EMPEROR CHARLES V.

BOOK V.

THE account of the cruel manner in which the pope had been treated, filled all Europe with aftonishment or horror. To fee a Christian emperor, who by possefing that dignity ought to have been the protector and advocate of the holy fee, lay violent hands on him who reprefented Chrift on earth, and detain his facred perfon in a rigorous captivity was confidered as an impiety that merited the fevereft vengeance, and which called for the immediate interpolition of every dutiful fon of the Church. Francis and Henry, alarmed at the progrefs of the Imperial arms in Italy, had even before the taking of Rome, entered into a clofer alliance; and, in order to give fome check to the emperor's ambition. had agreed to make a vigorous diversion in the Low Countries. The force of every motive which had influenced them at that time was now increased; and to thefe were added the defire of refcuing the pope out of the emperor's hands, a meafure no lefs politic than it appeared to be pious. This, however, rendered it neceffary to abandon their hoftile intentions against the Low Countries, and to make Italy the feat of war, as it was by vigorous operations there they might contribute most effectually towards delivering Rome, and fetting Clement at liberty. Francis being now fenfible that, in his fystem with regard to the affairs of Italy, the fpirit of refinement had carried him too far; and that, by an excels of remiffnels, he had allowed Charles to attain advantages which he might eafily have prevented; was eager to make reparation for an error, of which he was not often guilty, by an activity more fuitable to his temper. Henry thought his interpolition ncceffary, in order to hinder the emperor from becoming mafter of all Italy, and acquiring by that means fuch fuperiority of power, as would enable him for the future to dictate without controul to the other princes of Europe. Wolfey, whom Francis had taken care to fecure by flattery and prefents, the certain methods of gaining his favour, neglected nothing that could infenfe his mafter against the emperor. Befides all these public confiderations, Henry was influenced by one of a more private nature; having begun about this time to form his great fcheme of divorcing Catherine of Aragon, towards the execution of which he knew that the fanction of papal authority would be neceffary, he was defirous to acquire as much merit as pollible with Clement, by appearing to be the chief inftrument of his deliverance.

The negotiation, between princes thus disposed, was not tedious. Wolfey himfelf conducted it, on the part of his fovereign, with unbounded powers, Francis treated with him in perfon at Amiens [July 11], where the cardinal appeared, and was received with royal magnificence. A marriage between the duke of Orleans and the princefs Mary was agreed to as the bafis of the confederacy; it was refolved that Italy should be the theatre of war, the strength of the army which should take the field, as well as the contingent of troops or of money, which each prince should furnish, were settled; and if the emperor did not accept of the propofals which they were jointly to make him, they bound themfelves immediately to declare war, and to begin hoftilities [Aug. 18]. Henry, who took every refolution with impctuofity, entered fo eagerly into this new alliance, that, in order to give Francis the flrongeft proof of his friendship and refpect, he formally renounced the ancient claim of the English monarchs to the crown of France, which had long been the pride and ruin of the nation; as a full compensation for which he accepted a pension of fifty thousand crowns, to be paid annually to himself and his fuccessors*.

The pope, being unable to fulfil the conditions of his capitulation, ftill remained a prifoner under the fevere cuftody of Alarçon. The Florentines no fooner heard of what had happened at Rome, than they ran to arms in a tumultuous manner; expelled the cardinal di Cortona, who governed their city in the pope's name; defaced the arms of the Medici; broke in pieces the flatues of Lco and Clement; and declaring themfelves a free flate, re-eflablifhed their ancient popular government. The Venetians, taking advantage of the calamity of their ally the pope, feized Ravenna, and other places belonging to the church, under pretext of keeping them in deposite. The dukes of Urbino and Ferrara laid hold likewife on part of the fpoils of the unfortunate pontiff, whom they confidered as irretrievably ruined  $\frac{1}{2}$ .

Lannoy, on the other hand, laboured to derive fome folid benefit from that unforefeen event, which gave fuch fplendour and fuperiority to his mafter's arms. For this purpofe he marched to Rome, together with Moncada, and the marquis del Guafto, at the head of all the troops which they could affemble in the kingdom of Naples. The arrival of this reinforcement brought new calamities on the unhappy citizens of Rome; for the foldiers envying the wealth of their companions, imitated their licence, and with the utmoft rapaeity gathered the gleanings, which had efcaped the avarice of the Spaniards and Germans. There was not now any army in Italy capable of making head againft the Imperialifts; and nothing more was requifite to reduce Bologna, and the other towns in the ecclefiaftical flate, than to have appeared before them. But the foldiers having been to long accuftomed, under Bourbon, to an entire relaxation of discipline, and having tafted the fweets of living at diferetion in a great city, almost without the controul of a superior, were become so impatient of military subordination, and fo averfe to fervice, that they refufed to leave Rome, unless all their arrears were paid ; a condition which they knew to be impoffible. At the fame time, they declared, that they would not obey any other perfon than the prince of Orange, whom the army had chosen general. Lannoy, finding that it was no longer fafe for him to remain among licentious troops, who defpifed his dignity, and hated his perfon, returned to Naples; foon after the marquis del Guasto and Moncada thought it prudent to quit Rome for the fame reafon. The prince of Orange, a general only in name, and by the most precarious of all tenures, the goodwill of foldiers, whom fuccefs and licence had rendered capricious, was obliged to pay more attention to their humours, than they did to his commands. Thus the emperor, inftead of reaping any of the advantages which he might have expected from the reduction of Rome, had the mortification to fee the most formidable body of troops that he had ever brought into the field, continue in a flate of inactivity, from which it was impoffible to roufe them *.

This gave the king of France and the Venetians leifure to form new fchemes, and to enter into new engagements for delivering the pope, and preferving the liberties of Italy. The newly reflored republic of Florence very imprudently joined with them, and Lautrec, of whofe abilities the Italians entertained a much more favourable opinion than his own mafter, was, in order to gratify them, appointed generaliftimo of the league. It was with the utmost reluctance he undertook that office, being unwilling to expose himfelf a fccond time to the difficulties and difgraces, which the negligence of the king, or the malice of his favourites, might bring upon him. The best troops in France marched under his command; and the king of England, though he had not yet declared war against the emperor, advanced a confiderable fum towards carrying on the expedition. Lautrec's first operations were prudent, vigorous and successful. By the affistance of Andrew Doria, the ablest fca officer of that age, he rendered himfelf mafter of Genoa, and re cftablifhed in that republic the faction of the Fregofi, together with the dominion of France. He obliged Alexandria to furrender after a fhort fiege, and reduced all the country onthat fide of the Tefino. He took Pavia, which had fo long refifted the arms of his fovereign, by affault, and plundered. it with that cruelty, which the memory of the fatal difafter that had befallen the French nation before its walls naturally infpired. All the Milancfe, which Antonio de Leyvadefended with a small body of troops, kept together, and, fupported by his own address and industry, must have soon fubmitted to his power, if he had continued to bend the force of his arms against that country. But Lautrec durst not complete a conquest which would have been fo honourable to himfelf, and of fuch advantage to the league. Francis knew his confederates to be more defirous of circumfcribing the Imperial power in Italy, than of acquiring new territories for him; and was afraid, that if Sforza were once re-established in Milan, they would fecond but coldly the attack which he intended to make on the kingdom of Naples. For this reason he instructed Lautree not to push his operations with too much vigour in Lombardy; and happily the importunities of the pope, and the folicitations of the Florentines, the one for relief, and the other for protection, were fo urgent as to furnish him with a decent pretext for marching forward, without yielding to the intreaties of the Venetians and Sforza, who infifted on his laying fiege to Milan*.

While Lautree advanced flowly towards Rome, the em-

Venet. lib. iii. 238. peror had time to deliberate concerning the difpofal of the pope's perfon, who still remained a prifoner in the castle of St. Angelo. Notwithstanding the specious veil of religion, with which he ufually endeavoured to cover his actions, Charles, in many inftances, appears to have been but little under the influence of religious confiderations, and had frequently, on this occasion, expressed an inelination to transport the pope into Spain, that he might indulge his ambition with the fpectacle of the two most illustrious perfonages in Europe fucceffively prifoners in his court. But the fear of giving new offence to all Christendom, and of filling his own fabjects with horror, obliged him to forego that fatisfaction*. The progrefs of the confederates made it now neceffary, either to fet the pope at liberty, or to remove him to fome place of confinement more fecure than the caftle of St. Angelo. Many confiderations induced him to prefer the former, particularly his want of the money, requifite as well for recruiting his army, as for paying off the vast arrears due to it. In order to obtain this, he had affembled the Cortes of Caffile at Valladolid about the beginning of the year, and having laid before them the flate of his affairs, and reprefented the neceffity of making great preparations to refift the enemies, whom envy at the fuccefs which had crowned his arms would unite against him, he demanded a large fupply in the most preffing terms [Feb. 11]; but the Cortes, as the nation was already exhausted by extraordinary donatives, refused to load it with any new burden, and in fpite of all his endeavours to gain or to intimidate the members, perfifted in this refolution +. No refource, therefore, remained, but the extorting from Clement by way of ranfom, a fum fufficient for difcharging what was due to his troops, without which it was vain to mention to them their leaving Rome.

Nor was the pope inactive on his part, or his intrigues unfuccefsful towards haftening fuch a treaty. By flattery, and the appearance of unbounded confidence; he difarmed the refentment of cardinal Colonna, and wrought upon his vanity, which made him defirous of fhewing the world, that as his power had at first depressed the pope, it could now raife him to his former dignity. By favours and promifes he gained Moronè, who, by one of those whimfieal revolutions which occur fo often in his life, and which fo ftrongly difplay his character, had now recovered his eredit and authority with the Imperialists. The address and influence of two fuch men eafily removed all the obltacles which retarded an. accommodation, and brought the treaty for Clement's liberty to a conclusion, upon conditions hard indeed, but not more fevere than a prince in his fituation had reafon to expect. He was obliged to advance, in ready money, an hundred thousand crowns for the use of the army; to pay the fame fum at the diftance of a fortnight; and at the end of three months, an hundred and fifty thousand more. He engaged not to take part in the war against Charles, either in Lombardy or in Naples; he granted him a bull of eruzado, and the tenth of ecclefiaftical revenues in Spain; and he not only gave hoftages, but put the emperor in poffellion of feveral towns, as a fecurity for the performance of thefe articles*. Having raifed the first molety by a fale of ecclefiaftical dignities and benefices, and other expedients equally uncanonical, a day was fixed for delivering him from imprifonment [Dec. 6]. But Clement, impatient to be free, after a tedious confinement of fix months, as well as full of the fufpicion and diffrust natural to the unfortunate, was fo much afraid that the Imperialists might fill throw in obftacles to put off his deliverance, that he difguifed himfelf, on the night preceding the day when he was to be fet free, in the liabit of a merchant, and Alarçon having remitted fomewhat of his vigilance upon the conclusion of the treaty, he made his eseape undifcovered. He arrived before next morning at Orvietto, without any atte... dants but a fingle officer; and from thence wrote a letter of thanks to Lautree, as the chief inftrument of procuring him liberty+.

During thefe transactions, the ambassadors of France and England repaired to Spain, in confequence of the treaty which Wolfey had concluded with the French king. The emperor, unwilling to draw on himfelf the united forces of the two monarchs, difcovered an inclination to relax fomewhat the rigour of the treaty of Madrid, to which, hitherto, he had adhered inflexibly. He offered to accept of the two millions of crowns, which Francis had propofed to pay as an equivalent for the dutchy of Burgundy, and to fet his fons at liberty, on condition that he would recal his army out of Italy, and reftore Genoa, together with the other conquests which he had made in that country. With regard to Sforza, he infifted that his fate fhould be determined by the judges appointed to inquire into his crimes. Thefe propolitions being made to Henry, he transmitted them to his ally the French king, whom it more nearly concerned to examine and to answer them; and if Francis had been fincerely folicitous, either to conclude peace or preferve confiftency in his own conduct, he ought inftantly to have clofed with overtures which differed but little from the propofitions which he himfelf had formerly madet. But his views were now much changed; his alliance with Henry, Lautrec's progrefs in Italy, and the fuperiority of his army there above that of the emperor, hardly left him room to doubt of the fuccefs of his enterprife against Naples. Full of those fanguine hopes, he was at no lofs to find pretexts for rejecting or evading what the emperor had proposed. Under the appearance of fympathy with Sforza, for whole interefts he had not hitherto difcovered much folicitude, he again demanded the full and unconditional re-eftablishment of that unfortunate prince in his dominions. Under colour of its being imprudent to rely on the emperor's funcerity, he infifted that his fons fhould be fet at liberty before the French troops left Italy, or furrendered Genoa. The unreaforablenefs of thefe demands, as well as the reproachful infinuation with which they were accompanied, irritated Charles to fuch a degree, that he could hardly liften to them with patience; and repenting of his moderation, which had made fo little imprefion on his enemies, declared that he would not depart in the fmalleft article from the conditions which he had now offered. Upon this the French and Englifh ambaffadors (for Henry had been drawn unaccountably to concur with Francis in thefe ftrange propositions) demanded and obtained their audience of leave†.

Next day [Jan. 22, 1528,] two heralds who had accompanied the ambaffadors on purpofe, though they had hitherto concealed their character, having affumed the enfigns of their office, appeared in the emperor's court, and being admitted into his prefence, they, in the name of their respective masters, and with all the folemnities customary on fuch occasions, denounced war against him. Charles received both with a dignity fuitable to his own rank, but fpoke to each in a tone adapted to the fentiments which he entertained of their respective fovereigns. He accepted the defiance of the English monarch with a firmnels tempered by fome degree of decency and refpect. His reply to the French king abounded with that acrimony of expression, which perfonal rivalship, exasperated by the memory of many injuries inflicted as well as fuffered, naturally fuggefts. He defired the French herald to acquaint his fovereign, that he would henceforth confider him not only as a bafe violator of public faith, but as a stranger to the honour and integrity becoming a gentleman. Francis, too high-fpirited to bear fuch an imputation, had recourfe to an uncommon expedient in order to vindicate his character. He inftantly fent back the herald with a cartel of defiance, in which he gave the emperor the lie in form, challenged him to fingle combat, requiring him to name the time and place of the encounter, and the weapons with which he chofe to fight. Charles, as he was not inferior to his rival in fpirit or bravery; readily accepted the challenge; but, after feveral meffages concerning the arrangement of all the circumflances relative to the combat, accompanied with mutual reproaches, bordering on the moft indecent fcurrility, all thoughts of this duel, more becoming the heroes of romance than the two greatest monarchs of their age, were entirely laid afide*.

The example of two perfonages fo illustrious drew fuch general attention, and carried with it fo much authority,. that it had confiderable influence in producing an important: change in manners all over Europe. Duels, as has already been obferved, had long been permitted by the laws of all the. European nations, and forming a part of their jurifprudence, were authorifed by the magistrate, on many occasions as themost proper method of terminating questions with regard toproperty, or of deciding those which respected crimes. But fingle combats being confidered as folemn appeals to the omnifcience and justice of the Supreme Being, they were allowed only in public caufes, according to the prefeription of law, and carried on in a judicial form. Men accustomed to this manner of decifions in a court of justice, were naturally led to apply it to perfonal and private quarrels. Duels, which at first could be appointed by the civil judge alone, were fought without the interpolition of his authority, and in cafes to which the laws did not extend. The transaction between Charles and Francis flrongly countenanced this practice. Upon every affront, or injury, which feemed to touch his honour, a gentleman thought himfelf entitled to draw his fword, and to call on his adverfary to give him fatisfaction. Such an opinion becoming prevalent among men of fierce courage, of high fpirit, and of rude manners, when offence was often given, and revenge was always prompt, produced most fatal confequences. Much of the beft blood in Chriftendom was fhed; many ufeful lives were facrificed; and, at fome periods, war itfelf had hardly been more deftructive than thefe private contefts of honour. So powerful, however, is the dominion of fashion, that neither the terror of penal laws, nor reverence for religion, have been able entirely to abolish a practice unknown among the ancients, and not justifiable by any principle of reason; though at the fame time, it must be admitted, that to this abfurd custom, we must aferibe in some degree the extraordinary gentleness and complaifance of modern manners, and that respectful attention of one man to another, which, at prefent, render the focial intercourfes of life far more agreeable and decent, than among the most civilized nations of antiquity.

While the two monarchs feemed fo eager to terminate their quarrel by a perfonal combat, Lautrec continued his operations, which promifed to be more decifive. His army, which was now increafed to thirty five thoufand men, ad: vanced by great marches towards Naples [Feb.]. The terror of their approach, as well as the remonstrances and the entreaties of the prince of Orange, prevailed at last on the Imperial troops, though with difficulty, to quit Rome, of which they had kept poffeffion during ten months. But of that flourishing army which had entered the eity, fcarcely one half remained; the reft, cut off by the plague, or walted by difeases, the effects of their inactivity, intemperance, and debauchery, fell victims to their own erimes*. Lautree made the greateft efforts to attack them in their retreat towards the Neapolitan territories, which would have finished the war at one blow. But the prudence of their leaders difappointed all his meafures, and conducted them with little lofs to Naples. The people of that kingdom, extremely impatient to fhake off the Spanish yoke, received the French with open arms, wherever they appeared to take poffeffion; and Gaeta and Naples excepted, hardly any place of importance remained in the hands of the Imperialifts. The prefervation of the former was owing to the ftrength of its fortifications, that of the latter to the prefence of the Imperial army. Lautrec, however, fat down before Naples; but finding it vain to think of reducing a city by force while defended by'a whole army, he was obliged to employ the flower, but lefs dangerous method of blockade; and having taken measures which appeared to him effectual, he confidently affured his mafter, that famine would foon compel the befieged to capitulate. Thefe hopes were ftrongly confirmed by the defeat of a vigorous attempt made by the enemy in order to recover the command of the fea. The gallies of Andrew Doria, under the command of his nephew Philippino, guarded the mouth of the harbour. Moncada, who had fucceeded Lannoy in the viceroyalty, rigged out a number of gallies fuperior to Doria's, manned them with a chofen body of Spanish veterans, and going on board himfelf, together with the marquis del Guafto, attacked Philippino. before the arrival of the Venetian and French fleets. But the Genoefe admiral, by his fuperior skill in naval operations, eafily triumphed over the valour and number of the. Spaniards. The viceroy was killed, most of his fleet de-Aroved, and Guafto, with many officers of diffinction, being taken prifoners, were put on board the captive gallies. and fent by Philippino as trophies of his victory to his uncle*.

Notwithflanding this flattering profpect of fuccels, many circumflances concurred to fruftrate Lautrec's expectations. Clement, though he always acknowledged his being indebted to Francis for the recovery of his liberty, and often complained of the cruel treatment which he had met with from the emperor, was not influenced at this juncture by principles of gratitude, nor, which is more extraordinary, was he fwayed by the defire of revenge. His paft misfortunes rendered him more cautious than ever, and his recollection of the errors which he had committed, increased the natural irrefolution of his mind. While he amufed Francis with promifes, he fecretly negotiated with Charles; and being folicitous, above all things, to re-eftablish his family in Florence with its ancient authority, which he could not expect from Francis, who had entered into frict alliance with the new republic, he leaned rather to the fide of his enemy than to that of his benefactor, and gave Lautree no affiftance towards carrying on his operations. The Venetians, viewing with jealoufy the progrefs of the French arms, were intent only upon recovering fuch maritime towns in the Neapolitan dominions as were to be polieffed by their republic, while they were altogether carelefs about the reduction of Naples, on which the fuccefs of the common caufe depended*. The king of England, instead of being able, as had been projected, to embarraís the emperor by attacking his territories in the Low Countries, found his fubjects fo averfe to an unncceffary war, which would have ruined the trade of the nation, that in order to filence their clamours and put a ftop to the infurrections ready to break out among them, he was compelled to conclude a truce for eight months with the governels of the Netherlands +. Francis himfelf, with the fame unpardonable inattention of which he had formerly been guilty, and for which he had fuffered fo feverely, neglected to make proper remittances to Lautrec for the fupport of his army §.

These unexpected events retarded the progress of the French, discouraging both the general and his troops; but the revolt of Andrew Doria proved a fatal blow to all their measures. That gallant officer, the citizen of a republic, and trained up from his infancy in the sea fervice, retained the spirit of independence natural to the former, together with the plain liberal manners peculiar to the latter.

A ftranger to the arts of fubmifion and flattery neceffary

in courts, but confcious at the fame time of his own merit and importance, he always offered his advice with freedom, and often preferred his complaints and remonstrances with boldnefs. The French minifters, unaccuftomed to fuch liberties, determined to ruin a man who treated them with fo little deference; and though Francis himfelf had a just fenfe of Doria's fervices, as well as an high effect for his character, the courtiers, by continually reprefenting him as a man haughty, intractable, and more folicitous to aggrandize himfelf, than to promote the interest of France, gradually undermined the foundations of his credit, and filled the king's mind with fufpicion and diftruft. From thence proceeded feveral affronts and indignities put upon Doria. His appointments were not regularly paid; his advice, even in naval affairs, was often flighted; an attempt was made to feize the prifoners taken by his nephew in the fea fight off Naples; all which he bore with abundance of ill humour. But an injury offered to his country transported him beyond all bounds of patience. The French began to fortify Savona, to clear its harbour, and removing thither fome branches of trade carried on at Genoa, plainly fhewed that they intended to render that town, which had been fo long the object of jealoufy and hatred to the Genoefe, their rival in wealth and commerce. Doria, animated with a patriotic zeal for the honour and interest of his country, remonstrated against this in the higheft tone, not without threats, if the measure were not infantly abandoned. This bold action, aggravated by the malice of the courtiers, and placed in the most odious light, irritated Francis to fuch a degree, that he commanded Barbefieux, whom he appointed admiral of the Levant, to fail directly to Genoa with the French fleet, to arreft Doria, and to feize his gallies. This rafh order, the execution of which could have been fecured only by the moft profound fecrecy, was concealed with fo little care, that Doria got timely intelligence of it, and retired with all his gallies to a place of fafety. Guafto, his prifoner, who had long ob. ferved and fomented his growing difcontent, and had often allured him by magnificent promifes to enter into the emperor's fervice, laid hold on this favourable opportunity. While his indignation and refentment were at their height, he prevailed on him to difpatch one of his officers to the Imperial court with his overtures and demands. The negotiation was not long; Charles fully fenfible of the importance of fuch an acquifition, granted him whatever terms he required. Doria fent back his commiffion, together with the collar of St. Michael, to Francis, and hoifting the Imperial colours, failed with all his gallies towards Naples, not to block up the harbour of that unhappy city, as he had formerly engaged, but to bring them protection and deliverance.

His arrival opened the communication with the fea, and reftored plenty in Naples, which was now reduced to the laft extremity; and the French having loft their fuperiority at fea, were foon reduced to great straits for want of provifions. The prince of Orange, who fucceeded the viceroy in the command of the Imperial army, fhewed himfelf by his prudent conduct worthy of that honour which his good fortune and the death of his generals had twice acquired him. Beloved by the troops, who remembering the profperity which they had enjoyed under his command, ferved him with the utmost alacrity, he let flip no opportunity of haraffing the enemy, and by continual alarms or fallies fatigued and weakened them*. As an addition to all thefe misfortunes, the difeafes common in that country during the fultry months, began to break out among the French troops. The prifoners communicated to them the peftilence which the Imperial army had brought to Naples from Rome, and it raged with fuch violence, that few, either officers or foldiers, efcaped the infection. Of the whole army, not four thousand men, a number hardly sufficient to defend the camp, were capable of doing duty+; and being now befieged in their turn, they fuffered all the mileries from which the Imperialists were delivered. Lautrec, after fruggling long with fo many difappointments and calamities, which preyed on his mind at the fame time that the pestilence wasted his body, died [August 15], lamenting the negligence of his fovereign, and the infidelity of his allies, to which fo many brave men had fallen victims t. By his death, and the indifpolition of the other generals the command devolved on the marquis de Saluces, an officer altogether unequal to fuch a truft. He, with troops no lefs difpirited than reduced, retreated in diforder to Averfa; which town being invefted by the prince of Orange, Saluces was under the neceffity of confenting, that he himfelf should remain a prifoner of war, that his troops should lay down their arms and colours, give up their baggage, and march under a guard to the frontiers of France. 'By this ignominious capitulation, the wretched remains of the French army were faved; and the emperor, by his own perfeverance and the good conduct of his generals, acquired once more the fuperiority in Italy*.

The lofs of Genoa followed immediately upon the ruin of the army in Naples. To deliver his country from the dominion of foreigners was Doria's higheft ambition, and had been his principal inducement to quit the fervice of France, and enter into that of the emperor. A moft favourable opportunity for executing this honourable enterprife now prefented itfelf. The city of Genoa, afflicted by the peftilence, was almost deferted by its inhabitants; the French garrifon, being neither regularly paid nor recruited was reduced to an inconfiderable number; Doria's emiffaries found that fuch of the citizens as remained, being weary alike of the French and Imperial yoke, the rigour of which they had alternately felt, were ready to welcome him as their deliverer, and to fecond all his measures. Things wearing this promifing afpect, he failed towards the coait of Genoa; on his approach the French gallies retired; a finall body of men which he landed furprifed one of the gates of Genoa in the night-time; Trivulci, the French governor, with his feeble garrifon, flut himfelf up in the citadel, and Doria took poffeffion of the town without bloodfhed or refiftance [September 12]. Want of provisions quickly obliged Trivulci to capitulate; the people, eager to abolithfuch an odious monument of their fervitude, ran together with a tumultuous violence, and levelled the citadel with the ground.

It was now in Doria's power to have rendered himfelf the fovereign of his country, which he had fo happily delivered from oppression. The fame of his former actions, the fuccels of his prefent attempt, the attachment of his friends, the gratitude of his countrymen, together with the fupport of the emperor, all confpired to facilitate his attaining the fupreme authority, and invited him to lay hold of it. But with a magnanimity of which there are few examples, he facrificed all thoughts of aggrandizing himfelf to the virtuous fatisfaction of establishing liberty in his country, the higheft object at which ambition can aim. Having affembled the whole body of the people in the court before his palace, he affured them, that the happiness of feeing them once more in poffellion of freedom was to him a full reward for all his fervices; that, more delighted with the name of citizen than of fovereign, he claimed no pre-eminence or power above his equals; but remitted entirely to them the right of fettling what form of government they would now chufe to be established among them. The people listened to him with tears of admiration and of joy. Twelve perfons were elected to new model the conftitution of the republic. The influence of Doria's virtue and example communicated itfelf to his countrymen; the factions which had long torn and ruined the flate feemed to be forgotten; prudent precautions were taken to prevent their reviving; and the fame form of government which has fubfilled with little variation fince that time in Genoa was established with univerfal applaufe. Doria lived to a great age, beloved, respected, and honoured by his countrymen; and adhering uniformly to his professions of moderation, without arrogating any thing unbecoming a private citizen, he preferved a great afcendant over the councils of the republic, which owed its being to his generofity. The authority which he poffeffed was more flattering, as well as more fatisfactory, than that derived from fovereignty; a dominion founded in love and in gratitude; and upheld by veneration for his virtues, not by the dread of his power. His memory is still reverenced by the Genoefe, and he is diftinguished in their public monuments, and celebrated in the works of their hiftorians, by the most honourable of all appellations, THE FA-THER OF HIS COUNTRY, AND THE RESTOR-ER OF ITS LIBERTY*.

1529.] Francis in order to recover the reputation of his arms, difcredited by fo many loffes, made new efforts in the Milanefe. But the count of St. Pol, a rash and unexperienced officer, to whom he gave the command, was no match for Antonio de Leyva, the ableft of the Imperial generals. He, by his fuperior skill in war, checked with a handful of men, the brifk, but ill-concerted motions of the French; and though fo infirm himfelf that he was cairied conftantly in a litter, he furpassed them, when occasion required, no lefs in activity than in prudence. By an unexpected march he furprifed, defeated, and took prifoner the count of St. Pol, ruining the French army in the Milanefe as entirely as the prince of Orange had ruined that which befieged Naples +.

Amidst these vigorous operations in the field, each party difcovered an impatient defire of peace, and continual negotiations were carried on for that purpofe. The French king, difcouraged, and almost exhausted, by fo many unfuccessful enterprifes, was reduced now to think of obtaining the releafe of his fons by conceffions, not by the terror of his. arms. The pope hoped to recover by a treaty whatever he had loft in the war. The emperor, notwithstanding the advantages which he had gained, had many reafons to make him with for an accommodation. Solyman, having over-run Hungary, was ready to break in upon the Auftrian territories with the whole force of the Eaft. The reformation gaining ground daily in Germany, the princes who favoured it had entered into a confederacy which Charles thought dangerous to the tranquillity of the empire. The Spaniards murmured at a war of fuch unufual length, the weight of which refted chiefly on them. The variety and extent of the emperor's operations far exceeded what his revenues could fupport; his fuccefs hitherto had been owing chiefly to his own good fortune and to the abilities of his generals,. nor could he flatter himfelf that they, with troops defiitute of every thing neceffary, would always triumph over enemies ftill in a condition to renew their attacks. All parties, however, were at equal pains to conceal or to diffemble their real fentiments. The emperor, that his inability to carry on the war might not be fufpected, infifted on high terms in the. tone of a conqueror. The pope, folicitous not to lofe his. prefent allies before he came to any agreement with Charles, continued to make a thousand protestations of fidelity to the former, while he privately negotiated with the latter. Fran-cis, afraid that his confederates might prevent him by treat-ing for themfelves with the emperor, had recourfe to many dithonourable artifices, in order to turn their attention from the meafures which he was taking to adjust all differences with his rival.

In this fituation of affairs, when all the contending powers wifhed for peace, but durft not venture too haftily on the fteps neceffary for attaining it, two ladies undertook to procure this bleffing fo much defired by all Europe [May].

Thefe were Margaret of Auftria, dutchefs-dowager of Savoy, the emperor's aunt, and Louife, Francis's mother. They agreed on an interview at Cambray, and being lodged in two adjoining houfes, between which a communication was opened, met together without ceremony or obfervation, and held daily conferences, to which no perfon whatever was admitted. As both were profoundly fkilled in bufinefs, thoroughly acquainted with the fecrets of their refpective courts, and poffeffed with perfect confidence in each other, they foon made great progrefs towards a final accommodation, and the ambaffadors of all the confederates waited in anxious fufpenfe to know their fate, the determination of which was entirely in the hands of thofe illuftrious negotiators†.

But whatever diligence they used to haften forward a general peace, the pope had the address and industry to get the ftart of his allies, by concluding at Barcelona a particular treaty for himfelf [June 20.] The emperor, impatient to visit Italy in his way to Germany, and defirous of reeftablishing tranquillity in the one country, before he attempted to compose the diforders which abounded in the other, found it necessary to fecure at least one alliance among the Italian flates, on which he might depend. That with Clement, who courted it with unwearied importunity, feemed more proper than any other. Charles being extremely folicitous to make fome reparation for the infults which he had offered to the facred character of the pope, and to redeem paft offences by new merit, granted Clement, notwithflanding all his misfortunes, terms more favourable than he could have expected after a continued feries of fuccefs. Among other articles, he engaged to reftore all the territories belonging to the ecclefiaftical flate; to re-eftablish the dominion of the Medici in Florence; to give his natural daugh. ter in marriage to Alexander the head of that family; and to put it in the pope's power to decide concerning the fate of Sforza, and the poffeffion of the Milanefe. In return for thefe ample conceffions, Clement gave the emperor the inveftiture of Naples without the referve of any tribute, but the prefent of a white fteed, in acknowledgment of his fovereignty; abfolved all who had been concerned in affaulting and plundering Rome, and permitted Charles and his brother Ferdinand to levy the fourth of the ecclefiaftical revenues throughout their dominions+.

The account of this transaction quickened the negotiations at Cambray, and brought Margaret and Louife to an immediate agreement [Aug. 5]. The treaty of Madrid ferved as the basis of that which they concluded; the latter being intended to mitigate the rigour of the former. The chief articles werc, That the emperor should not, for the prefent, demand the reftitution of Burgundy, referving however, in full force, his rights and pretensions to that dutchy; That Francis should pay two millions of crowns as the ranfom of his fons, and, before they were fet at liberty, fhould reftore fuch towns as he still held in the Milanefe; That he should refign his pretensions to the fovereignty of Flanders and of Artois; That he should renounce all his pretensions to Naples, Milan, Genoa, and every other place beyond the Alps; That he fhould immediately confummate the marriage concluded between him and the emperor's fifter Eleonoras.

Thus Francis, chiefly from his impatience to procure liberty to his fons, facrificed every thing which had at firft prompted him to take arms, or which had induced him, by continuing hoftilities during nine fucceffive campaigns, to protract the war to a length hardly known in Europe before the eftablifhment of ftanding armies, and the imposition of exorbitant taxes, became univerfal. The emperor, by this treaty, was rendered fole arbiter of the fate of Italy; he delivered his territories in the Netherlands from an unpleafant badge of fubjection; and after having baffled his rival in the field, he prefcribed to him the conditions of peace. The different conduct and fpirit with which the two monarchs carried on the operations of war, led naturally to fuch an iffue of it. Charles, inclined by temper, as well as obliged by his fituation, concerted all his fchemes with caution, purfued them with perfeverance, and obferving circumflances and events with attention, let nonc cfcape that could be improved to advantage. Francis, more enterprifing than fleady, undertook great defigns with warmth, but often executed them with remiffnels; and diverted by his pleafures, or deceived by his favourites, he loft on feveral oceafions the most promising opportunities of fuccess. Nor had the character of the two rivals themfelves greater influence on theoperations of war, than the oppofite qualities of the generals. whom they employed. Among the Imperialists, valour tempered with prudence; fertility of invention aided by experi-ence; difcernment to penetrate the defigns of their enemies; a provident fagacity in conducting their own measures; in a. word, all the talents, which form great commanders and enfure victory, were confpicuous. Among the French, thefequalities were either wanting, or the very reverfe of them abounded; nor could they boaft of one man (unlefs we except: Lautrec, who was always unfortunate) that equalled the me --rit of Pescara, Leyva, Guasto, the prince of Orange, and other leaders, whom Charles had to fet in opposition to them. Bourbon, Morone, Doria, who by their abilities and conduct might have been capable of balancing the fuperiority which the Imperialifts had acquired, were induced to abandon the fervice of France, by the careleffnels of the king, and the malice or injuffice of his counfellors; and the most fatal blows given to France during the progrefs of the war, proceeded from the despair and resentment of these three perfons.

The hard conditions to which Francis was obliged to fubmit were not the most afflicting circumstances to him in the treaty of Cambray. He lost his reputation and the confidence of all Europe, by abaudoning his allies to his rival. Unwilling to enter into the details neceffary for adjufting their intcrefts, or afraid that whatever he claimed for them muft have been purchased by farther concessions on his own part, he gave them up in a body; and without the least provision in their behalf, left the Venetians, the Florentines, the duke of Ferrara, together with fuch of the Neapolitan barons as had joined his army, to the mercy of the emperor. They exclaimed loudly against this bafe and perfidious action, of which Francis himfelf was fo much ashamed, that, in order to avoid the pain of hearing from their ambaffadors the reproaches which he justly merited, it was fome time before he would confent to allow them an audience. Charles, on the other hand, was attentive to the intereft of every perfon who had adhered to him; the rights of fome of his Flemish fubjects, who had estates or pretensions in France, were fecured; one article was inferted, obliging Francis to reftore the blood and memory of the conftable Bourbon; and to grant his heirs the possession of his lands which had been forfeited; another, by which indemnification was flipulated for those French gentlemen who had accompanied Bourbon in his exiles. This conduct, laudable in itfelf, and placed in the most striking light by a comparison with that of Francis, gained Charles as much efteem as the fuccefs of his arms had acquired him glory.

Francis did not treat the king of England with the fame neglect as his other allies. He communicated to him all the flcps of his negotiation at Cambray, and luckily found that monarch in a fituation which left him no choice, but to approve implicitly of his measures, and to concur with them. Henry had been foliciting the pope for fome time, in order to obtain a divorce from Catharine of Aragon his queen. Several motives combined in prompting the king to urge his fuit. As he was powerfully influenced at fome feasons by religious confiderations, he entertained many fcruples concerning the legitimacy of his marriage with his brother's widow; his affections had long been ellranged from the queen, who was older than himfelf, and had loft all the charms which fhe poffeffed in the earlier part of her life; he was paffionately defirous of having male iffue: Wolfey artfully fortified his fcruples, and encouraged his hopes, that he might widen the breach between him and the emperor, Catharine's nephew, and, what was more forcible perhaps in its operation than all thefe united, the king had conceived a violent love for the celebrated Ann Boleyn, a young lady of great beauty, and of greater accomplishments, whom, as he found it impoffible to gain her on other terms, he determined to raife to the throne. The papal authority had often been interpofed to grant divorces for reafons lefs fpecious than those which Henry produced. When the matter was first propofed to Clement, during his imprifonment in the caftle of St. Angelo, as his hopes of recovering liberty depended entirely on the king of England, and his ally of France, he expressed the warmest inclination to gratify him. But no fooner was he fet free, than he difcovered other fentiments. Charles, who espoused the protection of his aunt with zeal inflamed by refentment, alarmed the pope on the one hand with threats, which made a deep impreffion on his timid mind; and allured him on the other with those promises in favour of his family, which he afterwards accomplished. Upon the profpect of thefe, Clement not only forgot all his obligations to Henry, but ventured to endanger the interest of the Romish religion in England, and run the rifque of alienating that kingdom for ever from the obedience of the papal fee. After amufing Henry during two years, with all the fubtleties and chicane which the court of Rome can fo dexteroufly employ to protract or defeat any caufe; after difplaying the whole extent of his ambiguous and deceitful policy, the intricacies of which the English historians, to whom it properly belongs, have found it no eafy matter to trace and unravel; he, at laft, recalled the powers of the delegates, whom he had appointed to judge in the point, avocated the caufe to Rome, leaving the king no other hope of obtaining a divorce, but from the perfonal decifion of the pope himfelf. As Clement was now in ftrict alliance with the emperor, who had purchased his friendship by the exorbitant concesfions which have been mentioned, Henry despaired of procuring any fentence from the former but what was dictated by the latter. His honour, however, and paffions concurred in preventing him from relinquishing his scheme of a divorce, which he determined to accomplifh by other means, and at any rate; and the continuance of Francis's friendship being neceffary to counterbalance the emperor's power, he, in order to fecure that, not only offered no remonstrances against the total neglect of their allies, in the treaty of Cambray, but made Francis the prefent of a large fum, as a brotherly contribution towards the payment of the ranfom for his fons 6.

Soon after the treaty of peace was concluded, the emperor landed in Italy with a numerous train of the Spanish nobility, and a confiderable body of troops [Aug. 12]. He left the government of Spain, during his abfence, to the emprefs Ifabella. By his long refidence in that country, he had acquired fuch thorough knowledge of the character of the people, that he could perfectly accommodate the maxims of his government to their genius. He could even affume, upon fome occafions, fuch popular manners, as gained wonderfully upon the Spaniards. A ftriking inftance of his difpo. fition to gratify them had occured a few days before he embarked for Italy: he was to make his public entry into the city of Barcelona; and fome doubts having arifen among the inhabitants, whether they fhould receive him as emperor, or as count of Barcelona; Charles inftantly decided in favour of the latter, declaring that he was more proud of that ancient title, than of his Imperial crown. Soothed with this flattering expression of his regard, the citizens welcomed him with acclamations of joy, and the states of the province store allegiance to his fon Philip, as heir of the county of Barcelona. A similar oath had been taken in all the kingdoms of Spain, with equal statisfaction *.

The emperor appeared in Italy with the pomp and power of a conqueror. Ambaffadors from all the princes and flates of that country attended his court, waiting to receive his decision with regard to their fate. At Genoa, where he first landed, he was received with the acclamations due to the protector of their liberties. Having honoured Doria with many marks of diffinction, and beflowed on the republic feveral new privileges, he proceeded to Bologna, the place fixed upon for his interview with the pope [Nov. 5.] He affected to unite in his public entry into that city the flate and majefly that fuited an emperor, with the humility becoming an obedient fon of the church; and while at the head of twenty thousand veteran foldiers, able to give law to all Italy, he kneeled down to kifs the feet of that very pope whom he had fo lately detained a prifoner. The Italians, after fuffering fo much from the ferocity and licentioufnefs of his armies, and after having been long accuftomed to form in their imagination a picture of Charles, which bore fome refemblance to that of the barbarous monarchs of the Goths or Huns, who had formerly afflicted their country with like calamities, were furprifed to fee a prince of a graceful appearance, affable and courteous in his deportment, of regular manners, and of exemplary attention to all the offices of religion t. They were fill more aftonished when he fettled all the concerns of the princes and flates which now depended on him, with a degree of moderation and equity much beyond what they had expected.

Charles himfelf, when he fet out from Spain, far from intending to give any fuch extraordinary proof of his felf-denial, feems to have been refolved to avail himfelf to the utmoft of the fuperiority which he had acquired in Italy. But various circumstances concurred in pointing out the necessity of purfuing a very different courfe. The progress of the Turkish fultan, who, after over-running Hungary, had penetrated into Auftria, [Sept. 13] and laid fiege to Vienna with an army of an hundred and fifty thousand men, loudly called upon him to collect his whole force to oppose that torrent; and though the valour of the Germans, the prudent conduct of Ferdinand, together with the treachery of the vizier, [Oct. 16] foon obliged Solyman to abandon that enterprife with difgrace and lofs, the religious diforders still growing in Germany rendered the prefence of the emperor highly neceffary there +: The Florentines, instead of giving their confent to the reestablishment of the Medici, which, by the treaty of Barce. lona, the emperor had bound himfelf to procure, were preparing to defend their liberty by force of arms; the preparations for his journey had involved him in unufual expences; and on this, as well as many other occasions, the multiplicity of his affairs, together with the narrownefs of his revenues, obliged him to contract the fchemes which his boundlefs ambition was apt to form, and to forego prefent and certain advantages, that he might guard against more remote but unavoidable dangers. Charles, from all thefe confiderations, finding it neceffary to affume an air of moderation, acted his part with a good grace. He admitted Sforza into his prefence, and not only gave him a full pardon of all paft offences, but granted him the investiture of the dutchy, together with his piece the king of Denmark's daughter in marriage. He allowed the duke of Ferrara to keep poffeffion of all his dominions, adjufting the points in difpute between him and the pope with an impartiality not very agreeable to the latter. He came to a final accommodation with the Venetians, upon the reafonable condition of their reftoring whatever they had usurped during the late war, either in the Neapolitan or papal territories. In return for fo many conceffions, he exacted confiderable fums from each of the powers with whom he treated, which they paid without reluctance, and which afforded him the means of proceeding on his journey towards Germany with a magnificence fuitable to his dignity  $\delta$ .

1530.] Thefe treaties, which reftored tranquillity to Italy after a tedious war, the calamities of which had chiefly affected that country, were published at Bologna with great folemnity on the first day of the year one thousand five hundred and thirty, amidst the universal acclamations of the people, applauding the emperor, to whole moderation and generolity they afcribed the bleffings of peace which they had fo long defired. The Florentines alone did not partake of this general joy. Animated with a zeal for liberty more laudable than prudent, they determined to oppose the reftoration of the Medici. The Imperial army had already entered their territories, and formed the fiege of their capital. But though deferted by all their allies, and left without any hope of fuccour, they defended themfelves many months with an obftinate valour worthy of better fuccefs; and even when they furrendered, they obtained a capitulation which gave them hopes of fecuring fome remains of their liberty. But the emperor, from his defire to gratify the pope, frustrated all their expectations, and abolished their ancient form of government, raifed Alexander di Medici to the fame abfolute dominion over that flate, which his family have retained to the prefent times. Philibert de Chalons, prince of Orange, the Imperial general, was killed during this fiege. His eftate and titles descended to his fister Claude de Chalons, who was married to Renè, count of Naffau, and she transmitted to her posterity of the houfe of Naffau the title of princes of Orange, which, by their fuperior talents and valour, they have rendered fo illustrious*.

§ Sandov. ii. 55, &c. Guic. l. xx. p. 341, &c. P. Heuter. Rer. Auftr. lib. ii c. 4. p. 236. 1530.]

After the publication of the peace at Bologna, and the ceremony of his coronation as king of Lombardy and emperor of the Romans [Feb. 22 and 24], which the pope performed with the accultomed formalities, nothing detained Charles in Italy +; and he began to prepare for his journey to Germany. His prefence became every day more neceffary in that country, and was folicited with equal importunity by the catholics and by the favourers of the new doctrines. During that long interval of tranquillity, which the abfence of the emperor, the contests between him and the pope, and his attention to the war with France, afforded them, the latter had gained much ground. Most of the princes who had embraced Luther's opinions, had not only established in their territories that form of worfhip which he approved, but had entirely suppressed the rites of the Romish church. Many of the free cities had imitated their conduct. Almoft one half the Germanic body had revolted from the papal fee, and its authority, even in those provinces which had not hitherto shaken off the yoke, was confiderably weakened, partly by the example of revolt in the neighbouring flates, partly by the fecret progrefs of the reformed doctrine even in those countries where it was not openly embraced. Whatever fatisfaction the emperor, while he was at open cnmity with the fee of Rome, might have felt in thosc events which tended to mortify and embarrafs the pope, he could not help perceiving now, that the religious divisions in Germany would, in the end, prove extremely hurtful to the Imperial authority. The weakness of former emperors had fuffered the great vallals of the empire to make fuch fuccefsful encroachments upon their power and prerogative, that during the whole course of a war, which had often required the exertion of his utmost ftrength, Charles hardly drew any effectual aid from Germany, and found that magnificent titles or obfelete pretentions were almost the only advantages which he had gained by fwaying the Imperial fceptre. He became fully fenfible, that if he did not recover in fome degree the prerogatives which his predeceffors had loft, and acquire the authority, as well as poffefs the name, of head of the empire, his high dignity would contribute more to obftruct than to promote his ambitious fchemes. Nothing, he faw, was more effential towards attaining this, than to fupprefs opinions which might form new bonds of confederacy among the princes of the empire, and unite them by ties flronger and more facred than any political connection. Nothing feemed to lead more certainly to the accompliftment of his defign, than to employ zeal for the eftablifhed religion, of which he was the natural protector, as the inflrument of extending his civil authority.

Accordingly, a prospect no fooner opened of coming to an accommodation with the pope, than, by the emperor's appointment, a diet of the empire was held at Spires [March 15, 1529], in order to take into confideration the flate of religion. The decree of the diet affembled there in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-fix, which was almost equivalent to a toleration of Luther's opinions, had given great offence to the reft of Chriftendom. The greatest delicacy of addrefs, however, was requisite in proceeding to any decifion more rigorous. The minds of men kept in perpetual agitation by a controverly carried on, during twelve years, without intermission of debate, or abatement of zeal, were now inflamed to an high degree. They were accustomed to innovations, and faw the boldest of them fuccefsful. Having not only abolished old rites, but substituted new forms in their place, they were influenced as much by attachment to the fystem which they had embraced, as by averfion to that which they had abandoned. Luther himfelf, of a fpirit not to be worn out by the length and obflinacy of the combat, or to become remifs upon fuccefs, continued the attack with as much vigour as he had begun it. His disciples, of whom many equalled him in zeal, and fome furpaffed him in learning, were no lefs capable than their mafter to conduct the controverfy in the propereft manner. Many of the laity, fome even of the princes trained up amidft thefe inceffant disputations, and in the habit of liftening to the arguments of the contending parties, who alternately appealed to them as judges, came to be profoundly skilled in all the questions which were agitated and, upon occasion, could shew themselves not inexpert in any of the arts with which thefe theological encounters were managed. It was obvious from all thefe circumftances, that any violent decifion of the diet must have immediately precipitated matters into confusion, and have kindled in Germany the flames of a religious war. All, therefore, that the archduke, and the other commissioners appointed by the emperor, demanded of the diet, was, to enjoin those flatesof the empire which had hitherto obeyed the decree iffued. against Luther at Worms, in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-four, to perfevere in the observation of it, and to prohibit the other flates from attempting any farther innovation in religion, particularly from abolishing the mass, before the meeting of a general council. After much difpute, a decree to that effect was approved of by a majority of voices*.

The elector of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburgh, the landgrave of Heffe, the dukes of Lunenburgh, the prince of Anhalt, together with the deputies of fourteen Imperial or free citiest, entered a folemn proteft against this decree, as unjust and impious [April 19]. On that account they were diffinguished by the name of PRO-TESTANTS (, an appellation which hath fince become better known, and more honourable, by its being applied

t The fourteen cities were Strafburgh, Nuremburg, Ulm, Con-ftance, Reutlingen, Windscheim, Meinengen, Lindaw, Kempter-Hailbron, Ifna, Weiffemburgh, Nordlinger, and St. Gal. § Sleid. Hift. 119. F. Paul. Hift. p. 45. Seckend. ii: 127

Indiferiminately to all the feets, of whatever denomination, which have revolted from the Roman fee. Not fatisfied with this declaration of their diffent from the decree of the diet, the protestants fent ambaffadors into Italy, to lay their grievances before the emperor, from which they met with the most difcouraging reception. Charles was at that time in clofe union with the pope, and folicitous to attach him inviolably to his intereft. During their long refidence at Bologna, they held many confultations concerning the moft effectual means of extirpating the herefies which had fprung up in Germany. Clement, whofe cautious and timid mind the propofal of a general council filled with horror, even beyond what popes, the conftant enemies of fuch affemblies ufually feel, employed every argument to diffuade the emperor from confenting to that measure. , Hc represented general councils as factious, ungovernable, prefumptuous, formidable to civil authority, and too flow in their operations to remedy diforders which required an immediate curc. Experience, he faid, had now taught both the emperor and himfelf, that forbearance and lenity, inflead of foothing the ipirit of innovation, had rendered it more enterprising and prefumptuous; it was neceffary, therefore, to have recourfe to the rigorous methods which fuch a defperate cafe required; Leo's fentence of excommunication, together with the decree of the diet at Worms, fhould be carried into execution, and it was incumbent on the emperor to employ his whole power, in order to overawe those, on whom the reverence due either to ecclefiaftical or civil authority had no longer any influence. Charles, whofe views were very different from the pope's, and who became daily more fenfible how obflinate and deep-rooted the evil was, thought of reconciling the protestants by means lefs violent, and confidered the convocation of a council as no improper expedient for that purpose; but promised, if gentler arts failed of fucces, that then he would exert himfelf with rigour to reduce to the obedience of the holy fee those stubborn enemies of the catholic faith *.

Such were the fentiments with which the emperor fet out for Germany, having already appointed a diet of the empire to be held at Augsburg [March 22, 1530]. In his journey towards the city, he had many opportunities of obferving the difpolition of the Germans with regard to the points in controversy, and found their minds every where fo much irritated and inflamed, as convinced him, that nothing tending to feverity or rigour ought to be attempted, until all other meafures proved ineffectual. He made his public entry into Augsburg with extraordinary pomp [June 15], and found there fuch a full affembly of the members of the diet, as was fuitable both to the importance of the affairs which were to come under their confideration, and to the honour of an emperor, who, after a long absence, returned to them crowned with reputation and fuccefs. His prefence feems to have communicated to all parties an unufual fpirit of moderation and defire of peace. The elector of Saxony would not permit Luther to accompany him to the diet, left he should offend the emperor by bringing into his prefence a perfon excommunicated by the pope, and who had been the author of all those diffensions which it now appeared io difficult to compose. At the emperor's defire, all the protestant princes forbad the divines who accompanied them to preach in public during their refidence at Augfburg. For the fame reafon they employed Melancthon, the man of the greateft learning, as well as of the most pacific and gentle fpirit among the reformers, to draw up a confession of their faith, expressed in terms as little offensive to the Roman catholics, as a regard for truth would permit. Melancthon, who feldom fuffered the rancour of controverfy to envenom his ftyle, even in writings purely polemical, executed a talk fo agreeable to his natural difpolition with great moderation and addrefs. The creed which he compofed, known by the name of the Confeffion of Augsburg, from the place where it was prefented, was read publicly in the diet. Some popifh divines were appointed to examine it; they brought in their animadverfions; a difpute enfued between them and Melancthon, feconded by fome of his brethren; but though Melancthon foftened fome articles, made conceffions with regard to others, and put the leaft exceptionable fenfe upon all; though the emperor himfelf laboured with great earneftnefs to reconcile the contending parties; fo many marks of diffinction were now eftablifhed, and fuch infuperable barriers placed between the two churches, that all hopes of bringing about a coalition feemed utterly defperate†.

From the divines, among whom his endeavours had been fo unfuccefsful, Charles turned to the princes their patrons. Nor did he find them, how defirous focver of accommodation, or willing to oblige the emperor, more difpofed than the former to renounce their opinions. At that time, zeal for religion took poffeffion of the minds of men, to a degree. which can fcarcely be conceived by those that live in an agewhen the paffions excited by the first manifestation of truth, and the first recovery of liberty, have in a great measure ceased. to operate. This zeal was then of fuch ftrength as to overcome attachment to their political intereft, which is commonly the predominant motive among princes. The elector of Saxony', the landgrave of Heffe, and other chiefs of the protestants, though folicited feparately by the emperor, and. allured by the promife or profpect of those advantages which it was known they were most folicitous to attain, refufed, with a fortitude highly worthy of imitation, to abandon what they deemed the caufe of God, for the fake of any earthly acquisition §. Every scheme in order to gain or difunite the protestant party proving abortive, nothing now remained for the emperor but to take fome vigorous measures towards afferting the doctrines and authority of the established church. Thefe, Campeggio, the papal nuncio, had always recommended as the only proper and effectual course of dealing with fuch obstinate heretics. In compliance with his opinions and remonstrances, the diet iffued a decree [Nov. 19], condemning most of the peculiar tenets held by the protestants; forbidding any perfon to protect or tolerate fuch as taught them; enjoining a first observance of the established rites; and prohibiting any further innovation under severe penalties. All orders of men were required to affift with their perfons and fortunes in carrying this decree into execution; and fuch as refufed to obey it were declared incapable of acting as judges, or of appearing as parties in the Imperial chamber, the fupreme court of judicature in the empire. To all which was fubjoined a promife, that an application should be made to the pope, requiring him to call a general council within fix months, in order to terminate all controversies by its fovereign decisions *.

The feverity of this decree, which was confidered as a prelude to the moft violent perfecution, alarmed the proteftants, and convinced them that the emperor was refolved on their deftruction. The dread of those calamities which were ready to fall on the church, oppressed the feeble spirit of Melancthon; and, as if the cause had already been desperate, he gave himself up to melancholy and lamentation. But Luther, who during the meeting of the diet had endeavoured to confirm and animate his party by several treatifes which he addressed to them, was not disconcerted or dismayed at the prospect of this new danger. He comforted Melancthon, and his other desponding disciples, and exhorted the princes not to abandon those truths which they had lately afferted with fuch laudable boldneist. His exhortations made the deeper impreffion upon them, as they were greatly alarmed at that time by the account of a combination among the popifh princes of the empire for the maintenance of the established religion, to which Charles himself had acceded ||. This convinced them that it was neceffary to ftand on their guard; and that their own fafety, as well as the inccefs of their caufe, depended on union. Filled with this dread of the adverfe party, and with thefe fentiments concerning the conduct proper for themfelves, they affembled at Smalkalde. There they concluded a league of mutual defence against all aggreffors, [Dec. 22] by which they formed the protestant states of the empire into one regular body, and beginning already to confider themfelves as fuch, they refolved to apply to the kings of France and England, and to implore them to patronize and affift their new confederacy.

An affair not connected with religion furnished them with a pretence for courting the aid of foreign princes. Charles, whofe ambitious views enlarged in proportion to the increase of his power and grandeur, had formed a fcheme of continuing the Imperial crown in his family, by procuring his brother Ferdinand to be elected king of the Romans. The prefent juncture was favourable for the execution of that defign. The emperor's arms had been every where victorious; he had given law to all Europe at the late peace; no rival now remained in a condition to balance or to controul him; and the electors, dazzled with the fplendour of his fuccefs, or overawed by the greatness of his power, durft fcarcely difpute the will of a prince, whole folicitations carried with them the authority of commands. Nor did he want plaufible reasons to enforce the measure. The affairs of his other kingdoms, he faid, obliged him to be often abfent from Germany; the growing diforders occasioned by the contro-verfies about religion, as well as the formidable neighbourhood of the Turks, who continually threatened to break in with their defolating armies into the heart of the empire, required the conftant prefence of a prince endowed with prudence capable of composing the former, and with power as well as valour fufficient to repel the latter. His brother Ferdinand poffeffed these qualities in an eminent degree; by refiding long in Germany, he had acquired a thorough knowledge of its conflitution and manners; having been present almost from the first rife of the religious diffenfions, he knew what remedies were most proper, what the Germans could bear, and how to apply them; as his own dominions lay on the Turkish frontier, he was the natural desender of Germany against the invasions of the infidels, being prompted by interest no lefs than he would be bound in duty to oppose them.

These arguments made little impression on the protestants. Experience taught them, that nothing had contributed more to the undifturbed progress of their opinions, than the interregnum after Maximilian's death, the long abfence of Charles, and the flackness of the reins of government which these occasioned. Confcious of the advantages which their caufe had derived from this relaxation of government, they were unwilling to render it more vigorous, by giving themfelves a new and a fixed master. They perceived clearly the extent of Charles's ambition, that he aimed at rendering the Imperial crown hereditary in his family, and would of courfe eftablish in the empire an absolute dominion, to which elective princes could not have aspired with equal facility. They determined therefore to oppose the election of Ferdinand with the utmost vigour, and to rouse their countrymen, by their example and exhortations, to withftand this encroachment on their liberties. The elector of Saxony, accordingly, not only refused to be prefent at the electoral college, which the emperor fummoned to meet at Cologne [ January 5, 1531], but instructed his eldest fon to appear there, and to proteft against the election as informal, illegal, contrary to the articles of the golden bull, and fubversive of the liberties of the empire. But the other electors, whom Charles had been at great pains to gain, without regarding either his absence or protest, chose Ferdinand king of the Romans; who, a few days after was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle+.

When the protestants, who were assembled a fecond time at Smalkalde, received an account of this transaction, and heard, at the fame time, that profecutions were commenced, in the Imperial chamber, against fome of their number, on account of their religious principles, they thought it neceffary, not only to renew their former confederacy, but immediately to dispatch their ambassadors into France and England [Feb. 29]. Francis had observed, with all the jealoufy of a rival, the reputation which the emperor had acquired by his feeming difinterestedness and moderation in fettling the affairs of Italy; and beheld with great concern the fuccefsful flep which he had taken towards perpetuating and extending his authority in Germany by the election of a king of the Romans. Nothing, however, would have been more impolitic than to precipitate his kingdom into a new war when exhausted by extraordinary efforts, and difcouraged by ill fuccefs, before it had got time to recruit its ftrength, or to forget past misfortunes. As no provocation had been given by the emperor, and hardly a pretext for a rupture had been afforded him, he could not violate a treaty of peace which he himfelf had fo lately folicited, without forfeiting the efteem of all Europe, and being detefted as a prince void of probity and honour. He observed, with great joy, powerful factions beginning to form in the empire; he listened with the utmost eagerness to the complaints of the protestant princes; and without feeming to countenance their religious opinions, determined fecretly to cherish those sparks of political discord which might be afterwards kindled into a flame. For this purpofe, he fent William de Bellay, one of the ableft negotiators in France, into Germany, who vifiting the courts of the malecontent princes, and heightening their ill humour by various arts, concluded an alliance between them and his mafter*, which though concealed at that time, and productive of no im. mediate effects, laid the foundation of an union fatal on many occasions to Charles's ambitious projects; and shewed the difcontented princes of Germany, where, for the future, they might find a protector no lefs able than willing to undertake their defence against the encroachments of the emperor.

The king of England, highly incenfed against Charles, in complaifance to whom the pope had long retarded, and now openly opposed his divorce, was no lefs disposed than Francis to strengthen a league which might be rendered fo formidable to the emperor. But his favourite project of the divorce led him into such a labyrinth of schemes and negotiations, and he was, at the same time, so intent on abolishing the papal jurifdiction in England, that he had no leifure for foreign affairs. This obliged him to rest fatisfied with giving general promifes, together with a small supply in money, to the confederates of Smalkalde †.

Meanwhile, many circumftances convinced Charles that this was not a juncture when the extirpation of herefy was to be attempted by violence and rigour; that in compliance with the pope's inclinations, he had already proceeded with imprudent precipitation; and that it was more his intereft to confolidate Germany into one united and vigorous body, than to divide and enfeeble it by a civil war. The proteftants, who were confiderable as well by their numbers as by their zeal, had acquired additional weight and importance by their joining in that confederacy into which the rafh fteps taken at Augfburg had forced them. Having now difcovered their own ftrength, they defpifed the decifions of the Imperial chamber; and being fecure of foreign protection, were ready to fet the head of the empire at defiance. At the fame time the peace with France was precarious, the friendship of an irresolute and interested pontiff was not to be relied on; and Solyman, in order to repair the difcredit and lofs which his arms had fuftained in the former campaign, was preparing to enter Austria with more numerous forces. On all these accounts, especially the last, a speedy accommodation with the malecontent princes became neceffary, not only for the accomplifhment of his future fchemes, but for cnfuring his prefent fafety. Negotiations were, accordingly, carried on by his direction with the elector of Saxony and his affociates; after many delays, occafioned by their jealoufy of the emperor, and of each other, after innumerable difficulties, arifing from the inflexible nature of religious tenets, which cannot admit of being altered, modified, or relinquished in the same manner as points of political interest, terms of pacification were agreed upon at Nuremberg [July 23], and ratified folemuly in the diet at Ratifbon [Aug. 3]. In this treaty it was flipulated, That univerfal peace be established in Germany, until the meeting of a general council, the convocation of which within fix months the emperor shall endeavour to procure; That no perfon shall be molested on account of religion; That a ftop shall be put to all proceffes begun by the Imperial chamber against protestants, and the fentences already past to their detriment shall be declared void. On their part, the protestants engaged to affift the emperor with all their forces in refifting the invation of the Turks +. Thus, by their firmnels in adhering to their principles, by the unanimity with which they urged all their claims, and by their dexterity in availing themfelves of the emperor's fituation, the protestants obtained terms which amounted almost to a toleration of their religion; all the conceffions were made by Charles, none by them; even the favourite point of their approving his brother's election was not mentioned; and the proteftants of Germany, who had hitherto been viewed only as a religious fect, came henceforth to be confidered as a political body of no fmall confequence *.

1532.] The intelligence which Charles received of Solyman's having entered Hungary at the head of three hundred thousand men, brought the deliberations of the diet at Ratifbon to a period; the contingent both of troops and money, which each prince was to furnish towards the defence of the empire, having been already fettled. The protestants, as a teftimony of their gratitude to the emperor, exerted themfelves with extraordinary zeal, and brought into the field forces which exceeded in number the quota imposed on them; the catholics imitating their example, one of the greatest and best appointed armies that had ever been levied in Germany, affembled near Vienna. Being joined by a body of Spanish and Italian veterans under the marquis del Guafto; by fome heavy-armed cavalry from the Low Countries; and by the troops which Ferdinand had raifed in Bohemia, Austria, and his other territories, it amounted in all to ninety thousand disciplined foot, and thirty thousand horfe, befides a prodigious fwarm of irregulars. Of this vaft army, worthy the first prince in Christendom, the emperor took the command in perfon; and mankind waited in suspense the iffue of a decisive battle between the two greatest monarchs in the world. But each of them dreading the other's power and good fortune, they both conducted their operations with fuch exceffive caution, that a campaign, for which fuch immenfe preparations had been made, ended without any memorable event [September and October]. Solyman, finding it impoffible to gain ground upon an enemy always attentive and on his guard, marched back to Conftantinople towards the end of autumn+. It is remarkable, that in fuch a martial age, when every gentleman was a foldier, and every prince a general, this was the first time that Charles, who had already carried on fuch extensive wars, and gained fo many victories, appeared at the head of his troops. In this first effay of his arms, to have opposed fuch a leader as Solyman was no fmall honour; to have obliged him to retreat, merited very confiderable praife.

THE REIGN OF THE

About the beginning of this campaign, the elector of Saxony died [Aug. 16], and was fucceeded by his fon John Frederick. The reformation rather gained than hoft by that cvent; the new elector, no lefs attached than his predeceffors to the opinions of Luther, occupied the flation which they had held at the head of the proteftant party, and defended, with the boldnefs and zeal of youth, that caufe which they had foftered and reared with the caution of more advanced age.

Immediately after the retreat of the Turks, Charles, impatient to revisit Spain, fet out on his way thither, for Italy. As he was extremely defirous of an interview with the pope they met a fecond time at Bologna, with the fame external demonstrations of respect and friendship, but with little of that confidence which had fubfifted between them during their late negotiations there. Clement was much diffatisfied with the emperor's proceedings at Augfburg; his conceffions with regard to the fpeedy convocation of a council, having more than cancelled all the merit of the fevere decree against the doctrines of the reformers. The toleration granted to the protestants at Ratifbon, and the more explicit promife concerning a council, with which it was accompanied, had irritated him still farther. Charles, however, partly from conviction that the meeting of a council would be attended with falutary effects, and partly from his defire to pleafe the Germans, having folicited the pope by his am-baffadors to call that affembly without delay, and now urging the fame thing in perfon, Clement was greatly embarraffed what reply he flould make to a request which it was indecent to refuse, and dangerous to grant. He endeavoured at first to divert Charles from the measure; but, finding him inflexible, he had recourfe to artifices, which he knew would delay, if not entirely defeat, the calling of that affembly. Under the plaufible pretext of its being previoufly neceffary to fettle, with all parties concerned, the place of the council's meeting; the manner of its proceedings; the right of the perfons who should be admitted to vote; and the authority of their decifions; he difpatched a nuncio, accompanied by an ambaffador from the emperor, to the elector of Saxony as head of the protestants. With regard to each of these articles, inextricable difficulties and contests arofe. The protestants demanded a council to be held in Germany; the pope infifted that it should meet in Italy: they contended that all points in difpute should be determined by the words of holy fcripture alone; he confidered not ouly the decrees of the church, but the opinions of fathers and doctors, as of equal authority; they required a free council, in which the divines, commiffioned by different: churches, fhould be allowed a voice; he aimed at modelling the council in fuch a manner as would render it entirely dependent on his pleafure. Above all, the protestants thought it unreasonable that they should bind themselves to fubmit to the decrees of a council, before they knew on what principles these decrees were to be founded, by what perfons they were to be pronounced, and what forms of proceeding they would obferve. The pope maintained it to be altogether unneceffary to call a council, if those who demanded it did not previoufly declare their refolution to acquiesce in its decrees. In order to adjust fuch a variety of points, many expedients were proposed, and the negotiations fpun out to fuch a length, as effectually answered Clement's purpose of putting off the meeting of a council, without drawing on himfelf the whole infamy of obftructing a meafure which all Europe deemed fo effential to the good of the church *.

Together with this negotiation about calling a council, the emperor carried on another, which he had fill more at heart, for fecuring the peace established in Italy. As Francis had renounced his pretentions in that country with great reluctance, Charles made no doubt but that he would lay hold on the first pretext afforded him, or embrace the first opportunity which prefented itfelf, of recovering what he had loft. It became neceffary on this account to take measures for affembling an army able to oppose him. As his treafury, drained by a long war, could not fupply the fums requifite for keeping fuch a body conftantly on foot, he attempted to throw that burden on his allies, and to provide for the fafety of his own dominions at their expence, by proposing that the Italian states should enter into a league of defence against all invaders; that, on the first appearance of danger, an army should be raifed and maintained at the common charge; and that Antonio de Leyva should be appointed the generalifimo. Nor was the propofal unacceptable to Clement, though for a reafon very different from that which induced the emperor to make it. He hoped by this expedient, to deliver Italy from the German and Spanish veterans, which had fo long filled all the powers in that country with terror, and ftill kept them in fubjection to the Imperial yoke. A league was accordingly concluded; [Feb. 24, 1533] all the Italian states, the Venetians excepted, accedel to it; the fum, which cach of the contracting parties should furnish towards maintaining the army was fixed; the emperor agreed to withdraw the troops which gave fo much umbrage to his allies, and which he was unable any longer to fupport. Having difbanded part of them, and removed the reft to Sicily and Spain, he embarked on board Doria's gallies, and arrived at Barcelona [April 22] §.

Notwithstanding all his precautions for fecuring the peace of Germany, and maintaining that fystem which he had eflablished in Italy, the emperor became every day more and more apprehenfive that both would be foon diffurbed by the intrigues or arms of the French king. His apprehenfions were well founded, as nothing but the desperate fituation of his affairs could have brought Francis to give his confent to a treaty fo difhonourable and difadvantageous as that of Cambray: he, at the very time of ratifying it had formed a refolution to obferve it no longer than neceffity compelled him, and took a folemn protest, though with the most profound fecrecy, against feveral articles in the treaty, particularly that whereby he renounced all pretensions to the dutchy of Milan, as unjust, injurious to his heirs, and invalid. One of the crown lawyers, by his command, entered a proteft to the fame purpole, and with the like fecrecy, when the ratification of the treaty was registered in the parliament of Parist. Francis feems to have thought that, by employing an artifice unworthy of a king, deftructive of public faith, and of the mutual confidence on which all transactions between nations are founded, he was releafed from any obligation to perform the most folemn promifes, or to adhere to the most facred engagements. From the moment he concluded the peace of Cambray, he wilhed and watched for an opportunity of violating it with fafety. He endeavoured for that reafon to ftrengthen his alliance with the king of England, whofe friendship he cultivated with the greatest affiduity. He put the military force of his own kingdom on a better and more respectable footing than ever. He artfully fomented the jealoufy and difcontent of the German princes.

But above all, Francis laboured to break the ftrict confederacy which fublified between Charles and Clement; and he had foon the fatisfaction to obferve the appearances of difguft and alienation arifing in the mind of that fufpicious and interefted pontiff, which gave him hopes that their union would not be lafting. As the emperor's decifion in favour of the duke of Ferrara had greatly irritated the pope, Francis aggravated the injuffice of that proceeding, and flattered Clement that the papal fee would find in him a more impartial and no lefs powerful protector. As the importunity with which Charles demanded a council was extremely offenfive to the pope, Francis artfully created obftacles to prevent it, and attempted to divert the German princes, his allies, from infifting fo obstinately on that point +. As the emperor had gained fuch an afcendant over Clement by contributing to aggrandize his family, Francis endeavoured to allure him by the fame irrefiftible bait, propofing a marriage between his fecond fon Henry duke of Orleans, and Catharine, the daughter of the pope's coufin Laurence di Medici. On the first overture of this match, the emperor could not perfuade himfelf that Francis really intended to debafe the royal blood of France, by an alliance with Catharine, whofe anceftors had been fo lately private citizens and merchants in Florence, and believed that he meant only to flatter or amufe the ambitious pontiff. He thought it neceffary, however, to efface the impreffion which fuch a dazzling offer might have made, by promifing to break off the marriage which had been agreed on between his own neice the king of Denmark's daughter, and the duke of Milan, and to fubflitute Catharine in her place. But the French ambaffador producing unexpectedly full powers to conclude the marriage treaty with the duke of Orleans, this expedient had no effect. Clement was fo highly pleafed with an honour which added fuch luftre and dignity to the houfe of Medici, that he offered to grant Catharine the investiture of confiderable territories in Italy, by way of portion; he feemed ready to fupport Francis in profecuting his ancient claims in that country, and confented to a perfonal interview with that monarch t.

Charles was at the utmost pains to prevent a meeting, in which nothing was likely to pass but what would be of detriment to him; nor could he bear, after he had twice condescended to visit the pope in his own territories, that Clement should bestow fuch a mark of distinction on his rival, as to venture on a voyage by fea, at an unfavourable feafon, in order to pay court to Francis in the French dominions. But the pope's eagerness to accomplish the match overcame all the fcruples of pride, or fear, or jealoufy, which would probably have influenced him on any other occasion. The interview, notwithstanding feveral artifices of the emperor to prevent it, took place at Marfeilles with extraordinary pomp, and demonstrations of confidence on both fides [October]; and the marriage, which the ambition and abilities of Catharine rendered in the fequel as pernicious to France, as it was then thought difhonourable, was confummated. But whatever fchemes may have been fecretly concerted by the pope and Francis in favour of the duke of Orleans, to whom his father proposed to make over all his rights in Italy; fo careful were they to avoid giving any caufe of offence to the emperor, that no treaty was concluded between them  $\oint$ ; and even in the marriage-articles, Catharine renounced all claims and pretensions in Italy, except to the dutchy of Urbino\*.

But at the very time when he was carrying on these negotiations, and forming this connection with Francis, which gave fo great umbrage to the emperor, fuch was the artifice and duplicity of Clement's character, that he fuffered the latter to direct all his proceedings with regard to the king of England, and was no less attentive to gratify him in that particular, than if the most cordial union had still subsisted between them. Henry's fuit for a divorce had now continued near fix years; during all which period the pope negotiated, promifed, retracted, and concluded nothing. After bearing repeated delays and difappointments longer than could have been expected from a prince of fuch a choleric and impetuous temper, the patience of Henry was at last fo much exhausted, that he applied to another tribunal for that decree which he had folicited in vain at Rome. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, by a fentence founded on the authority of univerfities, doctors, and rabbies, who had been confulted with refpect to the point, annulled the king's marriage with Catharine; her daughter was declared illegitimate; and Anne Boleyne acknowledged as queen of England. At the fame time Henry began not only to neglect and to threaten the pope, whom he had hitherto courted, but to make innovations in the church, of which he had formerly been fuch a zealous defender. Clement, who had already feen fo many provinces and kingdoms revolt from the holy fee, became apprehenfive at last that England might imitate their example, and partly from his folicitude to prevent that fatal blow, partly in compliance with the French king's folicitations, determined to give Henry fuch fatisfaction as might ftill retain him within the bosom of the church [March 23.] But the violence of the cardinals, devoted to the emperor, did not allow the pope leifure for executing this prudent refolution, and hurried him, with a precipitation fatal to the Roman fee, to iffue a bull refeinding Cranmer's fentence, confirming Henry's marriage with Catharine, and declaring him excommunicated, if, within a time specified, he did not abandon the wife he had taken, and return to her whom he had deferted. Enraged at this unexpected decree, Henry kept no longer any measures with the court of Rome; his subjects feconded his refentment and indignation; an act of parliament was paffed, abolishing the papal power and jurifdiction in England; by another, the king was declared fupreme head of the church, and all the authority of which the popes were deprived was vested in him. That vast fabric of ecclefiaftical dominion which had been raifed with fuch art, and of which the foundations feemed to have been laid fo deep, being no longer supported by the veneration of the people, was overturned in a moment. Henry himfelf, with the caprice peculiar to his character, continued to defend the doctrines of the Romifh church as fiercely as he attacked its jurifdiction. He alternately perfecuted the proteflants for rejecting the former, and the Catholics for acknowledging the latter. But his fubjects, being once permitted to enter into new paths, did not chufe to ftop fhort at the precife point preferibed by him. Having been encouraged by his example to break fome of their fetters, they were fo impatient to flake off what flill remained†, that, in the following reign, with the applaufe of the greater part of the nation, a total feparation was made from the church of Rome in articles of doctrine, as well as in matters of difcipline and jurifdiction.

A fhort delay might have faved the fee of Rome from all the unhappy confequences of Clement's rafhnefs. Soon after his sentence against Henry, he fell into a languishing distemper, which gradually wasting his constitution, put an end to his pontificate [Sept. 25,] the most unfortunate, both during its continuance, and by its effects, that the church had known for many ages. The very day on which the cardinals entered the conclave [Oct. 13,] they raifed to the papal throne Alexander Farnefe, dean of the facred college, and the oldeft member of that body, who affumed the name of Paul III. The account of his promotion was received with extraordinary acclamations of joy by the people of Rome, highly pleafed, after an interval of more than an hundred years, to fee the crown of St. Peter placed on the head of a Roman citizen. Perfons more capable of judging, formed a favourable prefage of his administration, from the experience which he had acquired under four pontificates, as well as the character of prudence and moderation which he had uniformly maintained in a flation of great eminence, and during an active period that required both talents and addrefs§.

Europe, it is probable, owed the continuance of its peace to the death of Clement; for although no traces remain in hiftory of any league concluded between him and Francis, it is fearcely to be doubted but that he would have feconded the operations of the French arms in Italy, that he might have gratified his ambition by feeing one of his family poffeffed of the fupreme power in Florence, and another in Milan. But upon the election of Paul III. who had hitherto adhered uniformly to the Imperial intereft, Francis found it neceffary to fufpend his operations for fome time, and to put off the commencement of hoftilities againft the emperor, on which, before the death of Clement, he had been fully determined.

While Francis waited for an opportunity to renew a war which had hitherto proved fo fatal to himfelf and his fubjects, a transaction of a very fingular nature was carried on in Germany. Among many beneficial and falutary effects of which the reformation was the immediate caufe, it was attended, as must be the cafe in all actions and events wherein men are concerned, with fome confequences of an opposite nature. When the human mind is roufed by grand objects, and agitated by ftrong paffions, its operations acquire fuch force, that they are apt to become irregular and extravagant. Uponany greatrevolution in religion, fuch irregularities abound most, at that particular period, when men, having thrown off the authority of their ancient principles, do not yet fully comprehend the nature, or feel the obligation of those new tenets which they have embraced. The mind in that fituation, pushing forward with the boldnefs which prompted it to reject established opinions, and not guided by a clear knowledge of the fystem fubstituted in their place, difdains all reftraint, and runs into wild notions, which often lead to fcandalous or immoral conduct. Thus, in the first ages of the Christian church, many of the new converts having renounced their ancient fystems of religious faith, and being but imperfectly acquainted with the doctrines and precepts of Chriftianity, broached the most extravagant opinions, equally fubverfive of piety and virtue; all which errors difappeared or were exploded when the knowledge of religion increased, and came to be more generally diffused. In like manner, foon after Luther's appearance, the rashnefs or ignorance of fome of his difciples led them to publish tenets no less absurd than pernicious, which being proposed to men extremely illiterate, but fond of novelty, and at a time when their minds were occupied chiefly with religious fpeculations, gained too eafy credit and authority among them. To these causes must be imputed the extravagances of Muncer, in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty five, as well as the rapid progrefs which his opinions made among the peafants; but though the infurrection excited by that fanatic was foon suppressed, feveral of his followers lurked in different places, and endeavoured privately to propagate his opinions.

In those provinces of Upper Germany, which had already been fo cruelly walted by their enthufiaftic rage, the magiftrates watched their motions with fuch fevere attention, that many of them found it necessiary to retire into other countries, fome were punished, others driven into exile, and their errors were entircly rooted out. But in the Netherlands and Westphalia, where the pernicious tendency of their opinions was more unknown, and guarded against with lefs care, they got admittance into feveral towns, and fpread the infection of their principles. The most remarkable of their religious tenets related to the facrament of baptifm, which as they contended, ought to be administered only to perfons grown up to years of understanding, and should be performed not by fprinkling them with water, but by dipping them in it: for this reafon they condemned the baptism of infants, and rebaptifing all whom they admitted into their fociety, the fect came to be diftinguished by the name of Anabaptitls. To this peculiar notion concerning baptism, which has the appearance of being founded on the practice of the cliurch in the apostolic age, and contains nothing inconfistent with the peace and order of human fociety, they added other principles of a most enthusiastic as well as dangerous nature. They maintained that, among Christians who had the precepts of the gofpel to direct, and the fpirit of God to guide them, the office of magistracy was not only unneceffary, but an unlawful encroachment on their fpiritual liberty; that the diffinctions occafioned by birth, or rank, or wealth, being contrary to the fpirit of the gofpel, which confiders all men as equal, fhould be entirely abolifhed; that all Chriftians, throwing their poffeffions into one common flock, fhould live together in that flate of equality which becomes members of the fame family; that as neither the laws of nature, nor the precepts of the New Teftament, had imposed any reftraints upon men with regard to the number of wives which they might marry, they fhould use that liberty which God himfelf had granted to the patriarchs.

Such opinions, propagated and maintained with enthußaftic zeal and boldnefs, were not long without producing the violent effects natural to them. Two Anabaptift prophets, John Matthias, a baker of Haerlem, and John Boccold, or Beükels, a journeyman taylor of Leyden, poffeffed with the rage of making profelytes, fixed their refidence at Munfter, an Imperial city in Westphalia, of the first rank, under the fovereignty of its bifhop, but governed by its own fenate and confuls. As neither of these fanatics wanted the talents requifite in defperate enterprifes, great refolution, the appearance of fanctity, bold pretenfions to infpiration, and a confident and plaufible manner of difcourfing, they foon gained many converts. Among thefe were Rothman, who had first preached the protestant doctrine in Munster, and Cnipperdoling, a citizen of good birth and confiderable eminence. Emboldened by the countenance of fuch difciples, they openly taught their opinions; and not fatisfied with that liberty, they made feveral attempts, though without fuccefs, to become masters of the town, in order to get their tenets eftablished by public authority. At last, having fecretly called in their affociates from the neighbouring country, they fuddenly took poffeffion of the arfenal and fenate houfe in the night time, and running through the ftreets with drawn fwords, and horrible howlings, cried out alternately, " Repent and be baptifed," and " Depart ye ungodly." The fenators, the canons, the nobility, together with the more lober citizens, whether papifts or protestants, terrified at their threats and outcries, fled in confusion, and left the city under the dominion of a frantic multitude, confifting chiefly of Arangers [February]. Nothing now remaining to overawe or control them, they fet about modelling the government according to their own wild ideas: and though at first they shewed fo much reverence for the ancient conflitution, as to elect fenators of their own fect, and to appoint Cnipperdoling and another profelyte confuls, this was nothing more than form; for all their proceedings were directed by Matthias, who, in the ftyle, and with the authority of a prophet, uttered his commands, which it was inftant death to difobey. Having begun with encouraging the multitude to pillage the churches, and deface their ornaments; he enjoined them to deftroy all books except the bible, as useless or impious; he ordered the eftates of fuch as fled to be confifcated, and fold to the inhabitants of the adjacent country; he commanded every man to bring forth hisgold and filver, and other precious effects, and to lay them at his feet; the wealth amaffed by thefe means, he deposited in a public treasury, and named deacons to dispense it for the common use of all. The members of this commonwealth being thus brought to a perfect equality, he commanded all of them to eat at tables prepared in public, and even prefcribed the diffes which were to be ferved up each day. Having finished his plan of reformation, his next care was to provide for the defence of the city; and he took measures for that purpose with a prudence which favoured nothing of fanaticifm. He collected.

large magazines of every kind; he repaired and extended the fortifications, obliging every perfon without diffinction to work in his turn; he formed fuch as were capable of bearing arms into regular bodies, and endeavoured to add the ftability of discipline to the impetuosity of enthuliasm. He fent emiffaries to the Anabaptifts in the Low-Countries, inviting them to affemble at Munfter, which he dignified with the name of Mount Sion, that from thence they might fet out to reduce all the nations of the carth under their dominion. He himfelf was unwearied in attending to every thing neceffary for the fecurity or increase of the fect; animating his difciples by his own example to decline no labour, as well as to fubmit to every hardship; and their enthufiaftic paffions being kept from fubfiding by a perpetual fucceffion of exhortations, revelations, and prophecies, they feemed ready to undertake or to fuffer any thing in maintenance of their opinions.

While they were thus employed, the bishop of Munster having affembled a confiderable army, advanced to befiege the town. On his approach, Matthias fallied out at the head of fome chofen troops, attacked one quarter of his camp, forced it, and after great flaughter returned to the city loaded with glory and fpoil. Intoxicated with this fuccefs, he appeared next day brandifhing a fpear, and declared, that, in imitation of Gideon, he would go forth with a handful of men and fmite the hoft of the ungodly. Thirty perfons, whom he named, followed him without hefita. tion in this wild enterprife [May,] and, rufhing on the enemy with frantic courage, were cut off to a man. The death of their prophet occafioned at first great confernation among his difciples; but Buccold by the fame gifts and pretentions which had gained Matthias credit, foon revived their fpirits and hopes to fuch a degree, that he fucceeded the deceafed prophet in the fame abfolute direction of all their affairs. As he did not poffefs that enterpriling courage which diftinguilhed his predeceffor, he fatisfied himfelf with carrying on ,a defensive war; and, without attempting to annoy the encmy by fallies, he waited for the fuccours he expected from the Low-Countries, the arrival of which was often foretold and promifed by their prophets. But though lefs daring in action than Matthias, he was a wilder enthusiaft, and of more unbounded ambition. Soon after the death of his predeceffor, having, by obfcure visions and prophecies, prepared the multitude for fome extraordinary event, he ftripped himfelf naked, and, marching through the ftreets, proclaimed with a loud voice, " That the kingdom of Sion was at hand; that whatever was higheft on earth should be brought low, and whatever was loweft fhould be exalted." In order to fulfil this, he commanded the churches, as the most lofty buildings in the eity, to be levelled with the ground; he degraded the fenators chofen by Matthias, and depriving Cnipperdoling of the confulfhip, the higheft office in the commonwealth, appointed him to execute the loweft and most infamous, that of common hangman, to which ftrange transition the other agreed, not only without murmuring, but with the utmost joy; and fuch was the despotic rigour of Boccold's administration, that he was called almost every day to perform fome duty or other of his wretched function. In place of the deposed fenators, he named twelve judges, according to the number of tribes in Ifrael, to prefide in all affairs; retaining to himfelf the fame authority which Mofes anciently poffeffed as legislator of that people:

Not fatisfied; however, with power or titles, which were not fupreme, a prophet, whom he had gained and tutored, having called the multitude together, declared it to be the will of God, that John Boccold fhould be king of Sion, and fit on the throne of David. John kneeling down, accepted of the heavenly call [June 24], which he folemnly protefted had been revealed likewife to himfelf, and was immediatly acknowledged as monarch by the deluded multitude. From that moment he affumed all the flate and pomp of royalty.

He wore a crown of gold, and was clad in the richeft and moft fumptuous garments. A bible was carried on his one hand, a naked fword on the other. A great body of guards accompanied him when he appeared in public. He coined money flamped with his own image, and appointed the great officers of his houfehold and kingdom, among whom Cnipperdoling was nominated governor of the city, as a reward for his former fubmiffion.

Having now attained the height of power, Boccold began to difcover paffions, which he had hitherto restrained, or indulged only in fecret. As the exceffes of enthuliafm have been observed in every age to lead to fenfual gratifications, the fame conflitution that is fusceptible of the former, being remarkably prone to the latter, he inftructed the prophets and teachers to harangue the people for feveral days concerning the lawfulnefs, and even neceffity, of taking more wives than one, which they afferted to be one of the privileges granted by God to the faints. When their ears were once accustomed to this licentious doctrine, and their passions inflamed with the profpect of fuch unbounded indulgence, he himfelf fet them an example of using what he called their Christian liberty, by marrying at once three wives, among which the widow of Matthias, a woman of fingular beauty, was one. As he was allured by beauty, or the love of variety, he gradually added to the number of his wives, until they amounted to fourteen, though the widow of Matthias was the only one dignified with the title of Queen, or who fhared with him the fplendour and ornaments of royalty. After the example of their prophet, the multitude gave themfelves up to the most licentious and uncontrouled gratification of their defires. No man remained fatisfied with a fingle wife. Not to use their Christian liberty was deemed a crime. Perfons were appointed to fearch the houfes for young women grown up to maturity, whom they inftantly compelled to marry. Together with polygamy, freedom of divorce, its infeparable attendant, was introduced, and became a new fource of corruption. Every excefs was commited, of which the raffions of men are capable, when reftrained neither by the authority of laws nor the fenfe of decency *; and by a monftrous and almost incredible conjunction, voluptuoufnefs was engrafted on religion, and diffolute riot accompanied the aufterities of fanatical devotion.

Meanwhile the German princes were highly offended at the infult offered to their dignity by Boccold's prefumptuous usurpation of royal honours; and the profligate manners of his followers, which were a reproach to the Chriftian name, filled men of all professions with horror. Luther, who had teftified against this fanatical spirit on its first appearance, now deeply lamented its progrefs, and having expofed the delusion with great strength of argument, as well as acrimony of flyle, called loudly on all the flates of Germany to put a ftop to a phrenzy no lefs pernicious to fociety, than fatal to religion. The emperor, occupied with other cares and projects, had not leifure to attend to fuch a diftant object; but the princes of the empire affembled by the king of the Romaus, voted a fupply of men and money to the bishop of Munfter, who being unable to keep a fufficient army on foot, had converted the fiege of the town into a blockade [1535]. The forces raifed in confequence of this refolution, were put under the command of an officer of experience, who approaching the town towards the end of fpring, in the year 1535, preffed it more closely than formerly; but found the fortifications fo ftrong, and fo diligently guarded, that he durst not attempt an affault. It was now about fifteen. months fince the anabaptifts had established their dominion in Munster; they had during that time undergone prodigious fatigue in working on the fortifications, and performing military duty. Notwithstanding the prudent attention of their king to provide for their fubfiftence, and his frugal aswell as regular economy in their public meals, they began to feel the approach of famine [May]. Several fmall bodies of their brethren, who were advancing to their affiftance. from the Low-Countries, had been intercepted and cut topieces; and while all Germany was ready to combine againf them, they had no profpect of fuccour. But fuch was the afcendant which Boccold had acquired over the multitude, and fo powerful the fascination of enthusiasm, that their hopes were as fanguine as ever, and they hearkened with implicit credulity to the visions and predictions of their prophets, who affured them that the Almighty would fpeedily interpose in order to deliver the city. The faith, however, of fome few, shaken by the violence and length of their fufferings, began to fail; but being fuspected of an inclination to furrender to the enemy, they were punified with immediate death, as guilty of impiety in diftrufting the power of God. One of the king's wives, having uttered certain words. which implied fome doubt concerning his divine miffion, he inftantly called the whole number together, and commanding the blafphemer, as he called her, to kneel down, cut off her head with his own hands; and fo far were the reft from expreffing any horror at this cruel deed, that they joined him in dancing with a frantic joy around the bleeding body of their companion.

By this time [June 1,], the befieged endured the utmost rigour of famine; but they chofe rather to fuffer hardships, the recital of which is shocking to humanity, than to listen to the terms of capitulation offered them by the bishop. At last, a deferter, whom they had taken into their fervice, be1535.]

ing either lefs intoxicated with the fumes of enthufiafm, or unable any longer to bear fuch diffrefs, made his efcape to the enemy. He informed their general of a weak part in the fortifications which he had observed, and affuring him that the belieged, exhausted with hunger and fatigue, kept watch there with little care; he offered to lead a party thither in the night. The propofal was accepted, and a chofen body of troops appointed for the fervice; who, fcaling the walls unperceived, feized one of the gates, and admitted the reft of the army. The anabaptifts, though furprifed, defended themfelves in the market-place with valour, heightened by defpair; but being overpowered by numbers, and furrounded on every hand, most of them were flain, and the remainder taken prisoners [June 24]. Among the last were the king and Cnipperdoling. The king, loaded with chains, was carried from city to city as a spectacle to gratify the curiofity of the people, and was exposed to all their infults. His fpirit, however, was not broken or humbled by this fad reverfe of his condition; and he adhered with unshaken firmnels to the diftinguishing tenets of his fect. After this, he was brought back to Munfter, the fcene of his royalty and crimes, and put to death with the most exquifite as well as lingering tortures, all which he bore with aftonifhing fortitude. This extraordinary man, who had been able to acquire fuch amazing dominion over the minds of his followers, and to excite commotions fo dangerous to fociety, was only twenty-fix years of age*.

Together with its monarch, the kingdom of the anabaptifls came to an end. Their principles having taken deep root in the Low-Countries, the party fill fubfifts there, under the name of Mennonites; but by a very fingular revolu-

Holding it unlawful to wage war, or to accept of civil offices, they devote themfelves entirely to the duties of private citizens, and by their industry and charity endeavour to make reparation to human fociety for the violence committed by their founders  $\ddagger$ . A fmall number of this fect, which is fettled in England, retains its peculiar tenet concerning baptilm, but without any dangerous mixture of enthuliafm.

The mutiny of the anabaptifts though it drew general attention, did not fo entirely engrofs the princes of Germany, as not to allow leifure for other transactions. The alliance between the French king and the confederates at Smalkalde, began about this time to produce great effects. Ulric, duke of Wurtemberg, having been expelled his dominions in the year one thousand five hundred and nineteen, on account of his violent and oppreffive administration, the houfe of Auftria had got poffeffion of his dutchy. That prince having now by a long exile atoned for the errors in his conduct, which were the effect rather of inexperience than of a tyrannical disposition, was become the object of general compatiion. The landgrave of Heffe, in particular, his near relation, warmly espoufed his interest, and used many efforts to recover for him his ancient inheritance. But the king of the Romans obftinately refused to relinquish avaluable acquifition which his family had made with fo much eafe. The landgrave unable to compel him, applied to the king of France, his new ally. Francis, eager to embrace any opportunity of diffreffing the houfe of Auftria, and defirous of wrefting from it a territory which gave it footing and influence in a part of Germany at a diffance from its other dominions, encouraged the landgrave to take arms, and fecretly fupplied him with a large fum of money. This he employed to raife troops; and marching with great expedition towards Wurtemberg, attacked, defeated, and difperfed a confiderable body of Auftrians, entrufted with the defence of the country. All the duke's fubjects haftened, with emulation, to receive their native prince, and re-invefted him with that authority which is ftill enjoyed by his defcendents. At the fame time the exercise of the proteftant religion was established in his dominions‡.

Ferdinand, how fenfible foever of this unexpected blow, not daring to attack a prince whom all the proteflant powers in Germany were ready to fupport, judged it expedient to conclude a treaty with him, by which, in the most ample form, he recognifed his title to the dutchy. The fuccefs of the landgrave's operations, in behalf of the duke of Wurtemberg, having convinced Ferdinand that a rupture with a league, fo formidable as that of Smalkalde, was to be avoided with the utmost care, he entered likewife into a negotiation with the elector of Saxony, the head of that untion, and by fome conceffions in favour of the protestant religion, and others of advantage to the elector himfelf, he prevailed on him, together with his confederates, to acknowledge his title as king of the Romans. At the fame time, in order to prevent any fuch precipitate or irregular election in times to come, it was agreed that no perfon should hereafter be promoted to that dignity without the unanimous confent of the electors; and the emperor foon after confirmed this flipulation +.

Thefe acts of indulgence towards the proteftants, and the clofe union into which the king of the Romans feemed to be entering with the princes of that party, gave great offence at Rome. Paul III. though he had departed from a refolution of his predeceffor, never to confent to the calling of a general council, and had promifed, in the first confistory held after his election, that he would convoke that affembly fo much defired by all Christendom, was no lefs enraged than Clement at the innovations in Germany, and no

lefs averfe to any fcheme for reforming either the doctrines of the church, or the abufes in the court of Rome: but having been a witness of the universal centure which Clement had incurred by his obstinacy with regard to these points, he hoped to avoid the fame reproach by the feeming alacrity with which he propofed a council; flattering himfelf, however, that fuch difficulties would arife concerning the time and place of meeting, the perfons who had a right to be prefent, and the order of their proceedings, as would effectually defeat the intention of those who demanded that affembly, without exposing himfelf to any imputation for refusing to call it. With this view he difpatched nuncios to the feveral courts, in order to make known his intention, and that he had fixed on Mantua as a proper place in which to hold the council. Such difficulties as the pope had forefeen, immediately prefented themfelves in a great number. The French king did not approve of the place which Paul had chofen, as the papal and imperial influence would neceffarily be too great in a town fituated in that part of Italy. The king of England not only concurred with Francis in urging that objection, but refused, befides, to acknowledge any council called in the name and by the authority of the pope. The German protestants having met together at Smalkalde [Dec. 12], infifted on their original demand of a council to be held in Germany, and pleading the emperor's promife, as well as the agreement at Ratifbon to that effect, declared that they would not confider an affembly held at Mantua as a legal or free reprefentative of the church. By this diverfity of fentiments and views, fuch a field for intrigue and negotiation opened, as made it eafy for the pope to affume the merit of being eager to affemble a council, while at the fame time he could put off its meeting at plcafurc. The protestants on the other hand, fuspecting his defigns, and fenfible of the importance which they derived from their union, renewed for ten years the league of Smalkalde, which now became ftronger and more formidable by the acceffion of feveral new members*.

During these transactions in Germany, the emperor undertook his famous enterprife against the piratical states in Africa. That part of the African continent lying along the coaft of the Mediterranean fea, which anciently formed the kingdoms of Mauritania and Maffylia, together with the republic of Carthage, and which is now known by the general name of Barbary, had undergone many revolutions. Subdued by the Romans, it became a province of their empire. When it was conquered afterwards by the Vandals, they erected a kingdom there. That being overturned by Bellifarius, the country became fubject to the Greek emperors, and continued to be fo until it was over-run, towards the end of the feventh century, by the rapid and irrefiftible arms of the Arabians. It remained for fome time a part of that vaft empire which the caliphs governed with absolute authority. Its immense distance, however, from the feat of government, encouraged the defcendents of those leaders who had fubdued the country, or the chiefs of the Moors, its ancient inhabitants, to throw off the yoke, and to affert their independence. The caliphs, who derived their authority from a spirit of enthusiasim, more sitted for making conquests than for preferving them, were obliged to connive at acts of rebellion which they could not prevent; and Barbary was divided into feveral kingdoms, of which Morocco, Algiers, and Tunis were the moft confiderable. The inhabitants of these kingdoms were a mixed race, Arabs, negroes from the fouthern provinces, and Moors, either natives of Africa, or who had been expelled out of Spain; all zealous profeffors of the Mahometan religion, and inflamed against Christianity with a bigotted hatred proportional to their ignorance and barbarous manners.

Among thefe people, no lefs daring, inconftant, and treacherous, than the ancient inhabitants of the fame country described by the Roman historians, frequent feditions broke out, and many changes in government took place. Thefe, as they affected only the internal flate of a country extremely barbarous, are but little known, and deferve to be fo: but about the beginning of the fixtcenth century, a fudden revolution happened, which, by rendering the ftates of Barbary formidable to the Europeans, hath made their hiftory worthy of more attention. This revolution was brought about by perfons born in a rank of life which entitled them to act no fuch illustrious part. Horuc and Hayradin, the fons of a potter in the Isle of Lesbos, prompted by a reftlefs and enterprifing fpirit, forfook their father's trade, ran to fea, and joined a crew of pirates. They foon diffinguished themselves by their valour and activity, and becoming masters of a fmall brigantine, carried on their infamous trade with fuch conduct and fuccefs, that they affembled a fleet of twelve galleys, befides many veffels of fmaller force. Of this fleet, Horuc, the elder brother, called Barbaroffa, from the red colour of his beard, was admiral, and Hayradin fecond in command, but with almost equal authority. They called themfelves the friends of the fea, and the enemies of all who fail upon it; and their names foon became terrible from the Straits of the Dardanels to those of Gibraltar. Together with their fame and power, their ambitious views extended, and while acting as corfairs, they adopted the ideas, and acquired the talents of conquerors. They often carried the prizes which they took on the coafts of Spain and Italy into the ports of Barbary, and enriching the inhabitants by the fale of their booty, and the thoughtlefs prodigality of their crews, were welcome guefts in every place at which they touched. The convenient fituation of these harbours, lying fo near the greatest commercial states at that time in Christendom, made the brothers with for an establishment in that country. An opportunity of accomplishing this quickly prefented itfelf, which they did not fuffer to pass unimproved. Eutemi, king of Algiers, having attempted feveral times, without fuccels, to take a fort which the Spanish governors of Oran had built not far from his capital, was fo ill-advifed as to apply for aid to Barbaroffa, whole valour the Africans confidered as irrefiftible. 'The active corfair gladly accepted of the invitation, and leaving his brother Hyradin with the fleet [1516,] marched at the head of five thousand men to Algiers, were he was received as their delivercr. Such a force gave him the command of the town; and as he perceived that the Moors neither suspected him of any bad intentions, nor were capable with their light-armed troops of oppofing his difciplined veterans, he fecretly murdered the monarch whom he had come to affift, and proclaimed himfelf king of Algiers in his flead. The authority which he had thus boldly ufurped, he endeavoured to establish by arts fuited to the genius of the people whom he had to govern; by liberality without bounds to those who favoured. his promotion, and by cruelty no lefs unbounded towards all whom he had any reason to distrust. Not fatisfied with thethrone which he had acquired, he attacked the neighbouring king of Tremecen, and having vanquished him in battle, added his dominions to those of Algiers. At the fame time he continued to infeft the coaft of Spain and Italy with fleets which refembled the armaments of a great monarch, rather than the light fquadrons of a corfair. Their frequent and cruel devastations obliged Charles, about the beginning of his reign [1518,] to furnish the marquis de Comares, governor of Oran, with troops fufficient to attack G 2

him. That officer, affifted by the dethroned king of Tremecen, executed the commiffion with fuch fpirit, that Barbaroffa's troops being beat in feveral encounters, he himfelf was fhut up in Tremecen. After defending it to the laft extremity, he was overtaken in attempting to make his efcape, and flain while he fought with an obflinate valour, worthy his former fame and exploits.

His brother Hayradin, known likewife by the name of Barbaroffa, affumed the fceptre of Algiers with the fame ambition and abilities, but with better fortune. His reign being undisturbed by the arms of the Spaniards, which had full occupation in the wars among the European powers, he regulated with admirable prudence the interior police of his kingdom, carried on his naval operations with great vigour, and extended his conquest on the continent of Africa. But perceiving that the Moors and Arabs fubmitted to his government with the utmost reluctance, and being afraid that his continual depredations would, one day, draw upon him the arms of the Chrislians, he put his dominions under the protection of the Grand Seignior, and received from him a body of Turkish foldiers fufficient for his fecurity against his domestic as well as his foreign enemies. At last, the fame of his exploits daily increasing, Solyman offered him the command of the Turkish fleet, as the only perfon whofe valour and skill in naval affairs entitled him to command against Andrew Doria, the greatest fea-officer of that age. Proud of this diffinction, Barbaroffa repaired to Conftantinople, and with a wonderful verfatility of mind, mingling the arts of a courtier with the boldnefs of a corfair, gained the entire confidence both of the fultan and his vizier. To them he communicated a scheme which he had formed of making himfelf mafter of Tunis, the moft flourishing kingdom, at that time, on the coaft of Africa; and this being approved of by them, he obtained whatever he demanded for carrying it into execution.

His hopes of fuccefs in this undertaking were founded on the intefline divisions in the kingdom of Tunis. Mahmed, the laft king of that country, having thirty-four fons by different wives, appointed Muley-Hafcen, one of the young-eft among them, to be his fucceffor. That weak prince, who owed this preference, not to his own merit, but to the a-fcendant which his mother had acquired over a monarch doating with age, first poifoned Mahmed his father in order to prevent him from altering his destination with respect to the fuccession; and then, with the barbarous policy which prevails wherever polygamy is permitted, and the right of fucceffion is not precifely fixed; he put to death all his brothers whom he could get into his power. Alrafchid, one of the eldeft, was fo fortunate as to efcape his rage; and finding a retreat among the wandering. Arabs, made feveral attempts, by the affistance of fome of their chiefs, to recover the throne, which of right belonged to him. But these proving unfuccefsful, and the Arabs, from their natural le-vity, being ready to deliver him up to his merciles brother, he fled to Algiers, the only place of refuge remaining, and implored the protection of Barbaroffa, who, difcerning at once all the advantages which might be gained by fupport-ing his title, received him with every poffible demonstration of friendship and respect. Being ready, at that time, to fet fail for Conftantinople, he eafily perfuaded Alrafchid, whofe eagerness to obtain a crown disposed him to believe or undertake any thing, to accompany him thither, promif-ing him effectual affiftance from Solyman, whom he reprefented to be the most generous, as well as most powerful mo-narch in the world. But no fooner were they arrived at Conflantinople, than the treacherous corfair, regardless of all his promifes to him, opened to the fultan a plan for conquering Tunis, and annexing it to the Turkish empire, by making use of the name of this exiled prince, and co-operat-ing with the party in the kingdom which was ready to declare in his favour. Solyman approved, with too much facility, of this perfidious propofal, extremely fuitable to the character of its author, but altogether unworthy of a great prince. A powerful fleet and numerous army were foon affembled; at the fight of which the credulous Alrafchid flattered himfelf that he fhould foon enter his capital in triumph.

But just as this unhappy prince was going to embark, he was arrefted by order of the fultan, fhut up in the feraglio, and was never heard of more. Barbaroffa failed with a fleet of two hundred and fifty veffels towards Africa. After ravaging the coafts of Italy, and fpreading terror through every part of that country, he appeared before Tunis; and landing his men, gave out that he came to affert the right of Alraschid, whom he pretended to have left fick aboard the admiral galley. The fort of Goletta, which commands the bay, foon fell into his hands, partly by his own address, partly by the treachery of its commander; and the inhabitants of Tunis, weary of Muley-Hafcen's government, took arms, and declared for Alrafchid with fuch zeal and unanimity as obliged the former to fly fo precipitately, that he left all his treasures behind him. The gates were immediately fet open to Barbarossa, as the reftorer of their lawful fovereign. But when Alraschid himself did not appear, and when inftead of his name, that of Solyman alone was heard among the acclamations of the Turkish foldiers marching into the town, the people of Tunis began to fuspect the corfair's treachery. Their fuspicions being foon converted into certainty, they ran to arms with the utmost fury, and furrounded the citadel, into which Barbaroffa had led his But having forefeen fuch a revolution, he was not troops. unprepared for it; he immediately turned against them the artillery on the ramparts, and by one brifk difcharge, difperfed the numerous but undirected affailants, and forced them to acknowlege Solyman as their fovereign, and to fubmit to himfelf as his viceroy.

His first care was to put the kingdom, of which he had thus got posseficient, in a proper posture of defence. He firengthened the citadel which commands the town; and fortifying the Goletta in a regular manner, at vaft expence made it the principal station for his fleet, and his great arfenal for military as well as naval ftores. Being now poffessed of fuch extensive territories, he carried on his depredations against the Chriftian states to a greater extent, and with more destructive violence than ever. Daily complaints of the outrages committed by his cruifers were brought to the emperor by his fubjects, both in Spain and Italy. All Christendom feemed to expect from him, as its greatest and most fortunate prince, that he would put an end to this new and odious species of oppression. At the fame time Muley-Hafcen, the exiled king of Tunis, finding none of the Mahometan princes in Africa willing or able to affift him in recovering his throne, applied to Charles [April 21, 1535], as the only perfon who could affert his rights in opposition to fuch a formidable ufurper. The emperor, equally defirous of delivering his dominions from the dangerous neighbourhood of Barbaroffa; of appearing as the protector of an unfortunate prince; and of acquiring the glory annexed in that age to every expedition against the Mahometans, readily concluded a treaty with Muley-Hafcen, and began to prepare for invading Tunis. Having made trial of his own abilities for war in the late campaign in Hungary, he was now become fo fond of the military character, that he determined to command on this occasion in perfon. The united ftrength of his dominions was called out upon an enterprize in which the emperor was about to hazard his glory, and which drew the attention of all Europe. A Flemish fleet carried from the ports of the Low-Country a body of German infantry*; the gallies of Naples and Sicily took on board the veteran bands of Italians and Spaniards, which had diftinguished themselves by fo many victories over the French; the emperor himself embarked at Barcelona with the flower of the Spanish nobility, and was joined by a confiderable fquadron from Portugal, under the command of the Infant * Heræi Annales Brabant i. 599.

Don Lewis, the emprefs's brother; Andrew Doria conducted his own gallies, the beft appointed at that time in Europe, and commanded by the moft fkilful officers; the pope furnifhed all the affiftance in his power towards fuch a piousenterprize; and the order of Malta, the perpetual enemies of the Infidels, equipped a fquadron, which, though fmall, was formidable by the valour of the knights who ferved on board it. The port of Cagliari in Sardinia was the general place of rendezvous. Doria was appointed high-admiral of the fleet; the command of the land forces under the emperor was given to the marquis de Guafto.

On the fixteenth of July, the fleet, confifting of near five hundred veffels, having on board above thirty thousand regular troops, fet fail from Cagliari, and after a profperous navigation landed within fight of Tunis. Barbaroffa having received early intelligence of the emperor's immenfe armament, and fufpecting its defination, prepared with equal prudence. and vigour for the defence of his new conquest. He called in all his corfairs from their different flations; he drew from Algiers what forces could be fpared; he difpatched meffengers to all the African princes, Moors as well as Arabs, and. by reprefenting Muley-Hafeen as an infamous apostate, prompted by ambition and revenge, not only to become the vaffal of a Christian prince, but to conspire with him to extirpate the Mahomedan faith, he inflamed those ignorant and bigotted chiefs to fuch a degree, that they took arms as in a common caufe. Twenty thousand horse, together with a great body of foot, foon affembled at Tunis; and by a proper distribution of prefents among them from time to time, Barbaroffa kept the ardour which had brought them together from fubfiding. But as he was too well acquainted with the enemy whom he had to oppofe, to think that thefe light troops could refift the heavy-armed cavalry and veteran infantry which composed the Imperial army, his chief confidence was in the ftrength of the Goletta, and in his body of Turkish foldiers, who were armed and disciplined after the European fashion. Six thousand of these, under the command of Sinan, a renegado Jew, the braveft and most experienced of all his corfairs, he threw into that fort, which the emperor immediately invefted. As Charles had the command of the fea, his camp was fo plentifully fupplied not only with the neceffaries, but with all the luxuries of life, that Muley-Hafcen, who had not been accustomed to fee war carried on with fuch order and magnificence, was filled with admiration of the emperor's power. His troops, animated by his prefence, and confidering it as meritorious to fhed their blood in fuch a pious caufe, contended with each other for the pofts of honour and danger. Three feparate attacks were concerted, and the Germans, Spaniards, and Italians, having one of these committed to each of them, pushed them forward with the eager courage which national emulation infpires. Sinan difplayed refolution and skill becoming the confidence which his mafter had put in him; the garrifon performed the hard fervice on which they were ordered with great fortitude. But though he interrupted the befiegers by frequent fallies, though the Moors and Arabs alarmed the camp with their continual incursions; the breaches soon became fo confiderable towards the land, while the fleet battered those parts of the fortifications which it could approach with no lefs fury and fuccefs, that an affault being given on all fides at once, the place was taken by florm [July 25.] Sinan, with the remains of his garrifon, retired after an obftinate refistance, over a shallow part of the bay towards the city. By the reduction of the Goletta, the emperor became mafter of Barbaroffa's fleet, confifting of eighty feven gallies and galliots, together with his arfenal, and three hundred cannoir, mostly brass, which were planted on the ramparts; a prodigious number in that age, and a remarkable proof of the ftrength of the fort, as well as of the greatnefs of the corfair's power. The emperor marched into the Goletta, through the breach, and turning to Muley-Hafcen who attended him, " Here," fays he, " is a gate open to you, by which you fhall return to take possefilion of your dominions."

Barbaroffa, though he felt the full weight of the blow which he had received, did not, however, lofe courage, or abandon the defence of Tunis. But as the walls were of great extent, and extremely weak; as he could not depend on the fidelity of the inhabitants, nor hope that the Moors and Arabs would fuftain the hardships of a fiege, he boldly determined to advance with his army, which amounted to fifty thoufand men*, towards the Imperial camp, and to decide the fate of his kingdom by theiffue of a battle. This refolution he communicated to his principal officers, and reprefenting to them the fatal confequences which might follow, if ten thoufand Christian flaves, whom he had fhut up in the citadel, should attempt to mutiny during the abfence of the army, he propofed, as a neceffary precaution for the public fecurity, to maffacre them without mercy before he began his march. They all approved warmly of his intention to fight; but inured as they were, in their piratical depredations, to fcenes of bloodshed and cruelty, the barbarity of his propofal concerning the flaves filled them with horror; and Barbaroffa, rather from the dread of irritating them, than fwayed by motives of humanity, confented to fpare the lives of the flaves.

By this time the emperor had begun to advance towards Tunis; and though his troops fuffered inconceivable hardfhips in their march, over burning fands, defitute of water, and expofed to the intolerable heat of the fun, they foon came up with the enemy. The Moors and Arabs, emboldened by their vaft fuperiority in number, immediately rufhed on to the attack with loud fhouts, but their undifciplined courage could not long fland the fhock of regular battalions; and though Barbaroffa, with admirable prefence of mind, and by exposing his own perfon to the greateft dangers, endeavoured to rally them, the rout became fo general, that he himfelf, was hurried along with them in their flight back to the city. There he found every thing in the utmost confusion; fome of the inhabitants flying with their families and effects; others, ready to fet open their gates to the conqueror; the Turkish foldiers preparing to retreat; and the citadel, which in fuch circumstances might have afforded him fome refuge, already in the poffession of the Christian captives. These unhappy men, rendered desperate by their fituation, had laid hold on the opportunity which Barbaroffa dreaded. As foon as his army was at fome diftance from the town, they gained two of their keepers, by whofe affistance knocking off their fetters, and bursting open their prifons, they overpowered the Turkish garrifon, and turned the artillery of the fort against their former masters. Barbaroffa, difappointed and enraged, exclaiming fometimes against the false compassion of his officers, and fometimes condemning his own imprudent compliance with their opinion, fled precipitately to Bona.

Meanwhile Charles, fatisfied with the eafy and almost bloodlefs victory which he had gained, and advancing flowly with the precaution neceffary in an enemy's country, did not yet know the whole extent of his own good fortune. But at last, a meffenger dispatched by the flaves acquainted him with the fuccels of their noble effort for the recovery of their liberty; and at the fame time deputies arrived from the town, in order to prefent him the keys of their gates, and to implore his protection from military violence. While he was deliberating concerning the proper measures for this purpofe, the foldiers, fearing that they fhould be deprived of the booty which they had expected, rushed fuddenly, and without orders into the town, and began to kill and plunder without distinction. It was then too late to restrain their cruelty, their avarice, or licentiousness. All the outrages of which foldiers are capable in the fury of a ftorm, all the excelles of which men can be guilty when their paffions are heightened by the contempt and hatred which difference in manners and religion infpire, were committed.

Above thirty thousand of the innocent inhabitants perished on that unhappy day, and ten thousand were carried away as flaves. Muley-Hascen took possession of a throne furrounded with carnage, abhorred by his subjects on whom he had brought such calamities, and pitied even by those whose rashness had been the occasion of them. The emperor lamented the fatal accident which had stained the lustre of his victory; and amidst such a scene of horror there was but one spectacle that afforded him any fatisfaction. Ten thousand Christian slaves, among whom were several perfons of distinction, met him as he entered the town; and falling upon their knees, thanked and blessed him as their deliverer.

At the fame time that Charles accomplished his promife to the Moorish king, of re-establishing him in his dominions, he did not neglect what was neceffary for bridling the power of the African corfairs, for the fecurity of his own fubjects, and for the intcreft of the Spanish crown. In order to gain thefe ends, he concluded a treaty with Muley-Hafcen on the following conditions: that he fhould hold the kingdom of Tunis in fee of the crown of Spain, and do homage to the emperor as his liege lord; that all the Christian flaves now within his dominions, of whatever nation, should be fet at liberty without ranfom; that no fubject of the emperor's should for the future be detained in servitude; that no Turkish corfair should be admitted into the ports of his dominions; that free trade, together with the public exercife of the Chriffian religion, should be allowed to the emperor's fubjects; that the emperor should not only retain the Goletta, but that all the other fea ports in the kingdom which were fortified should be put into his hands; that Muley-Hafcen fhould pay annually twelve thousand crowns for the fubfistence of the Spanish garrifon in the Goletta; that he should enter into no alliance with any of the emperor's enemies, and fhould prefent to him every year, as an acknowledgment of his vaffalage, fix Moorish horses, and as many hawks  $\uparrow$ . Having thus fettled the affairs of Africa; chaftifed the infolence of the corfairs; fecured a fafe retreat for the fhips of his fubjects, and a proper flation to his own fleets, on that coaft from which he was most infested by piratical depredations; Charles embarked again for Europe [Aug. 17], the tempestuous weather, and fickness among his troops, not permitting him to pursue Barbarossa \*.

By this expedition, the merit of which feems to have been eftimated in that age, rather by the apparent generofity of the undertaking, the magnificence with which it was conducted, and the fuccefs which crowned it, than by the importance of the confequences that attended it, the emperor attained a greater height of glory, than at any other period of his reign. Twenty thousand flaves whom he freed from bondage, either by his arms, or by his treaty with Muley-Hafcen §, each of whom he clothed and furnished with the means of returning to their refpective countries, spread over all Europe the fame of their benefactor's munificence, extolling his power and abilities with the exaggeration flowing from gratitude and admiration. In comparifon with him, the other monarchs in Europe made an inconfiderable figure. They feemed to be folicitous about nothing but their private and particular interefts; while Charles, with an elevation of fentiment which became the first prince in Christendom, appeared to be concerned for the honour of the Christian name, and attentive to the public fecurity and welfare.

BOOK VI.

UNFORTUNATELY for the reputation of Francis I. among his contemporaries, his conduct, at this juncture, appeared a perfect contrast to that of his rival, as he laid hold on the opportunity afforded him, by the emperor's liaving turned his whole force against the common enemy of Christendom. to revive his pretentions in Italy, and to plunge Europe into a new war. The treaty of Cambray, as has been obferved, did not remove the caufes of enmity between the two contending princes; it covered up, but did not extinguish the flames of difcord. Francis in particular, who waited with impatience for a proper occasion of recovering the reputation as well as the territories which he had loft, continued to carry on his negotiations in different courts against the emperor, taking the utmost pains to heighten the jealoufy which many princes entertained of his power or defigns, and to infpire the reft with the fame fuspicion and fear: among others, he applied to Francis Sforza, who, though indebted to Charles for the possefion of the dutchy of Milan, had received it on fuch hard conditions, as rendered him not only a valial of the empire, but a tributary dependant upon the emperor. The honour of having married the emperor's niece, did not reconcile him to this ignominious ftate of fubjection, which became fo intolerable even to Sforza, though a weak and poor-fpirited prince, that he liftened with eagerness to the first proposals Francis made of refcuing him from the yoke. These proposals were conveyed to him by Maraviglia, or Merveille, as he is called by the French historians, a Milanese gentleman refiding at Paris; and foon after, in order to carry on the negotiation with greater advantage, Merveille was fent to Milan, on pretence of vifiting his relations, but with fecret credentials from Francis as his envoy. In this character he was received by Sforza. But notwithstanding his care to keep that circumftance concealed, Charles fufpecting, or having received information of it, remonstrated and threatened in fuch an high tone, that the duke and his ministers, equally intimidated, gave the world immediately a most infamous proof of their fervile fear of offending the emperor. As Merveille had neither the prudence nor the temper which the function wherein he was employed required, they artfully decoyed him into a quarrel, in which he happened to kill his antagonift, one of the duke's domeftics, and having inftantly feized him, they ordered him to be tried for that crime, and to be beheaded [Dec. 1533.] Francis, no lefs aftonished at this violation of a character held facred among the most uncivilized nations, than enraged at the infult offered to the dignity of his crown, threatened Sforza with the effects of his indignation, and complained to the emperor, whom he confidered as the real author of that unexampled outrage. But receiving no fatisfaction from either, he appealed to all the princes of Europe, and thought himfelf now entitled to take vengeance for an injury, which it would have been indecent and pufillanimous to let pafs with impunity.

Being thus furnished with a pretext for beginning a war, on which he had already refolved, he multiplied his efforts in order to draw in other princes to take part in the quarrel. But all his measures for this purpose were disconcerted by unforescen events. After having facrificed the honour of the royal family of France by the marriage of his fon with Catherine of Medici, in order to gain Clement, the death of that pontiff had deprived him of all the advantages which he expected to derive from his friendship. Paul, his succesfor, though attached by inclination to the Imperial interest, feemed determined to maintain the neutrality fuitable to his character as the common father of the contending princes. The king of England, occupied with domestic cares and projects, declined, for once, engaging in the affairs of the continent, and refused to affist Francis, unlets he would imitate his example, in throwing off the papal fupremacy. These difappointments led him to folicit, with greater earneftnefs, the aid of the protestant princes affociated by the league of Smalkalde. That he might the more eafily acquire their confidence, he endeavoured to accommodate himfelf to their predominant passion, zeal for their religious tenets. He affected a wonderful moderation with regard to the points in difpute; he permitted Bellay, his envoy in Germany, to explain his fentiments concerning fome of the moft important articles, in terms not far different from those used by the protestants*: he even condescended to invite Melancthon, whole gentle manners and pacific fpirit diftinguished him among the reformers, to vifit Paris, that by his affistance he might concert the most proper measures for reconciling the contending fects which fo unhappily divided the church+. Thefe conceffions must be confidered rather as arts of policy, than the refult of conviction; for whatever impreffion the new opinions in religion had made on his filters, the queen of Navarre and dutchefs of Ferrara, the gaiety of Francis's own temper, and his love of pleafure, allowed him little leifure to examine theological controver-

But foon after he loft all the fruits of this difingenuous artifice, by a ftep 'very inconfiftent with his declarations to the German princes. This ftep, however, the prejudices of the age, and the religious fentiments of his own fubjects, rendered it neceffary for him to take. His clofe union with the king of England, an excommunicated heretic; his frequent negotiations with the German proteflants; but above all, his giving public audience to an envoy from fultan Solyman, had excited violent fufpicions concerning the fincerity of his attachment to religion. To have attacked the emperor, who, on all occafions, made high pretenfions to zeal in defence of the catholic faith, and at the very juncture when he was preparing for his expedition against Barbaroffa, which was then confidered as a pious enterprife, could not have failed to confirm fuch unfavourable fentiments with regard to Francis, and called on him to vindicate himfelf by fome extraordinary demonstration of his reverence for the established doctrines of the church. The indiferent zeal of fome of his fubjects, who had imbibed the protestant opinions, furnished him with such an occasion as he defired. They had affixed to the gates of the Louvre, and other public places, papers containing indecent reflections on the doctrines and rites of the popifh church. Six of the perfons concerned in this rafh action were difcovered and feized. The king, in order to avert the judgments which it was fuppofed their blafphemies might draw down upon the nation, appointed a folemn procession. The holy facrament was carried through the city in great pomp; Francis walked uncovered before it, bearing a torch in his hand; the princes of the blood fupported the canopy over it; the nobles marched in order behind. In the prefence of this numerous affembly, the king, accustomed to express himself on every subject in strong and animated language, declared, that if one of his hands were infected with herefy, he would cut it off with the other, and would not fpare even his own children, if found guilty of that crime. As a dreadful proof of his being in earnest, the fix unhappy perfons were publicly burnt before the procession was finished, with circumstances of the most shocking barbarity attending their execution*.

The princes of the league of Smalkalde, filled with refentment and indignation at the cruelty with which their brethren were treated, could not conceive Francis to be fincere, when he offered to protect in Germany those very tenets, which he perfecuted with fuch rigour in his own dominions; fo that all Bellay's art and eloquence in vindicating his master, or apologifing for his conduct, made but little impreffion upon them. They confidered likewife, that the emperor, who hitherto had never employed violence against the doctrines of the reformers, nor even given them much moleftation in their progrefs, was now bound by the agreement at Ratifbon, not to difturb fuch as had embraced the new opinions; and the protestants wifely regarded this as a more certain and immediate fecurity, than the precarious and diftant hopes with which Francis endeavoured to allure them. Befides, the manner in which he had behaved to his allies at the peace of Cambray, was too recent to be forgotten, and did not encourage others to rely much on his friendship or generofity. Upon all thefe accounts, the protestant princes refufed to affift the French king in any hoftile attempt againft the emperor. The elector of Saxony, the most zealous among them, in order to avoid giving any umbrage to Charles, would not permit Melancthon to visit the court of France, although that reformer, flattered perhaps by the invitation of fo great a monarch, or hoping that his prefence there might be of fignal advantage to the protestant caufe, difcovered a ftrong inclination to undertake the journey ‡.

But though none of the many princes who envied or dreaded the power of Charles, would fecond Francis's efforts in order to reduce and circumfcribe it, he neverthelefs, commanded his army to advance towards the frontiers of Italy. As his fole pretext for taking arms was that he might chaftife the duke of Milan for his infolent and cruel breach of the law of nations, it might have been expected that the whole weight of his vengeance was to have fallen on his territories. But on a fudden, and at their very commencement, the operations of war took another direction. Charles duke of Savoy, one of the leaft active and able princes of the line from which he defcended, had married Beatrix of Portugal, the fifter of the emprefs. By her great talents, the foon acquired an abfolute afcendant over her hufband; and proud of her affinity to the emperor, or allured by the magnificent promifes with which he flattered her ambition, fhe formed an union between the duke and the Imperial court, extremely inconfistent with that neutrality, which wife policy as well as the fituation of his dominions had hitherto induced him to obferve in all the quarrels between the contending monarchs. Francis was abundantly fentible of the diffress to which he might be exposed, if, when he entered Italy, he should leave behind him the territories of a prince, devoted fo obfequioufly to the emperor, that he had fent his eldeft fon to be educated in the court of Spain, as a kind of hoftage for his fidelity. Clement the Seventh, who had reprefented this danger in a ftrong light during his interview with Francis at Marfeilles, fuggested to him, at the fame time, the proper method of guarding against it, having advised him to begin his operations against the Milanefe, by taking poffeffion of Savoy and Piedmont, as the only certain way of fecuring a communication with his own dominions. Francis, highly irritated at the duke on many accounts, particularly for having fupplied the conflable Bourbon with the money that enabled him to levy the body of troops which ruined the French army in the fatal battle of Pavia, was not unwilling to let him now feel both how deeply he refented, and how feverely he could punish these injuries. Nor did he want feveral pretexts which gave fome colour of equity to the violence he intended. The territories of France and Savoy lying contiguous to each other, and intermingled in many places, various difputes, unavoidable in fuch a fituation, fubfifted between the two fovereigns concerning the limits of their refpective property; and befides, Francis, in right of his mother, Louife of Savoy, had large claims upon the duke her brother, for her fhare in their father's fucceffion. Being unwilling, however, to begin hoftilities without fome caufe of quarrel morc fpecious than these pretensions, many of which were obfolete, and others dubious, he demanded permission to march through Piedmont in his way to the Milanefe, hoping that the duke, from an excefs of attachment to the Imperial interest, might refuse this request, and thus give a greater appearance of juftice to all his operations against him. But, if we may believe the hiftorians of Savoy, who appear to be better informed with regard to this particular than those of France, the duke readily, and with a good grace, granted what it was not in his power to deny, promifing free paffage to the French troops as was defired; fo that Francis, as the only method now left of juftifying the measures which he determined to take, was obliged to infift for full fatisfaction with regard to every thing that either the crown of France or his mother Louife could demand of the houfe of Savoy*. Such an evafive anfwer, as might have been expected, being made to this requifition, the French army under the admiral Biron poured at once into the duke's territories at different places. The countries of Breffe and Bugey, united at that time to Savoy, were over-run in a moment. Most of the towns in the dutchy of Savoy opened their gates at the ap. proach of the enemy; a few which attempted to make refiltance were eafily taken; and before the end of the campaign the duke faw himfelf ftripped of all his dominions, but the province of Piedmont, in which there were not many places in a condition to be defended.

'To complete the duke's misfortunes, the city of Geneva, the fovereignty of which he claimed, and in fome degree poffeffed, threw off his yoke, and its revolt drew along with it the lofs of the adjacent territories. Geneva was, at that time, an Imperial city, and though under the direct dominion of its own bifhops, and the remote fovereignty of the dukes of Savoy, the form of its internal conflictution was purely republican, being governed by fyndics and a council chofen by the citizens. From thefe diffinct and often clafhing jurifdictions, two oppofite parties took their rife, and had long fublisted in the state; the one, composed of the advocates for the privileges of the community, affumed the name of Eignotz, or confederates in defence of liberty; and branded the other, which fupported the epifcopal or ducal prerogatives, with the name of Mammelukes, or flaves. At length [1532], the protestant opinions beginning to spread among the citizens, inspired fuch as embraced them with that bold enterprifing spirit which always accompanied or was naturally produced by them in their first operations. As both the duke and bishop were from interest, from prejudice, and from political confiderations, violent enemies of the reformation, all the new converts joined with warmth the party of the Eignotz; and zeal for religion, mingling with the love of liberty, added firength to that generous paffion. The rage and animofity of two factions, shut up within the fame walls, occafioned frequent infurrections, which terminating mostly to the advantage of the friends of liberty, they daily became more powerful.

The duke and bishop, forgetting their ancient contests about jurifdiction, had united against their common enemics, and each attacked them with his proper weapons. The bi-Thop excommunicated the people of Geneva as guilty of a double crime; of impiety, in apostatising from the established religion; and of facrilege, in invading the rights of his fee. The duke attacked them as rebels against their lawful prince, and attempted to render himfelf mafter of the city, first by furprife, and then by open force [1534]. The citizens, despising the thunder of the bishop's censures, boldly afferted their independence against the duke; and partly by their valour; partly by the powerful affistance which they received from the canton of Berne, together with fome small supplies both of men and money, fecretly furnished by the king of France, they defeated all his attempts. Not fatisfied with having repulfed him, or with remaining always upon the defensive themselves, they now took advantage of the duke's inability to refift them, while overwhelmed by the armies of France, and feized feveral caffles and places of ftrength which he possessed in the neighbourhood of Geneva; thus delivering the city from those odious monuments of its former fubjection, and rendering the public liberty more fecure for the future. At the fame time the canton of Berne invaded and conquered the Pays de Vaud, to which it had fome pretenfions. The canton of Friburgh, though zealoufly attached to the catholic religion, and having no fubject of contest with the duke, laid hold on part of the fpoils of that unfortunate prince. A great portion of these conquests or usurpations being ftill retained by the two cantons, add confiderably to their power, and have become the most valuable part of their territories. Geneva, notwithstanding many schemes and enterprifes of the dukes of Savoy to re-establish their dominion over it, still keeps possession of its independence; and in confequence of that bleffing, has attained a degree of confideration, wealth, and elegance, which it could not otherwife have reached +.

Amidît fuch a fucceffion of difaîtrous events, the duke of Savoy had no other refource but the emperor's protection, which, upon his return from Tunis, he demanded with the most earnest importunity; and as his misfortunes were occafioned chiefly by his attachment to the Imperial interest, he had a just title to immediate affistance, Charles, however, was not in a condition to fupport him with that vigour and dispatch which the exigency of his affairs called for. Most of the troops employed in the African expedition, having been raifed for that fervice alone, were disbanded as foon as it was finiss the veteran forces under Antonio de Leyva were hardly fufficient for the defence of the Milanese; and the emperor's treasfury was entirely drained by his extraordinary efforts against the Infidels.

But the death of Francis Sforza [Oct. 24], occasioned, † Hift. de la Ville de Geneve, par Spon, 12°. Utr. 1685, p. 99-Hift. de la Reformation de Suiffe, par Rouchat. Gen. 1728. toma iv. p. 294, &c. tom. v. p. 216, &c. Mem. de Bellay, 181. 1535·]

according to some historians, by the tetror of a French invafion, which had twice been fatal to his family, afforded the emperor full leifure to prepare for action. By this unexpected event, the nature of the war, and the caufes of difcord, were totally changed. Francis's first pretext for taking arms, in order to chaîtife Sforza for the infult offered to the dignity of his crown, was at once cut off; but as that prince died without iffue, all Francis's rights to the dutchy of Milan, which he had yielded only to Sforza and his posterity, returned back to him in full force. As the recovery of the Milanefe was the favourite object of that monarch, he inftantly renewed his claim to it; and if he had fupported his pretentions by ordering the powerful army quartered in Savoy to advance without lofing a moment towards Milan, he could hardly have failed to fecure the important point of poffeffion. But Francis who bccame lefs enterprifing as he advanced in years, and who was overawed at fome times into an excels of caution by the remembrance of his past missortunes, endeavoured to establish his rights by negotiation, not by arms; and from a timid moderation, fatal in all great affairs, neglected to improve the favourable opportunity which prefented itfelf. Charles was more decifive in his operations, and in quality of fovereign, took possefilion of the dutchy, as a va-cant fief of the empire. While Francis endeavoured to explain and affert his title to it by arguments and memorials, or employed various arts in order to reconcile the Italian powers to the thoughts of his regaining footing in Italy, his rival was filently taking effectual steps to prevent it. The emperor, however was very careful not to difcover too early any intention of this kind; but feeming to admit the equity of Francis's claim, he appeared folicitous only about giving him poffeffion in fuch a manner as might not difturb the peace of Europe, or overturn the balance of power in Italy, which the politicians of that country were fo defirous of preferving. By this artifice he deceived Francis, and gained fo much confidence with the reft of Europe, that almost without incurring any fufpicion, he involved the affair in new difficulties, and protracted the negotiations at pleafure. Sometimes he proposed to grant the investiture of Milan to the duke of Orleans, Francis's fecond fon, fometimes to the duke of Angouleme, his third fon; as the views and inclinations of the French court varied, he transferred his choice alternately from the one to the other, with fuch profound and well-conducted diffimulation, that neither Francis nor his ministers feem to have penetrated his real intention; and all military operations were entirely fufpended, as if nothing had remained but to enter quietly into possible of what they demanded.

1536.] During the interval of leifure gained in this manner, Charles, on his return from Tunis, affembled the states both of Sicily and Naples, and as they thought themfelves greatly honoured by the prefence of their fovereign, and were no lefs pleafed with the apparent difinterestedness of his expedition into Africa, than dazzled by the fuccefs which had attended his arms, he prevailed on them to vote him fuch liberal fubfidies as were feldom granted in that age. This enabled him to recruit his veteran troops, to levy a body of Germans, and to take every other proper precaution for executing or fupporting the measures on which he had determined. Bellay, the French envoy in Germany, having difcovered the intention of raifing troops in that country, notwithstanding all the pretexts employed in order to conceal it, first alarmed his master with this evident proof of the emperor's infincerity*.

But Francis was fo poffeffed at that time with the rage of negotiation, in all the artifices and refinements of which his rival far furpaffed him, that inflead of beginning his military operations, and pufhing them with vigour, or feizing the Milanefe before the Imperial army was affembled, he fatisfied himfelf with making new offers to the emperor, in order to procure the inveftiture by his voluntary deed. His offers were, indeed, fo liberal and advantageous, that if ever Charles had intended to grant his demand, he could not have rejected them with decency. He desteroufly eluded them by declaring that until he confulted the pope in perfon, he could not take his final refolution with regard to a point which fo nearly concerned the peace of Italy. By this evation he gained fome farther time for ripening the fchemes which he had in view.

The emperor at last advanced towards Rome, and made his public entry into that city with extraordinary pomp; [April 6] but it being found neceflary to remove the ruins of an ancient temple of peace, in order to widen one of the ftreets, through which the cavalcade had to pafs, all the hiftorians take notice of this trivial circumstance, and they are fond to interpret it as an omen of the bloody war that followed. Charles, it is certain, had by this time banished all thoughts of peace; and at last threw off the mask, with which he had fo long covered his defigns from the court of France, by a declaration of his fentiments no lefs fingular than explicit. The French ambaffadors having in their mafter's name demanded a definitive reply to his propositions concerning the investiture of Milan, Charles promifed to give it next day in prefence of the pope and cardinals affembled in full confiftory. Thefe being accordingly met, and all the foreign ambaffadors invited to attend, the emperor flood up, and addreffing himfelf to the pope, expatiated for fome time on the fincerity of his own willes for the peace of Chriftendom, as well as his abhorrence of war, the miferies of which he enumerated at great length, with fludied and elaborate oratory; he complained that all his endeavours to preferve the tranquillity of Europe had hitherto been defeated by the reflefs and unjust ambition of the French king; that even during his minority he had proofs of the unfriendly and hoftile intentions of that monarch; that, afterwards, he had openly attempted to wreft from him the Imperial crown Vol. III. 1 which belonged to him by a title no lefs just than natural; that lie had next invaded his kingdom of Navarre; that not fatisfied with this, he had attacked his territories, as well as those of his allies, both in Italy and the Low-Countries; that when the valour of the Imperial troops, rendered irrefiftible by the protection of the Almighty, had checked his progrefs, ruined his armies, and feized his perfon, he continued to purfue by deceit what he had undertaken with injuffice; that he had violated every article in the treaty of Madrid to which he owed his liberty, and as foon as he returned to his dominions took measures for rekindling the war which that pacification had happily extinguished; that when new misfortunes compelled him to fue again for peace at Cambray, he concluded and obferved it with equal infincerity; that foon after he had formed dangerous connexions with the heretical princes in Germany, and incited them to difturb the tranquillity of the empire; that now he had driven the duke of Savoy, a prince married to a fifter of the emprefs, and joined in clofe alliance with Spain, out of the greater part of his territories: that after injuries fo often repeated, and amidft fo many fources of difcord, all hope of amity or concord became defperate; and though he himfelf was still willing to grant the investiture of Milan to one of the princes of France, there was little probability of that event taking place, as Francis, on the one hand, would not confent to what was necessary for fecuring the tranquillity of Europe; nor on the other, could he think it reafonable or fafe to give a rival the unconditional poffeffion of all that he demanded. " Let us not however," added he, " continue wantonly to fhed the blood of our innocent fub. jects; let us decide the quarrel man to man, with what arms he pleases to chuse, in our shirts, on an island, a bridge, or aboard a galley moored in a river; let the dutchy of Burgundy be put in deposit on his part, and that of Milan on mine; these shall be the prize of the conqueror; and after that, let the united forces of Germany, Spain and France be employed to humble the power of the Turk, and to extirpate herefy out of Chriftendom. But if he, by declining this method of terminating our differences, renders war inevitable, nothing fhall divert me from profecuting it to fuch extremity, as fhall reduce one of us to be the pooreft gentleman in his own dominions. Nor do I fear that it will be on me this misfortune fhall fall; I enter upon action with the faireft profpect of fuccefs; the juftnefs of my caufe, the union of my fubjects, the number and valour of my troops, the experience and fidelity of my generals, all combine to enfure it. Of all thefe advantages, the king of France is defitute; and were my refources up more certain, and my hopes of victory no better founded than his, I would inftantly throw myfelf at his feet, and with folded hands, and a rope about my neck, implore his mercy *."

This long harangue the emperor delivered with an elevated voice, a haughty tone, and the greatest vehemence of expreffion and gesture. The French ambasfadors, who did not fully comprehend his meaning, as he fpake in the Spanish tongue, were totally disconcerted, and at a loss how they should answer such an unexpected invective; when one of them began to vindicate his mafter's conduct, Charles interposed abruptly, and would not permit him to proceed. The pope, without entering into any particular detail, fatisfied himfelf with a fhort but pathetic recommendation of peace, together with an offer of employing his fincere endeavours in order to procure that bleffing to Chriftendom; and the affembly broke up in the greatest astonishment at the extraordinary scene which had been exhibited. In no part of his conduct, indeed, did Charles ever deviate fo wide-ly from his general character. Inftead of that prudent recollection, that composed and regular deportment fo strictly attentive to decorum, and fo admirably adapted to conceal his own paffions, for which he was at all other times confpicuous, he appears on this occasion before one of the most august affemblies in Europe, boasting of his own power and exploits with infolence; inveighing against his enemy with indecency; and challenging him to combat with an oftentatious valour, more becoming a champion in romance, than the first monarch in Christendom. But the well known and powerful operation of continued profperity, as well as of exaggerated praife, even upon the firmeft minds, fufficiently account for this feeming inconfistency. After having compelled Solyman to retreat, and having ftripped Barbaroffa of a kingdom, Charles began to confider his arms as invincible. He had been entertained, ever fince his return from Africa, with repeated fcenes of triumphs and public rejoicings; the orators and poets of Italy, the most elegant at that time in Europe, had exhausted their genius in panegyric on his conduct and merit, to which the aftrologers added magnificent promifes of a more splendid fortune still in ftore. Intoxicated with all thefe, he forgat his ufual referve and moderation, and was unable to reftrain this extravagant fally of vanity, which became the more remarkable, by being both fo uncommon and fo public.

He himfelf feems to have been immediately fentible of the impropriety of his behaviour; and when the French ambaffadors demanded next day a more clear explanation of what he had faid concerning the combat, he told them that they were not to confider his propofal as a formal challenge to their mafter, but as an expedient for preventing bloodfhed; he endeavoured to foften feveral expressions in his difcourfe; and spoke in terms full of respect towards Francis. But though this flight apology was far from being fufficient to remove the offence which had been given, Francis, by an unaccountable infatuation, continued to negotiate, as if it had ftill been possible to bring their differences to a period by an amicable composition. Charles, finding him fo eager to run into the fnare, favoured the deception, and, by feem-ing to liften to his propofals, gained farther time to prepare for the execution of his own defigns.

At last, the Imperial army assembled on the frontiers of the Milanefe, to the amount of forty thousand foot and ten thousand horse, while that of France encamped near Vercelli in Piedmont, being greatly inferior in number, and weakened by the departure of a body of Swifs, whom Charles artfully perfuaded the popifh cantons to recal, that they might not ferve against the duke of Savoy, their ancient ally. The French general not daring to rifque a battle, retired as foon as the Imperialifts advanced. The emperor put himfelf at the head of his forces [May 6], which the marquis del Guafto, the duke of Alva, and Ferdinand de Gonzaga commanded under him, though the fupreme direction of the wholewas committed to Antonio de Leyva, whofe abilities and experience justly entitled him to that diffinction. Charles foon differented his intention not to confine his operations to, the recovery of Piedmont and Savoy, but to push forwards and invade the fouthern provinces of France. This fcheme he had long meditated, and had long been taking meafures for executing it with fuch vigour as might enfure fuccefs. He had remitted large fums to his fifter, the governefs of: the Low-Countries, and to his brother, the king of the Romans, inftructing them to levy all the forces in their power, in order to form two feparate bodies, the one to enter France on the fide of Picardy, the other on the fide of Champagne; while he with the main army, fell upon the oppofitc frontier of the kingdom. Trufting to these vast preparations, he thought it impoffible that Francis could refift fo many unexpected attacks on fuch different quarters; and began his enterprife with fuch confidence of its happy iffue, that he defired Jovius the hiftorian, to make a large provision of paper fufficient to record the victories which he was going to obtain.

His ministers and generals, instead of entertaining the fame fanguine hopes, represented to him in the strongest terms the danger of leading his troops fo far from his own territories, to fuch a diftance from his magazines, and into provinces which did not yield fufficient fubfiftence for their own inhabitants. They entreated him to confider the inexhaustible refources of France in maintaining a defensive war, and the active zeal with which a gallant nobility would ferve a prince whom they loved, in repelling the enemies of their country; they recalled to his remembrance the fatal mifcarriage of Bourbon and Pefcara, when they ventured upon the fame enterprife under circumftances which feemed as certainly to promife fuccefs; the marquis del Guafto in particular fell on his knees, and conjured him to abandon the undertaking as defperate. But many circumstances combined in leading Charles to difregard all their remonstrances. He could feldom be brought, on any occasion, to depart from a refolution which he had once taken; he was too apt to under-rate and defpife the talents of his rival the king of France, becaufe they differed fo widely from his own; he was blinded by the prefumption which accompanies profperity; and relied, perhaps, in fome degree, on the prophecies which predicted the increase of his own grandeur. He not only adhered obstinately to his own plan, but determined to advance towards France without waiting for the reduction of any part of Piedmont, except fuch towns as were abfolutely neceffary for preferving his communication with the Milanele.

The marquis de Saluces, to whom Francis had entrufted the command of a fmall body of troops left for the defence of Piedmont, rendered this more eafy than Charles had any reafon to expect. That nobleman, educated in the court of France, diffinguished by continual marks of the king's favour, and honoured so lately with a charge of fuch importance, fuddenly, and without any provocation or pretext of difgust revolted from his benefactor. His motives to this treacherous action were as childish as the deed itself was bafe. Being ftrongly possefue with a fuperfitious faith in divination and aftrology, he believed with full affurance, that the fatal period of the French nation was at hand; that on its ruins the emperor would establish an universal monarchy; that therefore he ought to follow the dictates of prudence, in attaching himfelf to his rifing fortune, and could incur no. blame for deferting a prince whom Heaven had devoted to destruction +. His treason became still more odious, by his employing that very authority, with which Francis had invested him, in order to open the kingdom to his enemies. Whatever measures were proposed or undertaken by the officers under his command for the defence of their conquells, he rejected or defeated. Whatever properly belonged to himfelf, as commander in chief, to provide or perform for that purpofe, he totally neglected. In this manner, he rendered towns even of the greatest confequence, untenable, by leaving them deftitute either of provisions, ammunition, artillery, or a fufficient garrifon; and the Imperialifts muft have reduced Piedmont in as short a time as was necessary to march through it, if Montpezat, the governor of Fossano, had not, by an extraordinary effort of courage and military conduct, detained them almost a month before that inconfiderable place.

By this meritorious and feafonable fervice, he gained his mafter fufficient time for affembling his forces, and for concerting a fyftem of defence againft a danger which he now faw to be inevitable. Francis fixed on the only proper and effectual plan for defeating the invafion of a powerful enemy; and his prudence in chufing this plan, as well as his perfeverance in executing it, deferve the greater praife, as it was equally contrary to his own natural temper, and to the genius of the French nation. He determined to remain altogether upon the defenfive; never to hazard a battle, or even a great fkirmifh without certainty of fuccefs; to fortify his camps in a regular manner; to throw garrifons only into towns of great ftrength; to deprive the enemy of fubfiftence, + Bellay, 222, a. 246, b.

by laying wafte the country before them; and to fave the whole kingdom, by facrificing one of its provinces. The execution of this plan he committed entirely to the marechal Montmorency, who was the author of it; a man wonderfully fitted by nature for fuch a truft, haughty, fevere, confident in his own abilitics, and defpifing those of other men; incapable of being diverted from any resolution by remonfirances or entreaties; and, in profecuting any fcheme, regardlefs alike of love or of pity.

Montmorency made choice of a ftrong camp, under the walls of Avignon, at the confluence of the Rhone and the Durance, one of which plentifully fupplied his troops with all neceffaries from the inland provinces, and the other covered his camp on that fide where it was most probable the enemy would approach. He laboured with unwearied induftry to render the fortifications of this camp impregnable, and affembled there a confiderable army, though greatly inferior to that of the enemy; while the king with another body of troops encamped at Valence higher up the Rhoue. Marfeilles and Arles were the only towns he thought it neceffary to defend; the former, in order to retain the command of the fea; the latter, as the barrier of the province of Languedoc; and each of these he furnished with numerous garrifons of his beft troops, commanded by officers on whofe fidelity and valour he could rely. The inhabitants of the other towns, as well as of the open country, were compelled to abandon their houfes, and were conducted to the mountains, or to the camp at Avignon, or to the inland provinces. The fortifications of fuch places as might have afforded shelter or defence to the enemy, were thrown down. Corn, forage, and provisions of every kind, were carried away or deftroyed; all the mills and ovens were ruined, and the wells filled up or rendered ufelefs. The devaltation extended from the Alps to Marfeilles, and from the fea to the confines of Dauphiné; nor does hiftory afford any inftance among civilized nations, in which this cruel expedient for the public fafety was employed with the fame rigour.

At length, the emperor arrived with the van of his army on the frontiers of Provence, and was still fo possefield with confidence of fuccefs, that, during a few days when he was obliged to halt until the reft of his troops came up, he began to divide his future conquests among his officers; and, as a new incitement to ferve him with zeal, gave them liberal promifes of offices, lands, and honours in France*. The face of defolation, however, which prefented itself to him, when he entered the country, began to damp his hopes, and convinced him that a monarch, who, in order to diffrefs an enemy, had voluntarily ruined one of his richeft provinces, would defend the reft with defperate obstinacy. Nor was it long before he became fenfible that Francis's plan of defence was as prudent as it appeared to be extraordinary. His fleet, on which Charles chiefly depended for fubfiftence, was prevented for fome time by contrary winds, and other accidents to which naval operations are fubject, from approaching the French coaft; even after its arrival, it afforded at best a precarious and fcanty fupply to fuch a numerous body of troops+; nothing was to be found in the country itfelf for their fupport; nor could they draw any confiderable aid from the dominions of the duke of Savoy, exhausted already by maintaining two great armies. The emperor was no lefs embarraffed how to employ, than how to fubfift his forces; for though he was now in poffeffion of almost an entire province, he could not be faid to have the command of it, while he held only defenceless towns; and while the French, befides their camp, at Avignon, continued masters of Marseilles and Arles. At first he thought of attacking their camp, and of terminating the war by one decifive blow; but skilful officers who were appointed to view it, declared the attempt to be utterly impracticable. He then gave orders to invest Marfeilles and Arles, hoping that the French would quit their advantageous poft in order to relieve them; but Montmorency adhering firmly to his plan, remained immoveable at Avignon, and the Imperialifts met with fuch a warm reception from the garrifons of both towns, that they relinquifhed their enterprifes with lofs and difgrace. As a laft effort, the emperor advanced once more towards Avignon, though with an army harraffed by the perpetual incurfions of fmall parties of the French light troops, weakened by difeafes, and difpirited by difafters, which feemed the more intolerable, becaufe they were unexpected.

During these operations, Montmorency found himself expofed to greater danger from his own troops than from the enemy; and their inconfiderate valour went near to have precipitated the kingdom into those calamities which he with fuch industry and caution had endeavoured to avoid. Unaccultomed to behold an enemy ravaging their country almost without controul; impatient of fuch long inaction; unacquainted with the flow and remote, but certain effects of Montmorency's system of defence; the French wished for a battle with no lefs ardour than the Imperialifts. They confidered the conduct of their general as a difgrace to their country. His caution they imputed to timidity; his circumfpection to want of fpirit; and the conftancy with which he purfued his plan, to obstinacy or pride. These reflections, whilpered at first among the foldiers and fubalterns, were adopted, by degrees, by officers of higher rank; and as many of them envied Montmorency's favour with the king, and more were diffatisfied with his harfh difgufting manner, the difcontent foon became great in his camp, which was filled with general murmurings, and almost open complaints against his measures. Montmorency, on whom the fentiments of his own troops made as little impreffion as the infults of the enemy, adhered fleadily to his fyftem; though, in order to reconcile the army to his maxims, no lefs contrary to the genius of the nation, than to the ideas of war among undifciplined troops, he affumed an unufual affability in his deportment, and often explained, with great condefeenfion, the motives of his conduct, the advantages which had already refulted from it, and the certain fuccefs with which it would be attended. At laft, Francis joined his army at Avignon, which, having received feveral reinforcements, he now confidered as of ftrength fufficient to face the enemy. As he had put no fmall conftraint upon himfelf, in confenting that his troops fhould remain fo long upon the defenfive, it can hardly be doubted but that his fondnefs for what was daring and fplendid, added to the impatience both of officers and foldiers, would at laft have over-ruled Montmorency's falutary caution*.

Happily the retreat of the enemy delivered the kingdom from the danger which any rash resolution might have occafioned. The emperor, after fpending two inglorious months in Provence, without having performed any thing fuitable to his vaft preparations, or that could juftify the confidence with which he had boafted of his own power, found that, befides Antonio de Leyva, and other officers of diftinction, he had loft one half of his troops by difeafes or by famine; and that the reft were in no condition to ftruggle any longer with calamities, by which fo many of their companions had perifhed. Neceffity, therefore, extorted from him orders to retire; and though he was fome time in motion before the French fuspected his intention, a body of light troops, affisted by crowds of pealants, eager to be revenged on those who had brought fuch defolation on their country, hung upon the rear of the Imperialifts, and by feizing every favourable opportunity of attacking them, threw them often into confusion. The road by which they fled, for they purfued their march with fuch diforder and precipitation that it fcarcely deferves the name of a retreat, were ftrewed with arms or baggage, which in their hurry and trepidation they had abandoned, and covered with the fick, the wounded, and the dead; infomuch that Martin Bellay, an eye-witnefs of their calamities, endeavours to give his readers fome idea of them, by comparing their miferies to thofe which the Jews fuffered from the victorious and deftructive arms of the Romans ‡. If Montmorency, at this critical moment, had advanced with all his forces, nothing could have faved the whole Imperial army from utter ruin. But that general, by ftanding fo long and fo obfinately on the defensive, had become cautious to excefs; his mind, tenacious of any bent it had once taken, could not affume a contrary one as fuddenly as the change of circumftances required; and he ftill continued to repeat his favourite maxims, that it was more prudent to allow the lion to efcape than to drive him to defpair, and that a bridge of gold fhould be made for a retreating enemy.

The emperor having conducted the fhattered remains of his troops to the frontiers of Milan, and appointed the marquis del Guafto to fucceed Leyva in the government of that dutchy, fet out for Genoa. As he could not bear to expofe himfelf to the foorn of the Italians, after fuch a fad reverfe of fortunc; and did not chufe, under his prefent circumflances, to revifit those cities through which he had fo lately paffed in triumph for one conquest, and in certain expectation of another, he embarked directly for Spain+ [November].

Nor was the progrefs of his arms on the oppofite frontier of France fuch as to alleviate, in any degree, the loffes which he had fuftained in Provence. Bellay, by his addrefs and intrigues, had prevailed on fo many of the German princes to withdraw the contingent of troops which they had furnifhed to the king of the Romans, that he was obliged to lay afide all thoughts of his intended irruption into Champagnc. Though a powerful army levied in the Low-Countries entered Picardy, which they found but feebly guarded, while † Mem. de Bellay, 316. Sandov. Hift. del Emper. ii. 252. † Jovii Hiftor. lib. xxxv. p. 174, &c. the firength of the kingdom was drawn towards the fouth; yet the nobility, taking arms with their ufual alaerity, fupplied by their fpirit the defects of the king's preparations, and defended Peronne, and other towns which were attacked, with fueh vigour, as obliged the enemy to retire, without making any conqueft of importance*.

Thus Franeis, by the prudence of his own measures, and by the union and valour of his fubjects, rendered abortive those vast efforts in which his rival had almost exhausted his whole foree. As this humbled the emperor's arrogance no lefs than it checked his power, he was mortified more fenfibly on this oceasion than on any other, during the course of the long conterts between him and the French monarch. One eircumftance alone embittered the joy with which the fuccels of the eampaign infpired Francis. That was the death of the dauphin, his cldeft fon, a prince of great hopes, and extremely beloved by the people on account of his refemblance to his father. This happening fuddenly, was imputed to poifon, not only by the vulgar, fond of afcribing the death of illustrious perfonages to extraordinary caufes, but by the king and his ministers. The count de Monteeueuli, an Italian nobleman, eupbearer to the dauphin, being feized on fuspicion, and put to the torture, openly charged the Imperial generals, Gonzaga and Leyva, with having infligated him to the commission of that crime; he even threw out fome indirect and obfcure acculations against the emperor himfelf. At a time when all France was exafperated to the utmost against Charles, this uncertain and extorted charge was confidered as an incontestible proof of guilt; while the confidence with which both he and his officers afferted their own innocence, together with the indignation, as well as horror, which they expressed on their being fuppofed capable of fueh a deteftable action, were little attended to, and less regarded +. It is evident, however, that the emperor could have no inducement to perpetrate fuch a crime, as Francis was still in the vigour of life himfelf, and had two fons, befides the dauphin, grown up almost to the age of manhood. That fingle confideration, without mentioning the emperor's general character, unblemished by the imputation of any deed refembling this in atrocity, is more than fufficient to counterbalance the weight of a dubious teftimony uttered during the anguish of torture t. According to the most unprejudiced historians, the dauphin's death was occafioned by his having drunk too freely of cold water after overheating himfelf at tennis; and this account, as it is the most fimple, is likewife the most credible. But if his days were cut fhort by poifon, it is not improbable that the emperor conjectured rightly, when he affirmed that it had been administered by the direction of Catharine of Medici, in order to fecure the crown to the duke of Orleans, her hufband *. The advantages refulting to her by the dauphin's death were obvious as well as great; nor did her boundless and daring ambition ever recoil from any action neceffary towards attaining the objects which she had in view.

1537.] Next year opened with a transaction very uncommon, but fo incapable of producing any effect, that it would not deferve to be mentioned, if it were not a firiking proof of the perfonal animofity which mingled itfelf in all the hoftilities between Charles and Francis, and which often betrayed them into fuch indecencies towards each other, as leffened the dignity of both. Francis, accompanied by the peers and princes of the blood, having taken his feat in the parliament of Paris with the ufual folemnities, the advocategeneral appeared; and after accufing Charles of Auftria (for fo he affected to call the emperor) of having violated the treaty of Cambray, by which he was abfolved from the homage due to the crown of France for the countries of Artois and Flanders; infifted that this treaty being now . void, he was still to be confidered as a vaffal of the crown, and by confequence had been guilty of rebellion in taking arms against his fovereign; and therefore he demanded that Charles should be fummoned to appear in perfon, or by his counfel, before the parliament of Paris, his legal judges, to anfwer for this crime. The request was granted; a herald repaired to the frontiers of Picardy, and fummoned him with the accultomed formalities to appear against a day prefixed. That term being expired, and no perfon appearing in his name, the parliament gave judgment, "That Charles of Auftria had forfeited by rebellion and contumacy thofe fiefs; declared Flanders and Artois to be re-united to the crown of France!" and ordered their decree for this purpofeto be published by found of trumpet on the frontiers of these provinces 1.

Soon after this vain difplay of his refentment, rather than of his power, Francis marched towards the Low-Countries: [March,] as if he had intended to execute-the fentence which his parliament had pronounced, and to feize those territories which it had awarded to him. As the queen of Hungary, to whom her brother the emperor had committed the government of that part of his dominions, was not prepared for fo early a campaign, he at first made fome progrefs, and took feveral towns of importance. But being obliged foon to leave his army, in order to fuperintend the operations of war, the Flemings, having affembled a numerous army, not only recovered most of the places which they had loft, but began to make conquests in their turn. At last they involted Tcrouenne, and the duke of Orleans, now dauphin, by the death of his brother, and Montmorency, whom Francis had honoured with the conflable's fword, as the reward of his great fervices during the former campaign, determined to hazard a battle in order to relieve it.

‡ Lettres et Memoires d'Etat, par Ribier, 2 tom. Blois, 1666. tom. i p. 1. While they were advancing for this purpofe, and within a few miles of the enemy, they were flopt flort by the arrival of an herald from the queen of Hungary, acquainting him that a fufpenfion of arms was now agreed upon.

This unexpected event was owing to the zealous endeavours of the two lifters, the queens of France and of Hungary, who had long laboured to reconcile the contending monarchs. The war in the Netherlands had laid wafte the frontier provinces of both countries, without any real advantage to either. The French and Flemings equally regretted the interruption of their commerce, which was beneficial to both. Charles as well as Francis, who had each ftrained to the utmost, in order to support the vast operations of the former campaign, found that they could not now keep armies on foot in this quarter, without weakening their operations in Piedmont, where both wifhed to pufh the war with the great. eft vigour. All these circumstances facilitated the negotiations of the two queens; a truce was concluded [July 30,] to continue in force for ten months, but it extended no farther than the Low-Countries*.

In Piedmont the war was fill profecuted with great animofity; and though neither Charles nor Francis could make the powerful efforts to which this animofity prompted them, they continued to exert themfelves like combatants, whofe rancour remains after their firength is exhaufted. Towns were alternately loft and retaken; fkirmifhes were fought every day; and much blood was fhed, without any action that gave a decided fuperiority to either fide. At laft the two queens determined not to leave unfinifhed the good work which they had begun, prevailed, by their importunate folicitations, the one on her brother, the other on her hufband, to confent alfo to a truce in Piedmont for three months. The conditions of it were, that each fhould keep poffeffion of what was in his hands, and after leaving garrifons in the towns, fhould withdraw his army out of the province; and that plenipotentiaries should be appointed to adjust all matters in dispute by a final treaty*.

The powerful motives which inclined both princes to this. accommodation, have been often mentioned. The expences. of the war had far exceeded the fums which their revenues. were capable of fupplying; nor durft they venture upon any great addition to the impositions then established, as subjects. had not yet learnt to bear with patience the immenfe burdens. to which they have become accultomed in modern times. The emperor in particular, though he had contracted debts: which in that age appeared prodigious +, had it not in his. power to pay the large arrears long due to his army. At. the fame time he had no prospect of deriving any aid in money or men either from the pope or Venetians, though he had employed promifes and threats, alternately, in order to. procure it. But he found the former not only fixed in his. refolution of adhering fleadily to the neutrality which hehad always declared to be fuitable to his character, but paf-fionately defirous of bringing about a peace. He perceived! that the latter were ftill intent on their ancient object of holding the balance even between the rivals, and folicitous not to throw too great a weight into either scale ..

What made a deeper impression on Charles than all' thefe, was the dread of the Turkish arms, which, by his. league with Solyman, Francis had drawn upon him. Though Francis, without the affiltance of a fingle ally, had a war to maintain against an enemy greatly fuperior in power to himfelf, yet fo great was the horror of Chriftians, in. that age, at any union with infidels, which they confidered! not only as difhonourable but profane, that it was long before he could be brought to avail himfelf of the obvious advantages refulting from fuch a confederacy. Neceffity at last furmounted his delicacy and feruples. Towards the clofe of the preceding year, La Forest, a fecret agent at the Ottoman Porte, had concluded a treaty with the fultan, whereby Solyman engaged to invade the kingdom of Naples, during the next campaign, and to attack the king of the Romans in Hungary with a powerful army, while Francis undertook to enter the Milanefe at the fame time with a proper force. Solyman had punctually performed what was incumbent on him. Barbaroffa with a great fleet ap. peared on the coaft of Naples, filled that kingdom, from which all the troops had been drawn towards Piedmont, with confternation, landed without refistance near Taranto, obliged Caftro, a place of fome ftrength, to furrender, plundered the adjacent country, and was taking meafures for fecuring and extending his conquefts, when the unexpected arrival of Doria, together with the pope's gallies, and a fquadron of the Venetian fleet, made it prudent for him to retire. In Hungary the progrefs of the Turks was more formidable. Mahmet, their general, after gaining feveral finall advantages, defeated the Germans in a great battle at Effek on the Drave*. Happily for Christendom, it was not in Francis's power, to execute with equal exactness what he had flipulated; nor could he affemble at this juncture an army ftrong enough to penetrate into the Milanefe. By this he failed in recovering poffeffion of that dutchy; and Italy was not only faved from the calamities of a new war, but from feeling the defolating rage of the Turkish arms, as an addition to all that it had fuffered +. As the emperor knew that he could not long refift the efforts of two fuch nowerful confederates, nor could expect that the fame fortunate accidents would concur a fecond time to deliver Naples, and to preferve the Milanefe; as he forefaw that the Italian flates would not only tax him loudly with infatiable ambition, but might even turn their arms against him, if he fhould be fo regardlefs of their danger as obffinately to protract the war, he thought it necessary, both for his fafety and reputation, to give his confent to a truce. Nor was

Francis willing to fuftain all the blame of obfructing the reeftablifhment of tranquillity, or to expofe himfelf on that account to the danger of being deferted by the Swifs and other foreigners in his fervice. He even began to apprehend that his own fubjects would ferve him coldly, if by contributing to aggrandize the power of the Infidels, which it was his duty, and had been the ambition of his anceftors to deprefs, he continued to act in direct opposition to all the principles which ought to influence a monarch diftinguished by the title of Most Christian King. He chofe, for all thefe reafons, rather to run the risk of difobliging his new ally the fultan, than, by an unfeafonable adherence to the treaty with him, to forfeit what was of greater confequence.

But though both parties confented to a truce, the plenipotentiaries found infuperable difficulties in fettling the articles of a definitive treaty. Each of the monarchs, with the arrogance of a conqueror, aimed at giving law to the other; and neither would fo far acknowledge his inferiority, as to facrifice any point of honour, or to relinquifh any matter of right; fo that the plenipotentiaries fpent the time in long and fruitlefs negotiations, and feparated after agreeing to prolong the truce for a few months.

1538.] The pope, however, did not defpair of accomplifting a point in which the plenipotentiaries had failed, and took upon himfelf the fole burden of negotiating a peace. To form a confederacy capable of defending Chriftendom from the formidable inroads of the Turkifth arms, and to concert effectual meafures for the extirpation of the Lutheran herefy, were two great objects which Paul had much at heart, and he confidered the union of the emperor with the king of France as an effential preliminary to both. To be the inftrument of reconciling thefe contending monarchs, whom his predeceffors by their interefted and indecent intrigues had fo often embroiled, was a circumftance which could not fail of throwing diffinguifhed luftre on his character and adminifiration. Nor was he without hopes that, while he purfued this laudable end, he might fecure advantages to his own family, the aggrandizing of which he did not neglect, though he aimed at it with a lefs audacious ambition than was common among the popes of that century. Influenced by thefe confiderations, he propoled an interview between the two monarchs at Nice, and offered to repair thither in perfon, that he might act as mediator in composing all their differences. When a pontiff of a venerable character, and of a very advanced age, was willing, from his zeal for peace, to undergo the fatigues of fo long a journey, neither Charles or Francis could with decency decline the interview. But though both came to the place of rendezvous, fo great was the difficulty of adjusting the ceremonial, or fuch the remains of distrust and raneour on each fide, that they refufed to fee one another, and every thing was transacted by the intervention of the pope, who visited them alternately. With all his zeal and ingenuity he could not find out a method of removing the obstacles which prevented a final accommodation, particularly those arising from the poffeffion of the Milanefe; nor was all the weight of his authority fufficient to overcome the obffinate perfeverance of either monarch in afferting his own claims. At laft, that he might not feem to have laboured altogether without effect, he prevailed on them to fign a truce for ten years. [June 18], upon the fame condition with the former, that each should retain what was now in his possession, and in. the mean time should fend ambaffadors to Rome, to difcufs their pretenfions at leifure*.

Thus ended a war of no long continuance, but very extensive in its operations, and in which both parties exerted their utmost firength. Though Francis failed in the object which he had principally in view, the recovery of the Milanefe, he acquired, neverthelefs, great reputation by the wildom of his meafures as well as the fuccefs of his arms in repelling a formidable invafion; and by keeping poffeffion of one half of the duke of Savoy's dominions, he added no inconfiderable acceffion of ftrength to his kingdom. Where. as Charles, repulfed and baffled, after liaving boafted fo arrogantly of victory, purchafed an inglorious truce, by facri. ficing an ally who had rashly confided too much in his friendship and power. The unfortunate duke murmured, complained, and remonstrated against a treaty fo much to his difadvantage, but in vain; he had no means of redrefs, and was obliged to fubmit. Of all his dominions, Nice, with its dependencies, was the only corner of which he himfelf kept poffeffion. He faw the reft divided between a powerful invader and the ally to whole protection he had trufted, while he remained a fad monument of the imprudence of weak princes, who by taking part in the quarrel of mighty neighbours, between whom they happen to be fituated, are crushcd and overwhelmed in the fhock.

A few days after figning the treaty of truce, the emperor fet fail for Barcelona, but was driven by contrary winds to the island of St. Margaret on the coaft of Provence. When Francis, who happened to be not far diftant, heard of this, he confidered it as an office of civility to invite him to take fhelter in his dominions, and propofed a perfonal interview with him at Aigues-mortes. The emperor, who would not be outdone by his rival in complaifance, inftantly repaired thither. As foon as he caft anchor in the road, Francis without waiting to fettle any point of ceremony, but relying implicitly on the emperor's honour for his fecurity, vifited him on board his galley, and was received and entertained with the warmest demonstrations of esteem and affection. Next day the emperor repaid the confidence which the king had placed in him. He landed at Aiguesmortes with as little precaution, and met with a reception equally cordial. He remained on fhore during the night, and in both vifits the two monarchs vied with each other in expressions of respect and friendship*. After twenty years of open hostilities, or of fecret enmity; after fo many injuries reciprocally inflicted or endured; after having formally given the lie, and challenged one another to fingle combat; after the emperor had inveighed fo publicly against Francis as a prince void of honour or integrity; and after Francis had accused him of being accessfury to the murder of his eldeft fon; such an interview appears altogether fingular and even unnatural. But the history of these monarchs abounds with fuch surprising transitions. From implacable hatred they appeared to pass, in a moment, to the most cordial reconcilement; from sufficient and distruss, to perfect confidence; and from practifing all the dark arts of a deccitful policy, they could affume, of a fudden, the liberal and open manners of two gallant gentlemen.

The pope, befides the glory of having reftored peace to Europe, gained, according to his expectation, a point of great confequence to his family, by prevailing on the emperor to betroth Margaret of Auftria, his natural daughter, formerly the wife of Alexander di Medici, to his grandfon Octavio Farnese, and in consideration of this marriage, to beflow feveral honours and territories upon his future fon-inlaw. A very tragical event, which happened about the beginning of the year 1537, had deprived Margaret of her first hufband. That young prince, whom the emperor's partiality had raifed to the fupreme power in Florence, upon the ruins of the public liberty, neglected entirely the cares of government, and abandoned himfelf to the most diffolute debanchery. Lorenzo di Medici his nearest kinfman was not only the companion but director of his pleafures, and employing all the powers of a cultivated and inventive genius in this difhonourable ministry, added fuch elegance as well as variety to vice, as gained him an abfolute afcendant over the

But while Lorenzo feemed to be funk in luxury, and affected fuch an appearance of indolence and effeminacy, that he would not wear a fword, and trembled at the fight of blood, he concealed under that difguife a dark, defigning, audacious fpirit. Prompted either by the love of liberty, or allured by the hope of attaining the fupreme power, he determined to affaffinate Alexander his benefactor and friend. Though he long revolved this defign in his mind, his referved and fufpicious temper prevented him from communicating it to any perfon whatever; and continuing to live with Alexander in their ufual familiarity, he, one night, under pretence of having fecured him an affignation with a lady of high rank whom he had often folicited, drew that unwary prince into a fecret apartment of his houfe, and there flabbed him, while he lay carelefsly on a couch expecting the arrival of the lady whofe company he had been promifed. But no fooner was the deed done, than flanding aftonished, and ftruck with horror at its atrocity, he forgot, in a moment, all the motives which had induced lim to commit it. Inftead of roufing the people to recover their liberty by publishing the death of the tyrant, inftead of taking any flep towards opening his own way to the dignity now vacant, he locked the door of the apartment, and, like a man bereaved of reason and prefence of mind, fled with the utmost precipitation out of the Florentine territories. It was late next morning before the fate of the unfortunate prince was known, as his attendants, accuftomed to his irregularites, never entered his apartment early. Immediately the chief perfons in the flate affembled. Being induced partly by the zeal of cardinal Cibo for the houfe of Medici, to which he was nearly related, partly by the authority of Francis Guicciardini, who recalled to their memory, and reprefented in flriking colours, the caprice as well as turbulence of their ancient popular government, they agreed to place Cofmo di Medici, a youth of eighteen, the only male heir of that illustrious houfe, at the head of the government; though at the fame time fuch was their love of liberty, that they established feveral regulations in order to circumfcribe and moderate his power.

Meanwhile, Lorenzo having reached a place of fafety, made known what he had done, to Philip Strozzi and the other Florentines who had been driven into exile, or who had voluntarily retired, when the republican form of government was abolished, in order to make way for the dominion of the Medici. By them, the deed was extolled with extravagant praifes, and the virtue of Lorenzo was compared to that of the elder Brutus, who difregarded the ties of blood, or with that of the younger, who forgot the friendship and favours of the tyrant, that they might preferve or recover the liberty of their country+. Nor did they reft fatisfied with empty panegyrics; they immediately quitted their different places of retreat, affembled forees, animated their vaffals and partizans to take arms, and to feize this opportunity of reeftablishing the public liberty on its ancient foundation. Being openly affifted by the French ambaffador at Rome, and fecretly encouraged by the pope, who bore no good-will to the houfe of Medici, they entered the Florentine dominious with a confiderable body of men. But the perfons who had elected Cofmo poffeffed not only the means of fupporting his government, but abilities to employ them in the moft proper manner. They levied, with the greatest expedition, a good number of troops; they endeavoured by every art to gain the citizens of greateft authority, and to render the administration of the young prince agreeable to the people. Above all, they courted the emperor's protection, as the only firm foundation of Cofino's dignity and power. Charles, knowing the propenfity of the Florentines to the friendship of France, and how much all the partizans of a republican government detefted him as the oppreffor of their liberties, faw it to be greatly for his interest to prevent the re-establifhment of the ancient conflictution in Florence, For this reafon, he not only acknowledged Cofmo as head of the Florentine flate, and conferred on him all the titles of honour with which Alexander had been dignified, but engaged to defend him to the utmoll; and as a pledge of this, ordered the commanders of fuch of his troops as were flationed on the frontiers of Tufcany, to fupport him against all aggreffors. By their aid, Cofmo obtained an eafy victory over the exiles, whofe troops he furprifed in the night-time, and took most of the chiefs prisoners: an event which broke all their measures, and fully established his own authority. But though he was extremely defirous of the additional honour of marrying the emperor's daughter, the widow of his predeceffor, Charles, fecure already of his attackment, chofe rather to gratify the pope, by beftowing her on his pephew+.

During the war between the emperor and Francis, an event had happened which abated in fome degree the warmth and cordiality of friendship which had long fubfilled between the latter and the king of England. James the fifth of Scotland, an enterprifing young prince, having heard of the emperor's intention to invade Provence, was fo fond of fhewing that he did not yield to any of his aneeftors in the fincerity of his attachment to the French crown, and fo eager to diftinguish himfelf by fome military exploit, that he levied a body of troops with an intention of leading them in perfon to the affiftance of the king of France. Though fome unfortunate accidents prevented his carrying any troops into France, nothing could divert him from going thither in perfon. Immediately upon his landing, he haftened to Provence, but had been detained fo long in his voyage, that he came too late to have any fhare in the military operations, and met the king on his return after the retreat of the Imperialifts. But Francis was fo greatly pleafed with his zeal, and no lefs with his manners and converfation, that he could not refuse him his daughter Magdalen, whom he demanded in marriage. It mortified Henry extremely to fee a prince, of whom he was immoderately jealous, form an alliance [Jan. 1, 1537], from which he derived fuch an acceffion of reputation as well as fecurity +. He could not, however, with dccency, oppose Francis's beflowing his daughter upon a monarch descended from a race of princes, the most ancient and faithful allies of the French crown. But when James, upon the fudden death of Magdalen, demanded as his fecond wife Mary of Guile, he warmly folicited Francis to deny his fuit, and in order to difappoint him, afked that lady in marriage for himfelf. When Francis preferred the Scottifh king's fincere courtship to his artful and malevolent propofal, he discovered much diffatisfaction. The pacification agreed upon at Nice, and the familiar interview of the two rivals at Aigues-mortes, filled Henry's mind with new fufpicions, as if Francis had altogether renounced his friendship for the fake of new connections with the emperor. Charles, thoroughly acquainted with the temper of the English king, and watchful to obferve all the fhiftings and caprices of his paffions, thought this a favourable opportunity of renewing his negotiations with him, which had been long broken off. By the death of queen Catharine, whole interest the emperor could not with decency have abandoned, the chief caufe of their difcord was removed; fo that, without touching upon the delicate queffion of her divorce, he might now take what measures he thought most effectual for regaining Henry's good-will. For this purpofe, he began with propofing feveral marriage-treaties to the king. He offered his niece, a daughter of the king of Denmark, to Henry himfelf; he demanded the princefs Mary for one of the princes of Portugal, and was even willing to receive her as the king's illegitimate daughter*. Though none of thefe projected alliances ever took place, or perhaps were ever ferioufly intended, they occasioned fuch frequent intercourse between the courts, and fo many reciprocal profeffions of civility and efleem, as confiderably abated the edge of Henry's rancour against the emperor, and paved the way for that union between them which afterwards proved fo difadvantageous to the French king.

The ambitious schemes in which the emperor had been engaged, and the wars he had been carrying on for fome years, proved, as ufual, extremely favourable to the progrefs of the reformation in Germany. While Charles was absent upon his African expedition, or intent on his projects against France, his chief object in Germany was to prevent the diffenfions about religion from diffurbing the public tranquillity, by granting fuch indulgence to the protestant princes as might induce them to concur with his measures, or at least hinder them from taking part with his rival. For this reafon, he was careful to fecure to the protestants the possession of all the advantages which they had gained by the articles of pacification at Nuremberg, in the year one thousand five hundred and thirty two*; and except fome flight trouble from the proceedings of the Imperial chamber, they met with nothing to diffurb them in the exercise of their religion, or to interrupt the fuccefsful zeal with which they propagated their opinions. Meanwhile the pope continued his negotiations for convoking a general council; and though the protestants had expressed great diffatisfaction with his intention to fix upon Mantua as the place of meeting, he adhered obstinately to his choice, iffued a bull on the fecond of June one thousand five hundred and thirty-fix, appointing it to affemble in that city on the twenty-third of May the year following: he nominated three cardinals to prefide in his name; enjoined all Christian princes to countenance it by their authority, and invited the prelates of every nation. to attend in perfon. This fummons of a council, an affembly which from its nature and intention demanded quiet times, as well as pacific difpofitions, at the very juncture when the emperor was on his march towards France, and ready to involve a great part of Europe in the confusions of war, appeared to every perfon extremely unfeafonable. It was intimated, however, to all the different courts by nuncios difpatched of purpofe+. With an intention to gratify the Germans, the emperor, during his refidence in Rome, had warmly folicited the pope to call a council; but being at the fame time willing to try every art in order to perfuade Paul to depart from the neutrality which he preferved between him and Francis, he fent Heldo his vice-chancellor into Germany, along with a nuncio difpatched thither, inflructing him to fecond all the nuncio's reprefentations, and to enforce them with the whole weight of the Imperial authority. The proteflants gave them audience at Smalkalde, [Feb. 25, 1537,] where they had affembled in a body in order to receive them. But after weighing all their arguments, they unanimonfly refufed to acknowledge a council fummoned in the name and by the authority of the pope alone; in which he affumed the fole right of prefiding; which was to be held in a city not only far diftant from Germany, but fubject to a prince, who was a ftranger to them, and clofely connected with the court of Rome; and to which their divines could not repair with fafety, especially after their doctrines had been ftigmatized in the very bull of convocation with the name of herefy. Thefe and many other objections against the council, which appeared to them unanfwerable, they cnumerated in a large manifefto, which they published in vindication of their conduct_.

Against this the court of Rome exclaimed as a flagrant proof of their obflinacy and prefumption, and the pope ftill perfifted in his refolution to hold the council at the time and in the place appointed. But fome unexpected difficulties being flarted by the duke of Mantua, both about the right of jurifdiction over the perfons who reforted to the council, and the fecurity of his capital amidft fuch a concourse of ftrangers, the pope [Oct. 8, 1538,] after fruitless endeavours to adjust these, first prorogued the council for fome months, and afterwards, transferring the place of meeting to Vicenza in the Venetian territories, appointed it to affemble on the first of May, in the following year. As neither the emperor nor the French king, who had not then come to any accommodation, would permit their fubjects to repair thither, not a fingle prelate appeared on the day prefixed, and the pope, that his authority might not become altogether contemptible by fo many ineffectual efforts to convoke that affembly, put off the meeting by an indefinite prorogations.

But that he might not feem to have turned his whole attention towards a reformation which he was not able to accomplish, while he neglected that which was in his own power, he deputed a certain number of cardinals and bishops, with full authority to inquire into the abuses and corruptions of the Roman court; and to propose the most effectual method of removing them. This ferutiny, undertaken with reluctance, was carried on flowly and with remiffnels. All defects were touched with a gentle hand, afraid of probing too deep, or of difcovering too much. But even by this partial examination, many irregularities were detected, and many enormitics exposed to light, while the remedies which they fuggested as most proper were either inadequate, or were never applied. The report and refolution of these deputies, though intended to be kept fecret, were transmitted by fome accident into Germany, and being immediately made public, afforded ample matter for reflection, and triumph to the protestants*. On the one hand, they demonstrated the necessity of a reformation in the head as well as the members of the church, and even pointed out many of the corruptions against which Luther and his followers had remonstrated with the greatest vchemence. They fhewed, on the other hand, that it was vain to expect this reformation from ecclefiaftics themfelyes, who, as Luther ftrongly expressed it, piddled at curing warts, while they overlooked or confirmed ulcers +.

1539.] The earneftnefs with which the emperor feemed, at first, to prefs their acquicfcing in the pope's scheme of holding a council in Italy, alarmed the protestant princes fo much, that they thought it prudent to ftrengthen their confederacy, by admitting feveral new members who folicited that privilege, particularly the king of Denmark. Heldo, who, during his refidence in Germany, had observed all the advantages which they derived from that union, endeavoured to counterbalance its effects by an alliance among the catholic powers of the empire. This league, diftinguished by the name of Holy, was merely defensive; and though concluded by Heldo in the emperor's name, was afterwards difowned by him, and fubfcribed by very few princes +.

The protestants soon got intelligence of this affociation, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the contracting parties to conceal it; and their zeal, always apt to fulpect and to dread, even to excefs, every thing that feemed to threaten religion, inflantly took the alarm, as if the emperor had been just ready to enter upon the execution of fome formidable plan for the extirpation of their opinions. In order to difappoint this, they held frequent confultations, they courted the kings of France and England with great affiduity, and even began to think of raifing the respective contingents both in men and money which they were obliged to furnish by the treaty of Smalkalde. But it was not long before they were convinced that thefe apprehenfions were without foundation, and that the emperor, to whom repofe was abfolutely neceffary, after efforts fo much beyond his ftrength in the war with France, had no thoughts of diffurbing the tranquillity of Germany. As a proof of this, at an interview with the protestant princes in Francfort [April 197, his ambaffadors agreed that all conceffions in their favour, particularly those contained in the pacification of Nuremberg, should continue in force for fifteen months; that during this period all proceedings of the Imperial chamber against them should be fuspended; that a conference should be held by a few divines of each party, in order to difcufs the points in controverly, and to propofe articles of accommodation which should be laid before the next diet. Though the emperor, that he might not irritate the pope, who remonstrated against the first part of this agreement as impolitic, and against the latter, as an impious encroachment upon his prerogative, never formally ratified this convention, it was obferved with confiderable exactnefs, and greatly firengthened the bafis of that ecclefiaftical liberty for which the protestants contended *.

A few days after the convention at Francfort, George duke of Saxony died [April 24], and his death was an event of great advantage to the reformation. That prince, the head of the Albertine, or younger branch of the Saxon family, poffeffed, as marquis of Mifnia and Thuringia, extenfive territories, comprehending Drefden, Leipfic, and other cities now the most confiderable in the electorate. From the first dawn of the reformation, he had been its enemy as avowedly as the electoral princes were its protectors, and had carried on his opposition not only with all the zeal flowing from religious prejudices, but with a virulence infpired by perfonal antipathy to Luther, and embittered by the domeffic animofity fubfifting between him and the other branch of his family. By his death without iffue, his fucceffion fell to his brother Henry, whofe attachment to the protestant religion furpassed, if possible, that of his predeceffor to popery. Henry no fooner took poffeffion of his new dominions, than, difregarding a claufe in George's will, dictated by his bigotry, whereby he bequeathed all his territories to the emperor and king of the Romans, if his brother fhould attempt to make any innovation in religion, he invited fome proteftant divines, and among them Luther himfelf, to Leipfic. By their advice and affiftance, he overturned in, a few weeks the whole fyftem of ancient rites, eftablifhing the full exercife of the reformed religion, with the univerfal applaufe of his fubjects, who had long wifhed for this change, which the authority of their duke alone had hitherto prevented†. This revolution delivered the proteftants from the danger to which they were exposed by having an inveterate enemy fituated in the middle of their territories; and they had now the fatisfaction of feeing that the poffeffions of the princes and cities attached to their caufe, extended in one great and almoft unbroken line from the fhore of the Baltic to the banks of the Rhine.

Soon after the conclusion of the truce at Nice, an event happened, which fatisfied all Europe that Charles had profecuted the war to the utmost extremity that the state of his affairs would permit. Vaft arrears were due to his troops, whom he had long amufed with vain hopes and promifes. As they now forefaw what little attention would be paid to their demands, when by the re-establishment of peace their fervices became of less importance, they lost all patience, broke out into an open mutiuy, and declared that they thought themfelves entitled to feize by violence what was detained from them contrary to all justice. Nor was this fpirit of fedition confined to one part of the emperor's dominions; the mutiny was almost as general as the grievance which gave rife to it. The foldiers in the Milanefe plundered the open country without controul, and filled the capital itfelf with confternation. Those in garrifon at Goletta threatened to give up that important fortrefs to Barbaroffa. In Sicily, the troops proceeded to ftill greater exceffes; having driven away their officers, they elected others in their flead, defeated a body of men whom the viceroy fent against them, took and pillaged feveral cities, conducting themfelves all the while in fuch a manner, that their operations refembled rather the regular proceedings of a concerted rebellion, than the rafhnefs and violence of a military mutiny. But by the addrefs and prudence of the generals, who, partly by borrowing money in their own name, or in that of their mafter, partly by extorting large fums from the cities in their refpective provinces, raifed what was fufficient to difcharge the arrears of the foldiers, thefe infurrections were quelled. The greater part of the troops were difbanded, fuch a number only being kept in pay as was neceffary for garrifoning the principal towns, and protecting the fea-coafts from the infults of the Turks*.

It was happy for the emperor that the abilities of his generals extricated him out of thefe difficulties, which it exceeded his own power to have removed. He had depended, as his chief refource for difcharging the arrears due to his foldiers, upon the fubfidies which he expected from his Castilian fubjects. For this purpose, he affembled the Cortes of Castile at Toledo, and having reprefented to them the extraordinary expence of his military operations, together with the great debts in which thefe had neceffarily involved him, he proposed to levy fuch fupplies as the prefent exigency of his affairs demanded, by a general excife on commodities. But the Spaniards already felt themfelves oppreffed with a load of taxes unknown to their anceftors. They had often complained that their country was drained not only of its wealth but of its inhabitants, in order to profecute quarrels in which it was not interefted, and to fight battles from which it could rcap no benefit; and they determined not to add voluntarily to their own burdens, or to furnish the emperor with the means of engaging in new enterprifes no lefs ruinous to the kingdom than most of those which he had hitherto carried on. The nobles iu particular inveighed with great vehemence against the imposition propofed, as an encroachment upon the valuable and dillinguishing privilege of their order, that of being exempted from the payment of any tax. They demanded a conference with the reprefentatives of the cities concerning the flate of the nation. They contended that if Charles would imitate the example of his predeceffors, who had refided conftantly in Spain, and would avoid entangling himfelf in a multiplicity of transactions foreign to the concerns of his Spanish dominions, his stated revenues of the crown would be fully fufficient to defray the neceffary expences of government. They reprefented to him, that it would be unjust to lay new burdens upon the people, while this prudent and effectual method of re-eftablishing public credit, and fecuring national opulence, was totally neglected +. Charles, after employing arguments, entreaties, and promises, but without fuccels, in order to overcome their oblinacy, difmiffed the affembly with great indignation. From that period neither the nobles nor the prelates have been called to these affemblies, on pretence that such as pay no part of the public taxes, fhould not claim any vote in laying them on. None have been admitted to the Cortes but the procurators or reprefentatives of eighteen cities. Thefe to the number of thirty-fix, being two from each community, form an affembly which bears no refemblance either in power or dignity or independence to the ancient Cortes, and are abfolutely at the devotion of the court in all their determinationst. Thus the imprudent zeal with which the Castilian nobles had fupported the regal prerogative, in opposition to the claims of the commons during the commotions in the year one thousand five hundred and twenty-one, proved at last fatal to their own body. By enabling Charles to deprefs one of the orders in the flate, they deftroyed that balance to which the conflitution owed its fecurity, and put it in his power, or in that of his fucceffors, to humble the other, and to ftrip it gradually of its most valuable privileges.

At the fame time, however, the Spanish grandees still poffeffed extraordinary power as well as privileges, which they exercifed and defended with an haughtine's peculiar to themfelves. Of this the emperor himfelf had a mortifying proof during the meeting of the Cortes at Toledo. As he was returning one day from a tournament accompanied by moft of the nobility, one of the ferjeants of the court, out of officious zeal to clear the way for the emperor, ftruck the duke of Infantado's horfe with his batton, which that haughty grandee refenting, drew his fword, beat and wounded the officer. Charles, provoked at fuch an infolent deed in his prefence, immediately ordered Ronquillo the judge of the court to arreft the duke; Ronquillo advanced to execute his charge, when the conflable of Caffile interpoling, checked him, claimed the right of jurifdiction over a grandee as a privilege of his office, and conducted Infantado to his own apartment. All the nobles prefent were fo pleafed with the boldnefs of the conftable in afferting the rights of their order, that, deferting the emperor, they attended him to his houfe with infinite applaufes, and Charles returned to the palace unaccompanied by any perfon but the cardinal Tavera. The emperor, how fentible foever of the affront, faw the danger of irritating a jealous and high-fpirited order of men, whom the flighteft appearance of offence might drive to the moft unwarrantable extremities. For that reafon, inftead of ftraining at any ill-timed exertion of his prerogative, he prudently connived at the arrogance of a body too potent for him to controul, and fent next morning to the duke of Infantado, offering to inflict what punifhment he pleafed on the perfon who had affronted him. The duke confidering this as a full reparation to his honour, instantly forgave the officer; beftowing on him, befides, a confiderable prefent as a compensation for his wound. Thus the affair was entirely forgotten †; nor would it have deferved to be mentioned, if it were not a flriking example of the high and independent fpirit of the Spanifh nobles in that age, as well as an inflance of the emperor's dexterity in accommodating his conduct to the circumflances in which he was placed.

Charles was far from discovering the same condescension or lenity toward the citizens of Ghent, who not long after broke out into open rebellion against his government. An event which happened in the year one thousand five hundred. and thirty-fix, gave occasion to this rash infurrection fo fatal to that flourishing city. At that time the queen dowagerof Hungary, governess of the Netherlands, having received orders from her brother to invade France with all the forces which she could raife, she affembled the States of the United Provinces, and obtained from them a fubfidy of twelve hundred thousand florins, to defray the expence of that undertaking. Of this fum, the county of Flanders was obliged to pay a third part as its proportion. But the citizens of Ghent, the most confiderable city in that country, averfe to a war with France, with which they carried on an extensive and gainful commerce, refused to pay their quota, and contended, that in confequence of flipulations between them and the anceftors of their prefent fovereign the emperor, no tax could be levied upon them, unlefs they had given their express confent to the imposition of it. The governefs on the other hand, maintained, that as the fubfidy of twelve hundred thousand florins had been granted by the States of Flanders, of which their representatives were members, they were bound, of courfe, to conform to what was enacted by them, as it is the first principle in fociety, on which the tranquillity and order of government depend, that the inclinations of the minority must be over-ruled by the judgment and decifion of the fuperior number.

The citizens of Ghent, however, were not willing to relinquish a privilege of fuch high importance as that which they claimed. Having been accustomed, under the government of the houle of Burgundy, to enjoy extensive immunities, and to be treated with much indulgence, they difdained to facrifice to the delegated power of a regent, thofe rights and liberties which they had often and fuccefsfully afferted against their greatest princes. The queen, though fhe endeavoured at first to foothe them, and to reconcile them to their duty by various conceffions, was at last fo much irritated by the obfinacy with which they adhered to their claim, that the ordered all the citizens of Ghent, on whom flie could lay hold in any part of the Netherlands, to be arrefted. But this rafh action made an impreffion very different from what the expected, on men, whofe minds were agitated with all the violent paffions which indignation at oppression and zeal for liberty inspire. Less affected with the danger of their friends and companions, than irritated at the governefs, they openly defpifed her authority, and fent deputies to the other towns of Flanders, conjuring them not to abandon their country at fuch a juncture, but to concur with them in vindicating its rights against the encroachments of a woman, who either did not know or did not regard their immunitics. All but a few inconfiderable towns declined entering into any confederacy against the governefs; they joined, however, in petitioning her to put off the term for payment of the tax fo long, that they might have it in their power to fend fome of their number into Spain, in order to lay their title to exemption before their fovereign. This the granted with fome difficulty. But Charles received their commissioners with an haughtiness to which they were not accustomed from their ancient princes, and enjoining them to yield the fame respectful obedience to his fifter, which they owed to him in perfon, remitted the examination of their claim to the council of Malines. This court, which is properly a standing committee of the parliament or flates of the country, and which poffeffes the fupreme jurifdiction in all matters civil as well as criminal*, pronounced the claim of the citizens of Ghent to be illfounded, and appointed them forthwith to pay their proportion of the tax.

Enraged at this decision, which they confidered as notorioufly unjust, and rendered desperate on feeing their rights betrayed by that very court which was bound to protect them, the people of Ghent ran to arms in a tumultuary manner; drove fuch of the nobility as refided among them out of the city; fecured feveral of the emperor's officers; put one of them to the torture, whom they accufed of having stolen or destroyed the record that contained a ratification of the privileges of exemption from taxes which they pleaded; chofe a council to which they committed the direction of their affairs; gave orders for repairing and adding to their fortifications; and openly erected the standard of rebeilion against their fovereign 7. Sensible, however, of their inability to fupport what their zeal had prompted them to undertake, and defirous of fecuring a protector against the formidable forces by which they might expect foon to be attacked, they fent fome of their number to Francis, offering not only to acknowledge him as their fovereign, and to put him in immediate poffession of Ghent, but to affift him with all their forces in recovering those provinces in the Netherlands, which had anciently belonged to the crown of France, and had been fo lately re-united to it by the decree of the parliament of Paris. This unexpected proposition coming from perfons who had it in their power to have performed inftantly one part of what they undertook, and who could contribute fo effectually towards the execution of the whole, opened great as well as alluring profpects to Francis's ambition. The counties of Flanders and Artois were of greater value than the dutchy of Milan, which he had fo long laboured to acquire with paffionate but fruitlefs defire; their fituation with respect to France rendered it more easy to conquer or to defend them; and they might be formed into a feparate principality for the duke of Orleans, no lefs fuitable to his dignity than that which his father aimed at obtaining. To this, the Flemings, who were acquainted with the French manners and government, would not have been averfe; and his own fubjects, weary of their deftructive expeditions into Italy, would have turned their armstowards this quarter with more good will, and with greater vigour. Several confiderations, neverthelefs, prevented Francis from laying hold of this opportunity, the most favourable in appearance which had ever prefented itfelf, of extending his own dominions, or distreffing the emperor. From the time of their interview at Aigues-mortes, Charles had continued to court the king of France with wonderful attention; and often flattered him with hopes of gratifying at last his wishes concerning the Milanefe, by granting the involtiture of it either to him or to one of his fons. But though these hopes and promises were thrown out with no other intention than to detach him from his confederacy with the grand feignior, or to raife fuspicions in Solyman's mind by the appearance of a cordial and familiar intercourfe fubfifting between the courts of Paris and Madrid, Francis was weak enough to catch at the fhadow by which he had been fo often amufed, and from eagernefs to feize it, relinquished what must have proved a more substantial acquisition. Befides this, the dauphin, jealous to excels of his brother, and unwilling that a prince who feemed to be of a reftlefs and enterprifing nature, fhould obtain an cftablishment, which from its fituation might be confidered almost as a domeftic one, made use of Montmorency, who, by a fingular piece of good fortune, was at the fame time the favourite of the father and of the fon, to defeat the application of the Flemings, and to divert the king from f oufing.

their caufe. Montmorency, accordingly, reprefented, in flrong terms, the reputation and power which Francis would acquire by recovering that footing which he formerly had in Italy, and that nothing would be fo efficacious to overcome the emperor's averfion to this as a facred adherence to the truce, and refufing, on an occafion fo inviting, to countenance the rebellious fubjects of his rival. Francis, apt of himfelf to over-rate the value of the Milanefe, becaufe he effimated it from the length of time as well as from the great efforts which he had employed in order to reconquer it, and fond of every action which had the appearance of generofity, affented without difficulty to fentiments fo agreeable to his own, rejected the propositions of the citizens of Ghent, and difmiffed their deputies with an harfh anfwer*.

Not fatisfied with this, by a further refinement in generofity, he communicated to the emperor his whole negotiation with the malecontents, and all that he knew of their fchemes and intentions +. This convincing proof of Francis's difinterestedness relieved Charles from the most difquieting apprehenfions, and opened a way to extricate himfelf out of all his difficulties. He had already received full information of all the transactions in the Netherlands, and of the rage with which the people of Gheat had taken arms against his government. He was thoroughly acquainted with the genius and qualities of his fubjects in that country; with their love of liberty; their attachment to their ancient privileges and cultoms; as well as the invincible obflinacy with which their minds, flow but firm and perfevering, adhered to any meafure on which they had deliberately refolved. He eafily faw what encouragement and fupport they might have derived from the affiftance of France; and though now free from any danger on that quarter, he was still fensible that fome immediate as well as vigorous interpofition was neceffary, in order to prevent the fpirit of difaffection from fpreading in a country where the number of cities, the multitude of people, together with the great wealth diffused among them. by commerce, rendered it peculiarly formidable, and would fupply it with inexhaustible refources. No expedient, after long deliberation, appeared to him fo effectual as his going in perfon to the Netherlands; and the governefs his fifter being of the fame opinion, warmly folicited him to undertake the journey. There were only two routes which he could take; one by land through Italy and Germany, the other entirely by fea, from fome port in Spain to one in the Low-Countries. But the former was more tedious than fuited the prefent exigency of his affairs; nor could he in confiftency with his dignity, or even his fafety, pafs through. Germany without fuch a train both of attendants and of troops, as would have added greatly to the time he muft have confumed in his journey; the latter was dangerous at this feafon, and while he remained uncertain with refpect tothe friendship of the king of England, was not to be ventured upon, unlefs under the convoy of a powerful fleet. This perplexing fituation, in which he was under the neceffity of chuling, and did not know what to chule, infpired. him at laft with the fingular and feemingly extravagant thought of paffing through France, as the most expeditious way of reaching the Netherlands. He propofed in his council to demand Francis's permiffion for that purpofe. All his counfellors joined with one voice in condemning the measure as no lefs-rash than unprecedented, and which must infallibly expose him to difgrace or to danger; to difgrace; if the demand were rejected in the manner that he had reafon to expect; to danger, if he put his perfon in the power of an enemy whom he had often offended, who had ancient injuries to revenge, as well as fubjects of prefeat contest fill remaining undecided. But Charles, who had fludied the character of his rival with greater care and more profound difcernment than any of his ministers, perlifted in his plan, and flattered himfelf that it might be accomplished not only M 3

without danger to his own perfon, but even without the expence of any conceffion detrimental to his crown.

With this view he communicated the matter to the French ambaffador at his court, and fent Granvelle his chief minister to Paris, in order to obtain from Francis permiffion to pafs through his dominions, and to promife that he would foon fettle the affair of the Milanefe to his fatisfaction. But at the fame time he entreated that Francis would not exact any new promife, or even infift on former engagements, at this juncture, left whatever he should grant, under his prefent circumftances, might feem rather to be extorted by neceffity than to flow from friendship or the love of justice. Francis inftead of attending to the fnare which fuch a flight artifice fcarcely concealed, was fo dazzled with the fplendour of overcoming an enemy by acts of generofity, and fo pleafed with the air of fuperiority which the rectitude and difintereftcdnefs of his proceedings gave him on this occafion, that he at once affented to all that was demanded. Judging of the emperor's heart by his own, he imagined that the fentiments of gratitude, arifing from the remembrance of good offices and liberal treatment, would determine him more forcibly to fulfil what he had fo often promifed, than the moft precife flipulations that could be inferted in any treaty.

Upon this, Charles, to whom every moment was precious fet out, notwithftanding the fears and fufpicions of his Spanish fubjects, with a small but splendid train of about an hundred perfons. At Bayoune, on the frontiers of France, he was received by the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, attended by the constable Montmorency. The two princes offered to go into Spain, and to remain there as hostages for the emperor's fafety; but this he rejected, declaring, that he relied with implicit confidence on the king's honour, and had never demanded, nor would accept of any other pledge for his fecurity. In all the towns through which he passed, the greatest possible magnificence was difplayed; the magiftrates prefented him the keys of the gates; the prifon doors were fet open; and by the royal honours paid to him, he appeared more like the fovereign of the country than a foreign prince [1540]. The king advanced as far as Chatelherault to meet him, their interview was diftinguifhed by the warmeft exprefiions of friendship and regard. They proceeded together towards Paris, and prefented to the inhabitants of that city, the extraordinary spectacle of two rival monarchs, whose enmity had disturbed and laid waste Europe during twenty years, making their folemn entry together with all the symptoms of a confidential harmony, as if they had forgotten for ever past injuries and would never revive hostilities for the future  $\uparrow$ .

Charles remained fix days at Paris; but amidft the perpetual careffes of the French court, and the various entertainments contrived to amuse or to do him honour, he difcovered an extreme impatience to continue his journey, ariling as much from an apprehension of danger which conflantly haunted him, as from the necessity of his prefence in the Low-Countries. Confcious of the difingenuity of his own intentions, he trembled when he reflected that fome fatal accident might betray them to his rival, or lead him to fuspect them; and though his artifices to conceal them fhould be fuccefsful, he could not help fearing that motives of interest might at last triumph over the scruples of honour, and tempt Francis to avail himfelf of the advantage now in his hands. Nor were there wanting perfons among the French minifters, who advifed the king to turn his own arts against the emperor, and as the retribution due for fo many inftances of fraud or falsehood, to feize and detain his perfon until he granted him full fatisfaction with regard to all the just claims of the French crown. But no confideration could induce Francis to violate the faith which he had pledged, nor could any argument convince him that Charles, after all the promifes that he had given, and all the favours which he had received, might fill be capable of deceiving: him. Full of this falle confidence, he accompanied him to St. Quintin; and the two princes, who had met him onthe borders of Spain, did not take leave of him until he entered his dominions in the Low-Countries.

As foon as the emperor reached his own territories [Jan. 24], the French ambaffadors demanded the accomplifhment of what he had promifed concerning the invefitiure of Milan: but Charles, under the plaufible pretext that his whole attention was then engroffed by the confultations neceffary towards fuppreffing the rebellion in Ghent, put off the matter for fome time. But in order to prevent Francis from fufpecting his fincerity, he ftill continued to talk of his refolutions with refpect to that matter in the fame ftrain as when he entered France, and even wrote to the king much to the fame purpofe, though in general terms, and with equivocal exprefiions, which he might afterwards explain. away or interpret at pleafure ‡.

Meanwhile the unfortunate citizens of Ghent, deftitute of leaders capable either of directing their councils, or conducting their troops; abandoned by the French king, and unfupported by their countrymen; were unable to refift their offended fovereign, who was ready to advance against them. with one body of troops which he had raifed in the Netherlands, with another drawn out of Germany, and a third. which had arrived from Spain by fea. The near approach of danger made them, at laft, fo fenfible of their own folly, that they fent ambaffadors to the emperor, imploring his. mercy, and offering to fet open their gates at his approach. Charles without vouchfating them any other anfwer, than that he would appear among them as their fovereign, with the fceptre and the fword in his hand, began his march at the head of his troops. Though he chose to enter the city on the twenty-fourth of February, his birth-day, he was touchted with nothing of that tendernels or indulgence which was natural towards the place of his nativity. Twenty-fix of the principal citizens were put to death [April 20]; a greater number were fent into banishment; the city was declared to have forfeited all its privileges and immunitics; the revenues belonging to it were confifcated; its ancient form of government was abolished; the nomination of its magistrates was vested for the future in the emperor and his fucceffors; a new fystem of laws and political administration was preferibed +; and in order to bridle the feditious fpirit of the citizens, orders were given to erect a ftrong citadel, for defraying the expense of which a fine of an hundred and fifty thousand florins was imposed on the inhabitants, together with an annual tax of fix thousand florins for the support of the garrifon*. By thefe rigorous proceedings, Charles not only punished the citizens of Ghent, but fet an awful example of feverity before his other fubjects in the Netherlands, whofe immunities and privileges, partly the effect, partly the caufe of their extensive commerce, circumfcribed the prerogative of their fovereign within very narrow bounds, and often flood in the way of meafures which he wished to undertake, or fettered and retarded him in his operations.

Charles having thus vindicated and re-eftablished his authority in the Low-Countries, and being now under no neceffity of continuing the fame fcene of falfehood and diffimulation with which he had long amufed Francis, began gradually to throw afide the veil under which he had concealed his intentions with respect to the Milanefe. At first, he eluded the demands of the French ambaffadors, when they again reminded him of his promifes; then he propofed, by way of equivalent for the dutchy of Milan, to grant the duke of Orleans the investiture of Flanders, clogging the offer, however, with impracticable conditions, or fuch as he knew would be rejecteds. At laft, being driven from all his evaluons and fubterfuges by their infifting for a categorical anfwer, he peremptorily refufed to give up a territory of fuch value, or voluntarily to make fuch a liberal addition to the ftrength of an enemy, by diminishing his own power†. He denied, at the fame time, that he had ever made any promife which could bind him to an action fo foolish, and fo contrary to his own interest*.

Of all the transactions in the emperor's life, this, without doubt, reflects the greatest dishonour on his reputation*. Though Charles was not extremely for pulses at other times about the means which he employed for accomplishing his ends, and was not always observant of the first precepts of veracity and honour, he had hitherto maintained fome regard for the maxims of that lefs precise and rigid morality by which monarchs think themselves entitled to regulate their conduct. But, on this occasion, the feheme that he formed of deceiving a generous and open-hearted prince; the illiberal and mean artifices by which he carried it on; the infensibility with which he received all the marks of his friendship, as well as the ingratitude with which he requited them, are all equally unbecoming the dignity of his character, and inconsistent with the grandeur of his views.

This transaction exposed Francis to as much foorn as it did the emperor to cenfure. After the experience of a long reign, after fo many opportunities of difcovering the duplicity and artifices of his rival, the credulous fimplicity with which he trufted him at this juncture feemed to merit no other return than what it actually met with. Francis, however, remonstrated and exclaimed, as if this had been the first inflance in which the emperor had deceived him. Feeling, as is ufual, the infult which was offered to his understanding ftill more fensibly than the injury done to his interest, he difcovered fuch referentment, as made it obvious that he would lay hold on the first opportunity of being revenged, and that a war, no lefs rancorous than that which had fo lately raged, would foon break out anew in Europe.

But fingular as the transaction which has been related may appear, this year is rendered fill more memorable by the establishment of the order of Jesuits; a body whose influence on ecclefiaftical as well as civil affairs hath been fo confiderable, that an account of the genius of its laws and government justly merits a place in history. When men take a view of the rapid progrefs of this fociety towards wealth and power; when they contemplate the admirable prudence with which it has been governed; when they attend to the perfevering and fystematic spirit with which its schemes have been carried on; they are apt to aferibe fuch a fingular inflitution to the fuperior wildom of its founder, and to fuppofe that he had formed and digefted his plan with profound policy. But the Jesuits, as well as the other monaftic orders, are indebted for the existence of their order not to the wifdom of their founder, but to his enthufiafm. Ignatio Loyola, whom I have already mentioned on occasion of the wound which he received in defending Pampeluna+, was a fanatic diffinguished by extravagancies in fentiment and conduct, no lefs incompatible with the maxims of fober reafon, than repugnant to the fpirit of true religion. The wild adventures, and visionary schemes, in which his enthusiasim engaged him, equal any thing recorded in the legends of the Romish faints; but are unworthy of notice in history.

Prompted by this fanatical fpirit, or incited by the love of power and diffinction, from which fuch pretenders to fuperior fanctity are not exempt, Loyola was ambitious of becoming the founder of a religious order. The plan, which he formed of its conflitution and laws, was fuggefted. as he gave out, and as his followers still teach, by the immediate infpiration of heaven*. But notwithstanding this high pretention, his defign met at first with violent opposition. The pope, to whom Loyola had applied for the fanetion of his authority to confirm the inftitution, referred his petition to a committee of cardinals. They reprefented the eftablishment to be unncceffary as well as dangerous, and Paul refused to grant his approbation of it. At laft, Loyola removed all his fcruples by an offer which it was impofiible for any pope to refift. He proposed, that besides the three vows of poverty, of chaftity, and of monaftic obedience, which are common to all the orders of regulars, the members of his fociety fhould take a fourth vow of obedience to the pope, binding themfelves to go whitherfoever he fhould command for the fervice of religion, and without requiring any thing from the holy fee for their fupport. At a time when the papal authority had received fuch a flock by the revolt of fo many nations from the Romifli church; at a time when every part of the popifh fystem was attacked with fo much violence and fuccefs, the acquifition of a body of men, thus peculiarly devoted to the fce of Rome, and whom it might fet in opposition to all its enemies, was an object of the highest confequence. Paul, instantly perceiving this, confirmed the inflitution of the Jefuits by his bull [Sept 27]; granted the most ample privileges to the members of the fociety; and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the order. The event hath fully juftified Paul's difeernment, in expecting fuch beneficial confequences to the fee of Rome from this inftitution. In lefs than half a century, the fociety obtained establishments in every country that adhered to the Roman catholic church; its power and wealth increafed amazingly; the number of its members became great; their character as well as accomplifhments were ftill greater; and the Icfuits were celebrated by the friends, and dreaded by the enemies, of the Romith faith, as the most able and enterprifing order in the church.

The conflictation and laws of the foeiety were perfected by Laynez and Aquaviva, the two generals who fucceeded

Loyola, men far superior to their master in abilities, and in the fcience of government. They framed that fystem of profound and artful policy which diffinguishes the order. The large infusion of fanaticism, mingled with its regulations, fhould be imputed to Loyola its founder. Many circumflances concurred in giving a peculiarity of character to the order of Jeluits, and in forming the members of it not only to take a greater part in the affairs of the world than any other body of monks, but to acquire fuperior influence in the conduct of them.

The primary object of almost all the monastic orders is to feparate men from the world, and from any concern in its affairs. In the folitude and filence of the cloitter, the monk is called to work out his own falvation by extraordinary acts of mortification and piety. He is dead to the world, and ought not to mingle in its transactions. He can be of no benefit to mankind, but by his example and by his prayers. On the contrary, the Jesuits are taught to confider themfelves as formed for action. They are chosen foldiers, bound to exert themfelves continually in the fervice of God, and of the pope, his vicar on earth. Whatever tends to infiruct the ignorant; whatever can be of use to reclaim or to oppose the enemies of the holy fee, is their proper object. That they may have full leifure for this active fervice. they are totally exempted from those functions, the performance of which is the chief bufinefs of other monks. They appear in no proceffions; they practife no rigorous aufterities; they do not confume one half of their time in the repetition of tedious offices +. But they are required to attend to all the transactions of the world, on account of the influence which thefe may have upon religion; they are directed to fludy the difpositions of perfons in high rank, and to cultivate their friendship; and by the very constitution, as well as genius of the order, a fpirit of action and intrigue is infufed into all its members.

As the object of the fociety of Jefuits differed from that of the other monastic orders, the diversity was no les in the form of its government. The other orders are to be confidered as voluntary affociations, in which whatever affects the whole body is regulated by the common fuffrage of all its members. The executive power is vefted in the perfons placed at the head of each convent, or of the whole fociety: the legiflative authority relides in the community. Affairs of moment, relating to particular convents, are determined in conventual chapters; fuch as refpect the whole order are confidered in general congregations. But Loyola, full of the ideas of implicit obedience, which he had derived from his military profession, appointed that the government of his order should be purely monarchical. A general, chosen for life by deputies from the feveral provinces, poffeffed power that was fupreme and independent, extending to every perfon, and to every cafe. He, by his fole authority, nominated provincials, rectors, and every other officer employed in the government of the fociety, and could remove them at pleafure. In him was vefted the fovereign administration of the revenues and funds of the order. Every member belonging to it was at his difpofal; and by his uncontrollable mandate, he could impose on them any task, or employ them in what fervice foever he pleafed. To his commands they were required not only to yield outward obedience, but to refign up to him the inclinations of their own wills, and the fentiments of their own understandings. They were to liften to his injunctions, as if they had been uttered by Chrift himfelf. Under his direction, they were to be mere paffive instruments, like elay in the hands of the potter; or like dead carcafes incapable of refiftance +. Such a fingular form of policy could not fail to imprefs its character on all † Compte rendu ou Parlem. de Bretagne, par M. de Chalotais, p. 41, &c. Compte par M. de Monclar, 83, 185, 343. the members of the order, and to give a peculiar force to all its operations. There is not in the annals of mankind any example of fuch a perfect defpotifin, exercifed not over monks shut up in the cells of a convent, but over men difperfed among all the nations of the earth.

As the conflicutions of the order veft in the general fuch abfolute dominion over all its members, they carefully provide for his being perfectly informed with respect to the character and abilities of his fubjects. Every novice who offers himfelf as a candidate for entering into the order, is obliged to manifest his conscience to the superior, or to a perfon appointed by him; and in doing this is required to confels not only his fins and defects, but to difeover the inclinations, the paffions, and the bent of his foul. This manifellation must be renewed every fix months*. The fociety, not fatisfied with penetrating in this manner into the innermost recesses of the heart, directs each member to observe the words and actions of the novices; they are conflituted fpies upon their conduct; and are bound to difclose every thing of importance concerning them to the fuperior. In order that this fcrutiny into their character may be as complete as poffible, a long noviciate must expire, during which they pass through the feveral gradations of ranks in the fociety, and they must have attained the full age of thirtythree years before they can be admitted to take the final vows, by which they become profeffed memberst. By thefe various methods, the fuperiors, under whofe immediate infpection the novices are placed, acquire a thorough knowledge of their dispositions and talents. In order that the general, who is the foul that animates and moves the whole fociety, may have under his eye every thing neceffary to inform or direct him, the provincials and heads of the feveral houfes are obliged to transmit to him regular and frequent.

reports concerning the members under their infpection. In thefe they defeend into minute details with refpect to the character of each perfon, his abilities natural or acquired, his temper, his experience in affairs, and the particular department for which he is beft fitted*. Thefe reports, when digefted and arranged, are entered into registers kept on purpose that the general may, at one comprehensive view, furvey the flate of the fociety in every corner of the earth; observe the qualifications and talents of its members; and thus chuse, with perfect information, the inftruments, which his absolute power can employ in any fervice for which he thinks meet to define them+.

As it was the profeffed intention of the order of Jefuits to labour with unwearied zeal in promoting the falvation of men, this engaged them, of courfe, in many active functions. From their first institution, they confidered the education of youth as their peculiar province; they aimed at being spiritual guides and confessors; they preached frequently in order to instruct the people; they fet out as missionaries to convert

* M. de Chalotais has made a calculation of the number of thefe reports, which the general of the Jefuits muft annually receive according to the regulations of the fociety. Thefe amount in all to 6584. If this fum be divided by 37, the number of provinces in the order, it will appear that 177 reports concerning the flate of each province are transmitted to Rome annually. Compte, p. 52. Befides this, there may be extraordinary letters, or fuch as are fent by the monitors or fpies whom the general and provincials entertain in each houfe. Compte par M. de Moncl. p. 431. The novelty of the inflitution, as well as the fingularity of its objects, procured the order many admirers and patrons. The governors of the fociety had the addrefs to avail themfelves of every circumftance in its favour, and in a fhort time the number as well as influence of its members increafed wonderfully. Before the expiration of the fixteenth century, the Jefuits had obtained the chief direction of the education of youth in every catholic country in Europe. nifter. They were the fpiritual guides of almost every perfon eminent for rank or power. They posseful the highest degree of confidence and interest with the papal court, as the most zealous and able champions for its authority. The advantages which an active and enterprising body of men might derive from all these circumstances are obvious. They formed the minds of men in their youth. They retained an alcendant over them in their advanced years. They posses ed, at different periods, the direction of the most confiderable courts in Europe. They mingled in all affairs. They took part in every intrigue and revolution. The general, by means of the extensive intelligence which he received, could regulate the operations of the order with the most perfect different, and by means of his absolute power could carry them on with the utmost vigour and effect §.

Together with the power of the order, its wealth continued to increase. Various expedients were devised for eluding the obligation of the vow of poverty. The order

In the year 1710, the order posselled twenty-four professed to the hundred and forty refidencies; fix hundred and twelve colleges; two hundred miffions; one hundred and fifty feminaries and boarding-fchools; and confisted of 19,998 Jefuits. acquired ample posseffions in every catholic country; and by the number as well as magnificence of its public buildings, together with the value of its property, moveable or real, it vied with the most opulent of the monastic fraternities. Befides the fources of wealth common to all the regular clergy, the Jefuits poffeffed one which was peculiar to themfelves. Under pretext of promoting the fuccefs of their miffions, and of facilitating the fupport of their miffionaries, they obtained a fpecial licence from the court of Rome, to trade with the nations which they laboured to convert. In confequence of this, they engaged in an extenfive and lucrative commerce, both in the East and West Indies. They opened warehouses in different parts of Europe, in which they vended their commodities. Not fatisfied with trade alone, they imitated the example of other commercial focieties, and aimed at obtaining fettlements. They acquired poffeffion accordingly of a large and fertile province in the fouthern continent of America, and reigned as fovereigns over fome hundred thousand fubjects +.

Unhappily for mankind, the vaft influence which the order of Jefuits acquired by all thefe different means, has been often exerted with the moft pernicious effect. Such was the tendency of that difcipline obferved by the fociety in forming its members, and fuch the fundamental maxims in its conflictution, that every Jefuit was taught to regard the intereft of the order as the capital object, to which every confideration was to be facrificed. This fpirit of attachment to their order, the moft ardent, perhaps, that ever influenced any body of men ‡, is the characteriftic principle of the Jefuits, and ferves as a key to the genius of their policy, as well as to the peculiarities in their fentiments and conduct.

As it was for the honour and advantage of the fociety, that its members fhould poffels an afcendant over perfons in high rank or of great power, the defire of acquiring and preferving fuch a direction of their conduct, with greater facility, has led the Jefuits to propagate a fystem of relaxed and pliant morality, which accommodates itself to the paffions of men, which justifies their vices, which tolerates their imperfections, which authorizes almost every action that the most audacious or crafty politician would with to perpetrate.

As the profperity of the order was intimately connected with the prefervation of the papal authority, the Jefuits, influenced by the fame principle of attachment to the interefts of their fociety, have been the moft zealous patrons of thofe doctrines which tend to exalt ecclefiaftical power on the ruins of civil government. They have attributed to the court of Rome a jurifdiction as extensive and abfolute as was claimed by the most prefumptuous pontiffs in the dark ages. They have contended for the entire independence of ecclefiaftics on the civil magistrate. They have published fuch tenets concerning the duty of opposing princes who were enemies of the catholic faith, as countenanced the most atrocious crimes, and tended to diffolve all the ties which connect fubjects with their rulers.

As the order derived both reputation and authority from the zeal with which it flood forth in defence of the Romifh church against the attacks of the reformers, its members, proud of this diffinction, have confidered it as their peculiar function to combat the opinions, and to check the progress of the protestants. They have made use of every art, and have employed every weapon against them. They have set themselves in opposition to every gentle or tolerating meafure in their favour. They have incessantly flirred up against them all the rage of ecclessational and civil perfecution.

Monks of other denominations have, indeed, ventured to teach the fame pernicious doctrines, and have held opinions equally inconfiftent with the order and happinefs of civil fociety. But they, from reafons which are obvious, have either delivered fuch opinions with greater referve, or have propagated them with lefs fuccefs. Whoever recollects the events which have happened in Europe during two centuries, will find that the Jefuits may juftly be confidered as refponfible for most of the pernicious effects arising from that corrupt and dangerous cafuiftry, from those extravagant tenets concerning ecclefiaftical power, and from that intolerant fpirit, which have been the difgrace of the church of Rome throughout that period, and which have brought fomany calamities upon civil fociety *.

But amidft many bad confequences flowing from the inflitution of this order, mankind, it must be acknowledged, have derived from it fome confiderable advantages. As the Jefuits made the education of youth one of their capital objects, and as their first attempts to establish colleges for the reception of fludents were violently opposed by the universities in different countries, it became neceffary for them, as the most effectual method of acquiring the public favour, to furpass their rivals in science and industry. This prompted them to cultivate the fludy of ancient literature with extraordinary ardour. This put them upon various methods for facilitating the inftruction of youth; and by the improvements which they made in it, they have contributed fo much. towards the progress of polite learning, that on this account they have merited well of fociety. Nor has the order of Jefuits been fuccefsful only in teaching the elements of literature; it has produced likewife eminent mafters in manybranches of fcience, and can alone boaft of a greater number of ingenious authors than all the other religious fraternities taken together +.

* Encyclopedie, art. Jefuites, tom. viii. 513. † M. d'Alembert has obferved, that though the Jefuits have made extraordinary progrefs in erudition of every fpecies, tho' they can reckon up many of their brethren who have been eminent mathematicians, antiquaries, and critics; though they have even formed fome orators of reputation; yet the order has never produced one man, whofe mind was fo much enlightened with found knowledge as to merit the name of a philosopher. But it feems

But it is in the new world that the Jefuits have exhibited the most wonderful display of their abilities, and have contributed most effectually to the benefit of the human species. The conquerors of that unfortunate quarter of the globe acted at first as if they had nothing in view, but to plunder, to enflave, and to exterminate its inhabitants. The Jefuits alone made humanity the object of their fettling there. About the beginning of the laft century they obtained admiffion into the fertile province of Paraguay, which ftretches acrofs the fouthern continent of America, from the east fide of the immenfe ridge of the Andes, to the confines of the Spanish and Portuguese fettlements on the banks of the river de la Plata. They found the inhabitants in a state little different from that which takes place among men when they first began to unite together; strangers to the arts; fubfisting preearioufly by hunting or fifhing; and hardly acquainted with the first principles of fubordination and government. The Jefuits fet themfelves to inftruct and to eivilize thefe favages. They taught them to cultivate the ground, to rear tame animals, and to build houfes. They brought them to live together in villages. They trained them to arts and manufactures. They made them tafte the fweets of fociety; and accuflomed them to the bleffings of fecurity and order. Thefe people became the fubjects of their benefactors; who have governed them with a tender attention, refembling that to be the unavoidable effect of monaftic education to contract and fetter the human mind. The partial attachment of a monk to the intereft of his order, which is often incompatible with that of other citizens; the habit of implicit obedience to the will of a fuperior, together with the frequent return of the wearifone and frivolous duties of the cloifter, debafe his faculties, and extinguifh that generofity of fentiment and fpirit, which qualifies men for thinking or feeling jultly with refpest to what is proper in life and conduct. Father Paul of Venice is, perhaps, the only perfon educated in a cloifter, that ever was altogether fuperior to its prejudices, or who viewed the transfations of men, and reafoned concerning the interefts of fociety, with the enlarged fentiments of a philolopher, with the differrment of a man converfant in affairs, and with the liberality of a gentleman.

with which a father directs his children. Refpected and beloved almost to adoration, a few Jefuits presided over some hundred thousand Indians. They maintained a perfect equality among all the members of the community. Each of them was obliged to labour, not for himfelf alone, but for the public. The produce of their fields, together with the fruits of their industry of every species, were deposited in common flore-houfes, from which each individual received every thing neceffary for the fupply of his wants. By this inftitution, almost all the passions which disturb the peace of fociety, and render the members of it unhappy, were extinguifhed. A few magiltrates, chofen from among their countrymen by the Indians themfelves, watched over the public tranquillity, and fecured obedience to the laws. The fanguinary punifhments frequent under other governments were unknown. An admonition from a Jesuit, a slight mark of infamy, or, on fome fingular occasion, a few lashes with a whip, were fufficient to maintain good order among thefe innocent and happy people*.

But even in this meritorious effort of the Jefuits for the good of mankind, the genius and fpirit of their order have mingled and are difcernible. They plainly aimed at eftablifthing in Paraguay an independent empire, fubject to the fociety alone, and which, by the fuperior excellence of its conflictution and police, could fcarcely have failed to extend its dominion over all the fouthern continent of America. With this view, in order to prevent the Spaniards or Portuguefe in the adjacent fettlements from acquiring any dangerous influence over the people within the limits of the province fubject to the fociety, the Jefuits endeavoured to infpire the Indians with hatred and contempt of thefe nations. They cut off all intercourfe between their fubjects and the Spanifh or Portuguefe fettlements. They prohibited any private trader of either nation from entering their territories. When they were obliged to admit any perfon in a public character from the neighbouring governments, they did not permit him to have any conversation with their subjects, and no Indian was allowed even to enter the houfe where thefe ftrangers refided, unless in the presence of a Jesuit. In order to render any communication between them as difficult as possible, they industriously avoided giving the Indians any knowledge of the Spanish, or of any other European language; but encouraged the different tribes, which they had civilized, to acquire a certain dialect of the Indian tongue, and laboured to make that the univerfal language throughout their dominions. As all these precautions, without military force, would have been infufficient to have rendered their empire fecure and permanent, they infiructed their fubjects in the European arts of war. They formed them into bodies of cavalry and infantry, completely armed and regularly difciplined. They provided a great train of artillery, as well as magazines flored with all the implements of war. Thus they established an army fo numerous and well-appointed, as to be formidable in a country, where a few fickly and ill difciplined battalions composed all the military force kept on foot by the Spaniards or Portuguelet.

The Jesuits gained no confiderable degree of power during the reign of Charles V. who, with his ufual fagacity, difcerned the dangerous tendency of the inflitution, and checked its progrefs*. But as the order was founded in the period of which I write the hiftory, and as the age to which I address this work hath feen its fall, the view which I have exhibited of the laws and genius of this formidable body will not, I hope, be unacceptable to my readers; cfpecially as one circumstance has enabled me to enter into this detail with particular advantage. Europe had obferved, for two centuries, the ambition and power of the order. But while it felt many fatal effects of thefe, it could not fully difcern the caufes to which they were to be imputed. It was unacquainted with many of the fingular regulations in the political conflitution or government of the Jefuits, which formed the enterprifing fpirit of intrigue that diffinguished its members, and elevated the body itfelf to fuch a height of power. It was a fundamental maxim with the Jefuits, from their first institution, not to publish the rules of their order. Thefe they kept concealed as an impenetrable mystery. They never communicated them to ftrangers; nor even to the greater part of their own members. They refused to produce them when required by courts of juffice+; and by a ftrange folecifm in policy, the civil power in different countries authorifed or connived at the establishment of an order of men, whole conflitution and laws were concealed with a folicitude which alone was a good reafon for excluding them. During the profecutions lately carried on against them in Portugal and France, the Jefuits have been fo inconfiderate as to produce the myflerious volumes of their inftitute. By the aid of these authentic records, the principles of their government may be delineated, and the fources of their power inveftigated with a degree of certainty and precision, which, previous to that event, it was impossible to attaint. But as I have pointed out the dangerous tendency of the confli-

‡ The greater part of my information concerning the government and laws of the order of Jefuits, I have derived from the reports of M. de Chalotais and M. de Monclar. I reft not my narrative, however, upon the authority even of these respectable magisstrates and elegant writers, but upon innumerable passes which they have extracted from the conflitutions of the order deposited in their hands. Hospinian, a protestant divine of Zurich, in his Hisforia Jefuitisa, printed A. D. 1619, published a small part of the conflitutions of the Jefuits, of which by some accident he had got a copy, p. 13-54.

tution and spirit of the order with the freedom becoming an historian, the candour and impartiality no lefs requisite in that character call on me to add one observation, that no clafs of regular clergy in the Romifh church has been more eminent for decency, and even purity of manners, than the major part of the order of Jesuits+. The maxims of an intriguing, ambitious, interested policy, might influence those who governed the fociety, might and even corrupt the heart, and pervert the conduct of fome individuals, while the greater number, engaged in literary pursuits, or employed in the functions of religion, was left to the guidance of those common principles which reftrain men from vice, and excite them to what is becoming and laudable. The caufes which occa fioned the ruin of this mighty body, as well as the circumflances and effects with which it has been attended in the different countries of Europe, though objects extremely worthy the attention of every intelligent obferver of human affairs, do not fall within the period of this hiftory.

No fooner had Charles re-established order in the Low-Countries, than he was obliged to turn his attention to the affairs in Germany. The protestants preffed him earnestly to appoint that conference between a felect number of the divines of each party, which had been flipulated in the convention at Francfort. The pope confidered fuch an attempt to examine into the points in difpute, or to decide concerning them, as derogatory to his right of being the fupreme judge in controverfy; and being convinced that fuch a conference would either be ineffectual by determining nothing, or prove dangerous by determining too much, he employed every art to prevent it. The emperor, however, finding it more for his interest to foothe the Germans than to gratify Paul, paid little regard to his remonstrances. In a diet held at Haguenaw [June 25], matters were ripened for the conference. In another diet affembled at Worms [Dec. 6], the conference was begun, Melancthon on the + Sur la Deftruct. des Jef. one fide and Eckius on the other fuftaining the principal part in the difpute; but after they had made fome progrefs, though without concluding any thing, it was fufpended by the emperor's command, that it might be renewed with greater folemnity in his own prefence in a diet fummoned to meet at Ratifbon. [1541] This affembly was opened with great pomp, and with a general expectation that its proceedings would be vigorous and decifive. By the confent of both parties, the emperor was entrusted with the power of nominating the perfons who should manage the conference, which it was agreed fhould be conducted not in the form of a public disputation, but as a friendly scrutiny or examination into the articles which had given rife to the prefent controverfies. He appointed Eckius, Gropper, and Pflug, on the part of the catholics; Melancthon, Bucer, and Piftorious, on that of the protestants; all men of diffinguished reputation among their own adherents, and, except Eckius, all eminent for moderation, as well as defirous of peace. As they were about to begin their confultations, the emperor put into their hands a book, composed, as he faid, by a learned divine in the Low-Countries, with fuch extraordinary perfpicuity and temper, as, in his opinion, might go far to unite and comprehend the two contending parties. Gropper a canon of Cologne, whom he had named among the managers of the conference, a man of address as well as of erudition, was afterwards fuspected to be the author of this fhort treatife. It contained politions with regard to twenty-two of the chief articles in theology, which included most of the questions then agitated in the controversy between the Lutherans and the church of Rome. By ranging his fentiments in a natural order, and expressing them with great fimplicity; by employing often the very words of fcripture, or of the primitive fathers; by foftening the rigour of fome opinions, and explaining away what was abfurd in others; by conceffions, fome times on one fide, and fometimes on the other; and efpecially by banishing as much as poffible (cholaftic phrafes, thofe words and terms of arts in controverly, which ferve as badges of diffinction to different fects, and for which theologians often contend more fiercely than for opinions themfelves; he at laft framed his work in fuch a manner, as promifed fairer than any thing that had hitherto been attempted to compose and to terminate religious diffensions*.

But the attention of the age was turned, with fuch acute observation, towards theological controversies, that it was not eafy to impofe on it by any glofs, how artful or fpecious foever. The length and eagerness of the dispute had separated the contending parties fo completely, and had fet their minds at fuch variance, that they were not to be reconciled by partial conceffions. All the zealous catholics, particularly the ecclesiaftics who had a feat in the diet, joined in condemning Gropper's treatife as too favourable to the Lutheran opinion, the poifon of which herefy it conveyed, as they pretended, with greater danger, becaufe it was in fome degree difguifed. The rigid protestants, especially Luther himfelf, and his patron the elector of Saxony, were for rejecting it as an impious compound of error and truth, craftily prepared that it might impose on the weak, the timid, and the unthinking. But the divines, to whom the examination of it was committed, entered upon that bufinels with greater deliberation and temper. As it was more eafy in itfelf, as well as more confiftent with the dignity of the church, to make conceffions, and even alterations with regard to fpeculative opinions, the difcuffion whereof is confined chiefly to schools, and which prefent nothing to the people that either firikes their imagination or affects their fenfes, they came to an accommodation about these without much labour, and even defined the great article concerning justification to their mutual fatisfaction. But, when they proceeded to points of jurifdiction, where the interest and authority of the Roman see were concerned, or to the rites and forms of external worship, where every change that could be made must be public, and draw the observation of the people, there the catholics were altogether untractable; nor could the church either with fafety or with honour a. abolish its ancient institutions. All the articles relative to the power of the pope, the authority of councils, the administration of the facraments, the worship of faints, and many other particulars, did not, in their nature, admit of any temperament; fo that after labouring long to bring about an accommodation with refpect to thefe, the emperor found all his endeavours ineffectual. Being impatient, however, to clofe the diet, he at last prevailed on a majority of the members to approve of the following recefs [July 28]: " That the articles concerning which the divines had agreed in the conference, should be held as points decided, and be observed inviolably by all; that the other articles, about which they had differed, should be referred to the determination of a general council, or if that could not be obtained, to a national fynod of Germany; and if it should prove impracticable, likewife, to affemble a fynod, that a general diet of the empire should be called within eighteen months, in order to give fome final judgment upon the whole controverfy; that the emperor should use all his interest and authority with the pope, to procure the meeting either of a general council or fynod; that, in the mean time, no innovations should be attempted, no endeavours should be employed to gain profelytes; and neither the revenues of the church, nor the rights of monasteries, should be invaded *."

All the proceedings of this diet, as well as the recefs in which they terminated, gave great offence to the pope. The power which the Germans had affumed of appointing their own divines to examine and determine matters of controverfy, he confidered as a very dangerous invafion of his rights; the renewing of their ancient propofal concerning a national fynod, which had been fo often rejected by him and his predeceffors, appeared extremely undutiful; but the bare mention of allowing a diet, composed chiefly of laymen to pafs judgment with refpect to articles of faith, was deemed no lefs criminal and profane than the worft of thofe herefies which they feemed zealous to fupprefs. On the other hand, the protestants were no lefs diffatisfied with a recefs, that confiderably abridged the liberty which they enjoyed at that time. As they murmured loudly against it, Charles, unwilling to leave any feeds of difcontent in the empire, granted them a private declaration in the most ample terms, exempting them from whatever they thought opprefive or injurious in the recefs, and afcertaining to them the full possible of all the privileges which they had ever enjoyed  $\ddagger$ .

Extraordinary as these concessions may appear, the fituation of the emperor's affairs at this juncture made it neceffary for him to grant them. He forefaw a rupture with France to be not only unavoidable, but near at hand, and durft not give any fuch caufe of difguit or fear to the protestants, as might force them, in felf-defence, to court the protection of the French king, from whom, at prefent, they were much alienated. The rapid progress of the Turks in Hungary was a more powerful and urgent motive to that moderation which Charles difcovered. A great revolution had happened in that kingdom; John Zapol Scæpus having chofen, as has been related, rather to poffefs a tributary kingdom, than to renounce the royal dignity to which he had been accuftomed, had by the affiftance of his mighty protector Solyman, wrested from Ferdinand a great part of the country, and left him only the precarious poffeffion of the reft. But being a prince of pacific qualities, the frequent attempts of Ferdinand, or of his partifans among the Hungarians, to recover what they had loft, greatly difquiet-

ed him; and the neceffity on thefe occafions, of calling in the Turks, whom he confidered and felt to be his mafters rather than auxiliaries, was hardly lefs mortifying. In order, therefore, to avoid thefe diffreffes, as well as to fecure quiet and leifure for cultivating the arts and enjoying amusements in which he delighted, he fecretly came to an agreement with his competitor [A. D. 1535], on this condition; That Ferdinand fhould acknowledge him as king of Hungary, and leave him during life, the unmolefted poffeffion of that part of the kingdom now in his power; but that, upon his demife, the fole right of the whole should devolve upon Ferdinand *. As John had never been married, and was then far advanced in life, the terms of the contract feemed very favourable to Ferdinand. But, foon after, fome of the Hungarian nobles, folicitous to prevent a foreigner from afcending their throne, prevailed on John to put an end to a long celibacy, by marrying Ifabella, the daughter of Sigifriond king of Poland. John had the fatisfaction, before his death, which happened within lefs than a year after his marriage, to fee a fon born to inherit his kingdom. To him, without regarding his treaty with Ferdinand, which he confidered, no doubt, as void, upon an event not forefeen when it was concluded, he bequeathed his crown; appointing the queen and George Martinuzzi, bishop of Waradin, guardians of his fon, and regents of the kingdom. The greater part of the Hungarians immediately acknowledged the young prince as king, to whom, in memory of the founder of their monarchy, they gave the name of Stephen+.

Ferdinand, though extremely difconcerted by this unexpected event, refolved not to abandon the kingdom which he flattered himfelf with having acquired by his compact with John. He fent ambaffadors to the queen to claim poffeffion, and to offer the province of Tranfylvania as a fettlement for her fon, preparing at the fame time to affert his right by force of arms. But John had committed the care of his fon to perfons, who had too much fpirit to give up the crown tamely, and who poffeffed abilities fufficient to defend it. The queen, to all the address peculiar to her own fex, added a mafculine courage, ambition, and magnanimity. Martinuzzi, who had raifed himfelf from the loweft rank in life to his prefent dignity, was one of those extraordinary men, who, by the extent as well as variety of their talents, are fitted to act a fuperior part in buffling and factious times. In difcharging the functions of his ecclefiaftical office, he put on the femblance of an humble and auftere fanctity. In civil transactions, he discovered industry, dexterity, and boldnefs. During war, he laid afide the caffock, , and appeared on horfeback with his fcymitar and buckler, as active, as oftentatious, and as gallant as any of his countrymen. Amidst all these different and contradictory forms which he could affume, an infatiable defire of dominion and authority was confpicuous. From fuch perfons it was obvious what answer Ferdinand had to expect. He foon perceived that he must depend on arms alone for recovering Hungary. Having levied for this purpose a confiderable body of Germans, whom his partifans among the Hungarians joined with their vaffals, he ordered them to march into that part of the kingdom which adhered to Stephen. Martinuzzi, unable to make head against fuch a powerful army in the field, fatisfied himfelf with holding out the towns, all of which, especially Buda, the place of greatest confequence, he provided with every thing neceffary for defence; and in the mean time he fent ambaffadors to Solyman, befeeching him to extend towards the fon the fame imperial protection which had fo long maintained the father on his throne. The fultan, though Ferdinand used his utmost endeavours to thwart this negotiation, and even offered to accept of the Hungarian crown on the fame ignominious condition, of paying tribute to the Ottoman Porte, by which John had held it, faw fuch prospects of advantage from espousing the interest of the young king, that he instantly promised him his protection; and commanding one army to advance forthwith towards Hungary, he himfelf followed with another. Meanwhile the Germans, hoping to terminate the war by the reduction of a city in which the king and his mother were fhut up, had formed the fiege of Buda. Martinuzzi, having drawn thither the ftrength of the Hungarian nobility, defended the town with fuch courage and skill, as allowed the Turkish forces time to come up to its relief. They infantly attacked the Germans, weakened by fatigue, difeafes, and defertion, and defeated them with great flaughtert.

Solyman foon after joined his victorious troops, and being weary of fo many expensive expeditions undertaken in defence of dominions which were not his own, or being unable to refift this alluring opportunity of feizing a kingdom, while pofieffed by an infant, under the guardianship of a woman and a prieft, he allowed interefted confiderations to triumph with too much facility over the principles of honour and the fentiments of humanity. What he planned ungeneroufly, he executed by fraud. Having prevailed on the queen to fend her fon, whom he pretended to be defirous of feeing, into his camp, and having, at the fame time, invited the chief of the nobility to an entertainment there, while they, fuspecting no treachery, gave themfelves up to the mirth and jollity of the feaft, a felect band of troops by the fultan's orders feized one of the gates of Buda. Being thus mafter of the capital, of the king's perfon, and of the leading men among the nobles, he gave orders to conduct the queen, together with her fon, to Tranfylvania, which province he allotted to them, and appointing a basha to prefide in Buda with a large body of foldiers, annexed Hungary to the Ottoman empire ... The tears and complaints of the unhappy queen had no influence to change his purpofe, nor could Martinuzzi either refift his abfolute and uncontrollable command, or prevail on him to recal it.

Before the account of this violent usurpation reached Ferdinand, he was fo unlucky as to have difpatched other ambaffadors to Solyman with a fresh representation of his right to the crown of Hungary, as well as a renewal of his former overture to hold the kingdom of the Ottoman Porte, and to pay for it an annual tribute. This ill-timed propofal was rejected with fcorn. The fultan, elated with fuccefs, and thinking that he might prefcribe what terms he pleafed to a prince who voluntarily proffered conditions fo unbecoming his own dignity, declared that he would not fuspend the operations of war, unlefs Ferdinand inftantly evacuated all the towns which he still held in Hungary, and confented to the impolition of a tribute upon Austria, in order to reimburle the fums which his prefumptuous invation of Hungary had obliged the Ottoman Porte to expend in defence of that kingdom ||.

In this ftate were the affairs of Hungary. As the unfortunate events there had either happened before the diffolution of the diet at Ratifbon, or were dreaded at that time, Charles faw the danger of irritating and inflaming the minds of the Germans, while a formidable enemy was ready to break into the empire; and perceived that he could not expect any vigorous affiftance either towards the recovery of Hungary, or the defence of the Auftrian frontier, unlefs he courted and fatisfied the proteftants. By the conceffions which have been mentioned, he gained this point, and fuch liberal fupplies both of men and money were voted for carrying on the war agaiuft the Turks, as left him under little anxiety about the fecurity of Germany during next campaign*.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the diet, the emperor fet out for Italy. As he paffed through Lucca, he had a fhort interview with the pope; but nothing could be concluded concerning the proper method of composing the religious difputes in Germany, between two princes, whofe views and interests with regard to that matter were at this juncture fo opposite. The pope's endeavours to remove the causes of difcord between Charles and Francis, and to extinguish those mutual animosities which threatened to break out fuddenly into open hostility, were not more fuccessful.

The emperor's thoughts were bent fo entirely, at that time, on the great enterprife which he had concerted againft Algiers, that he liftened with little attention to the pope's fchemes or overtures, and haftened to join his army and fleets.

Algiers still continued in that state of dependence on the Turkish empire to which Barbaroffa had subjected it. Ever fince he, as captain basha, commanded the Ottoman fleet, Algiers had been governed by Hascen-Aga, a renegado ennuch, who, by paffing through every flation in the corfair's fervice, had acquired fuch experience in war, that he was well fitted for a station which required a man of tried and daring courage. Hafcen, in order to fhew how well he deferved that dignity, carried on his piratical depredations against the Christian states with amazing activity, and outdid, if possible, Barbaroffa himfelf in boldnefs and cruelty. The commerce of the Mediterranean was greatly interrupted by his cruifers, and fuch frequent alarms given to the coaft of Spain, that there was a neceffity of erecting watch-towers at proper diftances, and of keeping guards conftantly on foot, in order to defery the approach of his fquadrons, and to protect the inhabitants from their descents+. Of this the emperor had received repeated and clamorous complaints from his fubjects, who reprefented it as an enterprife corresponding to his power, and becoming his humanity, to reduce Algiers, which, fince the conquest of Tunis, was the common receptacle of all the free-booters; and to exterminate that lawlefs race, the implacable enemies of the Chriftian name. Moved partly by their entreaties, and partly allured by the hope of adding to the glory which he had acquired by his last expedition into Africa, Charles, before he left Madrid in his way to the Low-Countries, had iffued orders both in Spain and Italy, to prepare a fleet and army for this purpose. No change in circumstances, fince that time, could divert him from this refolution, or prevail on him to turn his arms towards Hungary; though the fuccefs of the Turks in that country feemed more immediately to require his prefence there; though many of his most faithful adherents in Germany urged that the defence of the empire ought to be his first and peculiar care; though fuch as bore him no good-will ridiculed his prepofterous conduct in flying from an enemy almost at hand, that he might go in quest of a remote and more ignoble foe. But to attack the fultan in Hungary, how splendid soever that measure might appear, was an undertaking which exceeded his power, and was not confiftent with his intereft. To draw troops out of Spain or Italy, to march them into a country fo diftant as Hungary, to provide the vaft apparatus neceffary for tranfporting thither the artillery, ammunition, and baggage of a regular army, and to push the war in that quarter, where there was little profpect of bringing it to an iffue during feveral campaigns, were undertakings fo expensive and unwieldy as did not correspond with the low condition of the emperor's treafury. While his principal force was thus employed, his dominions in Italy and the Low-Countries must have lain open to the French king, who would not have allowed fuch a favourable opportunity of attacking them to go unimproved. Whereas the African expedition, the preparations for which were already finished, and almost the whole expence of it defrayed, would depend upon a fingle effort; and befides the fecurity and fatisfaction which the fuccess of it must give his subjects, would detain him during fo fhort a space, that Francis could hardly take advantage of his abfence, to invade his dominions in Europe.

On all these accounts, Charles adhered to his first plan, and with fuch determined obstinacy, that he paid no regard to the pope, who advifed, or to Andrew Doria, who conjured him not to expofe his whole armament to almost unavoidable deftruction, by venturing to approach the dangerous coast of Algiers at fuch an advanced feason of the year, and when the autumnal winds were fo violent. Having embarked on board Doria's gallies at Porto Venere in the Genoefe territories, he foon found that this experienced failor had not judged wrong concerning the element with which he was fo well acquainted; for fuch a ftorm arofe, that it was with the utmost difficulty and danger he reached Sardinia, the place of general rendezvous. But as his courage was undaunted, and his temper often inflexible, neither the renewed remonftrances of the pope and Doria, nor the danger to which he had already been exposed by difregarding their advice, had any other effect than to confirm him in his fatal refolution. The force, indeed, which he had collected, was fuch as might have infpired a prince lefs adventurous, and lefs confident in his own fchemes, with the moft fanguine hopes of fuccefs. It confifted of twenty thoufand foot, and two thousand horfe, Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, mostly veterans, together with three thousand volunteers, the flower of the Spanish and Italian nobility, fond of paying court to the emperor by attending him in his favourite expedition, and eager to fhare in the glory which they believed he was going to reap; to thefe were added a thoufand foldiers fent from Malta by the order of St. John, led by an hundred of its most gallant knights.

The voyage, from Majorca to the African coaft, was not lefs, tedious, or full of hazard, than that which he had juft finished. When he approached the land, the roll of the fea, and vehemence of the winds, would not permit the troops to difembark. But at last, the emperor, feizing a favourable opportunity, landed them without opposition, not far from Algiers, and immediately advanced towards the town. To oppose this mighty army, Hascen had only eight hundred Turks, and five thousand Moors, partly natives of Africa, and partly refugees from Granada. He returned, however, a fierce and haughty answer, when fummoned to furrender. But with fuch a handful of foldiers, neither his desperate courage, nor confummate skill in war, could have long resisted forces superior to those which had deseated Barbarossa at the head of fixty thousand men, and which had reduced Tunis, in spite of all his endeavours to fave it.

But how far soever the emperor might think himfelf beyond the reach of any danger from the enemy, he was fuddenly exposed to a more dreadful calamity, and one againit which human prudence and human efforts availed nothing. On the fecond day after his landing, and before he had time for any thing but to difperfe fome light armed Arabs who molefted his troops on their march, the clouds began to gather, and the heavens to appear with a fierce and threatening afpect. Towards evening, rain began to fall, accompanied with violent wind; and the rage of the tempest increasing, during the night, the foldiers, who had brought nothing afhore but their arms, remained exposed to all its fury. without tents, or shelter, or cover of any kind. The ground was foon fo wet that they could not lie down on it; their camp being in a low fituation, was overflowed with water. and they funk at every flep to the ankles in mud; while the wind blew with fuch impetuofity, that, to prevent their falling, they were obliged to thrust their spears into the ground, and to support themselves by taking hold of them. Hafcen was too vigilant an officer to allow an enemy in fuch diffress to remain unmolested. About the dawn of morning, he fallied out with foldiers, who having been fcreened from the florm under their own roofs, were fresh and vigorous. A body of Italians, who were flationed nearest the city, difpirited and benumbed with cold, fied at the approach of the Turks. The troops at the post behind them discovered greater courage; but as the rain had extinguished their matches, and wetted their powder, their muskets were ufe-lefs, and having fcarcely ftrength to handle their other arms, they were foon thrown into confusion. Almost the whole army, with the emperor himfelf in perfon, was obliged to advance, before the enemy could be repulsed, who, after fpreading fuch general confernation, and killing a confiderable number of men, retired at last in good order.

But all feeling or remembrance of this lofs and danger were quickly obliterated by a more dreadful as well as affecting spectacle. It was now broad day; the hurricane had abated nothing of its violence, and the fea appeared agitated with all the rage of which that deftructive element is capable; all the fhips, on which alone the whole army knew that their fafety and fubfistence depended, were feen driven from their anchors, fome dafhing against each other, fome beat to pieces on the rocks, many forced afhore, and not a few finking in the waves. In lefs than an hour, fifteen ships of war, and an hundred and forty transports with eight thousand men, perifhed; and fuch of the unhappy crews as cleaped the fury of the fea, were murdered without mercy by the Arabs, as foon as they reached land. The emperor flood in filent anguish and astonishment beholding this fatal event, which at once blafted all his hopes of fuccefs, and buried in the depths the vaft flores which he had provided, as well for annoving the enemy, as for fubfifting his own troops. He had it not in his power to afford them any other affiftance or relief than by fending fome troops to drive away the Arabs, and thus delivering a few who were fo fortunate as to get ashore from the cruel fate which their companions had met with. At last the wind began to fall, and to give fome hopes that as many fhips might escape as would be fufficient to fave the army from perifhing by famine, and transport them back to Europe. But thefe were only hopes; the approach of evening covered the fea with darkness; and it being impoffible for the officers aboard the ships which had outlived the florm, to fend any intelligence to their companions who were ashore, they remained during the night in all the anguish of fuspence and uncertainty. Next day, a boat dispatched by Doria made shift to reach land, with information, that having weathered out the florm, to which, during fifty years knowledge of the fea, he had never seen any equal in serceness and horror, he had found it necessary to bear away with his shattered ships to Cape Metafuz. He advised the emperor, as the face of the sky was still lowering and tempestuous, to march with all speed to that place, where the troops could re-embark with greater ease.

Whatever comfort this intelligence afforded Charles, from being affured that part of his fleet had efcaped, was balanced by the new cares and perplexity in which it involved him with regard to his army. Metafuz was at leaft three days march from his prefent camp; all the provisions which he had brought ashore at his first landing were now confumed; his foldiers, worn out with fatigue, were hardly able for fuch a march, even in a friendly country, and being difpirited by a fucceffion of hardfhips, which victory itfelf would fcarcely have rendered tolerable, they were in no condition to undergo new toils. But the fituation of the army was fuch as allowed not one moment for deliberation, nor left it in the leaft doubtful what to chufe. They were ordered inflantly to march, the wounded, the fick, and the feeble being placed in the centre; fuch as feemed most vigorous were flationed in the front and rear. Then the fad effects of what they had fuffered began to appear more manifeftly than ever, and new calamities were added to all those which they had already endured. Some could hardly bear the weight of their arms; others, spent with the toil of forcing their way through deep and almost impassable roads, funk down and died; many perifhed by famine, as the whole army fubfifted chiefly on roots and berries, or the flefh of horfes, killed by the emperor's order, and diftributed among the feveral battalions; many were drowned in brooks, which were fwollen fo much by the exceffive rains, that in paffing them they waded up to the chin; not a few were killed by the enemy, who during the greatest part of their retreat, alarmed, haraffed, and annoyed them night and day. At last they arrived at Metafuz: and the weather being now fo calm as to reftore their communication with the fleet, they were fupplied with plenty of provisions, and cheered with the prospect of fafety.

During this dreadful feries of calamities, the emperor difcovered great qualities, many of which a long continued flow of profperity had fearcely afforded him an opportunity of difplaying. He appeared confpicuous for firmnefs and conftancy of fpirit, for magnanimity, fortitude, humanity, and compaffion. He endured as great hardfhips as the meaneft foldier; he expofed his own perfon wherever danger threatened; he encouraged the defponding, vifited the fick and wounded, and animated all by his words and example. When the army embarked, he was among the laft who left the fhore, although a body of Arabs hovered at no great diftance, ready to fall on the rear. By thefe virtues, Charles atoned, in fome degree, for his obftinacy and prefumption in undertaking an expedition fo fatal to his fubjects.

The calamitics which attended this unfortunate enterprife did not end here; for no fooner were the forces got on board, than a new florm arifing, though lefs furious than the former, fcattered the fleet, and obliged them, feparately, to make towards fuch ports in Spain or Italy as they could first reach; thus fpreading the account of their difasters, with all the circumflances of aggravation and horror, which their imagination, still under the influence of fear, fuggested. The emperor himfelf, after escaping great dangers, and being forced into the port of Bugia in Africa [Dec. 2,] where he was obliged by contrary winds to remain feveral weeks, arrived at last in Spain, in a condition very different, from that in which he had returned from his former expedition against the infidels*.

BOOK VII.

THE calamities which the emperor fuffered in his unfortunate enterprise against Algiers were great; and the account of thefe, which augmented in proportion as it fpread at a greater diftance from the scene of his difasters, encouraged Francis to begin hostilities, on which he had for fome time been refolved. But he did not think it prudent to produce, as the motives of this refolution, either his ancient pretensions to the dutchy of Milan, or the emperor's difingenuity in violating his repeated promifes with regard to the reflitution of that country. The former might have been a good reafon against concluding the truce of Nice, but was none for breaking it; the latter could not be urged without exposing his own credulity as much as the enperor's want of integrity. A violent and unwarrantable action of one of the Imperial generals furnished him with a reason tojustify his taking arms, which was of greater weight than either of thefe, and fuch as would have roufed him, if he had been as defirous of peace as he was eager for war. Francis, by figning the treaty of truce at Nice, without confulting Solyman, gave (as he forefaw) great offence to that haughty monarch, who confidered an alliance with him as an honour of which a Christian prince had caufe to be proud. The friendly interview of the French king with the emperor in Provence, followed by fuch extraordinary appearances of union and confidence which diffinguished the reception of Charles when he paffed through the dominions of Francis to the Low-Countries, induced the fultan to fuspect that the two rivals had at last forgotten their ancient enmity, in order that they might form fuch a general confederacy against the Ottoman power, as had been long wished for in Chriftendom, and often attempted in vain. Charles, with his ufual art, endeavoured to confirm and ftrengthen these fuspicions, by inftructing his emiffaries at Conftantinople, as well as in those courts with which Solyman held any intelligence. to reprefent the concord between him and Francis to be for entire, that their fentiments, views, and purfuits, would be the fame for the future*. It was not without difficulty that Francis effaced thefe impressions; but the address of Rincon, the French ambaffador at the Porte, together with the manifest advantage of carrying on hostilities against the houfe of Auftria in concert with France, prevailed at length on the fultan not only to banish his fuspicions, but to enter into a clofer conjunction with Francis than ever. Rincon returned into France, in order to communicate to his master a fcheme of the fultan's for gaining the concurrence of the Venetians in their operations against the common enemy. Solyman having lately concluded a peace with that republic, to which the mediation of Francis and the good offices of Rincon had greatly contributed, thought it not impoffible to allure the fenate by fuch advantages, as, together with the example of the French monarch, might overbalance any scruples arising either from decency or caution, that could operate on the other fide. Francis, warmly approving of this measure, dispatched Rincon back to Constantinople, and directing him to go by Venice along with Fregolo, a Genoefe exile, whom he appointed his ambaffador to that republic, empowered them to negotiate the matter with the fenate, to whom Solyman had fent an envoy for the fame purposet. The marquis del Guasto, governor of the Milanefe, an officer of great abilities, but capable of attempting and executing the most atrocious actions, got intelligence of the motions and deftinations of these ambaffadors. As he knew how much his mafter wifhed to difcover the intentions of the French king, and of what confequence it was to retard the execution of his measures, he employed fome foldiers belonging to the garrifon of Pavia to lie in wait for Rincon and Fregolo as they failed down the Po, who murdered them and most of their attendants, and seized their papers. Upon receiving an account of this barbarous outrage, committed, during the subfistence of a truce, against perfons held facred by the most uncivilized nations, Francis's grief for the unhappy fate of two fervants whom he loved and truffed, his uneafinefs at the interruption of his fchemes by their death, and every other paffion, were fwallowed up and loft in the indignation which this infult on the honour of his crown excited. He exclaimed loudly against Guasto, who, having drawn upon himfelf all the infamy of affaffination without making any difcovery of importance, as the ambaffadors had left their inftructions and other papers of confequence behind them, now boldly denied his being acceffary in any wife to the crime. He fent an ambaffador to the emperor, to demand fuitable reparation for an indignity, which no prince, how inconfiderable or pufillanimous foever, could tamely endure: and when Charles, impatient at that time to fet out on his African expedition, endeavoured to put him off with an evafive answer, he appealed to all the courts in Europe, fetting forth the heinoufnels of the injury, the fpirit of moderation with which he had applied for redrefs, and the iniquity of the emperor in difregarding this just request.

Notwithfanding the confidence with which Guafto afferted his own innocence, the accufations of the French gained greater credit than all his proteflations; and Bellay, the French commander in Piedmont, procured, at length, by his induftry and addrefs, fuch a minute detail of the tranfaction, with the teflimony of fo many of the parties concerned, as amounted almost to a legal proof of the marquis's guilt. In confequence of this opinion of the public, confirmed by fuch firong evidence, Francis's complaints were univerfally allowed to be well founded, and the fteps which he took towards renewing hostilities, were ascribed not merely to ambition or refertment, but to the unavoidable necessfity of vindicating the honour of his crown*.

However just Francis might esteem his own cause, he did not truft fo much to that, as to neglect the proper precautions for gaining other allies befides the fultan, by whofe aid he might counterbalance the emperor's fuperior power. But his negotiations to this effect were attended with very little fuccefs. Henry VIII. eagerly bent at that time upon fchemes against Scotland, which he knew would at once diffolve his union with France, was inclinable rather to take part with the emperor, than to contribute in any degree towards favouring the operations against him. The pope adhered inviolably to his ancient fystem of neutrality. The Venetians, notwithstanding Solyman's folicitations, imitated the pope's example. The Germans, fatisfied with the religious liberty which they enjoyed, found it more their intereft to gratify than to irritate the emperor; fo that the kings of Denmark and Sweden, who on this occafion were first drawn in to interest themselves in the quarrels of the more potent monarchs of the louth, and the duke of Cleves, who had a difpute with the emperor about the poffeffion of Gueldres, were the only confederates whom Francis fecured. But the dominions of the two former lay at fuch a diffance, and the power of the latter was fo inconfiderable, that he gained little by their alliance.

But Francis by vigorous efforts of his own activity fupplied every defect. Being afflicted at this time with a diftemper, which was the effect of his irregular pleafures, and which prevented his purfuing them with the fame licentious indulgence, he applied to bufinefs with more than his ufual induftry. The fame caufe which occafioned this extraordinary attention to his affairs, rendered him morofe and diffatisfied with the minifters whom he had hitherto employed. This accidental peevifinefs being fharpened by reflecting on the falfe fleps into which he had lately been betrayed, as well as the infults to which he had been exposed, fome of those in whom he had ufually placed the greateft confidence felt the effects of this change in his temper, and were deprived of their offices. At last he difgraced Montmorency himfelf, who had long directed affairs as well civil as military, with all the authority of a minister no lefs beloved than trufted by his mafter; and Francis being fond of shewing that the fall of fuch a powerful favourite did not affect the vigour or prudence of his administration, this was a new motive to redouble his diligence in preparing to open the war by fome fplendid and extraordinary effort.

1542.] He accordingly brought into the field five armies. One to act in Luxemburg under the duke of Orleans, accompanied by the duke of Lorraine as his inftructor in the art of war. Another, commanded by the dauphin, marched towards the frontiers of Spain. A third, led by Van Roffem the marshal of Gueldres, and composed chiefly of the troops of Cleves, had Brabant allotted for the theatre of its operations. A fourth, of which the duke of Vendome was general, hovered on the borders of Flanders. The laft, confifting of the forces cantoned in Piedmont, was deflined for the admiral Annebaut. The dauphin and his brother were appointed to command where the chief exertions were intended, and the greatest honour to be reaped; the army of the former amounted to forty thoufand, that of the latter to thirty thousand men. Nothing appears more furprifing than that Francis did not pour with these numerous and irrefiftible armies into the Milanefe; which had fo long been the object of his withes as well as enterprifes; and that he should chuse rather to turn almost his whole firength into another direction, and towards new conquests. But the remembrance of the difasters which he had met with in his former expeditions into Italy, together with the difficulty of fupporting a war carried on at fuch a diflance from his own dominions, had gradually abated his violent inclination to obtain footing in that country, and made him willing to try the fortune of his arms in another quarter. At the fame time he expected to make fuch a powerful imprefion on the frontier of Spain, where there were few towns of any ftrength, and no army affembled to oppofe him, as might enable him to recover poffeffion of the country of Rouffillon, lately difmembered from the French crown, before Charles could bring into the field any force able to obfiruct his progrefs. The neceffity of fupporting his ally the duke of Cleves, and the hope of drawing a confiderable body of foldiers out of Germany by his means, determined him to act with vigour in the Low-Countries.

The dauphin and duke of Orleans opened the campaign much about the fame time [June]; the former laying fiege to Perpignan the capital of Rouffillon, and the latter entering Luxembourg. The duke of Orleans pushed his operations with the greatest rapidity and fuccess, one town falling after another, until no place in that large dutchy remained in the emperor's hands but Thionville. Nor could he have failed of over-running the adjacent provinces with the fame eafe, if he had not voluntarily ftopt fhort in this career of victory. But a report prevailing that the emperor had determined to hazard a battle in order to fave Perpignan, on a fudden the duke, prompted by youthful ardour, or moved perhaps by jealouly of his brother, whom he both envied and hated, abandoned his own conquest, and hastened towards Rouffillon, in order to divide with him the glory of the victory.

On his departure, fome of his troops were difbanded, others deferted their colours, and the reft, cantoned in the towns which he had taken, remained inactive. By this conduct, which leaves a difhonourable imputation either on his underftanding or his heart, or on both, he not only renounced whatever he could have hoped from fuch a promifing commencement of the campaign, but gave the enemy an opportunity of recovering, before the end of fummer, all the conquests which he had gained. On the Spanish frontier, the emperor was not fo inconfiderate as to venture on a battle, the loss of which might have endangered his kingdom. Perpignan, though poorly fortified, and brilkly attacked, having been largely fupplied with ammunition and provisions by the vigilance of Doria *, was defended fo long and fo vigoroufly by the duke of Alva, the perfevering obstinacy of whole temper fitted him admirably for fuch a fervice, that at last the French, after a fiege of three months, wasted by difeafes, repulfed in feveral affaults, and defpairing of fuccefs relinquished the undertaking, and retired into their own country+. Thus all Francis's mighty preparations, either from fome defect in his own conduct, or from the fupcrior power and prudence of his rival, produced no effects which bore any proportion to his expence and efforts, or fuch as gratified, in any degree, his own hopes, or answered the expectation of Europe. The only folid advantage of the campaign was the acquifition of a few towns in Piedmont, which Bellay gained rather by ftratagem and addrefs, than by the force of his arms t.

1543.] The emperor and Francis, though both confiderably exhausted by fuch great but indecifive efforts, difcovering no abatement of their mutual animofity, employed all their attention, tried every expedient, and turned themfelves towards every quarter, in order to acquire new allies, together with fuch a reinforcement of ftrength as would give them the fuperiority in the enfuing campaign. Charles, taking advantage of the terror and refentment of the Spanairds, upon the fudden invafion of their country, prevailed on the Cortes of the feveral kingdoms to grant him fubfidies with a more liberal hand than ufual. At the fame time he borrowed a large fum from John king of Portugal, and, by way of fecurity for his repayment, put him in posseficion of the Molucea isles in the East Indies, with the gainful com. merce of precious spices, which that sequestered eorner of the globe yields. Not fatisfied with this, he negotiated a marriage between Philip his only fon, now in his fixteenth year, and Mary daughter of that mouarch, with whom her father, the most opulent prince in Europe, gave a large dower; and having likewife perfuaded the Cortes of Aragon and Valencia to recognife Philip as the heir of thefe crowns, he obtained from them the donative usual on fuch oceasions f. These extraordinary supplies enabled him to make fuch additions to his forces in Spain that he could detach a great body into the Low-Countries, and yet referve as many as were fufficient for the defence of the kingdom. Having thus provided for the fecurity of Spain, and committed the government of it to his fon, he failed for Italy [May], in his way to Germany. But how attentive foever to raile the funds for earrying on the war, or eager to grafp at any new expedient for that purpofe, he was not fo inconfiderate as to accept of an overture which Paul, knowing his neceffities, artfully threw out to him. That ambitious pontiff, no lefs fagacious to difcern, than watchful to feize opportunities of aggrandizing his family, folieited him to grant Octavio his grandchild, whom the emperor had admitted to the honour of being his fon-in-law, the investiture of the dutchy of Milan, in return for which he promifed fuch a fum of money as would have gone far towards fupplying all his prefent exigencies. But Charles, as well from unwillingnefs to alienate a province of fo much value, as from difgust at the pope, who had hitherto refused to join in the war against Francis, rejected the proposal. His diffatisfaction with Paul at that juncture was fo great, that he even refufed to approve his alienating Parma and Placentia from the patrimony of St. Peter, and fettling them on his fon and grandfon as a fief to be held of the holy fee. As no other expedient for raifing money among the Italian flates remained, he confented to withdraw the garrifons which he had hitherto kept in the citadels of Florence and Leghorn; in confideration for which he received a large prefent from Cofino di Medici, who by this means fecured his own independence, and got poffetilon of two forts, which were jully called the fetters of Tufcany†.

But Charles, while he feemed to have turned his whole attention towards raifing the fums neceffary for defraying the expences of the year, had not been negligent of objects more diftant, though no lefs important, and had concluded a league offensive and defensive with Henry VIII. from which he derived, in the end, greater advantage than from all his other preparations. - Several flight circumftances which have already been mentioned, had begun to alienate the affections of that monarch from Francis, with whom he had been for fome time in clofe alliance; and new incidents of greater moment, had occurred to increase his difgust and animofity. Henry, defirous of establishing an uniformity in religion in both the British kingdoms, as well as fond of making profelytes to his own opinions, had formed a fcheme of perfuading his nephew the king of Scots to renounce the pope's fupremacy, and to adopt the fame fystem of reformation, which he had introduced into England. This measure he purfued with his usual eagerness and impetuofity, making fuch advantageous offers to James, whom he confidered as not over-fcrupuloufly attached to any religious tenets, that he hardly doubted of fuccefs. His propositions were accordingly received in fuch a manner, that he flattered himfelf with having gained his point. But the Scottifh ecclefiaftics, forefeeing how fatal the union of their fovereign with England must prove both to their own power, and to the eftablished fystem of religion; and the partifans of France, no lefs convinced that it would put an end to the influence of that crown upon the public councils of Scotland; combined together, and by their infinuations defeated Henry's fcheme at the very moment when he expected it to have taken effect*. Too haughty to brook fuch a difappointment, which he imputed as much to the arts of the French, as to the levity of the Scottish monarch, he took arms against Scotland, threatening to fubdue the kingdom, fince he could not gain the friendship of its king. At the fame time, his refentment against Francis quickened his negotiations with the emperor, an alliance with whom he was now as forward to accept as the other could be to offer it. During this war with Scotland, and before the conclufion of his negotiations with Charles, James V. died, leaving his crown to Mary his only daughter, an infant of a few days old. Upon this event, Henry altered at once his whole fyftem with regard to Scotland, and abandoning all thoughts of conquering it, aimed at what was more advantageous as well as more practicable, an union with that kingdom by a marriage between Edward his only fon and the young queen. But here, too, he apprehended a vigorous opposition from the French faction in Scotland, which began to beffir itfelf in order to thwart the measure. The neceflity of crushing this party among the Scots, and of preventing Francis from furnishing them any effectual aid, confirmed Henry's refolution of breaking with France, and pushed him on to put a finishing hand to the treaty of confederacy with the emperor.

In this league [Feb. 11] were contained first of all, articles for fecuring their future amity and mutual defence; then were enumerated the demands which they were refpcctively to make upon Francis; and the plan of their operations was fixed, if he should refuse to grant them fatisfaction. They agreed to require that Francis should not only renounce his alliance with Solyman, which had been the fource of infinite calamities to Christendom, but also that he should make reparation for the damages which that unnatural union had occafioned; that he should reftore Burgundy to the emperor, that he should defist immediately from hostilities, and leave Charles at leifure to oppose the common enemy of the Christian faith; and that he should immediately pay the fums due to Henry, or put fome towns in his hands as fecurity to that effect. If, within forty days, he did not comply with these demands, they then engaged to invade France each with twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse, and not lay down their arms until they had recovered Burgundy, together with the towns on the Somme, for the emperor, and Normandy and Guienne, or even the whole realm of France, for Henry*. Their heralds, accordingly, fet out with thefe haughty requifitions; and though they were not permitted to enter France, the two monarchs held themfelves fully entitled to execute whatever was stipulated in their treaty.

Francis on his part, was not lefs diligent in preparing for the approaching campaign. Having early obferved fymptoms of Henry's difgust and alienation, and finding all his endeavours to foothe and reconcile him ineffectual, he knew his temper too well not to expect that open hostilities would quickly follow upon this feceffion of friendship. For this reafon he redoubled his endeavours to obtain from Solyman fuch aid as might counterbalance the great acceffion of ftrength which the emperor would receive by his alliance with England. In order to fupply the place of the two ambaffadors murdered by Guasto, lie sent as his envoy, first to Venice, and then to Constantinople, Paulin, who, though in no higher rank than a captain of foot, was deemed worthy of being raifed to this important flation, to which he was recommended by Bellay, who had trained him to the arts of negotiation, and made trial of his talents and address on feveral occafions. Nor did he belie the opinion conceived of his courage and abilities. Haftening to Conftantinople, without regarding the dangers to which he was exposed, he urged his master's demands with fuch boldness, and availed himfelf of every circumstance with fuch dexterity, that he foon removed all the fultan's difficulties. As fome of the bashaws, swayed either by their own opinion, or influenced by the emperor's emiffaries, who had made their way even into this court, had declared in the divan against acting in concert with France, he found means either to convince or filence them*. At last he obtained orders for Barbaroffa to fail with a powerful fleet, and to regulate all his operations by the directions of the French king. Francis was not equally fuccefsful in his attempts to gain the princes of the empire. The extraordinary rigour with which he thought it neceffary to punish fuch of his. fubjects as had embraced the protestant opinions, in order to give fome notable evidence of his own zeal for the catholic faith, and to wipe off the imputations to which he was. liable from his confederacy with the Turks, placed an infuperable barrier between him and fuch of the Germans as intereft or inclination would have prompted most readily to. join him+. His chief advantage, however, over the emperor, he derived on this, as on other occasions, from the contiguity of his dominions, as well as from the extent of the royal authority in France, which exempted him from all the delays and difappointments unavoidable wherever popular affemblies provide for the expences of government by occafional and frugal fublidies. Hence his domeffic preparations. were always carried on with vigour and rapidity, while those of the emperor, unlefs when quickened by fome foreign fupply, or fome temporary expedient, were extremely flow and dilatory.

Long before any army was in readinefs to oppofe him, Francis took the field in the Low-Countries, against which he turned the whole weight of the war. He made himfelf mafter of Landrecy, which he determined to keep as the key to the whole province of Hainault; and ordered it to be fortified with great care. Turning from thence to the right, he entered the dutchy of Luxembourg, and found it in the fame defenceless flate as in the former year. While he was thus employed, the emperor, having drawn together an army, composed of all the different nations subject to his government, entered the territories of the duke of Cleves, on whom he had vowed to inflict exemplary vengeance. This prince, whofe conduct and fituation were fimilar to that of Robert de la Mark in the first war between Charles and Francis, refembled him likewife in his fate. Unable, with his feeble army, to face the emperor, who advanced at the head of forty-four thousand men, he retired at his approach; and the Imperialists, being at liberty to act as they pleafed, immediately invefted Duren. That town, though gallantly defended, was taken by affault; all the inhabitants were put to the fword, and the place itfelf reduced to afhes. This dreadful example of feverity ftruck the people of the country with fuch general terror, that all the other towns, even fuch as were capable of refistance, fent their keys to the emperor [August 24]; and before a body of French, detached to his affistance, could come up, the duke himfelf was obliged to make his fubmiffion to Charles in the most abject manner. Being admitted into the Imperial prefence, he kneeled, together with eight of his principal fubjects, and implored mercy. The emperor allowed him to remain in that ignominious posture, and eyeing him with an haughty and fevere look, without deigning to answer a fingle word, remitted him to his ministers. The conditions, however, which they prefcribed were not fo rigorous as he had reafon to have cxpected after fuch a reception. He was obliged [Sept. 7] to renounce his alliance with France and Denmark; to refign all his pretensions to the dutchy of Gueldres; to enter into perpetual amity with the emperor and king of the Romans. In return for which, all his hereditary dominions were reftor-ed, except two towns which the emperor kept as pledges of the duke's fidelity during the continuance of the war; and he was reinflated in his privileges as a prince of the empire. Not long after, Charles, as a proof of the fincerity of his reconcilement, gave him in marriage one of the daughters of his brother Ferdinand†.

Having thus chaftifed the prefumption of the duke of Cleves, detached one of his allies from Francis, and annexed to his own dominions in the Low-Countries a confiderable province which lay contiguous to them, Charles advaneed towards Hainault, and laid fiege to Landrecy. There, as the first fruits of his alliance with Henry, he was joined by fix thousand English under fir John Wallop. The garrifon, confifting of veteran troops commanded by De la Lande and Deffé, two officers of reputation, made a vigorous refiftance. Francis approached with all his forces to relieve that place; Charles covered the fiege; both were determined to hazard an engagement; and all Europe expected to fee this conteft, which had continued fo long, decided at laft by a battle between two great armies led by their refpective moparchs in perfon. But the ground which feparated their two camps was fuch, as put the difadvantage manifeftly on his fide who fhould venture to attack, and neither of them chofe to run that rifque. Amidft a variety of movements in order to draw the enemy into the fnare, or to avoid it themfelves, Francis, with admirable conduct and equal good fortune, threw first a supply of fresh troops, and then a convoy of provisions, into the town, fo that the emperor, deipairing of fuccefs, withdrew into winter-quarters*, in order to preferve his army from being entirely ruined by the rigour of the feafon.

During this campaign, Solyman fulfilled his engagements to the French king with great punctuality. He himfelf marched into Hungary with a numerous army [November];

† Haræi Annal. Brabant. t. i. 628. Recueil des Traitez, t. ii. 220. * Bellay, 405, &c. and as the princes of the empire made no great effort to fave a country which Charles, by employing his own force againft Francis, feemed willing to facrifice, there was no appearance of any body of troops to oppofe his progrefs. He befieged, one after another, Quinque Ecclefiæ, Alba, and Gran, the three most confiderable towns in the kingdom, of which Ferdinand had kept poffeffion. The first was taken by florm; the other two furrendered; and the whole kingdom, a fmall corner excepted, was fubjected to the Turkifh yoke+. About the fame time, Barbaroffa failed with a fleet of an hundred and ten gallies, and coafting along the flore of Calabria, made a defcent at Rheggio, which he plundered and burnt; and advancing from thence to the mouth of the Tiber, he flopt there to water. The citizens of Rome, ignorant of his defination, and filled with terror, began to fly with fuch general precipitation, that the city would have been totally deferted, if they had not refumed courage upon letters from Paulin the French envoy, affuring them that uo violence or injury would be offered by the Turks to any ftate in alliance with the king his master*. From Oftia, Barbaroffa failed to Marfeilles, and being joined by the French fleet with a body of land forces on board, under the count d'Enguien, a gallant young prince of the houfe of Bourbon, they directed their courfe towards Nice, the fole retreat of the unfortunate duke of Savoy [August 10]. There, to the aftonifhment and fcandal of all Chriftendom, the lilies of France and crefcent of Maliomet appeared in conjunction against a fortrefs on which the crofs of Savoy was difplayed. The town, however, was bravely defended against their combined force by Montfort a Savoyard gentleman, who flood a general affault, and repulfed the enemy with great lofs before he retired into the cafile. That fort, fituated upon a rock, on which the artillery made no impreffion, and which could not be undermined, he held out fo long, that Doria had time to approach with his fleet, and the marquis del Guasto to march with a body of troops from Milan. Upon intelligence of this, the French and Turks raised the fiege [Sept 8]†; and Francis had not even the consolution of fucces, to render the infamy which he drew on himself, by calling in fuch an auxiliary, more pardonable.

From the fmall progrefs of either party during this campaign, it was obvious to what a length the war might be drawn out between two princes, whofe power was fo equal-Iy balanced, and who, by their own talents or activity, could fo vary and multiply their refources. The trial which they had now made of each other's ftrength might have taught them the imprudence of perfifting in a war, wherein there was greater appearance of their diftreffing their own dominions than of conquering those of their adversary, and should have difposed both to wish for peace. If Charles and Francis had been influenced by confiderations of interest or prudence alone, this, without doubt, must have been the manner in which they would have reafoned. But the perfonal animofity, which mingled itfelf in all their quarrels, had grown to be fo violent and implacable, that, for the pleafure of gratifying it, they difregarded every thing elfe; and were infinitely more folicitous how to hurt each other, than how to fecure what would be of advantage to themfelves. No fooner then did the feafon force them to fuspend hostilities, than, without paying any attention to the pope's repeated endeavours or paternal exhortations to re-establish peace, they began to provide for the operations of the next year with new vigour, and an activity increasing with their hatred. Charles turned his chief attention towards gaining the princes of the empire, and endeavoured to roufe the formidable but unwieldy strength of the Germanic body against Francis. In order to understand the propriety of the steps which l.e took for that purpole, it is neceffary to review the chief † Guichenon Histoire de Savoye, t. i. p. 651. Bellay, 425, &c. transactions in that country fince the diet of Ratisbon in the year 1541.

Much about the time that affembly broke up, Maurice fucceeded his father Henry in the government of that part of Saxony which belonged to the Albertine branch of the Saxon family. This young prince, then only in his twentieth year, had, even at that early period, begun to difcover the great talents which qualified him for acting fuch a diftinguished part in the affairs of Germany. As foon as he entered upon the administration, he struck out into fuch a new and fingular path, as fhewed that he aimed from the beginning, at fomething great and uncommon. Though zealoully attached to the protestant opinions, both from education and principle, he refused to accede to the league of Smalkalde, being determined, as he faid, to maintain the purity of religion, which was the original object of that confederacy, but not to entangle himfelf in the political interefts or combinations to which it had given rife. At the fame time, forefeeing a rupture between Charles and the confederates of Smalkalde, and perceiving which of them was most likely to prevail in the contest, instead of that jealoufy and diftruft which the other protestants expressed of all the emperor's defigns, he affected to place in him an unbounded confidence; and courted his favour with the utmost affiduity. When the other protestants in the year 1542, either declined affifting Ferdinand in Hungary, or afforded him reluctant and feeble aid, Maurice marched thither in perfon, and rendered himfelf confpicuous by his zeal and courage. From the fame motive, he had led to the emperor's affiftance, during the last campaign, a body of his own troops; and the gracefulnels of his perfon, his dexterity in all military exerciles, together with his intrepidity, which courted and delighted in danger, did not diftinguish him more in the field, than his great abilities and infinuating address won upon the emperor's confidence and favourt. While by this conduct, which appeared extraordinary to thole who held the fame opinions with him concerning religion, Maurice endeavoured to pay court to the emperor, he began to difcover fome degree of jealoufy of his coufin the elector of Saxony. This, which proved in the fequel fo fatal to the elector, had almost occasioned an open rupture between them; and foon after Maurice's acceffion to the government, they both took arms with equal rage, upon account of a difpute about the right of jurifdiction over a paltry town fituated on the Moldaw. They were prevented, however, from proceeding to action by the mediation of the landgrave of Heffe, whofe daughter Maurice had married, as well as by the powerful and authoritative admonitions of Luther*.

Amidst these transactions, the pope, though extremely irritated at the emperor's conceffions to the protestants at the diet of Ratifbon, was fo warmly folicited on all hands, by fuch as were most devoutly attached to the fee of Rome, no lefs than by those whose fidelity or defigns he fuspected, to fummon a general council, that he found it impoffible to avoid any longer calling that affembly. The impatience for its meeting, and the expectations of great effects from its decifions, feemed to grow in proportion to the difficulty of obtaining it. He still adhered, however, to his original refolution of holding it in fome town of Italy, where, by the number of ecclefiaftics, retainers to his court, and depending on his favour, who could repair to it without difficulty or expence, he might influence and even direct all its proceedings. This proposition, though often rejected by the Germans, he instructed his nuncio to the diet held at Spires [March 3], in the year 1542, to renew once more; and if he found it gave no greater fatisfaction than formely, he empowered him, as a last concession, to propose for the place of meeting, Trent, a city in the Tyrol, fubject to the king of the Romans, and fituated on the confines between Germany and Italy. The catholic princes in the dict, after * Sleid. 292. Seck. l. iii. 403.

giving it as their opinion that the council might have been held with greater advantage in Ratifbon, Cologne, or fome of the great cities of the empire, were at length induced to approve of the place which the pope had named. The protestants unanimoufly expressed their diffatisfaction, and protested that they would pay no regard to a council held beyond the precincts of the empire, called by the pope's authority, and in which he affumed the right of pretiding+.

The pope without taking any notice of their objections, published the bull of intimation [May 22, 1542], named three cardinals to prefide as his legates, and appointed them to repair to Trent before the first of November, the day he had fixed for opening the council. But if Paul had defired the meeting of a council as fincerely as he pretended. he would not have pitched on fuch an improper time for calling it. Inftead of that general union and tranquillity, without which the deliberations of a council could neither be conducted with fecurity, nor attended with authority, fuch a fierce war was just kindled between the emperor and Francis, as rendered it impossible for the ecclesiaftics from many parts of Europe to refort thitlier in fafety. The legates accordingly, remained feveral months at Trent; but as no perfon appeared there, except a few prelates from the ecclefiastical state, the pope, in order to avoid the ridicule and contempt which this drew upon him from the enemies of the church, recalled them, and prorogued the council*.

Unhappily for the authority of the papal fee, at the very time that the German proteftants took every occasion of pouring contempt upon it, the emperor and king of the Romans found it.neceffary not only to connive at their conduct, but to court their favour by repeated acts of indulgence. In the fame diet of Spires, in which they had protefted in the most difrespectful terms against affembling a council at Trent, Ferdinand, who depended on their aid for the defence of Hungary, not only permitted that pro-testation to be inferted in the records of the diet, but renewed in their favour all the emperor's conceffions at Ratifbon, adding to them whatever they demanded for their farther fecurity. Among other particulars, he granted a fufpenfion of a decree of the Imperial chamber against the city of Goflar (one of those which had entered into the league of Smalkalde), on account of its having feized the ecclefiaffical revenues within its domains, and enjoined Henry duke of Brunswick to defilt from his attempts to carry that decree into execution. But Henry, a furious bigot, and no lefs obstinate than rash in all his undertakings, continuing to difquiet the people of Goflar by his incurfions, the elector of Saxony and landgrave of Heffe, that they might not fuffer any member of the Smalkaldic body to be oppreffed, affembled their forces, declared war in form against Henry, and in the space of a few weeks, striping him entirely of his dominions, drove him as a wretched exile to take refuge in the court of Bavaria. By this act of vengeance, no lefs fevere than fudden, they filled all Germany with dread of their power, and the confederates of Smalkalde appeared, by this first effort of their arms, to be as ready as they were able to protect those who had joined their affociation *.

Emboldened by fo many conceffions in their favour, as well as by the progrefs which their opinions daily made, the princes of the league of Smalkalde took a folemn proteft againft the Imperial chamber, and declined its jurifdiction for the future, becaufe that court had not been vifited or reformed according to the decree of Ratifbon, and continued to difcover a moft indecent partiality in all its proceedings. Not long after this, they ventured a ftep farther; and protefting againft the recefs of a diet held at Nuremberg [April 23, 1543], which provided for the defence of Hungary, refufed to furnifh their contingent for that purpofe

1544.] Such were the lengths to which the protestants had proceeded, and fuch their confidence in their own power when the emperor returned from the Low-Countries, to hold a diet which he had fummoned to meet at Spires. The respect due to the emperor, as well as the importance of the affairs which were to be laid before it, rendered this affembly extremely full. All the electors, a great number of princes ecclefiaftical and fecular, with the deputies of most of the cities, were prefent. Charles foon perceived that this was not a time to offend the jealous fpirit of the protestants, by afferting in any high tone the authority and doctrines of the church, or by abridging, in the fmalleft article, the liberty which they now enjoyed; but that, on the contrary, if he expected any fupport from them, or wished to preferve Germany from inteftine diforders while he was engaged in a foreign war, he must foothe them by new concessions, and a more ample extension of their religious privileges. He began accordingly, with courting the elector of Saxony, and landgrave of Heffe, the heads of the protestant party, and by giving up fome things in their favour, and granting liberal promifes with regard to others, he fecured himfelf from any danger of opposition on their part. Having gained this capital point, he then ventured to addrefs the diet with greater freedom. He began by reprefenting his own zeal, and unwearied efforts with regard to two things most effential to Christendom, the procuring of a general council in order to compose the religious diffensions which had unhappily arifen in Germany, and the providing fome proper means for checking the formidable progrefs of the Turkifh arms. But he observed, with deep regret, that his pious endeavours had been entirely defeated by the unjuftifiable ambition of the French king, who having wantonly kindled the flame of war in Europe, which had been fo lately extinguished by the truce of Nice, rendered it impoffible for the fathers of the church to affemble in council, or to deliberate with fecurity; and obliged him to employ those forccs in his own defence, which, with greater fatisfaction to himfelf, as well as more honour to Chriftendom, he would have turned against the infidels: that Francis, not thinking it enough to have called him off from oppofing the Mahomctans, had, with unexampled impiety, invited them into the heart of Chriftendom, and joining his arms to theirs, had openly attacked the duke of Savoy a member of the empire: that Barbaroffa's flect was now in one of the ports of France, waiting only the return of fpring to carry terror and defolation to the coast of fome Christian state: that in fuch a fituation it was folly to think of diffant expeditions against the Turk, or of marching to oppose his armies'in Hungary, while fuch a powerful ally received him into the centre of Europe, and gave him footing there. It was a dictate of prudence, he added, to oppose the nearest and most imminent danger, first of all, and by humbling the power of France, to deprive Solyman of the advantages which he derived from the unnatural confederacy formed between him and a monarch, who still arrogated the name of Moft Christian: that, in truth, a war against the French king and the fultan ought to be confidered as the fame thing; and that every advantage gained over the former was a fevere and fenfible blow to the latter: on all thefe accounts, he concluded with demanding their aid againft Francis, not merely as an enemy of the Germanic body, or of him who was its head, but as an avowed ally of the infidels, and a public enemy to the Christian name.

In order to give greater weight to this violent invective of the emperor, the king of the Romans flood up, and related the rapid conquefts of the fultan in Hungary, occafianed, as he faid, by the fatal neceffity imposed on his brother, of employing his arms against France. When he had 1544.]

finished, the ambaffadors of Savoy gave a detail of Barbaroffa's operations at Nice, and of the ravages which he had committed on that coaft. All thefe, added to the general indignation which Francis's unprecedented union with the Turks excited in Europe, made fuch an impreffion on the diet as the emperor wifhed, and difpofed molt of the members to grant him fuch effectual aid as he had demanded. The ambaffadors whom Francis had fent to explain the motives of his conduct, were not permitted to enter the bounds of the empire; and the apology which they published for their mafter, vindicating his alliance with Solyman, by examples drawn from scripture, and the practice of Christian princes, was little regarded by men who were irritated already, or prejudiced against him to fuch a degree, as to be incapable of allowing their proper weight to any arguments in his behalf.

Such being the favourable disposition of the Germans, Charles perceived that nothing could now obstruct his gaining all that he aimed at, but the fears and jealoufies of the protestants, which he determined to quiet by granting every thing that the utmost folicitude of these passions could defire for the fecurity of their religion. With this view, he confented to a recess, whereby all the rigorous edicts hitherto iffued against the protestants were suspended; a council either general or national to be affembled in Germany was declared neceffary, in order to re-eftablish peace in the church; until one of thefe should be held (which the emperor undertook to bring about as foon as poffible), the free and public exercife of the protestant religion was authorized; the Imperial chamber was enjoined to give no moleftation to the protestants; and when the term, for which the prefent judges in that court were elected, should expire, perfons duly qualified were then to be admitted as members, without any diffinction on account of religion. In return for thefe extraordinary acts of indulgence, the protestants concurred with the other members of the diet, in declaring war against

Francis in name of the empire; in voting the emperor a body of twenty-four thousand foot and four thousand herfe, to be maintained at the public expence for fix months, and to be employed against France; and at the fame time the diet imposed a poll-tax to be levied throughout all Germany on every perfon without exception, for the support of the war against the Turks.

Charles, while he gave the greatest attention to the minute and intricate detail of particulars neceffary towards conducting the deliberations of a numerous and divided affembly to fuch a fuccefsful period, negotiated a feparate peace with the king of Denmark; who, though he had hitherto performed nothing confiderable in confequence of his alliance with Francis, had it in his power, however, to make a troublefome diversion in favour of that monarch +. At the fame time, he did not neglect proper applications to the king of England, in order to roufe him to more vigorous efforts against their common enemy. Little, indeed, was wanting to accomplifh this; for fuch events had happened in Scotland as inflamed Henry to the most violent pitch of refentment against Francis. Having concluded with the parliament of Scotland a treaty of marriage between his fon and their young queen, by which he reckoned himfelf fecure of effecting the union of the two kingdoms, which had been long defired, and often attempted without fuccefs by his predeceffors, Mary of Guife the queen-mother, cardinal Beatoun, and other partizans of France, found means not only to break off the match, but to alienate the Scottifh nation entirely from the friendship of England, and to strengthen its ancient attachment to France. Henry, however, did not abandon an object of fo much importance; and as the humbling of Francis, befides the pleafure of taking revenge upon an enemy who had difappointed a favourite measure, appeared the most effectual method of bringing the Scots to accept once more of the treaty which they had relinquifhed, he was fo cager to accomplift this, that he was ready to fecond whatever the emperor could propose to be attempted against the French king. The plan, accordingly, which they concerted, was such, if it had been punctually executed, as must have ruined France in the first place, and would have augmented fo prodigiously the emperor's power and territories, as might in the end have proved fatal to the liberties of Europe. They agreed to invade France each with an army of twenty-five thousand men, and, without losing time in besieging the frontier towns, to advance directly towards the interior provinces, and to join their forces near Paris*.

Francis flood alone in opposition to all the enemies whom Charles was muftering against him. Solyman had been the only ally who did not defert him; but the affiftance which he received from him had rendered him fo odious to all Chriftendom, that he refolved rather to forego all the advantages of his friendship, than to become, on that account, the object of general detestation. For this reason, he difmilled Barbaroffa as foon as winter was over, who, after ravaging the coaft of Naples and Tufcany, returned to Conftantinople. As Francis could not hope to equal the forces of fo many powers combined against him, he endeavoured to fupply that defect by difpatch, which was more in his power, and to get the flart of them in taking the field. Early in the fpring the count d'Enguien invefted Carignan, a town in Piedmont, which the marquis del Guafto the Imperial general having furprifed the former year, confidered as of fo much importance, that he had fortified it at great expence. The count pushed the fiege with fuch vigour, that Guasto, fond of his own conquest, and feeing no other way of faving it from falling into the hands of the French, refolved to hazard a battle in order to relieve it. He began his march from Milan for this purpofe, and as he was at uo pains to conceal his intention, it was foon known in the French camp. Enguien, a gallant and enterprifing young man, withed paffionately to try the fortune of a battle; his troops defired it with no lefs ardour; but the peremptory injunction of the king not to venture a general engagement, flowing from a prudent attention to the prefent fituation of affairs, as well as from the remembrance of former difafters, reftrained him from venturing upon it. Unwilling, however, to abandon Carignan, when it was just ready to yield, and eager to diftinguish his command by fome memorable action, he difpatched Monluc to court, in order to lay before the king the advantages of fighting the enemy, and the hopes which he had of victory. The king referred the matter to his privy council; all the ministers declared, one after another, against fighting, and supported their fentiments by reafons extremely plaufible. While they were delivering their opinions, Monluc, who was permitted to be prefent, discovered fuch visible and extravagant fymptoms of impatience to speak, as well as such diffatisfaction with what he heard, that Francis, diverted with his appearance, called on him to declare what he could offer in reply to fentiments which feemed to be as just as they were general. Upon this, Monluc, a plain but spirited foldier, and of known courage, reprefented the good condition of the troops, their eagerneis to meet the enemy in the field, their confidence in their officers, together with the everlafting infamy which the declining of a battle would bring on the French arms; and he urged his arguments with fuch lively impetuofity, and fuch a flow of military eloquence, as gained over to his opinion, not only the king, naturally fond of daring actions, but feveral of the council. Francis, catching the fame enthufiafm which had animated his troops, fuddenly farted up, and having lifted his hands to Heaven, and implored the Divine protection, he then addreffed himfelf to Monluc, " Go," fays he, " return to Piedmont, and fight in the name of God *."

* Memoires de Monluc.

No fooner was it known that the king had given Enguien leave to fight the Imperialists, than fuch was the martial ardour of the gallant and high-fpirited gentlemen of that age, that the court was quite deferted, every perfon defirous of reputation, or capable of fervice, hurrying to Piedmont, in order to fhare, as volunteers, in the danger and glory of the action. Encouraged by the arrival of fo many brave officers, Enguien immediately prepared for battle, nor did Guafto decline the combat. The number of cavalry was almost equal, but the Imperial infantry exceeded the French by at least ten thousand men. They met near Cerifoles [April 11], in an open plain, which afforded to neither any advantage of ground, and both had full time to form their army in proper order. The flock was fuch as might have been expected between veteran troops, violent and obftinate. The French cavalry rushing forward to the charge with their ufual vivacity, borc down every thing that opposed them; but, on the other hand, the steady and disciplined valour of the Spanish infantry having forced the body which they encountered to give way, victory remained in fuspence, ready to declare for whichever general could make the best use of that critical moment. Guasto, engaged in that part of his army which was thrown into diforder, and afraid of falling into the hands of the French, whofe vengeance he dreaded on account of the murder of Rincon and Fregofo, loft his prefence of mind, and forgot to order a large body of referve to advance; whereas Enguien, with admirable courage and equal conduct, supported at the head of his gens d'armes, fuch of his battalions as began to yield; and at the fame time he ordered the Swifs in his fervice, who had been victorious wherever they fought, to fall upon the Spaniards. This motion proved decifive. All that followed was confusion and flaughter. The marquis del Guafto, wounded in the thigh, escaped only by the swiftness of his horfe. The victory of the French was complete, ten thousand of the Imperialists being flain, and a confiderable number, with all their tents, baggage, and artillery, taken. On the part of the conquerors, their joy was without allay, a few only being killed, and among these no officer of diflinction+.

This fplendid action, befide the reputation with which it was attended, delivered France from an imminent danger, as it ruined the army with which Guafto had intended to invade the country between the Rhone and Saone, where there were neither fortified towns nor regular forces to oppose luis progress. But it was not in Francis's power to purfue the victory with fuch vigour as to reap all the advantages which it might have yielded; for though the Milanefe remained now almost defenceles; though the inhabitants who had long murmured under the rigour of the imperial government, were ready to throw off the yoke; though Enguien, flushed with success, urged the king to feize this happy opportunity of recovering a country, the acquifition of which had been long his favourite object; yet, as the emperor and the king of England were preparing to break in upon the opposite frontier of France with numerous armies, it became necessary to facrifice all thoughts of conquest to the public fafety; and to recal twelve thousand of Enguien's best troops to be employed in defence of the kingdom. Enguien's fublequent operations were, of confequence, fo languid and inconfiderable, that the reduction of Carignan and fome other towns in Piedmont, was all that he gained by his great victory at Cerifoles*.

The emperor, as ufual, was late in taking the field, but he appeared, towards the beginning of June, at the head of an army more numerous and better appointed than any which he had hitherto led against France. It amounted almost to fifty thousand men, and part of it having reduced Luxembourg and fome other towns in the Netherlands, before he himfelf joined it, he now marched with the whole towards the frontiers of Champagne [June.] Charles, aecording to his agreement with the king of England, ought to have advanced directly towards Paris; and the dauphin, who commanded the only army to which Francis trufted for the fecurity of his dominions in that quarter, was in no condition to oppofe him. But the fuceels with which the French had defended Provence in the year one thousand five hundred and thirty-fix, had taught them the most effectual method of diftreffing an invading enemy. Champagne, a country abounding more in vines than corn, was incapable of maintaining a great army; and before the emperor's approach, whatever could be of any use to his troops had been carried off or deftroyed. This rendered it neeeffary for him to be mafter of fome places of strength in order to fecure the convoys, on which alone he now perceived that he must depend for fubfistence; and he found the frontier towns fo ill provided for defence, that he hoped it would not be a work either of much time or difficulty to reduce them. Accordingly Ligny and Commercy, which he first attacked, furrendered after a short refistance. He then invested St. Difier [July 8,] which, though it commanded an important pafs on the Marne, was deflitute of every thing neceffary for fustaining a fiege. But the count de Sancerre and M. De la Lande, who had acquired fuch reputation by the defence of Landrecy, generoully threw themfelves into the town, and undertook to hold it out to the last extremity. The emperor foon found how capable they were of making good their promife, and that he could not expect to take the town without befieging it in form. This accordingly he undertook; and as it was his nature never to abandon any enterprife in which he had once engaged, he perfifted in it with an inconfiderate obflinaey.

The king of England's preparations for the campaign were complete long before the emperor's; but as he did not chufe, on the one hand, to encounter alone the whole pow-. er of France, and was unwilling, on the other hand, that his troops should remain inactive, he took that opportunity of chaftifing the Scots, by fending his fleet, together with a confiderable part of his infantry, under the earl of Hertford, to invade their country. Hertford executed his commiffion with vigour, plundered and burnt Edinburgh and Leith, laid wafte the adjacent country, and reimbarked his men with fuch difpatch that they joined their fovereign foon after his landing in France* [July 14.] When Henry arrived in that kingdom, he found the emperor engaged in the fiege of St. Difier; an ambaffador, however, whom he fent to congratulate the English monarch on his fafe arrival on the continent, folicited him to march, in terms of the treaty, directly to Paris. But Charles had fet his ally fuch an ill example of fulfilling the conditions of their confederacy with exactness, that Henry, observing him employ his time and forces in taking towns for his own behoof, faw no reafon why he should not attempt the reduction of fome places that lay conveniently for himfelf. Without paying any regard to the emperor's remonstrances, he immediately invefted Boulogne, and commanded the duke of Norfolk to prefs the fiege of Montreuil, which had been begun before his arrival, by a body of Flemings, in conjunction with fome English troops. While Charles and Henry shewed fuch attention each to his own interest, they both neglected the common caufe. Instead of the union and confidence requifite towards conducting the great plan that they had formed, they early had difcovered a mutual jealoufy of each other, which, by degrees, begot diffrust, and ended in open hatred†.

By this time, Francis had, with unwearied induftry, drawn together an army, capable, as well from the number as from the valour of the troops, of making head against the enemy. But the dauphin, who still acted as general, prudently declining a battle, the loss of which would have endangered the kingdom, fatisfied himfelf with harafling the emperor with his light troops, cutting off his convoys, and laying wafte the country around him. Though extremely diftreffed by these operations, Charles still pressed the siege of St. Difier, which Sancerre defended with aftonishing fortitude and conduct. He flood repeated affaults, repulfing the enemy in them all; and undifmayed even by the death of his brave affociate De la Lande, who was killed by a cannonball, he continued to fhew the fame bold countenance and obstinate refolution. At the end of five weeks, he was ftill in a condition to hold out fome time longer, when an artifice of Granvelle's induced him to furrender. That crafty politician, having intercepted the kcy to the cypher which the duke of Guife used in communicating intelligence to Sancerre, forged a letter in his name, authorifing Sancerre to capitulate, as the king, though highly fatisfied with his behaviour, thought it imprudent to hazard a battle for his relief. This letter he conveyed into the town in a manner which could raife no fufpicion, and the governor fell into the fnare. Even then, he obtained fuch honourable conditions as his gallant defence merited, and among others, a ceffation of hostilities for eight days, at the expiration of which he bound himfelf to open the gates, if Francis, during that time, did not attack the Imperial army, and throw fresh troops into the town t. Thus Sancerre, by detaining the emperor fo long before an inconfiderable place, afforded his fovereign full time to affemble all his forces, and, what rarely falls to the lot of an officer in fuch an inferior command, acquired the glory of having faved his country.

As foon as St. Difier furrendered, the emperor advanced into the heart of Champagne [August 17], but Sancerre's obstinate resistance had damped his fanguine hopes of penetrating to Paris, and led him feriously to reflect on what he might expect before towns of greater strength, and defended by more numerous garrifons. At the fame time, the procuring fubfiftenec for his army was attended with great difficulty, which increased in proportion as he withdrew farther from his own frontier. He had loft a great number of his best troops in the fiege of St. Difier, and many fell daily in fkirmifhes, which it was not in his power to avoid, tho' they wafted his army infenfibly, without leading to any decifive action. The feafon advanced apaee, and he had not yet the command either of a fufficient extent of territory, or of any fuch confiderable town as rendered it fafe to winter in the enemy's country. Great arrears too were now due to his foldiers, who were upon the point of mutinying for their pay, while he knew not from what funds to fatisfy them. All thefe confiderations induced him to liften to the overtures of peace, which a Spanish Dominican, the confeffor of his fifter the queen of France, had fecretly made to his confessor, a monk of the fame order. In confequence of this, plenipotentiaries were named on both fides, and began their conferences in Chaufsè, a fmall village near Chalons. At the fame time, Charles, either from a defire of making one great final effort against France, or merely to gain a pretext for deferting his ally, and concluding a feparate peace, fent an ambaffador formally to require Henry, according to the flipulation in their treaty, to advance towards Paris. While he expected a return from him, and waited the iffue of the conferences at Chaufse, he continued to march forward, though in the ut:noft diffrefs from fcareity of provisions. But at last, by a fortunate motion on his part, or through fome neglect or treachery on that of the French, he furprifed first Esperney and then Chateau Thierry, in both which were confiderable magazines. No fooner was it known that thefe towns, the latter of which is not two days march from Paris, were in the hands of the enemy, than that great capital, defencelefs, and fufceptible of any violent alarm in proportion to its greatnefs, was filled with conflernation. The inhabitants, as if the emperor had been already at their gates, fled in the wildest confusion and defpair, many fending their wives and children down the Seine to Rouen, others to Orleans, and the towns upon the Loire. Francis himfelf, more afflicted with this than with any other event during his reign, and fenfible as well of the triumph that his rival would enjoy in infulting his capital, as of the danger to which the kingdom was exposed, could not refrain from crying out in the first emotion of his furprife and forrow, " How dear, O my God, do I pay for this crown, which I thought thou hadft granted me freely *!" But recovering in a moment from this fudden fally of peevifuncis and impatience, he devoutly added, " Thy will, however, be done;" and proceeded to iffue the neceffary orders for oppofing the enemy with his ufual activity and prefence of mind. The dauphin detached eight thousand men to Paris, which revived the courage of the affrighted citizens; he threw a flrong garrifon into Meaux, and by a forced march got into Ferte, between the Imperialists and the capital.

Upon this the emperor, who began again to feel the want of provisions, perceiving that the dauphin fiill prudently declined a battle, and not daring to attack his camp with forces fo much fhattered and reduced by hard fervice, turned fuddenly to the right, and began to fall back towards Soiffons. Having about this time received Henry's anfwer, whereby he refufed to abandon the fieges of Boulogne and Montreuil, of both which he expected every moment to get poffeffion, he thought himfelf abfolved from all obligations of adhering to the treaty with him, and at full liberty to confult his own interest in what manner foever he pleased. He confented, therefore, to renew the conference, which the furprife of Esperney had broken off. To conclude a peace between two princes, one of whom greatly defired, and the other greatly needed it, did not require a long negotiation. It was figned at Crespy, a small town near Meaux, on the eighteenth of September. The chief articles of it were, that all the conquefts which either party had made fince the truce of Nice shall be reftored; That the emperor shall give in marriage to the duke of Orleans, either his own eldeft daughter, or the fecond daughter of his brother Ferdinand, that if he chufe to beflow on him his own daughter, he shall fettle on her all the provinces of the Low-Countries, to be erected into an independent flate, which shall defcend to the male iffue of the marriage; that if he determined to give him his niece, he fhall, with her, grant him the investiture of Milan and its dependencies; that he shall within four months declare which of these two princesfes he had pitched upon, and fulfil the refpective conditions upon the confummation of the marriage, which shall take place within a year from the date of the treaty; that as foon as the duke of Orleans is put in poffellion either of the Low-Countries or of Milan, Francis shall reftore to the duke of Savoy all that he now poffeffes of his territories, except Pignerol and Montmilian; that Francis shall renounce all pretentions to the kingdom of Naples, or to the fovereignty of Flanders and Artois, and Charles shall give up his claim to the dutchy of Burgundy and county of Charolois; that Francis shall give no aid to the exiled king of Navarre; that both monarchs shall join in making war upon the Turk, towards which the king fhall furnish, when required by the emperor and empire, fix hundred men at arms, and ten thoufand foot +.

Befides the immediate motives to this peace, arifing from the diffrees of his army through want of provisions; from the difficulty of retreating out of France, and the impossibility of fecuring winter-quarters there; the emperor was influenced, by other confiderations, more diffant indeed, but not lefs weighty. The pope was offended to a great degree, as well at his concessions to the protestants in the late diet, as at his confenting to call a council, and to admit of public difputations in Germany with a view of determining the doctrines in controverfy. Paul confidering both these steps as facrilegious encroachments on the jurifdiction as well as privileges of the holy fee, had addreffed to the emperor a remonstrance rather than a letter on this fubject, written with fuch acrimony of language, and in a flyle of fuch high authority, as difcovered more of an intention to draw on a quarrel than of a defire to reclaim him. This ill humour was not a little inflamed by the emperor's league with Henry of England, which being contracted with an hcretic excommunicated by the apoftolic fce, appeared to the pope a profane alliance, and was not lefs dreaded by him than that of Francis with Solyman. Paul's fon and grand. fon, highly incenfed at the emperor for having refufed to gratify them with regard to the alienation of Parma and Placentia, contributed by their fuggestions to four and difguft him ftill more. To all which was added the powerful operation of the flattery and promifes which Francis inceffantly employed to gain him. Though from his defire of maintaining a neutrality, the pope had hitherto fuppreffed his own refentment, had cluded the artifices of his own family, and refifted the folicitations of the French king, it was not. fafe to rely much on the fleadiness of a man whom his paffions, his friends, and his interest combined to shake. The union of the pope with France, Charles well knew, would instantly expose his dominions in Italy to be attacked. The Venetians, he forefaw, would probably follow the example of a pontiff, who was confidered as a model of political wildom among the Italians; and thus, at a juncture when he felt himfelf hardly equal to the burden of the prefent war, he would be overwhelmed with the weight of a new confederacy against him t. At the fame time, the Turks, almost unrefisted, made fuch progress in Hungary, reducing town after town, that they approached near to.

the confines of the Auftrian provinces +. Above all thefe the extraordinary progress of the protestant doctrines in Germany, and the dangerous combination into which the princes of that profession had entered, called for his immediate attention. Almost one half of Germany had revolted from the eftablished church; the fidelity of the rest was much shaken; the nobility of Austria had demanded of Ferdinand the free excreife of religion ||; the Bohemians, among whom fome feeds of the doctrines of Hufs still remained, openly favoured the new opinions; the archbishop of Cologne, with a zeal which is feldom found among ecclefiastics, had begun the reformation of his diocefe; nor was it poffible, unlefs fome timely and effectual check were given to the spirit of innovation, to foresee where it would end. He himfelf had been a witnefs, in the late diet, to the peremptory and decifive tone which the proteflants had now affumed. He had feen how, from confidence in their number and union, they had forgotten the humble flyle of their first petitions, and had grown to fuch boldness as openly to defpife the pope, and to fhew no great reverence for the Imperial dignity itfelf. If, therefore, he wished to maintain either the ancient religion or his own authority, and would not chufe to dwindle into a mere nominal head of the empire, fome vigorous and fpeedy effort was requifite on his part, which could not be made during a war that required the greatest exertion of his strength against a foreign and powerful enemy.

Such being the emperor's inducements to peace, he had the address to frame the treaty of Crespy so as to promote all the ends which he had in view. By coming to an agreement with Francis, he took from the pope all profpect of advantage in courting the friendship of that monarch in preference to his. By the provifo with regard to a war with the Turks, he not only deprived Solyman of a powerful ally, but turned the arms of that ally against || Sleid. 285.

him. By a private article, not inferted in the treaty, that it might not raife any unfeafonable alarm, he agreed with Francis that both fhould exert all their influence and power in order to procure a general council, to affert its authority, and to exterminate the proteftant herefy out of their dominions. This cut off all chance of affiltance which the confederates of Smalkalde might expect from the French king*; and left their folicitations, or his jealoufy of an ancient rival, fhould hereafter tempt Francis to forget this engagement, he left him embarraffed with a war againft England, which would put it out of his power to take any confiderable part in the affairs of Germany.

Henry, poffeffed at all times with an high idea of his own power and importance, felt, in the most fensible manner, the neglect with which the emperor had treated him in concluding a separate peace. But the situation of his affairs was fuch as fomewhat alleviated the mortification which this occafioned. For though he was obliged to recal the duke of Norfolk from the fiege of Montreuil [Sept. 14], becaufe the Flemish troops received orders to retire, Boulogne had furrendered before the negotiations at Crefpy were brought to an iffue. While elated with vanity on account of this conqueft, and inflamed with indignation against the emperor, the ambassadors whom Francis fent to make overtures of peace, found him too arrogant to grant what was moderate of equitable. His demands were indeed extravagant, and made in the tone of a conqueror; that Francis should renounce his alliance with Scotland, and not only pay up the arrears of former debts, but reimburfe the money which Henry had expended in the prefent wart. Francis, though fincerely defirous of peace, and willing to yield a great deal in order to obtain it, being now free from the preffure of the Imperial arms, rejected thefe ignominious propositions with difdain; and Henry departing for England, hoftilities continued between the two nations.

The treaty of peace, how acceptable foever to the people of France, whom it delivered from the dread of an enemy who had penetrated into the heart of the kingdom, was loudly complained of by the dauphin. He confidered it as a manifest proof of the king his father's extraordinary partiality towards his younger brother, now duke of Orleans, and complained that, from his eagerness to gain an eftablishment for a favourite fon, he had facrificed the honour of the kingdom, and renounced the most ancient as well as valuable rights of the crown. But as he durft not venture to offend the king by refufing to ratify it, though extremely defirous at the fame time of fecuring to himfelf the privilege of reclaiming what was now alienated fo much to his detriment, he fecretly protefled, in prefence of fome of his adherents, against the whole transaction; and declared whatever he should be obliged to do in order to confirm it, null in itfelf, and void of all obligation. The parliament of Thouloufe, probably by the infligation of his partifans, did the fame*. But Francis, highly pleafed as well with having delivered his fubjects from the miferies of an invafion, as with the prospect of acquiring an independent fettlement for his fon at no greater price than that of renouncing conquests to which he had no just claim; titles which had brought fo much expence and fo many difafters upon the nation; and rights grown obfolete and of no value; ratified the treaty with great joy. Charles, within the time preferibed by the treaty, declared his intention of giving Ferdinand's daughter in marriage to the duke of Orleans, together with the dutchy of Milan as her dowry?. Every circumstance feemed to promife the continuance of peace. The emperor, cruelly afflicted with the gout, appeared to be in no condition to undertake any enterprife where great activity was requifite, or much fatigue to be endured. He himfelf felt this, or wifhed at leaft that it fhould be believed; and being fo much difabled by this excruciating diffemper, when a French ambaffador followed him to Bruffels, in order to be prefent at his ratification of the treaty of peace, that it was with the utmost difficulty that he figned his name, he observed, that there was no great danger of his violating these articles, as a hand that could hardly hold a pen, was little able to brandish a lance.

The violence of his difeafe confined the emperor feveral months in Bruffels, and was the apparent caufe of putting off the execution of the great fcheme which he had formed in order to humble the protestant party in Germany. But there were other reasons for this delay. For, however prevalent the motives were which determined him to undertake this enterprife, the nature of that great body which he was about to attack, as well as the fituation of his own affairs, made it neceffary to deliberate long, to proceed with caution, and not too fuddenly to throw afide the veil under which he had hitherto concealed his real fentiments and schemes. He was sensible that the protestants, confcious of their own ftrength, but under continual apprehenfions of his defigns, had all the boldness of a powerful confederacy joined to the jealoufy of a feeble faction; and were no lefs quick-fighted to difcern the first appearance of danger, than ready to take arms in order to repel it. At the fame time, he still continued involved in a Turkish war; and though. in order to deliver himfelf from this incumbrance, he had determined to fend an envoy to the Porte with most advantageous and even fubmiffive overtures of peace, the refolutions of that haughty court were fo uncertain, that before thefe were known, it would have been highly imprudent to have kindled the flames of civil war in his own dominions.

Upon this account, he appeared diffatisfied with a bull iffued by the pope immediately after the peace of Crefpy [Nov. 19], fummoning the council to affemble at Trent early next fpring, and exhorting all Chriftian princes to embrace the opportunity that the prefent happy interval of tranquillity afforded them, of fupprefling those herefies which threatened to fubvert whatever was facred or venerable among Christians. But after fuch a flight expression of diflike, as was necessfary in order to cover his defigns, he determined to countenance the council, which might become no inconfiderable inftrument towards accomplishing his projects, and therefore not only appointed ambassfadors to appear there in his name, but ordered the ecclessifies in his dominions' to attend at the time prefixed*.

1545] Such were the emperor's views when the Imperial dict, after feveral prorogations, was opened at Worms [March 24]. The protestants, who enjoyed the free exercife of their religion by a very precarious tenure, having no other fecurity for it than the recefs of the last diet, which was to continue in force only until the meeting of a council, withed earneftly to establish that important privilege upon fome firmer bafis, and to hold it by a perpetual not a temporary title. But inftead of offering them any additional fecurity, Ferdinand opened the diet with obferving, that there were two points, which chiefly required confideration, the profecution of the war against the Turks, and the state of religion; that the former was the most urgent, as Solyman, after conquering the greatest part of Hungary, was now ready to fall upon the Austrian provinces; that the emperor, who, from the beginning of his reign, had neglected no opportunity of annoying this formidable enemy, and with the hazard of his own perfon had refifted his attacks, being animated still with the fame zeal, had now confented to ftop fhort in the career of his fuccefs against France, that, in conjunction with his ancient rival, he might turn his arms with greater vigour against the common adverfary of the Chriftian faith; that it became all the members of the empire to fecond those pious endeavours of its head; that, therefore, they ought, without delay, to vote him fuch effectual aid as not only their duty but their intereft called upon them to furnifh; that the controverfies about religion were fo intricate, and of fuch difficult difcuffion, as to give no hope of its being poffible to bring them at prefent to any final iffue; that by perfeverance and repeated folicitations the emperor had at length prevailed on the pope to call a council, for which they had fo often wifhed and petitioned; that the time appointed for its meeting was now come, and both parties ought to wait for its decrees, and fubmit to them as the decifions of the univerfal church.

The popifh members of the diet received this declaration with great applaufe, and fignified their entire acquiescence in every particular which it contained. The protestants expressed great furprife at propositions, which were fo manifeftly repugnant to the receis of the former diet; they infifted that the queftions with regard to religion, as first in dignity and importance, ought to come first under deliberation; that, alarming as the progress of the Turks was to all Germany, the fecuring the free exercife of their religion touched them still more nearly, nor could they profecute a foreign war with fpirit, while folicitous and uncertain about their domeftic tranquillity; that if the latter were once rendered firm and permanent, they would concur with their countrymen in pushing the former, and yield to none of them in activity or zeal. But if the danger from the Turkish arms was indeed fo imminent, as not to admit of fuch a delay as would be occafioned by an immediate examination of the controverted points in religion, they required that a diet should be instantly appointed, to which the final fettlement of their religious difputes should be referred; and that in the mean time the decree of the former diet concerning religion should be explained in a point which they deemed effential. By the recess of Spires it was provided, that they fhould enjoy unmolefted the public exercise of their religion, until the meeting of a legal council; but as the pope had now called a council, to which Ferdinand had required them to fubmit, they began to fufpect that their adverfaries might take advantage of an ambiguity in the terms of the recefs, and pretending that the event therein mentioned had now taken place, might pronounce them to be no longer entitled to the fame indulgence. In order to guard against this interpretation, they renewed their former remonstrances against a council called to meet without the bounds of the empire, fummoned by the pope's authority, and in which he assume the right of prefiding; and declared that, notwithstanding the convocation of any fuch illegal assembly, they still held the recefs of the late diet to be in full force.

At other junctures, when the emperor thought it of advantage to foothe and gain the protestants, he had devifed expedients for giving them fatisfaction with regard to demands feemingly more extravagant; but his views at prefent being very different, Ferdinand, by his command, adhered inflexibly to his first propositions, and would make no conceffions which had the most remote tendency to throw difcredit on the council, or to weaken its authority. The protestants, on their part, were no less inflexible; and after much time spent in fruitless endeavours to convince each other, they came to no agreement. Nor did the prefence of the emperor, who upon his recovery arrived at Worms [May 15,] contribute in any degree to render the protestants more compliant. Fully convinced that they were maintaining the caufe of God and of truth, they fhewed themfelves fuperior to the allurements of interest, or the fuggestions of fear; and in proportion as the emperor redoubled his folicitations, or difcovered his defigns, their boldnefs feems to have increased. At last they openly declared, that they would not even deign to vindicate their tenets in prefence of a council, affembled not to examine, but to condemn them; and that they would pay no regard to an affembly held un. der the influence of a pope, who had already precluded himfelf from all title to act as a judge, by his having fligmatized their opinions with the name of herefy, and denounced against them the heaviest censures, which, in the plenitude of his usurped power, he could inflict*.

While the protestants, with fuch union as well as firmnefs, rejected all intercourfe with the council, and refufed their affent to the Imperial demands, in refpect to the Turkifh war, Maurice of Saxony alone fhewed an inclination to gratify the emperor with regard to both. Though he profeffed an inviolable regard for the protestant religion, he affumed an appearance of moderation peculiar to himfelf, by which he confirmed the favourable fentiments which the emperor already entertained of him, and gradually paved the way for executing the ambitious defigns which always occupied his active and enterprifing mindt. His example, however, had little influence upon fuch as agreed with him in their religious opinions; and Charles perceived that he could not hope either to procure prefent aid from the protestants against the Turks, or to quiet their fears and jealousies on account of their religion. But as his fchemes were not yet ripe for execution, nor his preparations fo far advanced that he could force the compliance of the protestants, or punish their obftinacy, he artfully concealed his own intentions. That he might augment their fecurity, he [August 4] appointed a diet to be held at Ratifbon early next year, in order to adjust what was now left undetermined; and previous to it, he agreed that a certain number of divines of each party should meet, in order to confer upon the points in difputes.

But, how far foever this appearance of a defire to maintain the prefent tranquillity might have imposed upon the protestants, the emperor was incapable of fuch uniform and thorough diffimulation, as to hide altogether from their view the dangerous defigns which he was meditating against them. Herman count de Weid, archbishop and elector of Cologne, a prelate confpicuous for his virtue and primitive fimplicity of manners, though not more diffinguished for learning than the other defeendants of noble families, who in that age possessed most of the great benefices in Germany, having become a profelyte, to the doctrines of the reformers, had begun in the year one thousand five hundred and forty-three, with the affiftance of Melancthon and Bucer, to abolish the ancient superstition in his diocefe, and to introduce in its place the rites effablished among the proteftants. But the canons of his cathedral, who were not poffeffed with the fame fpirit of innovation, and who forefaw how fatal the levelling genius of the new fect would prove to their dignity and wealth, opposed, from the beginning, this unprecedented enterprife of their archbishop, with all the zeal flowing from reverence for old inftitutions, heightened by concern for their own intcreft. This opposition, which the archbishop confidered only as a new argument to demonstrate the necessity of a reformation, neither shook his refolution, nor flackened his ardour in profecuting his plan, the canons, perceiving all their endeavours to check his career to be ineffectual, folemnly protefted against his proceed. ings, and appealed for redrefs to the pope and emperor, the former as ecclefiaftical, the latter as his civil fuperior. This appeal being laid before the emperor, during his refidence in Worms, he took the canous of Cologne under his immediate protection; enjoined them to proceed with rigour against all who revolted from the eftablished church; prohibited the archbishop to make any innovation in his diocefe; and fummoned him to appear at Bruffels within thirty days, to anfwer the accufations which fhould be preferred against him ‡.

To this clear evidence of his hoftile intentions against the protestant party, Charles added other proofs still more explicit. In his hereditary dominions of the Low-Countries, he perfecuted all who were fuspected of Lutheranism with unrelenting rigour. As foon as he arrived at Worms, he filenced the protestant preachers in that city. He allowed an Italian monk to inveigh against the Lutherans from the pulpit of his chapel, and to call upon him, as he regarded the favour of God, to exterminate that peffilent herefy. He difpatched the embassify, which has been already mentioned, to Constantinople, with overtures of peace, that he might be free from any apprehensions of danger or interruption from that quarter. Nor did any of these steps, or their dangerous tendency, escape the jealous observation of the protestants, or fail to alarm their fears, and to excite theirfolicitude for the fastety of their fect.

Meanwhile, Charles's good fortune, which predominated on all occasions over that of his rival Francis, extricated him out of a difficulty, from which, with all his fagacity and addrefs, he would have found it no eafy matter to have difentangled himfelf. Juft about the time when the duke of Or-Icans should have received Ferdinand's daughter in marriage, and together with her the poffeffion of the Milanefe, he died of a malignant fever [Sept. 8]. By this event, the empe-For was freed from the neceffity of giving up a valuable province into the hands of an enemy, or from the indecency of violating a recent and folemn engagement, which must have occafioned an immediate rupture with France. He affected, however, to exprefs great forrow for the untimely death of a young prince, who was to have been fo nearly allied to kim; but he carefully avoided entering into any fresh discuffions concerning the Milanefe; and would not liften to a propofal which came from Francis of new-modelling the treaty of Crefpy, fo as to make him fome reparation for the advantages which he had loft by the demife of his fon. In the more active and vigorous part of Francis's reign, a declaration of war would have been the certain and inftantaneous confequence of fuch a flat refufal to comply with a demand feemingly fo equitable; but the declining flate of his own health, the exhausted condition of his kingdom, together with the burden of the war against England, obliged, him, at prefent, to diffemble his refertment, and to put off thoughts of revenge to fome other juncture. In confequence of this event, the unfortunate duke of Savoy loft all hope of obtaining the reflitution of his territories; and the rights or claims relinquifhed by the treaty of Crefpy returned in full force to the crown of France, to ferve as pretexts for future wars*.

Upon the first intelligence of the duke of Orleans's death, the confederates of Smalkalde flattered themfelves that the effential alterations which appeared to be unavoidable confequences of it could hardly fail of producing a rupture, which would prove the means of their fafety. But they were not more difappointed with regard to this, than in their expectations from an event which feemed to be the certain prelude of a quarrel between the emperor and the pope. When Paul, whole paffion for aggrandizing his family increafed as he advanced in years, and as he faw the dignity and power which they derived immediately from him becoming more precarious, found that he could not bring Charles to approve of his ambitious fchemes, he ventured to grant his fon Peter Lewis the investiture of Parma and Placentia, though at the rifk of incurring the difpleafure of the emperor. At a time when a great part of Europe inveighed openly against the corrupt manners and exorbitant power of ecclefiaftics, and when a council was fummoned to reform the diforders in the church, this indecent grant of fuch a principality, to a fon of whofe illegitimate birth the pope ought to have been afhamed, and whofe licentious morals all good men detefted, gave general offence. Some cardinals in the Imperial intereft remonftrated against fuch an unbecoming alienation of the patrimony of the church; the Spanish ambaffador would not be prefent at the folemnity of his infeoffment, and upon pretext that these cities were part of the Milanefe ftate, the emperor peremptorily refufed to confirm the deed of invefliture. But both the emperor and pope being intent upon one common object in Germany, they facrificed their particular paffions to that public caufe, and fupprefied the emotions of jealoufy or refentment which were rifing on this occasion, that they might jointly purfue what each deemed to be of greater importance*.

About this time the peace of Germany was diffurbed by a violent but fhort eruption of Henry duke of Brunfwick. This prince, though fill fiript of his dominions, which the emperor held in fequeftration, until his differences with the confederates of Smalkalde should be adjusted, posseffed however fo much credit in Germany, that he undertook to raife for the French king a confiderable body of troops to be employed in the war against England. The money flipulated for this purpofe was duly advanced by Francis; the troopswere levied; but Henry, infread of leading them towards France, fuddenly entered his own dominions at their head,in hopes of recovering poffettion of them before any army could be affembled to oppose him. The confederates were not more furprifed at this unexpected attack, than the king of France was aftonished at a mean thievish fraud, fo unbecoming the character of a prince. But the landgrave of Heffe, with incredible expedition, collected as many men as put a ftop to the progress of Henry's undifciplined forces,. and being joined by his fon-in-law, Maurice, and by fome troops belonging to the elector of Saxony, he gained fuchadvantages over Henry, who was rafh and bold in forming his fchemes, but feeble and undetermined in executing them, as obliged him to difband his army, and to furrender himfelf, together with his eldeft fon, prifoners at difcretion. He was kept in close confinement, until a new reverse of affairsprocured him liberty+.

As this defeat of Henry's wild enterprife added new reputation to the arms of the proteftants, the eftablishment of the proteftant religion in the palatinate brought a great acceffions of ftrength to their party. Frederick, who fucceeded his brother Lewis in that electorate, had long been fufpected of a fecret propenfity to the doctrines of the reformers, which, upon his acceffion to the principality, he openly manifested. But as heexpected that fomething effectual towards a general and legal eltablishment of religion, would be the fruit of fo many diets, conferences, and negotiations, he did not, at first, attempt any public innovation in his dominions. Finding all these iffue in nothing, he thought himfelf called, at length [ Jan. 10, 1546], to countenance by his authority the fystem which he approved of, and to gratify the wifhes of his fubjects, who, by their intercourfe with the protestant states, had almost univerfally imbibed their opinions. As the warmth and impetuofity, which accompanied the fpirit of reformation in its first efforts, had fomewhat abated, this change was made with great order and regularity; the ancient rites were abolished, and new forms introduced, without any acts of violence, or fymptom of difcontent. Though Frederick adopted the religious fystem of the protestants, he imitated the example of Maurice, and did not accede to the league of Smalkalde +.

A few weeks before this revolution in the palatinate, the general council was opened with the accuftomed folemuities at Trent. The eyes of the catholic flates were turned with much expectation towards an affembly, which all had confidered as capable of applying an effectual remedy for the diforders of the church when they first broke out, though many were afraid that it was now too late to hope for great benefit from it, when the malady, by being fuffered to increafe during twenty-cight years, had become inveterate, and grown to fuch extreme violence. The pope, by his laft bull of convocation, had appointed the first meeting to be held in March. But his views and those of the emperor were fo different, that almost the whole year was spent in negotiations. Charles, who forefaw that the rigorous decrees of the council against the protestants would foon + Sleid. 356. Seck. l. iii. 616.

drive them, in felf-defence as well as from refentment, to fome desperate extreme, laboured to put off its meeting until his warlike peparations were fo far advanced, that he might be in a condition to fecond its decifions by the force of his arms. The pope, who had early fent to Trent the legates who were to prefide in his name, knowing to what contempt it would expose his authority, and what fuspicions it would beget of his intentions, if the fathers of the council fhould remain in a ftate of inactivity, when the church was in fuch danger as to require their immediate and vigorous interpolition, inlifted either upon translating the council." to fome city in Italy, or upon fufpending altogether its proceedings at that juncture, or upon authorizing it to begin its deliberations immediately. The emperor rejected the two former expedients as equally offenfive to the Germans of every denomination; but finding it impoffible to elude the latter, he proposed that the council should begin with reforming the diforders in the church, before it proceeded. to examine or define articles of faith. This was the very thing which the court of Rome dreaded moft, and which had prompted it to employ fo many artifices in order to prevent the meeting of fuch a dangerous judicatory. Paul, though more compliant than fome of his predeceffors with regard to calling a council, was no lefs jealous than they had been of its jurifdiction, and faw what matter of triumph fuch a method of proceeding would afford the heretics. He apprehended confequences not only humbling but fatal to the papal fee, if the council came to confider an inqueft into abufes as their only bufinefs; or if inferior prelates were allowed to gratify their own envy and peevilhnefs, by preferibing rules to those who are exalted above them in dignity and power. Without liftening, therefore, to this infidious propofal of the emperor, he inftructed his legates to open the council.

Jan. 18] The first fession was spent in matters of form. In a subsequent one, it was agreed that the framing a con-feffion of faith, wherein should be contained all the articles which the church required its members to believe ought to be the first and principal business of the council; but that at the fame time, due attention should be given to what was neceffary towards the reformation of manners and discipline. From this first fymptom of the spirit with which the council was animated, from the high tone of authority which the legates who prefided in it affumed, and from the implicit deference with which most of the members followed their directions, the protestants conjectured with ease what decifions they might expect. It aftonished them, however to fee forty prelates (for no greater number were yet affembled) affume authority as reprefentatives of the univerfal church, and proceed to determine the most important points of doctrine in its name. Senfible of this indecency, as well as of the ridicule with which it might be attended, the council advanced flowly in its deliberations, and all its proceedings were for fome time languishing and feeble *. As foon as the confederates of Smalkalde received information of the opening of the council, they published a long manifesto, containing a renewal of their protest against its meeting, together with the reafons which induced them to decline its jurifdictions t. The pope and emperor, on their , part, were fo little folicitous to quicken or add vigour to its operations, as plainly difcovered that fome object of greater importance occupied and interefted them.

The proteftants were not inattentive or unconcerned fpectators of the motions of the fovereign pontiff and of Charles, and they entertained every day more violent fufpicions of their intentions, in confequence of intelligence received from different quarters of the machinations carrying on against them. The king of England informed them, that the emperor, having long refolved to exterminate their opinions, would not fail to employ this interval of tranquillity which he now enjoyed, as the most favourable juncture for carrying his defign into execution. The merchants of Augfburg, which was at that time a city of extensive trade, received advice, by means of their correspondents in Italy, among whom were fome who fecretly favoured the proteftant cause 6, that a dangerous confederacy against it was forming between the pope and emperor. In confirmation of this they heard from the Low-Countries, that Charles had iffued orders, though with every precaution which could keep the meafure concealed, for raifing troops both there and in other parts of his dominions. Such a variety of information and corroborating all that their own jealoufy or obfervation led them to apprchend, left the proteflants little reason to doubt of the emperor's hostile intentions. Under this impreffion, the deputies of the confederates of Smalkalde affembled at Francfort, and by communicating their intelligence and fentiments to each other, reciprocally heightened their fenfe of the impending danger. But their union was not fuch as their fituation required, or the preparations of their enemies rendered neceffary. Their league had now fubfifted ten years. Among fo many members, whofe territories were intermingled with each other, and who, according to the cuftom of Germany, had created an infinite variety of mutual rights and claims by infermarriages, alliances, and contracts of different kinds, fubjects of jealoufy and difcord had unavoidably arifen. Some of the confederates, being connected with the duke of Brunfwick, were highly difgusted with the landgrave, on account of the rigour with which he had treated that rash and unfortunate prince. Others taxed the elector of Saxony and landgrave, the heads of the league, with having involved the members in unneceffary and exorbitant expences by their profuseness or want of economy. ing extremely different, rendered all its motions languid, at a time when the utmost vigour and dispatch were requisite. The landgrave, of a violent and enterprifing temper, but not forgetful, amidst his zeal for religion, of the usual maxims of human policy, infifted that as the danger which threatened them was manifest and unavoidable, they should have recourfe to the most effectual expedient for fecuring their own fafety, by courting the protection of the kings of France and England, or by joining in alliance with the protestant: cantons of Swifferland, from whom they might expect fuch powerful and prefent affistance as their fituation demanded. The elector on the other hand, with the most upright intentions of any prince in that age, and with talents which might have qualified him abundantly for the administration of government in any tranquil period, was poffeffed with fuch fuperfitious veneration for all the parts of the Luther-an fystem, and fuch bigotted attachment to all its tenets, as : made him averfe to an union with those who differed from him in any article of faith, and rendered him very incapable. of undertaking its defence in times of difficulty and danger. He feemed to think, that the concerns of religion were to be regulated by principles and maxims totally different from those which apply to the common affairs of life; and being. fwayed too much by the opinions of Luther, who was not only a stranger to the rules of political conduct, but despiled. them; he often discovered an uncomplying spirit, that proved of the greatest detriment to the caufe which he wished to fupport. Influenced, on this occasion, by the fevere and rigid notions of that reformer, he refufed to enter into any confederacy with Francis, becaufe he was a perfecutor of the truth; or to folicit the friendship of Henry, because he was no less impious and profane than the pope himfelf; or even to join in alliance with the Swifs, becaufe they differed from the Germans in feveral effential articles of faith. This diffenfion, about a point of fuch confequence, produced its natural effects. Each fecretly cenfured and reproached the other. The landgrave confidered the elector as fettered by narrow prejudices, unworthy of a prince called to act a chief part in a scene of fuch importance. The elector fulpected the landgrave of loofe principles and ambitious views, which corresponded ill with the facred caufe wherein they were engaged. But though the elector's fcruples prevented their timely application for foreign aid; and the jealoufy or difcontent of the other princes defeated a propofal for renewing their original confederacy, the term during which it was to continue in force being on the point of expiring; yct the fenfe of their common danger induced them to agree with regard to other points, particularly that they would never acknowledge the affembly at Trent as a lawful council, nor fuffer the archbishop of Cologne to be oppressed on account of the fteps which he had taken towards the reformation of his diocefe*.

The landgrave, about this time, defirous of penetrating to the bottom of the emperor's intentions, wrote to Granvelle, whom he knew to be thoroughly acquainted with all his mafter's fehemes, informing him of the feveral particulars which raifed the fufpicions of the protestants, and begging an explicit declaration of what they had to fear or to hope. Granvelle, in return, affured them, that the intelligence which they had received of the emperor's military preparations was exaggerated, and all their fuspicions deflitute of foundation; that though, in order to guard his frontiers against any infult of the French or English, he had commanded a small body of men to be raised in the Low-Countries, he was as folicitous as ever to maintain tranquillity in Germany+.

But the emperor's actions did not correspond with these professions of his minister. For instead of appointing men of known moderation and a pacific temper to appear in defence of the catholic doctrines at the conference which had been agreed on, he made choice of fierce bigots, attached to their own fyftem with a blind obflinacy, that rendered all hope of a reconcilement defperate. Malvenda, a Spanifh divine, who took upon him the conduct of the debate on the part of the catholics, managed it with all the fubtle dexterity of a feholaftic metaphyfician, more fludious to perplex his adverfaries than to convince them, and more intent on palliating error than on difcovering truth. The proteftants, filled with indignation, as well at his fophiftry as at fome regulations which the emperor endeavoured to impofe on the difputants, broke off the conference abruptly, being now fully convinced that, in all his late meafures, the emperor could have no other view than to amufe them, and to gain time for ripening his own fchemes*.

BOOK VIII.

WHILE appearances of danger daily increased, and the tempeft which had been fo long a gathering was ready to break forth in all its violence against the protestant church, Luther was faved, by a feafonable death, from feeling or beholding its destructive rage. Having gone, though in a declining flate of health, and during a rigorous feafon, to his native city of Eysleben, in order to compose, by his authority, a diffension among the counts of Mansfield, he was feized with a violent inflammation in his ftomach, which in a few days put an end to his life, in the fixty-third year of his age [Feb. 18]. As he was raifed up by Providence to be the author of one of the greatest and most interesting revolutions recorded in hiftory, there is not any perfon perhaps whofe character has been drawn with fuch oppofite colours. In his own age, one party, ftruck with horror and inflamed' with rage, when they faw with what a daring hand he overturned every thing which they held to be facred, or valued as beneficial, imputed to him not only all the defects and vices of a man, but the qualities of a demon. The other, warmed with the admiration and gratitude, which they thought he merited as the reftorer of light and liberty to the Christian church, ascribed to him perfections above the condition of humanity, and viewed all his actions with a veneration bordering on that which should be paid only to those who are guided by the immediate inspiration of Heaven. It is his own conduct, not the undiffinguishing cenfure or the exaggerated praife of his contemporaries, that ought to regulate the opinions of the prefent age concerning him. Zeal for what he regarded as truth, undaunted intrepidity to maintain his own fystem, abilities, both natural and acquired, to defend his principles, and unwearied induftry in propagating them, are virtues which fhine fo confpicuoufly in every part of his behaviour, that even his enemies must allow him to have posseffed them in an eminent. degree. To these may be added, with equal justice, such. purity and even aufterity of manners, as became one who affumed the character of a Reformer; fuch fanctity of life as fuited the doctrine which he delivered; and fuch perfect difinterestedness as affords no slight presumption of his fincerity. Superior to all felfish confiderations, a stranger to the elegancies of life, and defpifing its pleafures, he left the honours and emoluments of the church to his difciples, remaining fatisfied himfelf in his original state of professor in the univerfity, and paflor of the town of Wittemberg, with the moderate appointments annexed to these offices. His extraordinary qualities were allayed with no inconfiderable mixture of human frailty and human paffions. Thefe, however, were of fuch a nature, that they cannot be imputed to malevolence or corruption of heart, but feem to have taken their rife from the fame fource with many of his virtues. His mind, forcible and vehement in all its operations, roufed by great objects, or agitated by violent paffions, broke out, on many occasions, with an impetuofity which aftonishes men of feebler fpirits, or fuch as are placed in a more tranquil fituation. By carrying fome praife-worthy difpofitions to excefs, he bordered fome times on what was culpable, and was often betrayed into actions which exposed him to cenfure. His confidence that his own opinions were well-founded, approached to arrogance; his courage in afferting them, to rashness; his firmues in adhering to them, to obstinacy; and his zeal in confuting his adverfaries, to rage and fourrility. Accustomed himfelf to confider every thing as fubordinate to truth, he expected the fame deference for it from other men; and without making any allowances for their timidity or prejudices, he poured forth against fuch as difappointed him in this particular, a torrent of invective mingled with contempt. Regardless of any diffinction of rank or character when his doctrines were attacked, he chaftifed all his adverfaries indiferiminately, with the fame rough hand; neither the royal dignity of Henry VIII. nor the eminent learning and abilities of Erafmus, fcreened them from the fame grofs abufe with which he treated Tetzel or Eccius.

But thefe indecencies of which Luther was guilty, mult not be imputed wholly to the violence of his temper. They ought to be charged in part on the manners of the age. Among a rude people, unacquainted with thofe maxims, which, by putting continual reftraint on the paffions of individuals, have polifhed fociety, and rendered it agreeable, difputes of every kind were managed with heat, and ftrong emotions were uttered in their natural language without referve or delicacy. At the fame time, the works of learned men were all composed in Latin, and they were not only authorized, by the example of eminent writers in that language, to use their antagonist with the most illiberal feurrility; but, in a dead tongue, indecencies of every kind appear lefs shocking than in a living language, whose idioms and phrafes feem gross, because they are familiar.

In paffing judgment upon the characters of men, we ought to try them by the principles and maxims of their own age, not by those of another. For although virtue and vice are at all times the fame, manners and cuftoms vary continually. Some parts of Luther's behaviour, which appear to us moft culpable, gave no difgust to his contemporaries. It was even by fome of those qualities, which we are now apt to blame, that he was fitted for accomplifting the great work which he undertook. To roufe mankind, when funk in ignorance or fuperfition, and to encounter the rage of bigotry armed with power, required the utmost vehemence of zeal, as well as a temper daring to excels. A gentle call would neither have reached, nor have excited those to whom it was addreffed. A spirit more amiable, but less vigorous than Luther's, would have fhrunk back from the dangers which he braved and furmounted. Towards the clofc of Luther's life, tho' without any perceptible diminution of his zeal or abilities, the infirmities of his temper increased upon him, fo that he grew daily more peevifh, more irafcible, and more impatient of contradiction. Having lived to be a witness of his own amazing fuccefs; to fee a great part of Europe embrace his doctrines; and to fhake the foundation of the papal throne, before which the mightieft monarchs had trembled, he discovered, on some occasions, symptoms of vanity and felf-applause. He must have been, indeed, more than man, if, upon contemplating all that he actually accomplifued, he had never felt any fentiment of this kind rifing in his breaft*.

* A remarkable inftance of this, as well as of a certain fingularity and elevation of fentiment, is found in his Laft Will. The' the effects which he had to bequeath were very inconfiderable, he thought it neceffary to make a Teftament, but foorned to frame it with the ufual legal formalities. Notus fum, fays he, in caclo, in terra, & inferno, & auctoritatem ad hoc fufficientem habeo, ut mihi foli credatur, cum Deus mihi, homiui licet damnabili, et miferabili peccatori, ex paterna mifericordia Evangelium filii fui crediderit, dederitque ut in eo verax & fidelis fuerim, ita ut multi in mundo illud per me acceperint, & me pro Doctore veritatis ag-

Some time before his death he felt his ftrength declining, his conftitution being worn out by a prodigious multiplicity of bufinefs, added to the labour of difcharging his ministerial function with unremitting diligence, to the fatigue of conftant fludy, belides the composition of works as voluminous as if he had enjoyed uninterrupted leifure and retirement. His natural intrepidity did not forfake him at the approach of death; his last conversation with his friends was concerning the happinels referved for good men in a future life, of which he fpoke with the fervor and delight natural to one who expected and wished to enter foon upon the enjoyment of it +. The account of his death filled the Roman catholic party with exceflive as well as indecent joy, and damped the fpirits of all his followers; neither party fufficiently confidering that his doctrines were now fo firmly rooted, as to be in a condition to flourish independent of the hand which had first planted them. His funeral was celebrated by order of the elector of Saxony with extraordinary pomp. He left feveral children by his wife Catherine a Boria, who furvived him. Towards the end of the laft century, there were in Saxony fome of his defcendants in decent and honourable stations 1.

The emperor, meanwhile, purfued the plan of diffimulation with which he had fet out, employing every art to amuse the protostants, and to quiet their fears and jealousies. For this purpofe he contrived to have an interview with the landgrave of Heffe, the most active of all the confederates, and the most fuspicious of his defigns. To him he made fuch warm professions of his concern for the happiness of Germany, and of his averfion to all violent measures; he denied in fuch express terms, his having entered into any. league, or having begun any military peparations which should give any just cause of alarm to the protestants, as. feem to have difpelled all the landgrave's doubts and apprehenfions, and fent him away fully fatisfied of his pacific intentions. This artifice was of great advantage, and effectually answered the purpose for which it was employed. The landgrave, upon his leaving Spires, where he had been admitted to this interview, went to Worms, where the Smalkaldic confederates were affembled, and gave them fuch a flattering reprefentation of the emperor's favourable difpofition towards them, that they, who were too apt, as well from the temper of the German nation, as from the genius of all great affociations or bodies of men, to be flow, and dilatory, and undecifive in their deliberations, thought there was no neceffity of taking any immediate measures against danger, which appeared to be diftant or imaginary *.

Such events, however, foon occurred, as flaggered the credit which the protestants had given to the emperor's declarations. The council of Trent, though still compofed of a small number of Italian and Spanish prelates, without a fingle deputy from many of the kingdoms, which it aflumed a right of binding by its decrees, being ashamed of its long inactivity, proceeded now to fettle articles of the greatest importance. Having begun with examining the first and chief point in controverfy between the church of Rome and the reformers, concerning the rule which fhould' be held as supreme and decisive in matters of faith, the council, by its infallible authority, determined [Apr. 8], " That the books to which the defignation of Apocryphal" hath been given, are of equal authority with those which were received by the Jews and primitive Chriftians into the facred canon; that the traditions handed down from the apoftolic age, and preferved in the church, are entitled to as much regard as the doctrines and precepts which the infpired authors have committed to writing; that the Latin tranflation of the Scriptures, made or revifed by St. Jerome, and known by the name of the Vulgate translation, should be read in churches, and appealed to in the fehools as authentic and canonical." Against all who difelaimed the truth of these tenets, anathemas were denounced in the name and by the authority of the Holy Ghost. The decision of these points, which undermined the main foundation of the Lutheran fystem, was a plain warning to the protestants what judgment they might expect when the council should have leifure to take into consideration the particular and fubordinate articles of their creed §.

This difcovery of the council's readinefs to condemn the opinions of the protestants, was foon followed by a ftriking inflance of the pope's refolution to punish fuch as embraced them. The appeal of the canons of Cologne against their archbishop having been carried to Rome, Paul eagerly feized on that opportunity, both of difplaying the extent of his own authority, and of teaching the German ecclefiaftics the danger of revolting from the established church. As no perfon appeared in behalf of the archbishop, he was held to be convicted of the crime of herefy, and a papal bull was iffued [Apr. 16,] depriving him of his ecclefiaftical dignity, inflicting on him the fentence of excommunication, and abfolving his fubjects from the oath of allegiance which they had taken to him as their civil fuperior. The countenance which he had given to the Lutheran herefy was the only crime imputed to him, as well as the only reafon affigned to juffify the extraordinary feverity of this decrec. The protestants could hardly believe that Paul, how zealous foever he might be to defend the established fystem, or to humble those who invaded it, would have ventured to proceed to fuch extremities against a prince and elector of the empire, without having previously fecured fuch powerful protection as would render his cenfure fomething more than an impotent and defpicable fally of refertment. They were of courfe deeply alarmed at this fentence against the archbishop, confidering it as a fure indication of the malevolent intentions not only of the pope, but of the emperor, against the whole party*.

Upon this fresh revival of their fears, with fuch violence as is natural to men roufed from a falfe fecurity, and confcious of their having been deceived, Charles faw that now it became neceffary to throw afide the mask, and to declare openly what part he determined to act. By a long feries of artifice and fallacy, he had gained fo much time, that his measures, though not altogether ripe for execution, were in great forwardnefs. The pope, by his proceedings against the elector of Cologne, as well as by the decree of the council, had precipitated matters into fuch a fituation, as rendered a breach between the emperor and the protestants almost unavoidable. Charles had therefore no choice left him, but either to take part with them in overturning what the feeof Rome had determined, or to support the authority of the church openly by force of arms. Nor did the pope think it enough to have brought the emperor under a neceffity of acting; he preffed him to begin his operations immediately, and to carry them on with fuch vigour as could not fail of fecuring fuccefs. Transported by his zeal againft herefy, Paul forgot all the prudent and cautious maxims of the papal fee, with regard to the danger of extending the imperial authority beyond due bounds; and in order to crush the Lutherans, he was willing to contribute towards raifing up a mafter that might one day prove formidable to himfelf as well as to the reft of Italy.

But, befides the certain expectation of affiftance from the pope, Charles was now fecure from any danger of interruption to his defigns by the Turkish arms. His negotiations at the Porte, which he had carried on with great affiduity fince the peace of Crefpy, were on the point of being terminated in fuch a manner as he defired. Solyman, partly in compliance with the French king, who, in order to avoid the difagreeable obligation of joining the emperor againft his ancient ally, laboured with great zeal to bring about an accommodation between them, and partly from its being neceffary to turn his arms towards the eaft, where the Perfians threatened to invade his dominions, confented without difficulty to a truce for five years. The chief article of it was, That each fhould retain poffeffion of what he now held in Hungary; and Ferdinand, as a facrifice to the pride of the fultan, fubmitted to pay an annual tribute of fifty thoufand crowns+.

But it was upon the aid and concurrence of the Germans themfelves that the emperor relied with the greatest confidence. The Germanic body, he knew, was of fuch vaft flrength, as to be invincible if it were united, and that it was only by employing its own force that he could hope to fubdue it. Happily for him, the union of the feveral members in this great fystem was fo feeble, the whole frame was fo loofely compacted, and its different parts tended fo violently towards feparation from each other, that it was almost impoffible for it, on any important emergence, to join in a general or vigorous effort. In the prefent juncture, the fources, of difeord were as many, and as various, as had been known on any occasion. The Roman catholics, animated with zeal in defence of their religion proportional to the fiercenefs with which it had been attacked, were eager to fecond any attempt to humble those innovators, who had overturned it in many provinces, and endangered it in more. John and Albert of Brandenburg, as well as feveral other princes, incenfed at the haughtinefs and rigour with which the duke of Brunfwick had been treated by the confederates of Smalkalde, were impatient to refcue him, and to be revenged on them. Charles obferved, with fatisfaction, the working of those paffions in their minds, and counting on them as fure auxiliaries whenever he fhould think it proper to act, he found it, in the mean time, more neceffary to moderate than to inflame their rage.

Such was the fituation of affairs, fuch the difcernment with which the emperor forefaw and provided for every event, when the diet of the empire met at Ratifbon. Many of the Roman catholic members appeared there in perfon, but most of the confederates of Smalkalde, under pretence of being unable to bear the expence occafioned by the late unneceffary frequency of fuch affemblies, fent only deputies. Their jealoufy of the emperor, together with an apprehenfion that violence might, perhaps, be employed, in order to force their approbation of what he should propose in the diet, was the true caufe of their absence. The fpeech with which the emperor opened the diet was extremely artful. After profeffing, in common form, his regard for the profpcrity of the Germanic body, and declaring, that, in order to beflow his whole attention upon the re-establishment of its order and tranquillity, he had at prefent abandoned all other cares, rejected the most preffing folicitations of his other fubjects to refide among them, and postponed affairs of the greatest importance; he took notice. with fome difapprobation, that his difinterested example had not been imitated; many members of chief confideration having neglected to attend an affembly to which he had repaired with fuch manifest inconvenience to himfelf. He then mentioned their unhappy diffensions about religion; lamented the ill fuccefs of his paft endcavours to compose them; complained of the abrupt diffolution of the late conference, and craved their advice with regard to the beft and most effectual method of restoring union to the churches of Germany, together with that happy agreement in articles of faith, which their anceftors had found to be of no lefs advantage to their civil intereft, than becoming their Chriftian profession.

By this gracious and popular method of confulting the members of the diet, rather than of obtruding upon them any opinion of his own, befides the appearance of great moderation, and the merit of paying much refpect to their judgment, the emperor dexteroufly avoided difcovering his own fentiments, and referved to himfelf, as his only part, that of carrying into execution what they should recommend. Nor was he lefs fecure of fuch a decifion as he wished to obtain, by referring it wholly to themselves. The Roman catholic members, prompted by their own zeal, or prepared by his intrigues, joined immediately in reprefenting that the authority of the council now met at Trent ought to be fupreme in all matters of controverfy; that all Chriftians should submit to its decrees as the infallible rule of their faith; and therefore they befought him to exert the power, with which he was invefted by the Almighty, in protecting that affembly, and in compelling the protestants to acquiefce in its determinations. The protestants, on the other hand, prefented a memorial, in which, after repeating their objections to the council of Trent, they proposed, as the only effectual method of deciding the points in difpute, that either a free general council should be affembled in Germany, or a national council of the empire should be called, or a felect number of divines fhould be appointed out of each party to examine and define articles of faith. They mentioned the receffes of feveral diets favourable to this propofition, and which had afforded them the profpect of terminating all their differences in this amicable manner; they now conjured the emperor not to depart from his former plan, and by offering violence to their confciences, to bring calamities upon Germany, the very thought of which muft fill every lover of his country with horror. The emperor receiving this paper with a contemptuous fmile, paid no farther regard to it. Having already taken his final refolution, and perceiving that nothing but force could compel them to acquiefce in it, he difpatched the cardinal of Trent to Rome [ June 9], in order to conclude an alliance with the pope, the terms of which were already agreed on; he commanded a body of troops, levied on purpole in the Low-Countries, to advance towards Germany; he gave commiffions to feveral officers for railing men in different parts of the empire; he warned John and Albert of Brandenburg, that now was the proper time of exerting themfelves, in order to refcue their ally, Henry of Brunfwick, from captivity+.

'All these things could not be transacted without the obfervation and knowledge of the protestants. The fecret was now in many hands; under whatever veil the emperor ftill affected to conceal his defigns, his officers kept no fuch mysterious referve; and his allies and fubjects fpoke out his intentions plainly. Alarmed with reports of this kind from every quarter, as well as with the preparations for war which they could not but observe, the deputies of the confederates demanded audience of the emperor, and, in the name of their masters, required to know whether these military preparations were carried on by his command, and for what end, and against what enemy? To a question put in such a tone, and at a time when facts were become too notorious to be denied, it was neceffary to give an explicit anfwer. Charles owned the orders which he had iffued, and profeffing his purpole not to moleft on account of religion those who should act as dutiful subjects; declared, that he had nothing in view but to maintain the rights and prerogatives of the Imperial dignity, and by punishing fome factious members, to preferve the ancient conflitution of the empire from being impaired or diffolved by their irregular and licentious conduct. Though the emperor did not name the perfons whom he charged with fuch high crimes, and deflined to be the objects of his vengeance, it was obvious that he had the elector of Saxony and landgrave of Heffe in view. Their deputies confidering what he had faid, as a plain declaration of his hostile intentions, immediately retired from Ratisbont.

The cardinal of Trent found it no difficult matter to treat with the pope, who having at length brought the emperor to adopt that plan which he had long recommended, affented with eagerness to every article that he proposed. The league was figned [July 26] a few days after the cardinal's arrival at Rome. The pernicious herefies which abounded in Germany, the obftinacy of the protestants in rejecting the holy council affembled at Trent, and the neceffity of maintaining found doctrine, together with good order in the church, are mentioned as the motives of this union between the contracting parties. In order to check the growth of these evils, and to punish such as had impiously contributed to fpread them, the emperor, having long and without fuccefs made trial of gentler remedies, engaged infantly to take the field with a sufficient army, that he might compel all who difowned the council, or had apoftatized from the religion of their forefathers, to return into the bofom of the church, and fubmit with due obedience to the holy see. He likewise bound himself not to conclude a peace with them during fix months without the pope's confent, nor without affigning him his fhare in any conquefts which should be made upon them; and that even after this. period he should not agree to any accommodation which might be detrimental to the church, or to the interest of religion. On his part, the pope stipulated to deposit a large fum in the bank of Venice towards defraying the expence of the war; to maintain, at his own charge, during the fpace of fix months, twelve thousand foot, and five hundred horse; to grant the emperor, for one year, half of the ecclefiaftical revenues throughout Spain; to authorize him, by a bull, to alienate as much of the lands, belonging to religious houses in that country, as would amount to the fum of five hundred thousand crowns; and to employ not only spiritual cen-+ Sleid. 376.

fures, but military force, against any prince who should attempt to interrupt or defeat the execution of this treaty.

Notwithstanding the explicit terms in which the extirpation of herefy was declared to be the object of the war which was to follow upon this treaty, Charles still endeavoured to perfuade the Germans that he had no defign to abridge their religious liberty, but that he aimed only at vindicating his own authority, and reprefling the infolence of fuch as had encroached upon it. With this view, he wrote circular letters in the fame ftrain with his answer to the deputies at Ratifbon, to most of the free cities, and to leveral of the princes who had embraced the protestant doctrines. In these he complained loudly, but in general terms, of the contempt into which the Imperial dignity had fallen, and of the prefumptuous as well as diforderly behaviour of fome members of the empire. He declared that he now took arms, not in a religious, but in a civil quarrel; not to opprefs any who continued to behave as quiet and dutiful fubjects, but to humble the arrogance of fuch as had thrown off all fenfe of that fubordination in which they were placed under him as head of the Germanic body. Gross as this deception was, and manifest as it might have appeared to all who confidered the emperor's conduct with attention, it became neceffary for him to make trial of its effect; and fuch was the confidence and dexterity with which he employed it, that he derived the most folid advantages from this artifice. If he had avowed at once an intention of overturning the protestant church, and of reducing all Germany under its former state of subjection to the papal see, none of the cities or princes who had embraced the new opinions could have remained neutral after fuch a declaration, far lefs could they have ventured to affift the emperor in fuch an enterprife. Whereas by concealing, and even difclaiming any intention of that kind, he not only faved himfelf from the danger of being overwhelmed by a general confederacy of all the pro-teftant flates, but he furnished the timid with an excuse for continuing inactive, and the defigning or interefled with a pretext for joining him, without exposing themfelves to the infamy of abandoning their own principles, or taking part openly in supprefling them. At the fame time the emperor well knew, that if, by their affistance, he were enabled to break the power of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave, he might afterwards preferibe what terms he pleafed to the feeble remains of a party without union, and deflitute of leaders, who would then regret, too late, their missaken confidence in him, and their inconfiderate defertion of their affociates.

The pope, by a fudden and unforefeen difplay of his zeal, had well nigh difconcerted this plan which the emperor had formed with fo much care and art. Proud of having been the author of fuch a formidable league against the Lutheran herefy, and happy in thinking that the glory of extirpating it was referved for his pontificate, he published the articles of his treaty with the emperor, in order to demonftrate the pious intention of their confederacy, as well as to difplay his own zeal, which prompted him to make fuch extraordinary efforts for maintaining the faith in its purity. Not fatisfied with this, he foon after iffued a bull, containing most liberal promifes of indulgence to all who should engage in this holy enterprife, together with warm exhortations to fuch as could not bear a part in it themfelves, to increafe the fervour of their prayers, and the feverity of their mortifications, that they might draw down the bleffing of Heaven upon those who undertook it*. Nor was it zeal alone which pushed the pope to make declarations fo inconfistent with the account which the emperor himfelf gave of his motives for taking arms. He was much fcandalized at Charles's diffimulation in fuch a caufe; at his feeming to be ashamed of owning his zeal for the church, and at his endeavours to make that pass for a political conteft, which he ought to have gloried in as a war which had no other object than the defence of religion. With as muchfolicitude, therefore, as the emperor laboured to difguife the purpofe of the confederacy, did the pope endeavour to publish their real plan, in order that they might come at once to an open rupture with the protestants, that all hope of reconcilement might be cut off, and that Charles might be under fewer temptations, and have it lefs in his power than at prefent, to betray the interests of the church by any accommodation beneficial to himfelf †.

The emperor, though not a little offended at the pope's indifcretion or malice in making this difcovery, continued boldly to purfue his own plan, and to affert his intentions to be no other than what he had originally avowed. Several of the proteflant flates, whom he had previoufly gained, thought themfelves juftified, in fome meafure, by his declarations, for abandoning their affociates, and even for giving affiftance to him.

But these artifices did not impose on the greater and founder part of the protestant confederates. They clearly perceived it to be against the reformed religion that the emperor had taken arms, and that not only the suppression of it, but the extinction of the German liberties, would be the certain confequence of his obtaining fuch an entire funeriority as would enable him to execute his fchemes in their full extent. They determined, therefore, to prepare for their own defence, and neither to renounce those religious truths, to the knowledge of which they had attained by means fo wonderful, nor to abandon those civil rights which had been transmitted to them by their ancestors. In order to give the neceffary directions for this purpose, their deputies met at Ulm, foon after their abrupt departure from Ratifbon. Their deliberations were now conducted with fuch vigour and unanimity, as the imminent danger which threatered them required. The contingent of troops, which each of the confederates was to furnish, having been fixed by the original treaty of union, orders were given for bringing them immediately into the field. Being fensible, at last, that through the narrow prejudices of fome of their members, and the imprudent fecurity of others, they had neglected too long to strengthen themselves by foreign alliances, they now applied with great earness to the Venetians and Swifs.

To the Venetians they reprefented the emperor's intention of overturning the prefent fyftem of Germany, and of raifing himfelf to abfolute power in that country by means of foreign force furnished by the pope; they warned them how fatal this event would prove to the liberties of Italy, and that by fuffering Charles to acquire unlimited authority in the one country, they would foon feel his dominion to be no lefs defpotic in the other; they befought them, therefore, not to grant a passage through their territories to those troops, which ought to be treated as common enemies, becaufe by fubduing Germany they prepared chains for the reft of Europe. These reflections had not escaped the fagacity of those wife republicans. They had communicated their fentiments to the pope, and had endeavoured to divert him from an alliance, which tended to render irrefiftible the power of a potentate, whole ambition he already knew to be boundlefs. But they had found Paul fo eager in the profecution of his own plan, that he difregarded all their remonstrances t. This attempt to alarm the pope having proved unfuccefsful, they declined doing any thing more towards preventing the dangers which they forefaw; and in return to the application from the confederates of Smalkalde, they informed them, that they could not obftruct the march of the pope's troops through an open country, but by levying an army ftrong enough to face them in the field; and that this would draw upon themfelves the whole weight of his as well as of the emperor's indignation. For the fame reafon they declined lending a fum of money, which the elector of Saxony and landgrave proposed to borrow of them, towards carrying on the war *.

The demands of the confederates upon the Swifs were not confined to the obfiructing of the entrance of foreiguers into Germany; they required of them, as the neareft neighbours and clofeft allies of the empire, to interpofe with their wonted vigour for the prefervation of its liberties, and not to ftand as inactive fpectators, while their brethren were opprefied and enflaved. But with whatever zeal fome of the cantons might have been difpofed to act when the caufe of the reformation was in danger, the Helvetic body was fo divided with regard to religion, as to render it unfafe for the proteftants to take any flep without confulting their catholic affociates; and among them the emiffaries of the pope and emperor had fuch influence, that a refolution of maintaining an exact neutrality between the contending parties was the utmoft which could be procured §.

Being difappointed in both thefe applications, the proteftants, not long after, had recourfe to the kings of France and England; the approach of danger either overcoming the elector of Saxony's feruples, or obliging him to yield to the importunities of his affociates. The fituation of the two monarchs flattered them with hopes of fuccefs. Tho<sup>7</sup> hoftilities between them had continued for fome time after the peace of Crefpy, they became weary at laft of a war, attended with no glory or advantage to either, and had lately terminated all their differences by a peace concluded at Campe near Ardres. Francis having with great difficulty procured his allies, the Scots, to be included in the treaty, in return for that conceffion he engaged to pay a great fum which Henry demanded as due to him on feveral accounts, and he left Boulogne in the hands of the English as a pledge for his faithful performance of that article. But though the re-establishment of peace feemed to leave the two monarchs at liberty to turn their attention towards Germany, fo unfortunate were the protestants, that they derived no immediate advantage from this circumstance. Henry appeared unwilling to enter into any alliance with them, but on fuch conditions as would render him not only the head, hut the fupreme director of their league; a pre-eminence which, as the bonds of union or intereft between them were but feeble, and as he differed from them fo widely in his religious fentiments, they had no inclination, to admit +. Francis, more powerfully inclined by political confiderations to afford them affiliance, found his kingdom fo much exhausted by a long war, and was fo much afraid of irritating the pope, by entering into close union with excommunicated heretics, that he durft not undertake the protection of the Smalkaldic league. By this ill-timed caution, or by a fuperfiitious deference to scruples, to which at other times he was not much addicted, he loft the most promifing opportunity of mortifying and diffreffing his rival, which prefented itfelf during his whole reign.

But, notwithftanding their ill fuccefs in their negotiations with foreign courts, the confederates found no difficulty at home, in bringing a fufficient force into the field. Germany abounded at that time with inhabitants; the feudal inflitutions which fubfifted in full force, enabled the nobles to call out their numerous vaffals, and to put them in motion on the fhorteft warning; the martial fpirit of the Germans not broken or enervated by the introduction of commerce and arts, had acquired additional vigour during the continual wars in which they had been employed, for half a century, either in the pay of the emperors or the kings of France. Upon every opportunity of entering into fervice, they were accuftomed to run eagerly to arms; and to every ftandard that was erected, volunteers flocked from all quarters +. Zeal feconded, on this occasion, their native ardour. Men on whom the doctrines of the reformation had made that deep impression which accompanies truth when first difcovered, prepared to maintain it with proportional vigour; and among a warlike people it appeared infamous to remain inactive, when the defence of religion was the motive for taking arms. Accident combined with all thefe circumstances in facilitating the levy of foldiers among the confederates. A confiderable number of Germans in the pay of France, being difmiffed by the king on the profpect of peace with England, joined in a body the standard of the protestants ‡. By fuch a concurrence of causes, they were enabled to affemble in a few weeks an army compofed of feventy thousand foot and fifteen thousand horse, provided with a train of an hundred and twenty cannon, eight hundred ammunition waggons, eight thoufand beafts of burden, and fix thoufand pioneers q. This army, one of the most numerous, and undoubtedly the best appointed, of any which had been levied in Europe during that century, did not require the united effort of the whole protestant body to raife it. The elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Heffe, the duke of Wurtemburg, the princes of Anhalt, and the Imperial cities of Augfburg, Ulm, and Strafburg, were the only powers which contributed towards this great armament: the electors of Cologne, of Brandenburg, and the count Palatine, overawed by the emperor's threats, or deceived by his professions; remained neuter. John marquis of Brandenburg Barcith, and Albert of Brandenburg Anfpach, tho' both early converts to Lutheranifm, entered openly into the emperor's fervice, under pretext of having obtained his promife for the fecurity of the protestant religion; and Maurice of Saxony, foon followed their example.

. THE REIGN OF THE

The number of their troops, as well as the amazing rapidity wherewith they had affembled them, aftonished the emperor, and filled him with the most difquieting apprehenfions. He was, indeed, in no condition to refift fuch a mighty force. Shut up in Ratifbon, a town of no great ftrength, whofe inhabitants, being mostly Lutherans, would have been more ready to betray than to affift him, with only three thousand Spanish foot, who had ferved in Hungary, and about five thousand Germans who had joined him from different parts of the empire, he must have been overwhelmed by the approach of fuch a formidable army, which he could not fight, nor could he even hope to retreat from it in fafety. The pope's troops, though in full march to his relief, had hardly reached the frontiers of Germany; the forces which he expected from the Low-Countries had not yet begun to move, and were even far from being complete +. His fituation, however, called for more immediate fuccour, nor did it feem practicable for him to wait for fuch diftant auxiliaries, with whom his junction was fo precarious.

But it happened fortunately for Charles, that the confederates did not avail themfelves of the advantage which lay fo full in their view. In civil wars, the first steps are commonly taken with much timidity and hefitation. Men are folicitous, at that time, to put on the femblance of moderation and equity; they strive to gain partifans by feeming to adhere ftrictly to known forms; nor can they be brought, at once, to violate those established institutions, which in times of tranquillity they have been accustomed to reverence; hence their proceedings are often feeble or dilatory, when they ought to be most vigorous and decisive. Influenced by those confiderations, which, happily for the peace of fociety, operate powerfully on the human mind, the confederates could not think of throwing off that allegiance which they owed to the head of the empire, or of turning their arms agaiust him without one folemn appeal more to his candour, and to the impartial judgment of their fellow-fubjects. For this purpofe, they addreffed a letter to the emperor [July 15], and a manifesto to all the inhabitants of Germany. The tenor of both was the fame. They reprefented their own conduct with regard to civil affairs as dutiful and fubmiffive; they mentioned the inviolable union in which they had lived with the emperor, as well as the many and recent marks of his good-will and gratitude wherewithal they had been honoured; they afferted religion to be the fole caufe of the violence which the emperor now meditated against them; and in proof of this produced many arguments to convince thofe who were fo weak as to be deceived by those artifices with which he endeavoured to cover his real intentions; they declared their own refolution to rifk every thing in maintenance of their religious rights, and foretold the diffolution of the German conftitution, if the emperor should finally prevail against them *.

Charles, though in fuch a perilous fituation as might have infpired him with moderate fentiments, appeared as inflexible and haughty as if his affairs had been in the most profperous state. His only reply to the address and manifesto of the protestants, was to publish the ban of the empire [July 20], against the elector of Saxony and landgrave of Heffe, their leaders, and against all who should dare to affift them. By this fentence, the ultimate and most rigourous one which the German jurifprudence has provided for the punifhment of traitors, or enemies to their country, they were declared rebels and outlaws, and deprived of every privilege which they enjoyed as members of the Germanic body; their goods were confifcated; their fubjects abfolved from their oath of allegiance; and it became not only lawful but meritorious to invade their territories. The nobles, and free cities, who framed or perfected the conftitution of the German government, had not been fo negligent of their own fafety and privileges as to truft the emperor with this formidable jurifdiction. The authority of a diet of the empire ought to have been interpoled before any of its mem. bers could be put under the ban. But Charles overlooked that formality, well knowing that, if his arms were crowned with fuccefs, there would remain none who would have either power or courage to call in queftion what he had donc +. The emperor however did not found his fentence against the elector and landgrave on their revolt from the established church, or their conduct with regard to religion; he affected to affign for it reafons purely civil, and those too expressed in such general and ambiguous terms, without specifying the nature or circumftances of their guilt, as rendered it more like an act of despotic power than of a legal and limited jurifdiction. Nor was it altogether from choice, or to conceal his intentions, that Charles had recourfe to the ambiguity of general expressions; but he durst not mention too particularly the caufes of his fentence, as every action which he could have charged upon the elector and landgrave as a crime, might have been employed with equal juffice to condemn many of the protestants whom he still pretended to confider as faithful fubjects, and whom it would have been extremely imprudent to alarm or difguft.

The confederates, now perceiving all hopes of accommodation to be at an end, had only to chufe whether they would fubmit without referve to the emperor's will, or proceed to open hoftilities. They were not defitute either of public fpirit, or of refolution to make the proper choice. A few days after the ban of the empire was publifhed, they, according to the cuftom of that age, fent a herald to the Imperial camp, with a folemn declaration of war againft Charles, to whom they no longer gave any other title than that of pretended emperor, and renounced all allegiance, homage, or duty which he might claim, or which they had hitherto yielded to him. But previous to this formality, part of their troops had begun to act. The command of a confiderable body of men raifed by the city of Augfburg having been give to Sebaftian Schertel, a foldier of fortune, who, by the booty that he had got when the Imperialifts plundered Rome, together with the merit of long fervice, had acquired wealth and authority which placed him on a level with the chief of the German nobles: that gallant veteran refolved, before he joined the main body of the confederates, to attempt fomething fuitable to his former fame, and to the expectation of his countrymen. As the pope's forces were hastening towards Tyrol, in order to penetrate into Germany by the narrow paffes through the mountains which run acrofs that country, he advanced thither with the utmost rapidity, and feized Ehrenberg and Cuffstein, two ftrong caftles which commanded the principal defiles. Without flopping a moment, he continued his march towards Infpruck, by getting poffeffion of which he would have obliged the Italians to ftop fhort, and with a fmall body of men could have refifted all the efforts of the greatest armies. Castlealto, the governor of Trent, knowing what a fatal blow this would be to the emperor, all whofe defigns muft have proved abortive if his Italian auxiliaries had been intercepted, raifed a few troops with the utmost dispatch, and threw himfelf into the town. Schertel, however, did not abandon the enterprife, and was preparing to attack the place, when the intelligence of the approach of the Italians, and an order from the elector and landgrave, obliged him to defift. By his retreat the paffes were left open, and the Italians entered Germany without any opposition, but from the garrifons which Schertel had placed in Ehrenberg and Cuffitein, and thefe, having no hopes of being relieved, furrendered, after a short resistance*+.

With the care and solicitude of a German, who was

Nor was the recalling of Schertel the only error of which the confederates were guilty. As the fupreme command of their army was committed, in terms of the league of Smalkalde, to the elector of Saxony and landgrave of Heffe with equal power, all the inconveniencies arifing from a divided and co-ordinate authority, which is always of fatal confequence in the operations of war, were immediately felt. The elector, though intrepid in his own perfon to excels, and most ardently zealous in the cause, was flow in deliberating, uncertain as well as irrefolute in his determinations, and conftantly preferred measures which were cautious and fafe, to fuch as were bold or decifive. The landgrave, of a more active and enterprifing nature, formed all his refolutions with promptitude, wished to execute them with spirit, and uniformly preferred fuch measures as tended to bring the contest to a speedy issue. Thus their maxims, with regard to the conduct of the war, differed as widely as those by which they were influenced in preparing for it. Such perpetual contrariety in their fentiments gave rife, imperceptibly, to jealoufy and the fpirit of contention. These multiplied the diffensions flowing from the incompatibility of their natural tempers, and rendered them more violent. The other members of the league confidering themfelves as independent, and fubject to the elector and landgrave, only in confequence of the articles of a voluntary confederacy, did not long retain a proper veneration for commanders who proceeded with fo little concord; and the numerous army of the protestants, like a vast machine whose parts are ill himfelf of noble birth, Seckendorf has published a long digrefilion concerning his anceftor, calculated chiefly to shew how Schertel was ennobled, and his posserity allied to many of the most ancient families in the empire. Among other curious particulars, he gives us an account of his wealth, the chief fource of which was the plunder he got at Rome. His landed effate alone was fold by his grandfons for fix hundred thousand florins. By this we may form fome idea of the riches amassed by the Condutieri, or commanders of mercenary bands in that age. At the taking of Rome, Schertel was only a captain. Seckend. lib. ii. 73. compacted, and which is deflitute of any power fufficient to move and regulate the whole, acted with no confiftency, vigour, or effect.

The emperor, who was afraid that, by remaining at Ratifbon, he might render it impoffible for the pope's forces to join him, having boldly advanced to Landshut on the Ifer, the confederates loft fome days in deliberating whether it was proper to follow him into territories of the duke of Bavaria, a neutral prince. When at last they furmounted that fcruple, and began to move towards his camp, they fuddenly abandoned the defign, and haftened to attack Ratifbon, in which town Charles could leave only a fmall garrifon. By this time the papal troops, amounting fully to that number which Paul had flipulated to furnish, had reached Landshut, and were soon followed by fix thousand Spaniards of the veteran band stationed in Naples. The confederates, after Schertel's spirited but fruitless expedition, seem to have permitted thefe forces to advance unmolefted to the place of rendezvous, without any attempt to attack either them or the emperor feparately, or to prevent their junction*. The Imperial army amounted now to thirty-fix thoufand men, and was still more formidable by the difcipline and valour of the troops, than by their number. Avila, a commendator of Alcantara, who had been prefent in all the wars carried on by Charles, and had ferved in the armies which gained the memorable victory at Pavia, which conquered Tunis, and invaded France, gives this the preference to any military force he had ever feen affembled +. Octavio Farnele, the pope's grandfon, affisted by the ablest officers formed in the long wars between Charles and Francis, commanded the Italian auxiliaries. His brother, the cardinal Farnese, accompanied him as a papal legate; and in order to give the war the oppearance of a religious enterprife, he proposed to march at the head of the army, with a crofs carried before him, and to publifh indulgences wherever he came, to all who fhould give them any affiftance, as had anciently been the practice in the crufades againft the infidels. But this the emperor firictly prohibited, as inconfiftent with all the declarations which he had made to the Germans of his own party; and the legate perceiving, to his aftonifhment, that the exercife of the proteftant religion, the extirpation of which he confidered as the fole object of the war, was publicly permitted in the Imperial camp, foon returned in difguft to Italy§.

The arrival of these troops enabled the emperor to fend fuch a reinforcement to the garrifon at Ratifbon, that the confederates, relinquishing all hopes of reducing that town, marched towards Ingoldstadt on the Danube, near to which Charles was now encamped. They exclaimed loudly against the emperor's notorious violation of the laws and conflitution of the empire, in having called in foreigners to lay wafte Germany and to opprefs its liberties. As, in that age, the dominion of the Roman fee was fo odious to the protestants, that the name of the pope alone was fufficient to infpire them with horror at any enterprife which he countenanced, and to raife in their minds the blackeft fuspicions, it came to be univerfally believed among them, that Paul, not fatisfied with attacking them openly by force of arms, had dispersed his emissaries all over Germany, to fet on fire their towns and magazines, and to poifon the wells and fountains of water. Nor did this rumour, which was extravagant and frightful enough to make a deep impreffion on the credulity of the vulgar, fpread among them only; even the leaders of the party, blinded by their prejudices, published a declaration, in which they accused the pope of having employed fuch antichriftian and diabolical arts against themt. These fentiments of the confederates were confirmed, in some measure, by the behaviour of the papal troops, who, thinking nothing too rigorous towards heretics anathematizedby the church, were guilty of great exceffes in the territories of the Lutheran flates, and aggravated the calamities of war, by mingling with it all the cruelty of bigotted zeal.

The first operations in the field, however, did not correspond with the violence of those passions which animated individuals. The emperor had prudently taken the refolution of avoiding an action with an army fo far fuperior in numbert, especially as he forefaw that nothing could keep a body composed of fo many and fuch diffimilar members from falling to pieces, but the prefling to attack it with an inconfiderate precipitancy. The confederates, though it was no lefs evident that to them every moment's delay was pernicious, were still prevented by the weakness or division of their leaders from exerting that vigour, with which their fituation, as well as the ardour of their foldiers, ought to have infpired them. On their arrival at Ingolditadt [Aug. '29,] they found the emperor in a camp not remarkable for ftrength, and furrounded only by a flight entrenchment. Before the camp lay a plain of fuch extent, as afforded fufficient-fpace for drawing out the whole army, and bringing it to act at once. Every confideration fhould have determined them to have feized this opportunity of attacking the emperor; and their great fuperiority in numbers, the eagerness of their troops, together with the flability of the German infantry in pitched battles, afforded them the mok probable expectation of victory. The landgrave urged this with great warmth, declaring that if the fole command were vested in him, he would terminate the war on that occafion, and decide by one general action the fate of the two parties. But the elector, reflecting on the valour and difcipline of the enemy's forces, animated by the prefence of the emperor, and conducted by the best officers of the age, would not venture upon an action, which he thought to be fo doubtful, as the attacking fuch a body of veterans on ground which they themfelves had chofen, and while covered by fortifications which, though imperfect, would afford them no fmall advantage in the combat. Notwithstanding his hefitation and remonstrances, it was agreed to advance towards the enemy's camp in battle array, in order to make a trial whether by that infult, and by a furious cannonade which they began, they could draw the Imperialifts out of their works. But the emperor had too much fagacity to fall into this fnare. He adhered to his own fystem with inflexible conflancy; and drawing up his foldiers behind their trenches, that they might be ready to receive the confederates if they should venture upon an affault, calmly waited their approach, and carefully reftrained his own men from any excursions or skirmishes which might bring on a general engagement. Meanwhile he rode along the lines, and addreffing the troops of the different nations in their own language, encouraged them not only by his words, but by the cheerfulnefs of his voice and countenance; he exposed himfelf in places of greatest danger, and amidst the warmest fire of the enemy's artillery, the most numerous that had hitherto been brought into the field by any army. Roufed by his example, not a man quitted his ranks; it was thought infamous to difcover any fymptom of fear when the emperor appeared fo intrepid; and the meaneft foldier plainly perceived, that their declining the combat at prefent was not the effect of timidity in their general, but the refult of a well-grounded caution. The confederates, after firing feveral hours on the Imperialifis, with more noife and terror than execution, feeing no prospect of alluring them to fight on equal terms, retired to their own camp. The emperor employed the night with fuch diligence in ftrengthening his works, that the confederates, returning to the cannonade next.day, found that, though they had now been willing to venture upon fuch a bold experiment, the opportunity of making an attack with advantage was loft*.

After fuch a difcovery of the feeblenels or irrefolution of their leaders, and the prudence as well as firmnefs of the emperor's conduct, the confederates turned their whole attention towards preventing the arrival of a powerful reinforcement of ten thousand foot, and four thousand horse, which the count de Buren was bringing to the emperor from the Low-Countries. But though that general had to traverfe fuch an extent of country; though his route lay through the territories of feveral flates warmly difpofed to favour the confederates; though they were apprized of his approach, and by their fuperiority in numbers might eafily have detached a force fufficient to overpower him, he advanced with fuch rapidity, and by fuch well-concerted movements, while they opposed him with fuch remiffnefs, and for little military skill, that he conducted this body to the Imperial camp without any lofs+ [Sept. 10.]

Upon the arrival of the Flemings, in whom he placed great confidence, the emperor altered, in fome degree, his plan of or-arations, and began to act more upon the offenfive, though he still avoided a battle with the utmost induftry. He made himfelf mafter of Neuburg, Dillingen, and Donawert on the Danube; of Nordlingen, and feveral other towns, fituated in the most confiderable streams which fall into that mighty river. By this he got the command of a great extent of country, though not without being obliged to engage in feveral sharp encounters, of which the fuccefs was various, nor without being exposed oftener than once, to the danger of being drawn into a battle. In this manner the whole autumn was fpent; neither party gained any remarkable fuperiority over the other, and nothing was yet done towards bringing the war to a period. The emperor had often foretold, with confidence, that difcord and the want of money would compel the confederates to difperfe that unwieldy body, which they had neither abilities to guide, nor funds to support t. Though he waited with impatience for the accomplifhment of his prediction, there was no profpect of that event being at hand. But he himfelf began to fuffer from the want of forage and provisions; even the catholic provinces being fo much incenfed at the introduction of foreigners into the empire, that they furnished them with reluctance, while the camp of the confederates abounded with a profusion of all necessfaries, which the zeal of their friends in the adjacent countries poured in with the utmost liberality and good-will. Great numbers of the Italians and Spaniards, unaccuftomed to the food or climate of Germany, were become unfit for fervice through fieknefs ‡. Coufiderable arrears were now due to the troops, who had fearcely received any money fince the beginning of the campaign; the emperor, experiencing on this, as well as on former occasions, that his jurifdiction was more extensive than , his revenues, and that the former enabled him to affemble a greater number of foldiers, than the latter were fufficient to fupport. Upon all thefe accounts, he found it difficult to keep his army in the field; fome of his ableft generals, and even the duke of Alva himfelf, perfevering and obstinate as he ufually was in the profecution of every meafure, advifing him to difperfe his troops into winter quarters. But as the arguments against any plan which he had adopted, rarely made much impreffion upon the emperor, he paid no regard to their opinion, and determined to continue his efforts in order to weary out the confederates; being well affured that if he could once oblige them to feparate, there was little probability of their uniting again in a body *. Still, however, it remained a doubtful point, whether his fleadinefs was most likely to fail, or their zeal to be exhausted. It was fliil uncertain which party, by first dividing its forces, would give the fuperiority to the other; when an unexpected event decided the contest, and occasioned a fatal reverse in the affairs of the confederates.

Maurice of Saxony having infinuated himfelf into the emperor's confidence, by the arts which have already been defcribed, no fooner faw hostilities ready to break out between the confederates of Smalkalde and that monarch, than vaft prospects of ambition began to open upon him. That portion of Saxony, which descended to him by his ancestors, was far from fatisfying his afpiring mind; and he perceived with pleafure the approach of civil war, as, amidft the revolutions and convultions occasioned by it, opportunities of acquiring additional power or dignity, which at other times are fought in vain, prefent themfelves to an enterprifing fpirit. As he was thoroughly acquainted with the flate of the two contending parties, and the qualities of their leaders, he did not hefitate long in determining on which fide the greatest advantages were to be expected. Having revolved all thefe things in his own breaft, and having taken his final refolution of joining the emperor, he prudently determined to declare early in his favour; that by the merit of this, he might acquire a title to a proportional recompence. With this view, he had repaired to Ratifbon in the month of May, under pretext of attending the diet; and after many conferences with Charles or his ministers, he, with the most mysterious fecrecy, concluded a treaty, in which he engaged to concur in affifting the emperor, as a faithful fubject; and Charles, in return, flipulated to beftow on him all the fpoils of the elector of Saxony, his dignities as well as territories*. History hardly records any treaty that can be confidered as a more manifest violation of the most powerful principles which ought to influence human actions. Maurice, a profeffed protestant, at a time when the belief of religion, as well as zeal for its interests, took strong possession. of every mind, binds himfelf to contribute his affiftance towards carrying on a war which had manifefly no other ob. ject than the extirpation of the protestant doctrines. He engages to take arms against his father-in law, and to ftrip his nearest relation of his honours and dominions. He joins a dubious friend against a known benefactor, to whom his obligations were both great and recent. Nor was the prince who ventured upon all this, one of those audacious politicians, who, provided they can accomplish their ends, and fecure their interest, avowedly difregard the most facred obligations, and glory in contemning whatever is honourable or decent. Maurice's conduct, if the whole must be aferibed to policy, was more artful and mafterly; he executed his plan in all its parts, and yet endeavoured to preferve, in every flep which he took, the appearance of what was fair, and virtuous, and laudable. It is probable, from his fubfequent behaviour, that, with regard to the protestant religion at least, h's intentions were upright, that he fondly trusted to the emperor's promifes for its fecurity, but that, according to the fate of all who refine too much in policy, and who tread in dark and crooked paths in attempting to deceive others, he himfelf was, in fome degree, deceived.

His first care, however, was to keep the engagements into which he had entered with the emperor closely concealed: and fo perfect a master was he in the art of diffimulation, that the confederates, notwithstanding his declining all connections with them, and his remarkable associated in paying court to the emperor, feemed to have entertained no furficion of his defigns. Even the elector of Saxony, when he marched at the beginning of the campaign to join his affociates, committed his dominions to Maurice's protection, which he, with an infidious appearance of friendship, readily undertook*. But fearcely had the elector taken the field, when Maurice began to confult privately with the king of the Romans how to invade those very territories, with the defence of which he was entrusted. Soon after, * Struvii Corp. 1046. the emperor fent him a copy of the Imperial ban denomied against the elector and landgrave. As he was next heir to the former, and particularly interested in preventing strangers from getting his dominions into their possession, Charles required him, not only for his own fake, but upon the allegiance and duty which he owed to the head of the empire, instantly to feize and detain in his hands the forfeited estates of the elector; warning him, at the fame time, that if he neglected to obey these commands, he should be held as accession to the crimes of his kinstan, and be liable to the fame punishment*.

This artifice, which it is probable Maurice himfelf fuggested, was employed by him in order that his conduct towards the elector might feem a matter of necessity but not of choice, an act of obedience to his fuperior, rather than a voluntary invation of the rights of his kinfman and ally. But in order to give fome more fpecious appearance to this thin veil with which he endeavoured to cover his ambition, he, foon after his return from Ratifbon, had called together the flates of his country; and reprefenting to them that a civil war between the emperor and confederates of Smalkalde was now become unavoidable, defired their advice with regard to the part which he fhould act in that event. They having been prepared, no doubt, and tutored beforehand, and being defirous of gratifying their prince, whom they effeemed as well as loved, gave fuch counfel as they knew would be most agreeable; advising him to offer his mediation towards reconciling the contending parties; but if that were rejected, and he could obtain proper fecurity for the protestant religion, they delivered it as their opinion, that, in all other points, he ought to yield obedience to the emperor. Upon receiving the Imperial refeript, together with the ban against the elector and landgrave, Maurice summoned the ftates of his country a fecond time; he laid before them the orders which he had received, and mentioned the punifhment with which he was threatened in cafe of difobedience; he acquainted them, that the confederates had refuled to admit of his mediation, and that the emperor had given him the most fatisfactory declarations with regard to religion; he pointed out his own interest in fecuring posseffion of the electoral dominions, as well as the danger of allowing ftrangers to obtain an eftablishment in Saxony; and upon the whole, as the point under deliberation respected his fubjects no lefs than himfelf, he defired to know their fentiments, how he should steer in that difficult and ardnous conjuncture. The states, no lefs oblequious and complaifant than formerly, professing their own reliance on the emperor's promifes as a perfect fecurity for their religion, propoled that, before he had recourfe to more violent methods, . they would write to the elector, exhorting him, as the beft means, not only of appealing the emperor, but of preventing his dominions from being feized by foreign or hoflile powers, to give his confent that Maurice flould take possefion of them quietly and without opposition. Maurice himself feconded their arguments in a letter to the landgrave, his father-in-law. Such an extravagant proposition was rejected with the fcorn and indignation which it deferved. The landgrave, in return to Maurice, taxed him with his treachery and ingratitude towards a kinfman to whom he was fo deeply indebted; he treated with contempt his affectation of executing the Imperial ban, which he could not but know to be altogether void by the unconftitutional and arbitrary manner in which it had been iffued; he befought him, not to fuffer himfelf to be fo far blinded by ambition, as to forget the obligations of honour and friendship, or to betray the protestant religion, the extirpation of which out of Germany, even by the acknowledgment of the pope himfelf, was the great object of the prefent war ‡.

But Maurice had proceeded too far to be diverted from purfuing his plan by reproaches or arguments. Nothing now remained but to execute with vigour, what he hitherto carried on by artifice and diffimulation. Nor was his boldnefs in action inferior to his fubtlety in contrivance. Having affembled about twelve thoufand men, he fuddenly invaded one part of the electoral provinces, while Ferdinand, with an army composed of Bohemians and Hungarians, over ran the other. Maurice, in two fharp encounters, dcfeated the troops which the elector had left to guard his country; and improving these advantages to the utmost, made himfelf mafter of all the electorate, except Wittemberg, Gotha, and Eifenach, which being places of confiderable ftrength, and defended by fufficient garrifons, refufed to open their gates. The news of thefe rapid conquefts foon reached the Imperial and confederate camps. In the former, fatisfaction with an event, which it was forefeen would be productive of the most important confequences, was expressed by every possible demonstration of joy. The latter was filled with aftonishment and terror. The name of Maurice was mentioned with execration, as an apostate from religion, a betrayer of the German liberty, and a contemner of the most facred and natural ties. Every thing that the rage or invention of the party could fuggeft, in order to blacken and render him odious, invectives, fatires, and lampoons, the furious declamations of their preachers, together with the rude wit of their authors, were all employed against him. While he, confiding in the arts which he had fo long practifed, as if his actions could have admitted of any ferious juftification, published a manifesto, containing the fame frivolous reafons for his conduct, which he had formerly alledged in the meeting of his states, and in his letter to the landgrave+.

The elector, upon the first intelligence of Maurice's motions, proposed to return home with his troops for the defence of Saxony. But the deputies of the league, assembled at Ulm, prevailed on him, at that time, to remain with the army, and to prefer the fuccefs of the common caufe before the fecurity of his own dominions. At length the fufferings. and complaints of his fubjects increased fo much, that he discovered the utmost impatience to fet out, in order to refcue them from the oppreffion of Maurice, and from the cruelty of the Hungarians, who, having been accustomed to that licentious and mercilefs fpecies of war which was thought lawful against the Turks, committed, wherever they came, the wildest acts of rapine and violence. This defire of the elector was fo natural and fo warmly urged, that the deputies at Ulm, though fully fentible of the unhappy confequences of dividing their army, durft not refufe their confent, how unwilling foever to grant it. In this perplexity, they repaired to the camp of the confederates at Giengen, on the Brenz, in order to confult their conflituents. Nor were they lefs at a lofs what to determine in this preffing emergence. But, after having confidered ferioufly the open defertion of some of their allies; the scandalous lukewarmness of others, who had hitherto contributed nothing towards the war; the intolerable load which had fallen of confequence upon fuch members as were most zealous for the cause, or most faithful to their engagements; the ill fuccefs of all their endeavours to obtain foreign aid; the unufnal length of the campaign; the rigour of the feafon; together with the great number of foldiers, and even officers, who had quitted the fervice on that account; they concluded that nothing could fave them, but either the bringing the conteft to the immediate decision of a battle, by attacking the Imperial army, or an accommodation of all their differences with Charles by a treaty. Such was the defpondency and dejection which now opprefied the party, that of thefe two they chofe what was most feeble and unmanly, empowering a minister of the elector of Brandenburg to propound overtures of peace in their name to the emperor.

No fooner did Charles perceive this haughty confederacy which had fo lately threatened to drive him out of Germany, condefcending to make the first advances towards an agreement, than concluding their spirit to be gone, or their union to be broken, he immediately affumed the tone of a conqueror; and, as if they had been already at his mercy, would not hear of a negotiation, but upon condition that the elector of Saxony should previously give up himself and his dominions absolutely to his disposal t. As nothing more intolerable or ignominious could have been preferibed, even in the worft fituation of their affairs, it is no wonder that this proposition should be rejected by a party, which was rather humbled and difconcerted than fubdued. But tho' they refused to fubmit tamely to the emperor's will, they wanted fpirit to purfue the only plan which could have preferved their independence: and forgetting that it was the union of their troops in one body which had hitherto rendered the confederacy formidable, and had more than once obliged the Imperialists to think of quitting the field, they inconfiderately abandoned their advantage, which, in fpite of the diversion in Saxony, would still have kept the emperor in awe; and yielding to the elector's entreaties, confented to his propofal of dividing the army. Nine thousand men were left in the dutchy of Wurtemberg, in order to protect that province, as well as the free cities of Upper Germany; a confiderable body marched with the elector towards Saxony; but the greater part returned with their refpective leaders into their own countries, and were difperfed there *.

The moment that the troops feparated, the confederacy ceafed to be the object of terror; and the members of it, who, while they composed part of a great body, had felt but little anxiety about their own fecurity, began to tremble when they reflected that they now ftood exposed fingly to the whole weight of the emperor's vengeance. Charles did not allow them leifure to recover from their confternation, or to form any new schemes of union. As soon as the confederates began to retire, he put his army in motion, and tho' it was now in the depth of winter, he refolved to keep the field, in order to make the most of that favourable juncture for which he had waited fo long. Some fmall towns in which the protestants had left garrifons, immediately opened their gates. Norlingen, Rotenberg, and Hall, Imperial cities, fubmitted foon after. Though Charles could not prevent the elector from levying, as he retreated, large contributions upon the archbishop of Mentz, the abbot of Fulda, and other ecclefiaftics +, this was more than balanced by the fubmiffion of Ulm, one of the chief cities of Suabia, highly diftinguished by its zeal for the Smalkaldic league. As foon as an example was fet of deferting the common caufe, the reft of the members became infantly impatient to follow it, and feemed afraid left others, by getting the flart of them in returning to their duty, fhould, on that account, obtain more favourable terms. The elector Palatine, a weak prince, who, notwithstanding his professions of neutrality, had, very prepofteroully, fent to the confederates four hundred horfe, a body fo inconfiderable as to be fearcely any addition to their firength, but great enough to render him guilty in the cyes of the emperor, made his acknowledgements in the molt abject manner. The inhabitants of Augfburg, shaken by fo many inflances of apoftacy, expelled the brave Schertcl out of their city, and accepted fuch conditions as the emperor was pleafed to grant them.

than those which lay more exposed. Thus a confederacy lately fo powerful as to fhake the Imperial throne, fell to pieces, and was diffolved in the fpace of a few weeks; hardly any member of that formidable combination now remaining in arms, but the elector and landgrave, whom the emperor, having from the beginning marked out as the victims of his vengeance, was at no pains to offer terms of reconciliation. Nor did he grant those who fubmitted to him a generous and unconditional pardon. Confeious of his own fuperiority, he treated them both with haughtinefs and rigour. All the princes in perfon, and the cities by their deputies, were compelled to implore merey in the humble poflure of fupplicants. As the emperor laboured under great difficulties from the want of money, he imposed heavy fines upon them, which he levied with most rapacious exactnefs. The duke of Wurtemberg paid three hundred thousand crowns; the city of Augsburg an hundred and fifty thousand; Ulm an hundred thousand; Frankfort eighty thousand; Memmingen fifty thousand; and the reft in proportion to their abilities, or their different degrees of guilt. They were obliged, befides, to renounce the league of Smalkalde; to furnish affistance, if required, towards executing the Imperial ban against the elector and landgrave; to give up their artillery and warlike flores to the emperor; to admit garrifons into their principal cities and places of ftrength; and, in this difarmed and dependent fituation, to expect the final award which the emperor should think proper to pronounce when the war came to an iffue+. But, amidit tl.e great variety of articles dictated by Charles on this occafion, he in conformity to his original plan, took care that nothing relating to religion should be inferted; and to fuch a degree were the confederates humbled or overawed, that forgetting the zeal which had fo long animated them, they were folicitous only about their own fafety, without venturing to infift on a point, the mention of which they faw the emperor avoiding with fo much industry. The inhabitants of Memmingen alone made fome feeble efforts to procure a promife of protection in the exercise of their religion, but were checked fo feverely by the Imperial ministers, that they inftantly fell from their demand.

The elector of Cologne, whom, notwithflanding the fentence of excommunication iffued against him by the pope, Charles had hitherto allowed to remain in possession of the archiepifcopal fee, being now required by the emperor to fubmit to the censures of the church, this virtuous and difinterested prelate, unwilling to expose his subjects to the miseries of war on his own account, voluntarily resigned that high dignity [Jan. 25]. With a moderation becoming his age and character, he chose to enjoy truth, together with the exercise of his religion, in the retirement of a private life, rather than to disturb fociety by engaging in a doubtful and violent flruggle in order to retain his office  $\delta$ .

During these transactions, the elector of Saxony reached the frontiers of his country unmolested. As Maurice could affemble no force equal to the army which accompanied him, he in a short time, not only recovered possession of his own territories, but over-ran Misnia, and stripped his rival of all that belonged to him, except Drefden and Leipsic, which, being towns of some strength, could not be fuddenly reduced. Maurice, obliged to quit the field, and to shut himself up in his capital, dispatched courier after courier to the emperor, representing his dangerous situation, and foliciting him with the most earnest importunity to march immediately to his relief. But Charles, busy at that time in prefcribing terms to fuch members of the league as were daily returning to their allegiance, thought it fufficient to detach Albert marquis of Brandenburg-Anfpach with three thousand men to his affistance. Albert, though an enterprifing and active officer, was unexpectedly furprifed by the elector, who killed many of his troops, difperfed the remainder, and took. him prifoner 1. Maurice continued as much exposed as formerly; and if his enemy had known how to improve the opportunity which prefented itfelf, his ruin must have heen immediate and unavoidable. But the elector, no lefs flow and dilatory when invelted with the fole command, than he had been formerly when joined in authority with a partner, never gave any proof of military activity but in this enterprife against Albert. Instead of marching directly towards Maurice, whom the defeat of his ally had greatly alarmed, he inconfiderately littened to overtures of accommodation. which his artful antagonift proposed with no other intention than to amule him, and to flacken the vigour of his operations.

Such, indeed, was the pofture of the emperor's affairs, that he could not march inftantly to the relief of his ally. Soon after the feparation of the confederate army, he, in order to eafe himfelf of the burden of maintaining a fuperfluous number of troops, had difmiffed the count of Buren. with his Flemings*, imagining that the Spaniards and Germans, together with the papal forces, would be fully fufficient to crush any degree of vigour that yet remained among the members of the league. But Paul, growing wife too late, began now to difcern the imprudence of that meafure from which the more fagacious Venetians had endeavoured in vain to diffuade him. The rapid progress of the Imperial arms, and the eafe with which they had broken a combination that appeared no lefs firm than powerful, opened his eyes at length, and made him not only forget at once all the advantages which he had expected from fuch a complete triumph over herefy, but placed, in the ftrongest light, his own impolitic conduct, in having contributed towards acquiring for Charles fuch an immenfe increase of power, as would enable him, after oppreffing the liberties of Germany, to give law with abfolute authority to all the flates of Italy. The moment that he perceived his error, he endeavoured to correct it. Without giving the emperor any warning of his intention, he ordered Farnefe, his grandfon, to return infantly to Italy with all the troops under his command, and at the fame time recalled the licence which he had granted Charles, of appropriating to his own use a large share of the church lands in Spain. He was not deflitute of pretences to juffify this abrupt defertion of his ally. The term of fix months, during which the flipulations in their treaty were to continue in force, was now expired; the league, in opposition to which their alliance had been framed, feemed to be entirely diffipated; Charles, in all his negotiations with the princes and cities which had fubmitted to his will, had neither confulted the pope, nor had allotted him any part of the conquefts which he had made, nor had allowed him any fhare in the vaft contributions which he had raifed. He had not even made any provision for the suppression of herefy, or the re-establishment of the catholic religion, which were Paul's chief inducements to beflow the treafurcs of the church fo liberally in carrying on the war. Thefe colours, however fpecious, did not conceal from the emperor that fecret jealoufy which was the true motive of the pope's conduct. But as Paul's orders with regard to the march of his troops were no lefs perceptory than unexpected, it was impoffible to prevent their retreat. Charles exclaimed loudly against his treachery, in abandoning him fo unfeafonably, while he was profecuting a war undertaken in obedience to the papal injunctions, and from which, if fuccefsful, fo much honour and advantage would redound to the church. To complaints he added threats and exposlulations. But Paul remained inflexible; his troops continued their march towards the ecclefiaftical ftate, and in an elaborate memorial, intended as an apology for his conduct, he difcovered new and more manifeft fymptoms of alienation from the emperor, together with a deep-rooted dread of his power†. Charles, weakened by the withdrawing of fo great a body from his army, which was already much diminifhed by the number of garrifons that he had been obliged to throw into the towns which had capitulated, found it neceffary to recruit his forces by new levies, before he could venture to march in perfon towards Saxony.

The fame and splendour of his success could not have failed of attracting fuch multitudes of foldiers into his fervice from all the extensive territories now subject to his authority, as must foon have put him in a condition of taking the field against the elector; but the fudden and violent e. ruption of a confpiracy at Genoa, as well as the great revolutions which that event, extremely mysterious in its first appearances, feemed to portend, obliged him to avoid entangling himfelf in new operations in Germany, until he had fully difcovered its fource and tendency. The form of government which had been established in Genoa, at the time, when Andrew Doria reftored liberty to his country, though calculated to obliterate the memory of former diffentions, and received at first with eager approbation, did not, after a trial of near twenty years, give universal fatisfaction to those turbulent and factious republicans. As the entire administration of affairs was now lodged in a certain number of noble familics, many, envying them that pre-eminence, wifhed for the reflitution of a popular government, to which they had been accuftomed; and though all reverenced the difinterested virtue of Doria, and admired his talents, not a few were jealous of that afcendant which he had acquired in the councils of the commonwealth. His age, however, his moderation, and his love of liberty, afforded ample fecurity to his countrymen that he would not abufe his power, nor ftain the clofe of his days by attempting to overturn that fabric, which it had been the labour and pride of his life to erect. But the authority and influence which in his hands were innocent, they eafily faw would prove destructive, if usurped by any citizen of greater ambition, or less virtue. A citizen of this dangerous character had actually formed fuch pretentions, and with fome prospect of fuccess. Giannetino Doria, whom his grand uncle Andrew defined to be the heir of his private fortune, aimed likewife at being his fucceffor in power: His temper, haughty, infolent, and overbearing to fuch a degree as would hardly have been tolerated in one born to reign, was altogether unfupportable in the citizen of a free ftate. The more fagacious among the Genoefe already feared and hated him as the enemy of those liberties for which they were indebted to his uncle. While Andrew himfelf, blinded by that violent and undifcerning affection which perfons in advanced age often contract for the younger members of their family, fet no bounds to the indulgence with which he treated him; feeming lefs folicitous to fecure and perpetuate the freedom of the commonwealth, than to aggrandize that undeferving kinfinan.

But whatever fuspicion of Doria's defigns, or whatever diffatisfaction with the fystem of administration in the commonwealth, these circumstances might have occasioned, they would have ended, it is probable, in nothing more than murmurings and complaints, if John Lewis Fiesco count of Lavagna, observing this growing difgust, had not been encouraged by it to attempt one of the boldest actions recorded in history. That young nobleman, the richest and most i hustrious subject in the republic, possessed, in an eminent degree, all the qualities which win upon the human heart, which command respect, or fecure attachment. He was graceful and majestic in his perfon; magnificent even to profusion; of a generosity that anticipated the wishes of his friends, and exceeded the expectations of strangers; of an infauating address, gentle manners, and a flowing affability.

But under the appearance of thefc virtues, which feemed to form him for enjoying and adorning focial life, he concealed all the difpolitions which mark men out for taking the lead in the moft dangerous and dark confpiracies; an infatiable and reftlefs ambition, a courage unacquainted with fear, and a mind that difdained fubordination. Such a temper could ill brook that flation of inferiority, wherein he was placed in the republic; and as he envied the power which the elder Doria had acquired, he was filled with indignation at the thoughts of its defcending, like an hereditary poffeffion, to Giannetino. Thefe various paffions, preying with violence on his turbulent and afpiring mind, determined him to attempt overturning that domination to which he could not fubmit.

As the most effectual method of accomplishing this, he thought at first of forming a connection with Francis, and even propofed it to the French ambaffador at Rome; and after expelling Doria, together with the Imperial faction, by his affiltance, he offered to put the republic once more under the protection of that monarch, hoping in return for that fervice to be entrusted with the principal share in the administration of government. But having communicated his fcheme to a few chofen confidents, from whom he kept nothing fecret, Verrina, the chief of them, a man of defperate fortune, capable alike of adviling and executing the moft audacious deeds, remonstrated with earnestness against the folly of expoling himfelf to the most imminent danger, while he allowed another to reap all the fruits of his fuccels; and exhorted him warmly to aim himfelf at that pre-eminence in his country, to which he was defined by his illustrious birth, was called by the voice of his fellow-citizens, and would be raifed by the zeal of his friends. This difcourfe opened fuch great profpects to Fielco, and fo fuitable to his genius, that abandoning his own plan, he eagerly adopted that of Verrina. The other perfons prefent, though fenfible of the hazardous nature of the undertaking, did not chufe to condemn what their patron had fo warmly approved. It was inftantly refolved, in this dark cabal, to affaffinate the two Dorias, as well as the principal perfons of their party, to overturn the established fystem of government, and to place Fielco on the ducal throne of Genoa. Time, however, and preparations were requisite to ripen fuch a defign for execution; and while he was employed in carrying on thefe, Fielco made it his chief care to guard against every thing that might betray his fecret, or create fuspicion. The difguife he affumed, was of all others the most impenetrable. He feemed to be abandoned entirely to pleasure and diffipation. A perpetual gaiety, diversified by the purfuit of all the amufements in which perfons of his age and rank are apt to delight, engroffed, in appearance, the whole of his time and thoughts. But amidit this hurry of diffipation, he profecuted his plan with the most cool attention, neither retarding the delign by a timid hefitation, nor precipitating the execution by an excels of impatience. He continued his correspondence with the French ambaffador at Rome, though without communicating to him his real intentions, that by his means he might fecure the protection. of the French arms, if hereafter he should find it necessary to call them in to his aid. He entered into a close confederacy with Farnese duke of Parma, who being disgusted with the emperor for refuting to grant him the investiture of that dutchy, was eager to promote any measure that tended to diminish his influence in Italy, or to ruin a family so implicity devoted to him as that of Doria. Being fenfible that, in a maritime state, the acquisition of naval power was what he ought chiefly to aim at, he purchased four gallies from the pope, who probably was not unacquainted with the defign which he had formed, and did not difapprove of it. Under colour of fitting out one of these gallies to fail on a cruife against the Turks, he not only assembled a good number of his own vaffals, but engaged in his fervice many bold adventurers, whom the truce between the emperor and Solyman had deprived of their ufual occupation and fubfiftence.

While Fiefco was taking thefe important fteps, he preferved fo admirably his ufual appearance of being devoted entirely to pleafure and amufement, and paid court with fuch artful addrefs to the two Dorias, as impofed not only on the generous and unfuspicious mind of Andrew, but deceived Giannetino, who, confcious of his own criminal intentions, was more apt to diftruft the defigns of others. So many inftruments being now prepared, nothing remained but to ftrike the blow. Various confultations were held by Fielco with his confidents, in order to fettle the manner of doing it with the greatest certainty and effect. At first, they proposed to murder the Dorias and their chief adherents, during the celebration of high mafs in the principal church; but, as Andrew was often absent from religious folemnities on account of his great age, that defign was laid afide. It was then concerted that Fiefco should invite the uncle and nephew, with all their friends whom he had marked out as victims, to his houfe; where it would be eafy to cut them off at once without danger or refiftance; but as Giannetino was obliged to leave the town on the day which they had chosen, it became necessary likewife to alter this plan. They at last determined to attempt by open force, what they found difficult to effect by ftratagem, and fixed on the night between the fecond and third of [anuary, for the execution of their enterprife. The time was cholen with great propriety; for as the doge of the former year was to quit his office, according to cuftom, on the first of the month, and his fucceffor could not be elected fooner than the fourth, the republic remained during that interval in a fort of anarchy, and Fiefco might with lefs violence take poffession of the vacant dignity.

The morning of that day Ficfco employed in vifiting his friends, paffing fome hours among them with a fpirit as gay and unembarraffed as at other times. Towards evening, he paid court to the Dorias with his usual marks of respect, and furveying their countenance and behaviour with the attention natural in his fituation, was happy to obferve the perfect fecurity in which they remained, without the leaft forefight or dread of that florm which had been fo long a gathering, and was now ready to burft over their heads. From their palace he haftened to his own, which flood by itfelf in the middle of a large court, furrounded by a high wall. The gates had been fet open in the morning, and all perfons, without diffinction, were allowed to enter, but frong guards posted within the court fuffered no one to return. Verrina, meanwhile, and a few perfons trufted with the fecret of the confpiracy, after conducting Fielco's vallals, as well as the crews of his gallies, into the palace in fmall bodies, with as little noife as possible, difperfed themselves through the city, and, in the name of their patron, invited to an entertainment the principal citizens whom they knew to be difgusted with the administration of the Dorias, and to have inclination as well as courage to attempt a change in the government. Of the vaft number of perfons who now filled the palace, a few only knew for what purpofe they were affembled; the reft, aftonifhed at finding, inftead of the preparations for a feaft, a court crowded with armed men, and apartments filled with the inftruments of war, gazed on each other with a mixture of curiofity, impatience, and terror.

While their minds were in this flate of fufpenfe and agitation, Fiefco appeared. With a look full of alacrity and confidence, he addreffed himfelf to the perfons of chief diflinction, telling them, that they were not now called to partake of the pleafure of an entertainment, but to join in a deed of valour, which would lead them to liberty and immortal renown. He fet before their eyes the exorbitant as well as intolerable authority of the elder Doria, which the ambition of Giannetino, and the partiality of the emperor to a family more devoted to him than to their country, was about to enlarge and to render perpetual. This unrighteous dominion, continued he, you have it now in your power to fubvert, and to establish the freedom of your country on a firm basis. The tyrants must be cut off. I have taken the most effectual measures for this purpose. My affociates are numerous. I can depend on allies and protectors if neceffary. Happily, the tyrants are as fecure as I have been provident. Their infolent contempt of their countrymen has banished the fuspicion and timidity which ufually render the guilty quick-fighted to difcern, as well as fagacious to guard against the vengeance which they deferve. They will now feel the blow, before they fufpect any hoftile hand to be nigh. Let us then fally forth, that we may deliver our country by one generous effort, almost unaccompanied with danger, and certain of fuccefs. Thefe words, uttered with that irrefiftible fervour which animates the mind when roufed by great objects, made the defired impreffion on the audience. Fiefco's vaffals, ready to execute whatever their master should command, received his discourse with a murmur of applause. To many whose fortunes were desperate, the license and confusion of an infurrection afforded an agreeable profpect. Those of higher rank and more virtuous fentiments, durft not discover the furprife or horror with which they were ftruck at the propofal of an enterprife no lefs unexpected than atrocious; as each of them imagined the other to be in the fecret of the confpiracy, and faw himfelf furrounded by perfons who waited only a fignal from their leader to perpetrate the greatest crime. With one voice then all applauded, or feigned to applaud, the undertaking.

Fielco having thus fixed and encouraged his affociates, before he gave them his laft orders, he haftened for a moment to the apartment of his wife, a lady of the noble houfe of Cibo, whom he loved with tender affection, and whofe beauty and virtue rendered her worthy of his love. The noife of the armed men who crowded the court and palace, having long before this reached her ears, fhe concluded fome hazardous enterprife to be in hand, and flic trembled for her husband. He found her in all the anguish of uncertainty and fear; and, as it was now impossible to keep his defign concealed, he informed her of what he had undertaken. The profpect of a fcene fo full of horror as well as danger. completed her agony; and foreboding immediately in her mind the fatal iffue of it, the endeavoured, by her tears, her entreaties, and her defpair, to divert him from his purpofe. Fiefco, after trying in vain to foothe and to infpire her with hope, broke from a fituation into which an excefs of tendernefs had unwarily feduced him, though it could not shake his refolution. " Farewell," he cried, as he quitted the apartment, " you shall either never fee me more, or you shall behold to-morrow every thing in Genoa fubject to your power."

As foon as he rejoined his companions, he allotted each his proper flation: fome were appointed to affault and feize the different gates of the city; fome to make themfelves mafters of the principal ftreets or places of ftrength: Fiefco referved for himfelf the attack of the harbour where Doria's gallies were laid up, as the post of chief importance, and of greatest danger. It was now midnight, and the citizens slept in the fecurity of peace, when this band of confpirators, numerous, desperate, and well armed, rushed out to execute their plan. They furprifed fome of the gates, without meeting with any refiftance. They got poffellion of others after a fharp conflict with the foldiers on guard. Verrina, with the galley which had been fitted out against the Turks, blocked up the mouth of the Darfena or little harbour where Doria's fleet lay. All poffibility of efcape being cut off by this precaution, when Fiefco attempted to enter the gallies from the flore, to which they were made fast, they were in no condition to make refiftance, as they were not only unrigged and difarmed, but had no crew on board, except the flaves chained to the oar. Every quarter of the city was now filled with noife and tumult, all the flreets refounding with the cry of Fiefco and Liberty. At that name, fo popular and beloved, many of the lower rank took arms and joined the confpirators. The nobles and partifaus of the ariftocracy, aftonished or affrighted, shut the gates of their houfes, and thought of nothing but of fecuring them from pillage. At last the noife excited by this scene of violence and confusion, reached the palace of Doria; Giannetino flarted immediately from his bed, and imagining that it was occafioned by fome mutiny among the failors, rufhed out with a few attendants, and hurried towards the harbour. The gate of St. Thomas, through which he had to pafs. was already in the possefion of the conspirators, who, the moment he appeared, fell upon him with the utmost fury. and murdered him on the fpot. The fame must have been the fate of the elder Doria, if Jerome de Fiefco bad executed his brother's plan, and had proceeded immediately to attack him in his palace; but he, from the fordid confideration of preventing its being plundered amidft the confusion, having forbid his followers to advance, Andrew got intelligence of his nephew's death, as well as of his own danger; and mounting on horfeback, faved himfelf by flight Amidft this general confternation, a few fenators had the courage to affemble in the palace of the republict. At first, fome of the most daring among them attempted to rally the feattered foldiers, and to attack a body of the confpirators; but being repulfed with lofs, all agreed that nothing now remained, but to treat with the party which feemed to be irrefiftible. Deputies were accordingly fent to learn of Fiefco what were the conceffions with which he would be fatisfied, or rather to fubmit to whatever terms he should pleafe to prefcribe.

But by this time Fielco, with which they were empowered to negotiate, was no more. Just as he was about to leave the harbour, where every thing had fucceeded to his wifh, that he night join his victorious companions, he heard fome extraordinary uproar on board the admiral galley. Alarmed at the noife, and fearing that the flaves might break their chains, and overpower his affociates, he ran thither; but the plank which reached from the fhore to the weffel happening to overturn, he fell into the fea, whilft he hurried forward too precipitately. Being loaded with heawy armour, he funk to the bottom, and perifhed in the very moment when he must have taken full possession of every thing that his ambitious heart could defire. Verrina was the first who difcovered this fatal accident, and forefeeing, at once, all its confequences, concealed it with the utmost industry from every one but a few leaders of the confpiracy. Nor was it difficult, amidst the darkness and confusion of the night, to have kept it fecret, until a treaty with the fenators should have put the city in the power of the confpirators. All their hopes of this were difconcerted by the imprudence of Jerome Fiefco, who, when the deputies of the fenate inquired for his brother, the count of Lavagna, that they might make their propofals to him, replied with a childifh vanity, " I am now the only perfon to whom that title belongs, and with me you must treat. These words difcovered as well to his friends as to his enemies what had inappened, and made the impreffion which might have been expected upon both. The deputies, encouraged by this event, the only one which could occafion fuch a fudden revolution as might turn to their advantage, affumed inftantly with admirable prefence of mind, a new tone, fuitable to the change in their circumftances, and made high demands. While they endeavoured to gain time by protracting the negotiation, the reft of the fenators were bufy in affembling their partifans, and in forming a body capable of defending the palace of the republic. On the other hand, the conspirators, aftonifhed at the death of a man whom they adored and trufted, and placing no confidence in Jerome, a giddy youth, felt their eourage die away, and their arms fall. from their hands. That profound and amazing fecreey with which the confpiracy had been concerted, and which had contributed hitherto fo much to its fuccefs, proved now the chief caufe of its mifcarriage. The leader was gone;the greater part of those who acted under him, knew not his confidents, and were frangers to the object at which he aimed. There was no perfon among them whofe authority: or abilities entitled him to assume Fielco's place, or to finish his plan; after having loft the fpirit which animated it, life and activity deferted the whole body. Many of the confpirators withdrew to their houfes, hoping that amidit the darkness of the night they had passed unobserved, and might remain unknown. Others fought for fafety by a timely retreat; and before break of day, most of them fled with precipitation from a city, which but a few hours before, was ready to aeknowledge them as mafters.

Next morning every thing was quiet in Genoa; not an enemy was to be feen; few marks of the violence of the former night appeared, the confpirators having conducted their enterprife with more noife than bloodfhed, and gained all their advantages by furprife, rather than by force of arms. Towards evening, Andrew Doria returned to the city, being met by all the inhabitants, who received him with aeelamations of joy. Though the difgrace as well as danger of the preceding night were frefh in his mind, and the mangled body of his kinfman ftill before his eyes, fuch was his moderation as well as magnanimity, that the decree iffued by the fenate against the confpirators, did not exceed that just measure of feverity which was requisite for the fupport of government, and was dictated neither by the violence of refentment, nor the raneour of revenge *.†

After taking the neceffary precautions for preventing the flame, which was now fo happily extinguished, from breaking out anew, the first care of the fenate was to fend an ambaffador to the emperor, to give him a particular detail of what happened, and to beg his affiftance towards the reduction of Montobbio, a ftrong fort on the hereditary effate of the Fiefci, in which Jerome had shut himself up. Charles was no lefs alarmed than aftonifhed at an event fo ftrange and unexpected. He could not believe that Fiefco, how bold or adventurous foever, durit have attempted fuch an enterprife, but on foreign fuggestion, and from the hope of foreign aid. Being informed that the duke of Parma was well acquainted with the plan of the confpirators, he immediately fuppofed that the pope could not be ignorant of a meafure, which his fon had countenanced. Proceeding from this to a farther conjecture, which Paul's cautious maxims of policy in other inftances rendered extremely probable, he concluded that the French king must have known and approved of the defign; and he began to apprehend that this fpark might again kindle the flame of war which had raged fo long in Italy. As he had drained his Italian territories of troops on account of the German war, he was altogether unprovided for refifting any hoffile attack in that country; and on the first appearance of danger, he must have detached thither the greateft part of his forces for its defence. In this fituation of affairs, it would have been altogether imprudent in the emperor to have advanced in perfon against the elector, until he should learn with some degree of certainty whether fuch a fcene were not about to open in Italy, as might put it out of his power to keep the field with an army fufficient to oppofe him.

teen, composed a history of this confpiracy, containing such a difcovery of his admiration of Fiesco and his enterprise, as render it not surprising that a minister, so jealous and difcerning as Richlieu, should be led, by the perusal of it, to predict the turbulent and dangerous spirit of that young ecclesiastic. # BOOK IX.

THE emperor's dread of the hoftile intentions of the pope and French king did not proceed from any imaginary or illgrounded fuspicion. Paul had already given the ftrongeft proofs both of his jealoufy and enmity. Charles could not hope that Francis, after a rivalship of fo long continuance, would behold the great advantages which he had gained over the confederate protestants, without feeling his ancient emulation revive. He was not deceived in this conjecture. Francis had obferved the rapid progrefs of his arms with deep concern, and though hitherto prevented, by circumflances which have been mentioned, from interpoling in order to check them, he was now convinced that, if he did not make fome extraordinary and timely effort, Charles muft acquire fuch a degree of power as would enable him to give law to the reft of Europe. This apprehenfion which did not take its rife from the jealoufy of rivalship alone, but was entertained by the wifest politicians of the age, suggested various expedients which might ferve to retard the course of the emperor's victories, and to form by degrees fuch a combination against him as might put a stop to his dangerous career.

With this view, Francis inftructed his emiffaries in Germany to employ all their addrefs in order to revive the courage of the confederates, and to prevent them from fubmitting to the emperor. He made liberal offers of his affiftance to the elector and landgrave, whom he knew to be the moft zealous as well as the moft powerful of the whole body; he ufed every argument and propofed every advantage which could either confirm their dread of the emperor's defigns, or determine them not to imitate the inconfiderate credulity of their affociates, in giving up their religion and liberties to his difpofal. While he took this flep towards continuing the civil war which raged in Germany, he endeavoured likewife to ftir up foreign enemies against the emperor. He folicited Solyman to feize this favourable opportunity of invading Hungary, which had been drained of all the troops neceffary for its defence, in order to form the army against the confederates of Smalkalde. He exhorted the pope to repair, by a vigorous and leafonable effort, the error of which he had been guilty in contributing to raife the emperor to fuch a formidable height of power. Finding Paul, both from the confcioufnels of his own miltake, and his dread of its confequences, abundantly disposed to listen to what he fuggested, he availed himfelf of this favourable disposition which the pontiff began to discover, as an argument to gain the Venetians. He endeavoured to convince them that nothing could fave Italy, and even Europe, from oppreffion and fervitude, but their joining with the pope and him, in giving the first beginning to a general confederacy, in order to humble that ambitious potentate, whom they had all equal reafon to dread.

Having fet on foot these negotiations in the fouthern courts, he turned his attention next towards those in the north of Europe. As the king of Denmark had particular reafons to be offended with the emperor, Francis imagined that the object of the league which he had projected would be highly acceptable to him: and left confiderations of caution or prudence would reflrain him from joining in it, he attempted to overcome thefe, by offering him the young queen of Scots in marriage to his fon +. As the ministers who governed England in the name of Edward VI. had openly declared themfelves converts to the opinions of the reformers, as foon as it became fafe upon Henry's death to lay afide that difguife which his intolerant bigotry had forced them to affume, Francis flattered himfelf that their zeal would not allow them to remain inactive spectators of the overthrow and deftruction of those who profeffed the fame faith with themfelves. He hoped, that notwithftanding the ftruggles of faction incident to a minority, and the profpect of an approaching rupture with the Scots, he might prevail on them likewife to take part in the common caufe ‡.

While Francis employed fuch a variety of expedients, and exerted himfelf with fuch extraordinary activity, to roufe the different flates of Europe againft his rival, he did not neglect what depended on himfelf alone. He levied troops in all parts of his dominions; he collected military flores; he contracted with the Swifs cantons for a confiderable body of men; he put his finances in admirable order; he remitted confiderable fums to the elector and landgrave; and took all the other fleps neceffary towards commencing hoftilities, on the florteft warning, and with the greateft vigour *.

Operations fo complicated, and which required the putting fo many inftruments in motion, did not escape the emperor's obfervation. He was early informed of Francis's intrigues in the feveral courts of Europe, as well as of his domestic preparations; and fensible how fatal an interruption a foreign war would prove to his defigns in Germany, he trembled at the profpect of that event. The danger, however, appeared to him as unavoidable as it was great. He knew the infatiable and well-directed ambition of Solyman, and that he always chofe the feafon for beginning his military enterprifes with prudence equal to the valour with which he conducted them. The pope, as he had good reafon to believe, wanted not pretexts to justify a rupture, nor inclination to begin hoftilities. He had already made fome difcovery of his fentiments, by expreffing a joy altogether unbecoming the head of the church, upon receiving an account of the advantage which the elector of Saxony had gained over Albert of Brandenburg; and as he was now fecure of finding, in the French king, an ally of fufficient power to fupport him, he was at no pains to conceal the violence and extent of his enmity §. The Venetians, Charles was well affured, had long obferved the growth of his power with jealoufy, which, added to the folicitations and promifes of France, might at laft quicken their flow counfels, and overcome their natural caution. The Danes and Englifh, it was evident, had both peculiar reafon to be difgufted, as well as ftrong motives to act againft him. But above all, he dreaded the active emulation of Francis himfelf, whom he confidered as the foul and mover of any confederacy that could be formed againft him; and as that monarch had afforded protection to Verrina, who failed directly to Marfeilles upon the mifcarriage of Fiefco's confpiracy, Charles expected every moment to fee the commencement of thofe hoftile operations in Italy, of which he conceived the infurrection in Genoa to have been only the prelude.

But while he remained in this flate of fuspenfe and folicitude, there was one circumstance which afforded him fome prospect of avoiding the danger. The French king's health began to decline. A difeafe, which was the effect of his intemperance and inconfiderate purfuit of pleafure, preyed gradually on his conflitution. The preparations for war, as well as the negotiations in the different courts, began to languish, together with the monarch who gave fpirit to both. The Genoefe, during that interval [March] reduced Montobbio, took Jerome Fiefco prifoner, and having put him to death, together with his chief adherents, extinguished all remains of the confpiracy. Several of the Imperial cities in Germany, defpairing of timely affiftance from France, fubmitted to the emperor. Even the landgrave feemed disposed to abandon the elector, and to bring matters to a fpeedy accommodation, on fuch terms as he could obtain. In the mean time, Charles waited with impatience the iffue of a diftemper, which was to decide whether he must relinquish all other schemes, in order to prepare for refilting a combination of the greater part of Europe against him, or whether he might proceed to invade Saxony, without interruption or fear of danger.

The good fortune, fo remarkably propitious to his family, that fome hiftorians have called it the Star of the Houfe of Austria, did not desert him on this occasion. Francis died at Rambouillet, on the last day of March, in the fiftythird year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign. During twenty-eight years of that time, an avowed rivalship fubfifted between him and the emperor, which involved not only their own dominions, but the greater part of Europe, in wars, which were profecuted with more violent animofity, and drawn out to a greater length, than had been known in any former period. Many circumftances contributed to this. Their animofity was founded in oppofition of intereft, heightened by perfonal emulation, and exafperated not only by mutual injuries, but by reciprocal infults. At the fame time, whatever advantage one feemed to poffefs towards gaining the afcendant, was wonderfully balanced by fome favourable circumstance peculiar to the other. The emperor's dominious were of greater extent, the French king's lay more compact; Francis governed his kingdom with abfolute power; that of Charles was limited, but he fupplied the want of authority by addrefs: the troops of the former were more impetuous and enterprifing; those of the latter better difciplined, and more patient of fatigue. The talents and abilities of the two monarchs were as different as the advantages which they poffeffed, and contributed no lefs to prolong the contcit between them. Francis took his refolutions fuddenly, profecuted them at first with warmth, and pufhed them into execution with a most adventurous courage; but being deftitute of the perfeverance neceffary to furmount difficulties, he often abandoned his defigns, or relaxed the vigour of purfuit, from impatience, and fometimes from levity. Charles deliberated long, and determined with coolnefs; but having once fixed his plan, he adhered to it with inflexible obflinacy, and neither danger nor dif-

THE REIGN OF THE

couragement could turn him afide from the execution of it. The fuccefs of their enterprifes was fuitable to the diverfity of their characters, and was uniformly influenced by it. Francis, by his impetuous activity, often disconcerted the emperor's best laid fehemes; Charles, by a more calm but fleady profecution of his defigns, checked the rapidity of his rival's career, and basfled or repulsed his most vigorous efforts. The former, at the opening of a war or of a campaign, broke in upon his enemy with the violence of a torrent, and carried all before him; the latter, waiting until. he faw the force of his rival begin to abate, recovered in the end not only all that he had loft, but made new acquifitions. Few of the French monarch's attempts towards conqueft, whatever promifing afpect they might wear at first, were conducted to a happy iffue; many of the emperor's enterprifes, even after they appeared desperate and impracticable, terminated in the most prosperous manner. Francis was dazzled with the fplendour of an undertaking; Charles was allured by the profpect of its turning to his advantage.

The degree, however, of their comparative merit and reputation has not been fixed either by a strict scrutiny into their abilities for government, or by an impartial confideration of the greatness and fuccess of their undertakings: and Francis is one of those monarchs who occupies a higher rank in the temple of Fame, than either his talents or performances entitle him to hold. This pre-eminence he owed to many different circumflances. The fuperiority which Charles acquired by the victory of Pavia, and which from that period he preferved through the remainder of his reign, was fo manifest, that Francis's struggle against his exorbitant and growing dominion was viewed by molt of the other powers, not only with the partiality which naturally arifes for those who gallantly maintain an unequal contest, but with the favour due to one who was refifting a common enemy, and endeavouring to fet bounds to a monarch equally formidable to them all. The characters of princes, too, cfpecially among their contemporaries, depend not only upon their talents for government, but upon their qualities as men. Francis, notwithstanding the many errors confpicuous in his foreign policy and domestic administration, was nevertheless humane, beneficent, generous. He posselfed dignity without pride; affability free from meannefs; and courtefy exempt from deceit. All who had accefs to him, and no man of merit was ever denied that privilege, respected and loved him. Captivated with his perfonal qualities, his fubjects forgot his defects as a monarch, and admiring him as the most accomplished and amiable gentleman in his dominions, they hardly murmured at acts of male-administration, which, in a prince of lefs engaging difpofitions, would have been deemed unpardonable. This admiration, however, must have been temporary only, and would have died away, with the courtiers who beflowed it; the illufion arifing from his private virtues muft have ceafed, and pofterity would have judged of his public conduct with its usual impartiality; but another circumstance prevented this, and his name hath been transmitted to posterity with increasing reputation. Science and the arts had, at that time, made little progrefs in France. They were just beginning to advance beyond the limits of Italy, where they had revived, and which had hitherto been their only feat. Francis took them immediately under his protection, and vied with Leo himfelf, in the zeal and munificence with which he encouraged them. He invited learned men to his court, he conversed with them familiarly, he employed them in business, he raifed them to offices of dignity, and honoured them with his confidence. That order of men, not more prone to complain when denied the respect to which they conceive themfelves entitled, than apt to be pleafed when treated with the diffinction which they confider as their due, thought they could not exceed in gratitude to fuch a benefactor, and strained their invention, and employed all their ingenuity in panegyric. Succeeding authors, warmed with their deferiptions of Francis's bounty, adopted their encomiums, and even added to them. The appellation of Father of Letters beftowed upon Francis, hath rendered his memory facred among hiftorians; and they feem to have regarded it as a fort of impiety to uncover his infirmities, or to point out his defects. Thus Francis, notwithstanding his inferior abilities, and want of fuecefs, hath more than equalled the fame of Charles. The good qualities which he poffeffed as a man, have entitled him to greater admiration and praife than have been beftowed upon the extensive genius and fortunate arts of a more capable, but lefs amiable rival.

By his death a confiderable change was made in the flate of Europe. Charles, grown old in the arts of government and command, had now to contend only with younger monarchs, who could not be regarded as worthy to enter the lifts with him, who had flood fo many encounters with Henry VIII. and Francis I. and come off with honour in all those different ftruggles. By this event, he was eafed of all his difquietude, and was happy to find that he might begin with fafety those operations against the elector of Saxony, which he had hitherto been obliged to fuspend. He knew the abilities of Henry II. who had just mounted the throne of France, to be greatly inferior to those of his father, and forefaw that he would be fo much occupied for fome time in difplacing the late king's ministers, whom he hated, and in gratifying the ambitious demands of his own favourites, that he had nothing to dread, either from his perfonal efforts, or from any confederacy which this unexperienced prince could form.

But as it was uncertain how long fuch an interval of fecurity might continue, Charles determined inftantly to improve it: and as foon as he heard of Francis's demife, he began his march [April 13] from Egra on the borders of Bohemia. But the departure of the papal troops, together with the retreat of the Flemings, had fo much diminified his army, that fixteen thoufand men were all he could affem-

ble. With this inconfiderable body he fet out on an expedition, the event of which was to decide what degree of authority he should possels from that period in Germany: but as this little army confifted chiefly of the veteran Spanish and Italian bands, he did not, in trufting to them, commit much to the decision of chance; and even with fo fmall a force he had reason to entertain the most fanguine hopes of fuccefs. The elector had levied an army greatly fuperior in number; but neither the experience and discipline of his troops, nor the abilities of his officers, were to be compared with those of the emperor. The elector, befides, had already been guilty of an error, which deprived him of all the advantage which he might have derived from his fuperiority in number, and was alone fufficient to have occasioned his ruin. Inflcad of keeping his forces united, he detached one great body towards the frontiers of Bohemia, in order to facilitate his junction with the malecontents of that kingdom, and cantoned a confiderable part of what remained in different places of Saxony, where he expected the emperor would make the first impression, vainly imagining that open towns, with fmall garrifons, might be rendered tenable against an enemy.

The emperor entered the fouthern frontier of Saxony, and attacked Altorf upon the Elfter. The impropriety of the meafure which the elector had taken was immediately feen, the troops pofted in that town furrendering without refiftance; and thofe in all the other places between that and the Elbe, either imitated their example, or fled as the Imperialifts approached. Charles that they might not recover from the panic with which they feemed to be flruck, advanced without lofing a moment. The elector, who had fixed his head-quarters at Meiffen, continued in his wonted flate of fluctuation and uncertainty. He even became more undetermined, in proportion as the danger drew near, and called for prompt and decifive refolutions. Sometimes he acted as if he had refolved to defend the banks of the Elbe, and to hazard a battle with the enemy, as foon as the detachments which he had called in were able to join him. At other times he abandoned this as rafh and perilous, feeming to adopt the more prudent counfels of those who advifed him to endeavour at protracting the war, and for that end to retire under the fortifications of Wittemberg, where the Imperialists could not attack him without manifest difadvantage, and where he might wait, in fafety, for the fuccours which he expected from Mecklenburgh; Pomerania, and the protestant cities on the Baltic. Without fixing upon either of thefe plans, he broke down the bridge at Meiffen, and marched along the east bank of the Elbe to Muhlberg. There he deliberated anew, and, after much hefitation, adopted one of those middle schemes, which are always acceptable to feeble minds incapable of deciding. He left a detachment at Muhlberg to oppose the Imperialifts, if they should attempt to pass at that place, and advancing a few miles with his main body, encamped there in expectation of the event, according to which he proposed to regulate his fubfequent motions.

Vol. III.

Charles, meanwhile, pushing forward inceffantly, arrived the evening of the twenty-third of April on the banks of the Elbe, opposite to Muhlberg. The river, at that place, was three hundred paces in breadth, above four feet in depth, its current rapid, and the bank poffeffed by the Saxons was higher than that which he occupied. Undifmayed, however, by all thefe obflacles, he called together his general officers, and, without afking their opinions, communicated to them his intention of attempting next morning to force his paffage over the river, and to attack the enemy wherever he could come up with them. They all expressed their allonishment at fuch a bold refolution; and even the duke of Alva, though naturally daring and impetuous, and Maurice of Saxony, notwithstanding his impatience to crush his rival the elector, remonfirated earneftly against it. But the emperer, confiding in his own judgment or good for1547.]

tune, paid no regard to their arguments, and gave the orders necesflary for executing his defigns.

Early in the morning a body of Spanish and Italian foot marched towards the river, and began an inceffant fire upon the enemy. The long heavy mufkets used in that age, did execution on the opposite bank, and many of the foldiers, hurried on by a martial ardour in order to get nearer the enemy, rufhed into the ftream, and, advancing breaft high, fired with a more certain aim, and with greater effect. Under cover of their fire, a bridge of boats was begun to be laid for the infantry; and a peafant having undertaken to conduct the cavalry through the river by a ford with which he was well acquainted, they also were put in motion. The Saxons posted in Muhlberg endeavoured to obstruct these operations, by a brifk fire from a battery which they had erected; but as a thick fog covered all the low grounds upon the river, they could not take aim with any certainty, and the Imperialists fuffered very little; at the fame time the Saxons being much galled by the Spaniards and Italians, they fet on fire fome boats which had been collected near the village, and prepared to retire. The Imperialifts perceiving this, ten Spanish foldiers instantly stript themselves, and holding their fwords with their teeth, fwam acrofs the river, put to flight fuch of the Saxons as ventured to oppose them, faved from the flames as many boats as were fufficient to complete their own bridge, and by this fpirited and fuccefsful action, encouraged their companions no lefs than they intimidated the enemy.

By this time the cavalry, each trooper having a foot foldier hehind him, began to enter the river, the light horfe marching in the front, followed by the men at arms, whom the emperor led in perfon, mounted on a Spanish horfe, dreffed in a fumptuous habit, and carrying a javelin in his hand. Such a numerous body struggling through a great river, in which, according to the directions of their guide, they were obliged to make feveral turns, fometimes treading.

on a firm bottom, fometimes fwimming, prefented to their companions, whom they left behind, a fpectacle equally magnificent and interefting  $\uparrow$ . Their courage, at laft, furmounted every obftacle, no man betraying any fymptom of fear, when the emperor fhared in the danger no lefs than the meaneft foldier. The moment that they reached the oppofite fide, Charles, without waiting the arrival of the reft of the infantry, advanced towards the Saxons with the troops which had paffed along with him, who, flufhed with their good fortune, and defpifing an enemy who had neglected to oppofe them, when it might have been done with fuch advantage, made no account of their fuperior numbers, and marched on as to a certain victory.

During all these operations, which necessarily confumed much time, the elector remained inactive in his camp; and from an infatuation which appears to be fo amazing, that the best informed historians impute it to the treachcrous arts of his generals, who deceived him by falfe intelligence, he would not believe that the emperor had paffed the river, or could be fo near at hand *. Being convinced, at laft, of his fatal miltake, by the concurring teltimony of eye-witneffes, he gave orders for retreating towards Wittemberg. But a German army, encumbered, as ufual, with baggage and artillery, could not be put fuddenly in motion. They had juft begun to march when the light troops of the enemy came in view, and the elector faw an engagement to be unavoidable. As he was no lefs bold in action than irrefolute in council, he made the disposition for battle with the greatest prefence of mind, and in the most proper manner, taking advantage of a great forest to cover his wings, fo as to prevent his being furrounded by the enemy's cavalry, which were far more numerous than his own. The emperor, likewife, ranged his men in order as they came up, and riding along the ranks, exhorted them with few but efficacious words to do their duty. It was with a very different fpirit that the two armies advanced to the charge. As the day, which had hitherto been dark and cloudy, happened to clear up at that moment, this accidental circumftance made an imprefilion on the different parties corresponding to the tone of their minds; the Saxons, furprifed and differentened, felt pain at being exposed fully to the view of the enemy: the up at that moment, this accidental circumftance made an impression on the different parties corresponding to the tone of their minds; the Saxons, furprifed and disheartened, felt pain at being exposed fully to the view of the enemy; the Imperialifts, being now fecure that the protestant forces could not escape from them, rejoiced at the return of funfhine, as a certain prefage of victory. The flock of battle would not have been long doubtful, if the perfonal courage which the elector difplayed, together with the activity which he exerted from the moment that the approach of the enemy rendered an engagement certain, and cut off all poffibility of hefitation, had not revived in fome degree the fpirit of his troops. They repulfed the Hungarian light-horfe who began the attack, and received with firmnefs the men at arms who next advanced to the charge; but as thefe were the flower of the Imperial army, were commanded by experienccd officers, and fought under the emperor's eye, the Saxons foon began to give way, and the light troops rallying at the fame time and falling on their flanks, the flight became general. A fmall body of chofen foldiers, among whom the elector had fought in perfon, still continued to defend themfelves, and endeavoured to fave their master by retiring into the foreft; but being furrounded on every fide, the elector wounded in the face, exhausted with fatigue, and perceiving all refiftance to be vain, furrendered himfelf a prifoner. He was conducted immediately towards the emperor, whom he found just returned from the purfuit, standing on the field of battle in the full exultation of fuccels, and receiving the congratulations of his officers, upon this complete victory obtained by his valour and conduct. Even in fuch an unfortunate and humbling fituation, the elector's behaviour was equally magnanimous and decent. Senfible of his condition, he approached his conqueror without any of the fullennefs or pride which would have been improper in a captive; and confeious of his own dignity, he defcended to no mean fubmiffion, unbecoming the high flation which he held among the German princes. " The fortune of war," faid he, " has made me your priforer, most gracious emperor, and I hope to be treated"----Here, Charles harfhly interrupted him: " And am I then, at laft, acknowledged to be emperor? Charles of Ghent was the only title you lately allowed me. You shall be treated as you deferve." At thefe words he turned from him abruptly with an haughty air. To this cruel repulfe, the king of the Romans added reproaches in his own name, using expressions still more ungenerous and infulting. The elector made no reply; but, with an unaltered countenance, which difcovered neither aftonishment nor dejection, accompanied the Spanish foldiers appointed to guard him t.

This decifive victory coft the Imperialifts only fifty men. Twelve hundred of the Saxons were killed, chiefly in the pursuit, and a greater number taken prifoners. About four hundred kept in a body, and efcaped to Wittemberg, together with the electoral prince, who had likewife been wounded in the action. After refting two days in the field of battle, partly to refresh his army, and partly to receive the deputies of the adjacent towns, which were impatient to fecure his protection by fubmitting to his will, the emperor began to move towards Wittemberg, that he might terminate the war at once, by the reduction of that city. The unfortunate elector was carried along in a fort of triumph, and exposed every where, as a captive, to his own fubjects; a fpectacle extremely afflicting to them, who both honoured and loved him; though the infult was fo far from fubduing his firm fpirit, that it did not even ruffle the wonted tranquillity and composure of his mind.

As Wittemberg, the refidence, in that age, of the electoral branch of the Saxon family, was one of the ftrongeft cities in Germany, and could not be taken, if properly defended, without great difficulty, the emperor marched thither with the utmost difpatch, hoping that while the confternation occafioned by his victory was still recent, the inhabitants might imitate the example of their countrymen, and fubmit to his power, as foon as he appeared before their walls. But Sybilla of Cleves, the elector's wife, a woman no lefs diftinguished by her abilities than her virtue, instead of abandoning herfelf to tears and lamentations upon her husband's misfortune, endeavoured by her example as well as exhortations, to animate the citizens. She infpired them with fuch refolution, that, when fummoned to furrender, they returned a vigorous answer, warning the emperor to behave towards their fovereign with the refpect due to his rank, as they were determined to treat Albert of Brandenburg, who was still a prifoner, precifely in the fame manner that he treated the elector. The fpirit of the inhabitants, no lefs than the ftrength of the city, feemed now to render a liege in form neceffary. After fuch a fignal victory, it would have been difgraceful not to have undertaken it, tho' at the fame time the emperor was defitute of every thing requifite for carrying it on. But Maurice removed all difficulties by engaging to furnish provisions, artillery, ammunition, pioneers, and whatever elfe should be needed. Trusting to this, Charles gave orders to open the trenches before the town. It quickly appeared, that Maurice's eagerness to reduce the capital of those dominions, which he expected as his reward for taking arms against his kinsman, and deferting the protestant caufe, had led him to promife what exceeded his power to perform. A battering train was, indeed, carried fafely down the Elbe from Drefden to Wittemberg; but as Maurice had not fufficient force to preferve a fecure communication between his own territories and the camp of the befiegers, count Mansfeldt, who commanded a body of electoral troops, intercepted and deftroyed a convoy of provisions and military flores, and dispersed a band of pioneers defined for the fervice of the Imperialists. This put a flop to the progress of the fiege, and convinced the emperor, that as he could not rely on Maurice's promises, recours onght to be had to fome more expeditions as well as more certain method of getting posseful of the town.

The unfortunate elector was in his hands, and Charles was ungenerous and hard-hearted enough to take advantage of this, in order to make an experiment whether he might not bring about his defign, by working upon the tendernefs of a wife for her husband, or upon the piety of children towards their parent. With this view, he fummoned Sybilla a fecond time to open the gates, letting her know that if fhe again refused to comply, the elector should answer with his head for her obstinacy. To convince her that this was not an empty threat, he brought his prifoner to an immediate trial. The proceedings against him were as irregular as the ftratagem was barbarous. Inftead of confulting the ftates of the empire, or remitting the caufe to any court, which, according to the German conflitution, might have legally taken cognizance of the elector's crime, he fubjected the greatest prince in the empire to the jurifdiction of a courtmartial, composed of Spanish and Italian officers, and in which the unrelenting duke of Alva, a fit inftrument for any act of violence, prefided [May 10]. This ftrange tribunal founded its charge upon the ban of the empire which had been iffued against the prifoner by the fole authority of the emperor, and was defitute of every legal formality which could render it valid. But the court-martial, prefuming the elector to be thereby manifeftly convicted of treafon and rebellion, condemned him to fuffer death by being beheaded. This decree was intimated to the elector while he was amufing himfelf in playing at chefs with Erneft of Brunfwick his fellow-prifoner. He paufed for a moment, though without discovering any symptom either of surprise or terror; and after taking notice of the irregularity as well as injustice of the emperor's proceedings: " It is eafy, continued he, to comprehend his scheme. I must die, because Wittemberg will not furrender, and I shall lay down my life with pleafure, if, by that facrifice, I can preferve the dignity of my house, and transmit to my posterity the inheritance which belongs to them. Would to God, that this fentence may not affect my wife and children more than it intimidates me! and that they, for the fake of adding a few days to a life already too long, may not renounce honours and territories which they were born to poffefs *!" He then turned to his antagonist, whom he challenged to continue the game. He played with his usual attention and ingenuity, and having beat Erneft, expressed all the fatisfaction which is commonly felt on gaining fuch victories. After this, he withdrew to his own apartment, that he might employ the reft of his time in fuch religious exercifes as were proper in his fituation +.

It was not with the fame indifference, or composure, that the account of the elector's danger was received in Wittemberg. Sybilla, who had fupported with fuch undaunted fortitude her husband's missortunes, while she imagined that they could reach no farther than to diminifh his power or territories, felt all her refolution fail as foon as his life was threatened. Solicitous to fave that, fhe defpifed every other confideration; and was willing to make any facrifice, in order to appeale an incenfed conqueror. At the fame time, the duke of Cleves, the elector of Brandenburg, and Maurice, to none of whom Charles had communicated the true motives of his violent proceedings against the elector, interceded warmly with him to fpare his life. The first was prompted fo to do merely by compassion for his fifter, and regard for his brother-in-law. The two others dreaded the univerfal reproach that they would incur, if, after having boafted fo often of the ample fecurity which the emperor had promifed them with refpect to their religion, the first effect of their union with him should be the public execution of a prince, who was justly held in reverence as the most zealous protector of the protestant cause. Maurice, in particular, forefaw that he must become the object of detestation to the Saxons, and could never hope to govern them with tranquillity, if he were confidered by them as accessfary to the death of his nearest kinsman, in order that he might obtain possession.

While they, from fuch various motives, folicited Charles, with the most earnest importunity, not to execute the fentence; Sybilla, and his children, conjured the elector, by letters as well as meffengers, to fcruple at no conceffion that would extricate him out of the prefent danger, and deliver them from their fears and anguish on his account. The emperor, perceiving that the expedient which he had tried began to produce the effect that he intended, fell by degrees from his former rigour, and allowed himfelf to foften into promifes of clemency and forgiveness, if the elector would shew himself worthy of his favour, by fubmitting to reafonable terms. The elector, on whom the confideration of what he might fuffer himfelf had made no impreffion, was melted by the tears of his wife whom he loved, and could not refift the intreaties of his family. In compliance with their repeated folicitations, he agreed to articles of accommodation [May 19,] which he would otherwife have rejected with difdain. The chief of them were, that he should refign the electoral dignity, as well for himfelf as for his pofterity, into the emperor's hands, to be difpofed of entirely at his pleasure; that he should instantly put the Imperial troops in poffession of the cities of Wittemberg and Gotha; that he should fet Albert of Brandenburg at liberty without ranfom; that he flould fubmit to the decrees of the Imperial chamber, and acquiesce in whatever reformation the emperor fhould make in the conftitution of that court; that he fhould renounce all leagues against the emperor or king of the Romans, and enter into no alliance for the future, in which they were not comprehended. In return for thefe important conceffions, the emperor not only promifed to fpare his life, but to fettle on him and his posterity the city of Gotha and its territories, together with an annual penfion of fifty thousand florins, payable out of the revenues of the electorate; and likewife to grant him a fum in ready money to be applied towards the discharge of his debts. Even thefe articles of grace were clogged with the mortifying condition of his remaining the emperor's prifoner during the reft of his life*. To the whole, Charles had fubjoined, that he fhould fubmit to the decrees of the pope and council with regard to the controverted points in religion; but the elector, though he had been perfuaded to facrifice all the objects which men commonly hold to be the dearest and most valuable, was inflexible with regard to this point; and neither threats nor intreaties could prevail to make him renounce what he deemed to be truth, or perfuade him to act in opposition to the dictates of his conscience.

As foon as the Saxon garrifon marched out of Wittemberg, the emperor fulfilled his engagements to Mauricc; and in reward for his merit in having deferted the proteflant caufe, and having contributed with fuch fuccefs towards the diffolution of the Smalkaldic league, he gave him poffeffion of that city, together with all the other towns in the electorate. It was not without reluctance, however, that he made fuch a facrifice; the extraordinary fuccefs of his arms had begun to operate in its ufual manner, upon his ambitious mind, fuggefting new and vaft projects for the aggrandifement of his family, towards the accomplifhment of which the retaining of Saxony would have been of the utmost confequence. But as this fcheme was not then ripe for execution, he durft not yet venture to difelofe it; nor would it have been either fafe or prudent to offend Maurice at this juncture, by fuch a manifest violation of all the promifes, which had feduced him to abandon his natural allies.

The landgrave, Maurice's father-in-law, was still in arms; and though now left alone to maintain the protestant caufe, was neither a feeble nor contemptible enemy. His dominions were of confiderable extent; his fubjects animated with zeal for the reformation; and if he could have held the Imperialifts at bay for a fhort time, he had much to hope from a party whofe strength was still unbroken, whose union as well as vigour might return, and which had reafon to depend, with certainty, on being effectually fupported by the king of France. The landgrave thought not of any thing fo bold or adventurous; but being feized with the fame confternation which had taken possefion of his alfociates, he was intent only on the means of procuring favourable terms from the emperor, whom he viewed as a conqueror, to whofe will there was a neceffity of fubmitting. Maurice encouraged this tame and pacific fpirit, by magnifying, on the one hand, the emperor's power; by boafting, on the other, of his own interest with his victorious ally; and by reprefenting the advantageous conditions which he could not fail of obtaining by his interceffion for a friend, whom he was fo folicitous to fave. Sometimes the landgrave was induced to place fuch unbounded confidence in his promifes, that he was impatient to bring matters to a final accommodation. On other occasions, the emperor's exorbitant ambition, reftrained neither by the fcruples of decency, nor the maxims of juffice, together with the recent and shocking proof which he had given of this in his treatment of the elector of Saxony, came fo full into his thoughts, and made fuch a lively impreffion on them, that he broke off abruptly the negotiations which he had begun; feeming to be convinced that it was more prudent to depend for fafety on his own arms, than to coufide in Charles's generofity.

But this bold refolution, which defpair had fuggefled to an impatient fpirit, fretted by difappointments, was not of long continuance. Upon a more deliberate furvey of the enemy's power, as well as his own weaknefs, his doubts and fears returned upon him, and together with them the fpirit of negotiating, and the defire of accommodation.

Maurice and the clector of Brandenburg acted as mediators between him and the emperor; and after all that the former had vaunted of his influence, the conditions preferibed to the landgrave were extremely rigorous. The articles with regard to his renouncing the league of Smalkalde, acknowledging the emperor's authority, and fubmitting to the decrees of the Imperial chamber, were the fame which had been imposed on the elector of Saxony. Befides these, he was required to furrender his perfon and territories to the emperor; to implore for pardon on his knees; to pay an hundred and fifty thousand crowns towards defraying the expences of the war; to demolifh the fortifications of all the towns in his dominions except one; to oblige the garrifon which he placed in it to take an oath of fidelity to the emperor; to allow a free paffage through his territories to the Imperial troops as often as it shall be demanded; to deliver up all his artillery and ammunition to the emperor; to fet at liberty, without ranfom, Henry of Brunfwick, together with the other prifoners whom he had taken during the war; and neither to take arms himfelf, nor to permit any of his fubjects to ferve against the emperor or his allies for the future +.

The landgrave ratified thefe articles, though with the utmost reluctance, as they contained no flipulation with regard to the manner in which he was to be treated, and left him entirely at the emperor's mercy. Neceffity, however compelled him to give his affent to them. Charles who had affumed the haughty and imperious tone of a conquercr, ever fince the reduction of Saxony, infifted on unconditional fubmiffion, and would permit nothing to be added to the terms which he had preferibed, that could in any degree limit the fulnefs of his power, or reftrain him from behaving as he faw meet towards a prince whom he regarded as abfolutely at his difpofal. But though he would not vouchfafe to negotiate with the landgrave on fuch a footing of equality, as to fuffer any article to be inferted among those which he had dictated to him, that could be confidered as a formal flipulation for the fecurity and freedom of his own perfon; he, or his ministers in his name, gave the elector of Brandenburg and Maurice fuch full fatisfaction with regard to this point, that they affured the landgrave, that Charles would behave to him in the fame way as he had done to the duke of Wurtemberg, and would allow him, whenever he had made his fubmillion, to return to his own territories. Upon finding the landgrave to be still posseffed with his former fufpicions of the emperor's intentions, and unwilling to truft verbal or ambiguous declarations, in a matter of fuch effential concern as his own liberty, they fent him a bond figned by them both, containing the most folemn obligations, that if any violence whatfoever was offered to his person, during his interview with the emperor, they would instantly furrender themfelves to his fous, and remain in their hands to be treated by them in the fame manner as the emperor fhould treat him *.

This, together with the indifpentable obligation of performing what was contained in the articles of which he had accepted, removed his doubts and feruples, or made it neceffary to get over them. He repaired for that purpofe, to the Imperial camp at Hall in Saxony, where a circumflance occurred which revived his fulpicions and increased his fears. Just as he was about to enter the chamber of prefence, in order to make his public fubmiffion to the emperor, a copy of the articles which he had approved of was put into his hands, in order that he might ratify them anew. Upon perufing them, he perceived that the Imperial miniflers had added two new articles; one importing, that if any difpute fhould arife concerning the meaning of the former conditions, the emperor should have the right of putting what interpretation upon them he thought most reasonable; the other, that the landgrave was bound to fubmit implicitly to the decisions of the council of Trent. This unworthy artifice, calculated to furprife him into an approbation of articles, to which he had not the most distant idea of affenting, by propoling them to him at a time when his mind was engroffed and difquieted with the thoughts of that humiliating ceremony which he had to perform, filled the landgrave with indignation, and made him break out into all those violent expressions of rage to which his temper was prone. With fome difficulty, the elector of Brandenburg and Maurice prevailed at length on the emperor's minifters to drop the former article as unjuft, and to explain the latter in fuch a manner, that he could agree to it, without openly renouncing the protestant religion.

This obftacle being furmounted, the landgrave was impatient to finish a ceremony which, how mortifying foever, had been declared neceffary towards his obtaining pardon. The emperor was feated on a magnificent throne, with all the enfigns of his dignity, furrounded by a numerous train of the princes of the empire, among whom was Henry of Brunfwick, lately the landgrave's prifoner, and now, by a sudden reverse of fortune, a spectator of his humiliation. The landgrave was introduced with great folemnity, and advancing towards the throne, fell upon his knees. His chancellor, who walked behind him, immediately read, by his mafter's command, a paper which contained an humble confession of the crime whereof he had been guilty; an ac. knowledgment that he had merited on that account the molt fevere punifhment; an abfolute refignation of himfelf and his dominions to be difpofed of at the emperor's pleafure; a fubmifive petition for pardon, his hopes of which were founded entirely on the emperor's clemency; and it concluded with promifes of behaving, for the future, like a fubject whofe principles of loyalty and obedience would be confirmed, and would even derive new force from the fentiments of gratitude which must hereafter fill and animate his heart. While the chancellor was reading this abject declaration, the eyes of all the spectators were fixed on the unfortunate landgrave; few could behold a prince, fo powerful as well as high-fpirited, fuing for mercy in the pofture of a fuppliant, without being touched with commiferation, and perceiving ferious reflections arife in their minds upon the inflability and emptinefs of human grandeur. The emperor viewed the whole transaction with an haughty unfeeling composure; and preferving a profound filence himfelf, made a fign to one of his fecretaries to read his answer: the tenor of which was, That though he might have juftly inflicted on him the grievous punifhment which his crimes deferved, yet, prompted by his own generofity, moved by the folicitations of feveral princes in behalf of the landgrave, and influenced by his penitential acknowledgments, he would not deal with him according to the rigour of juffice, and would fubject him to no penalty that was not fpecified in the articles which he had already fubfcribed. The moment the fecretary had finished, Charles turned away abruptly, without deigning to give the unhappy fuppliant any fign of compassion or reconcilement. He did not even defire him to rife from his knees; which the landgrave having ventured to do unbidden, advanced towards the emperor with an intention to kifs his hand, flattering himfelf, that his guilt being now fully expiated, he might prefume to take that liberty. But the elector of Brandenburg, perceiving that this familiarity would be offenfive to the emperor, interpofed, and defired the landgrave to go along with him and Maurice to the duke of Alva's apartments in the caffle.

He was received and entertained by that nobleman with the respect and courtefy due to fuch a gueft. But after fupper, while he was engaged in play, the duke took the elector and Maurice aside, and communicated to them the emperor's orders, that the landgrave must remain a prifoner in . that place under the cuftody of a Spanish guard. As they had not hitherto entertained the most distant fuspicion of the emperor's fineerity or rectitude of intention, their furprife was exceffive, and their indignation not inferior to it, ou difeovering how greatly they had been deceived themfelves, and how infamoufly abufed, in having been made the inftruments of deceiving and ruining their friend. They had recourfe to complaints, to arguments, and to entreaties, in order to fave themfelves from that difgrace, and to extrieate him out of the wretched fituation into which he had been betrayed by too great confidence in them. But the duke of Alva remained inflexible, and pleaded the necessity of executing the emperor's commands. By this time it grew late, and the landgrave, who knew nothing of what had paffed, nor dreaded the fnare in which he was entangled, prepared for departing, when the fatal orders were intimated to him. He was firuek dumb at first with astonishment, but after being filent a few moments, he broke out into all the violent expressions which horror, at injustice accompanied with fraud, naturally fuggefts. He complained, he expostulated, he exclaimed; fometimes inveighing against the emperor's artifiees as unworthy of a great and generous prince; fometimes centuring the eredulity of his friends in trufting to Charles's infidious promifes; fometimes charging them with meannefs in flooping to lend their affiftance towards the execution of fuch a perfidious and dithonourable scheme; and in the end he required them to remember their engagements to his ehildren, and inftantly to fulfil them. They, after giving way for a little to the torrent of his paffion, folemnly afferted their own innocence and upright intention in the whole transaction, and encouraged him to hope, that as foon as they faw the emperor, they would obtain redrefs of an injury, which affected their own honour, no lefs than it did his liberty. At the fame time, in order to foothe his rage and impatience, Manrice remained with him during the night, in the apartment where he was confined†.

Next morning, the elector and Mauriee applied jointly to the emperor, reprefenting the infamy to which they would be exposed throughout Germany, if the landgrave were detained in cuftody; that they would not have advifed, nor would he himfelf have confented to an interview, if they had fuspected that the loss of his liberty was to be the confequence of his fubmiffion; that they were bound to procure his releafe, having plighted their faith to that effect, and engaged their own perfons as fureties for his. Charles liftened to their earnest remonstrances with the utmost coolness. As he now flood no longer in need of their fervices, they had the mortification to find that their former oblequioulnefs was forgotten, and little regard paid to their intereeffion. He was ignorant, he told them, of their particular or private transactions with the landgrave, nor was his conduct to be regulated by any engagements into which they had thought lit to enter; though he knew well what he himfelf had promifed, which was not that the landgrave fhould be exempt from all reftraint, but that he fhould not be kept a prifoner during life*. Having faid this with a peremptory

* According to feveral hiftorians of great name, the emperor, in his treaty with the landgrave, flipulated that he would not detain him in any prifon. But in executing the deed, which was written in the German tongue, the Imperial miniflers fraudulently fubfituted the word earger, inflead of einiger, and thus the treaty, in place of a promife that he fhould not be detained in any prifon, contained only an engagement that he fhould not be detained in perpetual impriforment. But authors, eminent for hiftorical knowledge and critical accuracy, have called in quefion the truth of this common flory. The filence of Sleidan with regard to it, as well as its not being mentioned in the various memorials which he has publified concerning the landgrave's impriformenty and decifive tone, he put an end to the conference; and they feeing no probability, at that time, of making any impreffion upon the emperor, who feemed to have taken this refo-Intion deliberately, and to be obfinately bent on adhering to it, were obliged to acquaint the unfortunate prifoner with the ill fuccels of their endeavours in his behalf. The difappointment threw him into a new and more violent tranfport of rage, fo that to prevent his proceeding to fome defperate extremity, the elector and Maurice promifed that they would not quit the emperor, until, by the frequency and fervour of their interceffions, they had extorted his confent to fet him free. They accordingly renewed their folicitations a few days afterwards, but found Charles more haughty and intractable than before, and were warned that if they touched again upon a fubject fo difagreeable, and with regard to which he had determined to hear nothing farther, he would inftantly give orders to convey the prifoner into Spain. Afraid of hurting the landgrave by an officious or ill-timed zeal to ferve him, they not only defifted, but left the court, and as they did not chuse to meet the first fallies of the landgrave's rage upon his learning the caufe of their departure, they informed him of it by a letter, wherein they exhorted him to fulfil all that he had promifed to the emperor, as the most certain means of procuring a fpeedy releafe.

Whatever violent emotions their abandoning his caufe in this manner occafioned, the landgrave's impatience to recover liberty made him follow their advice. He paid the fum which had been imposed on him, ordered his fortreffes to be razed, and renounced all alliances which could give offence.

greatly favour this opinion. But as feveral books which contain the information neceffary towards difcuffing this point with accuracy, are written in the German language, which I do not underfland, I cannot pretend to inquire into this matter with the fame precifion wherewith I have endeavoured to fettle fome other controverted facts which have occurred in the courfe of this hiftory. See Struv. Corp. 1052. Mofheim's Ecclef. Hift. vol. ii. p. 161, 162. Engl. edition.

This prompt compliance with the will of the conqueror produced no effect. He was flill guarded with the fame vigilant feverity; and being carried about, together with the degraded elector of Saxony, wherever the emperor went, their difgrace and his triumph was each day renewed. The fortitude as well as equanimity, with which the elector bore thefe repeated infults, were not more remarkable than the landgrave's fretfulnefs and impatience. His active impetuous mind could ill brook reftraint; and reflection upon the fhameful artifices, by which he had been decoyed into that fituation, as well as indignation at the injuffice with which he was ftill detained in it, drove him often to the wildeft exceffes of paffion.

The people of the different cities, to whom Charles thus wantonly exposed those illustrious prisoners as a public spectacle, were fenfibly touched with fuch an infult offered to . the Germanic body, and murmured loudly at this indecent treatment of two of its greatest princes. They had foon other caufes of complaint, and fuch as affected them more nearly. Charles proceeded to add oppreffion to infult, and arrogating to himfelf all the rights of a conqueror, exercifed them with the utmost rigour. He ordered his troops to feize the artillery and military ftores belonging to fuch as had been members of the Smalkaldic league, and having collected upwards of five hundred pieces of cannon, a great number in that age, he fent part of them into the Low-Countries, part into Italy, and part into Spain, in order to fpread by this means the fame of his fuccefs, and that they might ferve as monuments of his having fubdued a nation hitherto deemed invincible. He then levied, by his fole authority, large fums of money, as well upon those who had ferved him with fidelity during the war, as upon fuch as had been in arms against him; upon the former, as their contingent towards a war, which, having been undertaken, as he pretended, for the common benefit, ought to be carried on at the common charge; upon the latter, as a fine by way of punifhment for their rebellion. By thefe exactions, he amaffed above one million fix hundred thoufand crowns, a fum which appeared prodigious in the fixteenth century. But fo general was the confternation which had feized the Germans upon his rapid fuccefs, and fuch their dread of his victorious troops, that all implicitly obeyed his commands; though, at the fame time, thefe extraordinary firetches of power greatly alarmed a people jealous of their privileges, and habituated, during feveral ages, to confider the Imperial authority as neither extensive nor formidable. This difcontent and refentment, how industriously foever they concealed them, became univerfal; and the more thefe paffions were reftrained and kept down for the prefent, the more likely were they to burft out foon with additional violence.

While Charles gave law to the Germans like a conquered people, Ferdinand treated his fubjects in Bohemia with still greater rigour. That kingdom poffeffed privileges and immunities as extensive as those of any nation in which the feudal inflitutions were established. The prerogative of their kings was extremely limited, and the crown itfelf elective. Ferdinand, when raifed to the throne, had confirmed their liberties with every folemnity preferibed by their exceffive folicitude for the fecurity of a conftitution of government to which they were extremely attached. He foon began, however, to be weary of a jurifdiction fo much circumferibed, and to defpife a sceptre which he could not transmit to his posterity; and notwithstanding all his former engagements, he attempted to overturn the conflictution from its foundations; that, inftead of an elective kingdom, he might render it hereditary. But the Bohemians were too highfpirited tamely to relinquish privileges which they had long enjoyed. At the fame time, many of them having embraced the doctrines of the reformers, the feeds of which John Hufs and Jerome of Prague had planted in their country about the beginning of the preceding century, the defire of acquiring religious liberty mingled itfelf with their zeal for their civil rights; and thefe two kindred paffions heightening, as usual, each other's force, precipitated them immediately into violent measures. They had not only refuled to ferve their fovereign against the confederates of Smalkalde, but having entered into a close alliance with the elector of Saxony, they had bound themselves, by a folemn affoeiation, to defend their ancient constitution; and to perfift, until they should obtain fuch additional privileges as they thought necessary towards perfecting the prefent model of their government, or rendering it more permanent They chofe Cafpar Phlug, a nobleman of diflinction, to be their general; and raifed an army of thirty thousand men to enforce their petitions. But either from the weaknefs of their leader, or from the diffentions in a great unwieldy body, which, having united haftily, was not thoroughly compacted, or from fome other unknown caufe, the fubfequent operations of the Bohemians bore no proportion to the zeal and ardour with which they took their first resolutions. They suffered themselves to be amused folong with negotiations and overtures of different kinds, that before they could enter Saxony, the battle of Muhlberg was fought, the elector deprived of his dignity and territories, the landgrave confined to close cuftody, and the league of Smalkalde entirely diffipated. The fame dread of the emperor's power which had feized the reft of the Germans, reached them. As foon as their fovereign approached with a body of Imperial troops, they inftantly difperfed, thinking of nothing but how to atone for their paft guilt, and to acquire fome hope of forgiveness by a prompt submiffion. But Ferdinand, who entered his dominions full of that implacable refentment which inflames monarchs whofe authority has been despifed, was not to be mollified by the late repentance and involuntary return of rebellious fubjects to their duty. He even heard, unmoved, the intreaties and tears of the citizens of Prague, who appeared before him in the posture of suppliants, and implored for mercy. The fentence which he pronounced against them was rigorous to extremity; he abolifhed many of their priwileges, he abridged others, and new modelled the conftitution according to his pleasure. He condemned to death many of those who had been most active in forming the late affociation against him, and punished still a greater number with confifcation of their goods, or perpetual banifhment. He obliged all his fubjects, of every condition, to give up their arms to be depolited in forts where he planted garrifons; and after difarming his people, he loaded them with new and exorbitant taxes. Thus, by an ill-conducted and unfuccefsful effort to extend their privileges, the Bohemians not only enlarged the fphere of the royal prerogative, when they intended to have circumfcribed it, but they almost annihilated those liberties which they aimed at establifting on a broader and more fecure foundation*.

The emperor, having now humbled, and, as he imagined. fubdued the independent and flubborn fpirit of the Germans by the terror of arms and the rigour of punishment, held a diet at Augsburg, in order to compose finally the controverfies with regard to religion, which had fo long diflurbed the empire. He durft not, however, truft the determination of a matter fo interesting to the free fuffrage of the Germans, broken as their minds now were to fubjection. He entered the city at the head of his Spanish troops, and affigned them quarters there. The reft of his foldiers he cantoned in the adjacent villages; fo that the members of the diet, while they carried on their deliberations, were furrounded by the fame army which had overcome their countrymen. Immediately after his public entry, Charles gave a proof of the violence with which he intended to proceed. He took poffeffion by force of the cathedral, together with one of the principal churches; and his priefts having, by various ceremonies, purified them from the pollution with which they fupposed the unhallowed ministrations of the protestants to have defiled them, they re-established with great pomp the rites of the Romish worship.

The concourse of members to this diet was extraordinary; the importance of the affairs concerning which it was to deliberate, added to the fear of giving offence to the emperor by an absence which lay open to misconstruction, brought together almost all the princes, nobles, and reprefentatives of cities who had a right to fit in that affembly. The emperor, in the fpeech with which he opened the meeting, called their attention immediately to that point, which feemed chiefly to merit it. Having mentioned the fatal effects of the religious diffentions which had arifen in Germany, and taken notice of his own unwearied endeavours to procure a general council, which alone could provide a remedy adequate to those evils, he exhorted them to recognife its authority, and to acquiefce in the decifions of an affembly to which they had originally appealed, as having the fole right of judgment in the cafe.

But the council, to which Charles wifhed them to refer all their controverfies, had, by this time, undergone a violent change. The fear and jealoufy, with which the emperor's first fucceffes against the confederates of Smalkalde had infpired the pope, continued to increafe. Not fatisfied with attempting to retard the progrefs of the Imperial arms, by the fudden recal of his troops, Paul began to confider the emperor as an enemy, the weight of whofe power he must foon feel, and against whom he could not be too hafty in taking precautions. He forefaw that the immediate effect of the emperor's acquiring abfolute power in Germany, would be to render him entirely mafter of all the decifions of the council, if it should continue to meet in Trent. It was dangerous to allow a monarch, fo ambitions, to get the command of this formidable engine, which he might employ at pleafure to limit or overturn the papal authority. As the only method of preventing this, he determined to remove the council to fome city more immediately under his own jurifdiction, and at a greater diffauce from the terror of the emperor's arms, or the reach of his influence. An incident fortunately occurred, which gave this measure the appearance of being neceffary. One or two of the fathers of the council, together with fome of their domeflics, happening to die fuddenly, the phyficians, deceived by the fymptoms, or fuborned by the pope's legates, pronounced the diffemper to be infectious and peftilential. Some of the prelates, ftruck with a panic, retired; others were impatient to be gone; and after a short confultation, the council was translated to Bologna [March 11,] a city fubject to the pope. All the bishops in the Imperial interest warmly oppofed this refolution, as taken without neceffity, and founded on falfc or frivolous pretexts. All the Spanish prelates, and most of the Neapolitan, by the emperor's express command, remained at Trent; the reft, to the number of thirtyfour, accompanying the legates to Bologna. Thus a fehifm commenced in that very affembly, which had been called to heal the divisions of Christendom; the fathers of Bologna inveighed against those who staid at Trent, as contumacious and regardlefs of the pope's authority; while the other accufed them of being fo far intimidated by the fears of imaginary danger, as to remove to a place where their confultations could prove of no fervice towards re-cftablishing peace and order in Germany+.

The emperor, at the fame time, employed all his intereft to procure the return of the council to Trent. But Paul, who highly applauded his own fagacity in having taken a flep which put it out of Charles's power to acquire the direction of that affembly, paid no regard to a requeft, the object of which was fo extremely obvious. The fummer was confumed in fruitlefs negotiations with refpect to this point, the importunity of the one and obflinacy of the other daily increasing. At last an event happened which widened the breach irreparably, and rendered the pope utterly averfe from liftening to any propofal that came from the emperor. Charles, as has been already obferved, had fo violently exafperated Peter Lewis Farnefe, the pope's fon, by refufing to grant him the investiture of Parma and Placentia, that the had watched ever fince that time with all the vigilance of refentment for an opportunity of revenging that injury. He had endeavoured to precipitate the pope into open hoftilities against the emperor, and had earnestly folicited the king of France to invade Italy. His hatred and refentment extended to all those whom he knew that the emperor favoured, he did every ill office in his power to Gonzaga, governor of Milan, and had encouraged Fielco in his attempt upon the life of Andrew Doria, becaufe both Gonzaga and Doria possefield a great degree of the emperor's efteem and confidence. His malevolence and fecret intrigues were not unknown to the emperor, who could not be more defirous to take vengeance on him, than Gonzaga and Doria were to be employed as his inftruments in inflicting it. Farnefe, by the profligacy of his life, and by enormities of every kind, equal to those committed by the worft tyrants who have difgraced human nature, had rendered himfelf fo odious, that it was thought any violence whatever might be lawfully attempted against him. Gonzaga and Doria foon found among his own fubjects, perfons who were eager, and even deemed it meritorious, to lend their hands in fuch a fervice. As Farnefe, animated with the jealoufy which ufually poffeffes petty fovereigns, had employed all the cruelty and fiaud, whereby they endeavour to fupply their defect of power, in order to humble and extirpate the nobility subject to his government, five noblemen of the greatest di-Ainction in Placentia combined to avenge the injuries which they themfelves had fuffered, as well as those which he had offered to their order. They formed their plan in conjunction with Gonzaga; but it remains uncertain whether he originally fuggefled the feheme to them, or only approved of what they proposed, and co-operated in carrying it on. They concerted all the previous fteps with fuch forefight, conducted their intrigues with fuch fecrecy, and difplayed. fuch courage in the execution of their defign, that it may be ranked among the most audacious deeds of that nature mentioned in hiftory. One body of the confpirators furprifed, at mid-day [Sept. 10], the gates of the citadel of Placentia where Farnefe refided, overpowered his guards,and murdered him. Another party of them made themfelves mafters of the town, and called upon their fellow-citizens to take arms, in order to recover their liberty. The multitude ran towards the citadel, from which three great guns, a fignal concerted with Gonzaga, had been fired; and before they could guess the cause or the authors of the tumult, they faw the lifelefs body of the tyrant hanging by the heels from one of the windows of the citadel. But feuniverfally detertable had he become, that not one expressed any fentiment of concern at fuch a fad reverfe of fortune,. or difcovered the least indignation at this ignominious treatment of a fovereign prince. The exultation at the fuccefs of the confpiracy was general, and all applauded the actors in it, as the deliverers of their country. The body was tumbled into the ditch that furrounded the citadel, and expofed to the infults of the rabble; the reft of the citizens returned to their ufual occupations, as if nothing extraordinary had happened.

Before next morning, a body of troops arriving from the frontiers of the Milanefe, where they had been polled in expectation of the event, took polleffion of the city in the emperor's name, and reinftated the inhabitants in the polleffion of their ancient privileges. Parma, which the Imperialifts attempted likewife to furprife, was faved by the vigilance and fidelity of the officers whom Farnefe had intrufted with the command of the garrifon. The death of a fon whom, ~ notwithftanding his infamous vices, Paul loved with an excefs ~ of parental tendernefs, overwhelmed him with the deepeft affliction; and the lofs of a city of fuch confequence as Placentia, greatly embittered his forrow. He accufed Gonzaga, in open confiltory, of having committed a cruel murder, in order to prepare the way for an unjuft ufurpation, and immediately demanded of the emperor fatisfaction for both; for the former, by the punifhment of Gonzaga; for the latter, by the reflictution of Placentia to his graudfon Octavia, its rightful owner. But Charles, who, rather than quit a prize of fuch value, was willing not only to expofe himfelf to the imputation of being accellary to the erime which had given an opportunity of feizing it, but to bear the infamy of defrauding his own fon-in-law of the inheritance which belonged to him, eluded all his folicitations, and determined to keep poffeffion of the city, together with its territories†.

This refolution, flowing from an ambition fo rapacious, as to be reftrained by no confideration either of decency or justice, transported the pope fo far beyond his usual moderation and prudence, that he was eager to take arms against the emperor, in order to be avenged on the murderers of his fon, and to recover the inheritance wrested from his family. Confcious, however, of his own inability to contend with fuch an enemy, he warmly folicited the French king and the republic of Venice to join in an offenfive league against Charles. But Henry was intent at that time on other objects. His ancient allies the Scots, having been defeated by the English in one of the greatest battles ever fought between these two rival nations, he was about to fend a numerous body of veteran troops into that country, as well to preferve it from being conquered, as to gain the acquifition of a new kingdom to the French monarchy, by marrying his fon the dauphin to the young queen of Scotland. An undertaking accompanied with fuch manifest advantages, the fuccefs of which appeared to be fo certain, was not to be re-

Natalis Comitis Hiftor. lib. iii. p. 64. linquifhed for the remote profpect of benefit from an alliance depending upon the precarious life of a pope of fourfcore, who had nothing at heart but the gratification of his own private refentment. Inftead, therefore, of rufning headlong into the alliance propofed, Henry amufed the pope with fuch general profeffions and promifes, as might keep him from any thoughts of endeavouring to accommodate his differences with the emperor, but at the fame time he avoided any fuch engagement as might occafion an immediate rupture with Charles, or precipitate him into a war for which he was not prepared. The Venetians, though much alarmed at feeing Placentia in the hands of the Imperialifts, imitated the wary conduct of the French king, as it nearly refembled the fpirit which ufually regulated their own conduct‡.

But though the pope found that it was not in his power to kindle immediately the flames of war, he did not forget the injuries which he was obliged for the prefent to endure; refentment fettled decper in his mind, and became more rancorous in proportion as he felt the difficulty of gratifying it. It was while thefe fentiments of enmity were in full force, and the defire of vengeance at its height, that the dict of Augfburg, by the empcror's command, petitioned the pope, in the name of the whole Germanic body, to enjoin the prelates who had retired to Bologna to return again to Trent, and to renew their deliberations in that place. Charles had been at great pains in bringing the members to join in this requeft. Having obferved a confiderable variety of fentiments among the protestants with respect to the fubmission. which he had required to the decrees of the council, fome of them being altogether intractable, while others were ready to acknowledge its right of jurifdiction upon certain conditions, he employed all his address in order to gain or to divide them. He threatened and overawed the elector Palatine, a weak prince, and afraid that the emperor might inflict on him the punishment to which he had made himfelf liable by the affiftance that he had given to the confederates of Smalkalde. The hope of procuring liberty for the landgrave, together with the formal confirmation of his own electoral dignity, overcame Maurice's fcruples, or prevented him from oppofing what he knew would be agreeable to the The clector of Brandenburg, lefs influenced by emperor. religious zeal than any prince of that age, was cafily induced to imitate their example, in affenting to all that the emperor required. The deputies of the cities remained still to be brought over. They were more tenacious of their principles, and though every thing that could operate either on their hopes or fears was tried, the utmost that they would promife was, to acknowledge the jurifdiction of the council, if effectual provision were made for fecuring to the divines of all parties free accefs to that affembly, with entire liberty of debate; and if all points in controverly were decided according to fcripture and the usage of the primitive church. But when the memorial containing this declaration was prefented to the emperor, he ventured to put in practice a very extraordinary artifice. Without reading the paper, or taking any notice of the conditions on which they had infifted, he feemed to take it for granted that they had complied with his demand, and gave thanks to the deputies for their full and unreferved fubmiffion to the decrees of the council [Oct. o7. The deputies, though aftonished at what they had heard, did not attempt to fet him right, both parties being better pleafed that the matter should remain under this state of ambiguity, than to pufh for an explanation, which muft have oceafioned a difpute, and would have led, perhaps, to a rupture+.

Having obtained this feeming fubmillion from the members of the diet to the authority of the council, Charles employed that as an argument to enforce their petition for its return to Trent. But the pope, from the fatisfaction which he felt in mortifying the emperor, as well as from his own averlion to what was demanded, refolved, without hefitation, that his petition should not be granted; though, in order to avoid the imputation of being influenced wholly by refentment, he had the address to throw it upon the fathers at Bologna, to put a direct negative upon the request. With this view he referred to their confideration the petition of the diet [Dec. 20], and they, ready to confirm by their affent whatever the legates were pleafed to dictate, declared that the council could not, confiftently with its dignity, return to Trent, unlefs the prelates who, by remaining there, had discovered a schifmatic spirit, would first repair to Bologna, and join their brethren; and that, even after their junction, the council could not renew its confultations with any prospect of benefit to the church, if the Germans did not prove their intention of obeying its future decrees to be fincere, by yielding immediate obedience to those which it had already paffedt.

This answer was communicated to the emperor by the pope, who at the fame time exhorted him to comply with demands which appeared to be fo reafonable. But Charles was better acquainted with the duplicity of the pope's character than to be deceived by fuch a grofs artifice; he knew that the prelates of Bologna durst utter no fentiment but what Paul infpired; and, therefore, overlooking them as mere tools in the hand of another, he confidered their reply as a full difcovery of the pope's intentions. As he could no longer hope to acquire fuch an afcendant in the council as to render it fubfervient to his own plan, he faw it to be neceffary that Paul should not have it in his power to turn against him the authority of fo venerable an affembly. In order to prevent this, he fent two Spanish lawyers to Bologna [Jan. 16, 1548], who, in the prefence of the legates, protefled, That the translation of the council to that place had been unneceffary, and founded on falfe or frivolous pretexts; that while it continued to meet there, it ought to be deemed an unlawful and fchifmatical conventicle; that all its decifions ought of courfe to be held as null and invalid; and that fince the pope, together with the corrupt ecclefiaftics who depended on him, had abandoned the care of the church, the emperor, as its protector, would employ all the power which God had committed to him, in order to preferve it from thofe calamities with which it was threatened. A few days after [Jan. 23], the Imperial ambaffador at Rome demanded an audience of the pope, and in prefence of all the cardinals, as well as foreign miniflers, protefted againft the proceedings of the prelates at Bologna, in terms equally harfh and difrefpectful†.

It was not long before Charles proceeded to carry thefe threats, which greatly alarmed both the pope and council at Bologna, into execution. He let the diet know the ill fuccefs of his endeavours to procure a favourable answer to their petition, and that the pope, equally regardless of their entreaties, and of his fervices to the church, had refused to gratify them by allowing the council to meet again at Trent; that, though all hope of holding this affembly in a place, where they might look for freedom of debate and judgment, . was not to be given up, the profpect of it was, at prefent, diftant and uncertain; that in the mean time, Germany was torn in pieces by religious diffentions, the purity of the faith corrupted, and the minds of the people difquieted with a multiplicity of new opinions and controverfies formerly unknown among Christians; that, moved by the duty which he owed to them as their fovereign, and to the church as its protector, he had employed fome divines of known abilities and learning, to prepare a fystem of doctrine, to which all fhould conform, until a council, fuch as they wished for, could be convocated. This fyftem was compiled by Pflug, Helding, and Agricola, of whom the two former were dignitaries in the Romith church, but remarkable for their pacific and healing fpirit; the laft was a protestant divine, fufpected, not without reafon, of having been gained by bribes and promifes, to betray or miflead his party on this occafion. The articles prefented to the diet of Ratifbon in the year one thousand five hundred and forty-one, in order to reconcile the contending parties, ferved as a model for the prefent work. But as the emperor's fituation was much changed fince that time, and he found it no longer neceffary to manage the protestants with the fame delicacy as at that juncture, the conceffions in their favour were not now fo numerous, nor did they extend to points of fo much confequence. The treatife contained a complete fystem of theology, conformable in almost every article to the tenets of the Romish church, though expressed, for the most part, in the softest words, or in feriptural phrafes, or in terms of fludied ambiguity. Every doctrine, however, peculiar to popery, was retained, and the obfervation of all the rites, which the protestants condemned as inventions of men introduced into the worship of God, was enjoined. With regard to two points only, fome relaxation in the rigour of opinion as well as fome latitude in the practice were admitted. Such ecclefiaftics as had married, and would not put away their wives, were allowed, neverthelefs, to perform all the functions of their facred office; and those provinces which had been accultomed to partake of the cup as well as of the bread in the facrament of the Lord's fupper, were still indulged in the privilege of receiving both. Even these were declared to be conceffions for the fake of peace, and granted only for a feafon, in compliance with the weaknefs or prejudices of their countrymen+.

This fystem of doctrine, known afterwards by the name of the Interim, because it contained temporary regulations, which were to continue no longer in force than until a free general council could be held, the emperor prefented to the diet [May 15], with a pompous declaration of his fincere intention to re-effablish tranquillity and order in the church, as well as of his hopes that their adopting thefe regulations would contribute greatly to bring about that defirable event. It was read in prefence of the diet, according to form. As foon as it was finished, the archbishop of Mentz, prefident of the electoral college, rofe up haftily; and having thanked the emperor for his unwearied and pious endeavours in order to reflore peace to the church, he, in name of the diet, fignified their approbation of the fyftem of doctrine which had been read, together with their refolution of conforming to it in every particular. The whole affembly was amazed at a declaration fo unprecedented and unconftitutional, as well as at the elector's prefumption in pretending to deliver the fenfe of the diet, upon a point which had not hitherto been the fubject of confultation or debate. But not one member had the courage to contradict what the elector had faid; fome being overawed by fear, others remaining filent through complaifance. The emperor held the archbishop's declaration to be a full constitutional ratification of the Interim, and prepared to enforce the obfervance of it, as a decree of the empire ‡.

During this diet, the wife and children of the landgrave, warmly feconded by Maurice of Saxony, endeavoured to intereft the members in behalf of that unhappy prince, who ftill languifhed in confinement. But Charles, who did not chufe to be brought under the neceffity of rejecting any requeft that came from fuch a refpectable body, in order to prevent their reprefentations, laid before the diet an account of his transactions with the landgrave, together with the motives which had at first induced him to detain that prince in cuftody, and which rendered it prudent, as he alledged, to keep him flill under reftraint. It was no eafy matter to give any good reason for an action, incapable of being juftified. But he thought the most frivolous pretexts might be produced in an affembly the members of which were willing to be deceived, and afraid of nothing fo much as of difcovering that they faw his conduct in its true colours. His account of his own conduct was accordingly admitted to be fully fatisfactory, and after fome feeble entreaties that he would extend his clemency to his unfortunate prifoner, the landgrave's concerns were no more mention-.ed +.

In order to counterbalance the unfavourable impression which this inflexible rigour might make, Charles, as a proof that his gratitude was no lefs permanent and unchangeable than his refentment, invefted Maurice in the electoral dignity, with all the legal formalities. The ceremony was performed, with extraordinary pomp, in an open court, fo near the apartment in which the degraded elector was kept a prifoner, that he could view it from his windows. Even this infult did not ruffle his ufual tranquillity; and turning his eyes that way, he beheld a profperous rival receiving those enfigns of dignity of which he had been ftripped, without uttering one fentiment unbecoming the fortitude that he had preferved amidit all his calamities *.

Immediately after the diffolution of the diet, the emperor ordered the Interim to be published in the German as well as Latin language. It met with the usual reception of conciliating fchemes, when propofed to men heated with difputation; both parties declaimed against it with equal violence. The protestants condemned it as a fystem containing the groffest errors of popery, difguifed with fo little art. that it could impose only on the most ignorant, or on those who, by wilfully flutting their eyes, favoured the deception. The papifts inveighed against it, as a work in which fome doctrines of the church were impioufly given up, others meanly concealed, and all of them delivered in terms calculated rather to deceive the unwary, than to inftruct the ignorant, or to reclaim fuch as were enemies to the truth. While the Lutheran divines fiercely attacked it on one hand, the general of the Dominicans with no lefs vehemence impugned it on the other. But at Rome, as foon as the contents of the Interim came to be known, the indignation of the courtiers and ecclefiaftics role to the greatest height. They exclaimed against the emperor's profane encroachment on the facerdotal function, in prefuming, with the concurrence of an affembly of laymen, to define articles of faith and to regulate modes of worship. They compared this rafh deed to that of Uzziah, who, with an unhallowed hand, had touched the ark of God; or to the bold attempts of thofe emperors, who had rendered their memory detellable, by endeavouring to model the Christian church according to their pleafure. They even affected to find out a refem--blance between the emperor's conduct and that of Henry VIII. and expressed their fear of his imitating the example of that apoflate, by usurping the title as well as jurifdiction belonging to the head of the church. All, therefore, contended with one voice, that as the foundations of ecclefiaftical authority were now flaken, and the whole fabric ready to be overturned by a new enemy, fome powerful method of defence should be provided, and a vigorous refisance must be made, in the beginning, before he grew too formidable to be opposed.

The pope, whole judgment was improved by longer experience in great transfactions, as well as by a more extensive obfervation of human affairs, viewed the matter with more acute differnment, and derived comfort from the very circumflance which filled them with apprehension. He was astonished that a prince of such superior fagacity as the emperor, should be so intoxicated with a single victory, as to imagine that he might give law to mankind, and decide even in those matters, with regard to which they are most impatient of dominion. He faw that by joining any one of the contending parties in Germany, Charles might have had it in his power to have oppreffed the other, but that the prefumption of fuccels had now infpired him with the vain thought of his being able to domineer over both. He foretold that a fystem which all attacked, and none defended, could not be of long duration; and that, for this reason, there was no need of his interposing in order to hasten its fall; for as foon as the powerful hand which now upheld it was withdrawn, it would fink of its own accord, and be forgotten, for ever‡.

The emperor, fond of his owniplan, adhered to his refolution of carrying it into full execution. But though the elector Palatine, the elector of Brandenburg, and Maurice, influenced by the fame confiderations as formerly, feemed ready to yield implicit obedience to whatever he should enjoin, he met not every where with a like oblequious fubmif. fion. John marquis of Brandenburg Anfpach, although he had taken part with great zeal in the war against the confederates of Smalkalde, refused to renounce doctrines which he held to be facred; and reminding the emperor of the repeated promifes which he had given his protestant allies, of allowing them the free exercise of their religion, he claimed, in confequence of thefe, to be exempted from receiving the Interim. Some other princes, alfo, ventured to mention the fame feruples, and to plead the fame indulgence. But on this, as on other trying occasions, the firmnefs of the elector of Saxony was most diftinguished, and merited the higheft praife. Charles well knowing the authority of his example with all the protestant party, laboured with the utmost earnestness, to gain his approbation of the Interim, and by employing fometimes promifes of fetting him at liberty, fometimes threats of treating him with greater harfhnefs, attempted alternately to work upon his hopes and his fears. But he was alike regardlefs of both. After having declared his fixed belief in the doctrines of the reformation, " I cannot now," faid he, " in my old age, abandon the principles for which I early contended; nor, in order to procure freedom during a few declining years, will I betray that good caufe, on account of which I have fuffered fo much, and am still willing to fuffer. Better for me to enjoy, in this folitude, the effeem of virtuous men, together with the approbation of my own confcience, than to return into the world, with the imputation and guilt of apof-.tacy, to difgrace and embitter the remainder of my days." By this magnanimous refolution, he fet his countrymen a pattern of conduct, fo very different from that which the emperor wished him to have exhibited to them, that it drew upon him fresh marks of his displeasure. The rigour of his .confinement was increafed; the number of his fervants abridged; the Lutheran clergymen, who had hitherto been permitted to attend him, were difmiffed; and even the books of devotion, which had been his chief confolation during a tedious imprisonment, were taken from him +. The landgrave of Heffe, his companion in misfortune, did not maintain the fame conftancy. His patience and fortitude were both fo much exhaulted by the length of his confinement, that, willing to purchase freedom at any price, he wrote to the emperor, offering not only to approve of the Interim, but to yield an unreferved fubmiffion to his will in every other particular. But Charles who knew that whatever courfe the landgrave might hold, neither his example nor authority would prevail on his children or fubjects to receive the Interim, paid no regard to his offers. He was kept confined as firiftly as ever; and while he fuffered the cruel mortification of having his conduct fet in contrast to that of the elector, he derived not the fmalleft benefit from the mean flep which exposed him to fuch deferved cenfure*.

But it was in the Imperial cities that Charles met with the most violent opposition to the Interim. These fmall commonwealths, the citizens of which were accuftomed to liberty and independence, had embraced the doctrines of the reformation when they were first published, with remarkable engernefs; the bold fpirit of innovation being peculiarly fuited to the genius of free government. Among them, the protestant teachers had made the greatest number of profelytes. The most eminent divines of the party were fettled in them as paflors. By having the direction of the fchools and other feminaries of learning, they had trained up difciples, who were as well indructed in the articles of their faith, as they were zealous to defend them. Such perfons were not to be guided by example, or fwayed by authority; but having been taught to employ their own understanding . in examining and deciding with respect to the points in controverfy, they thought that they were both qualified and entitled to judge for themfelves. As foon as the contents of the Interim were known, they, with one voice, joined in refusing to admit it. Augsburg, Ulm, Strasburg, Conflance, Bromen, Magdeburg, together with many other towns of less note, prefented remonstrances to the emperor, fetting forth the irregular and unconflictutional manner in which the Interim had been enacted, and befeeching him not to offer fuch violence to their confciences, as to require their affent to a form of doftrine and worthip, which appeared to them repugnant to the express precepts of the divine law. But Charles having prevailed on fo many princes of the empire to approve of his new model, was not much moved by the reprefentations of those cities, which, how formidable soever they might have proved, if they could have been formed into one body, lay fo remote from each other, that .

it was eafy to opprefs them feparately, before it was possible for them to unite.

In order to accomplifh this, the emperor faw it to be requifite that his measures should be vigorous, and executed with fuch rapidity as to allow no time for concerting any common plan of opposition. Having laid down this maxim as the rule of his proceedings, his first attempt was upon the city of Augfburg, which, though overawed by the prefence of the Spanish troops, he knew to be as much diffatisfied with the Interim as any in the empire. He ordered one body of these troops to feize the gates; he posted the rest in different quarters of the city; and affembling all the burgeffes in the town-hall [Aug. 3,] he, by his fole abfolute authority, published a decree abolishing their prefent form of government, diffolving all their corporations and fraternities, and nominating a fmall number of perfons, in whom he vefled for the future all the powers of government. Each of the perfons, thus chofen, took an oath to obferve the Interim. An act of power fo unprecedented as well as arbitrary, which excluded the body of the inhabitants from any fhare in the government of their own community, and fubjected them to men who had no other merit than their fervile devotion to the emperor's will, gave general difguft; but as they durft not venture upon refiftance, they were obliged to fubmit in filence*. From Augfburg, in which he left a garrifon, he proceeded to Ulm, and new-modelled its government with the fame violent hand; he feized fuch of their paffors as refused to fubfcribe the Interim, committed them to prifon, and at his departure carried them along with him in chainst. By this feverity he not only fecured the reception of the Interim, in two of the most powerful cities, but gave warning to the reft what fuch as continued refractory had to expect. The effect of the example was as great as he could have wifhed; and many towns, in order to fave themfelves from the like treatment, found it neceffary to comply with what he enjoined. This obedience, extorted by the rigour of authority, produced no change in the fentiments of the Germans, and extended no farther than to make them conform fo far to what he required, as was barely fufficient to foreen them from punishment. The protestant preachers accompanied those religious rites, the observation of which the Interim prefcribed, with fuch an explication of their tendency, as ferved rather to confirm than to remove the fcruples of their hearers with regard to them. The people, many of whom had grown up to mature years fince the establishment of the reformed religion, and never known any other form of public worship, beheld the pompous pageantry of the popilh fervice with contempt or horror; and in most places the Romish ecclesiaftics who returned to take poffeffion of their churches, could hardly be protected from infult, or their ministrations from interruption. Thus, notwithstanding the apparent compliance of fo many cities, the inhabitants being accustomed to freedom, fubmitted with reluctance to the power which now oppreffed them. Their understanding as well as inclination revolted against the doctrines and ceremonies imposed on them; and though, for the prefent, they concealed their difgust and refentment, it was evident that these passions could not always be kept under reftraint, but would break out at last in effects proportional to their violence*.

Charles, however, highly pleafed with having bent the flubborn fpirit of the Germans to fuch general fubmiffior, departed for the Low-Countries, fully determined to compel the cities, which flill flood out, to receive the Interim. He carried his two prifoners, the elector of Saxony and landgrave of Heffe, along with him, either becaufe he durit not leave them behind him in Germany, or becaufe he withed to give his countrymen the Flemings this illustrious proof of the fuccels of his arms, and the extent of his power. Before Charles arrived at Bruffels [Sept. 17,] he was inform-* Mem. de Ribier, ii. 218. Sleid. 491.

ed that the pope's legates at Bologna had difmiffed the council by an indefinite prorogation, and that the prelates affembled there had returned to their respective countries. Neceffity had driven the pope into this measure. By the fcceffion of those who had voted against the translation, together with the departure of others, who grew weary of continuing in a place where they were not fuffered to proceed to bufinels, fo few and fuch inconfiderable members remained, that the pompous appellation of a General Council could not, with decency, be bestowed any longer upon them. Paul had no choice but to diffolve an affembly which was become the object of contempt, and exhibited to all Christendom a most glaring proof of the impotence of the Romish fee. But unavoidable as the measure was, it lay open to be unfavourably interpreted, and had the appearance of withdrawing the remedy, at the very time when those for whose recovery it was provided; were prevailed on to acknowledge its virtue, and to make trial of its efficacy. Charles did not fail to put this confiruction on the couduct of the pope; and by an artful comparison of his own efforts to fuppress herefy, with Paul's fcandalous inattention to a point fo effential, he endeavoured to render the pontiff odious to all zealous catholics. At the fame time he commanded the prelates of his faction to remain at. Trent, that the council might still appear to have a being, and might be ready, whenever it was thought expedient, to refume its deliberations for the good of the church +.

The motive of Charles's journey to the Low-Countries, befide gratifying his favourite paffion of travelling from one part of his dominious to another, was to receive Philip his only fon, who was now in the twenty-first year of his age, and whom he had called thither, not only that he might be recognized by the flates of the Netherlands as heir-apparent, but in order to facilitate the execution of a vast feheme, the object of which, and the reception it met with, shall be hereafter explained. Philip having left the government of Spain to Maximilian, Ferdinand's eldeft fon, to whom the emperor had given the princefs Mary his daughter in marriage, embarked for Italy, attended by a numerous retinue of Spanish nobles+. The fquadron which efcorted him, was commanded by Andrew Doria, who, notwithstanding his advanced age, infifted on the honour of performing, in perfon, the fame duty to the fon, which he had often difcharged towards the father. He landed fafely at Genoa [Nov. 25;] from thence he went to Milan, and proceeding through Germany, arrived at the Imperial court in Bruffels [April 1, 1549.] The states of Brabant, in the first place, and those of the other provinces in their order, acknowledged his right of fucceffion in common form, and he took the cuftomary oath to preferve all their privileges inviolate t. In all the towns of the Low-Countries through which Philip paffed, he was received with extraordinary pomp. Nothing that could either express the respect of the people, or contribute to his amufement, was neglected; pageants, tournaments, and public fpectacles of every kind, were exhibited with that expensive magnificence which commercial nations are fond of difplaying, when, on any occasion, they depart from their ufual maxims of frugality. But amidft thefe fcenes of feftivity and pleafure, Philip's natural feverity of temper was difcernible. Youth itself could not render him agreeable, nor his being a candidate for power form him to courtefy. He maintained a haughty referve in his behaviour, and difcovered fuch manifest partiality towards his Spanish attendants, together with fuch an avowed preference to the manners of their country, as highly difgufted the Flemings, and gave rife to that antipathy, which afterwards occafioned a revolution fo fatal to him in that part of his dominions*.

Charles was long detained in the Netherlands by a violent attack of the gout, which returned upon him fo frequently, and with fuch increafing violence, that it had broken, to a great degree, the vigour of his conflictation. He neverthelefs did not flacken his endeavours to enforce the Interim. The Inhabitants of Strafburg, after a long flruggle, found it neceffary to yield obedience; thofe of Conflance, who had taken arms in their own defence, were compelled by force, not only to conform to the Iaterim, but to renounce their privileges as a free city, to do homage to Ferdinand as archduke of Auftria, and as his vaffals, to admit an Auftrian governor and garrifon+. Magdeburg, Bremen, Hamburgh, and Lubeck, were the only Imperial cities of note that flill continued refractory.
