LETTER

From a Gentleman in Glafgow, to his friend in the country, concerning the late tumults, that happened in that city:

A CCORDING to your defire, I now fend you a true and particular account of the diforders which happened in this place in the month of June laft, by which you will perceive that the accounts thereof publifhed in the Edinburgh and London news-paper, are for the molt part falfe. No doubt you have obferved in thefe accounts, that the conduct of the magiftrates was condemned, and on the other hand, that the conduct of capt. Bufhel who commanded the detatchment of foot then in town, was jufified : But by the following narrative, you will fee that the magiftrates did upon that occafion, all that could have been expected from men in their circumftances; and that on the other hand captain Bufhel, in deftroying fo many of the inhabitants, acted with the utmost precipitation.

On the twenty third of June, when the malt tax, as regulated in the last fession of parliament, was to take place in Scotland, there appeared pretty early in the ftreets and about the fkirts of the city where the malt barns are fituated, a number of idle women and boys, whole defign was to hinder the excile officers to enter into these barns : Tho' the magistrates caused these idle people to be difperfed when and wherefoever they appeared, yet the officers did not attempt to enter the barns, fearing that from these small beginnings upon fuch an occasion as this of levying the malt tax, a more formidable mob might grow up, against which the magistrates might not be able to protect them, befides they were every day in expectation that a party of the king's forces would be fent to Glafgow, to protect them in that fervice. On the day following being the 24th, the fame fet of idle people appeared now and then in the fireets and corners of the city, but as foon as they appeared they were disperfed by the magistrates. About fix o'clock at night night two companys of lord Delorain's regiment of foot, commanded by captain Bushel, came to town : The magiltrates ordered the guard house to be opened and fitted up for their reception; while this was a doing, the town fervants were all of a fudden attacked, and driven out of the guard by a mob. who locked up the doors, and carried off the keys. The provolt, who is the head magi-ftrate of the city, getting intelligence hereof, fent his officers to break open the doors, and a little after was going in perfon to fee it done, but in his way was met by some of the inhabitants, who told him that his officers were beaten and bruifed by the mob, and driven away from the guard; that it would be dangerous for him to venture his perfon among them; and that the foldiers being but few, and fatigued with a long march in very bad weather, it would be more commodious for them, and would more effectually quiet the minds of the people, and fecure the peace of the town, to fend them into quarters for that night, and to caufe the inhabitants to keep guard as usual. The provost acquainted the captain hereof, who appeared to be well fatisfied with it, becaule his men were much fatigued, and as he faid, he expected next day to be re-inforced with other two companies, and fo the provost caused the ordinary guard to be warned.

This being over the provolt, and Mr. Campbell of Blythfwood, the only other justice of the peace then in town, the dean of guild, and other inhabitants of the place, waited in the town-house till near nine o'clock at night, and there being no appearance of any diforder, they went into a tavern, leaving ofders with their officers to watch in the fireets, and if any tumult appeared, to acquaint them thereof.

After 100'clock at night, the provost and company with him received an account, that the mob had affaulted the house of Daniel Campbell of Shawfield, member of parliament for the city, which stands in one of the extremities of the town. This account was exceedingly furprizing to the provost and all that were with him, because they had not the leaft knowledge or apprehention of any fuch defign: However they all immediately repaired to Mr. Campbell's house, where they found a more formi-A dable dable mob than heretofore had appeared in the ftreets, confisting of a good number of flurdy young fellows armed with clubs and other weapons, having alfo large hammers and other fuch tools proper for breaking up the doors, and beating down the house, not one of them were known to the provost and his company; however they dealt with them partly by intreaties, and partly by threats to defift their enterprife ; After a long time fpent with them, they at length prevailed upon them to retire, which they did accordingly; but as they were going off, they were met and turned back by a great many rioters. who were coming towards Mr. Campbell's houfe upon the fame defign; these infulted the provost and the gentlemen that were with him to the highest degree, beat down the town officers, and threatned to cut the provoft and his company in pieces; and because they did not retire at these threats, they went about to lay violent hands upon them, fo that at length they were obliged to fly for their lives, being in their flight purfued by a good number of the rioters, from whom they escaped with great difficulty.

The provolt, as I told you before, had caufed fome of the inhabitants be advertised to mount guard as usual, yet this unfortunate accident falling out before their ordinary time of mounting guard, which is between ten and eleven o'clock at night, diverted them from going to the guard that night, the' in reality they were twice warned to it both before and after the foldiers came to the town: But fuppofing they had been upon guard they could have been of no ule upon fuch an occasion as this, or against fuch a formidable mob, because they were but few in number, and confift of the poorer fort of people, who are hired to that fervice by the other inhabitants; and they are no other than fo many watch-men whole buli. nefs is to alarm the inhabitants in cafe of fire, and to prevent diforders by drunkards, thieves, and other fuch perfons in the night time.

When it was near twelve o'clock at night, the provolt being then deliberating with the gentlemen that were with him, about calling for the affiltance of the military, a ferjeant came to the provost from capt. Bushell, offering him his affiltance, if there was any occasion for it. The provolt faid, that he was most willing to accept of the affiltance of the captain and his foldiers, but afked the ferieant how he proposed to gather his foldiers together? The ferjeant answered by beating the drum. The provoft reply'd that by this the rioters who were now most numerous and outragious, would be alarmed ; that they would affault the drums, beat down and difarm the foldiers, one by one as they came feverally out of their quarters, fo that they fnould not be able to repair to any place of rendezvous; also the men being in bed, and the rioters in full poffeffion of the houfe, going through every corner of it with lighted candles, the mifchief would probably be over before the foldiers could be gathered : To all this the ferjeant answered that things might fo fall out for that was the cafe, the men were all in bed.

The rioters being thus abfolute mafters of the houfe, fpared nothing but the walls, floors, and roof, which they could neither fo eafily, not fo fuddenly pull down; of the houfhold goods, fome part they deftroyed, and other part they carried off; yet a good part of the moft valuable furniture was faved for Mr. Campbell's ufe, being carried off by honeft people who went in to fave what they could.

While all this was a doing, Mr. Campbell and his family were at his country house of Woodhall, eight miles diftant from the town, he himfelf had gone thither on Tuesday the 22d of June, being the day before the malt tax commenced, and next day he was followed by his lady and children and fome fervants; fo that there were only a few fervants in the house when this riot happen-Whether Mr. Campbell removed himfelf and faed. mily at that time, from an apprehension of this misfortune, or not, 1 cannot tell, but it is certain that one John Woddrow, did inform Hector Thomson, Mr. Campbell's fervant, while Mr. Campbell was yet in town, that there was a flying report that his mafter's house was to be pulled down; and Thomfon having acquainted his mafter thereof, returned to Woddrow, telling him, that his mafter thanked him for his information. The forefaid John Woddrow declared this upon oath before his majefty's advocate, when he made inquifition into that matter at Glafgow, of which I fhall bereafter acquaint you. One would believe that Mr. Campbell's removal proceeded from this information, but it is very firange that he never told the magiftrates bereof, who, if they had got timely notice, could eafily have prevented the whole mifchief: However, tho' Mr. Campbell neglected to give the forefaid information to the magiftrates, by which his houfe might have been faved, yet it is not to be doubted that he took care of his cafh, bills, banknotes, jewels, and other fuch valuable things which could be removed without obfervation

Next day being Friday the 25th of June, the provoft fet tradefmen on work to fecure and fhut up the passages to Mr. Campbell's houfe, which was done accordingly. Then about eleven o'clock he put the foldiers in possification of the guard houfe; and for further fecurity of the peace of the town, he ordered two hundred of the inhabitants to assess the town house at three o'clock in the asternoon, there to attend for receiving fuch orders as should be thought fit to be given them; but this was alfo diverted by the difmal transactions that happened before the time of their meeting.

Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon, the provost with a good many merchants and others being then walking before the town-house, there appeared a mob, confishing for the most part of women and boys, armed with clubs and fuch other weapons, who had been gathered together by an old woman beating a druin before them; when they approached to the town-houfe the provost and those that were with him attacked them and difarmed them, and with their own arms beat them off, and dispersed them; these gathering themselves together by lanes and back ways, appeared a little after before the main guard, and threw fome fromes at the foldiery, upon which captain Bushell turned out his guard, caused them form into a hollow fquare, by which they faced towards the four freets which center at the guard-houfe. One would believe from this difpolition made by the captain, that he was to be attacked on all fides by a formidable enemy; but from the declarations of about thirty or four--ty ty eye-witneffes, it appears that the enemy which he was afraid of, was a mob confilting for the molt part of wo-" men and boys, that of these a great many were drawn together out of curiofity, when the foldiers formed themfelves into a square ; that such of the mob as came thither with an evil defign, had no arms nor other weapons; nor could they do any mifchief to the foldiery but by throwing of Rones; that they having thrown fome flones at the foldiers, the captain advanced towards a young man who was doing no harm and beat him fo unmercifully with his half pike that he brake it in pieces, upon which some more stones were thrown at them, but no danger done, no foldier either wounded or bruifed: The King's proclamation was not read, but the captain fwore by God, if they would not depart, he would fire upon them: And because his orders were not immediately obeyed, he was as good as his word; while the foldiers were presenting their firelocks, some of the mob run away, yet he gave command to fire, and by this first fire, two innocent perfons who were not concerned in the tumult, but going about their lawful business, and who knew nothing either or his orders of his threatnings, were fhot dead in the fireets. ' Some gentlemen who were diverting themfelves at bowls in the bowlling-green, hearing this first fire, came rushing out into the Candleriggs; though there was no mob in that freet, and no ftones thrown from thence, yet the platoon that faced that way fired upon them, and would have done execution, had not the gentlemen as foon as the foldiers were prefenting their muskets, covered themselves under a house, yet by this fire a poor man was wounded who was croffing the ftreet about his lawful business. A poor blacksmith with his cloak about him paffing by the head of one of these ftreets, neither doing nor fearing any harm, was shot thro' the head by one of these officers, with a pistol which he had concealed under his cloaths, and the fame officer advancing forward from his platoon, either with the fame or another piftol, fhot another poor tradefman who was paffing by without doing or defigning any harm. Tho' by these bloody and cruel executions the mob was all at once dispersed and the streets cleared, yet the foldiers

continued to fire, pointing their firelocks to the fides of the fireets, the entries of cloffes, and to windows two or three flairs high: So that while the poor dying people, lay weltering in their blood upon the fireets, it was dangerous for any perfon to draw near to give them any affiftance. One woman was flot upon a flair; another beneath a flair; and a third, being a young gentlewoman, was flot looking throw a window into the fireets two flairs high.

While this bloody tragedy was acting at the guard, the provost with a good number of the inhabitants was at the town house, from whence he dispatched a gentleman to captain Bushell, to exposlulate with him how he came to fire without givin ghim advice thereof before hand, as be promifed in the forenoon when he was put in possession of the guard; the captain's answer to the gentleman was, that he could not stand to be knocked down with his men : The gentleman replyed, that if he had given previous notice to the provoft, he would have difperfed the inconfiderable mob that affaulted him, without fhedding one drop of their blood. During this conference the firing ceafed, upon which fome people appearing from the houses and closes into which they had retired, the gentleman taking captain Bufhell's cane out of his hand, run towards them and chafed them away: And returning to the captain, observed to him what an easy matter it was to have prevented all this bloodfhed, and intreated him to give over firing, till he returned to him from the provolt.. When the gentleman came to the provolt, he found him befet by a more formidable mob than was at the guard, who being exafperated at the murder of fo many of their fellow citizens, threatned revenge upon the foldiers, and destruction to the provost and his company if they opposed them; and for thwith running up stairs to the town-house magazine, broke up the doors, carried out the arms, and rung the fire bell to alarm the whole city. The provolt fearing that the foldiers would be cut in pieces, dispatched the fame gentleman to the captain to acquaint him of all this, and to tell him it was his opinion, that the propereft way to fave himfelf and his foldiers, was to retire out of the city. The captain retired accord - accordingly, and all the time of their retreat. though no mob followed them, fome of the foldiers faced about and fired upon people that were only looking after them, and not offering them any violence. When they came to the Weft-port, through which they were to march out of the town, one of the foldiers eipying a face maker ftanding at the head of a fireet, aimed at him and fhot him dead, though there was no tumult there, and this poor man having been at another end of the town, knew nothing of what had paffed at the guard. There were in all nine perfons killed and feventeen wounded.

This account of the forefaid bloody action, I have extracted from the declarations of near forty perfons who were eyz-witneffes of the facts, and whole declarations are in writing hereof in my hand. And now Sir, I fubmit to your judgment, whether captain Bufhell's conduct in this matter be juftifiable or not, or if he has not been guilty of the most unaccountable rafhnefs. After the foldiers retired, they marched to Dumbarton, which is diftant ten long miles from this place, but by the way they took, is fourteen miles; which abstracting from the forefaid declarations, is of itfelf a fubftantial evidence of that part of the forefaid narrative, that the foldiers received no mifchief by the flones that were thrown at them.

About an hour after they marched from Glafgow, they were followed by a good number of people, who after their departure, were provoked to fee fo many of their fellow-citizens deftroyed; of these very few were in arms, and of fuch as were armed, few had fire arms, and as I am informed fuch fire arms as they had were unfit for fervice. They did not overtake them, but only came up with two ftragglers, who through bodily indifpofition, under which they had laboured for fome days before, were not able to keep up with the reft in their hafty march; to these they offered not the least violence, only brought them prisoners to the town. Upon their first enterance, one of them by the affiftance of fome of the inhabitants, made his escape, the other was affaulted and beaten by the friends of the dead and wounded perfons. but at length was refcued by other of the inhabitants and put unto fafe cultody, and a furgeon was appointed to attend attend him; and in a few days after he was perfectly cured of his wounds; and got money to carry him to Edinburgh.

As foon as the news of this matter reached Edinburgh. a most scandalous account thereof was published in the Caledonian Mercury, of the 29th of June, reflecting on the magistrates of Glasgow, and containing gross infinuations of their being accessary to all these diforders. It was faid, " That capt. Bufhell, as foon as the mob be-" gan to affemble, at Mr. Campbell's houfe, fent to the " magistrates for orders to disperse them, but they answer-" ed, that they did not think it convenient to make ule of " his affiftance." From what I have faid you will fee, that the mob began to affemble at ten o'clock at night, and the forefaid meffage from capt. Bushell, did not come to the provolt till near twelve, when the mob was molt numerous and outragious, and when it would have been the greatest imprudence to beat up the foldiers out of their quarters. It is also faid in the foresaid news paper, " That capt. Bushell when infulted by the mob, at the " guard, caufed a conftable read the proclamation, the " magistrates it feems not thinking it fafe to countenance " him." Whereas in truth there was no confable there, no proclamation read, and the magistrates would have willingly, without any apprehension of danger, countenanced capt. Bushell, and suppressed the mob, but the captain did not advertife them of it, but of his own accord fired upon the mob, and killed fundry of them upon the spot. Its further faid, " That capt. Bushell fired at first " blunt shot, hoping thereby to affright the mob." Whereas by the first fire two perfons were killed. Its al. fo infinuated in the forefuid news papers, " That when " the magistrates advised the captain to retire with the " detatchment out of town, there was no necessity for " it;" and yet if they had not retired, it is highly probable they would have been all cut in pieces. It is likewife faid, " That on Saturday the mob continued ring-" ing of fire bells, &c. and pulling down the roof and " floors of Shawfield's house;" this is also false, for there were no fire bells rung after Friday, when captain Bushell committed the above mentioned flaughter : Neither were were the roof nor floors of Mr. Campbell's houle pulled down, but remain unto this day The next harangue is, "That two of the foldiers who were fo bruifed with "ftones, that they were not able to keep up with the "party, fell into the hands of the mob, who ufed them "very barbaroufly; one efcaped into a houfe, but the "other is fo bruifed with ftones that his life is defpaired "of;" all this is abfolutely falfe as appears by the foregoing account. That two of the mob went to Dumbarton, and threatned the inhabitants if they received captain Bufhell and his foldiers, is what I know nothing about. And laftly, if the mob threatned to affaffinate Mr. Campbell at his country houfe, yet it is certain they never went thither.

TT

It is faid, that the magiftrates of Edinburgh were the publishers of this account, and particularly that they called upon Mr James M'Euen to print it; that becaufe of the many reflections upon the magistrates of Glafgow therein contained, he refufed to do it: That thereupon they called for one Rolland, publisher of the Caledonian Mercury, who at their defire published it in the faid news paper. When the magistrates of Glafgow had notice of it, they wrote a fhort account of the forefaid diforders, and fent it to Mr. M'Euen to be inferted in his Courant, but he was forbid by the magistrates of Edinburgh to do it on pain of imprifonment, and after the fame was privately printed, they under the fame penalty difcharged the Edinburgh hawkers to call it about in the freets.

Sir, I leave it to you to judge if the publishing such a fcandalous libel, in which his majesty's best subjects were represented as rioters and rebels, were not a real dif-fervice done to his majesty; and if the restraining the liberty of the press, by which they were hin sered to justify themselves from these vile imputations which had been cast upon them, was not oppression in a high degree.

I cannot acquaint you what accounts of this matter were fent to their excellencies, the lords juffices of Great Britain, but it would appear by the confequences, that the city of Glafgow had been reprefented to their lordfhips as in a frate of rebellion; for by their excellencies orders, general Wade did on the 9th of July laft march towards towards the faid city a confiderable body of his majefty's forces, confisting of my lord Delorain's regiment of foot, fix troops of the Royal Scots dragoons, as many of the earl of Stair's dragoons, and one of the independent companies of Highlanders, under the command of Sir Duncan Campbell of Lochnel, with a Train of Artillery, ammunition, &c. and when the general approached the city, he made a halt with his forces, and fent a letter to the magifirates, fignifying, " That he was by their ex-" cellencies; ordered to march a body of his majefty's " forces into the city of Glafgow, in order to support " the civil power in refloring the peace and quiet of the " city; and being informed that feveral of the inhabi-" tants had armed themselves, and kept a guard in the "town, he required the magistrates to difarm them, and " fecure their arms in fome fafe magazine." But the general was foon fatisfied that this was calumny and mifrepresentation, for as the magistrates had acquainted him in their answer to his letter, the city was in perfect peace, and he marched his troops and train into it without the least disturbance, and that night they were all lodged within the city.

Mr. Duncan Forbes his majesty's advocate attended the general in this expedition; his bufinefs was to make a krift inquiry into the diforders that had happened, and to discover the authors thereof. On Saturday being the roth of July, a great many perfons of the best character in town, were examined before him, and they all teftified the truth of what I have above mentioned, in relation to the provoft's conduct. On Monday early in the morning, a great many poor people were taken out of their beds, and committed prifoners to the guard, on fulpicion that they had been concerned in the late riots; but upon examination the greater part was difmiffed, the reft being about twenty in number were remanded to prifon. That day the two companies of capt. Bushell which retired to Dumbarton, returned to Glafgow. The advocate 'continued his inquilition the Tuefday, Wednesday and Thurfday following, all perfons that were fummoned compeared, and were examined upon oath, but it could not be discovered that any person of note or character in the place place was in the leaft concerned in the late riots. On Thurfday afternoon the magistrates with the dean of guild and deacon conveener were called upon by the advocate, and fundry interrogatories proposed to them, which they answered. I cannot acquaint you what discoveries did arise from these answers, because tho' they were wrote down, yet the advocate has always excused himself from giving a copy thereot when it was demanded of him by the magistrates.

I am now come to the ftrange and furprizing transactions which happened on Friday the 16th of July. On that day about noon capt. Bushell's detachment of foot was drawn up at the mercat crofs near to the tolbooth: the captain himfelf brought thither from the guard house in his own hands a bundle of ropes, which he carried into the forefaid prifon, and there bound the prifoners, which as I have ahove mentioned were fuspected to have been concerned in the forefaid rlots After this they were brought down from the prison in their manacles, and delivered to the cuftody of the faid captain and his detachment, to be by them carried prifoners to Edinburgh. While this was a doing Charles Miller provoft, John Stirling, James Johnson, and James Mitchell, bailies, John Stark dean of guild. John Armour deacon conveener, are all apprehended by a constable, and incarcerated in the tolbooth of Glafgow, by fix feveral warrants iffued by his majeffy's advocate. The news of this flying through the city, brought together to the mercat crofs a vaft concourfe of people, who were all exceedingly furprized at these ftrange operations. I am very far from believing or imagining, that my lord advocate intended any evil by these proceedings; but I am fure they had a natural tendency to create new diforders in the place: but God be thanked no fuch things happened; the multitude at the defire of the wifer fort of the inhabitants dispersed all at once, and returned to their habitations.

The tenor of the warrant for committing the magistrates was much the fame; and the form of the warrant is such.

By the Right Hon. Duncan Forbes his Majefty's Advocate, and one of the Juffices of the Peace for the Shire of Lanerk.

"WHERE AS it appears by the examination of divers witneffes upon oath taken before me, That the magiftrates' of Glafgow, and particularly Charles Miller the prefent provoft, has by his conduct as a magiftrate, favoured and encouraged the mobs, tumults, and riotous aliemblies which happened at Glafgow upon the 24th, and 25th of June 1aft, whereby the houfe of Daniel Campbell of Shawfield was entirely pillaged, and in a great meafure deftroyed; and whereby two companies of his majefty's forces lying in Glafgow, were violently affaulted and invaded, compelled to retire out of the town, and purfued by an armed force, who made two of their number prifoners, and maltreated them barbaroufly when they were fo prifoners in the fireets of Glafgow. And whereas by the late examination, it alfo appears, that the faid provoft Miller is guilty of divers other acts of partiality and male administration in his office, with refpect to the difcharge of his duty towards the actors in the faid riots and tumults: Thefe are therefore requiring you to feize the the body of the faid Charles Miller, and to commit him prifoner to the tolbooth of Glafgow, there to be detained in cuttody, until he fhall be from thence delivered over to a fufficient guard of his majefty's forces, to be appointed by the general, in order to his being transported fafe to the tolbooth of Edinburgh, there to abide his trial. And the magiftrates and keepers of the tolbooth of Edinburgh are hereby required to receive the body of the fuid Charles Miller, when he fhall be delivered to them as above, and to detain him in fure cuffody within their tolbooth, until he fhall be from thence liberated by due order of law. Given at Glafgow the 16th July 1725 years. Sic fubfcribitur, DUN. FORBES."

"To the conftables of the fhire of Lanerk, or any of them." To the keepers of the tolbooth of Glafgow, and to the magistrates and keepers of the tolbooth of Edinburgh."

The authority from whence these wartants proceeded, occasioned great speculations among the gentlemen of the law. 'The Lords of justiciary who are fupreme judges in criminals within Scotland, when this affair came before them; gave it as their opinion, that fince the union his majefty's advocate had no power of commitment. It would feem that the advocate himfelf was also of this opinion hecaufe he adds in the warrant as another fource of his authority, <sup>46</sup> That he is one of the justices of the peace in the thire of Lanerk?" But then it is much doubted if it is in the power of any one justice of peace to commit the whole magistrates of a place, and especially the provost of the city of Glasgow, who befides being his majefiy's licutenant there, is a justice of peace in special for the city, and therefore within that jurifdiction not fubject to the authority of any other juffice within the county. But further, it is hard to be understood, how a justice of peace in the county of Lanerk, could by law order any perfon whatfoever to be committed to the cuftody of the king's forces, to be by them carried out of the county of Lanerk, thro' the counties of Dumbarton, Stirling, Linlithgow, and unto' the compty of Edinburgh, there to be imprifoned. But these things I leave to the confideration of lawyers, and proceed to confider the crimes expressed in the warrants, as the cause of their commitment.

It is faid, " That by their conduct they favoured and encourag-"ed the mobs, &c. whereby Mr. Campbell's house was riffled, and " whereby two companies of the king's forces were affaulted, com-" pelled to retire out of town, purfued and two of them taken and " beaten in the ftreets, and were also guilty of divers other acts of " partiality and male administration in the discharge of their office, " with respect to the faid rioters." How this charge is to be maintained against these gentlemen is more than I can tell, I have heard it faid that the provost was much to be blamed because he did not put the foldiers in possession of the guard upon their first arrival; because for that night the guard was not kept by the inhabitants or any other, the like whereof had never happened fince the revolution ; and because he did not call for the affistance of the foldiers; and when captain Bushell offered it he retufed it. But all this is abundantly defended by the foregoing narrative. And tho' we should grant that he might have done better, yet it would be the greatest har hardship in the world to charge a gentleman as being accessory to a crime, when it is plain he intended to hinder the commission of it, and purfued his intentions by fuch methods as feemed at that time most proper to him and to all that were about him. It is a difficult talk to manage in the midft of great and fudden confusions, but it is exceedingly eafy to reflect upon a man's management after it is over. It has been also faid that John Stirling and James Johnson ' were at the time of this riot abfent from the place, very true, but did they forefee that this riot was to come to pafs, and to encourage it went out of the way? by no means; for Mr. Stirling was at Edinburgh two or three weeks before it happened, and was obliged to be there upon private affairs, and particularly attending a law fuit which was not determined till the very day before the riot happened, and on that very day was fettling and finishing all matters in refpect to the faid law fnit before he left Edinburgh." Mr. Johnfon was at the fair or public mercat of Pertk, to which place he had gone from Glafgow fome days before, and he being a dealer in linen cloth which is fold in great quantities in that mercat, he has not been known for thirty years past to be once absent from that fair. Mr. Mitchell who is the youngeft magistrate in the city, was in his own house at the time; when the news of the riot was brought to him, not knowing of the provost's being there, he was afraid to venture himfelt into the tumult, and tho' otherwife abundantly capable . for his office as a magilirate, yet he is very unfit for adventures of that kind; it is true he being trades bailie, might be supposed to have more than ordinary influence upon the rioters; but it is true alfo that among these rioters there was not one tradefman of character, or who was either burgefs or freeman in the city, and its probable that most of them were strangers from the country. It is hard to imagine in what manner the charge is to be maintained against John Stark dean of guild ; this gentleman though he is not a magifirate of the city, yet as he had done all that day, fo all that night he acted in concert with the provost, and did all that was in his power for fuppreffing the tumnlt; and nothing feems to be chargeable upon him, but that he had not power enough to fupprefs As for John Armour deacon conveener, he was in his house that night, but knew nothing of the riot till next morning; and this was no extraordinary thing, for that affiir having been tranfacted in a corner of the town, and late at night, there were many hundreds of families in the place, especially such as lived in back lanes as this gentleman did, who underflood nothing of the matter till next morning. In the last place perhaps it will be charged upon all of them, that after the tumults were over they did not take up the rioters; but the answer is plain, few or none of these rioters were known to them; and if it had been otherwife, yet confidering the ferment that was in town occasioned by the shedding of to much innocent blood, it was too hard a talk for them to undertake; and his majefty's advocate was not infenfible of this, for when he came upon that errand, he was guarded by a confiderable body of his majefty's forces. But to return to the thread of the flory.

On Saturday the 17th of July, the forefaid gentlemen were brought out of the tolbooth of Glafgow, and under a guard of the Royal Royal Scots Dragoons, were conducted prifoners to Falkirk, where they refted next day, being Sunday On Monday about noon captain Bufhell arrived at Edinburgh with his prifoners, who were committed to the caftle without any warrant; but to fupply that defect, the warrant was fent to the commander of that garrifor after their commitment. About five o'clock in the afternoon the foretaid gentlemen were brought to the town, they were met by another party of the Royal Scots Dragoons, fome of Stair's Dragoons and two companies of Highlanders, and by all thefe they were conducted in great triumph thro' the ftreets to the tolbooth of Edinburgh. They were met at fome diftance from the town by feveral gentleman from Edinburgh. and fourty or fifty of their own merchants, who came from Glafgow to accompany them into the city of Edinburgh, upon this extraordinary occafion.

Next day, being the 20th of July, application was made for them to the Lords of Julficiary, that they might be liberated upon bail; this had been offered to the advocate æ Glafgow when they were committed to the prifon there, but he refued it, faying that the crime was not bailable, yet the Lords of Julficiary did unanimoufly give fentence to the courtary, and bail being given, they were by their lordships orders for at liberty about fix o'clock that night.

On Wednefday the arft, two of the magifirates left Edinburgh, and arrived at Glafgow that evening; they were met at five or fix miles diffance from the town by fome hundreds of the inhabitants on horfeback, who conducted them into the city, where they were received with ringing of bells, and other demonstrations of joy.
