

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

DURING THE REIGNS OF

QUEEN MARY AND OF KING JAMES VI.

TILL

His Acceffion to the CROWN of ENGLAND.

WITH

A REVIEW of the SCOTTISH HISTORY previous to that Period;

And an APPENDIX containing ORIGINAL PAPERS.

By WILLIAM ROBERTSON, D.D.

PRINCIPAL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH, AND HISTORIOGRAPHER TO HIS MAJESTY FOR SCOTLAND.

THE FIFTEENTH EDITION.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

With the AUTHOR'S laft Emendations and Additions.

VOL. II.

LONDON:

FRINTED FOR T. CADELL JUN. AND W. DAVIES (SUCCESSORS TO MR. CADELL) IN THE STRAND.

1797.

THE

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

BOOK IV.

A s the day appointed for the meeting of parliament approached, Mary and her minifters were employed in deliberating concerning the courfe which it was moft proper to hold with regard to the exiled nobles. Many motives prompted her to fet no bounds to the rigour of juftice. The malecontents had laboured to defeat a fcheme, which her interest confpired with her passions in rendering dear to her; they were the leaders of the party, whose friendship she had been obliged to court, while she held their principles in abhorrence; and they were firmly attached to a rival, whom she had good reason both to fear and to hate.

But on the other hand, feveral weighty confiderations might be urged. The noblemen, whofe fate was in fufpenfe, were among the most powerful fubjects in the kingdom; their wealth great, their connexions extensive, and their adherents numerous. They were now at mercy, the objects of compassion, and fuing for pardon with the most humble fubmission.

In those circumstances, an act of clemency would exalt the queen's character, and appear no less fplendid among foreigners, than acceptable to her

VOL. II.

2

her own fubjects. Mary herfelf, though highly incenfed, was not inexorable; but the king's rage was implacable and unrelenting. They were folicited in behalf of the fugitives from various quarters. Morton, Ruthven, Maitland, and all who had been members of the congregation, were not forgetful of their ancient union with Murray and his fellow-fufferers; nor neglectful of their fafety, which they deemed of great importance to the kingdom. Melvil, who at that time poffeffed the queen's confidence, seconded their folicitations. And Murray having stooped fo low as to court Rizio, that favourite, who was defirous of fecuring his protection against the king, whose difpleafure he had lately incurred, feconded the interceffions of his other friends with the whole of his influence<sup>a</sup>. The interpofition of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, who had lately been Elizabeth's ambaffador in Scotland, in behalf of the exiles, was of more weight than all thefe, and attended with more fuccefs. Throgmorton, out of enmity to Cecil, had embarked decply in all the intrigues which were carried on at the English court, in order to undermine the power and credit of that minister. He espoufed, for this reason, the caufe of the Scottish queen, towards whofe title and pretenfions the other was known to bear little favour ; and ventured, in the prefent critical juncture, to write a letter to Mary, containing the molt falutary advices with regard to her conduct. He recommended the pardoning of the earl of Murray and his affociates, as a meafure no lefs prudent than popular. " An action of this nature,"

2 Melv. 125.

ture," fays he, " the pure effect of your Majefty's generofity will fpread the fame of your lenity and moderation, and engage the English to look towards your acceffion to the throne, not only without prejudice, but with defire. By the fame means, a perfect harmony will be reftored among your own fubjects, who, if any rupture should happen with England, will ferve you with that grateful zeal which your clemency cannot fail of infpiring b."

These prudent remonstrances of Throgmorton, to which his reputation for wildom and known attachment to the queen added great authority, made a deep impression on her spirit. Her courtiers cultivated this happy difpolition, and prevailed on her, notwithstanding the king's in-Hexible temper, to facrifice her own private refentment to the interceffion of her fubjects and the wifhes of her friends c. With this view, the parliament, which had been called to meet on the fourth of February, was prorogued to the feventh of April d; and in the mean time fhe was bufy in confidering the manner and form in which the thould extend her favour to the lords who were under difgrace.

Though Mary difcovered on this occasion a mind naturally prone to humanity and capable of forgiving, the wanted firmnels, however, to refift the influence which was fatally employed to difappoint the effects of this amiable disposition. About this time, and at no great diftance from each other, two envoys arrived from the French king [Feb. 3]. The former was intrusted with matters of mere ceremony alone; he congratu-

b Mely. 119. C Ibia. 125. d Good. vol. i. 224. B 2

lated

lated the queen on her marriage, and invefted the king with the enfigns of the order of St. Michael. The inftructions of the latter related to matters of more importance, and produced greater effects <sup>e</sup>.

An interview between Charles IX. and his fifter the queen of Spain had been often propofed; and after many obstacles arising from the oppofition of political interest, was at last appointed at Bayonne. Catherine of Medicis accompanied her fon; the duke of Alva attended his mistrefs. Amidst the scenes of public pomp and pleafure, which feemed to be the fole occupation of both courts, a scheme was formed, and measures concerted, for exterminating the Hugonots in France, the protestants in the Low Countries, and for fuppreffing the reformation throughout all Europe f. The active policy of pope Pius IV. and the zeal of the cardinal of Lorrain confirmed and encouraged difpofitions fo fuitable to the genius of the Romish religion, and so beneficial to their own order.

It was an account of this holy league which the fecond French envoy brought to Mary, conjuring her at the fame time, in the name of the king of France and the cardinal of Lorrain, not to reftore the leaders of the protestants in her kingdom to power and favour, at the very time when the catholic princes were combined to deftroy that fect in all the countries of Europe<sup>g</sup>.

Popery is a fpccies of falfe religion remarkable for the ftrong poffeffion it takes of the heart. Contrived by men of deep infight in the human

3

* Keith, 325. Append. 167.

f Thuan, lib. 37. S Melv. 126.

character,

B. IV.

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

:566.7

character, and improved by the experience and obfervation of many fucceffive ages, it arrived at last to a degree of perfection which no former fyltem of fuperstition had ever attained. There is no power in the understanding, and no passion in the heart, to which it does not prefent objects adapted to roufe and to interest them. Neither the love of pleafure which at that time prevailed in the court of France, nor the purfuits of ambition which occupied the court of Spain, had fecured them from the dominion of higotry. Laymen and courtiers were agitated with that furious and unmerciful zeal which is commonly confidered as peculiar to ecclefiaftics ; and kings and ministers thought themselves bound in conscience to extirpate the protestant doctrine. Mary herfelf was deeply tinetured with all the prejudices of popery; a paffionate attachment to that fuperfition is visible in every part of her. character, and runs through all the fcenes of her life : fhe was devoted too with the utmost fubmiffion to the princes of Lorrain, her uncles; and had been accuftomed from her infancy to liften to all their advices with a filial refpect, The profpect of reftoring the public exercife of her own religion, the pleafure of complying with her uncles, and the hopes of gratifying the French monarch, whom the prefent fituation of her affairs in England made it neceffary to court, counterbalanced all the prudent confiderations which had formerly weighed with her. She instantly joined the confederacy, which had been formed for the destruction of the protestants, and altered the whole plan of her conduct with regard to Murray and his adherents h.

h See Append. No. XIV.

To

B. IV.

To this fatal refolution may be imputed all the fubfequent calamities of Mary's life. Ever fince her return into Scotland, fortune may be faid to have been propitious to her, rather than adverfe; and if her profperity did not rife to any great height, it had, however, fuffered no confiderable interruption. A thick and fettled cloud of adverfity, with few gleams of hope, and none of real enjoyment, covers the remainder of her days.

The effects of the new fyftem which Mary had adopted were foon vifible. The time of the prorogation of parliament was fhortened; and by a new proclamation the twelfth of March was fixed for its meeting <sup>1</sup>. Mary refolved, without any further delay, to proceed to the attainder of the rebel lords, and at the fame time determined to take fome fteps towards the re-eftablifhment of the Romifh religion in Scotland <sup>k</sup>. The lords of the

i Keith, 326.

k It is not on the authority of Knox alone, that we charge the queen with the defign of re-establishing the Roman catholic religion, or at least of exempting the professor of it from the rigour of those penal laws to which they were fubjected. He indeed afferts that the altars, which should have been erected in the church of St. Giles, were already provided, 394. I. Mary herfelf, in a letter to the archbishop of Glafgow, her ambaflador in France, acknowledges, " that in that parliament fhe intended to have done fome good, with respect to restoring the old religion." Keith, 331. 2. The spiritual lords, i. e. the popish ecclesiaftics, had, by her authority, refumed their ancient place in that affembly. Ibid. 3. She had joined the confederacy at Bayonne. Keith, Append. 167. 4. She allowed mais to be celebrated in different parts of the kingdom, ibid.; and declared that the would have mass free for all men that would hear it. Good. vol. i. 274. 5. Blackwood, who was furnished by the archhishop of Glafgow with materials for writing his Martyre de Marie, affirms that the queen intended to have procured in this parliament, the articles were chofen as usual to prepare the bufinels which was to come before the parliament. They were all perfons in whom the queen could confide, and bent to promote her defigns. The ruin of Murray and his party feemed now inevitable, and the danger of the reformed church imminent, when an event unexpectedly happened which faved both. If we regard either the barbarity of that age, when fuch acts of violence were common, or the mean condition of the unhappy perfon who fuffered, the event is little remarkable; but if we reflect upon the circumftances with which it was attended, or upon the confequences which followed it, it appears extremely memorable; and the rife and progrefs of it deferve to be traced with great care.

6

Darnly's external accomplifhments had excited that fudden and violent paffion which raifed him to the throne. But the qualities of his mind corresponded ill with the beauty of his perfon. Of a weak understanding, and without experience, conceited at the fame time of his own abilities, and afcribing his extraordinary fuccels entirely to his diftinguished merit, all the queen's favour made no imprefion on fuch a temper. All her gentlenefs could not bridle his imperious and ungovernable scapable of directing his conduct, could not preferve him from rash and imprudent actions<sup>1</sup>. Fond of all the amufements, and even prone to all the vices of youth, he became by degrees carelefs of her perfon, and a liament, if not the re-effablishment of the catholic religion, at least framething for the ease of catholics. Jebb, vol. ii. 204. J Goud. vol. i. 222.

ftranger

ftranger to her company. To a woman, and a queen, fuch behaviour was intolerable. The lower the had flooped in order to raife him, his behaviour appeared the more ungenerous and criminal: and in proportion to the ftrength of her first affection, was the violence with which her difappointed paffion now operated. A few months after the marriage, their domestic quarrels began to be observed. The extravagance of Darnly's ambition gave rife to thefe. Instead of being fatisfied with a share in the administration of government, or with the title of king, which Mary, by an unprecedented ftretch of power, had conferred on him, he demanded the crown matrimonial with the most infolent importunity m. Though Mary alleged that this gift was beyond her power, and that the authority of parliament must be interposed to bestow it, he wanted either understanding to comprehend, or temper to admit, fo just a defence; and often renewed and urged his request.

Rizio, whom the king had first taken into great confidence, did not humour him in these follies. By this he incurred Henry's difpleafure; and as it was impossible for Mary to behave towards her husband with the fame affection which diftinguished the first and happy days of their union, he imputed this coldness, not to his own behaviour which had fo well merited it, but to the infinuations of Rizio. Mary's own conduct

m Keith, 329. Id. App. 165, 166. Knox, 404. The eagerne's of the king to obtain the Croton Matrimonial is not furprifing, when the extent of the powers which that title conveyed, as explained in the text and note p. 158, is taken into confideration.

confirmed

B. IV.

confirmed and ftrengthened thefe fufpicions. She treated this ftranger with a familiarity, and admitted him to a fhare in her confidence, to which neither his firft condition, nor the office fhe had lately beftowed on him, gave him any title. He was perpetually in her prefence, intermeddled in every bufinefs, and, together with a few favourites, was the companion of all her private amufements. The haughty fpirit of Darnly could not bear the intrufion of fuch an upftart; and impatient of any delay, and unreftrained by any fcruple, he inftantly refolved to get rid of him by violence.

At the fame time another defign, which took its rife from very different motives, was carrying on against the life of Rizio. Morton, Ruthven, Lindfay, and Maitland, were the contrivers of it. In all former commotions they had been ftrictly united with Murray, though in the late infurrection they had deferted him, for various reasons. Morton was nearly allied to the family of Angus, and, during the minority of the prefent earl, acted as chief of the name of Douglas. Ruthven was married to the king's aunt. Lindfay's wife was of the fame blood. All thefe had warmly concurred with the queen in promoting a marriage which did fo much honour to the house of Douglas, and naturally expected, that, under a king of their own blood, the chief management of affairs would be committed to them. Maitland, with his usual fagacity, forefaw that Murray's opposition to the match would prove dangerous and ineffectual; but whoever ruled at court, he hoped, by his dexterity and talents, to render himfelf neceffary and of importance. They

They were all equally difappointed in their expectations. The king's headftrong temper ren-dered him incapable of advice. The queen could not help diftrufting men who had been fo long and fo intimately connected with Murray, and gave herfelf up entirely to fuch counfellors as complied with all her inclinations. The return of that nobleman and his followers was therefore the only event which could reftore Morton, Maitland, and their affociates, to their former afcendant over the queen's councils. For this reafon, nothing could be more mortifying to them, than the refolution which Mary had taken to treat the exiles with rigour. This they imputed to Rizio, who, after he had engaged to aid Murray with all his intereft, was now the moft active inftrument in promoting the meafures which were concerted for the ruin of that nobleman. This officious zeal completed the difguit which they had conceived against him, and in-fpired them with thoughts of vengeance, in no wife fuitable to juffice, to humanity, or to their own dignity.

While they were ruminating upon their fcheme, the king communicated his refolution to be averged of Rizio to lord Ruthven, and implored his affiftance, and that of his friends, towards the execution of this defign. Nothing could be more acceptable to them than this overture. They faw at once all the advantages they would reap, by the concurrence of fuch an affociate. Their own private revenge upon Rizio would pafs, they hoped, for an act of obedience to the king; and they did not defpair of obtaining the reftoration of their banifhed friends, and fecurity for the protectant teftant religion, as the price of their compliance with his will.

B. IV.

But as Henry was no lefs fickle than rafh, they liefitated for fome time, and determined to ad. vance no farther, without taking every possible precaution for their own fafety. They did not, in the mean time, fuffer the king's refertment to abate. Morton, who was inferior to no man of that intriguing age in all the arts of infinuation and address, took the young prince under his management. He wrought upon his ruling paffion, ambition to obtain the matrimonial crown. He reprefented Rizio's credit with the queen to be the chief and only obftacle to his fuccefs in that demand. This minion alone, he faid, poffessed her confidence ; and out of complaifance to him, her fubjects, her nobility, and even her hufband, were excluded from any participation of her fecret councils. Under the appearance of a confidence merely political, he infinuated, and the king perhaps believed, that a familiarity of a quite different and very criminal nature might be concealed ". Such various and complicated

<sup>n</sup> Of all our hiftorians, Buchanan alone avowedly accufes Mary of a criminal love for Rizio, 340. 344. Knox flightly infinuates that fuch a fufpicion was entertained, 391. Melvil, in a converfation with the queen, intimates that he was afraid her familiarity with Rizio might be liable to mífconfruction, 110. The king himfelf feems, both by Melvil's account, and by his expofulation with the queen, which Ruthven mentions, to have given credit to thefe fufpicions. Melv. 127. Keith, Append. 123, 124. That the king's fufpicions were flrong, is likewife evident from the paper publified, Append. No. XV. But in oppofition to thefe fufpicions, and they are nothing more, we may obferve that Kaulet the queen's French fecretary, was difmified from her. plicated paffions raged in the king's bofom with the utmost fury. He became more impatient than ever of any delay, and even threatened to strike the intended blow with his own hand. At last preliminaries were fettled on both fides, and articles for their mutual fecurity agreed upon. The king engaged to prevent the attainder of the banifhed lords, to confent to their return into Scotland, to obtain for them an ample remiffion of all their crimes, and to fupport, to the utmost of his power, the religion which was now established in the kingdom. On their parts they undertook to procure the crown matrimonial for Henry, to fecure his right of fucceffion, if the queen should die before him without iffue, and to defend that right to the uttermost, against whatever perfon should prefume to difpute it; and if either Rizio, or any other perfon, should happen to be killed in pro-her fervice, and Rizio advanced to that office, in December 1564. Keith, 268. It was in confequence of this preferment, that he acquired his great credit with the queen. Melv. 107. Darnly arrived in Scotland about two months after. Keith, 269. The queen immediately conceived for him a paffion, which had all the fymptoms of genuiue and violent love. Rizio aided this paffion, and promoted the marriage with all his intereft. Melv. III. During fome months after the marriage, the queen's fondness for Darnly continued. She foon proved with child. From this enumeration of circumstances, it appears almost impossible that the queen, unlefs we suppose her to have been a woman utterly abandoned, could carry on any criminal intrigue with Rizio. But the filence of Randolph, the English refident, a man abundantly ready to mention and to aggravate Mary's faults, and who does not once infinuate that her confidence in Rizio concealed any thing criminal, is in itfelf a fufficient vindication of her innocence.

fecuting

E. IV.

fecuting the defign, the king promifed to acknowledge himfelf to be the author of the enterprife, and to protect those who were embarked in it °.

Nothing now remained but to concert the plan of operation, to chufe the actors, and to affign them their parts in perpetrating this detestable crime. Every circumstance here paints and characterifes the manners and men of that age, and fills us with horror at both. The place chofen for committing fuch a deed, was the queen's bed chamber. Though Mary was now in the fixth month of her pregnancy, and though Rizio might have been feized elfewhere without any difficulty, the king pitched upon this place, that he might enjoy the malicious pleafure of reproaching Rizio with his crimes before the queen's face. The earl of Morton, the lord high chancellor of the kingdom, undertook to direct an enterprife, carried on in defiance of all the laws of which he was bound to be the guardian. The lord Ruthven, who had been confined to his bed for three months by a very dangerous diftemper, and who was still to feeble that he could hardly walk, or bear the weight of his own armour, was intrufted with the executive part ; and while he himfelf needed to be fupported by two men, he came abroad to commit a murder in the prefence of his fovereign.

On the ninth of March, Morton entered the court of the palace with an hundred and fixty men; and without noife, or meeting with any refistance, feized all the gates. While the queen • Good. vol. i. 266.

VOL. II.

was

was at fupper with the countefs of Argyll, Rizio, and a few other perfons, the king fuddenly entered the apartment by a private paffage. At his back was Ruthven, clad in complete armour, and with that ghaftly and horrid look which long fickness had given him. Three or four of his most trusty accomplices followed him. Such an unufual appearance alarmed thole who were prefent. Rizio inftantly apprehended that he was the victim at whom the blow was aimed; and in the utmost consternation retired behind the queen, of whom he laid hold, hoping that the reverence due to her perfou might prove fome protection to him. The confpirators had proceeded too far to be reftrained by any confideration of that kind. Numbers of armed men rushed into the chamber. Ruthven drew his dagger, and with a furious mien and voice commanded Rizio to leave a place of which he was unworthy, and which he had occupied too long. Mary employed tears, and entreaties, and threatenings, to fave her favourite. But, notwithstanding all these, he was torn from her by violence, and before he could be dragged through the next apartment, the rage of his enemies put an end to his life, piercing his body with fifty-fix wounds P. Athol, Huntly, Bothwell, and other confidents of the queen, who had apartments in the palace, were alarmed at the uproar, and filled with the utmost terror on their own account; but either no violence was intended against them, or the confpirators durk not fhed the

P See Append. No. XV.

nobleft

T.Stothard R.A.del!

Loney sculp.

Publighed Feble 1708. by Cadell & Daries, Strand.

nobleft blood in the kingdom in the fame illegal manner with which they had ventured to take the life of a stranger. Some of them were difmissed, and others made their escape.

The confpirators, in the mean time, kept poffeffion of the palace, and guarded the queen with the utmost care. A proclamation was pub-lished by the king, prohibiting the parliament to meet on the day appointed ; and measures were taken by him for preventing any tumult in the city 9. Murray, Rothes, and their followers, being informed of every ftep taken against Rizio, arrived at Edinburgh next evening. Murray was gracioully received both by the king and queen: by the former, on account of the articles which had been agreed upon between them; by the latter, because she hoped to prevail on him, by gentle treatment, not to take part with the murderers of Rizio. Their power The still felt and dreaded; and the infult which they had offered to her authority, and even to her perfon, fo far exceeded any crime fhe could impute to Murray, that in hopes of wreaking her vengeance on them, the became extremely willing to be reconciled to him, The obligations, however, which Murray lay under to men who had hazarded their lives on his account, engaged him to labour for their fafety. The queen, who fcarcely had the liberty of choice left, was perfuaded to admit Morton and Ruthven into her prefence, and to grant them the promife of pardon in whatever terms they should deem neceffary for their own fecurity.

9 Keith, Appendix, 126.

C 2

The

B. IV.

The king, meanwhile, flood aftonished at the boldnefs and fuccefs of his own enterprife, and uncertain what courfe to hold. The queen obferved his irrefolution, and availed herfelf of it. She employed all her art to difengage him from his new affociates. His confcioufnels of the infult which he had offered to fo illustrious a benefactrefs, infpired him with uncommon facility and complaifance. In fpite of all the warnings he received to diffrust the queen's artifices, the prevailed on him to difmifs the guards which the confpirators had placed on her perfon; and that fame night [March 11] he made his efcape along with her, attended by three perfons only, and retired to Dunbar. The fcheme of their. flight had been communicated to Huntly and Bothwell, and they were quickly joined by them and feveral other of the nobles. Bothwell's eftate lay in that corner of the kingdom, and his followers crowded to their chief in fuch numbers, as foon enabled the queen to fet the power of the confpirators at defiance.

This fudden flight filled them with inexpreffible confternation. They had obtained a promife of pardon; and it now appeared from the queen's conduct, that nothing more was intended by this promife than to amufe them, and to gain time. They ventured, however, to demand the accomplifhment of it; but their meffenger was detained a prifoner, and the queen advancing towards Edinburgh at the head of eight thoufaud men, talked in the higheft firain of refertment and revenge. She had the addrefs, at the fame time, to feparate Murray and his affociates from the confpirators against Rizio. Sensible that the union union of these parties would form a confederacy which might prove formidable to the crown, fhe expressed great willingness to receive the former into favour; towards the latter, fhe declared herfelf inexorable. Murray and his followers were no lefs willing to accept a pardon on her terms. The confpirators against Rizio, deprived of every refource, and incapable of refiftance, fled precipitately to Newcaftle [March 19], having thus changed fituations with Murray and his party, who left that place a few days before.

No man fo remarkable for wildom, and even for cunning, as the earl of Morton, ever engaged in a more unfortunate enterprife. Deferted bafely by the king, who now denied his knowledge of the confpiracy by public proelamations, and abandoned ungeneroufly by Murray and his party r, he was obliged to fly from his native country, to refign the highest office, and to part with one of the most opulent fortunes in the kingdom.

On her return to Edinburgh, Mary began to proceed against those concerned in the murder of Rizio with the utmost rigour of law. But, in praife of her clemency, it must be obferved, that only two perfons, and these of no confiderable rank, fuffered for this crime s.

In this confpiracy there is one circumftance which, though fomewhat detached, deferves not to be forgotten. In the confederacy between the king and the confpirators, the real intention of which was affaffination, the preferving of the reformed church is, neverthelefs, one of the most confiderable articles; and the fame men who were preparing to violate one of the first duties of morality, affected the higheft regard for religion. Hiftory relates thefe extravagances of the human mind, without pretending to juftify, or even to account for them; and regulating her own opinions by the eternal and immutable laws of juftice and of virtue, points out fuch inconfiftencies, as features of the age which the deferibes, and records them for the inftruction of ages to come.

s Keith, Appendix, 130. 134. 5 Melv. 130. C 3

17

E. IV.

As this is the feeond inftance of deliberate affaffination which has occurred, and as we shall hereafter meet with many other inftances of the fame crime, the eaufes which gave rife to a prae-tiee fo fhocking to lumanity deferve our partieular attention. Refentment is, for obvious and wife reafons, one of the ftrongest passions of the human mind. The natural demand of this paffion is, that the perfon who feels the injury fhould himfelf inflict the vengeance due on that account. The permitting this, however, would have been destructive to fociety; and punishment would have known no bounds, either in feverity or in duration. For this reafon, in the very infancy of the focial flate, the fword was taken out of private hands, and committed to the magiftrate. But at first, while laws aimed at restraining, they really ftrengthened the principle of revenge. The earlieft and most fimple punishment for crimes was retaliation; the offender forfeited limb for limb, and life for life. The payment of a compenfation to the perfon injured, fueceeded to the rigour of the former inftitution. In both thefe, the gratification of private revenge was the object of law; and he who fuffered the wrong was the only perfon who had a right to purfue, to exact, or to remit the punifhment. While laws allowed allowed fuch full fcope to the revenge of one party, the interefts of the other were not neglected. If the evidence of his guilt did not amount to a full proof, or if he reckoned hunfelf to be unjuftly accufed, the perfon to whom a crime was imputed had a right to challenge his adverfary to fingle combat, and, on obtaining the victory, vindicated his own honour. In almost every confiderable caufe, whether civil or criminal, arms were appealed to, in defence, either of the innocence, or the property, of the parties. Justice had feldom occasion to use her balance; the fword alone decided every contest. The paffion of revenge was nourified by all thefe means, and grew, by daily indulgence, to be incredibly ftrong. Mankind became habituated to blood, not only in times of war, but of peace; and from this, as well as other caufes, contracted an amazing ferocity of temper and of manners. This ferocity, however, made it necessary to difcourage the trial by combat ; to abolish the payment of compensations in criminal cases; and to think of some milder method of terminating difputes concerning civil rights. The punifhments for crimes became more fevere, and the regulations concerning property more fixed; but the princes, whole province it was to inflict the one and to enforce the other, poffeffed little power. Great offenders despised their authority ; smaller ones sheltered themselves under the jurisdiction of those from whose protection they expected im-punity. The administration of justice was extremely feeble and dilatory. An attempt to punish the crimes of a chieftain, or even of his vaffals, often excited rebellions and civil wars. To

To nobles, haughty and independent, among whom the caufes of difeord were many and unavoidable, who were quick in difcerning an injury, and impatient to revenge it; who deemed it in-famous to fubmit to an enemy, and cowardly to forgive him ; who confidered the right of punifi-. ing those who had injured them, as a privilege of their order and a mark of independence; fuch flow proceedings were extremely unfatisfactory. The blood of their adverfary was, in their opinion, the only thing which could wafh away an affront; where that was not fhed, their revenge was difappointed, their courage became fufpected, and a stain was left on their honour. That vengeance, which the impotent hand of the magistrate could not inflict, their own could eafily execute. Under governments fo feeble, men affumed, as in a flate of nature, the right of judging and redreffing their own wrongs; and thus affaffination, a crime of all others the most deftructive to fociety, eame not only to be allowed, but to be reckoned honourable.

The hiftory of Europe, during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, abounds with deteftable inftances of this erime. It prevailed chiefly among the French and Scots, between whom there was a clofe intercourfe at that time, and a furprifing refemblance in their national characters. In one thoufand four hundred and feven, the only brother of the king of France was murdered publicly in the ftreets of Paris; and fo far was this horrible action from meeting with proper punifhment, that an emiuent lawyer was allowed to plead in defence of it before the peers of France, and avowedly to maintain the lawfulnets nefs of affaffination. In one thousand four hundred and feventeen, it required all the eloquence and authority of the famous Gerlon, to prevail on the council of Constance to condemn this proposition, " That there are some cafes in which affaffination is a virtue more meritorious in a knight than in a fquire, and more meritorious in a king than in a knight "." The number of eminent perfons who were murdered in France and Seotland, on account either of private, or political, or religious quarrels, during the fifteenth and fixteenth centuries, is almost incredible. Even after those causes which first gave rife to this barbarous practice were removed; after the jurifdiction of magistrates and the authority of laws were better established, and become more univerfal; after the progrefs of learning and philosophy had polished the manners, and humanized the minds of men, this erime continued in fome degree. It was towards the close of the feventeenth century before it disappeared in France. The additional vigour which the royal authority acquired by the acceffion of James VI. to the throne of England, feems to have put a ftop to it in Scotland.

The influence, however, of any national cuftom, both on the understanding and on the heart, and how far it may go towards perverting or extinguishing moral principles of the greatest importance, is remarkable. The authors of those ages have perfectly imbibed the fentiments of their cotemporaries, with regard to affaffination; and they who had leifure to reflect and to judge, appear to be no more shocked at this crime, than the perfons who committed it during the heat and impetuofity of paffion. Buchanan defcribes the murder of cardinal Beatoun and of Rizio, without expreffing those feelings which are natural to a man, or that indignation which became an hiftorian u. Knox, whofe mind was fiercer and more unpolished, relates the death of Beatoun and of the duke of Guise, not only without censure, but with the utmost exultation x. On the other hand, the bishop of Ross mentions the affaffination of the earl of Murray with fome degree of applaufe<sup>y</sup>. Blackwood dwells upon it with the most indecent triumph, and ascribes it directly to the hand of God 2. Lord Ruthven, the principal actor in the confpiracy against Rizio, wrote an account of it some short time before his own death, and in all his long narrative there is not one expression of regret, or one symptom of compunction, for a crime no lefs diffionourable than barbarous<sup>a</sup>. Morton, equally guilty of the fame crime, entertained the fame fentiments concerning it; and in his last moments, neither he himself, nor the ministers who attended him, feem to have confidered it as an action which called for repentance; even then he talks of David's flaughter as coolly as if it had been an innocent or commendable deed b. The vices of another age aftonish and shock us; the vices of our own become familiar, and excite little horror c. I return from this digreffion to the courfe of the hiftory.

t L'Enfant, Hift. Conc. de Conft.

The

B. IV.

u Buchan. 295. 345.

- x Knox, 334.
- y Anderf. 3. 84.
- Z Jebb, 2. 263.
  - b Crawf. Mem. Append.

a Keith, Append. 119. c In the first accounts of Rizio's murder fent to England, there feem to have been mingled (as is usual in relating extraordinary

22

The charm, which had at first attached the queen to Darnly, and held them for fome time in an happy union, was now entirely diffolved; and love no longer covering his follies and vices with its friendly veil, they appeared to Mary in their full dimension and deformity<sup>d</sup>. Though Henry published a proclamation, difclaiming any knowledge of the confpiracy against Rizio, the queen was fully convinced, that he was not only acceffary to the contrivance, but to the commilfion of that odious crime . That very power which, with liberal and unfufpicious fondnefs, fhe had conferred upon him, he had employed to infult her authority, to limit her prerogative, and to endanger her perfon. Such an outrage it was impoffible any woman could bear or forgive. Cold civilities, fecret diftrust, frequent quarrels, fucceeded to their former transports of affection and confidence. The queen's favours were no longer conveyed through his hands. The crowd of expectants ceased to court his patronage, which they found to avail fo little. Among the nobles, fome dreaded his furious temper, others complained of his perfidioufnefs; and all of them traordinary events) fome circumftances, which afterwards appeared to be falfe: among others, that a friar named Black, had been flain at the fame time with Rizio. Packhurft bifhop of Norwich, in communicating this intelligence to his correspondent, Bullinger, an eminent reformed divine of Zurich, expression of the murder of Rizio, and exults over the supposed death of the friar, in terms which, in our times, will appear as shocking as they are puerile: "Fraterculus quidam, nomine Black, papiftarum antesigmanus, codem tempore in aula occiditur: Sic niger hic nebulo, nigra quoque morte peremptus, invitus nigrums fubito descendit in Orcum." Burn. Hit. of Reform, iii. App. 360. d See Appendix, No. XV1. e Keith, 350.

defpifed

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

defpifed the weaknefs of his understanding and the inconftancy of his heart. The people themfelves obferved fome parts of his conduct, which little fuited the dignity of a king. Addicted to drunkennefs, beyond what the manners of that age could bear, and indulging irregular paffions, which even the licentiousness of youth could not excufe, he, by his indecent behaviour, provoked the queen to the utmost ; and the paffions which it oceafioned often forced tears from her eyes, both in public and private f. Her averfion for him increased every day, and could be no longer concealed. He was often absent from court, appeared there with little fplendour, and was trufted with no power. Avoided equally by those who endeavoured to pleafe the queen, who favoured Morton and his affociates, or who adhered to the house of Hamilton, he was left almost alone in a neglected and unpitied folitude g.

About this time a new favourite grew into great eredit with the queen, and foon gained an afcendant over her heart, which encouraged his enterprifing genius to form defigns that proved fatal to himfelf, and the oceafion of all Mary's fubfequent misfortunes. This was James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, the head of an aneient family, and, by his extensive poffeffions and numerous vaffals, one of the most powerful noblemen in the kingdom. Even in that turbulent age, when fo many vaft projects were laid open to an afpiring mind, and invited it to action, no man's ambition was more daring than Bothwell's, or had recourfe to bolder or more fingular expedients

f Keith, 329.

2 Melv. 131, &c.

B. IV.

24

for obtaining power<sup>h</sup>. When almost every perfon of diffinction in the kingdom, whether papift or protestant, had joined the congregation in oppoling the dangerous encroachments of the French upon the liberties of the nation, he, though an avowed protestant, adhered to the queen regent, and acted with vigour on her fide. The fuccefs which attended the arms of the congregation having obliged him to retire into France, hc was taken into the queen's fervice, and continued with her till the time of her return into Scotland 1. From that period, every ftep of his conduct towards Mary was remarkably dutiful; and amidst all the shiftings of faction, we scarcely ever find him holding any courfe which could be offenfive to her. When Murray's proceedings with regard to her marriage gave umbrage to the queen, fhe recalled Bothwell from that banishment into which fke had been obliged with reluctance to drive him, and confidered his zeal and abilities as the most powerful supports of her authority. When the confpirators against Rizio feized her perfon, he became the chief inftrument of recovering her liberty, and ferved her, on that occasion, with <sup>h</sup> The enterprifing fpirit of Bothwell was fo confpicuous as to procure him feveral marks of diftinction during his refidence in France. Hardwicke's State Papers, i. 143. 'Throgmorton, the Englifh ambaffador at Paris, and one of the moth fagacious minifters employed by Elizabeth, points him out as a perfon who was to be dreaded and obferved. " The earl of Bothwell," fays he in a letter, Nov. 28, 1560, " is departed to return into Scotland, and hath made boaft that he will do great things, and live in Scotland in defpite of all men. He is a glorious, rafh, and hazardous young man; and therefore it were meet that his adverfaries fhould both have an eye to him, and alfo keep him fhort." Ibid. p. 149.

i Anderf. i. 90.

VOL. II.

fo

25

fo much fidelity and fuccefs, as made the deepeft impreffion on her mind, and greatly increafed the confidence which fhe had hitherto placed in him<sup>k</sup>. Her gratitude loaded him with marks of her bounty; fhe raifed him to offices of profit and of truft, and tranfacted no matter of importance without his advice<sup>1</sup>. By complaifance and affiduity he confirmed and fortified thefe difpolitions of the queen in his favour, and infenfibly paved the way towards that vaft project, which his immoderate ambition had perhaps already conceived, and which, in fpite of many difficulties, and at the expence of many crimes, he at laft accomplifhed.

The hour of the queen's delivery now approached. As her palacc was defended only by a flender guard, it feemed imprudent to expofe her perfon, at this time, to the infults fhe might fuffer in a kingdom torn by factions and prone to mutiny. For this reafon, the privy council advifed the queen to fix her refidence in the caftle of Edinburgh, the ftrongeft fortrefs in the kingdom, and the moft proper place for the fecurity of her perfon m. In order to render this fecurity more perfect, Mary laboured to extinguift the domeftic feuds which divided fome of the principal nobles. Murray and Argyll were exafperated againft Huntly and Bothwell, by reciprocal and repeated injuries. The queen, by her authority and entreaties, effected a reconcilement among them, and drew from them a promife to bury their difcords in everlafting oblivion. This reconcilement Mary had fo much at heart, that fhe made it k Anderf. 92, 93. m Keith, 335. 1 Melv. 133. Knox, 396.

the

B. IV.

1566.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

the condition on which fhe again received Murray into favour <sup>n</sup>.

On the nineteenth of June, Mary was delivered of her only fon James, a prince whofe birth was happy for the whole ifland, and unfortunate to her alone. His acceffion to the throne of England united the two divided kingdoms in one mighty monarchy, and eftablifhed the power of Great Britain on a firm foundation; while fhe, torn early from her fon by the cruelty of her fate, was never allowed to indulge those tender paffions, nor to tafte those joys which fill the heart of a mother.

Melvil was inftantly difpatched to London with an account of this event. It flruck Elizabeth, at firft, in a fenfible manner; and the advantage and fuperiority which her rival had acquired by the birth of a fon, forced tears from her eyes. But before Melvil was admitted to audience, fhe had fo far recovered the command of herfelf, as to receive him not only with decency, but with exceffive cheerfulnefs; and willingly accepted the invitation which Mary gave her, to fland godmother to her fon °.

As Mary loved fplendour and magnificence, fhe refolved to celebrate the baptifm of the young prince with great pomp; and for that purpofe fent invitations of the fame kind to the French king, and to the duke of Savoy, the uncle of her former hufband.

The queen, on her recovery, difcovered no change in her fentiments with respect to the king P. The death of Rizio, and the counten Keith, 336. Append. 139. "Melv. 138. P See Append. No. XVII.

nance

B. IV.

nance he had given to an action fo infolent and unjustifiable, were still fresh in her memory. She was frequently penfive and dejected 4. Though Henry fometimes attended at court, and accompanied her in her progreffes through dif-ferent parts of the kingdom, he met with little reverence from the nobles, while Mary treated him with the greatest referve, and did not fuffer him to posses any authority . The breach be-tween them became every day more apparent . Attempts were made towards a reconcilement, particularly by Caftelnau, the French ambaffador; but after fuch a violent rupture, it was found no eafy matter to bind the nuptial knot anew; and though he prevailed on the king and queen to pafs two nights together', we may, with great probability, pronounce this appearance of union, to which Castelnau trusted, not to have been fincere ; we know with certainty that it was not lafting.

Bothwell, all this while, was the queen's prime confident. Without his participation no business was concluded, and no favour bestowed. Toge-ther with this afcendant over her councils, Bothwell, if we may believe the contemporary hiftorians, acquired no lefs fway over her heart. But at what precife time this ambitious lord first allowed the fentiments of a lover to occupy the place of that duty and respect which a subject owes his fovereign; or when Mary, inftead of gratitude for his faithful fervices, felt a paffion of another nature rifing in her bofom, it is no eafy matter to determine. Such delicate transitions

9 Melv. 148; I Keith, 350. Melv. 132.

of

Keith, Append. 169. t Ibid. 169.

of paffion can be difcerned only by thofe who are admitted near the perfons of the parties, and who can view the fecret workings of the heart with calm and acute obfervation. Neither Knox nor Buchanan enjoyed thefe advantages. Their humble flation allowed them only a diftant accefs to the queen and her favourite. And the ardour of their zeal as well as the violence of their prejudices rendered their opinions rafh, precipitate, and inaccurate. It is by the effects of this reciprocal paffion, rather than by their accounts of it, that fubfequent hiftorians can judge of its reality.

Adventurous as Bothwell's project to gain the queen may appear, it was formed and carried on under very favourable circumstances. Mary was young, gay, and affable. She poffeffed great fenfibility of temper, and was capable of the utmost tenderness of affection. She had placed her love on a very unworthy object, who requited it with ingratitude, and treated her with neglect, with infolence, and with brutality. All there she felt and resented. In this situation, the attention and complaifance of a man who had vindicated her authority and protected her perfon, who entered into all her views, who foothed all her paffions, who watched and improved every opportunity of infinuating his defign and recommending his paffion ", could hardly fail of making an imprefion on a heart of fuch a frame as Mary's.

The haughty fpirit of Darnly, nurfed up in flattery, and accuftomed to command, could not bear the contempt under which he had now fallen, and the flate of infignificance to which he faw himfelf reduced. But in a country where he was univerfally hated or despifed, he could never hope to form a party, which would fecond any attempt he might make to recover power. He addreffed himfelf, therefore, to the pope, and to the kings of France and Spain, with many professions of his own zeal for the catholic religion, and with bitter complaints against the queen, for neglecting to promote that interest *: and foon after, he took a refolution, equally wild and defperate, of embarking on board a ship which he provided, and of slying into foreign parts. It is almost impoffible to form any fatisfactory conjecture concerning the motives which influence a capricious and irregular mind. He hoped, perhaps, to recommend himfelf to the catholic princes on the continent by his zeal for religion, and that they would employ their intereft towards reinftating him in the polleffion of that power which he had loft, Perhaps he expected nothing more than the comfort of hiding the difgrace under which he was now fallen, among ftrangers, who had never been witneffes of his former profperity.

<sup>u</sup> Anderf. i. 93, 94.

30

He communicated the defign to the French ambaffador Le Croc, and to his father the earl of Lennox. They both endeavoured to diffuade him from it, but without fuccefs. Lennox, who feems, as well as his fon, to have loft the queen's confidence, and who, about this time, was feldom at court, inftantly communicated the matter to her by a letter. Henry, who had refufed to accompany the queen from Stirling to Edinburgh, was likewife abfent from court. He arrived there, however, on the fame day fhe received the account of his intended flight. But he was more than ufually wayward and peevifh; and fcrupling to enter the palace unlefs certain lords who attended the queen were difmiffed, Mary was obliged to meet him without the gates. At laft he suffered her to conduct him into her own apartment. She endeavoured to draw from him the reafons of the ftrange refolution which he had taken, and to divert him from it. In fpite however of all her arguments and intreaties he remained filent and flexible. Next day the privy council, by her direction, expoftulated with him on the fame head. He perfisted, notwithstanding, in his fullennefs and obftinacy; and neither deigned to explain the motives of his conduct, nor fignified any intention of altering it. As he left the apartment, he turned towards the queen, and told her that fhe fhould not fee his face again for a long time. A few days after, he wrote to Mary, and mentioned two things as grounds of his difguft. She herfelf, he faid, no longer admitted him into any confidence, and had deprived him of all power; and the nobles, after her example, treated lim with open neglect, fo that he appeared in every place without the dig-nity and fplendour of a king.

x Knox, 399.

count

Nothing could be more mortifying to Mary than this intended flight of the king's, which would have fpread the infamy of their domeftic quarrel all over Europe. Compaffion for a monarch who would then appear to be forced into exile by her neglect and ill-ufage, might have difpofed mankind to entertain fentiments concerning the caufes of their difcord, little to her advantage. In order, therefore, to prepoffefs the minds of her allies. 32 allies, and to fereen her reputation from any cenfure with which Darnly might endeavour to load it, the privy council transmitted a narrative of this whole transfaction both to the king and to the queen-mother of France. It is drawn with great art, and fets Mary's conduct in the most favourable point of light <sup>y</sup>.

About this time the licence of the borderers called for redrefs; and Mary refolving to hold a court of juffice at Jedburgh, the inhabitants of feveral adjacent counties were fummoned to attend their fovereign in arms, according to cuftom 2. Bothwell was at that time lieutenant or warden of all the marches, an office among the most important in the kingdom; and though usually divided into three distinct governments, bestowed by the queen's favour upon him alone. In order to difplay his own valour and activity in the difcharge of this truft, he attempted to feize a gang of banditti, who, lurking among the marfhes of Liddefdale, infefted the reft of the country. But while he was laying hold upon one of those desperadoes, he was taying hold upon in feveral places [Oct. 16], fo that his followers were obliged to carry him to Hermitage caftle. Mary instantly flew thither, with an impatience which has been confidered as marking the anxiety of a lover, but little fuited the dignity of a queen<sup>a</sup>. Finding that Bothwell was threatened with

Y Keith, 345. 347. Z Ibid. 353. Good. vol. i. 302. The diftance between Jedburgh and Hermitage is eighteen Scottifh miles, through a country almost impossible. The feason of the year was far advanced. Bothwell feems to have been wounded in a fcuffle, occasioned by the defpair of a fingle man, rather than any open infurrection of the porderers.

B. IV.

no

no dangerous fymptom, fhe returned the fame day to Jedburgh. The fatigue of fuch a journey, added to the anguifh of mind fhe had fuffered on Bothwell's account, threw her next morning into a violent fever <sup>b</sup>. Her life was defpaired of, but her youth, and the vigour of her conftitution, refifted the malignity of her difeafe. During the continuance of the queen's illnefs, the king, who refided at Stirling, never came near Jedburgh <sup>c</sup>; and when he afterwards [Nov. 5] thought fit to make his appearance there, he met with fuch a cold reception, as did not encourage him to make any long flay<sup>d</sup>. Mary foon recovered ftrength enough to return along the eaftern borders to Dunbar.

While the refided in this place, her attention was turned towards England. Elizabeth, notwithftanding her promife, and even proclamations, to the contrary, not only allowed, but encouraged Morton and his affociates to remain in England °. Mary, on the other hand, offered her protection to feveral English fugitives. Each queen watched the motions of the other with a borderers. It does not appear that the queen was attended by any confiderable train. Had any military operation been neceffary, as is fuppofed, Good. vol. i. 304, it would have been extremely improper to rifk the queen's perfon in an expedition against thieves. As foon as the queen found Bothwell to be in no danger, she instantly returned, and after this we hear no more of the infurrection, nor have we any proof that the rioters took refuge in England. As there is no farther evidence with refpect to the motives of this extraordinary journey, the reader must judge what degree of credit is due to Knox and Buchanan, who afcribe it to the queen's love of Bothwell.

b Keith, 351, 352. 4 Knox, 400.

• C Ibid. Append. 133. • Cald. vol. ii. p. 15. jealous jealous attention, and fecretly countenanceed the practices which were carrying on to diffurb the administration of her rival.

For this purpofe Mary's ambaffador, Robert Melvil, and her other emiffaries, were extremely active and fuccefsful. We may afcribe, in a good degree, to their intrigues, that fpirit which appeared in the parliament of England, and which raifed a ftorm that threatened Elizabeth's domcftic tranquillity more than any other event of her reign, and required all her art and dexterity to allay it.

Elizabeth had now reigned eight years without discovering the least intention to marry. A violent diftemper with which she had lately been feized having endangered her life, and alarmed the nation with the profpect of all those calamities which are occafioned by a difputed and dubious fucceffion, a motion was made, and eagerly liftened to in both houses, for addreffing the queen to provide against any fuch danger in times to come, either by fignifying her own refolution to marry, or by confenting to an act, eftablishing the order of fuccession to the crown f. Her love to her fubjects, her duty to the public, her concern for posterity, it was afferted, not only called upon, but obliged her to take one of thefe fteps. The infuperable averfion which fhe had all along discovered for marriage, made it improbable that fhe would choofe the former ; and if fhe complied with the latter requeft, no title to the crown could, with any colour of juffice, be fet in oppofition to that of the Scottish queen. Elizabeth was fagacious enough to fee the remoteft confe-

f D'Ewes Journ. of Parl. 105.

quences

B. IV.

quences of this motion, and obferved them with the greatest anxiety. Mary, by refusing fo often to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, had plainly intimated a defign of embracing the first promifing opportunity for profecuting her right to the English crown; and by her fecret negociations fhe had gained many to favour her title 8. All the Roman catholics ardently wished for her fucceffion. Her gentlenefs and humanity had removed many of those apprehensions which the protestants entertained on account of her religion. The court faction, which envied the power of Cecil, and endeavoured to wreft the administration out of his hands, advanced the pretenfions of the Scottish queen in opposition to him. The union of the two kingdoms was a defirable object to all wife men in both nations; and the birth of the young prince was a fecurity for the continuance of this bleffing, and gave hopes of its perpetuity. Under these circumstances, and while the na-

Under thefe circumftances, and while the nation was in fuch a temper, a parliamentary declaration of Mary's title would have been highly detrimental to Elizabeth. The prefent unfettled ftate of the fucceffion left much in her power. Her refentment alone might have gone far towards excluding any of the competitors from the crown; and the dread of this had hitherto reftrained and overawed the ambition of the Scottifh queen. But if this check fhould be removed by the legal acknowledgment of her title, Mary would be more at liberty to purfue her dangerous defigns, and to act without fear or referve. Her partifans were already meditating fchemes for infurrections in different parts of the kingdom <sup>h</sup>;

g Melv. 136.

h Ibid. 147.

and

and an act of parliament, recognifing the rights of that princefs, whofe pretentions they favoured, would have been nothing lefs than a fignal to arms; and notwithstanding Elizabeth's just title to the affections of her fubjects, might have fhaken and endangered her throne.

While this matter remained in fuspense in both houses, an account of it was transmitted to Mary by Melvil her ambaffador. As fhe did not want advocates for her right, even among those who were near Elizabeth's perfon, fhe endeavoured to cultivate the difposition which appeared towards fettling the rights of fucceffion in her favour, by a letter to the privy counfellors of England. She expressed in it a grateful sense of Elizabeth's friendship, which she ascribes chiefly to their good offices with their fovereign in her behalf. She declared her refolution to live in perpetual amity with England, without urging or purfuing her claim upon the crown any farther than should be agreeable to the queen. But, at the fame time, as her right of fucceffion was undoubted, fhe hoped it would be examined with candour, and judged of with impartiality. The nobles who attended her wrote to the English privy council in the fame strain i. Mary artfully gave thefe letters the air of being nothing more than a declaration of her own and of her fubjects gratitude towards Elizabeth. But as fhe could not be ignorant of the jealoufy and fear with which Elizabeth obferved the proceedings of parliament, a ftep fo uncommon as this, of one prince's entering into public correspondence with the privy counfellors of another, could not be otherwife conftrued than as taken with an intention to encourage the fpirit which had already been raifed among the Englifh. In this light it feems to have appeared to Elizabeth herfelf<sup>k</sup>. But the difposition of her people rendering it neceffary to treat Mary's perfon with great decency, and her title with much regard, the mentioned it to her only in the fofteft language.

1 Keith, 354. Append. 136.

not

B. IV.

Nothing, however, could be a more cruel mortification to a princefs of Elizabeth's character, than the temper which both houfes of parliament difcovered on this occafion. She bent all her policy to defeat or elude the motion. After allowing the first heat of their zeal to evaporate, she called into her prefence a certain number of each house. She foothed and carefied them; she threatened and promifed; she remitted fublidics which were due, and refused those which were offered; and in the end prevailed to have this formidable motion put off for that fession. Happily for her the conduct of the Scottish queen, and the misfortunes which befel her, prevented the revival of fuch a motion in any future parliament<sup>1</sup>.

Meantime, in order to preferve the reputation of impartiality, and that fhe might not drive Mary into any desperate measure, the committed to the Tower one Thornton, who had published fomething derogatory to the right of the Scottish line<sup>m</sup>; and fignissied her displeasure against a member of the house of commons, who seem-k Keith, 357. 1 D'Ewes Journ. 104-130. Camd. 399. Melv. 199. Haynes, 446. m Camd. 401. VOL. 11. E ed.

B. IV.

38

ed, by fome words in a fpeech, to glance at Mary<sup>n</sup>.

Amidst all her other cares, Mary was ever folicitous to promote the interest of that religion which she professed. The re-establishment of the Romish doctrine seems to have been her favourite paffion ; and though the defign was concealed with care and conducted with caution. fhe purfued it with a perfevering zeal. At this time she ventured to lay aside somewhat of her ufual referve; and the aid which the expected from the popifh princes, who had engaged in the league of Bayonne, encouraged her to take a step which, if we confider the temper of the nation, appears to be extremely bold. Having formerly held a fecret correspondence with the court of Rome, the now refolved to allow a nuncio from the pope publicly to enter her dominions. Cardinal Laurea, at that time bishop of Mondovi, was the perfon on whom Pius V. conferred this office, and along with him he fent the queen a prefent of twenty thousand crowns °. It is not the character of the papal court to open its treasury upon distant or imaginary hopes. The bufinefs of the nuncio into Scotland could be no other than to attempt a reconciliation of that kingdom to the Romifu fee. Thus Mary herfelf underftood it ; and in her answer to a letter which she received from the pope, after expreffing her grateful fenfe of his paternal care and liberality, the promifes that fhe would bend her whole ftrength towards the n Haynes, 449. • Vita Card. Laur. ap. Burn. vol. iii. p. 325. re-effa-

39

re-eftablishment and propagation of the catholic faith; that fhe would receive the nuncio with every poffible demonstration of respect, and concur, with the utmost vigour, in all his defigns towards promoting the honour of God, and reforing peace to the kingdom; that the would celebrate the baptism of the prince according to the ceremonies which the Romish ritual prefcribes, hoping that her fubjects would be taught, by this example, again to reverence the facraments of the church, which they had fo long treated with contempt ; and that fhe would be careful to inftil early into her fon the principles of a fincere love and attachment to the catholic faith P. But though the nuncio was already arrived at Paris, and had fent over one of his attendants with part of the money, the queen did not think the juncture proper for his reception. Elizabeth was preparing to fend a mag-nificent embaffy into Scotland, against the time of the prince's baptism, and as it would have been improper to offend her, fhe wifely contrived, under various pretences, to detain Laurea at Paris 9. The convultions into which the kingdom was thrown foon after, made it impossible for him to purfue his journey any farther.

At the very time that Mary was fecretly carrying on thefe negociations for fubverting the reformed church, fhe did not fcruple pub-licly to employ her authority towards obtaining for its minifters a more certain and comfortable fublistence'. During this year, the iffued feve-

P Conzi Vita Mariæ, ap. Jebb, vol. ii. p. 51. 9 Keith, Append. 135. F Keith, 561, 562. H

r Keith, 561, 562. Knox, 401. ral

ral proclamations and acts of council for that purpofe, and readily approved of every feheme which was propofed for the more effectual payment of their flipends. This part of her conduct does little honour to Mary's integrity: and though juffified by the example of princes, who often reckon falfehood and deceit among the neceffary arts of government, and even authorifed by the pernicious cafuiftry of the Roman church, which transfers breach of faith to heretics from the lift of crimes to that of duties, fuch diffimulation, however, muft be numbered among thofe blemishes which never ftain a truly great and generous character.

December. ] As neither the French nor Piedmontefe ambaffadors were yet arrived, the baptilm of the prince was put of from time to time. Meanwhile, Mary fixed her refidence at Craigmillar . Such a retirement, perhaps, fuited the prefent temper of her mind, and induced her to prefer it before her own palace of Holy-roodhoufe. Her averfion for the king grew every day more confirmed, and was become altogether incurable. A deep melancholy fucceeded to that gaiety of fpirit which was natural to her. The rashness and levity of her own choice, and the king's ingratitude and obflinacy, filled her with shame and with despair. A variety of pal. fions preyed at once on a mind, all whofe fenfations were exquisite and all its emotions flrong, and often extorted from her the laft with of the unfortunate, that life itfelf might come to an end t.

* Keith, 355. * Ibid. Pref. vii.

But

1566.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

But as the earl of Bedford, and the count de Brienne, the English and French ambasfadors, whom the had long expected, arrived about this time, Mary was obliged to fupprefs what paffed in her bosom, and to set out for Stirling, in order to celebrate the baptism of her fon. Bedford was attended by a numerous and splendid train, and brought prefents from Elizabeth, fuitable to her own dignity, and the respect with which the affected, at that time, to treat the queen of Scots. Great preparations had been made by Mary, and the magnificence dif-played by her on this occasion exceeded whatever had been formerly known in Scotland. The ceremony itfelf was performed [Dec. 17] according to the rites of the Romish church. But neither Bedford, nor any of the Scottish nobles who profeffed the protestant religion, entered within the gates of the chapel ". The fpirit of that age, firm and uncomplying, would not, upon any inducement, condefcend to witnefs an action which it deemed idolatrous.

Henry's behaviour at this juncture perfectly difcovers the excefs of his caprice, as well as of his folly. He chofe to refide at Stirling, but confined himfelf to his own apartment; and as the queen diffrufted every nobleman who ventured to converfe with him, he was left in abfolute folitude. Nothing could be more fingular, or was lefs expected, than his choofing to appear in a manner that both publifhed the contempt under which he had fallen, and, by expofing the queen's domefic unhappinefs to the > u Keith, 360. E 3

observ-

B. IV.

The

obfervation of fo many foreigners, looked like a flep taken on purpole to mortify and to offend her. Mary felt this infult fenfibly; and notwithflanding all her efforts to affume the gaiety which fuited the occafion, and which was neceflary for the polite reception of her guefts, fhe was fometimes obliged to retire, in order to be at liberty to indulge her forrow, and give vent to her tears *. The king ftill perfifted in his defign of retiring into foreign parts, and daily threatened to put it into execution <sup>y</sup>.

X Keith, Pref. vii.

42

Y Camden affirms, 401, that Bedford was commanded by Elizabeth not to give Darnly the title of king. As this, was an indignity not to be borne either by Mary or her hufband, it hath been afferted to be the caufe of the king's abfence from the ceremony of his fon's bap ifm. Keitn, 360. Good. 319. But, I. No fuch thing is to be found among Bedford's instructions, the original of which still remains. Keith, 356. 2. Bedford's advice to the queen by Melvil is utterly inconfistent with Camden's affertion. Melv. 153. Melvil's account is confirmed by Elizabeth's inftructions to Sir Henry Norris, where the affirms that the commanded Bedford to employ his best offices towards reconciling Mary to her hufband, which fhe had attempted to no purpole. Digges's Compl. Ambaf. p. 13. A paper published Append. No. XVIII, proves the fame thing. 3. Le Croc the French refident mentions the king's absence, but without giving that reason for it which has been founded on Camden's words, though, if that had been the real one, it is hardly poffible to conceive that he should have neglected to mention it. Le Croc's first letter is dated December 2, some time prior to the arrival of the earl of Bedford in Scotland ; and when his instructions, either public or secret, could hardly be known. Le Croc plainly supposes that the discord between the king and queen was the caufe of his abfence. from the baptism, and his account of this matter is that which I have followed. Keith, Pref. vii. 4. He informs his court, that on account of the difference betwixt the king and the

1566.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

The ceremony of witneffing the prince's bap-tifm was not the fole bufinefs of Bedford's embaffy. His inftructions contained an overture, which ought to have gone far towards extin-guishing those jealoufies which had fo long fubfifted between the two queens. The treaty of Edinburgh, which has been fo often mentioned, was the principal occasion of thefe. The fpirit, however, which had rifen to fuch an height in the late parliament, the power of the party which favoured the Scottish queen's title, the number and activity of her agents in different parts of the kingdom, alarmed Elizabeth, and induced her to forego any advantage which the ambiguous and artful expressions in that treaty might afford her. Nothing was now demanded of Mary, but to renounce any title to the crown of England during Elizabeth's life and the lives of her pofterity; who, on the other hand, engaged to take no ftep which might prove inju-rious to Mary's claim upon the fucceffion <sup>2</sup>.

Mary could not, with decency, reject a proposition fo equitable; fhe infifted, however, that Elizabeth fhould order the right upon which fhe claimed, to be legally examined and pub-

the queen, he had refufed to hold any further correspondence with the former, though he appears, in many inflances, to have been his great confident. Ibid. 5. As the king was not prefent at the baptifm, he feems in have been e cluded from any fhare in the ordinary administration of bufinefs. Two acts of privy council, one on the 20th, and the other on the 21ft of December, are found in Keith,  $5^{6}2$ . They both run in the queen's name alone. The king feems not to have been prefent. This could not be owing to Elizabeth's inflructions to Bedford.

2 Keith, 356.

licly

licly recognifed, and particularly that the tefta-ment of Henry VIII. whereby he had excluded the descendants of his eldest sister the queen of Scotland, from the place due to the min the order of fucceffion, might be produced, and con-fidered by the English nobility. Mary's mi-nisters had credulously embraced an opinion, that this testament, which they fo justly conceived to be injurious to their miftrefs, was a mere forgery; and on different occasions had urged Elizabeth to produce it. Mary would have fuffered confiderably by gaining this point. The original testament is still extant, and not the least doubt can be entertained of its genuine-nefs and authenticity. But it was not Elizabeth's intention to weaken or to fet afide the title of the houfe of Stewart. She aimed at nothing more than to keep the queftion concern-ing the fucceffion perplexed and undecided, and by industriously eluding this request, she did, in one respect, real service to Mary's caufe ª.

A few days after the baptifm of the prince, Morton and all the other confpirators againft Rizio obtained their pardon, and leave to return into Scotland. Mary, who had hitherto continued inexorable to every entreaty in their behalf, yielded at laft to the folicitations of Bothwell<sup>b</sup>. He could hope for no fuccefs in thofe bold defigns on which his ambition refolved to venture, without drawing aid from every quarter. By procuring a favour for Morton and his affociates, of which they had good reason to despair, he expected to fecure a band of faithful and determined adherents.

<sup>a</sup> Rymer, xv. p. 110. Keith, 358. Note (c). Murdin, 368 b Good. vol. i. 140. Melv. 154. 1566.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

The king still remained at Stirling in folitude and under contempt. His impatience in this fituation, together with the alarm given him by the rumour of a defign to feize his perfon and confine him to prifon e, was the occasion of his leaving that place in an abrupt manner, and retiring to his father at Glafgow."

Two affemblies of the church were held during this year [June 25, Dec. 25]. New com-plaints were made, and upon good grounds, of the poverty and contempt under which the protestant clergy were fuffered to languish. Penurious as the allotment for their fubfistence was, they had not received the leaft part of what was due for the preceding year d. Nothing lefs than a zeal, ready to endure and to fuffer every thing for a good caufe, could have perfuaded men to adhere to a church fo indigent and fo neglected. The extraordinary expences occasioned by the prince's baptifm had exhaufted the queen's treafury, and the fums appropriated for the fubfiftence of the clergy were diverted into other channels. The queen was therefore obliged to prevent the just remonstrances of the affembly, by falling on fome new method for the relief of the church. Some fymptoms of liberality, fome flretch towards munificence, might have been expected in an affignment which was made with an intention of foothing and filencing the clergy. But both the queen and the nobles held fast the riches of the church which they had feized. A fum which, at the higheft computation, can hardly be reckoned equal to nine thousand pounds fterling<sup>e</sup>, was deemed fufficient for the maintenance of a whole national church, by men who had lately feen fingle monasteries possified of revenues far superior in value.

c Keith, Pref. viii. d Ibid. 562.

riches

46

The ecclefiaftics in that age bore the grievances which affected themfelves alone with aftonifhing patience; but wherever the reformed religion was threatened, they were extremely apt to be alarmed, and to proclaim, in the loudest manner, their apprehensions of danger. A just occafion of this kind was given them, a short time before the meeting of the affembly. The ufurped and oppreffive jurifdiction of the fpiritual courts had been abolifhed by the parliament. in the year one thousand five hundred and fixty, and commiffaries were appointed to hear and determine the caufes which formerly came under their cognizance f. Among the few acts of that parliament to which Mary had paid any regard, this was one. She had confirmed the authority of the commiffaries, and had given them inftructions for directing their proceedingss, which are still of great authority in that court. From the time of their first appointment, these judges had continued in the uninterrupted exercise of their function, when of a fudden the queen iffued a proclamation, reftoring the archbishop of St. Andrew's to his ancient jurifdiction, and depriving the commiffaries of all authority b.

A motive, which cannot be justified, rendered the queen not unwilling to venture upon this <sup>e</sup> Keith, 562. f Ibid. 152, <sup>g</sup> Ibid. 251. b Knox, 403. rafh

rafh action. She had been contriving for fome time how to re-establish the popish religion; and the reftoring the ancient ecclefiaftics to their former jurifdiction feemed to be a confiderable ftep towards that end. The motive which prompted Bothwell, to whofe influence over the queen this action must be chiefly imputed i, was still more criminal. His enterprising ambition had already formed that bold defign, which he foon after put in execution; and the ufe which we shall hereafter find him making of that authority which the popifh ecclefialtics regained, difcovers . the reafons of his prefent conduct in contribut-ing to revive their power. The protestant clergy were not unconcerned fpectators of an event which threatened their religion with unavoidable deftruction; but as they defpaired of obtaining the proper remedy from the queen herfelf, they addreffed a remonstrance to the whole body of the protestant nobility, full of that ardent zeal for religion, which the danger to which it was exposed at that time feemed to require k. What effects this vehement exhortation might have produced, we have no opportunity of judging, the attention of the nation being quickly turned towards events of another and more tragical nature.

1567.] Immediately upon the king's leaving Stirling, and before he could reach Glafgow, he was feized with a dangerous diftemper The fymptoms which attended it were violent and unufual, and in that age it was commonly imputed to the effects of poifon<sup>1</sup>. It is impoffible, amidit the i Knox, 403. k Keith, 567. l Melv. 154. Knox, 401. contra-contradictions of historians, to decide with certainty concerning its nature or its cause<sup>m</sup>. His life was in the utmost danger; but after languishing for some weeks, the vigour of his constitution surmounted the malignity of the difease.

B. IV.

Mary's neglect of the king on this occasion was equal to that with which he had treated her during her illness at Jedburgh. She no longer felt that warmth of conjugal affection which prompts to sympathy, and delights in all those tender offices which sooth and alleviate fickness and pain. At this juncture, she did m Buchanan and Knox are politive that the king had been poifoned. They mention the black and putrid puffules which broke out all over his body. Buchanan adds, that Abernethy, the king's phyfician, plainly declared that poifon was the caufe of thefe fymptoms, and that the queen refufed to allow her own phyfician to attend him. Buch. 349. Knox, 401. 2. Blackwood, Caufin, &c. Jebb, vol. ii. 59. 214. affert, that the fmall-pox was the difeafe with which the king was feized. He is called a Poski/b man in the queen's letter. Good. vol. ii. 15. The reason given by French Paris for lodging the king at the Kirk of Field, viz. left the young prince fould catch the infection if he flaid in the palace, feems to favour this opinion. Anderf. vol. ii. 193. Carte mentions it as a proof of Mary's tendernels to her hufband, that though fhe never had the small-pox herfelf, she ventured to attend him, vol. iii. 446. This, if it had been true, would have afforded a good pretence for not visiting him fooner; but Mary had the small-pox in her infancy. Sadler's Letters, p. 330. An additional proof of this is produced from a poem of Adrian Turnebus, by the publisher of Ancient Scottish Poems, p. 308. 3. Bishop Lefly affirms, that the king's difeafe was the French pox. Keith, 264. Note (b). In that age, this difease was effeemed to contagious, that perfons infected with it were removed without the walls of cities.

not

not even put on the appearance of this paffion. Notwithstanding the king's danger, she amufed herfelf with excursions to different parts of the country, and suffered near a month to elapse before she visited him at Glasgow. By that time the violence of the distemper was over, and the king, though weak and languishing, was out of all danger.

The breach between Mary and her hufband was not occafioned by any of those flight dif-gusts which interrupt the domestic union, without diffolving it altogether. Almost all the paffions which operate with greatest violence on a female mind, and drive it to the most dangerous extremes, concurred in raifing and fomenting this unhappy quarrel. Ingratitude for the favours she had bestowed, contempt of her perfon, violations of the marriage vow, encroachments on her power, conspiracies against her favourites, jealoufy, infolence, and obstinacy, were the injuries of which Mary had great reason to complain. She felt them with the utmost fenfibility; and, added to the anguish of disappointed love, they produced those fymptoms of defpair which we have already defcribed. Her re-fentment against the king feems not to have abated from the time of his leaving Stirling. In a letter written with her own hand to her ambaffador in France, on the day before fhe fet out for Glafgow [Jan. 20], no tokens of fudden reconcilement appear. On the contrary, fhe mentions, with fome bitternefs, the king's ingratitude, the jealoufy with which he ob-ferved her actions, and the inclination he difcovered to difturb her government, and at the VOL. II. fame F fame time talks of all his attempts with the utmost fcorn<sup>n</sup>.

50

After this discovery of Mary's fentiments, at the time of her departure from Edinburgh to Glafgow, a vifit to the king, which had been neglected when his fituation rendered it moft neceffary, appears fingular, and it could hardly be expected that any thing but marks of jealoufy and diftrust should appear in such an interview. This, however, was far from being the cafe ; fhe not only vifited Henry, but, by all her words and actions, endeavoured to express an uncommon affection for him: and though this made impreffion on the credulous fpirit of her hufband, no lefs flexible on fome occafions, than obftinate on others; yet, to those who are acquainted with the human heart, and who know how feldom and how flowly fuch wounds in domeftic happiness are healed, this fudden transition will appear with a very fufpicious air, and will be confidered by them as the effect of artifice.

But it is not on fufpicion alone that Mary is charged with diffimulation in this part of her conduct. Two of her famous letters to Bothwell were written during her ftay at Glafgow, and fully lay open this fcene of iniquity. He had fo far fucceeded in his ambitious and criminal defign, as to gain an abfolute afcendant over the queen; and in a fituation fuch as Mary's, merit not fo confpicuous, fervices of far inferior importance, and addrefs much lefs infinuating than Bothwell's, may be fuppofed to fteal imperceptibly on a female heart, and entirely to overcome

R Keith, Pref. viii.

B. 1V.

51

it. Unhappily, among those in the higher ranks of life, fcruples with regard to conjugal fidelity are, often, neither many nor ftrong : nor did the manners of that court in which Mary had been educated contribute to increase or to fortify them. The amorous turn of Francis I. and Henry II. the licentiousness of the military character of that age, and the liberty of appearing in all companies, which began to be allowed to women, who had not yet acquired that delicacy of fentiment, and those polished manners, which alone can render liberty innocent, had introduced among the French an aftonishing relaxation in domeftic morals. Such examples, which were familiar to Mary from her infancy, could hardly fail of diminishing that horror of vice which is natural to a virtuous mind. The king's behaviour would render the first approach of forbidden fentiments lefs shocking ; refentment, and difappointed love, would be apt to reprefent what-ever foothed her revenge, as juftifiable on that account; and fo many concurring caufes might, almost imperceptibly, kindle a new passion in her heart.

But whatever opinion we may form with regard to the rife and progrefs of this paffion, the letters themfelves breathe all the ardour and tenderness of love. The affection which Mary there expresses for Bothwell fully accounts for every fublequent part of her conduct; which, without admitting this circumstance, appears altogether mysterious, inconfistent, and inexplicable. That reconcilement with her hufband, of which, if we allow it to be genuine, it is impof-fible to give any plaufible account, is difcovered by

by the queen's own confession to have been mere artifice and deceit. As her averfion for her hufband, and the fufpicious attention with which she observed his conduct, became universally known, her ears were officioufly filled, as is ufual in fuch cafes, with groundlefs or aggravated accounts of his actions. By fome the was told, that the king intended to feize the perfon of the prince his fon, and in his name to usurp the government; by others fhe was affured that he refolved inftantly to leave the kingdom; that a veffel was hired for this purpofe, and lay in the river Clyde ready to receive him °. The last was what Mary chiefly dreaded. Henry's retiring into a foreign country must have been highly dishonourable to the queen, and would have entirely disconcerted Bothwell's measures. While he refided at Glafgow, at a diftance from her, and in that part of the kingdom where the interest of his family was greatest, he might with more facility accomplish his defigns. In order, therefore, to prevent his executing any fuch wild fcheme, it was neceffary to bring him to fome place where he would be more immediately under her own cye. For this purpose, she first employed all her art to regain his confidence, and then proposed to remove him to the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, under pretence that there he would have eatier access to the advice of phyficians, and that fhe herfelf could attend him without being absent from her fon P. The king was weak enough to fuffer himfelf to be perfuaded; and being still feeble, and incapable of bearing fatigue, was carried in a litter to Edinburgh.

<sup>o</sup> Keith, Pref. viii. P Good. vol. ii. 8.

of

B. IV.

The place prepared for his reception was a houfe belonging to the provoft of a collegiate church, called Kirk of Field. It flood almost upon the fame fpot where the houfe belonging to the principal of the university now flands. Such a fituation, on a rising ground, and at that time in an open field, had all the advantages of healthful air to recommend it; but, on the other hand, the folitude of the place rendered it extremely proper for the commission of that crime, with a view to which it feems manifestly to have been chofen.

Mary continued to attend the king with the most assiduous care. She feldom was abfent from him through the day; fhe flept two nights in the chamber under his apartment. She heaped on him fo many marks of tendernefs and confidence, as in a great meafure quieted those fufpicions which had fo long diffurbed him. But while he was fondly indulging in dreams of the return of his former happinels, he flood on the very brink of destruction. On Sunday the ninth of February, about eleven at night, the queen left the Kirk of Field, in order to be prefent at a mafque in the palace. At two next morning, the houfe in which the king lay was blown up with gunpowder. The noife and shock which this fudden explosion occasioned, alarmed the whole city. The inhabitants ran to the place whence it came. The dead body of the king, with that of a fervant who flept in the fame room, werc found lying in an adjacent garden without the city wall, untouched by fire, and with no bruife or mark of violence.

Such

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Such was the unhappy fate of Henry Stewart lord Darnly, in the twenty-first year of his age. The indulgence of fortune, and his own external accomplifhments, without any other merit, had raifed him to an height of dignity of which he was altogether unworthy. By his folly and ingratitude, he loft the heart of a woman who doated on him to distraction. His infolence and inconftancy alienated from him fuch of the nobles as had contributed most zealously towards his elevation. His levity and caprice exposed him to the fcorn of the people, who once revered him as the defcendant of their ancient kings and heroes. Had he died a natural death, his end would have been unlamented, and his memory have been forgotten ; but the cruel circumstances of his murder, and the fhameful remiffnefs in neglecting to avenge it, have made his name to be remembered with regret, and have rendered him the object of pity, to which he had otherwife no title.

Every one's imagination was at work to guels who had contrived and executed this execrable deed. The fufpicion fell, with almost general confent, on Bothwell 9; and fome reflections were thrown out, as if the queen herfelf were no ftranger to the crime. Of Bothwell's guilt there remains the fullest evidence that the nature of the action will admit. The queen's known fentiments with regard to her hufband, gave a great appearance of probability to the imputation with which the was loaded .

9 Melv. 155. Anderf. vol ii. 156. * See Differtation concerning the murder of Henry Darnly, and the genuineness of Mary's letters to Bothwell, Appendix. wo

B. IV.

Two days after the murder, a proclamation was isfued by the queen, offering a confiderable reward to any perfon who fhould difcover those who had been guilty of fuch a horrid and deteftable crime s; and though Bothwell was now one of the greatest subjects in the kingdom, formidable on account of his own power, and protected by the queen's favour, it was impoffible to suppress the fentiments and indignation of the people. Papers were affixed to the most public places of the city, accufing him of the murder, and naming his accomplices ; pictures appeared to the fame purpofe, and voices were heard in the middle of the night, charging him with that barbarous action. But the authors of these rumours did not confine their accusations to Bothwell alone; they infinuated that the queen herfelf was acceffary to the crime t. This bold accufation, which fo directly attacked Mary's reputation, drew the attention of her council; and by cngaging them in an inquiry after the authors of these libels, diverted them from fearching for the murderers of the king ". It could fcarce be expected that Mary herfelf would be extremely folicitous to discover those who had rid her of an hufband whom fhe had fo violently hated. It was Bothwell's interest, who had the fupreme direction of this, as well as of all other affairs, to flife and fupprcfs whatever evidence should be offered, and to cover, if poffible, the whole tranfaction under the veil of darkness and of filence. Some inquiry, however, was made, and fome perfons called before the council; but the examination was conducted with the most indecent remisinels,

<sup>s</sup> Anderf. vol. i. 36. <sup>t</sup> Ibid. vol. ii. 156. <sup>u</sup> Id. vol. i. 38.

B. IV.

remiffnefs, and in fuch a manner as to let in no light upon that fcene of guilt *.

It was not her own fubjects alone who fufpected Mary of having been acceffary to this unnatural crime; nor did an opinion, fo difhonourable to her character, owe its rife and progrefs to the jealoufy and malice of her factious nobles. The report of the manner and circumftances of the king's murder fpread quickly over all Europe, and even in that age, which was accustomed to deeds of violence, it excited univerfal horror. As her unhappy breach with her hufband had long been matter of public difcourfe, the first conjectures which were formed with regard to his death, were extremely to her difadvantage. Her friends, at a lofs what apology to offer for her conduct, called on her to profccute the murderers with the utmost diligence, and expected that the rigour of her proceedings would prove the best and fullest vindication of her innocence y.

Lennox at the fame time incited Mary to vengeance with inceffant importunity. This nobleman had fhared in his fon's difgrace, and being treated by Mary with neglect, ufually refided at a diftance from court. Roufed, however, by an event no lefs fhocking to the heart of a father, than fatal to all his fchemes of ambition, he ventured to write to the queen [Feb. 21], and to offer his advice with refpect to the most effectual method for difcovering and convicting thofe who had fo cruelly deprived him of a fon, and her of a hufband. He urged her to profecute thofe who were guilty with vigour, and to bring them to a fpeedy trial; he declared his own fufpicion of Bothwell, and of those who were named as his accomplices; he required that, out of regard to decency, and in order to encourage evidence to appear against them, the perfons accused of fuch an atrocious crime should be committed to cuftody, or at leaft excluded from her court and prefence z.

* Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 167, 168. y Keith, Pref. ix. them

1567.7 HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Mary was then at Seaton, whither she had retired after the burial of the king, whole body was deposited among the monarchs of Scotland, in a private but decent manner<sup>a</sup>. The former part of the earl's demand could not on any pre tence be eluded; and it was refolved to bring Bothwell immediately to trial. But, inftead of confining him to any prifon, Mary admitted him into all her councils, and allowed a perfon, univerfally reputed the murderer of her hufband, to enjoy all the fecurity, the dignity, and the power of a favourite b. The offices which Bothwell already posseffed, gave him the command of all the fouth of Scotland. The cafile of Edinburgh, however, was a place of fo much confequence, that he wifned earneftly to have it in his own power. The queen, in order to prevail on the earl of Mar to furrender it, confented to put the perfon of the young prince in his hands, and immediately bestowed the government of that important fortress upon Bothwell [March 19]. So many steps in her conduct, inconfistent with all the rules of prudence and of decency, muft be imputed to an excels either of folly or of love.

z Keith, 369, &c. * Anderf vo. i. 23.

b Anderf. vol. i. 40, &c. C Ibid. vol. i. Pref. 64. Keith, 379.

Mary's

Mary's known character fully vindicates her from the former; of the latter, many and striking proofs foon appeared.

No direct evidence had yet appeared againft Bothwell; but as time might bring to light the circumftances of a crime in which fo many accomplices were concerned, it was of great importance to hurry over the trial, while nothing more than general fufpicions, and uncertain furmifes, could be produced by his accufers. For this reafon, in a meeting of privy council held on the twenty-eighth of March, the twelfth of April was appointed for the day of trial. Though the law allowed, and the manner in which criminal caufes were carried on in that age required, a much longer interval, it appears from feveral circumftances that this fhort fpace was confiderably contracted, and that Lennox had only eleven days warning to prepare for accufing a perfon fo far fuperior to himfelf both in power and in favour <sup>d</sup>. No man could be lefs in a condition to contend

d The act of privy council, appointing the day of Bothwell's trial, bears date March the 28th, which happened on a Thursday. Anders. vol. i. 50. The queen's warrant to the meffengers, empowering them to fummon Lennox to be prefent, is dated on the 29th. Anderf. vol. ii. 97. He was fummoned by public proclamation at the crofs of Edinburgh on the fame day. Ibid. 100. He was fummoned at his dwelling-houfes in Glafgow and Dunbarton the 30th of March, the 1st and 2d days of April. Ibid. 101. He was fummoned at Perth, April 1ft. Ibid. 102. Though Lennox refided at that time forty miles from Edinburgh, the citation might have been given him fooner. Such an unneceffary delay affords fome caufe for fuspicion. It is true, Mary, in her letter, March 24th, invited Lennox to come to Edinburgh the enfuing week ; this gave him warning fome days contend with an antagonist who was thus fupported. Though Lennox's paternal eftate had been reftored to him when he was recalled into Scotland, it feems to have been confiderably impaired during his banishment. His vaffals, while he refided in England, had been accuftomed to fome degree of independence, and he had not recovered that afcendant over them, which a feudal chief ufually poffeffed. He had no reafon to expect the concurrence of any of those factions into which the nobles were divided. During the fhort period of his fon's profperity, he had taken fuch steps as gave rife to an open breach with Murray and all his adherents. The partifans of the house of Hamilton were his hereditary and mortal enemies. Huntly was linked in the clofeft. confederacy with Bothwell; and thus, to the difgrace of the nation, Lennox stood alone in a caufe where both honour and humanity called fo loudly on his countrymen to fecond him.

B. 1V.

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

It is remarkable too that Bothwell himfelf was prefent, and fat as a member in that meeting of privy council, which gave directions with regard to the time and manner of his own trial; and he ftill enjoyed not only full liberty, but was received into the queen's prefence with the fame diftinguished familiarity as formerly °.

Nothing could be a more cruel difappointment to the wifhes and refertment of a father, than fuch days fooner, that fhe intended to bring on the trial without delay. But the precife time could not be legally or certainly known to Lennox fooner than ten or twelve days before the day on which he was required to appear. By the law and practice of Scotland, at that time, parties were fummoned, in cafes of treafon, forty days previous to the trial.

e Anderf. vol. i. 50. 52.

a premature trial; every flep towards which feemed to be taken by directions from the perfon who was himfelf accufed of the crime, and calculated on purpofe to conceal rather than to detect his guilt. Lennox forefaw what would be the iffue of this mock inquiry, and with how little fafety to himfelf, or fuccefs to his caufe, he could venture to appear on the day prefixed. In his former letters, though under expressions the most respectful, some symptoms of his distructing the queen may be discovered. He spoke out now in plain language. He complained of the injury done him, by hurrying on the trial with fuch illegal precipitation. He reprefented once more the indecency of allowing Bothwell not only to enjoy perfonal liberty, but to retain his former influence over her councils. He again required her, as fhe regarded her own honour, to give fome evidence of her fincerity in profecuting the murder, by confining the perfon who was on good grounds fuspected to be the author of it; and till that were done, he fignified his own refolution not to be prefent at a trial, the manner and circumftances of which were fo irregular and unfatisfactory f.

He feems, however, to have expected little fuccefs from this application to Mary; and therefore at the fame time befought Elizabeth to interpofe, in order to obtain fuch a delay as he demanded<sup>g</sup>. Nothing can be a ftronger proof how violently he fufpected the one queen, than his fubmitting to implore the aid of the other, who had treated his fon with the utmost contempt, and himfelf and family with the greatest f Anders. vol. i. 52.

+$34 ×

s Good. vol. i. 352. rigour. rigour. Elizabeth, who was never unwilling to interpofe in the affairs of Scotland, wrote inftantly to Mary, advifed her to delay the trial for fome time, and urged in fuch ftrong terms the fame arguments which Lennox had ufed, as might have convinced her to what an unfavourable conftruction her conduct would be liable, if fhe perfifted in her prefent method of proceeding <sup>h</sup>.

Neither her intreaties, however, nor those of Lennox, could prevail to have the trial put off. On the day appointed Bothwell appeared, but with fuch a formidable retinuc, that it would have been dangerous to condemn, and impoffible to punish him. Besides a numerous body of his friends and vaffals, affembled, according to cuftom, from different parts of the kingdom, he was attended by a band of hired foldiers, who marched with flying colours along the ftreets of Edinburgh<sup>i</sup>. A court of juffice was held with the accustomed formalities. An indictment was prefented against Bothwell, and Lennox was called upon to make good his accufation. In his name appeared Robert Cunningham, one of his dependants. He excufed his master's abfence, on account of the shortness of the time, which prevented his affembling his friends and vaffals, without whofe affiftance he could not with fafety venture to fet himfelf in opposition to fuch a powerful antagonist. For this reason, he defired the court to ftop proceeding, and protefted, that any fentence which should be passed at that time ought to be deemed illegal and void. Bothwell, on the other hand, infifted that the Anderf. Pref. 60. See Appendix, No. XIX.

 Anderf. vol. i. 135.

VOL. 11.

court

G

B. IV.

court fhould inftantly proceed to trial. One of Lennox's own letters, in which he craved of the queen to profecute the murderers without delay, was produced. Cunningham's objections were over-ruled; and the jury, confifting of peers and barons of the first rank, found Bothwell not guilty of the crime.

No perfon appeared as an accufer, not a fingle witnefs was examined, nor any evidence produced againft him. The jury, under thefe circumftances, could do nothing elfe but acquit him. Their verdict, however, was far from gratifying the wifnes, or filencing the murmurs of the people. Every circumftance in the trial gave grounds for fufpicion, and excited indignation ; and the judgment pronounced, inftead of being a proof of Bothwell's innocence, was efteemed an argument of his guilt. Pafquinades and libels were affixed to different places, expreffing the fentiments of the public with the utmost virulence of language.

The jury themfelves feem to have been aware of the cenfure to which their proceedings would be exposed; and, at the fame time that they returned their verdict acquitting Bothwell, the earl of Caithness protested, in their name, that no crime should be imputed to them on that account, becaufe no accufer had appeared, and no proof was brought of the indictment. He took notice likewife, that the ninth inftead of the tenth of February was mentioned in the indictment, as the day on which the murder had been committed : a circumstance which discovers the extreme inaccuracy of those who prepared the indictment; and at a time when men were difpofed, and not without reason, to be fuspicious of every thing, this this fmall matter contributed to confirm and to increafe their fufpicions k.

Even Bothwell himfelf did not rely on the judgment which he had obtained in his favour, as a full vindication of his innocence. Immediately after his acquittal, he, in compliance with a cuftom which was not then obfolete, published a writing, in which he offered to fight in fingle combat any gentleman of good fame who fhould prefume to accufc him of being acceffary to the murder of the king.

Mary, however, continued to treat him as if he had been cleared by the most unexceptionable and fatisfactory evidence. The afcendant he had gained over her heart, as well as over her councils, was more visible than ever; and Lennox, who could not expect that his own perfon could be fafe in a country where the murderer of his fon had been abfolved, without regard to justice; and loaded with honours, in contempt of decency; fled with precipitation towards England<sup>1</sup>.

Two days after the trial a parliament was held, [April 14,] at the opening of which the queen diftinguished Bothwell, by appointing him to carry the sceptre before her in. Most of the acts paffed in this affembly were calculated on purpole to ftrengthen his party, and to promote his defigns. He obtained the ratification of all the poffeffions and honours which the partiality of the queen had conferred upon him; and the act to that effect contained the ftrongeft declarations of his faithful fervices to the crown in all times paft. The furrender of the caftle of Edin-k Both. Trial, Anderf. vol. ii. 97, &c. 1 Keith, 378. Note (d). m 1bid.

G 2

burgh

64

burgh by Marwas confirmed. The law of attainder againft Huntly was repealed, and he and his adherents were reflored to the honours and eftates of their anceftors. Several of thofe who had been on the jury which acquitted Bothwell, obtained ratifications of the grants made in their favour; and as pafquinades daily multiplied, a law paffed, whereby thofe into whofe hands any paper of that kind fell, were commanded inftantly to deftroy it ; and if, through their neglect, it fhould be allowed to fpread, they were fubjected to a capital punifhment, in the fame manner as if they had been the original authors<sup>n</sup>.

But the abfolute dominion which Bothwell had acquired over Mary's mind appeared in the clearest manner, by an act in favour of the protestant religion, to which at this time she gave her affent. Mary's attachment to the Romish faith was uniform and fuperflitious; fhe had never laid afide the defign, nor loft the hopes, of reftoring it. She had of late come under new engagements to that purpofe, and in confequence of thefe had ventured upon fome fteps more public and vigorous than any she had formerly taken. But though none of thefe circumstances were unknown to Bothwell, there were powerful motives which prompted him at this juncture to conciliate the good-will of the protestants, by exerting himfelf in order to procure for them fome additional fecurity in the exercife of their religion. That which they enjoyed at prefent was very precarious, being founded entirely on the royal proclamation iffued foon after the arrival of the queen in Scotland, which in express terms was declared to be only a temporary regulation. From that period, neither the folicitations of the general affemblies of the church, nor the intreaties of her people, could extort from Mary any conceffion in favour of the protestant religion, on which the professors might rest with greater confidence. This, however, by the more powerful influence of Bothwell, they now obtained. An act was passed in this parliament, repealing all the laws, canon, civil, and municipal, adverse to the reformed religion, and exempting fuch as had embraced it from the penalties to which they might have been fubjected by these laws, either on account of their past conduct or prefent profession ; declaring at the fame time that their perfons, estates, honours, and benefices were taken under public protection against every court, civil or ec-clefiastical, that might attempt to molest them on account of their religious fentiments. Thus the protestants, instead of holding their facred rights by no better tenure than a declaration of royal indulgence, which might be revoked at pleafure, obtained legal and parliamentary protection in the exercife of their religion. By prevailing on the queen to affent to this law, Bothwell feems to have flattered himfelf that he would acquire fuch merit both with the clergy and with the people, as might induce them to favour his ambitious fchemes, and to connive at what he had done, or might do, in order to accomplish them. The protestants accordingly, though this act was far from amounting to a legal establishment of the reformed faith, feem to have confidered it as an additional fecurity of fuch importance, that it was published among the laws enacted in a parliament held G 3 held towards the clofe of this year, under very different leaders °.

n Keith, 380.

declared

65

Every

B. 1V.

• I am indebted to the accuracy of Sir David Dalrymple, for pointing out (Remarks on the Hiftory of Scotland, ch. 9.) a confiderable error into which I had fallen with respect to this act, by fuppoling it to be fo favourable to the doctrine of the Reformation, that the parliament which met Dec. 15, could fubstitute nothing stronger or more explicit in its place, and thought it fufficient to ratify it word for word. This error I have now corrected; hut after confidering the act with particular attention, though I am fatisfied that it neither established the reformed religion or the religion of the ftate, nor abolifhed popery, yet it granted fuch new and legal fecurity to the protestants, as was deemed, in that age, an acquifition of great value. The framers of the law feem manifeffly to have viewed it in that light; after reciting, 46 that the queen, fince her arrival, had attempted nothing contrary to the flate of religion which the found publicly and univerfally standing, on which account she was most worthy to be ferved, honoured, and obeyed, &c."-the act goes on, se that as the intends to continue the fame goodnefs and government in all times coming, the professors of the religion aforefaid may and shall have occasion to praise God for her Jiappy and gracious government, &c. : and to the effect that the professions of the religion aforefaid may assure themselves to be in full furety thereof, and of their lands, lives, &c. and may with the better will jeopard and hazard their lives and goods in her highnels's fervice, against all enemies to her, and to the commonwell of this realm, &c. therefore our fovereign, with the advice of the whole effates in parliament, &c." then follow the flatutory claufes mentioned in the text. The intention of passing the act is apparent, and it is drawn with great art. This art is peculiarly manifeft in the concluding claufe. In her first proclamation the queen had declared, that it should continue in force only until the should take final order concerning religion with the advice. of parliament. In this act the intention of taking further order concerning religion is mentioned, probably with a view to pleafe the queen ; but it is worded with fuch fludied dexcerity, that the protection granted by this law is no longer-

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Every flep taken by Bothwell had hitherto been attended with all the fuccefs which his moft fanguine to be regarded as temporary, or depending upon the queen taking fuch final order. Parl. 1 K. Ja. VI. c. 31. In the fame light of an important acquisition of security to the reformed religion, this act is reprefented by the privy council in a proclamation iffued May 23, 1567. Keith, 571. Mary's principal adherents, in a paper fubscribed by them, Sept. 12, 1568, declare, that she, " by the advice of the three estates, had fatisfied the defire of the whole nobility in an act concerning all the points of religion paffed in the parliament held April 1567." Goodal, ii. 357. The fame is afferted to be the intention and effect of this act in another public paper in the year 1570. Haynes, 621. This act is perfectly conformable to that fystem of policy by which Bothwell feems to have regulated his conduct both before and after this time, with a view of gaining the protestants, particularly the clergy, by acts of indulgence and favour. On the 3d of October 1566, when Bothwell's credit was very confiderable, the queen, in a meeting of privy council, where he was prefent, took meafures for fecuring to the protestant clergy more regular payment of their flipends; and on the 20th of December of that year, granted an affignation of a confiderable fum to be applied for the fupport of the miniftry. Keith, 360, 361, 362. In a meeting of privy council, January 10, 1567, when all public transactions were entirely conducted by Bothwell, an act was paffed in order to provide for the fustentation of ministers in boroughs, and Bothwell is named as one of the commissioners for carrying it into execution, with power to impose a tax on fuch boroughs as had no ministers, for raising a stipend. Keith, 570. In another meeting of privy council, May 23, 1567, the queen, after mentioning the declaration which the had made in the year 1561, of her refolution to maintain that religion which the found eftablished in the kingdom, and after taking notice of what additional fecurity it had acquired by the late act of April 19th, with a view of giving still farther fatisfacti n to the protestants, she declared that all licences which had been obtained from her by any perfons, permitting them to exercife the rites of popifh worfhip, were now revoked and annulled. Keith, fanguine wishes could expect. He had entirely, gained the queen's heart; the murder of the king had excited no public commotion; he had been acquitted by his peers of any fhare in that crime; and their decifion had been in fome fort ratified in parliament. But in a kingdom where the regal authority was fo extremely limited, and the power of the nobles fo formidable, he durft not venture on the last action, towards which all his ambitious projects tended, without their approbation. In order to fecure this, he, immediately after the diffolution of parliament, invited all the nobles who were prefent to an entertain-ment [April 19]. Having filled the houfe with his friends and dependants, and furrounded it with armed men P, he opened to the company his intention of marrying the queen, whofe confent, he told them, he had already obtained; and demanded their approbation of this match, which, he faid, was no lefs acceptable to their fovereign, than honourable to himfelf 4. Huntly and Sea-

Keith, 570-572. It deferves to be remarked, that, favourable as all these acts were to the reformation, some bishops, whose ardent zeal for the old doctrines bistory records, were prefent in those meetings of privy council in which they were passed. From confidering all these particulars, one need not wonder that a law " anent caffing (as its title bears), annulling, and abrogating of all laws, acts, and conflitutions, canone, civile, and municipal, with other conflitutions, contrare to the religion now professit within the realme," confirmed by the royal affent of the queen, should be published among the ftatutes fecuring the protestant religion. We find according-ly, in a very rare edition of the acts of parliament imprintit at Edinburgh by Robert Lekprevik, printar to the king's majestie, 6 day of April 1558, the act of April 19 inferted among the acts of the regent's parliament in December. P Good. vol. ii. 141.

9 Anderf. vol. i. 94.

· ton.

B. 1V.

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

ton, who were privy to all Bothwell's fchemes, and promoted them with the utmost zeal; the popish ecclesiaftics, who were absolutely devoted to the queen, and ready to footh all her paffions ; inftantly declared their fatisfaction with what he had propofed. The reft, who dreaded the exorbitant power which Bothwell had acquired, and observed the queen's growing affection towards him in all her actions, were willing to make a merit of yielding to a measure which they could neither oppole nor defeat. Some few were confounded and enraged. But in the end Bothwell, partly by promifes and flattery, partly by terror and force, prevailed on all who were prefent to fubfcribe a paper, which leaves a deeper stain than any occurrence in that age on the honour and character of the nation.

This paper contained the strongest declarations of Bothwell's innocence, and the most ample acknowledgment of his good fervices to the kingdom. If any future accusation should be brought against him on account of the king's murder, the fubscribers promifed to stand by him as one man, and to hazard their lives and fortunes in his defence. They recommended him to the qucen as the most proper perfon she could choose for a husband : and if she should condescend to bestow on him that mark of her regard, they undertook to promote the marriage, and to join him with all their forces in oppofing any perfon who endcavoured to obstruct it r. Among the subscribers of this paper we find fome who were the queen's chief confidents, others who were ftrangers to her councils, and obnoxious to her difpleafure ; fome

"Anderf, vol. i. 177.

who

who faithfully adhered to her through all the viciffitudes of her fortune, and others who became the principal authors of her fufferings ; fome paffionately attached to the Romish superstition, and others zealous advocates for the protestant faith<sup>s</sup>. No common intereft can be fuppofed to have united men of fuch opposite principles and parties, in recommending to their fovereign a ftep fo injurious to her honour, and fo fatal to her peace. This ftrange coalition was the effect of much artifice, and must be confidered as the boldeft and most masterly stroke of Bothwell's addrefs. It is obfervable, that amidft all the altercations and mutual reproaches of the two parties which arofe in the kingdom, this unworthy transaction is feldom mentioned. Confcious on both fides, that in this particular their conduct could ill bear examination, and would redound little to their fame, they always touch upon it unwillingly, and with a tender hand, feeming defirous that it should remain in darknefs, or be buried in oblivion. But as fo many perfons who, both at that time and ever after, poffeffed the queen's favour, fubfcribed this paper, the fufpicion becomes ftrong, that Bothwell's ambitious hopes were neither unknown to Mary nor difapproved by her<sup>t</sup>.

Thefe

<sup>8</sup> Keith, 382.

<sup>t</sup> Of all the different fystems with regard to this transaction, that of Camden feems to be the least accurate, and the worst founded. He supposes that Bothwell was hated by Murray, Morton, &c. who had been his affociates in the murder of the king, and that they now wanted to ruin him. He affirms, at the fame time, that the fubscriptions to this paper were obtained by them out of fear that Bothwell might

B. IV.

Thefe fufpicions are confirmed by the moft direct proof. Melvil at that time enjoyed a confiderable fhare in her favour. He, as well as his brother, kept a fecret correfpondence in England with thofe who favoured her pretensions to that crown. The rumour of her intended marriage with Bothwell having fpread early in that kingdom, excited universal indignation; and Melvil received a letter from thence, which reprefented, in the ftrongeft terms, what would be the fatal effects of fuch an imprudent ftep. He put this letter into the queen's hands, and enforced it fink in his hopes, and betray the whole bloody fecret, 404. But befides the abfurdity of fuppofing that any man's enemies would contribute towards raifing him to fuch high dignity, on the uncertain hopes of being able afterwards to deprive him of it; befides the impoffibility of accomplishing fuch a marriage, if it had been either unknown to the queen, or difagreeable to her; we may obferve that this fuppolition is deftroyed by the direct teftimony of the queen herfelf, who afcribes the confent of the nobles to Bothwell's artifices, who purchased it by giving them to understand that we were content therewith. Anderf. vol. i. 94. 99. It would have been no fmall advantage to Mary, if the could have reprefented the confent of the nobles to have been their own voluntary deed. It is still more furprifing to find Lesley afcribing this paper to Murray and his faction. Anderf. vol. i. 26. The bifhop himfelf was one of the perfons who fubscribed it. Keith, 383. The king's commiffioners, at the conference held at York 1568, pretended that none of the nobles, except the earl of Huntly, would fubscribe this paper till a warrant from the queen was produced, by which they were allowed to do fo: this warrant they had in their cuftody, and exhibited. Anderf. vol. iv. part 2. 5. This differs from Buchanan's account, who fuppofes that all the nobles prefent fubfcribed the paper on the 19th, and that next day they obtained the approbation of what they had done, by way of fecurity to themfelves, 355.

12

with

with the utmost warmth. She not only difregarded thefe remonstrances, but communicated the matter to Bothwell; and Melvil, in order to fave his life, was obliged to fly from court, whither he durst not return till the earl's rage began to abate<sup>u</sup>. At the fame time Elizabeth warned Mary of the danger and infamy to which she would expose herfelf by fuch an indecent choice: but an advice from her met with still lefs regard *.

Three days after the rifing of parliament Mary went from Edinburgh to Stirling, in order to vifit the prince her fon. Bothwell had now brought his fchemes to full maturity, and every precaution being taken which could render it fafe to enter on the last and decifive ftep, the u Melv. 156. According to Melvil, Lord Herries likewife remonstrated against the marriage, and conjured the queen, on his knees, to lay afide all thoughts of fuch a difhonourable alliance, 156. But it has been observed, that Herries is one of the nobles who fubfcribed the bond, April 19. Keith, 383. 2. That he is one of the witneffes to the marriage articles between the queen and Bothwell, May 14. Good. vol. ii. 61. 3. That he fat in council with Bothwell, May 17. Keith, 386. But this remonstrance of lord Herries against the marriage happened before those made hy Melvil himfelf, 157. Melvil's remonstrance must have happened fome time before the meeting of parliament; for after offend ing Bothwell, he retired from court; he allowed his rage time to fubfide, and had again joined the queen when the was feized, April 24. 158. The time which must have elapfed by this account of the matter, was perhaps sufficient to have gained Herries from being an opposer to become a promoter, of the marriage. Perhaps Melvil may have committed fome mistake with regard to this fact, fo far as relates to lord Herries. He could not well be miftaken with regard to what himfelf did.

x Anderf. vol. i. 106.

natural

B. IV.

Fublyhed Febr 1. 1798. by Cadell & Davies, Strand.

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

73

natural impetuofity of his fpirit did not fuffer him to deliberate any longer. Under pretence of an expedition against the freebooters on the borders, he affembled his followers; and marching out of Edinburgh with a thousand horse [April 24], turned fuddenly towards Linlithgow, met the queen on her return near that place, difperfed her flender train without refiftance, feized on her perfon, and conducted her, together with a few of her courtiers, as a prifoner to his caftle of Dunbar. She expressed neither furprize, nor terror, nor indignation, at fuch an outrage committed on her perfon, and fuch an infult offered to her authority, but feemed to yield without ftruggle or regret y. Melvil was at that time one of her attendants; and the officer by whom he was feized informed him, that nothing was done without the queen's own confent<sup>2</sup>. If we may rely on the letters published in Mary's name, the scheme had been communicated to her, and every flep towards it was taken with her participation and advice <sup>2</sup>.

Both the queen and Bothwell thought it of advantage to employ this appearance of violence. It afforded her a decent excufe for her conduct; and while fhe could plead that it was owing to force rather than choice, fhe hoped that her reputation, among foreigners at leaft, would efcape without cenfure, or be expofed to lefs reproach. Bothwell could not help diftrufting all the methods which had hitherto been ufed for vindicating him from any concern in the murder of the king. Something was ftill wanting for his fecurity, and for quieting his guilty fears. This was a pardon under the great feal. By the laws of Scotland the most heinous crime must be mentioned by name in a pardon, and then all leffer offences are deemed to be included under the general claufe, and all other crimes what foewer<sup>b</sup>. To feize the perfon of the prince is high treafon; and Bothwell hoped that a pardon obtained for this would extend to every thing of which he had been accufed<sup>c</sup>.

y Keith, 383.	z Mely. 158.	Good vol. ii. 37. his
VOL. II.	H	his

Bothwell having now got the queen's perfon into his hands, it would have been unbecoming either a politician or a man of gallantry to have delayed confummating his schemes. The first ftep towards this was to have his marriage with lady Jane Gordon, the earl of Huntly's fifter, diffolved. In order to accomplifh that, in a manner confiftent with the ideas of the queen on one hand, and with the fentiments of his countrymen on the other, two different proceffes became neceffary : one founded on the maxims of the canon law, the other accommodated to the tencts of the reformed church. Bothwell accordingly commenced a fuit, in his own name, in the fpiritual court of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, the jurifdiction of the archibility of St. An-drew's, the jurifdiction of which the queen had re-ftored [April 27], by a fpecial commission grant-ed for this purpofe, and pleaded, that lady Jane and himfelf, being coufins within the prohibited degrees, and having married without a papal dif-penfation, their union was null from the beginning d. At the fame time he prevailed with lady Tane

b Parl. 6 Jac. IV. c. 62. c Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 61. d In her own time, it was urged as an aggravation of the queen's guilt, that the gave her confent to marry the hufband of Jane to apply to the protestant court of commiffaries for a divorce, on account of his having been guilty of adultery. The influence of Bothwell was of equal weight in both courts. In the courfe of four days, with the fame indecent and fufpicious precipitancy, the one declared the marriage to be illegal and null, the other pronounced a fentence of divorce °.

While this infamous tranfaction was carrying on the queen refided at Dunbar; detained as a prifoner, but treated with the greateft refpect. Soon after Bothwell, with a numerous train of his dependants, conducted her to Edinburgh [May 3]; but, inftead of lodging her in the palace of Holyrood-houfe, he conveyed her to the caftle, of which he was governor. The difcontent of the nation rendered this precaution neceffary. In an houfe unfortified, and of eafy accefs, the of another woman; and the charge has been often repeated fince. But, according to Mary's own ideas, confonant to the principles of her religion, the marriage of Bothwell with lady Jane Gordon was unlawful and void, and the confidered them as living together not in the hallowed bonds of matrimony, but in a flate of criminal intercourfe. Bothwell's addreffes, which ftruck her protestant fubjects not only as indecent but flagitious, could not appear in the fame light to her; and this may be pleaded in extenuation of the crime imputed to her of having liftened to them. But it will not exempt her from the charge of great imprudence in this unfortunate step. Mary was well acquainted with the ideas of her fubjects, and knew what they would think of her giving ear for a moment to the coartship of a man lately married under her own eye, in the church of her palace. Appendix, No. XX. Every confideration should have restrained her from forming this union, which to her people must have appeared odious and shocking. Remarks on the Hiftory of Scotland, p. 199, &c.

C Anderf. i. 132. Append. No. XX.

queen

B. IV.

queen might have been refcued without difficulty out of his hands. In a place of ftrength fhe was fecured from all the attempts of his enemies. One fmall difficulty still remained to be fur-mounted. As the queen was kept in a fort of captivity by Bothwell, a marriage concluded in that condition might be imputed to force, and be held invalid. In order to obviate this, Mary appeared in the court of feffion, and, in prefence of the chancellor and other judges, and feveral of the nobility, declared that fhe was now at full liberty; and though Bothwell's violence in feizing her perfon had at first excited her indignation, yet his refpectful behaviour fince that time had not only appealed her refentment, but determined her to raife him to higher honours f.

What thefe were, foon became public. The title of duke of Orkney was conferred upon Bothwell; and on the fifteenth of May his marriage with the queen, which had fo long been the object of his wifhes, and the motive of his crimes, was folemnized. The ceremony was performed in public, according to the rites of the protestant church, by Adam Bothwell, bishop of Orkney, one of the few prelates who had embraced the reformation, and on the fame day was celebrated in private, according to the forms prefcribed by the popifh religion<sup>g</sup>. The bold-nefs with which Craig, the minifter who was commanded to publish the banns, testified against the defign; the fmall number of the nobles who were prefent at the marriage; and the fullen and difrespectful filence of the people

f And. i. 87. g Id. 136. ii. 276.

when

when the queen appeared in public; were manifeft fymptoms of the violent and general diffatiffaction of her own fubjects. The refufal of Du Croc, the French ambaffador, to be prefent at the nuptial ceremony or entertainment, diffeovers the fentiments of her allies with regard to this part of her couduct; and although every other action in Mary's life could be juftified by the rules of prudence, or reconciled to the principles of virtue, this fatal marriage would remain an inconteftable proof of her rafhnefs, if not of her guilt.

Mary's first care was to offer fome apology for her conduct, to the courts of France and England. The instructions to her ambassiadors still remain, and arc drawn by a masserly hand. But under all the artificial and false colouring the employs, it is easy to discover, not only that many of the steps she had taken were unjustifiable, but that she herfelf was confcious that they could not be justified b.

The title of king was the only thing which was not beflowed upon Bothwell. Notwithflanding her attachment to him, Mary remembered the inconveniencies which had arifen from the rafh advancement of her former hufband to that honour. She agreed, however, that he fhould fign, in token of confent, all the public writs iffued in her name<sup>1</sup>. But though the queen withheld from him the title of king, he poffeffed, neverthelefs, regal power in its full extent. The queen's perfon was in his hands; fhe was furrounded more clofely than ever by his creatures; none of her fubjects could obtain audience without his permiffion; and, unlefs in his own pre-h And. i. 89.

fence,

н 3

B. IV.

fence, none but his confidents were permitted to converfe with her <sup>k</sup>. The Scottifh monarchs were accuftomed to live among their fubjects as fathers or as equals, without diftruft, and with little ftate; armed guards ftanding at the doors of the royal apartment, difficulty of accefs, diftance and retirement, were things unknown and unpopular.

These precautions were necessary for securing to Bothwell the power which he had acquired. But, without being mafter of the perfon of the young prince, he effecemed all that he had gained to be precarious and uncertain. The queen had committed her fon to the care of the earl of Mar. The fidelity and loyalty of that nobleman were too well known to expect that he would be willing to put the prince into the hands of the man who was fo violently fufpected of having murdered his father. Bothwell, however, laboured to get the prince into his power, with an anxiety which gave rife to the blackeft fufpicions. All his addrefs, as well as authority, were employed to perfuade, or to force Mar into a compliance with his demands 1. And it is no flight proof, both of the firmnels and dexterity of that nobleman, that he preferved a life of fo much importance to the nation, from being in the power of a man, whom fear or ambition might have prompted to violent attempts against it.

The eyes of the neighbouring nations were fixed, at that time, upon the great events which had happend in Scotland during three months; a king murcered with the utmost cruelty, in the prime of his days, and in his capital city; the k And. i. 136.

<sup>1</sup> Melv. 160. Buch. 361. perfon

1567.]

perfon fuspected of that odious crime fuffered not only to appear publicly in every place, but admitted into the prefence of the queen, diftinguished by her favour, and intrulled with the chief direction of her affairs; subjected to a trial which was carried on with most shamelefs partiality, and acquitted by a fontence which ferved only to confirm the fulpicions of his guilt; divorced from his wife, on pretences frivolous or indecent; and after all this, inftead of meeting with the ignominy due to liis actions, or the punifhment merited by his crimes, permitted openly, and without opposition, to marry a queen, the wife of the prince whom he had affaffinated, and the guardian of those laws which he had been guilty of violating. Such a quick fucceffion of incidents fo fingular and fo deteftable, in the fpace of three months, is not to be found in any other history. They left, in the opinion of foreigners, a mark of infamy on the character of the nation. The Scots were held in abhorrence all over Europe; they durft hardly appear any where in public; and after fuffering fo many atrocious deeds to pass with impunity, they were univerfally reproached as men void of courage or of humanity, as equally regardless of the reputation of their queen and the honour of their country m.

Thefe reproaches roufed the nobles, who had been hitherto amufed by Bothwell's artifices, or intimidated by his power. The manner in which he exercifed the authority which he acquired, his repeated attempts to become mafter of the m Anderf. vol. i. 128. 134. Mely. 163. See Appendix, No. XXI.

prince's

prince's perfon, together with fome rash threatenings against him, which he let fall n, added to the violence and promptitude of their refolu-tions. A confiderable body of them affembled at Stirling, and entered into an affociation for the defence of the prince's perfon. Argyll, Athol, Mar, Morton, Glencairn, Home, Lind-fay, Boyd, Murray of Tullibardin, Kirkaldy of Grange, and Maitland the fecretary, were the heads of this confederacy °. Stewart earl of Athol was remarkable for an uniform and bigot-ted attachment to popery; but his indignation on account of the murder of the king, to whom he was nearly allied, and his zeal for the fafety, of the prince, overcame, on this occafion, all confiderations of religion, and united him with the most zealous protestants. Several of the other nobles acted, without queftion, from a laudable concern for the fafety of the prince and the honour of their country. But the spirit which fome of them difcovered during the fubfequent revolutions, leaves little room to doubt, that ambition or refentment were the real motives of their conduct; and that, on many occasions, while they were purfuing ends just and neceffary, they were actuated by principles and paffions altogether unjustifiable.

The first accounts of this league filled the queen and Bothwell with great confernation. They were no firangers to the fentiments of the nation with refpect to their conduct; and though their marriage had not met with public oppolition, they knew that it had not been carried on a Melv. 161.

· Keith, 394.

without

E. IV.

without the fecret difguft and murmurings of all ranks of men. They forefaw the violence with which this indignation would burft out, after having been fo long fuppreffed; and in order to prepare for the ftorm, Mary iffued a proclamation [May 28], requiring her fubjects to take arms, and to attend her hufband by a day appointed. At the fame time, fhe publifhed a fort of manifefto, in which fhe laboured to vindicate her government from those imputations which it had been loaded with, and employed the ftrongeft terms to express her concern for the fafety and welfare of the prince her fon. Neither of these produced any confiderable effect. Her proclamation was ill obeyed, and her manifefto met with little credit P.

The confederate lords carried on their preparations with no lefs activity, and with much more fuccefs. Among a warlike people, men of fo much power and popularity found it an eafy matter to raife an army. They were ready to march before the queen and Bothwell were in a condition to refift them. The caftle of Edinburgh was the place whither the queen ought naturally . to have retired, and there her perfon might have been perfectly fafe. But the confederates had fallen on means to shake or corrupt the fidelity of Sir James Balfour, the deputy governor, and Bothwell durft not commit to him fuch an important truft. He conducted the queen to the caffle of Borthwick [June 6], and on the appearance of lord Home, with a body of his followers, before that place, he fled with precipitation to Dunbar, and was followed by the queen difguifed in men's clothes. The confederates advanced towards Edinburgh, where Huntly endeavoured, in vain, to animate the inhabitants to defend the town against them. They entered without opposition, and were inftantly joined by many of the citizens, whofe zeal became the firmest fupport of their caufe 9.

P Keith, 387. 395, 396.

In order to fet their own conduct in the most favourable light, and to roufe the public indignation against Bothwell, the nobles pub-listed a declaration of the motives which had induced them to take arms. All Bothwell's paft crimes were enumerated, all his wicked intentions difplayed and aggravated, and every true Scotchman was called upon to join them in avenging the one and in preventing the other .

Meanwhile Bothwell affembled his forces at Dunbar; and as he had many dependents, in that corner, he foon gathered fuch ftrength that he ventured to advance towards the confederates. Their troops were not numerous; the fuddennefs and fecrecy of their enterprife gave their friends at a distance no time to join them; and as it does not appear that they were fupported either with money or fed with hopes by the queen of England, they could not have kept long in a body. But on the other hand, Bothwell durft not rifk a delay s. His army followed him with reluctance in this quarrel, and ferved him with no cordial affection; fo that his only hope of fuccefs was in furprifing the enemy, or in ftriking the blow before his own troops had leifure to recollect themfelves, or to imbibe the fame unfavourable opinion of his actions, which had fpread over the reft of the nation. Thefe motives determined the queen to march forward, with an inconfiderate and fatal fpeed.

9 Keith, 398,

Anderf. vol. i. 128. SKeith, 401. leifure

B. 17.

On the first intelligence of her approach, the confederates advanced to meet her [July 15]. They found her forces drawn up almost on the fame ground which the English had occupied before the battle of Pinkie. The numbers on both fides were nearly equal; but there was no equality in point of difcipline. The queen's army confisted chiefly of a multitude, hastily affembled, without courage or experience in war. The troops of the confederates were composed of gentlemen of rank and reputation, followed by their most trufty dependents, who were no lefs brave than zealous<sup>1</sup>.

Le Croc the French ambaffador, who was in the field, laboured, by negociating both with the queen and the nobles, to put an end to the quarrel without the effufion of blood. He reprefented to the confederates the queen's inclinations towards peace, and her willingnefs to pardon the offences which they had committed. Morton replied with warmth, that they had taken arms not againft the queen, but againft the murderer of her hufband; and if he were given up to juffice, or banifhed from her prefence, the thould find them ready to yield the obedience which is due from fubjects to their fovereign. Glencairn added, that they did not come to afk pardon for any offence, but to put Cald, vol. ii. 43, 49.

nifh

B. IV.

nish those who had offended. Such haughty anfwers convinced the ambaffador, that his mediation would be ineffectual, and that their paffions were too high to allow them to liften to any pacific propositions, or to think of retreating after having proceeded fo far ".

The queen's army was posted to advantage, on a rifing ground. The confederates advanced to the attack refolutely, but flowly, and with the caution which was natural on that unhappy field. Her troops were alarmed at their approach, and difcovered no inclination to fight. Mary endeavoured to animate them; fhe wept, fhe threatened, fhe reproached them with cowardice, but all in vain. A few of Bothwell's immediate attendants were eager for the encounter; the reft flood wavering and irrefolute, and fome began to fleal out of the field. Bothwell attempted to infpirit them, by offering to decide the quarrel, and to vindicate his own innocence, in fingle combat with any of his adverfaries. Kirkaldy of Grange, Murray of Tullibardin, and lord Lindfay, contended for the honour of entering the lifts against him. But this challenge proved to be a mere bravade. Either the confcioufness of guilt deprived Bothwell of his wonted courage, or the queen, by her authority, forbad the combat x.

After the fymptoms of fear difcovered by her followers, Mary would have been inexcufable had she hazarded a battle. To have retreated in the face of an enemy who had already furrounded the hill on which the flood, with part " Keith, 401. X Cald. vol. ii. 50.

T.Stethard R.A. del

Stewe seule

Published Felt 1:38 by cadell & Davies, Strand .

of their cavalry, was utterly impracticable. In this fituation, fhe was under the cruel neceffity of putting herfelf into the hands of those subjects who had taken arms against her. She demanded an interview with Kirkaldy, a brave and generous man, who commanded an advanced body of the enemy. He, with the confent and in the name of the leaders of the party, promised that, on condition she would difinis Bothwell from her prefence, and govern the kingdom by the advice of her nobles, they would honour and obey her as their fovereign 7.

During this parley, Bothwell took his laft farewell of the queen, and rode off the field with a few followers. This difmal reverfe happened exactly one month after that marriage which had coft him fo many crimes to accomplifh, and which leaves fo foul a ftain on Mary's memory.

As foon as Bothwell retired, Mary furrendered to Kirkaldy, who conducted her toward the confederate army, the leaders of which received her with much refpect; and Morton, in their name, made ample profeflions of their future loyalty and obedience<sup>2</sup>. But fhe was treated by the common foldiers with the utmost infolence and indignity. As fhe marched along, they poured upon her all the opprobrious names which are beftowed only on the lowest and most infamous criminals. Wherever fhe turned her eyes, they held up before hera itandard, on which was painted the dead body of the late king, firetched on the ground, and the young prince kneeling before it, and uttering thefe words, "Judge and revenge

y Good. vol. ii. 164. Melv. 165; 2 Good. vol. ii. 165. VOL. 11. Ry

my caufe, O Lord !" Mary turned with horror from fuch a fhocking fight. She began already to feel the wretched condition to which a captive prince is reduced. She uttered the most bitter complaints, fhe melted into tears, and could hardly be kept from finking to the ground. The con-federates conducted her towards Edinburgh; and in fpite of many delays, and after looking, with the fondnefs and credulity natural to the unfortunate, for fome extraordinary relief, she arrived there. The ftreets were covered with multitudes, whom zeal or curiofity had drawn together, to behold fuch an unufual fcene. The queen, worn out with fatigue, covered with duft, and bedewed with tears, was exposed as a spec-tacle to her own subjects, and led to the provost's house. Notwithstanding all her arguments and intreaties, the fame flandard was carried before her, and the fame infults and reproaches repeated <sup>z</sup>. A woman, young, beautiful, and in diftrefs, is naturally the object of compaffion. The comparison of their present misery with their former splendour, usually softens us in favour of illustrious fufferers. But the people beheld the deplorable fituation of their fovereign with infenfibility; and fo ftrong was their perfuafion of her guilt, and fo fitting was then pertuation of dignation, that the fufferings of their queen did not, in any degree, mitigate their refertment, or procure her that fympathy which is feldom denied to unfortunate princes.

z Melv. 166. Buch. 364.

BOOK V.

THE confederate lords had proceeded to fuch extremities against their fovereign, that it now became almost impossible for them either to stop short, or to purfue a course less violent. Many of the nobles had refused to concur with them in their enterpisse; others openly condemned it. A small circumstance might abate that indignation with which the multitude were at prefent animated against the queen, and deprive them of that popular applause which was the chief foundation of their power. These confiderations inclined fome of them to treat the queen with great lenity.

But, on the other hand, Mary's affection for Bothwell continued as violent as ever; she obflinately refused to hearken to any proposal for diffolving their marriage, and determined not to abandon a man, for whole love fhe had already facrificed fo much<sup>2</sup>. If they should allow her to recover the fupreme power, the first exertion of it would be to recall Bothwell; and they had reafon, both from his refentment, from her conduct, and from their own, to expect the fevereft effects of her vengeance. These confiderations furmounted every other motive; and reckoning themfelves abfolved, by Mary's incurable attachment to Bothwell, from the engagements which they had come under when the yielded ' herfelf a prifoner, they, without regarding the duty which they owed her as their queen, and without .

<sup>a</sup> Keith, 419. 446. 449. Melv. 167. See Append. No. XX11.

B. V.

An

without confulting the reft of the nobles, carried her next evening, under a ftrong guard, to the caftle of Lochlevin, and figned a warrant to William Douglas, the owner of it, to detain her as a prifoner. This caftle is fituated in a fmall ifland, in the middle of a lake. Douglas, to whom it belonged, was a near relation of Morton's, and had married the earl of Murray's mother. In this place, under ftrict cuftody, with a few attendants, and fubjected to the infults of a haughty woman, who boafted daily of being the lawful wife of James V. Mary fuffered all the rigour and miferies of captivity <sup>b</sup>.

Immediately after the queen's imprifonment, the confederates were at the utmost pains to ftrengthen their party; they entered into new bonds of affociation; they affumed the title of lords of the fecret council, and without any other right, arrogated to themfelves the whole regal authority. One of their first acts of power was, to fearch the city of Edinburgh for fuch as had been concerned in the murder of the king. This fhow of zeal gained reputation to themfelves, and threw an oblique reflection on the queen for her remiffnefs. Several fufpected perfons were feized. Captain Blackadder and three others were condemned and executed. But no difcovery of importance was made. If we believe fome historians, they were convicted by fufficient evidence. If we give credit to others, their fenfence was unjust, and they denied, with their last breath, any knowledge of the crime for which they fuffered c.

> <sup>b</sup> Keith, 403. Note (b). <sup>c</sup> Cald. vol. ii. 53. Crawf. Mem. 35.

An unexpected accident, however, put into the hands of Mary's enemies what they deemed the fulleft evidence of her guilt. Bothwell having left in the caftle of Edinburgh a cafkct containing feveral fonnets and letters written with the queen's own hand; he now fent one of his confidents to bring to him this precious deposite. But as his meffenger returned, he was intercepted, and the cafket feized by Morton <sup>d</sup>. The contents of it were always produced by the party as the moft ample juftification of their own conduct; and to thefc they continually appealed as the moft unanfwerable proof of their not having loaded their fovereign with the imputation of imaginary crimes <sup>e</sup>.

But the confederates, notwithstanding their extraordinary fuccefs, were ftill far from being perfectly at eafe. That fo fmall a part of the nobles should pretend to dispose of the perfon of their fovereign, or to assume the authority which belonged to her, without the concurrence of the reft, was deemed by many of that body to be unprecedented and prefumptuous. Several of thefe were now assembled at Hamilton, in order to deliberate what courfe they should hold in this difficult conjuncture. The confederates made fome attempt towards a coalition with them, but without effect. They employed the mediation of the assembly of the church, to draw them to a perfonal interview at Edinburgh, but with no better fuccefs. That party, however, though its numbers were formidable, and the power of its leaders

d Anders. vol. ii. 92. Good. vol. ii. 90.

· See Differtation at the end of the Hiftory.

leaders great, foon loft reputation by the want of unanimity and vigour; all its confultations evaporated in murmurs and complaints, and no fcheme was concerted for obstructing the progress of the confederates <sup>f</sup>.

There appeared fome profpect of danger from another quarter. This great revolution in Scotland had been carried on without any aid from Elizabeth, and even without her knowledgeg. Though the was far from being displeased at seeing the affairs of that kingdom embroiled, or a rival, whom she hatcd, reduced to distrefs; she neither wished that it should be in the power of the one faction entirely to suppress the other, nor could fhe view the fleps taken by the confederates without great offence. Notwithstanding the popular maxims by which the governed her own fubjects, her notions of royal prerogative were very exalted. The confederates had, in her opinion, encroached on the authority of their fovereign, which they had no right to control, and had offered violence to her perfon, which it was their duty to efteem They had fet a dangerous example to facred. other fubjects, and Mary's caufe became the common caufe of princes h. If ever Elizabeth was influenced with regard to the affairs of Scotland by the feelings of her heart, rather than by confiderations of interest, it was on this occasion. Mary, in her prefent condition, degraded from her throne, and covered with the infamy attending an accufation of fuch atrocious crimes, could be no longer the object of Elizabeth's jealoufy, either as a woman or as a queen. Sympathy with 8 Id. 415.

f Keith, 407.

90

h Id. 412. 415. a fo-

B. V.

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

a fovereign in diftrefs feems, for a moment, to have touched a heart not very fusceptible of tender fentiments; and, while thefe were yet warm, she difpatched Throkmorton into Scotland [June 30], with power to negotiate both with the queen and with the confederates. In his inftructions there appears a remarkable folicitude for Mary's liberty, and even for her reputation; and the terms upon which fhe proposed to re-establish concord between the queen and her fubjects, appear to be fo reafonable and well digested, as might have ensured the fafety and happinels of both. Zealous as Throkmorton was to accomplish this, all his endeavours and address proved ineffectual. He found not only the confederate nobles, but the nation in general, fo far alienated from the queen, and fo much offended with the indecent precipitancy of her marriage with the reputed murderer of her former hufband, as to be incapable of liftening to any proposition in her favour.

During the flate of anarchy occafioned by the imprifonment of the queen, and the diffolution of the eftablished government, which afforded such ample fcope for political speculation, four different fchemes had been proposed for the fettlement of the nation. One, that Mary should be replaced upon the throne, but under various and strict limitations. The fecond, that the should refign the crown to her fon, and retiring out of the kingdom, should refide, during the remainder of her days, either in England or in France. The third, that Mary should be brought to public trial for her crimes, and after conviction, of which no doubt was entertained, should be kept in perpetual petual imprisonment. The fourth, that after trial and condemnation, capital punishment should be inflicted upon her. Throkmorton, though disposed, as well by his own inclination as in conformity to the spirit of his instructions, to view matters in the light most favourable to Mary, informed his court, that the milder schemes, recommended by Maitland alone, would undoubtedly be reprobated, and one of the more rigorous carried into execution.

In justification of this rigour, the confederates maintained that Mary's affection for Bothwell . was still unabated, and openly avowed by her; that fhe rejected with difdain every propofal for diffolving their marriage; and declared, that fhe would forego every comfort, and endure any extremity, rather than give her confent to that measure. While thefe were her sentiments, they contended, that concern for the public welfare, as well as attention to their own fafety, rendered it neceffary to put it out of the queen's power to reftore a daring man, exafperated by recent injuries, to his former station, which must needs prove fatal to both. Notwithstanding their folicitude to conciliate the good-will of Elizabeth, they forefaw clearly what would be the effect, at this juncture, of Throkmorton's interposition in behalf of the queen, and that fhe, elated with the profpect of protection, would refuse to liften to the overtures which they were about to make to her. For this reafon they peremptorily denied Throkmorton accefs to their prifoner; and what propositions he made to them in her behalf they either refused or eluded i.

I Keith, 417. 427.

Meanwhile

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Meanwhile they deliberated with the utmost anxiety concerning the fettlement of the nation, and the future disposal of the queen's person. Elizabeth, observing that Throkmorton made no progrefs in his negotiations with them, and that they would liften to none of his demands in Mary's favour, turned towards that party of the nobles who were affembled at Hamilton, incited them to take arms in order to reftore their queen to liberty, and promifed to affift them in fuch an attempt to the utmost of her powerk. But they discovered no greater union and vigour than formerly, and, behaving like men who had given up all concern either for their queen or their country, tamely allowed an inconfiderable part of their body, whether we confider it with refpect to numbers or to power, to fettle the government of the kingdom, and to difpole of the queen's perfon at pleafure. ' Many confultations were held, and various opinions arofe with regard to each of these. Some seemed defirous of adhering to the plan on which the confederacy was at first formed; and after punishing the murderers of the king, and diffolving the marriage with Bothwell ; after providing for the fafety of the young prince, and the fecurity of the protestant religion ; they proposed to re-establish the queen in the poffestion of her legal authority. The fuccefs with which their arms had been accompanied, infpired others with bolder and more desperate thoughts, and nothing less would fatisfy them than the trial, the condemnation, and punishment of the queen herfelf, as the principal k See Append. No. XXIII.

confpirator

confpirator against the life of her husband and the fafety of her fon<sup>1</sup>: the former was Maitland's fystem, and breathed too much of a pacific and moderate spirit, to be agreeable to the temper or wishes of the party. The latter was recommended by the clergy, and warmly adopted by many laics; but the nobles durft not or would not venture on such an unprecedented and audacious deed<sup>m</sup>.

Both parties agreed at laft upon a fcheme, neither fo moderate as the one, nor fo daring as the other. Mary was to be perfuaded or forced to refign the crown; the young prince was to be proclaimed king, and the earl of Murray was to be appointed to govern the kingdom, during his minority, with the name and authority of regent. With regard to the queen's own perfon, nothing was determined. It feems to have been the intention of the confederates to keep her in perpetual imprifonment; but in order to intimidate herfelf, and to overawe her partifans, they ftill referved to themfelves the power of proceeding to more violent extremes.

It was obvious to forefee difficulties in the execution of this plan. Mary was young, ambitious, high-fpirited, and accuftomed to command. To induce her to acknowledge her own incapacity for governing, to renounce the dignity and power which the was born to enjoy, t m The intention of putting the queen to death feems to have been carried on by fome of her fubjects: at this time we often find Elizabeth boaffing that Mary owed her life to her interpofition Digges's Compl. Amb. 14, &c. See Append. No. XVIII.

1 Keith, 420, 421, 422. 582.

94

become

become dependant on her own subjects, to confent to her own bondage, and to invest those perfons whom the confidered as the authors of all her calamities with that honour and authority of which the herfelf was ftripped, were points hard to be gained. These, however, the con-federates attempted, and they did not want means to infure fuccels. Mary had endured, for feveral weeks, all the hardfhips and terror of a prifon; no profpect of liberty appeared; none of her subjects had either taken arms, or so much as folicited her relief n; no perfon, in whom the could confide, was admitted into her prefence ; even the ambaffadors of the French king, and queen of England, were refused access to her. In this folitary state, without a counfellor or a friend, under the preffure of diftrefs and the apprehension of danger, it was natural for a woman to hearken almost to any overtures. The confederates took advantage of her condition and of her fears. They employed lord Lindfay, the fiercest zealot in the party, to communicate their fcheme to the queen, and to obtain her fubfcription to those papers which were necessary for rendering it effectual. He executed his commiffion with harshness and brutality. Certain death was before Mary's eyes if the refuted to comply with his demands. At the fame time fhe was informed by Sir Robert Melvil, in the name of Athol, Maitland, and Kirkaldy, the perfons among the confederates who were most attentive to her interest, that a refignation extorted by fear, and granted during her imprisonment, was void

n Keith, 425.

in

96

in law, and might be revoked as foon as fhe recovered liberty. Throkmorton, by a note which he found means of conveying to her, fuggested the fame thing °. Deference to their opinion, as well as concern for her own fafety, obliged her, to yield to every thing which was required, and to fign all the papers which Lindfay prefented to her. By one of thefe, she refigned the crown, renounced all thare in the government of the kingdom, and confented to the coronation of the young king. By another, the appointed the earl of Murray regent, and conferred upon him all the powers and privileges of that high office [July 24]. By a third, the fubflituted fome other noblemen in Murray's place, if he should refufe the honour which was defigned for him Mary, when she fubfcribed thefe deeds, was bathed in tears ; and while fhe gave away, as it were with her own hands, the feeptre which fhe had fwayed fo long, she felt a pang of grief and indignation, one of the fevereft, perhaps, which can touch the human heart P.

The confederates endeavoured to give this refignation all the weight and validity in their power, by proceeding without delay to crown the young prince. The ceremony was performed at Stirling, on the twenty-ninth of July, with much folemnity, in prefence of all the nobles of the party, a confiderable number of leffer barons, and great affembly of the people. From that time, all public writs were iffued, and the government carried on in the name of James VI. 9

o Keith, 425. Note (b). Melv. 169. 9 Keith, 437. No p Keith, 430. Crawf. Mem. 38.

No revolution fo great was ever effected with more eafe, or by means fo unequal to the end. In a warlike age, and in lefs time than two months, a part of the nobles, who neither poffeffed the chief power, nor the greateft wealth in the nation, and who never brought three thoufand men into the field, feized, imprifoned, and dethroned their queen, and without fhedding a fingle drop of blood, fet her fon, an infant of a year old, on the throne.

During this rapid progrefs of the confederates, the eyes of all the nation were turned on them with aftonifhment; and various and contradictory opinions were formed concerning the extraordinary fteps which they had taken.

Even under the ariftocratical form of government which prevails in Scotland, faid the favourers of the queen, and notwithstanding the exorbitant privileges of the nobles, the prince poffeffes confiderable power, and his perfon is treated with great veneration. No encroachments should be made on the former, and no injury offered to the latter, but in cafes where the liberty and, happinels of the nation cannot be fecured by any other means. Such cafes feldom exist, and it belongs not to any part, but to the whole, or at least to a majority of the fociety, to judge of their exiftence. By what action could it be pretended that Mary had invaded the rights or property of her fubjects, or what fcheme had fhe formed against the liberty and constitution of the kingdom? Were fears, and fufpicions, and furmifes, enough to justify the imprifoning and the deposing a queen, to whom the crown de-fcended from io long a race of monarchs? The VOL. II. principal K principal author of whatever was reckoned culpable in her conduct, was now driven from her prefence. The murderers of the king might have been brought to condign punifhment, the fafety of the prince have been fecured, and the proteftant religion have been eftablifhed, without wrefting the fceptre out of her hands, or condemning her to perpetual imprifonment. Whatever right a free parliament might have had to proceed to fuch a rigorous conclution, or whatever name its determinations might have merited, a fentence of this nature, paffed by a fmall part of the nobility, without acknowledging or confulting the reft of the nation, muft be deemed a rebellion againft the government, and a confpiracy againft the perfon of their fovereign.

The partifans of the confederates reafoned very differently. It is evident, faid they, that Mary either previoufly gave confent to the king's murder, or did afterwards approve of that horrid action. Her attachment to Bothwell, the power and honours which fhe has conferred upon him, the manner in which she fuffered his trial to be carried on, and the indecent fpeed with which fhe married a man stained with fo many crimes, raife ftrong fuspicions of the former, and put the. latter beyond all doubt. To have fuffered the fupreme power to continue in the hands of an ambitious man, capable of the most atrocious and desperate actions, would have been difgraceful to the nation, difhonourable to the queen, and dangerous to the prince. Recourse was therefore had to arms. The queen had been compelled to abandon a hufband fo unworthy of herfelf. But her affection toward him still continuing tinuing unabated; her indignation againft the authors of this feparation being vifible, and often expressed in the strongest terms; they, by restoring her to her ancient authority, would have armed her with power to destroy themselves, have enabled her to recal Bothwell, and have afforded her an opportunity of pursuing schemes fatal to the nation with greater eagerness, and with more fuccess. Nothing therefore remained, but by one bold action to deliver themselves and their country from all stuture fears. The expedient they had chosen was no less respectful to the royal blood, than necessary for the public fastery. While one prince was fet asside as incapable of governing, the crown was placed on his head who was the undoubted representative of their ancient kings.

1567.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

99

Whatever opinion pofterity may form on comparing the arguments of the two contending parties, whatever fentiments we may entertain concerning the justice or neceffity of that courfe which the confederates held, it cannot be denied that their conduct, fo far as regarded themfelves, was extremely prudent. Other expedients, lefs rigorous towards Mary, might have been found for fettling the nation; but, after the injuries which they had already offered the queen, there was none fo effectual for fecuring their own fafety, or perpetuating their own power,

To a great part of the nation, the conduct of the confederates appeared not only wife, but just. The king's acceffion to the throne was every where proclaimed, and his authority fubmitted to without opposition. Though feveral of the nobles were still affembled at Hamilton, and feemed to be entering into fome combination against his government, an affociation for fupporting it was formed, and figned by fo many perfons of power and influence throughout the nation, as entirely difcouraged the attempt <sup>r</sup>.

The return of the earl of Murray, about this time, added ftrength to the party, and gave it a regular and finished form. Soon after the murder of the king, this nobleman had retired into France, upon what pretence historians do not mention. During his refidence there, he had held a close correspondence with the chiefs of the confederacy, and, at their defire, he now returned. He feemed, at first, unwilling to accept the office of regent. This hefitation cannot be afcribed to the scruples either of diffidence or of duty. Murray wanted neither the abilities nor the ambition which might incite him to afpire to this high dignity. He had received the first accounts of his promotion with the utmost fatisfaction; but by appearing to continue for fome days in fuspense, he gained time to view with attention the ground on which he was to act; to balance the ftrength and refources of the two contending factions, and to examine whether the foundation on which his future fame and fuccefs must reft, were found and firm.

Before he declared his final refolution, he waited on Mary at Lochlevin. This vifit, to a fifter, and a queen, in a prifon, from which he had neither any intention to relieve her, nor to mitigate the rigour of her confinement, may be mentioned among the circumftances which dif-

r Anders. vol. ii. 231.

cover

cover the great want of delicacy and refinement in that age. Murray, who was naturally rough and uncourtly in his manner<sup>5</sup>, expoftulated fo warmly with the queen concerning her paft conduct, and charged her faults fo home upon her, that Mary, who had flattered herfelf with more gentle and brotherly treatment from him, melted into tears, and abandoned herfelf entirely to defpair<sup>c</sup>. This interview, from which Murray could reap no political advantage, and wherein he difcovered a fpirit fo fevere and unrelenting, may be reckoned among the moft bitter circumflances in Mary's life, and is certainly one of the moft unjuftifiable fteps in his conduct.

Soon after his return from Lochlevin [Aug. 22], Murray accepted the office of regent, and began to act in that character without opposition.

Amidit fo many great and unexpected events, the fate of Bothwell, the chief caule of them all, hath been almost forgotten. After his flight from the confederates, he lurked for fome time among his vaffals in the neighbourhood of Dunbar. But finding it impoffible for him to make head, in that country, against his enemies, or even to secure himself from their pursuit, he fled for shelter to his kinsman the bishop of Murray; and when he, overawed by the confederates, was obliged to abandon him, he retired to the Orkney Isles. Hunted from place to place, deferted by his friends, and accompanied by a few retainers, as desperate as himself, he suffered at once the mileries of infamy and of want. His indigence forced him upon a courfe which added

K 3

5 Keith, 96.

* Ibid. 445, 446.

to

to his infamy. He armed a few fmall fhips, which had accompanied him from Dunbar, and attacking every veffel which fell in his way, endeavoured to procure fublifience for himfelf and his followers by piracy. Kirkaldy and Murray of Tullibardin were fent out againft him by the confederates; and furprifing him while he rode at anchor, fcattered his finall fleet, took a part of it, and obliged him to fly with a fingle ship towards Norway. On that coaft, he fell in with a veffel richly laden, and immediately attacked it ; the Norwegians failed with armed boats to its affistance, and after a desperate fight, Bothwell and all his crew were taken prifoners. His name and quality were both unknown, and he was treated at first with all the indignity and rigour which the odious crime of piracy merited. His real character was foon difcovered, and though it fayed him from the infamous death to which his affociates were condemned, it could neither procure him liberty, nor mitigate the hardfhips of his imprifonment. He languished ten years in this unhappy condition; melancholy and defpair deprived him of reafon, and at last he ended his days, unpitied by his countrymen, and un-affifted by ftrangers". Few men ever accomplished their ambitious projects by worfe means, or reaped from them lefs fatisfaction. The early part of his life was reftlefs and enterprifing, full of danger and vicifitudes. His enjoyment of the grandeur, to which he attained by fo many crimes, was extremely fhort ; embittered by much anxiety, and difquicted by many fears. In his u Mely. 168.

latter

B. V.

latter years, he fuffered the most intolerable calamities to which the wretched arc fubject, and from which perfons who have moved in fo high a fphere are commonly exempted.

The good effects of Murray's acceffion to the regency were quickly felt. The party forming for the queen was weak, irrefolutc, and difunited; and no fooner was the government of the king-dom in the hands of a man fo remarkable both for his abilities and popularity, than the nobles, of whom it was compoled, loft all hopes of gaining ground, and began to treat feparately with the regent. So many of them were brought to acknowledge the king's authority, that fcarce any appearance of opposition to the effablished government was left in the kingdom. Had they adhered to the queen with any firmnefs, it is probable, from Elizabeth's difposition at that time, that fhe would have afforded them fuch affiftance as might have enabled them to face their cncmies in the field. But there appeared fo little vigour or harmony in their councils, that fhe was difcouraged from cfpoufing their caufe; and the regent, taking advantage of their fituation, obligcd them to fubmit to his government, without granting any terms, either to themfelves or to the queen x.

The regent was no lefs fuccefsful in his attempt to get into his hands the places of firength in the kingdom. Balfour, the deputy governor, furrendered the caftle of Edinburgh; and as the reward of his treachery, in deferting Bothwell his patron, obtained terms of great advantage to himfelf,

× Keith, 447. 450. 463.

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

104

himfelf. The governor of Dunbar, who difcovered greater fidelity, was foon forced to capitulate : fome other fmall forts furrendered without refiftance.

This face of tranquillity in the nation encouraged the regent to call a meeting of parliament [Dec. 15]. Nothing was wanting to confirm the king's authority, and the proceedings of the confederates, except the approbation of this fupreme court ; and after the fuccefs which had attended all their measures, there could be little doubt of obtaining it. The numbers that reforted to an affembly which was called to deliberate on matters of fo much importance, were great. The meeting was opened with the utmost folemnity, and all its acts passed with much unanimity. Many, however, of the lords who had difcovered the warmest attachment to the queen, were prefent. But they had made their peace with the regent. Argyll, Huntly, and Herries, acknowledged, openly in parliament, that their behaviour towards the king had been undutiful and criminal y. Their compliance, in this manner, with the measures of the regent's party, was either the condition on which they were admitted into favour, or intended as a proof of the fincerity of their reconcilement.

The parliament granted every thing the confederates could demand, either for the fafety of their own perfons, or the fecurity of that form of government which they had established in the kingdom. Mary's refignation of the crown was accepted, and declared to be valid. The king's

y Anderf. vol. iv. 153. See Appendix, No. XXIV. authority, authority, and Murray's election, were recognifed and confirmed. The imprifoning the queen, and all the other proceedings of the confederates, were pronounced lawful. The letters which Mary had written to Bothwell were produced, and the was declared to be acceffory to the murder of the king z. At the fame time, all the acts of parliament of the year one thoufand five hundred and fixty, in favour of the proteftant religion, were publicly ratified; new ftatutes to the fame purpofe were enacted; and nothing that could contribute to root out the remains of popery, or to encourage the growth of the reformation, was neglected.

B. V.

It is obfervable, however, that the fame parfimonious fpirit prevailed in this parliament, as in that of the year one thoufand five hundred and fixty. The proteftant elergy, notwithftanding many difcouragements, and their extreme poverty, had, for feven years, performed all religious offices in the kingdom. The expedients fallen upon for their fubfiftence had hitherto proved ineffectual, or were intended to be fo. But notwithftanding their known indigence, and the warm remonifrances of the affembly of the church, which met this year, the parliament did nothing more for their relief, than prefcribe fome new regulations concerning the payment of the thirds of benefices, which did not produce any confiderable change in the fituation of the elergy.

1568.] A few days after the diffolution of parliament [Jan. 3], four of Bothwell's depend-z Good. vol. ii. 66. Anderf. vol. ii. 206.

ents

106

ents were convicted of being guilty of the king's murder, and fuffered death as traitors. Their confeffions brought to light many circumftances relative to the manner of committing that barbarous crime; but they were perfons of low rank, and feem not to have been admitted into the fecrets of the confpiracy<sup>2</sup>.

Notwithstanding the universal submission to the regent's authority, there still abounded in the kingdom many fecret murmurs and cabals. The partifans of the house of Hamilton reckoned Murray's promotion an injury to the duke of Chatelherault, who, as first prince of the blood, had, in their opinion, an undoubted right to be regent. The length and rigour of Mary's fuf-ferings began to move many to commiferate her cafe. All who leaned to the ancient opinions in religion dreaded the effects of Murray's zeal. And he, though his abilities were great, did not poffefs the talents requifite for foothing the rage or removing the jealoufies of the different factions. By infinuation, or addrefs, he might have gained or foftened many who had oppofed him; but he was a ftranger to these gentle arts. His virtues were severe; and his deportment towards his equals, especially after his elevation to the regency, diltant and haughty. This behaviour offended fome of the nobles, and alarmed others. The queen's faction which had been fo eafily difperfed, began again to gather and to unite, and was fecretly favoured by fome who had hitherto zealoufly concurred with the confederates b.

2 Anders. vol. ii. 165.

b Melv. 179.

Such

Such was the favourable difpolition of the nation towards the qucen, when the recovered her liberty, in a manner no lefs furprifing to her friends, than unexpected by her cnemies. Several attempts had been made to procure her an opportunity of elcaping, which fome unforefeen accident, or the vigilance of her keepers, had hitherto difappointed. At laft, Mary employed all her art to gain George Douglas her keeper's brother, a youth of eighteen. As her manners were naturally affable and infinuating, fhe treated him with the most flattering diffinction ; fhe even allowed him to entertain the moft ambitious hopes, by letting fall fome expreffions, as if the would choofe him for her hufband &. At his age, and in fuch circumstances, it was impoffible to refift fuch a temptation. He yielded, and drew others into the plot. On Sunday the fecond of May, while his brother fat at fupper, and the reft of the family were retired to their devotions, one of his accomplices found means to fteal the keys out of his brother's chamber, and opening the gates to the queen and one of her maids, locked them behind her, and then threw the keys into the lake. Mary ran with precipitation to the boat which was prepared for her, and on reaching the fhore, was received with the utmost joy, by Douglas, lord Seaton, and fir James Hamilton, who, with a few attendants, waited for her. She inftantly mounted on horfeback, and rode full fpeed towards Niddrie, lord Seaton's feat in West-Lothian. She arrived there that night, without being purfued or interrupted.

c Keith, 469. 481. Note.

After

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

108

After halting three hours, fhe fet out for Hamilton; and travelling at the fame pace, fhe reached it next morning.

On the first news of Mary's escape, her friends, whom, in their prefent disposition, a much smaller accident would have roufed, ran to arms. In a few days, her court was filled with a great and fplendid train of nobles, accompanied by fuch numbers of followers, as formed an army above fix thousand ftrong. In their prefence she declared that the refignation of the crown, and the other deeds which fhe had figned during her imprifonment, wcre extorted from her by fear. Sir Robert Melvil confirmed her declaration; and on that, as well as on other accounts, a council of the nobles and, chief mcn of her party pronounced all thefe tranfactions void and illegal. [May 8]. At the fame time, an affociation was formed for the defence of her perfon and authority, and fubscribed by nine earls, nine bishops, eighteen lords, and many gentlemen of diffinetion d. Among them we find feveral who had been prefent in the laft parliament, and who had figned the counter-affociation in defence of the king's government; but fuch fudden changes were then fo common, as to be no matter of reproach.

At the time when the queen made her escape, the regent was at Glasgow, holding a court of juffice. An event so contrary to their expectations, and so fatal to their schemes, gave a great shock to his adherents. Many of them appeared wavering and irrefolute; others began to carry

d Keith, 475.

3

on

B. V.

on private negotiations with the queen; and fome openly revolted to her fide. In fo difficult a juncture, where his own fame, and the being of the party depended on his choice, the regent's most faithful affociates were divided in opinion. Some advifed him to retire without lofs of time, to Stirling. The queen's army was already ftrong, and only eight miles diftant ; the adjacent country was full of the friends and dependents of the house of Hamilton, and other lords of the queen's faction; Glafgow was a large and unfortified town; his own train confifted of no greater number than was usual in times of peace; all these reasons pleaded for a retreat. But on the other hand, arguments were urged of no inconfiderable weight. The citizens of Glafgow were well affected to the caufe; the vaffals of Glencairn, Lennox, and Semple, lay near at hand, and were both numerous and full of zeal; fuccours might arrive from other parts of the kingdom in a few days; in war, fuccefs depends upon reputation as much as upon numbers; reputation is gained or loft by the first ftep one takes; on all these confiderations, a retreat would be attended with the ignominy of a flight, and would at once difpirit his friends, and infpire his enemies with boldnefs. In fuch dangerous exigencies as this, the fuperiority of Murray's genius appeared, and enabled him both to chufe with wildom and to act with vigour. He declared against retreating, and fixed his headquarters at Glafgow. And while he amufed the queen for some days, by pretending to hearken . to fome overtures which the made for accomdating their differences, he was employed, with VOL. II. T. the

110

the utmoft industry, in drawing together his adherents from different parts of the kingdom. He was foon in a condition to take the field: and though far inferior to the enemy in number, he confided fo much in the valour of his troops and the experience of his officers, that he broke off the negotiation, and determined to hazard a battle<sup>c</sup>.

At the fame time [May 13], the queen's generals had commanded her army to move. Their intention was, to conduct her to Dunbartoncaftle, a place of great ftrength, which the regent had not been able to wreft out of the hands of lord Fleming the governor; but if the enemy should endeavour to interrupt their march, they refolved not to decline an engagement. In Mary's fituation, no refolution could be more imprudent. A part only of her forces was affembled. Huntly, Ogilvie, and the northern clans were foon expected ; her fufferings had removed or diminished the prejudices of many among her fubjects; the addrefs with which she furmounted the dangers that obstructed her escape, dazzled and interested the people; the fudden confluence of fo many nobles added luftre to her caufe ; fhe might affuredly depend on the friendship and countenance of France; she had reason to ex-pect the protection of England; her enemies could not poffibly look for fupport from that quarter. She had much to hope from purfuing flow and cautious measures ; they had every thing. to fear.

But Mary, whole hopes were naturally fanguine, and her passions impetuous, was fo elevate Buchan. 369.

B. V.

ed by her fudden transition from the depth of distress, to such an unufual appearance of prospenity, that she never doubted of success. Her army, which was almost double to the enemy in number, consisted chiefly of the Hamiltons and their dependents. Of these the archbishop of St. Andrew's had the chief direction, and hoped, by a victory, not only to crush Murray, the ancient enemy of his house, but to get the person of the queen into his hands, and to oblige her either to marry one of the duke's fons, or at least to commit the chief direction of her affairs to himfelf. His ambition proved fatal to the queen, to himfelf, and to his family f.

Mary's imprudence, in refolving to fight, was not greater than the ill conduct of her generals in the battle. Between the two armies, and on the road towards Dunbarton, there was an eminence called Langude Hill. This the regent had the precaution to feize, and posted his troops in a finall village, and among fome gardens and inclofures adjacent. In this advantageous fituation he waited the approach of the enemy, whofe superiority in cavalry could be of no benefit to them on fuch broken ground. The Hamiltons, who composed the vanguard, ran fo eagerly to the attack, that they put themfelves out of breath, and left the main battle far behind. The encounter of the fpearmen was fierce and desperate; but as the forces of the Hamiltons were exposed, on the one flank, to a continued fire from a body of mulqueteers, attacked on the f Anders. vol. iv. 32. Melv. 181.

other

other by the regent's most choice troops, and not fupported by the reft of the queen's army, they were foon obliged to give ground, and the rout immediately became universal. Few victories, in a civil war, and among a fierce people, have been purfued with lefs violence, or attended with lefs bloodshed. Three hundred fell in the field: in the flight almost none were killed. The regent and his principal officers rode about, befeeching the foldiers to spare their countrymen. The number of prisoners was great, and among them many perfons of diffinction. The regent marched back to Glafgow, and returned public thanks to God for this great, and, on his fide, almost bloodlefs victory <sup>g</sup>.

During the engagement, Mary flood on a hill at no great diftance, and beheld all that paffed in the field, with fuch emotions of mind as are not eafily defcribed. When the faw the army, which was her laft hope, thrown into irretrievable confution, her fpirit, which all her paft misfortunes had not been able entirely to fubdue, funk altogether. In the utmost confermation, the began her flight, and fo lively were her imprefitions of fear, that the never clofed her eyes till the reached the abbey of Dundrenan in Galloway, full fixty Scottifh miles from the place of battle<sup>h</sup>.

These revolutions in Mary's fortune had been no lefs rapid than fingular. In the short space of eleven days, she had been a prisoner at the mercy of her most inveterate enemies; she had seen a powerful army under her command, and a numerous train of nobles at her devotion: and

8 Keith, 477.

h Id. 481.

B. v.

now

T.Stollaurd R.A.del.

Isaac Taylor sculp.

Published Jan IS 198. by Gadell & Maries, Strand.

now fhe was obliged to fly, in the utmoft danger of her life, and to lurk, with a few attendants, in a corner of her kingdom. Not thinking herfelf fafe even in that retreat, her fears impelled her to an action, the moft unadvifed, as well as the moft unfortunate in her whole life. This was her retiring into England, a ftep which, on many accounts, ought to have appeared to her rafh and dangerous.

Before Mary's arrival in Scotland, mutual distrust and jealousies had arisen between her and Elizabeth. All their fubfequent transactions had contributed to exafperate and inflame thefe paffions. She had endeavoured, by fecret negotiations and intrigues, to difturb the tranquillity of Elizabeth's government, and to advance her own pretentions to the English crown. Elizabeth, who poffeffed great power, and acted with lefs referve, had openly fupported Mary's rebellious fubjects, and fomented all the diffentions and troubles in which her reign had been involved. The maxims of policy still authorifed that queen to purfue the fame courfe; as by keeping Scotland in confusion, the effectually fecured the peace of her own kingdom. The regent, after his victory, had marched to Edinburgh, and not knowing what courfe the queen had taken, it was feveral days before he thought of purfuing her i. She might have been concealed in that retired corner, among fubjects devoted to her interest, until. her party, which was difperfed rather than broken by the late defeat, should gather fuch frength that she could again appear with fafety

i Crawf. Mem. 59.

at

at their head. There was not any danger which fhe ought not to have run, rather than throw herfelf into the hands of an enemy, from whom fhe had already fuffered fo many injuries, and who was prompted, both by inclination and by intereft, to renew them.

But, on the other hand, during Mary's confinement, Elizabeth had declared against the proceedings of her fubjects, and folicited for her liberty, with a warmth which had all the appearance of fincerity. She had invited her to take refuge in England, and had promifed to meet her in perfon, and to give her fuch a reception as was due to a qucen, a kinfwoman, and an allyk. Whatever apprehension Elizabeth might entertain of Mary's defigns while the had power in her hands, she was, at prefent, the object, not of fear but of pity; and to take advantage of her fituation, would be both ungenerous and inhuman. The horrors of a prifon were fresh in Mary's memory; and if she should fall a fecond time into the hands of her fubjects, there was no injury to which the prefumption of fuccefs might not embolden them to proceed. To attempt escaping into France, was daugerous; and, in her fituation, almost impossible; nor could fhe bear the thoughts of appearing as an exile and a fugitive in that kingdom where fhe had once enjoyed all the fplendour of a queen. England remained her only afylum ; and, in spite of the entreaties of lord Herries, Fleming, and her other attendants, who conjured her, even on their knees, not to confide in Elizabeth's pro-

k Camd. 489. Anderf. vol. iv. 99. 120. Murdin, 369. miles mifes or generofity, her infatuation was invincible, and the refolved to fly thither. Herrics, by her command, wrote to Lowther the deputy-governor of Carlifle, to know what reception he would give her; and, before his anfwer could return, her fear and impatience were fo great, that the got into a fifther-boat [May 16], and, with about twenty attendants, landed at Wirkington in Cumberland, and thence the was conducted with many marks of refpect to Carlifle <sup>1</sup>.

As foon as Mary arrived in England, the wrote a long letter to the queen, reprefenting, in the ftrongeft terms, the injuries which the had fuffered from her own fubjects, and imploring that pity and affistance which her present situation demanded m. An event fo extraordinary, and the conduct which might be proper in confequence of it, drew the attention, and employed the thoughts, of Elizabeth and her council. If their deliberations had been influenced by confiderations of juffice or generofity alone, they would not have found them long or intrieate. A queen, vanquished by her own fubjects, and threatened by them with the lofs of her liberty, or of her life, had fled from their violence, and thrown herfelf into the arms of her nearest neighbour and ally, from whom the had received repeated affurances of friendship and protection. Thefe eireumitances entitled her to refpect and to compation, and required that the thould either be reftored to her own kingdom, or at leaft be left at full liberty to fcek aid from any other quarter. But with Elizabeth and her counfel-

Keith, 483. Anders. vol. iv. 2.

m Id. 29. lors, lors, the queftion was not, what was moft juft or generous, but what was moft beneficial to herfelf, and to the Englifh nation. Three different refolutions might have been taken, with regard to the queen of Scots. To re-inftate her in her throne, was one; to allow her to retire into France, was another; to detain her in England, was a third. Each of these drew confequences after it, of the utmost importance, which were examined, as appears from papers ftill extant ", with that minute accuracy which Elizabeth's ministers employed in all their confultations upon affairs of moment.

To reftore Mary to the full exercise of the royal authority in Scotland, they observed, would render her more powerful than ever. The nobles who were most firmly attached to the English in-terest would quickly feel the utmost weight of her refentment. As the gratitude of princes is feldom strong or lasting, regard to her own intereft might foon efface the memory of her obligations to Elizabeth, and prompt her to renew the alliance of the Scottish nation with France, and revive her own pretenfions to the English crown. Nor was it poffible to fetter and circumfcribe the Scottish queen, by any conditions that would prevent thefe dangers. Her party in Scotland was numerous and powerful. Her return, even without any fupport from England, would inspire her friends with new zeal and courage; a fingle victory might give them the fuperiority, which they had loft by a fingle defeat, n Anders. vol. iv. 34. 99. 102.

and

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

and render Mary a more formidable rival than ever to Elizabeth.

The dangers arifing from fuffering Mary to return into France, were no lefs obvious. The French king could not refufe his affiftance towards reftoring his fifter and ally to her throne. Elizabeth would, once more, fee a foreign army in the ifland, overawing the Scots, and ready to enter her kingdom; and if the commotions in France, on account of religion, were fettled, the princes of Lorrain might refume their ambitious projects, and the united forces of France and Scotland might invade England where it is weakeft and most defencelefs.

Nothing therefore remained but to detain her in England; and to permit her either to live at liberty there, or to confine her in a prifon. The former was a dangerous experiment. Her court would become a place of refort to all the Roman catholics, to the difaffected, and to the lovers of innovation. Though Elizabeth affected to reprefent Mary's pretensions to the English crown as ill-founded, she was not ignorant that they did not appear in that light to the nation, and that many thought them preferable even to her own title. If the activity of her emiffaries had gained her fo many abettors, her own perfonal iufluence was much more to be dreaded; her beauty, her addrefs, her fufferings, by the admiration and pity which they would excite, could not fail of making many converts to her party °.

• Anderf. vol. iv. 56. 60.

It

It was indeed to be apprehended, that the treating Mary as a prifoner would excite uni-verfal indignation against Elizabeth, and that by this unexampled feverity towards a queen, who implored, and to whom fhe had promifed her protection, she would forfeit the praise of justice and humanity, which was hitherto due to her administration. But the English monarchs were often fo folicitous to fecure their kingdom againft the Scots, as to be little fcrupulous about the means which they employed for that purpofe. Henry IV. had feized the heir of the crown of Scotland, who was forced, by the violence of a ftorm, to take refuge in one of the ports of his kingdom; and in contempt of the rights of hospitality, without regarding his tender age, or the tcars and entreaties of his father, detained him a prifoner for many years. This action, though detefted by posterity, Elizabeth refolved now to imitate. Her virtue was not more proof than that of Henry had been, against the temptations of interest; and the possession of a prefent advantage was preferred to the prospect of future fame. The fatisfaction which the felt in mortifying a rival, whole beauty and accomplishments she envied, had, perhaps, no lefs influence than political confiderations, in bringing her to this refolution. But, at the fame time, in order to fcreen herfelf from the cenfure which this conduct merited, and to make her treatment of the Scottish queen look like the effect of neceffity rather than of choice, fhe determined to affume the appearance of concern for her intereft, and of deep fympathy with her fufferings,

118

May

B. V.

With this view, she instantly dispatched lord Scrope [May 20], warden of the weft marches, and fir Francis Knollys, her vice-chamberlain, to the queen of Scots, with letters full of expreffions of kindness and condolence. But, at the fame time, they had private inftructions to watch all her motions, and to take care that fhe should not escape into her own kingdom P. On their arrival, Mary demanded a perfonal interview with the queen, that fhe might lay before her the injuries which fhe had fuffered, and receive from her those friendly offices which she had been encouraged to expect. They answered, that it was with reluctance admission into the prefence of their fovereign was at prefent denied her; that while she lay under the imputation of a crime fo horrid as the murder of her hufband, their miftrefs, to whom he was fo nearly allied, could not, without bringing a ftain upon her own reputation, admit her into her prefence; but as foon as the liad cleared herfelf from that afperfion, they promifed her a reception fuit-able to her dignity, and aid proportioned to her diftrefs 9.

Nothing could be more artful than this pretence; and it was the occafion of leading the queen of Scots into the fnare in which Elizaheth and her minifters wifhed to entangle her. Mary expressed the utmost furprise at this unexpected manner of evading her request; but as she could not believe fo many professions of friendship to be void of fincerity, the frankly offered to submit her cause to the cognizance of p Anderf. vol. iv. 36. 70. 92.

9 Ibid. vol. iv. 8. 55. Eliza-

Elizabeth, and undertook to produce fuch proofs of her own innocence, and of the falfehood of the accufations brought against her, as should fully remove the feruples, and fatisfy the deli-cacy of the English queen. This was the very point to which Elizabeth laboured to bring the matter. In confequence of this appeal of the Scottifh queen, fhe now confidered herfelf as the umpire between her and her fubjects, and forefaw that fhe would have it entirely in her own power to protract the inquiry to any length, and to perplex and involve it in endless difficulties. In the mean time, fhe was furnished with a plaufible reafon for keeping her at a diftance from court, and for refufing to contribute towards replacing her on the throne. As Mary's conduct had been extremely incautious, and the prefumptions of her guilt were many and ftrong, it was not impossible her subjects might make good their charge against her; and if this should be the refult of the inquiry, fhe would, thenceforth, ceafe to be the object of regard or of. compassion, and the treating her with coldness and neglect would merit little cenfure. In a matter fo dark and mysterious, there was no probability that Mary could bring proofs of her innocence, fo incontested, as to render the conduct of the English queen altogether culpable; and, perhaps, impatience under reftraint, fuspicion of Elizabeth's partiality, or the difcovery of her artifices, might engage Mary in fuch cabals, as would juftify the using her with greater rigour.

Elizabeth early perceived many advantages which would arife from an inquiry into the condust duct of the Scottish queen, carried on under her direction. There was fome danger, however, that Mary might discover her fecret intentions too foon, and by receding from the offer which fhe had made, endeavour to difappoint them. But even in that event, fhe determined not to drop the inquiry, and had thought of feveral different expedients for carrying it on. The countefs of Lennox, convinced that Mary was acceffary to the murder of her fon, and thirsting for that vengeance which it was natural for a mother to demand, had implored Elizabeth's justice, and folicited her, with many tears, in her own name, and in her husband's, to bring the Scottifli queen to a trial for that crimer. The parents of the unhappy prince had a just right to prefer this acculation; nor could the, who was their nearest kinfwoman, be condemned for liftening to fo equitable a demand. Befides, as the Scottifh nobles openly accufed Mary of the fame crime, and pretended to be able to confirm their charge by fufficient proof, it would be no difficult matter to prevail on them to petition the queen of England to take cognizance of their proceedings against their fove-reign; and it was the opinion of the English council, that it would be reafonable to comply with the request's. At the fame time, the obfolete claim of the fuperiority of England over Scotland began to be talked of; and on that account, it was pretended that the decifion of the contest between Mary and her fubjects belonged of right to Elizabeth . But though

r Camd. 412- Haynes, 469.

s And. vol. iv. part i. 37.

VOL. II.

M t Ibid.

Eliza.

Elizabeth revolved all thefe expedients in her mind, and kept them in referve to be made ufe of as occafion might require, fhe wifhed that the inquiry into Mary's conduct fhould appear to be undertaken purely in compliance with her own demand, and in order to vindicate her innocence; and fo long as that appearance could be preferved, none of the other expedients were to be employed.

When Mary confented to fubmit her caufe to Elizabeth, fhe was far from fufpecting that any bad confequences could follow, or that any dangerous pretensions could be founded on her offer. She expected that Elizabeth herfelf would receive and examine her defences"; fhe meant to confider her as an equal, for whofe fatisfaction fhe was willing to explain any part of her conduct that was liable to cenfure, not to acknowledge her as a fuperior, before whom the was bound to plead her caufe. But Elizabeth put a very different fense on Mary's offer. She confidered herfelf as chofen to be judge in the controverfy between the Scottifh queen and her fubjects, and began to act in that capacity. She proposed to appoint commissioners to hear the pleadings of both parties, and wrote to the regent of Scotland to impower proper perfons to appear before them, in his name, and to produce what he could allege in vindication of his proceedings against his fovereign.

Mary had, hitherto, relied with unaccountable credulity on Elizabeth's profeffions of regard, and expected that fo many kind speeches

> u Anderf. vol. iv. 10. 2

would,

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

would, at last, be accompanied with fome fuitable actions. But this propofal entirely unde-ceived her. She plainly perceived the artifice of Elizabeth's conduct, and faw what a diminution it would be to her own honour, to appear on a level with her rebellious fubjects, and to ftand together with them at the bar of a fuperior and a judge. She retracted the offer which she had made, and which had been perverted to a purpofe fo contrary to her intention. She demanded, with more earneftness than ever, to be admitted into Elizabeth's prefence; and wrote to her [June 13] in a strain very different from what fhe had formerly used, and which fully difference in the second second second second second on her heart. "In my prefent fituation," fays fhe, "I neither will nor can reply to the accufa-tions of my fubjects. I am ready, of my own accord, and out of friendfhip to you, to fatisfy your fcruples, and to vindicate my own con-duct. My fubjects are not my equals; nor will I, by fubmitting my caufe to a judicial trial, acknowledge them to be fo. I fled into your arms, as into those of my nearest relation and most perfect friend. I did you honour, as I imagined, in choosing you, preferably to any other prince, to be the restorer of an injured queen. Was it ever known that a prince was blamed for hearing, in perfon, the complaints of those who appealed to his justice, against the false accusations of their enemies? You admitted into your prefence [April 24] my baftard bro-ther, who had been guilty of rebellion; and you deny me that honour! God forbid that I should be the occasion of bringing any stain upon your reputation ! M 2 putation! I expected that your manner of treating me would have added luftre to it. Suffer me either to implore the aid of other princes, whofe delicacy on this head will be lefs, and their refentment of my wrongs greater; or let me receive from your hands that affiftance which it becomes you, more than any other prince, to grant; and by that benefit bind me to yourfelf in the indiffoluble ties of gratitude "."

This letter fomewhat difconcerted Elizabeth's plan, but did not divert her from the profecution of it. She laid the matter before the privy council [June 20], and it was there determined, notwithflanding the entreaties and remonftrances of the Scottifh queen, to go on with the inquiry into her conduct, and until that were finifhed, it was agreed that Elizabeth could not, confiftently with her own honour, or with the fafety of her government, either give her the affiftance which fhe demanded, or permit her to retire out of the kingdom. Left fhe fhould have an opportunity of efcaping, while fhe refided fo near Scotland, it was thought advifable to remove her to fome place at a greater diffance from the borders<sup>y</sup>.

While the English court was occupied in these deliberations, the regent did not neglect to improve the victory at Langside. That event was of the utmost importance to him. It not only drove the queen herself out of the kingdom, but left her adherents dispersed, and without a leader, at his mercy. He seemed resolved, at first, to * Anderf. vol. iv. part i. 94.

y Id. ibid. 102. proceed

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

proceed against them with the utmost rigour. Six perfons of fome diffinction, who had been taken prifoners in the battle, were tried and condemned to death, as rebels against the king's government. They were led to the place of execution, but by the powerful interceffion of Knox they obtained a pardon. Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh was one of the number, who lived to give both the regent and Knox reafon to repent of this commendable act of lenity<sup>2</sup>.

Soon after, the regent marched with an army, confifting of four thousand horse and one thoufand foot, towards the west borders. The nobles in this part of the kingdom were all the queen's adherents; but as they had not force fufficient to obstruct his progress, he must either have obliged them to fubmit to the king, or would have laid wafte their lands with fire and fword. But Elizabeth, whofe intereft it was to keep Scotland in confusion, by preferving the balance between the two parties, and who was endeavouring to footh the Scottish queen by gentle treatment, interposed at her defire. After keeping the field two weeks, the regent, in compliance to the English ambassador, dismissed his forces; and an expedition, which might have proved fatal to his opponents, ended with a few acts of feverity 2.

The refolution of the English privy council, with regard to Mary's perfon, was foon carried into execution; and, without regarding her remonstrances or complaints, she was conducted to Bolton [July 13], a castle of lord Scroop's, on z Cald. vol. ii. 99.

a Ibid.

M 3

the

the borders of Yorkshire<sup>b</sup>. In this place, her, correspondence with her friends in Scotland became more difficult, and any profpect of making her escape was entirely cut off. She now felt herfelf to be completely in Elizabeth's power, and though treated as yet with the refpect due to a queen, her real condition was that of a prifoner. Mary knew what it was to be deprived of liberty, and dreaded it as the worst of all evils. While the remembrance of her late imprifonment was still lively, and the terror of a new one filled her mind [July 28], Elizabeth thought it a proper juncture to renew her former proposition, that she would fuffer the regent and his adherents to be called into England, and confent to their being heard in defence of their own conduct. She declared it to be far from her intention to claim any right of judging between Mary and her subjects, or of degrading her so far as to require that she should answer to their accufations. On the contrary, Murray and his affociates were fummoned to appear, in order to juffify their conduct in treating their fovereign io harfhly, and to vindicate themfelves from those crimes with which shc had charged them.' On her part, Elizabeth promifed, whatever should be the iffue of this inquiry, to employ all her power and influence towards replacing Mary on her throne, under a few limita-tions, by no means unreafonable. Mary, deceived by this feeming attention to her dignity as a queen; foothed, on one hand, by a promife more flattering than any which the had

b Anderf, vol. iv. 14. See Appendix, No. XXV.

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

hitherto received from Elizabeth, and urged, on the other, by the feelings which were natural on being conducted into a more interior part of England, and kept there in more rigorous confinement, complied at length with what Elizabeth required, and promifed to fend commiffioners to the conferences appointed to be held at York <sup>c</sup>.

In order to perfuade Elizabeth that the defired nothing fo much as to render the union between them as close as poffible, fhe shewed a disposition to relax fomewhat in one point; with regard to which, during all her past and fubsequent miffortunes, she was uniformly inflexible. She expreffed a great veneration for the liturgy of the church of England; fhe was often prefent at religious worship, according to the rites of the reformed church; made choice of a protestant clergyman to be her chaplain; heard him preach againft the errors of popery with attention and feeming pleafure; and difcovered all the fymp-toms of an approaching convertion <sup>d</sup>. Such was Mary's known and bigotted attachment to the popish religion, that it is impossible to believe her fincere in this part of her conduct; nor can any thing mark more ftrongly the wretchedness of her condition, and the excels of her fears, than that they betrayed her into diffimulation, in a matter concerning which her fentiments were, at all other times, fcrupuloufly delicate.

At this time the regent called a parliament [Aug. 18], in order to proceed to the forfeiture

c Anders. iv. part i. p. 15, 12, &c. 109, &c. Haynes, 458, &c. State Trials, Edit. Hargrave, i. 90.

d Anderf. vol. iv. part i. 113. Haynes, 509. See Appendix, No. XXVI.

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

of those who refused to acknowledge the king's authority. The queen's adherents were alarmed, and Argyll and Huntly, whom Mary had appointed her lieutenants, the one in the fouth, and the other in the north of Scotland, began to affemble forces to obstruct this meeting. Compassion for the queen, and envy at those who governed in the king's name, had added fo much ftrength to the party, that the regent would have found it difficult to withstand its efforts, But as Mary had fubmitted her caufe to Elizabeth, fhe could not refuse, at her defire, to command her friends to lay down their arms, and to wait patiently until matters were brought to a decifion in England. By procuring this ceffation of arms, Elizabeth afforded as feafonable relief to the regent's faction, as she had formerly given to the queen's e.

The regent, however, would not confent, even at Elizabeth's requeft, to put off the meeting of parliament <sup>f</sup>. But we may afcribe to her influence, as well as to the eloquence of Maitland, who laboured to prevent the one half of his countrymen from exterminating the other, any appearances of moderation which this parliament difcovered in its proceedings. The moft violent opponents of the king's government were forfeited; the reft were allowed ftill to hope for favour <sup>g</sup>.

No fooner did the queen of Scots fubmit her caufe to her rival, than Elizabeth required the regent to fend to York deputies properly inftructed for vindicating his conduct, in prefence

- e Anderf. vol. iv. 125.
- f See Appendix, No. XXVII.

g Buch. 371.

of

B. V.

of her commissioners. It was not without hefitation and anxiety that the regent confented to this measure. His authority was already established in Scotland, and confirmed by parliament. To fuffer its validity now to be called in queftion, and fubjected to a foreign jurifdiction, was extremely mortifying. To accuse his fovereign before strangers, the ancient enemies of the Scottish name, was an odious task. To fail in this acculation was dangerous; to fucceed in it was difgraceful. But the strength of the adverfe faction daily increased. He dreaded the interpolition of the French king in its behalf. In his fituation, and in a matter which Elizabeth had fo much at heart, her commands were neither to be difputed nor difobcyed h.

The necessity of repairing in perfon to York added to the ignominy of the ftep which hc was obliged to take. All his affociates declined the office ; they were unwilling to expose themselves to the odium and danger with which it was eafy to forclee that the difcharge of it would be attended, unless he himself confented to share these in common with them. The earl of Morton, Bothwell bishop of Orkney, Pitcairn commendator of Dunfermling, and lord Lindfay, were joined with him in commission [Sept. 18]. Macgill of Rankeilor, and Balnaves of Hallhill, two eminent civilians, George Buchanan, Murray's faithful adherent, a man whofe genius did honour to the age, Maitland, and feveral others, were appointed to attend them as affiftants. Maitland owed this diffinction to the regent's fear, rather than to his affection. He had warmly remonftrated againft this mcafure. He wifhed his country to continue in friendfhip with England, but not to become dependent on that nation. He was defirous of re-eftablifhing the queen in fome degree of power, not inconfiftent with that which the king poffeffed; and the regent could not, with fafety, leave behind him a man, whofe views were fo contrary to his own, and who, by his fuperior abilities, had acquired an influence in the nation, equal to that which others derived from the antiquity and power of their families i.

> h Buch. 372. See Append. No. XXVIII. affection.

Mary impowered Lefly bifhop of Rofs, lord Livingfton, lord Boyd, lord Herries, Gavin Hamilton commendator of Kilwinning, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, and Sir James Cockburn of Skirling, to appear in her name <sup>k</sup>.

Elizabeth nominated Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, Thomas Radcliff earl of Suffex, and Sir Ralph Sadler, her commiffioners to hear both parties.

* The fourth of October was the day fixed for opening the conference. The great abilities of the deputies on both fides, the dignity of the judges before whom they were to appear, the high rank of the perfons whole caufe was to be heard, and the importance of the points in difpute, rendered the whole transaction no lefs illuftrious than it was fingular. The fituation in which Elizabeth appeared on this occation, ftrikes us with an air of magnificence. Her rival, an independent queen, and the heir of an ancient race of monarchs, was a prifoner in her hands, and appeared, by her ambaffadors, before her tribunal. The regent of Scotland, who reprefented the majefty, and poffeffed the authority of a king, ftood in perfon at her bar. And the fate of a kingdom, whofe power her anceftors had often dreaded, but could never fubdue, was now at her difpofal.

i Buch. 371. Anderf. vol. iv. 35, Mely. 186. 188. & Anderf. vol. iv. 33.

hands,

The views, however, with which the feveral parties confented to this conference, and the iffue to which they expected to bring it, were extremely different.

Mary's chief object was the recovering of her former authority. This induced her to confent to a measure against which she had long struggled. Elizabeth's promifes gave her ground for entertaining hopes of being reftored to her kingdom; in order to which fhe would have willingly made many conceffions to the king's party; and the influence of the English queen, as well as her own impatience under her prefent fituation, might have led her to many more 1. The regent aimed at nothing but fecuring Elizabeth's protection to his party, and feems not to have had the most distant thoughts of coming to any composition with Mary. Elizabeth's views were more various, and her schemes more intricate. She seemed to be full of concern for Mary's honour, and folicitous that fhe should wipe off the afperfions which blemished her character. This she pretended to be the intention of the conference; amufing Mary, and eluding the folicitations of the French and Spanish ambaffadors in her behalf, by repeated promifes of af-

Anders. vol. iv. part ii. 33. Good. vol. ii. 337. isfting

fifting her, as foon as fhe could venture to do fo, without bringing difgrace upon herfelf. But, under this veil of friendship and generofity, Elizabeth concealed fentiments of a different nature. She expected that the regent would accufe Mary of being acceffary to the murder of her hufband. She encouraged him, as far as decency would permit, to take this defperate ftep m. And as this acculation might terminate in two different ways, flie had concerted measures for her future conduct fuitable to each of thefe. If the charge against Mary should appear to be well founded, she refolved to pronounce her unworthy of wearing a crown, and to declare that fhe would never burden her own confcience with the guilt of an action fo detestable as the reftoring her to her kingdom ". If it should happen, that what her accufers alleged did not amount to a proof of guilt, but only of mal-administra-tion, she determined to set on foot a treaty for reftoring her, but on fuch conditions as would render her hereafter dependent not only upon England, but upon her own fubjects °. As every ftep in the progrefs of the conference, as well as the final refult of it, was in Elizabeth's own power, the would ftill be at liberty to choofe which of these courses she should hold; or if there appeared to be any danger or inconveniency in purfuing either of them, fhe might protract the whole caufe by endlefs delays, and involve it in inextricable perplexity.

The conference, however, was opened with much folemnity. But the very first step difco-

m Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 11. 45. Haynes, 487. n Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 11. O Ibid. vol. iv. part ii. 16.

Anderi. vol. 1v. part 11. 11. O Ibid. vol. 1v. part 11. 16. vered

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

vered it to be Elizabeth's intention to inflame, rather than to extinguish, the diffentions and animofities among the Scots. No endeavours were used to reconcile the contending parties, or to mollify the fiercenefs of their hatred, by bringing the queen to offer pardon for what was past, or her subjects to promise more dutiful obedience for the future. On the contrary, Mary's commissioners were permitted to prefer a complaint against the regent and his party [Oct.8], containing an enumeration of their treafonable actions, of their feizing her perfon by force of arms, committing her to prifon, compelling her to refign the crown, and making use of her fon's name to colour their ufurpation of the whole royal authority; and of all thefe enormities they required fuch speedy and effectual redress, as the injuries of one queen demanded from the juffice of another P.

It was then expected that the regent would have difclofed all the circumftances of that unnatural crime to which he pretended the queen had been acceffary, and would have produced evidence in fupport of his charge. But far from accufing Mary, the regent did not even anfwer the complaints brought againft himfelf. He difcovered a reluctance at undertaking that office, and ftarted many doubts and fcruples, with regard to which he demanded to be refolved by Elizabeth herfelf<sup>q</sup>. His referve and hefitation were no lefs furprifing to the greater part of the Englifh commiffioners than to his own affociates. They knew that he could not vindicate his own conduct without charging the murder upon the queen, and he had not hitherto fhown any extraordinary delicacy on that head. An intrigue, however, had been fecretly carried on, fince his arrival at York, which explains this myftery.

P Anderf. vol. iv. partii. 52. VOL. II. N 9 Haynes, 478. conduct

134 HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

The duke of Norfolk was, at that time, the most powerful and most popular man in England. His wife was lately dead; and he began already to form a project, which he afterwards more openly avowed, of mounting the throne of Scot. land, by a marriage with the queen of Scots. He faw the infamy which would be the confequence of a public accufation against Mary, and how prejudicial it might be to her pretenfions to the English fuccession. In order to fave her from this cruel mortification, he applied to Maitland, and expressed his aftonishment at feeing a man of fo much reputation for wifdom, concurring with the regent in a meafure fo difhonourable to themfelves, to their queen, and to their country ; fubmitting the public transactions of the nation to the judgment of foreigners; and publishing the ignominy and exposing the faults of their fovereign, which they were bound, in good policy, as well as in duty, to conceal and to cover. It was eafy for Maitland, whole fentiments were the fame with the duke's, to vindicate his own conduct. He affured him, that he had employed all his credit to diffuade his countrymen from this meafure ; and would still contribute, to the utmost of his power, to divert them from it. This encouraged Norfolk to communicate the matter to the regent. He repeated and enforced the fame arguments which he had used with Maitland. He warned him of the danger to which he must expofe 135 expose himself by fuch a violent action as the public accusation of his fovereign. Mary would never forgive a man, who had endeavoured to fix fuch a brand of infamy on her character. If fhe ever recovered any degree of power, his destruction would be inevitable, and he would juftly merit it at her hands. Nor would Elizabeth screen him from this, by a public approbation of his conduct. For whatever evidence of Mary's guilt he might produce, fhe was refolved to give no definitive fentence in the caufe. Let him only demand that the matter should be brought to a decifion immediately after hearing the proof, and he would be fully convinced how falfe and infidious her intentions were, and, by confequence, how improper it would be for him to appear as the acculer of his own fovereign r. The candour which Norfolk feemed to difcover in thefe remonftrances, as well as the truth which they contained, made a deep impression on the regent. He daily received the ftrongeft affurances of Mary's willingness to be reconciled to him, if he abstained from accusing her of fuch an odious crime, together with the denunciations of her irreconcilable hatred, if he acted a contrary part<sup>s</sup>. All these confiderations concurred in determining him to alter his purpose, and to make trial of the expedient which the duke had fuggested.

He demanded, therefore [Oct. 9], to be informed, before he proceeded farther, whether the English commissioners were empowered to declare Melv. 187. Haynes, 573.

S Anderf. vol. iv. port ii. 77. Good. vol. ii. 157. See Appendix, No. XXIX.

the queen guilty, by a judicial act; whether they would promife to pafs fentence, without delay ; whether the queen should be kept under fuch reftraint, as to prevent her from diffurbing the government now eftablished in Scotland; and whether Elizabeth, if the approved of the proceedings of the king's party, would engage to protect it for the future . The paper containing thefe demands was figned by himfelf alone, without communicating it to any of his attendants, except Maitland and Melvil ". But left fo many precautions should excite any fufpicion of their proceeding from fome confcioufnefs of defect in the evidence which he had to produce against his fovereign, Murray empowered Lethington, Mackgill, and Buchanan, to wait upon the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffex, and Sir Ralph Sadler, and to lay before them, not in their public characters as commissioners, but as privaté perfons, Mary's letters to Bothwell, her fonnets, and all the other papers upon which were founded the charge of her being acceffory to the murder of the king, and to declare that this confidential communication was made to them, with a view to learn whether the queen of England would confider this evidence as fufficient to establish the truth of the accufation. Nothing could be more natural than the regent's folicitude, to know on what footing he flood. To have ventured on a ftep fo uncommon and dangerous, as the accufing his fovereign, without previoully afcertaining that he might take it with fafety, would have been unpardonable imprudence. But Elizabeth, who did

* Anders. vol. iv. part ii. 55. State Trials, i. 91, &c. a Anders. vol. iv. part ii. 56. Melv. 190.

1568.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

did not expect that he would have moved any fuch difficulty, had not empowered her commiffioners to give him that fatisfaction which he demanded. It became neceffary to transmit the articles to herfelf, and by the light in which Norfolk placed them, it is eafy to fee that he wished that they should make no slight impression on Elizabeth and her ministers. " Think not the Scots," faid he, " over-forupulous or precife. Let us view " their conduct as we would wish our own to be " viewed in a like fituation. The game they " play is deep; their estates, their lives, their "honour, are at stake. It is now in their own " power to be reconciled to their queen, or to " offend her irrecoverably; and in a matter of fo " much importance the utmost degree of caution " is not exceffive x."

While the English commissioners waited for fuller instructions with regard to the regent's demands, he gave in an answer to the complaint which had been offered in name of the Scottifh queen. It was expressed in terms perfectly conformable to the fystem which he had at that time adopted. It continued no infinuation of the queen's being accessory to the murder of her husband; the bitterness of style peculiar to the age was confiderably abated; and though he pleaded, that the infamy of the marriage with Bothwell made it neceffary to take arms in order to diffolve it; though Mary's attachment to a man fo odious juftified the keeping her for fome time under restraint ; yet nothing more was faid on these subjects than was barely requisite in his own

* Anderf. vol. iv. 77.

N 3

own defence. The queen's commissioners did not fail to reply ' [Oct. 17]. But while the article with regard to the murder remained untouched, these were only skirmiss at a diftance, of no confequence towards ending the contest, and were little regarded by Elizabeth or her commissioners.

The conference had, hitherto, been conducted in a manner which difappointed Elizabeth's views, and produced none of those discoveries which she had expected. The distance between York and London, and the neceffity of confulting her upon every difficulty which occurred, confumed much time. Norfolk's negotiation with the Scottish regent, however fecretly carried on, was not, in all probability, unknown to a princefs fo remarkable for her fagacity in penetrating the defigns of her enemies, and feeing through their deepest schemes z. Instead, therefore, of returning any answer to the regent's demands, the refolved to remove the conference to Weftminfter, and to appoint new commiffioners, in whom the could more abfolutely confide. Both the queen of Scots and the regent were brought, without difficulty, to approve of this refolution<sup>a</sup>.

We often find Mary boafting of the fuperiority in argument obtained by her commiffioners during the conference at York, and how, by the ftrength of their reafons, they confounded her adverfaries, and filenced all their cavils<sup>b</sup>. The difpute ftood, at that time, on a footing which rendered her

Y Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 64. 80. Z Good. vol. ii. 160. Anderf. vol. iii. 24. <sup>2</sup> Haynes, 484. Anderf. vol. iv. 94, <sup>b</sup> Good. vol. i. 186. 284. 350.

victory

B. V.

victory not only apparent, but cafy. Her participation of the guilt of the king's murder was the circumftance upon which her fubjects muft have refted, as a juftification of their violent proceedings againft her; and while they induftrioufly avoided mentioning that, her caufe gained as much as that of her adverfaries loft by fuppreffing this capital argument.

Elizabeth refolved that Mary should not enjoy the fame advantage in the conference to be held at Westminster. She deliberated with the utmost anxiety, how she might overcome the regent's fcruples, and perfuade him to accufe the queen. She confidered of the most proper method for bringing Mary's commissioners to answer such an accusation; and as she forefaw that the promifes with which it was necessary to allure the regent, and which it was impossible to conceal from the Scottish queen, would naturally exasperate her to a great degree, she determined to guard her more narrowly than ever; and though lord Scroop had given her no reason to distrust his vigilance or fidelity, yet becaufe he was the duke of Norfolk's brother-in-law, fhe thought it proper to remove the queen as foon as poffible to Tuthbury in Staffordshire, and commit her to the keeping of the earl of Shrewfbury, to whom that castle belonged c.

Mary began to fulpect the defign of this fecond conference [Oct. 21]; and notwithftanding the fatisfaction the expressed at feeing her cause taken more immediately under the queen's own eye<sup>d</sup>, she framed her instructions to her com-

C Haynes, 487.

d Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 95. miffioners miffioners in fuch a manner, as to avoid being brought under the neceffity of anfwering the acculation of her subjects, if they should be fo desperate as to exhibit one against her e. These fuspicions were foon confirmed by a circumstance extremely mortifying. The regent having arrived at London, in order to be prefent at the conference, was immediately admitted into Elizabeth's prefence, and received by her, not only with re-fpect, but with affection. This Mary juftly confidered as an open declaration of that queen's partiality towards her adverfaries. In the first emotions of her refentment, she wrote to her commiffioners [Nov. 22], and commanded them to complain, in the prefence of the English nobles, and before the ambassadors of foreign princes, of the usage she had hitherto met with, and the additional injuries which fhe had reafon to apprehend. Her rebellious subjects were allowed accefs to the queen, fhe was excluded from her prefence; they enjoyed full liberty, fhe languished under a long imprisonment; they were encouraged to accuse her, in defending herfelf she laboured under every difadvantage. For thefe reafons fhe once more renewed her demand, of being admitted into the queen's prefence; and if that were denied, fhe inftructed them to declare, that the recalled the confent which the had given to the conference at Westminster, and protefted, that whatever was done therc, fhould be held to be null and invalid f.

This, perhaps, was the most prudent refolution Mary could have taken. The pretences on which the declined the conference were plaufible, and the juncture for offering them well chofen. But either the queen's letter did not reach her commiftioners in due time, or they fuffered themfelves to be deceived by Elizabeth's profeffions of regard for their mittrefs, and confented to the opening of the conference <sup>g</sup>.

Good. vol. ii. 349.

f Ibid. vol. ii. 184.

which

To the commissioners who had appeared in her name at York [Nov. 25], Elizabeth now added Sir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great feal, the earls of Arundel and Leicester, lord Clinton, and Sir William Cecil<sup>h</sup>. The difficulties which obstructed the proceedings at York wcre quickly removed. A fatisfying answer was given to the regent's demands; nor was he fo much disposed to hefitate and raise objections, as formerly. His negotiation with Norfolk had been discovered to Morton by some of Mary's attendants, and he had communicated it to Cecil<sup>1</sup>. His perfonal fafety, as well as the continuance of his power, depended on Elizabeth. By favouring Mary, the might at any time ruin him, and by a queftion which the artfully flarted, concerning the perfon who had a right, by the law of Scotland, to govern the kingdom during a . minority, the let him fee, that even without reftoring the queen, it was an eafy matter for her ' to deprive him of the supreme direction of affairsk. Thefe confiderations, which were powerfully feconded by most of his attendants, at length determined the regent to produce his accufation against the queen.

8 Anderf. vol. iii. 25. h Id. vol. iv. part ii. 99. 8 Melv. 191. k Haynes, 484.

He

He endeavoured to leffen the obloguy with which he was fenfible this action would be attended, by protefling, that it was with the utmost reluctance he undertook this difagreeable tafk ; that his party had long fuffered their conduct to be mifconftrued, and had borne the worft imputations in filence, rather than expose the crimes of their fovereign to the eyes of strangers; but that now the infolence and importunity of the adverse faction forced them to publish, what they had hitherto, though with lofs to themfelves, endeavoured to conceal<sup>1</sup>. These pretexts are decent; and the confiderations which he mentions had, during fome time, a real influence upon the conduct of the party; but fince the meeting of parliament held in December, they had difcovered fo little delicacy and referve with refpect to the queen's actions, as renders it impossible to give credit to those fludied professions. The regent and his affociates were drawn, it is plain, partly by the neceffity of their affairs, and partly by Elizabeth's artifices, into a fituation where no liberty of choice was left to them; and they were obliged either to acknowledge themfelves to be guilty of rebellion, or to charge Mary with having been acceffory to the commiffion of murder.

The accufation itfelf was conceived in the ftrongeft terms. Mary was charged, not only with having confented to the murder, but with being acceffory to the contrivance and execution of it. Bothwell, it was pretended, had been fcreened from the purfuits of juffice by her favour;

1 Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 115.

B. V.

vour; and the had formed defigns no lefs dangerous to the life of the young prince, than fubverfive of the liberties and conftitution of the kingdom. If any of thefe crimes thould be denied, an offer was made to produce the moft ample and undoubted cvidence in confirmation of the charge <sup>m</sup>.

At the next meeting of the commiffioners [Nov. 29], the earl of Lennox appeared before them; and after bewailing the tragical and unnatural murder of his fon, he implored Elizabeth's juffice against the queen of Scots, whom he accufed, upon oath, of being the author of that crime, and produced papers, which, as he pretended, would make good what he alleged. The entrance of a new actor on the stage, fo opportunely, and at a juncture fo critical, can fearce be imputed to chance. This contrivance was manifestly Elizabeth's, in order to increase, by this additional accufation, the infamy of the Scottish queen n.

Mary's commiffioners expressed the utmost furprife and indignation at the regent's prefumption, in loading the queen with calumnies, which, as they affirmed, she had fo little merited [Dec. 4]. But, instead of attempting to vindicate her honour, by a reply to the charge, they had recours to an article in their instructions, which they had formerly neglected to mention in its proper place. They demanded an audience of Elizabeth; and having renewed their missing's request, of a personal interview, they protessed, if that were denied her, against all the m Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 119.

n Id. ibid. 122. future future proceedings of the commissioners°. A. protestation of this nature, offered just at the critical time when fuch a bold accufation had been preferred against Mary, and when the proofs in fupport of it were ready to be examined, gave reason to suspect that she dreaded the event of that examination. This fuspicion received the ftrongeft confirmation from another circumstance; Rofs and Herries, before they were introduced to Elizabeth, in order to make this protestation, privately acquainted Leicefter and Cecil, that as their miftrefs had, from the beginning, difcovered an inclination towards bringing the differences between herfelf and her fubjects to an amicable accommodation, fo fhe was still defirous, notwithstanding the regent's andacious accufation, that they should be terminated in that manner P.

Such moderation feems hardly to be compatible with the flrong refentment which calumniated innocence naturally feels; or with that eagernefs to vindicate itfelf which it always difcovers. In Mary's fituation, an offer fo ill-timed muft be confidered as a confeffion of the weaknefs of her caufe. The known character of her commiffioners exempts them from the imputation of folly, or the fufpicion of treachery. Some fecret conviction, that the conductof their miltrefs could not bear fo ftrict a ferminy as muft be made into it, if they fhould reply to the accufation preferred by Murray against her, feems to be the moft probable motive of this imprudent propofal, by which they endeavoured to avoid it.

Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 133. 158, &c:
 P Ibid. iv. 134. Cabbala, 157.

B. V.

T+

It appeared in this light to Elizabeth, and afforded her a prentence for rejecting it [Dcc. 4]. She reprefented to Mary's commiffioners, that, in the prefent juncture, nothing could be fo difhonourable to their miftrefs as an accommodation; and that the matter would feem to be huddled up in this manner, merely to fupprefs difcoveries, and to hide her fhame; nor was it poffible that Mary could be admitted, with any decency, into her prefence, while fhe lay under the infamy of fuch a public accufation.

Upon this repulfe, Mary's commissioners withdrew; and as they had declined anfwering, there feemed now to be no further reafon for the regent's producing the proofs in fupport of his charge. But without getting thefe into her hands, Elizabeth's fchemes were incomplete; and her artifice for this purpofe was as mean, but as fuccefsful, as any the had hitherto employed. She commanded her commiffioners to teffify her indignation and difpleafure at the regent's prefumption, in forgetting fo far the duty of a fubject, as to accufe his fovereign of fuch atrocious crimes. He, in order to regain the good opinion of fuch a powerful protectrefs, offered to shew that his accufations were not malicious, nor ill-grounded. Then were produced and fubmitted to the inspection of the English commissioners, the acts of the Scottish parliament in confirmation of the regent's authority, and of the queen's refignation; the confessions of the perfons executed for the king's murder; and the fatal cafket which contained the letters, fonnets, and contracts, that have been fo often mentioned.

0

VOL. II.

As

As foon as Elizabeth got thefe into her pofseffion, the laid them before her privy council [Dec. 14], to which the joined, on this occasion, feveral noblemen of the greatest eminence in her kingdom; in order that they might have an opportunity of confidering the mode in which an inquiry of fuch public importance had been hitherto conducted, as well as the amount of the evidence now brought against a perfon who claimed a preferable right of fucceffion to the English crown. In this respectable affembly all the proceedings in the conferences at York and Westminster were reviewed, and the evidence produced by the regent of Scotland against his lovereign was examined with attention. In particular, the letters and other papers faid to be written by the queen of Scots, were carefully compared " for the manner of writing and or-" thography," with a variety of letters which Elizabeth had received at different times from the Scottish queen; and, as the refult of a most accurate collation, the members of the privy council, and noblemen conjoined with them, declared that no difference between these could be difcovered 9. Elizabeth, having eftablished a fact fo unfavourable to her rival, began to lay afide the expressions of friendship and respect which the had hitherto used in all her letters to the Scottish queen. She now wrote to her in fuch terms, as if the prefumptions of her guilt had amounted almost to certainty; she blamed her for refusing to vindicate herfelf from an accusation which could not be left unanfwered, without a manifest injury to her character; and plainly intimated, that unlefs that were done, no change would be made in her prefent fituation '. She hoped that fuch a difcovery of her fentiments would intimidate Mary, who was hardly recovered from the flock of the regent's attack on her reputation, and force her to confirm her refignation of the crown, to ratify Murray's authority as regent, and to confent that both herfelf and her fon fhould refide in England, under English protection. This fcheme Eliza-beth had much at heart; she proposed it both to Mary and to her commissioners, and neglected no argument, nor artifice, that could poffibly recommend it. Mary faw how fatal this would prove to her reputation, to her pretensions, and even to her perfonal fafety. She rejected it without hefitation. " Death," faid she, " is " lefs dreadful than fuch an ignominious flep. " Rather than give away, with my own hands, " the crown which defcended to me from my " anceftors, I will part with life ; but the laft " words I utter, shall be those of a queen of " Scotland ","

9 Anderson, vol. iv. part ii. 170, &c.

out

E. V.

At the fame time fhe feems to have been fenfible how open her reputation lay to cenfure, while fhe fuffered fuch a public accufation to remain unanfwered; and though the conference was now diffolved, fhe empowered her commiffioners to prefent a reply to the allegations of her enemies, in which fhe denied, in the ftrongeft terms, the crimes imputed to her; and recri-

<sup>7</sup> Anderf. vol. iv. part ii. 179. 183. Good. vol. ii. 260. <sup>8</sup> Haynes, 497. See Append. No. XXX. Good, vol. ii.

274.301.

minated

minated upon the regent and his party, by accufing them of having devifed and executed the murder of the king <sup>t</sup> [Dec. 24]. The regent and his affociates afferted their innocence with great warmth. Mary continued to infift on a perfonal interview, a condition which fhe knew would never be granted <sup>u</sup>. Elizabeth urged her to vindicate her own honour. But it is evident from the delays, the evafions, and fubterfuges, to which both queens had recourfe by turns, that Mary avoided, and Elizabeth did not defire to make any further progrefs in the inquiry.

1569.] The regent was now impatient to return into Scotland, where his adverfaries were endeavouring, in his abfence, to raife fome commotions. Before he fet out, he was called into the privy council [Feb. 2], to receive a final declaration of Elizabeth's fentiments. Cecil acquainted him, in her name, that on one hand nothing had been objected to his conduct, which the could' reckon detrimental to his honour, or inconfistent with his duty; nor had he, on the other hand, produced any thing against his fovereign, on which fhe could found an unfavourable opinion of her actions; and for this reason, she resolved to leave all the affairs of Scotland precifely in the fame fituation in which fhe had found them at the beginning of the conference. The queen's commissioners were dismissed much in the same manuer x.

After the attention of both nations had been fixed fo earneftly on this conference upwards of four months, fuch a conclusion of the whole ap-

<sup>c</sup> Good. ii. 285.

u Ibid. 283. Cabbala, 157.

E Good. ii. 315. 333.

pears,

B. V.

1569.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

pears, at first fight, triffing and ridiculous. Nothing, however, could be more favourable to Elizabeth's future fchemes. Notwithstanding her feeming impartiality, fhe had no thoughts of continuing neuter; nor was fhe at any lofs on whom to beftow her protection. Before the regent left London, the fupplied him with a confiderable fum of money, and engaged to fupport. the king's authority to the utmost of her powery. Mary, by her own conduct, fortified this refolution. Enraged at the repeated inftances of Elizabeth's artifice and deceit, which fhe had difcovered during the progrefs of the conference, and despairing of ever obtaining any fuccour from her, the endeavoured to roufe her own adherents in Scotland to arms, by imputing fuch defigns to Elizabeth and Murray, as could not fail to infpire every Scotchman with indignation. Murray, fhe pretended, had agreed to convey the prince her fon into England; to furrender to Elizabeth the places of greatest strength in the kingdom; and to acknowledge the dependence of the Scottifh upon the English nation. In return for this, Murray was to be declared the lawful heir of the crown of Scotland; and at the fame time the question with regard to the English fuccession was to be decided in favour of the earl of Hartford, who had promifed to marry one of Cecil's daughters. An account of thefe wild and chimerical projects was fpread industriously among the Scots. Elizabeth, perceiving it was calculated of purpofe to bring her government into difreputation, laboured to y Good. 313. Carte, iii. 478.

deftroy

deftroy its effects, by a counter-proclamation, and became more difgusted than ever with the Scottish queen <sup>2</sup>.

The regent, on his return, found the kingdom in the utmost tranquillity. But the rage of the queen's adherents, which had been fuspended in expectation that the conference in England would terminate to her advantage, was now ready to break out with all the violence of civil war. They were encouraged too by the appearance of a leader, whole high quality and pretenfions entitled him to great authority in the nation. This was the duke of Chatelherault, who had refided for fome years in France, and was now fent over by that court with a fmall fupply of money, in hopes that the prefence of the first nobleman in the kingdom would ftrengthen the queen's party. Elizabeth had detained him in England, for fome months, under various pretences, but was obliged at last to fuffer him to proceed on his journey. Before his departure Mary invested him [Feb. 25] with the high dignity of her lieutenant general in Scotland, together with the fantaflic title of her adopted father.

The regent did not give him time to form his party into any regular body. He affembled an army with his ufual expedition, and marched to Glafgow. The followers of Argyll and Huntly, who composed the chief part of the queen's faction, being feated in corners of the kingdom very diftant from each other, and many of the duke's dependents having been killed or taken in the battle of Langfide, the fpirit and strength of his adherents were totally broken, and an accommodation with the regent was the only thing which could prevent the ruin of his effate and valials. This was effected without difficulty, and on no unreafonable terms. The duke promifed to acknowledge the authority both of the king and of the regent; and to claim no jurifdiction in confe-quence of the commiffion which he had received from the queen. The regent bound himfelf to repeal the act which had paffed for attainting feveral of the queen's adherents; to reftore all who would fubmit to the king's government to the possession of their estates and honours; and to hold a convention, wherein all the differences between the two parties should be fettled by mutual confent. The duke gave hoftages for his faithful performance of the treaty : and, in token of their fincerity, he and lord Herries accompanied the regent to Stirling, and vifited the young king. The regent fet at liberty the prisoners taken at Langfide 1.

z Haynes, 500. 503. See Append. No. XXXI. killed

B. V.

Argyll and Huntly refufed to be included in this treaty. A fecret negotiaton was carrying on in England, in favour of the captive queen, with fo much fuccefs, that her affairs began to wear a better afpect, and her return into her own kingdom feemed to be an event not very diftant. The French king had lately obtained fuch advantages over the Hugonots, that the extinction of that party appeared to be inevitable, and France, by recovering domefic tranquillity,

<sup>2</sup> Cabbala, 161. Crawf. Mem. 106.

quillity, would be no longer prevented from protecting her friends in Britain. Thefe circumflances not only influenced Argyll and Huntly, but made fo deep an impression on the duke, that he appeared to be wavering and irrefolute, and plainly difcovered that he wifhed to evade the accomplishment of the treaty. The regent faw the danger of allowing the duke to shake himfelf loofe, in this manner, from his engagements; and inftantly formed a refolution equally bold and politic. He commanded his guards to feize Chatelherault in his own house in Edinburgh, whither he had come in order to attend the convention agreed upon; and regardlefs either of his dignity as the first nobleman in the kingdom, and next heir to the crown, or of the promifes of perfonal fecurity, on which he had relied, committed him and lord Herries prifoners to the caftle of Edinburgh b. A blow fo fatal and unexpected difpirited the party. Argyll fubmitted to the king's government, and made his pcace with the regent on very eafy terms; and Huntly, being left alone, was at last obliged to lay down his arms.

Soon after [April 16], lord Boyd returned into Scotland, and brought letters to the regent, both from the English and Scottish queens. A convention was held at Perth [July 21], in order to confider them. Elizabeth's letter contained three different proposals with regard to Mary; that the should either be reftored to the full possession of her former authority; or be admitted to reign jointly with the king her fon;

b Crawf. Mem. 111. Melv. 202.

or at leaft be allowed to refide in Scotland, in fome decent retirement, without any fhare in the administration of government. These overtures were extorted by the importunity of Fenelon the French ambassifiador, and have fome appearance of being favourable to the captive queen. They were, however, perfectly fuitable to Elizabeth's general fystem with regard to Scottish affairs. Among propositions so enequal and disproportionate, she easily faw where the choice would fall. The two former were rejected; and long delays must necessarily have intervened, and many disficulties have arisen, before every circumstance relative to the last could be finally adjusted <sup>c</sup>.

Mary, in her letter, demanded that her marriage with Bothwell fhould be reviewed by the proper judges, and if found invalid, fhould be diffolved by a legal fentence of divorce. This fatal marriage was the principal fource of all the calamities fhe had endured for two years; a divorce was the only thing which could repair the injuries her reputation had fuffered by that ftep. It was her intereft to have propofed it early; and it is not eafy to account for her long filence with refpect to this point. Her particular motive for propofing it at this time began to be fo well known that the demand was rejected by the convention of eftates<sup>4</sup>. They imputed it not fo much to any abhorrence of Bothwell, as to her

C Spotfwood, 230.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. 231. In a privy council, held July 30, 1569, this demand was confidered; and, of fifty-one members prefent, only feven voted to comply with the queen's requeft. Records Priv. Counc. MS. in the Lyon Office, p. 148.

eagernefs

eagerness to conclude a marriage with the duke of Norfolk.

This marriage was the object of that fecret negotiation in England, which I have already mentioned. The fertile and projecting genius of Maitland first conceived this scheme. During the conference at York, he communicated it to the duke himfelf, aud to the bishop of Rofs. The former readily closed with a scheme fo flattering to his ambition. The latter confidered it as a probable device for reftoring his miftrefs to liberty, and replacing her on her throne. Nor was Mary, with whom Norfolk held a correfpondence by means of his fifter lady Scroop, averfe from a meafure, which would have reftored her to her kingdom with fo much fplendour e. The fudden removal of the conference from York to Westminster fuspended, but did not break off this intrigue. Maitland and Rofs were Itill the duke's prompters, and his agents; and many letters and love tokens were exchanged between him and the queen of Scots.

But as hc could not hope, that under an administration fo vigilant as Elizabeth's, fuch an intrigue could be kept long concealed, he attempted to deceive her by the appearance of opennefs and candour, an artifice which feldom fails of fuccefs. He mentioned to her the rumour which was fpread of his marriage with the Scottifh queen; he complained of it as a groundlefs calumny; and difclaimed all thoughts of that kind, with many expressions full of contempt both for Mary's character and dominions. Jealous as Elizabeth was of every thing relative to the queen of Scots, she feems to have credited thefe profeffions f. But, instead of discontinuing the negotiation, he renewed it with greater vigour, and admitted into it new affociates. Among thefe was the regent of Scotland. He had given great offence to Norfolk, by his pub-lic accufation of the queen, in breach of the concert into which he had entered at York. He was then ready to return into Scotland. The influence of the duke in the north of England was great. The earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, the most powerful noblemen in that part of the kingdom, threatened to revenge upon the regent the injuries which he had done his fovereign. Murray, in order to fecure a fafe return into Scotland, addreffed himfelf to Norfolk, and after fome apology for his paft conduct, he infinuated that the duke's fcheme of marrying the queen his fifter was no lefs acceptable to him than beneficial to both kingdoms; and that he would concur with the utmost ardour in promoting fo defirable an event g. Norfolk heard him with the credulity natural to those who are passionately bent upon any design. He wrote to the two earls to desist from any hostile attempt against Murray, and to that he owed his passage through the norther counties without disturbance.

* Camd. 419. Haynes, 573. State Trials, i. 73. both

Encouraged by his fuccels in gaining the regent, he next attempted to draw the English .

f Haynes, 574. State Trials, i. 79, 80. 3 Anderf. iii. 34.

nobles

uobles to approve his defign. The nation began to defpair of Elizabeth's marrying. Her jea-loufy kept the question with regard to the right of fucceffion undecided. The memory of the civil wars, which had defolated England for more than a century, on account of the disputed titles of the houses of York and Lancaster, was still recent. Almost all the ancient nobility had perished, and the nation itself had been brought to the brink of destruction in that unhappy conteft. The Scottifh queen, though her right of fucceffion was generally held to be undoubted, might meet with formidable competitors. She might marry a foreign and a popilh prince, and bring both liberty and religion into danger. But, by marrying her to an Englishman, a zealous protestant, the most powerful and most univerfally beloved of all the nobility, an effectual remedy feemed to be provided against all these evils. The greater part of the peers, either directly or tacitly, approved of it, as a falutary project. The earls of Arundel, Pembroke, Leicester, and lord Lumley, subscribed a letter to the Scottish queen, written with Leicester's hand, in which they warmly recommended the match, but infifted, by way of preliminary, on Mary's promife that fhe fhould attempt nothing, in confequence of her pretensions to the English crown, prejudicial to Elizabeth, or to her pofterity; that she should confent to a league, offenfive and défenfive, between the two king-doms; that she should confirm the present es-tablishment of religion in Scotland; and receive into favour fuch of her fubjects as had appeared in arms against her. Upon her agreeing to the marriage marriage and ratifying thefe articles, they engaged that the Englifh nobles would not only concur in reftoring her immediately to her own throne, but in fecuring to her that of England in reversion. Mary readily confented to all thefe propofals, except the fecond, with regard to which she demanded fome time for confulting her ancient ally the French king <sup>h</sup>.

The whole of this negotiation was industrioufly concealed from Elizabeth. Her jealoufy of the Scottish queen was well known, nor could it be expected that fhe would willingly come into a measure, which tended fo visibly to fave the reputation, and to increase the power of her rival. But, in a matter of fo much confequence to the nation, the taking a few fteps without her knowledge could hardly be reckoned criminal; and while every perfon concerned, even Mary and Norfolk themfelves, declared that nothing flould be concluded without obtaining her confent, the duty and allegiance of fubjects feemed to be fully preferved. The greater part of the nobles regarded the matter in this light. Those who conducted the intrigue, had farther and more dangerous views. They faw the advantages which Mary would obtain by this treaty, to be prefent and certain; and the execution of the promifes which the came under, to be diftant and uncertain. They had early communicated their fcheme to the kings of France and Spain, and obtained their approbation 1. A treaty concerning which they confulted foreign princes, while they concealed it h Anderson, vol. iii. 51. Camd. 420.

p

i Anderf. vol. iii. 63. VOL. 11.

from their own fovereign, could not be deemed innocent. They hoped, however, that the union of fuch a number of the chief perfons in the kingdom would render it neceffary for Elizabeth to comply; they flattered themfelves that a combination fo ftrong would be altogether irrefiftible; and fuch was their confidence of fuccefs, that when a plan was concerted in the north of England for refcuing Mary out of the hands of her keepers, Norfolk, who was afraid that if the recovered her liberty, her fentiments in his favour might change, ufed all his interest to diffuade the confpirators from attempting it k.

. In this fituation did the affair remain, when lord Boyd arrived from England; and, befides the letters which he produced publicly, brought others in cyphers from Norfolk and Throkmorton to the regent, and to Maitland. Thefe were full of the most fanguine hopes. All the nobles of England concurred, faid they, in favouring the defign. Every preliminary was adjusted; nor was it poffible that a fcheme fo deep laid, conducted with fo much art, and supported both by power and by numbers, could mifcarry, or be defeated in the execution. Nothing now was wanting but the concluding ceremony. It depended on the regent to haften that, by procuring a fentence of divorce, which would remove the only obstacle that stood in the way. This was expected of him, in confequence of his promife to Norfolk; and if he regarded either his interest or his fame, or even his fafety, he would not fail to fulfil these engagements 1.

k Camd. 420. 1 Haynes, 520. Spotfw. 230. See Appendix, No. XXXII.

But

But the regent was now in very different circumftances from those which had formerly induced him to affect an approbation of Norfolk's schemes. He faw that the downfal of his own power muft be the first confequence of the duke's fuccefs; and if the queen, who confidered him as the chief author of all her misfortunes, should recover her ancient authority, he could never expect favour, nor fcarce hope for impunity. No wonder he declined a step fo fatal to himfelf, and which would have eftablished the grandeur of another on the ruins of his own. This refufal occafioned a delay. But, as every other circumstance was fettled, the bishop of Rofs, in the name of his mistrefs, and the duke, in perfon, declared, in prefence of the French ambaffador, their mutual confent to the marriage, and a contract to this purpofe was figned, and intrusted to the keeping of the ambaffador m.

The intrigue was now in fo many hands, that it could not long remain a fecret. It began to be whifpered at court; and Elizabeth calling the duke into her prefence [Aug. 13], expreffed the utmost indignation at his conduct, and charged him to lay aside all thoughts of profecuting fuch a dangerous defign. Soon after Leicester, who perhaps had countenanced the project with no other intention, revealed all the circumstances of it to the queen. Pembroke, Arundel, Lumley, and Throkmorton, were confined and examined. Mary was watched more narrowly than ever; and Hastings earl of Huntingdon, who pretended to dispute with the > m Carte, vol. iii. 486. P 2

Scottifh

Scottish queen her right to the fuccession, being joined in commission with Shrewsbury, rendered her imprisonment more intolerable, by the ex-cess of his vigilance and rigour ". The Scottish regent, threatened with Elizabeth's difpleafure, meanly betrayed the duke; put his letters into her hands, and furnished all the intelligence in his power ?. The duke himfelf retired first to Howard-houfe, and then, in contempt of the fummons to appear before the privy council, fled to his feat in Norfolk. Intimidated by the imprifonment of his affociates; coldly received by his friends in that . country ; unprepared for a rebellion ; and unwilling perhaps to rebel ; he hefitated for fome days, and at last obeyed a fecond call, and repaired to Windfor [Oct. 3]. He was first kept as a prisoner in a private house, and then fent to the Tower. After being confined there upwards of nine months, he was releafed upon his humble fubmiffion to Elizabeth, giving her a promife, on his allegiance, to hold no farther correspondence with the queen of Scots P. During the progress of Norfolk's negotiations, the queen's partifans in Scotland, who made no doubt of their iffuing in her reftoration to the throne, with an increase of authority, were wonderfully elevated. Maitland was the foul of that party, and the perfon whofe activity and ability the regent chiefly dreaded. He had laid the plan of that intrigue which had kindled fuch combustion in England. He continued to foment the fpirit of difaffection in Scotland, and had feduced from the regent n Haynes, 525, 526. 530. 532.

See Append. No. XXXIII.

P Haynes, 525. 597. lord

B. V.

lord Home, Kirkaldy, and feveral of his former affociates. While he enjoyed liberty, the regent could not reckon his own power fecure. For this reafon, having by an artifice allured Maitland to Stirling, he employed captain Crawford, one of his creatures, to accufe him of being acceffory to the murder of the king ; and under that pretence he was arrefted and carried as a prifoner to Edinburgh. He would foon have been brought to trial, but was faved by the friendship of Kirkaldy, governor of the caftle, who, by pretending a warrant for that purpofe from the regent, got him out of the hands of the perfon to whole care he was committed, and conducted him into the caftle, which from that time was entirely under Maitland's command 9. The lofs of a place of fo much importance, and the defection of a man fo eminent for military skill as Kirkaldy, brought the regent into fome difreputation, for which, however, the fuccefs of his ally Elizabeth, about this time, abundantly compensated.

The intrigue carried on for reftoring the Scottifh queen to liberty having been difcovered, and difappointed, an attempt was made to the fame purpole by force of arms; but the iffue of it was not more fortunate. The earls of Northumberland and Weftmorland, though little diftinguifhed by their perfonal abilities, were two of the moft ancient and powerful of the Englifh peers. Their eftates in the northern counties were great, and they poffeffed that influence over the inhabitants, which was hereditary in the popular and martial families of Percy and of

> 9 Spotfw. 232. P 3

Nevil,

B. V.

Nevil. They were both attached to the popifh religion, and difcontented with the court, where new men and a new fystem prevailed. Ever fince Mary's arrival in England, they had warmly espouled her interest; and zeal for popery, oppolition to the court, and commileration of her fufferings, had engaged them in different plots for her relief. Notwithstanding the vigilance of her keepers, they held a close correspondence with her, and communicated to her all their defigns '. They were privy to Norfolk's schemes; but the caution with which he proceeded did not fuit their ardour and impetuofity. The liberty of the Scottish queen was not their fole object. They aimed at bringing about a change in the religion, and a revolution in the government of the kingdom. For this reason they folicited the aid of the king of Spain, the avowed and zealous patron of popery in that age. Nothing could be more delightful to the reftlefs spirit of Philip, or more necessary towards facilitating his fchemes in the Netherlands, than the involving England in the confusion and miseries of a civil war. The duke of Alva, by his direction, encouraged the two earls, and promifed, as foon as they either took the field with their forces, or furprifed any place of ftrength, or refcued the queen of Scots, that he would fupply them both with money and a ftrong body of troops. La Mothe, the governor of Dunkirk, in the difguife of a failor, founded the ports where it would be most proper to land. And Chiapini Vitelli, one of Alva's ableft officers, was

> Haynes, 595. Murdin, 44. 62, &c. difpatched

difpatched into England, on pretence of fettling fome commercial differences between the two nations; but in reality that the rebels might be fure of a leader of experience, as foon as they ventured to take arms<sup>5</sup>.

The conduct of this negotiation occasioned many meetings and meffages between the two earls. Elizabeth was informed of thefe; and though the fuspected nothing of their real defign, the concluded that they were among the number of Norfolk's confidents. They were fummoned, for this reafon, to repair to court. Confcious of guilt, and afraid of difcovery, they delayed giving obedience. A fecond, and more peremptory order was iffued [Nov. 9]. This they could not decline, without shaking off their allegiance ; and as no time was left for deliberation, they inftantly erected their flandard against their fovereign. The re-establishing the catholic religion; the fettling the order of fucceffion to the crown ; the defence of the ancient nobility ; were the motives which they alleged to justify their rebellion t. Many of the lower people flocked to them with fuch arms as they could procure; and had the capacity of their leaders been in any degree equal to the enterprife, it must have foon grown to be extremely formidable. Elizabeth acted with prudence and vigour ; and was ferved by her fubjects with fidelity and ardour. On the first rumour of an infurrection, Mary was removed to Coventry, a place of strength, which could not be taken without a regular

s Carte, vol. iii. 489, 490. Camd. 421.

Strype, vol. i. 547.

164

B. V.

regular fiege ; a detachment of the rebels, which was fent to refcue her, returned without fuccefs. Troops were affembled in different parts of the kingdom; as they advanced, the malecontents retired. In their retreat their numbers dwindled away, and their fpirits funk. Defpair and uncertainty whither to direct their flight, kept together for fome time a fmall body of them among the mountains of Northumberland ; but they were at length obliged to difperfe, and the chiefs took refuge among the Scottifh borderers. The two earls, together with the counters of Northumberland, wandering for fome days in the waftes of Liddifdale, were plundered by the banditti [Dec. 21], exposed to the rigour of the feason, and left destitute of the necessaries of life. Westmorland was concealed by Scot of Buccleugh and Ker of Ferniherst, and afterwards conveyed into the Netherlands. Northumberland was feized by the regent, who had marched with fome troops towards the borders to prevent any impression the rebels might make on those mutinous provinces 4.

Amidft fo many furprifing events, the affairs of the church, for two years, have almoft efcaped our notice. Its general affemblies were held regularly; but no bufinefs of much importance employed their attention. As the number of the proteftant clergy daily increased, the deficiency of the funds let apart for their fubfiftence became greater, and was more fenfibly felt. Many efforts were made towards recovering the ancient patrimony of the church, or at leaft as much of it as was posselied by the popish incumbents, a race of men who were now not only useless but burdensome to the nation. But though the manner in which the regent received the addresses and complaints of the general assessment of the general of the general assessment of the general of the general remedy was provided; and while they fuffered intolerable opprefilion, and groaned under extreme poverty, fair words, and liberal promises, were all they were able to obtain *.

" Cabbala, 171. Camd. 422.

1570.] Elizabeth now began to be weary of keeping fuch a prifoner as the queen of Scots. During the former year, the tranquillity of her government had been difturbed, first by a fecret combination of fome of her nobles, then by the rebellion of others; and she often declared, not without reason, that Mary was the hidden cause of both. Many of her own fubjects favoured or pitied the captive queen; the Roman catholic princes on the continent were warmly interested in her caufe. The detaining her any longer in England, the forefaw, would be made the pretext or occasion of perpetual cabals and infurrections among the former; and might expose her to the holtile attempts of the latter. She refolved, therefore, to give up Mary into the hands of the regent, after stipulating with him, not only that her days should not be cut short, either by a judicial fentence or by fecret violence, but that she should be treated in a manner fuited to her rank; and in order to fecure his observance of this, she required that fix of the chief noblemen in the kingdom should be

* Cald. vol. ii. 80, &c.

fent into England as hoftages y. With refpect to the fafe cuftody of the queen, fhe relied on Murray's vigilance, whofe fecurity, no lefs than her own, depended on preventing Mary from re-afcending the throne. The negotiation for this purpote was carried fome length, when it was difcovered by the vigilance of the bifhop of Rofs, who, together with the French and Spanish ambassadors, remonstrated against the infamy of fuch an action, and reprefented the furrendering the queen to her rebellious fubjects, to be the fame thing as if Elizabeth should, by her own authority, condemn her to inftant death. This procured a delay; and the murder of the regent prevented the revival of that defign 2.

Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh was the perfon who committed this barbarous action. He had been condemned to death foon after the battle of Langfide, as I have already related, and owed his life to the regent's clemency. But part of his eftate had been beftowed upon one of the regent's favourites, who feized his houfe, and turned out his wife naked, in a cold night, into the open fields, where, before next morning, fhe became furioufly mad. This injury made a deeper impreffion upon him than the benefit which he had received, and from that moment he vowed to be revenged upon the regent. Party-rage ftrengthened and inflamed his private resentment. His kinsmen the Hamiltons applauded the enterprife. The maxims of that age juftified the most desperate course which he could

y Haynes, 524.

z Carte, vol. iii. 491. Anderf. vol. iii. 84.

take

1570.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

take to obtain vengeance. He followed the regent for fome time, and watched for an opportunity to ftrike the blow. He refolved at laft to wait till his enemy should arrive at Linlithgow, through which he was to pais in his way from Stirling to Edinburgh. He took his ftand in a wooden gallery, which had a window to-wards the ftreet; fpread a feather-bed on the floor, to hinder the noifc of his feet from being heard; hung up a black cloth behind him, that his shadow might not be observed from without; and after all this preparation, calmly expected the regent's approach, who had lodged during the night in a part of the town not far diftant. Some indiffinct information of the danger which threatened him had been conveyed to the regent, and he paid fo much regard to it, that he refolved to return by the fame gate through which he had entered, and to fetch a compais round the town. But as the crowd about the gate was great, and he himfelf unacquainted with fear, he proceeded directly along the ftreet; and the throng of the people obliging him to move very flowly, gave the affaffin time to take fo true an aim, that he fhot him with a fingle bullet through the lower part of his belly, and killed the horfe of a gentleman who rode on his other fide. His followers instantly endeavoured to break into the horfe whence the blow had come, but they found the door ftrongly barricaded; and before it could be forced open, Hamilton had mounted a fleet horfe, which flood ready for him at a back paffage, and was got far beyond their reach. The regent died the fame night of his wound a.

<sup>a</sup> Buchan. 385. Crawf. Mem, 124. Cabbala, 171. There

B. V.

There is no perfon in that age about whom historians have been more divided, or whose character has been drawn with fuch opposite colours. Perfonal intrepidity, nilitary skill, fagacity, and vigour in the administration of civil affairs, are virtues, which even his enemies al-low him to have posses are more dubious, and ought neither to be praifed nor cenfured without great referve, and many diffinctions. In a fierce age he was capable of using victory with humanity, and of treating the vanquished with moderation. A patron of learning, which, among martial nobles, was either unknown, or despised. Zealous for religion, to a degree which diftinguithed him, even at a time when professions of that kind were not uncommon. His confidence in his friends was extreme, and inferior only to his liberality towards them, which knew no bounds. A difinterested paffion for the liberty of his country, prompted him to oppose the pernicious fystem which the princes of Lorrain had obliged the queen-mother to purfue. On Mary's return into Scotland he ferved her with a zeal and affection, to which he facrificed the friendship of those who were most attached to his perfon. But, on the other hand, his ambition was immoderate; and events happened that opened to him vaft projects, which allured his enterprifing genius, and led him to actions inconfiftent with the duty of a fubject. His treatment of the queen, to whofe bounty he was fo much indebted, was unbrotherly and ungrateful. The depend-ence on Elizabeth, under which he brought Scotland, was difgraceful to the nation. He deceived and betrayed Norfolk with a bafenefs unwor-3 unworthy of a man of honour. His elevation to fuch unexpected dignity infpired him with new paffions, with haughtiness and referve; and inftead of his natural manner, which was blunt and open, he affected the arts of diffimulation and refinement. Fond, towards the end of his life, of flattery, and impatient of advice, his creatures, by foothing his vanity led him aftray, while his ancient friends flood at a diftance, and predicted his approaching fall. But amidft the turbulence and confusion of that factious period, he dispensed. justice with fo much impartiality, he represed the licentious borderers with fo much courage, and established fuch uncommon order and tranquillity in the country, that his administration was extremely popular, and he was long and affectionately remembered among the commons, by the name of the Good Regent.

160

BOOK VI.

THE unexpected blow, by which the regent was cut off, ftruck the king's party with the utmoft confternation. Elizabeth bewailed his death as the moft fatal difafter which could have befallen her kingdom; and was inconfolable to a degree that little fuited her dignity. Mary's adherents exulted, as if now her reftoration were not only certain, but near at hand. The infamy of the crime naturally fell on those who exprefied fuch indecent joy at the commission of . VOL. 11.

it; and as the affaffin made his efcape on a horfe which belonged to lord Claud Hamilton, and fled directly to Hamilton, where he was received in triumph, it was concluded that the regent had fallen a facrifice to the refentment of the queen's party, rather than to the revenge of a private man. On the day after the murder, Scott of Buccleugh, and Ker of Ferniherft, both zealous abettors of the queen's caufe, entered England in an hoftile manner, and plundered and burnt the country, the inhabitants of which expected no fuch outrage. If the regent had been alive, they would fearce have ventured on fuch an irregular incursion, nor could it well have happened fo foon after his death, unless they had been privy to the crime.

This was not the only irregularity to which the anarchy that followed the regent's death gave occafion. During fuch general confusion, men hoped for univerfal impunity, and broke out into exceffes of every kind. As it was impoffible to restrain these without a settled form of government, a convention of the nobles was held [Feb. 12], in order to deliberate concerning the election of a regent. The queen's adherents refufed to be prefent at the meeting, and protofted against its proceedings. The king's own party was irrefolute and divided in opinion. Maitland, whom Kirkaldy had fet at liberty, and who obtained from the nobles then affembled a declaration acquitting him of the crime which had been laid to his charge, endeavoured to bring about a coalition of the two parties, by propoling to ad-mit the queen to the joint administration of government with her fon. Elizabeth, adhering to her her ancient fyftem with regard to Scottifh affairs, laboured, notwithftanding the folicitations of Mary's friends <sup>a</sup>, to multiply, and to perpetuate the factions, which tore in pieces the kingdom. Randolph, whom fhe difpatched into Scotland on the firft news of the regent's death, and who was her ufual agent for fuch fervices, found all parties fo exafperated by mutual injuries, and to full of irreconcileable rancour, that it coft him little trouble to inflame their animofity. The convention broke up without coming to any agreement; and a new meeting, to which the nobles of all parties were invited, was appointed on the firft of May <sup>b</sup>.

Meantime, Maitland and Kirkaldy, who ftill continued to acknowledge the king's authority, were at the utmost pains to restore fome degree of harmony among their countrymen. They procured, for this purpofe, an amicable conference among the leaders of the two factions. But while the one demanded the reftoration of the queen, as the only thing which could reeftablish the public tranquillity ; while the other efteemed the king's authority to be fo facred, that it was, on no account, to be called in question or impaired; and neither of them would recede in the least point from their opinions, they feparated without any profpect of concord. Both were rendered more averse from reconcilement. by the hope of foreign aid. An envoy arrived from France with promifes of powerful fuccour to the queen's adherents; and as the civil wars

<sup>a</sup> Sce Appendix, No. XXXIV.

b Crawf. Mem. 131. Calderw. ii. 157.

Q 2

in that kingdom feemed to be on the point of terminating in peace, it was expected that Charles would foon be at liberty to fulfil what he promifed. On the other hand, the earl of Suffex was affembling a powerful army on the borders, and its operations could not fail of adding fpirit and ftrength to the king's party <sup>c</sup>.

Though the attempt towards a coalition of the factions proved ineffectual, it contributed fomewhat to moderate or fuspend their rage; but they foon began to act with their usual violence. Morton, the most vigilant and able leader on the king's fide, folicited Elizabeth to interpofe, without delay, for the fafety of a party fo devoted to her interest, and which stood fo much in need of her affiftance. The chiefs of the queen's factions, affembling at Linlithgow, marched thence to Edinburgh [April 10]; and Kirkaldy, who was both governor of the caftle and provoft of the town, prevailed on the citizens, though with fome difficulty, to admit them within the gates. Together with Kirkaldy, the earl of Athole and Maitland acceded almost openly to their party ; and the duke and lord Herries, having recovered liberty by Kirkaldy's favour, refumed the places which they had formerly held in their councils. Encouraged by the acquifition of perfons fo illustrious by their birth, or fo eminent for their abilities, they published a proclamation, declaring their intention to fupport the queen's authority, and feemed refolved not to leave the city before the meeting of the approaching convention, in which, by c Crawf. Mem. 134.

their

their numbers and influence, they did not doubt of fecuring a majority of voices on their fide d.

At the fame time they had formed a defign of kindling war between the two kingdoms. If they could engage them in hoftilities, and revive their ancient emulation and antipathy, they hoped, not only to diffolve a confederacy of great advantage to the king's caufe, but to reconcile their countrymen to the queen, Elizabeth's natural and most dangerous rival. With this view, they had, immediately after the murder of the regent, prompted Scot and Ker to commence hostilities, and had fince instigated them to continue and extend their depredations. As Elizabeth forefaw, on the one hand, the dangerous confequences of rendering this a national quarrel; and refolved, on the other, not to fuffer fuch an infult on her government to pafs with impunity; fhe iffued a proclamation, deelaring that the imputed the outrages which had been committed on the borders not to the Scottifh nation, but to a few defperate and ill-defigning perfons; that, with the former, fhe was refolved to maintain an inviolable friendship. whereas the duty which flie owed to her own fubjects obliged her to chaftife the licentioufnefs of the latter . Suffex and Scroop accordingly entered Scotland, the one on the eaft, the other on the west borders, and laid waste the adjacent countries with fire and fword f. Fame magnified the number and progrefs of their troops, and Mary's adherents, not thinking themfelves fafe in Edinburgh, the inhabitants whereof were ill

d Crawf. Mem. 137. Calderw. ii. 176. f Cabbala, 174.

e Calderw, ii. 181.

Q 3

affected

174

affected to their eaufc, retired to Linlithgow [April 28]. There, by a public proclamation, they afferted the queen's authority, and forbad giving obedience to any but the duke, or the carls of Argyll and Huntly, whom fhe had conflituted her lieutenants in the kingdom.

The nobles who continued faithful to the king, though confiderably weakened by the defection of fo many of their friends, affembled at Edinburgh on the day appointed [May 1]. They iffued a counter-proclamation, declaring fuch as appeared for the queen enemies of their country; and charging them with the murder both of the late king and of the regent. They could not, however, prcfume fo much on their own ftrength as to venture either to elect a regent, or to take the field against the queen's party; but the aftiftance which they received from Elizabeth, enabled them to do both. By her order fir William Drury marched into Scotland, with a thousand foot and three hundred horse; the king's adherents joined him with a confiderable body of troops, and advancing towards Glafgow, where the adverfe party had already begun hoftilities by attacking the caffle, they forced them to retire, plundered the neighbouring country, which belonged to the Hamiltons, and, after feizing fome of their caffles, and rafing others, returned to Edinburgh.

Under Drury's protection, the earl of Lennox returned into Scotland. It was natural to commit the government of the kingdom to him during the minority of his grandfon. His illustrious birth, and alliance with the royal family of England, as well as of Scotland, rendered him worthy of of that honour. His refentment against Mary being implacable, and his eftate lying in England, and his family refiding there, Elizabeth confidered him as a man who, both from inclination and from interest, would act in concert with her, and ardently wished that he might fucceed Murray in the office of regent. But, on many accounts, fhe did not think it prudent to discover her own sentiments, or to favour his pretenfions too openly. The civil wars in France, which had been excited partly by real and partly by pretended zeal for religion, and carried on with a fiercenefs that did it real difhonour, appeared now to be on the point of coming to an iffue; and after fhedding the beft blood, and wafting the richeft provinces in the kingdom, both parties defired peace with an ar-dour that facilitated the negotiations which were carrying on for that purpose. Charles IX. was known to be a passionate admirer of Mary's beauty. Nor could he, in honour, fuffer a queen of France, and the most ancient ally of his crown, to languish in her prefent cruel situation without attempting to procure her relief. He had hitherto been obliged to fatisfy himfelf with remon-Itrating, by his ambaffadors, against the indignity with which fhe had been treated. But if he were once at full liberty to purfue his inclina. tions, Elizabeth would have every thing to dread from the impetuofity of his temper and the power of his arms. It therefore became necessary for her to act with fome referve, and not to appear avowedly to countenance the choice of a regent, in contempt of Mary's authority. The jealoufy and prejudices of the Scots required no lefs manage-management. Had fhe openly fupported Lennox's claim; had fhe recommended him to the convention, as the candidate of whom the approved ; this might have roufed the independent spirit of the nobles, and by too plain a difcovery of her intention, fhe might have defeated its fuccefs. For thefe reafons the hefitated long, and returned ambiguous anfwers to all the meffages which the received from the king's party. A more explicit declaration of her fentiments was at last obtained, and an event of an extraordinary nature feems to have been the occasion of it. Pope Pius V. having iffued a bull, whereby he excommunicated Elizabeth, deprived her of her kingdom, and abfolved her fubjects from their oath of allegiance, Felton, an Englishman, had the boldnefs to affix it on the gates of the bishop of London's palace. In former ages, a pope, moved by his own ambition, or pride, or bigotry, denounced this fatal fentence against the most powerful monarchs; but as the authority of the court of Rome was now lefs regarded, its proceedings were more cautious; and it was only when they were roufed by fome powerful prince, that the thunders of the church were ever heard. Elizabeth, therefore, imputed this ftep, which the pope had taken, to a combination of the Roman catholic princes against her, and fuspected that some plot was formed in favour of the Scottish queen. In that event, she knew that the fafety of her own kingdom depended on preferving her influence in Scotland; and in order to ftrengthen this, fhe renewed her promifes of protecting the king's adherents, encouraged them to proceed to the election of a regent, regent, and even ventured to point out the earl of Lennox, as the perfon who had the beft title. That honour was accordingly conferred upon him, in a convention of the whole party, held on the 12th of July<sup>8</sup>.

B. VI.

The regent's first care was, to prevent the meeting of the parliament which the queen's party had fummoned to convene at Linlithgow. Having effected that, he marched against the earl of Huntly, Mary's lieutenant in the north, and forced the garrifon which he had placed in Brechin to furrender at difcretion. Soon after, he made himfelf master of fome other castles. Emboldened by this fuccessful beginning of his administration, as well as by the appearance of a confiderable army, with which the earl of Suffex hovered on the borders, he deprived Maitland of his office of fecretary, and proclaimed him, the duke, Huntly, and other leaders of the queen's party, traitors and enemies of their country <sup>h</sup>.

In this defperate fituation of their affairs, the queen's adherents had recourfe to the king of Spain<sup>i</sup>, with whom Mary had held a clofe correfpondence ever fince her confinement in England. They prevailed on the duke of Alva to fend two of his officers to take a view of the country, and to examine its coafts and harbours : and obtained from them a fmall fupply of money and arms, which were fent to the earl of Huntly<sup>k</sup>. But this aid, fo difproportionate to their exigencies, would have availed them little. They were indebted for their fafety to a treaty, which

<sup>g</sup> Spotfw. 240. Cald. ii. 186. See Append. No. XXXV. <sup>h</sup> Crawf. Mem. 159. Cald. ii. 198. <sup>i</sup> See Append. No. XXXVI. <sup>k</sup> Anderf. iii. 122. Crawf. Mem. 153. Elizabeth

178

Elizabeth was carrying on, under colour of reftoring the captive queen to her throne. The first steps in this negotiation had been taken in the month of May; but hitherto little progrefs was made in it. The peace concluded between the Roman catholics and hugonots in France, and her apprehenfions that Charles would interpole with vigour in behalf of his fifter-in-law, quickened Elizabeth's motions. She affected to treat her prifoner with more indulgence, fhe listened more graciously to the folicitations of foreign ambaffadors in her favour, and feemed fully determined to replace her on the throne of her anceftors. As a proof of her fincerity, fhe laboured to procure a ceffation of arms between the two contending factions in Scotland. Lennox, elated with the good fortune which had hitherto attended his administration, and flattering himfelf with an eafy triumph over enemies whole eftates were walted, and their forces difpirited, refused for some time to come into this measure. It was not fafe for him, however, to dispute the will of his protectrefs. A ceffation of hoftilities during two months, to commence on the third of September, was agreed upon; and, being renewed from time to time, it continued till the first of April next year 1.

Soon after, Elizabeth difpatched Cecil and Sir Walter Mildmay to the queen of Scots. The dignity of thefe ambafiadors, the former her prime minifter, the latter chancellor of the exchequer, and one of her ableft counfellors, convinced all parties that the negotiation was 1 Spotfw. 243.

ferious,

B. VI.

ferious, and that the hour of Mary's liberty was now approaching. The propositions which they made to her were advantageous to Elizabeth, but fuch as a prince in Mary's fituation had reafon to expect. The ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh; the renouncing any pretenfions to the English crown, during Eliza, beth's own life, or that of her posterity; the adhering to the alliance between the two kingdoms; the pardoning her subjects who had taken arms against her; and her promising to hold no correspondence, and to countenance no enterprife, that might disturb Elizabeth's government; were among the chief articles. By way of fecurity for the accomplifhment of thefe, they demanded that fome perfons of rank fhould be given as hoftages, that the prince her fon should refide in England, and that a few caftles on the border should be put into Elizabeth's hands. To some of these propositions Mary confented ; fome she endeavoured to mitigate; and others fhe attempted to evade. In the mean time, she transmitted copies of them to the pope, to the kings of France and Spain, and to the duke of Alva. She infinuated, that without fome timely and vigorous interpolition in her behalf, he would be obliged to accept of thefe hard conditions, and to purchase liberty at any price. But the pope was a diftant and feeble ally, and by his great efforts at this time against the Turks, his treasury was entirely exhausted. Charles had already begun to meditate that confpiracy against the hugonots, which marks his reign with fuch infamy; and it required much leifure, and perfect tranquillity, to bring that execrable execrable plan to maturity. Philip was employed in fitting out that fleet which acquired fo much renown to the Chriftian arms, by the victory over the infidels at Lepanto; the Moors in Spain threatened an infurrection; and his fubjects in the Netherlands, provoked by much opprefilon and many indignities, were breaking out into open rebellion. All of them, for thefe different reafons, advifed Mary, without depending on their aid, to conclude the treaty on the belt terms fhe could procure<sup>m</sup>.

Mary accordingly confented to many of Elizabeth's demands, and difcovered a facility of difpolition, which promifed still further conceffions. But no conceffion the could have made, would have fatisfied Elizabeth, who, in fpite of her repeated professions of fincerity to foreign ambaffadors, and notwithftanding the folemnity with which fhe carried on the treaty, had no other object in it, than to amufe Mary's allies, and to gain timen. After having fo long treated a queen, who fled to her for refuge, in fo ungenerous a manner, she could not now difmifs her with fafety. Under all the difadvantages of a rigorous confinement, Mary had found means to excite commotions in England, which were extremely formidable. What defperate effects of her just refentment might be expected, if she were set at liberty, and recovered her former power? What engagements could bind her, not to revenge the wrongs which fhe had fuffered, nor to take advantage of the favourable conjunctures that might prefent themfelves?

m Anderf, vol. iii. 119, 120. n Digges, Compl. Amb. 78. Was Was it poffible for her to give fuch fecurity for her behaviour, in times to come, as might remove all fufpicions and fears? And was there not good caufe to conclude, that no future benefits could ever obliterate the memory of past injuries? It was thus Elizabeth reafoned; though the continued to act as if her views had been entirely different. She appointed feven of her privy counfellors to be commissioners for fettling the articles of the treaty; and, as Mary had already named the bishops of Ross and Galloway, and lord Levingston, for her ambaffadors, the required the regent to impower proper perfons to appear in behalf of the king. The earl of Morton, Pitcairn abbot of Dunfermling, and fir James Macgill, were the perfons chofen by the regent. They prepared for their journey as flowly as Elizabeth herfelf could have wished. At length they arrived at London [Feb. 19, 1571], and met the commissioners of the two queens. Mary's ambaffadors difcovered the ftrongeft inclination to comply with every thing that would remove the obstacles which stood in the way of their miftrefs's liberty. But when Morton and his affociates were called upon to vindicate their conduct, and to explain the fentiments of their party, they began, in justification of their treatment of the queen, to advance fuch maxims concerning the limited powers of princes, and the natural right of fubjects to refift and to control them, as were extremely fhocking to Elizabeth, whole notions of regal prerogative, as has been formerly obferved, were very exalted. With regard to the authority which the king now poffeffed, they declared VOL. II. that R that they neither had, nor could poffibly receive instructions, to confent to any treaty that tended to fubvert, or even to impair it in the leaft degree°. Nothing could be more trifling and ridiculous, than fuch a reply from the commiffioners of the king of Scots to the queen of England. His party depended abfolutely on her protection ; it was by perfons devoted to her he had been feated on the throne, and to her power he owed the continuance of his reign. With the utmost ease she could have brought them to hold very different language; and whatever conditions the might have thought fit to prefcribe, they would have had no other choice but to fubmit. This declaration, however, the affected to confider as an infuperable difficulty; and finding that there was no reafon to dread any danger from the French king, who had not difcovered that eagerness in support of Mary which was expected, the reply made by Morton [March 24] furnished her with a pretence for putting a ftop to the negotiation, until the regent should fend ambaffadors with more ample powers. Thus, after being amufed for ten months with the hopes of liberty, the unhappy queen of Scots remained under ftricter cuftody than ever, and without any profpect of efcaping from it; while those subjects who still adhered to her were exposed, without ally or protector, to the rage of enemies, whom their fuccefs in this negotiation rendered still more infolent P.

On the day after the expiration of the truce, which had been obferved with little exactnels

. On

• Cald. ii. 234. Digges, 51. Haynes, 523, 524. P And. iii. 91, &c.

on either fide, captain Crawford of Jordan-hill, a gallant and enterprifing officer, performed a fervice of great importance to the regent, by furprifing the caffle of Dunbarton. This was the only fortified place in the kingdom, of which the queen had kept poffeffion ever fince the commencement of the civil wars. Its fituation on the top of an high and almost inacceffible rock, which rifes in the middle of a plain, rendered it extremely ftrong, and, in the opinion of that age, impregnable; as it commanded the river Clyde it was of great confequence, and was deemed the most proper place in the king-dom for landing any foreign troops that might come to Mary's aid. The ftrength of the place rendered lord Fleming, the governor, more fecure than he ought to have been, confidering its importance. A foldier who had ferved in the garrifon, and had been difgusted by fome ill ulage, proposed the scheme to the regent, endeavoured to demonstrate that it was practicable, and offered himfelf to go the foremost man on the enterprife. It was thought prudent to rifk any danger for fo great a prize. Scaling-ladders, and whatever elfe might be necessary, were prepared with the utmost fecrecy and difpatch. All the avenues to the caftle were feized, that no intelligence of the defign might reach the governor. Towards evening Crawford marched from Glafgow with a fmall but determined band. By midnight they arrived at the bottom of the rock. The moon was fet, and the fky, which hitherto had been extremely clear, was covered with a thick fog. It was where the rock was highest that the affailants made their attempt, becaufe

B. VI.

because in that place there were few centinels, and they hoped to find them leaft alert. The first ladder was fcarcely fixed, when the weight and eagernefs of thofe who mounted, brought it to the ground. None of the affailants were hurt by the fall, and none of the garrifon alarmed at the noife. Their guide and Crawford fcrambled up the rock, and fastened the ladder to the roots of a tree which grew in a cleft. This place they all reached with the utmost difficulty, but were still at a great diftance from the foot of the wall. Their ladder was made fast a fecond time; but in the middle of the afcent, they met with an unforefeen difficulty. One of their companions was feized with fome fudden fit, and clung, feemingly without life, to the ladder. All were at a stand. It was impoffible to pafs him. To tumble him headlong was cruel; and might occasion a difcovery. But Crawford's prefence of mind did not forfake him. He ordered the foldier to be bound fast to the ladder, that he might not fall when the fit was over; and turning the other fide of the ladder, they mounted with thefe over his belly. Day now began to break, and there ftill remained a high wall to fcale; but after furmounting fo many great difficulties, this was foon accomplified. A fentry obferved the first man who appeared on the parapet, and had just time to give the alarm, before he was knocked on the head. The officers and foldiers of the garrifon ran out naked, unarmed, and more folicitous about their own fafety, than capable of making resistance. The affailants rushed forwards, with repeated fhouts and with the utmost fury; took possession

1571.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

poffeffion of the magazine; feized the cannon; and turned them against their enemies. Lord Fleming got into a small boat, and fied all alone into Argyleshire. Crawford, in reward of his valour and good conduct, remained master of the castle; and as he did not lose a single man in the enterprise, he enjoyed his fuccess with unmixed pleasure. Lady Fleming, Verac the French envoy, and Hamilton archbishop of St. Andrew's, were the prisoners of greatest diffunction 4.

,Verac's character protected him from the usage which he merited by his activity in ftirring up enemies against the king. The regent treated the lady with great politeness and humanity. But a very different fate awaited the archbishop; he was carried under a ftrong guard to Stirling ; and as he had formerly been attainted by act of parliament, he was, without any formal trial, condemned to be hanged; and on the fourth day after he was taken, the fentence was executed. An attempt was made to convict him of being acceffary to the murder both of the king and regent, but thefe accufations were fupported by no proof. Our historians observe, that he was the first bishop in Scotland who died by the hands of the executioner. The high offices he had enjoyed, both in church and flate, ought to have exempted him from a punifhment inflicted only on the lowest criminals. But his zeal for the queen, his abilities, and his profeffion, rendered him odious and formidable to the king's adherents. Lennox hated him as the

> 9 Buchan. 394. R 3

perfon

E. VI.

186

perfon by whole counfels the reputation and power of the houfe of Hamilton were fupported. Party rage and perfonal enmity dictated that indecent fentence, for which fome colour was fought, by imputing to him fuch odious crimes<sup>r</sup>. The lofs of Dunbarton, and the fevere treatment of the archbishop, perplexed no lefs than they enraged the queen's party; and hostilities were renewed with all the fierceness which difappointment and indignation can infpire. Kirkaldy, who, during the truce, had taken care to increase the number of his garrifon, and to provide every thing necessary for his defence, iffued a proclamation declaring Lennox's authority to be unlawful and usurped; commanded all who favoured his cause to leave the town within fix hours; feized the arms belonging to the citizens; planted a battery on the steeple of St. Giles's, repaired the walls, and fortified the gates of the city; and, though the affections of the inhabitants leaned a different way, held out the metropolis against the regent. The duke, Huntly, Home, Herries, and other chiefs of that faction, repaired to Edinburgh with their followers; and having received a small sum of money and fome ammunition from France, formed no contemptible army within the walls. On the other fide, Morton seized Leith and fortified it ; and the regent joined him with a confiderable body of men. While the armies lay fo near each other, daily skirmishes happened, and with various success. The queen's party was not strong enough to take the field against the regent, r Spotfwood, 252.

1571.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

nor was his fuperiority fo great as to undertake the fiege of the caftle or of the town s.

Some time before Edinburgh fell into the hands of his enemies, the regent had fummoned a parliament to meet in that place. In order to prevent any objection against the lawfulnels of the meeting, the members obeyed the proclamation as exactly as poffible; and affembled [May 14] in a house at the head of the Canongate, which, though without the walls, lies within the liberties of the city. Kirkaldy exerted himfelf to the utmost to interrupt their meeting; but they were fo ftrongly guarded, that all efforts were vain. They passed an act attainting Maitland and a few others, and then adjourned to the 28th of August'.

The other party, in order that their proceedings might be countenanced by the fame shew of legal authority, held a meeting of parliament foon after. There was produced in this affembly a declaration by the queen, of the invalidity of that decd whereby she had refigned the crown, and conferted to the coronation of her son. Conformable to this declaration, an act was passed, pronouncing the refignation to have been extorted by fear; to be null in itfelf, and in all its confequences; and enjoining all good fub-jects to acknowledge the queen alone to be their lawful fovereign, and to fupport those who acted in her name. The prefent establishment of the protestant religion was confirmed by another statute; and, in imitation of the adverse party, a new meeting was appointed on the 26th of August ".

2 Cald. ii. 233, &c. Crawf. Mem. 177. " Ibid. Meanwhile

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

E. VI.

188

Meanwhile all the miferies of civil war defolated the kingdom. Fellow-citizens, friends, brothers, took different fides, and ranged themfelves under the flandards of the contending factions. In every county, and almost in every town and village, King's men and Queen's men were names of diffinction. Political hatred diffolved all natural ties, and extinguished the reciprocal good-will and confidence which hold mankind together in fociety. Religious zeal mingled itself with these civil diffinctions, and contributed not a little to heighten and to inflame them.

The factions which divided the kingdom were, in appearance, only two. But in both thefe there were perfons with views and principles fo different from each other, that they ought to be diffinguished. With some, confiderations of religion were predominant, and they either adhered to the queen, becaufe they hoped by her means to re-eftablish popery, or they defended the king's authority, as the best fupport of the protestant faith. Among these the opposition was violent and irreconcileable. Others were influenced by political motives only, or allured by views of intereft; the regent aimed at uniting thefe, and did not defpair of gaining by gentle arts many of Mary's adherents to acknowledge the king's authority. Maitland and Kirkaldy had formed the fame defign of a coalition, but on fuch terms that the queen might be reftored to fome fhare in the government, and the king-dom fhake off its dependence upon England, Morton, the ableft, the moft ambitious, and the most powerful man of the king's party, held a particular particular courfe; and moving only as he was prompted by the court of England, thwarted every measure that tended towards a reconcilement of the factions; and as he ferved Elizabeth with much fidelity, he derived both power and credit from her avowed protection.

The time appointed by both parties for the meeting of their parliaments now approached. Only three peers and two bishops appeared in that which was held in the queen's name at Edinburgh. But, contemptible as their numbers were, they paffed an act for attainting upwards of two hundred of the adverfe faction. The meeting at Stirling was numerous and fplendid. The regent had prevailed on the earls of Argyll, Eglinton, Caffils, and lord Boyd, to acknowledge the king's authority. The three earls were among the most powerful noblemen in the kingdom, and had hitherto been zealous in the queen's caufe. Lord Boyd had been one of Mary's commissioners at York and Westminster, and fince that time had been admitted into all her most fecret councils. But, during that turbulent period, the conduct of individuals, as well as the principles of factions, varied fo often, that the fense of honour, a chief prefervative of confistence in character, was entirely loft; and without any regard to decorum, men fuddenly abandoned one party, and adopted all the violent paffions of the other. The defection, however, of fo many perfons of diffinction, not only weakened the queen's party, but added reputation to her adverfaries.

After the example of the parliament at Edinburgh, that at Stirling began with framing acts against against the opposite faction. But in the midst of all the fecurity, which confidence in their own numbers or diffance from danger could infpire, they were awakened, early in the morning of September the third, by the fhouts of the enemy in the heart of the town. In a moment the houses of every perfon of distinction were furrounded, and before they knew what to think of fo ftrange an event, the regent, the earls of Argyll, Morton, Gleneairn, Caffils, Eglinton, Montrofe, Buchan, the lords Sempil, Carthcart, Ogilvie, were all made prifoners, and mounted behind troopers, who were ready to carry them to Edinburgh. Kirkaldy was the author of this daring enterprife; and if he had not been induced by the ill-timed folicitude of his friends about his fafety, not to hazard his own perfon in conducting it, that day might have terminated the contcit between the two factions, and have reftored peace to his country. By his direction four hundred men, under the command of Huntly, lord Claud Hamilton, and Scott of Buccleugh, fet out from Edinburgh, and, the better to conceal their defign, marched towards the fouth. But they foon wheeled to the right, and horfes having been provided for the infantry, rode straight to Stirling. By four in the morning they arrived there; not one fentry was posted on the walls, not a fingle man was awake about the place. They met with no refiftance from any perfon whom they attempted to feize, except Morton. He defending his house with obstinate valour, they were obliged to fet it on fire, and he did not furrender till foreed out of it by the flames. In performing this, fome time was

B. VI.

was confumed ; and the private men, unaccuftomed to regular discipline, left their colours, and began to rifle the houses and shops of the citizens. The noife and uproar in the town reached the caftle. The earl of Mar fallied out with thirty foldiers; fired brifkly upon the enemy, of whom almost none but the officers kept together in a body. The townsmen took arms to affist their governor; a fudden panic ftruck the affailants ; fome fled, fome furrendered themfelves to their own prifoners; and had not the borderers, who followed Scott, prevented a purfuit, by carrying off all the horfes within the place, not a man would have efcaped. If the regent had not unfortunately been killed, the lofs on the king's fide would have been as inconfiderable as the alarm was great. Think on the archbishop of St. Andrew's, was the word among the queen's foldiers; and Lennox fell a facrifice to his memory. The officer to whom he furrendered, endeavouring to protect him, loft his own life in his defence. He was flain, according to the general opinion, by command of lord Claud Hamilton. Kirkaldy had the glory of concerting this plan with great fecrecy and prudence; but Morton's fortunate obstinacy, and the want of discipline among his troops, deprived him of fuccefs, the only thing wanting to render this equal to the most applauded military enterprises of the kind x.

As fo many of the nobles were affembled [Sept. 6], they proceeded without delay to the election of a regent. Argyll, Morton, and Mar, were x Melv. 226. Crawf. Mem. 204.

candi-

candidates for the office. Mar was chofen by a majority of voices. Amidît all the fierce diffentions which had prevailed fo long in Scotland, he had diftinguished himfelf by his moderation, his humanity, and his difinterestedness. As his power was far inferior to Argyll's, and his abilities not fo great as Morton's, he was, for these reasons, less formidable to the other nobles. His merit, too, in having fo lately refcued the leaders of the party from imminent destruction, contributed not a little to his preferment.

While thefe things were carrying on in Scotland, the transactions in England were no lefs interesting to Mary, and still more fatal to her cause. The parliament of that kingdom, which met in April, passed an act, by which it was declared to be high treasfon to claim any right to the crown during the life of the queen; to affirm that the title of any other perfon was better than hers, or to maintain that the parliament had not power to settle and to limit the order of fuccession. This remarkable statute was intended not only for the scottish statute their own fovereign, but to curb the restless and intriguing spirit of the Scottish queen and her adherents y.

At this time a treaty of marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou, the French king's brother, was well advanced. Both courts feemed to defire it with equal ardour, and gave out, with the utmost confidence, that it could not fail of taking place. Neither of them, however,

y Camd. 436.

B. VI.

ever, wished it fuccess; and they encouraged it for no other end, but becaufe it ferved to cover or to promote their particular defigns. The whole policy of Catherine of Medicis was bent towards the accomplishment of her detestable project for the deftruction of the hugonot chiefs; and by carrying on a negotiation for the marriage of her fon with a princefs who was justly efteemed the protectrefs of that party, by yielding fome things in point of religion, and by difcovering an indifference with regard to others, she hoped to amufe all the protestants in Europe, and to lull afleep the jealoufy even of the hugonots themfelves. Elizabeth flattered herfelf with reaping advantages of another kind. During the dependence of the negotiation, the French could not with decency give any open affiftance to the Scottifh queen; if they conceived any hopes of fuccefs in the treaty of marriage, they would of courfe interest themselves but coldly in her concerns: Mary herfelf must be dejected at losing an ally, whom she had hitherto reckoned her most powerful protector; and by interrupting her correspondence with France, one fource, at leaft, of the cabals and intrigues which difturbed the kingdom would be ftopt. Both queens fucceeded in their schemes. Catherine's artifices imposed on Elizabeth, and blinded the hugonots. The French difcovered the utmost indifference about the interest of the Scottish queen; and Mary, confidering that court as already united with her rival, turned for protection with more eagerness than ever towards the king of Spain 2. Philip, whole dark and thought-

<sup>2</sup> Digges, 144. 148. Camd. 434. VOL. 11. S

ful

B. VI.

194

ful mind delighted in the mystery of intrigue, had held a fecret correspondence with Mary for fome time, by means of the bifhop of Rofs, and had fupplied both herself and her adherents in Scotland with fmall fums of money. Ridolphi, a Florentine gentleman, who refided at London under the character of a banker, and who acted privately as an agent for the pope, was the perfon whom the bishop intrusted with this negotiation. Mary thought it neceffary likewife to communicate the fecret to the duke of Norfolk, whom Elizabeth had lately reftored to liberty, upon his solemn promise to have no farther intercourse with the queen of Scots. This promife, however, he regarded fo little, that he continued to keep a conftant correspondence with the captive queen ; while fhe laboured to nourifh his ambitious hopes, and to ftrengthen his amorous attachment by letters written in the fondest careffing ftrain. Some of these he must have received at the very time when he made that folemn promife of holding no farther intercourfe with her, in confequence of which Elizabeth reftored him to liberty. Mary, still confidering him as her future husband, took no step in any matter of moment without his advice. She early communicated to him her negotiations with Ridolphi: and in a longer letter, which fhe wrote to him in cyphers a, after complaining of the basenes with which the French court had abandoned her interest, she declared her intention of imploring the affiftance of the Spanish monarch, which was

<sup>a</sup> Haynes, 597, 593. Hardw. State Papers, i. 190, &c Digges, Compleat Ambaf. 147.

now

now her only refource; and recommended Ridolphi to his confidence, as a perfon capable both of explaining and advancing the fcheme. The duke commanded Hickford, his fecretary, to decypher, and then to burn this letter; but whether he had been already gained by the court, or refolved at that time to betray his mafter, he difobeyed the latter part of the order, and hid the letter, together with other treafonable papers, under the duke's own bed.

Ridolphi, in a conference with Norfolk, omitted none of those arguments, and spared none of those promises, which are the usual incentives to rebellion. The pope, he told him, had a great fum in readinefs to beftow in fo good a caufe. The duke of Alva had undertaken to land ten thousand men not far from London. The catholics to a man would rife in arms. Many of the nobles were ripe for a revolt, and wanted only a leader. . Half the nation had turned their eyes towards him, and called on him to revenge the unmerited injuries which he himfelf had fuffered; and to refcue an unfortunate queen, who offered him her hand and her crown, as the reward of his fuccefs. Norfolk approved of the defign, and though he refused to give Ridolphi any letter of credit, allowed him to use his name in negotiating with the pope and Alva b. The bifhop of Rofs, who, from the violence of his temper, and impatience to procure relief for his miftrefs, was apt to run into rafh and defperate defigns, advifed the duke to affemble fecretly a few of his followers, and at once to feize Elizabeth's perfon,

> b Anderf, iii. 161. s 2

But

B. VI.

But this the duke rejected as a scheme equally wild and hazardous. Meanwhile, the English court had received fome imperfect information of the plot [August], by intercepting one of Ri-dolphi's agents; and an accident happened, which brought to light all the circumstances of it. The duke had employed Hickford to tranfmit to lord Herries fome money, which was to be distributed among Mary's friends in Scotland. A perfon not in the fecret was intrusted with conveying it to the borders, and he fufpecting it from the weight to be gold, whereas he had been told that it was filver, carried it directly to the privy council. The duke, his domeftics, and all who were privy, or could be fuspected of being privy, to the delign, were taken into cuftody. Never did the accomplices in a confpiracy discover less firmness, or fervants betray an indulgent mafter with greater bafe-nefs [Sept. 7]. Every one confeffed the whole of what he knew. Hickford gave directions how to find the papers which he had hidden. The duke himfelf, relying at first on the fidelity of his affociates, and believing all dangerous papers to have been destroyed, confidently afferted his own innocence; but when their depolitions and the papers themfelves were produced, aftonished at their treachery, he acknowledged his guilt, and implored the queen's mercy. His offence was too heinous, and too often repeated, to obtain pardon; and Elizabeth thought it neceffary to deter her fubjects, by his punifhment, from holding correspondence with the queen of Scots, or her emissaries. Being tried by his peers, he was found guilty of high treafon, and.

and, after feveral delays, fuffered death for the crime<sup>c</sup>.

The difeovery of this confpiracy produced many effects, extremely detrimental to Mary's interest. The bishop of Rofs, who appeared, by the confession of all concerned, to be the prime mover in every cabal against Elizabeth, was taken into cuftody, his papers fearched, himfelf committed to the Tower, treated with the utmost rigour, threatened with capital punishment, and, after a long confinement, fet at liberty, on condition that he should leave the kingdom. Mary was not only deprived of a fervant, equally eminent for his zeal and his abilities, but was denied from that time the privilege of having an ambaffador at the English court. The Spanish ambassador, whom the power and dignity of the prince he reprefented exempted from fuch infults as Rofs had fuffered, was commanded to leave England d. As there was now the clearest evidence that Mary, from refentment of the wrongs fhe had fuffered, and impatience of the captivity in which she was held, would not feruple to engage in the most hostile and desperate enterprises against the established government and religion, she began to be regarded as a public enemy, and was kept under a stricter guard than formerly, the number of her domeftics was abridged, and no perfon permitted to fee her, but in prefence of her keeperse.

At the fame time, Elizabeth, forefeeing the ftorm which was gathering on the continent

c Anderf. iii. 149. State Trials, 185. e Strype, Ann. ii. 50.

d Digges, 163.

against

against her kingdom, began to wish that tranquillity were reftored in Scotland; and irritated by Mary's late attempt against her government, fhe determined to act, without difguife or ambiguity, in favour of the king's party. This refolution she intimated to the leaders of both factions [Oct. 23]. Mary, she told them, had held fuch a criminal correspondence with her avowed enemies, and had excited fuch dangerous confpiracies both against her crown and her life, that the would henceforth confider her as unworthy of protection, and would never confent to reftore her to liberty, far lefs to replace her on her throne. She exhorted them, therefore, to unite in acknowledging the king's authority. She promifed to procure by her mediation equitable terms for those who had hitherto opposed it. But if they still continued refractory, she threatened to employ her utmost power to compel them to fubmit f. Though this declaration did not produce an immediate effect; though hostilities continued in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh ; though Huntly's brother, fir Adam Gordon, by his bravery and good conduct, had routed the king's adherents in the North in many encounters; yet fuch an explicit difcovery of Elizabeth's fentiments contributed not a little to animate one party, and to deprefs the fpirit and hopes of the other g.

1572.] As Morton, who commanded the regent's forces, lay at Leith, and Kirkaldy ftill held out the town and caftle of Edinburgh, f See Append. No. XXXVIJ.

& Cald. ii. 289. 294. Strype, ii. 76.

fcarce

fcar a day paffed without a skirmish; and while both avoided any decifive action, they haraffed each other by attacking fmall parties, beating up quarters, and intercepting convoys. Thefe operations, though little memorable in themfelves, kept the paffions of both factions in perpetual exercise and agitation, and wrought them up, at last, to a degree of fury, which rendered them regardless not only of the laws of war, but of the principles of humanity. Nor was it in the field alone, and during the heat of combat, that this implacable rage appeared; both parties hanged the prifoners which they took, of whatever rank or quality, without mercy, and without trial. Great numbers fuffered in this shocking manner; the unhappy victims were led, by fifties at a time, to execution; and it was not till both fides had fmarted feverely, that they difcontinued this barbarous practice, fo reproachful to the character of the nation b. Meanwhile, those in the town and caffle, though they had received a fupply of money from the duke of Alva<sup>i</sup>, began to fuffer for want of provisions. As Morton had destroyed all the mills in the neighbourhood of the city, and had planted finall garrifons in all the houfes of firength around it, fcarcity daily increafed. At last all the miferies of famine were felt, and they must have been foon reduced to fuch extremities, as would have forced them to capitulate, if the English and French ambassadors had not procured a sufpension of hostilities between the two parties k.

Crawf. Mein. 218. 220. i Cald. ii. 345.

i Cald. ii. 345.

k Ib. 346. Though

Though the negotiation for a marriage between Elizabeth and the duke of Anjou had been fruitlefs, both Charles and fhe were defirous of concluding a defensive alliance between the two crowns. He confidered fuch a treaty, not only as the best device for blinding the protestants, against whom the conspiracy was now almost ripe for execution ; but as a good precaution, likewife, against - the dangerous confequences to which that atrocious measure might expose him. Elizabeth, who had hitherto reigned without a fingle ally, now faw her kingdom fo threatened with inteftine commotions, or expoled to invafions from abroad, that the was extremely folicitous to fecure the affiftance of fo powerful a neighbour. The difficulties arifing from the fituation of the Scottish queen were the chief occafions of any delay. Charles demanded fome terms of advantage for Mary and her party. Elizabeth refused to listen to any proposition of that kind. Her obstinacy overcame the faint efforts of the French monarch. Mary's name was not fo much as mentioned in the treaty; and with regard to Scottish affairs, a short article was inferted [April 11], in general and ambiguous terms, to this purpofe : " That the parties contracting shall make no innovations in Scotland; nor fuffer any stranger to enter, and to foment the factions there ; but it shall be lawful for the queen of England to chaftife, by force of arms, those Scots who shall continue to harbour the English rebels now in Scotland 1." In confequence of this treaty, France and England

1 Digges, 170. 191. Camden, 444.

affected

B. V1.

affected to act in concert with regard to Scotland, and Le Croc and fir William Drury appeared there, in the name of their refpective fovereigns. By their mediation, a truce for two months was agreed upon, and during that time conferences were to be held between the leaders of the opposite factions, in order to accommodate their differences and reftore peace to the kingdom. This truce afforded a feafonable interval of tranquillity to the queen's adherents in the South: but in the North it proved fatal to her intereft. Sir Adam Gordon had ftill maintained his reputation and fuperiority there. Several parties, under different officers, were fent against him. Some of them he attacked in the field ; against others he employed stratagem ; and as his courage and conduct were equal, none of his enterprifes failed of fuccefs. Hc made war too with the humanity which became fo gallant a man, and gained ground by that, no lefs than by the terror of his arms. If he had not been obliged by the truce to fufpend his operations, he would in all probability have brought that part of the kingdom to fubmit entirely to the queen's authority m.

Notwithstanding Gordon's bravery and fuccefs, Mary's intercft was on the decline, not only in her own kingdom, but among the English. Nothing could be more offentive to that nation, jealous of foreigners, and terrified at the prospect of the Spanish yoke, than her negotiations with the duke of Alva. The parliament, which met in May, proceeded against m Crawf. Mem.

B. VI.

her as the moft dangerous enemy of the kingdom; and after a folemn conference between the lords and commons, both houfes agreed in bringing in a bill to declare her guilty of high treafon, and to deprive her of all right of fucceffion to the crown. This great caufe, as it was then called, occupied them during the whole feffion, and was carried on with much unanimity. Elizabeth, though fhe applauded their zeal, and approved greatly of the courfe they were taking, was fatisfied with fhewing Mary what fhe might expect from the refentment of the nation; but as fhe did not yet think it time to proceed to the moft violent extremity againft her, fhe prorogued the parliament <sup>n</sup>.

Thefe fevere proceedings of the English parliament were not more mortifying to Mary than the coldness and neglect of her allies the French. The duke of Montmorency, indeed, who came over to ratify the league with Elizabeth, made a shew of interesting himfelf in favour of the Scottish queen; but, instead of foliciting for her liberty, or her restoration to her throne, all that he demanded was a slight mitigation of the rigour of her imprisonment. Even this small request he urged with fo little warmth or importunity, that no regard was paid to it °.

The alliance with France afforded Elizabeth much fatisfaction, and the expected from it a great increase of fecurity. She now turned her whole attention towards Scotland, where the animofities of the two factions were still to high, and fo many interfering interests to be adjusted,

B D'Ewes, Journ. 206, &c.

• Jebb, ii. 512. that

1572.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

that a general pacification feemed to be at a great distance. But while she laboured to bring, them to fome agreement, an event happened which filled a great part of Europe with aftonifhment and with horror. This was the maffacre of Paris; an attempt, to which there is no parallel in the hiftory of mankind, either for the long train of craft and diffimulation with which it was contrived, or for the cruelty and barbarity with which it was carried into execution. By the most folemn promises of fafety and of favour, the leaders of the protestants were drawn to court; and though doomed to destruction, they were received with careffes, loaded with honours, and treated, for feven months, with every poffible mark of familiarity and of confidence. In the midft of their fecurity, the warrant for their deftruction was iffued by their fovereign [Aug. 24], on whofe word they had relicd; and in obedience to it, their countrymen, their fellow-citizens, and companions, imbrued their hands in their blood. Ten thousand protestants, without diftiction of age, or fex, or condition, were murdered in Paris alone. The fame barbarous orders were fent to other parts of the kingdom, and a like carnage enfued. This deed, which no popish writer, in the prefent age, mentions without deteftation, was at that time applauded in Spain; and at Rome folemn thankfgivings were offered to God for its fuccefs. But among the protestants, it excited incredible horror; a ftriking picture of which is drawn by the French ambaflador at the court of England, in his account of his first audience after the massacre. " A gloomy forrow," fays he, " fat on every face :

B. VI.

face; filence, as in the dead of night, reigned through all the chambers of the royal apartment; the ladies and courtiers were ranged on each fide, all clad in deep mourning, and as I paffed through them, not one bestowed on me a civil look, or made the least return to my falutes P."

But horror was not the only paffion with which this event infpired the protestants; it filled them with fear. They confidered it as the prelude to fome greater blow, and believed, not without much probability, that all the popilh princes had confpired the destruction of their fect. This opinion was of no finall differvice to Mary's affairs in Scotland. Many of her adherents were proteltants; and, though they wished her reftoration, were not willing, on that account, to facrifice the faith which they profeffed. They dreaded her attachment to a religion which allowed its votaries to violate the most folemn engagements, and prompted them to perpetrate the most barbarous crimes. A general confederacy of the protestants feemed to them the only thing that could uphold the reformation against the league which was formed to overturn it. Nor could the prefent establishment of religion be long maintained in Britain, but by a strict union with Elizabeth, and by the concurrence of both na--tions, in efpoufing the defence of it as a common .caufe 9.

Encouraged by this general difpofition to place confidence in her, Elizabeth refumed a fcheme which the had formed during the regency of the

carl

P Carte, iii. 522. 9 Digges, 244. 267.

earl of Murray, of fending Mary as a prifoner into Scotland. . But her fentiments and fituation were now very different from what they had been during her negotiation with Murray. Her animofity against the queen of Scots was greatly augmented, by recent experience, which taught her that fhe had inclination, as well as power, not only to difturb the tranquillity of her reign, but to wreft from her the crown; the party in Scotland favourable to Mary was almost entirely broken; and there was no reafon to dread any danger from. France, which still continued to court her friendfhip. She aimed, accordingly, at fomething very different from that which she had in view three years before. Then the difcovered a laudable folicitude, not only for the fafety of Mary's life, but for fecuring to her, treatment fuited to her rank. Now the required, as an exprefs condition, that immediately after Mary's arrival in Scotland, the thould be brought to public trial ; and having no doubt that fentence would be paffed according to her deferts, fhe infifted that, for the good of both kingdoms, it should be executed without delay r. No transaction, perhaps, in Elizabeth's reign, merits more fevere cenfure. Eager to cut fhort the days of a rival, the object both of her hatred and dread, and no lefs anxious to avoid the blame to which fuch a deed of violence might expofe her, the laboured, with timid and ungenerous artifice, to transfer the odium of it from herfelf to Mary's own fubjects. The earl of Mar, happily for the honour of his country, had more virtue than to > r Murdin, 224. T

TOL. II.

liften

listen to fuch an ignominious proposal; and Elizabeth did not venture to renew it.

While she was engaged in purfuing this infidious meafure, the regent was more honourably employed in endeavouring to negotiate a general peace among his countrymen. As he laboured for this purpofe with the utmost zeal, and the adverse faction placed entire confidence in his integrity, his endeavours could hardly have failed of being fuccefsful. Maitland and Kirkaldy came fo near to an agreement with him, that fcarce any thing remained, except the formality of figning the treaty. But Morton had not forgotten the difappointment he met with in his pretentions to the regency; his abilities, his wealth, and the patronage of the court of England, gave him greater fway with the party, than even the regent himfelf ; and he took pleafure in thwarting every meafure purfued by him. He was afraid that, if Maitland and his affociates recovered any fhare in the administration, his own influence would be confiderably diminifhed; and the regent, by their means, would acquire that afcendant which belonged to his ftation. With him concurred all those who were in poffeffion of the lands which belonged to any of the queen's party. His ambition, and their avarice, frustrated the regent's pious intentions, and retarded a bleffing fo neceffary to the kingdom, as the eftablishment of peace s.

Such a difcovery of the felfifhnefs and ambition which reigned among his party, made a deep imprefion on the regent, who loved his country,

5 Melv. 233. Crawf. Mem. 237.

and

and wished for peace with much ardour. This inward grief broke his spirit, and by degrees brought on a fettled melancholy, that ended in a diftemper, of which he died on the twenty-ninth of October. He was, perhaps, the only perfon in the kingdom who could have enjoyed the office of regent without envy, and have left it. without loss of reputation. Notwithstanding their mutual animosities, both factions acknowledged his views to be honourable, and his integrity to be uncorrupted <sup>t</sup>.

207

it

No competitor now appeared againft Morton. The queen of England powerfully fupported his claim, and notwithftanding the fears of the people, and the jealoufy of the nobles, he was elected regent [November]; the fourth who, in the fpace of five years, had held that dangerous office.

As the truce had been prolonged to the first of January, this gave him an opportunity of continuing the negotiations with the opposite party, which had been fet on foot by his predeceffor. They produced no effects, however, till the beginning of the next year.

Before we proceed to thefe, fome events, hitherto untouched, deferve our notice.

The earl of Northumberland, who had been kept prifoner in Lochlevin ever fince his flight into Scotland in the year one thoufand five hundred and fixty-nine, was given up to lord Hunfdon, governor of Berwick; and being carried to York, fuffered there the punifhment of his rebellion. The king's party were fo fenfible of their dependence on Elizabeth's protection, that it was fearcely poffible for them to refufe putting into her hands a perfon who had taken up arms againft her; but as a fum of money was paid on that account, and fhared between Morton and Douglas of Lochlevin, the former of whom, during his exile in England, had been much indebted to Northumberland's friendship, the abandoning this unhappy nobleman, in fuch a manner, to certain destruction, was univerfally condemned as a most ungrateful and mercenary action ".

This year was remarkable for a confiderable innovation in the government of the church. Soon after the reformation, the popifh bishops had been confirmed by law in possefion of part of their benefices; but the fpiritual jurifdiction, which belonged to their order, was exercifed by fuperintendants, though with more moderate authority. On the death of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, Morton 'obtained from the crown a grant of the temporalities of that fee. But as it was thought indecent for a layman to hold a benefice to which the cure of fouls was annexed, he procured Douglas, rector of the university of St. Andrew's, to be chofen archbishop ; and, allotting him a fmall penfion out of the revenues of the fee, retained the remainder in his own hands. The nobles, who faw the advantages which they might reap from fuch a practice, supported him in the execution of his plan. It gave great offence, however, to the clergy, who, inftead of perpetuating an order whole name and power was odious to them, wished that the revenues

" Crawf. Mem. 55. 222. Camd. 445.

B. VI.

venues which had belonged to it might be employed in fupplying fuch parifhes as were ftill unprovided with fettled paftors. But, on the one hand, it would have been rash in the clergy to have irritated too much noblemen, on whom the very existence of the protestant church in Scotland depended; and Morton, on the other, conducted his fcheme with fuch dexterity, and managed them with fo much art, that it was at last agreed, in a convention composed of the leading men among the clergy, together with a committee of privy council, " That the name and office of archbishop and bishop should be continued during the king's minority, and thefe dignities be conferred upon the best qualified among the protestant ministers; but that, with regard to their spiritual jurifdictions, they should be fubject to the general affembly of the church." The rules to be observed in their election, and the perfons who were to fupply the place, and enjoy the privileges which belonged to the dean and chapter in times of popery, wcre likewife particularly fpecified *. The whole being laid before the general affembly, after fome exceptions to the name of archbishop, dean, chapter, &c. and a protestation that it should be confidered only as a temporary constitution, until one more perfect could be introduced, it obtained the approbation of that court y. Even Knox, who was prevented from attending the affembly by the ill state of his health, though he declaimed loudly against the fimoniacal paction to which Douglas owed his preferment, and x Cald. ii. 305.

y Id. 354.

blamed

т 3

B. VI.

blamed the nomination of a perfon worn out with age and infirmities, to an office which required unimpaired vigour both of body and mind, feems not to have condemned the proceedings of the convention ; and, in a letter to the affembly, approved of fome of their regulations with refpect to the election of bishops, as worthy of being carefully obferved <sup>z</sup>. In confequence of the affembly's confeut to the plan agreed upon in the convention, Douglas was inftalled in his office, and at the fame time an archbishop of Glafgow and a bishop of Dunkeld were chosen from among the protestant clergy. They were all admitted to the place in parliament, which belonged to the ecclefiaftieal order. But, in imitation of the example fet by Morton, fuch bargains were made with them by different noblemen, as gave them possession only of a very fmall part of the revenues belonging to their fees <sup>2</sup>.

Soon after the diffolution of this affembly, Knox, the prime infrument of fpreading and eftablifting the reformed religion in Scotland, ended his life [Nov. 27], in the fixty-feventh year of his age. Zeal, intrepidity, diffutereftednefs, were virtues which he poffeffed in an eminent degree. He was acquainted too with the learning cultivated among divines in that age; and excelled in that fpecies of eloquence which is calculated to roufe and to inflame <sup>b</sup>. His maxims.

See Appendix, No. XXXVIII.
 <sup>a</sup> Spotfw. 261.
 <sup>b</sup> A firlking defcription of that species of eloquence for which Knox was diffinguiss of the species o

maxims, however, were often too fevere, and the impetuofity of his temper exceffive. Rigid and uncomplying himfelf, he fhewed no indulgence to the infirmities of others. Regardlefs of the diftinctions of rank and character, he uttered his admonitions with an acrimony and vehemence, more apt to irritate than to reclaim. This often betrayed him into indecent and undutiful expreffions with rcfpect to the queen's perfon and conduct. Thofe very qualities, however, which now render his character lefs amiable, fitted him to be the inftrument of Providence for advancing the reformation among a fierce people, and enabled him to face dangers, and to furmount oppofition, from which a perfon of a more gentle fpirit would have been apt to fhrink back. By an un-coming of that most notible Prophet and Apostle of our nation, Mr. John Knox, to St. Andrew's, who, by the faction of the queen occupying the caffle and town of Edinburgh, was compelled to remove therefra with a number of the beft, and chufed to come to St. Andrews. I heard him teach there the prophecies of Daniel that fummer and the winter following. I had my pen and little buike, and took away fic things as I could comprehend. In the opening of his text he was moderate the frace of half an hour; but when he entered to application, he made me fo to grue [thrill] and tremble that I -could not hald the pen to write. ---- He was very weak. I faw him every day of his doctrine go bulie [flowly] and fair, with a furring of marticks about his neck, a ftaff in the one hand, and good godlie Richart Ballanden holding him up by the oxter [under the arm], from the abbey to the parish kirk ; and he the faid Richart and another fervant lifted him up to the pulpit, where he behoved to lean at his first entrie; but e're he was done with his fermon, he was fo active and vigorous, that he was like to ding the pulpit in blads [beat the pulpit to pieces], and fly out of it." MS. Life of Mr. James Melville, communicated to me by Mr. Paton of the Cuftomhouse, Edinburgh, p. 14. 21.

wearied

B. VI.

wearied application to fludy and to bufinefs, as well as by the frequency and fervour of his public difcourfes, he had worn out a conflitution naturally robuft. During a lingering illnefs he difcovered the utmoft fortitude; and met the approaches of death with a magnanimity infeparable from his character. He was conflantly employed in acts of devotion, and comforted himfelf with thofe profpects of immortality which not only preferve good men from defponding, but fill them with exultation in their laft moments. The earl of Morton, who was prefent at his funeral, pronounced his eulogium in a few words, the more honourable for Knox, as they came from one whom he had often cenfured with peculiar feverity : " There lies He, who never feared the face of man <sup>b</sup>."

1573.] Though Morton did not defire peace from fuch generous motives as the former regent, he laboured, however, in good earneft, to eftablifh it. The public confutions and calamities, to which he owed his power and importance when he was the only fecond perfon in the nation, were extremely detrimental to him, now that he was raifed to be the firft. While fo many of the nobles continued in arms againft him, his authority as regent was partial, feeble, and precarious. Elizabeth was no lefs defirous of extinguifhing the flame which fhe had kindled and kept fo long alive in Scotland<sup>c</sup>. She had difcovered the alliance with France, from which fhe had expected fuch advantages, to be no foundation of fecurity. Though appearances of friendfhip ftill

b Spotf. 266. Cald. ii. 273.

• Digges, 299. fublifted fubfifted between her and that court, and Charles daily renewed his protestations of inviolable adherence to the treaty, fhe was convinced, by fatal example, how little fhe ought to rely on the promifes or oaths of that perfidious monarch. Her ambaffador warned her that the French held fecret correspondence with Mary's adherents in Scotland, and encouraged them in their obftinacy d. The duke of Alva carried on his intrigues in that kingdom with lefs difguife. She was perfuaded that they would embrace the first ferene interval, which the commotions in France and in the Netherlands would allow them, and openly attempt to land a body of men in Scotland. She refolved, therefore, to prevent their getting any footing in the ifland, and to cut off all their hopes of finding any affiftance there, by uniting the two parties.

The fituation of Mary's adherents enabled the regent to carry on his negotiations with them to great advantage. They were now divided into two factions. At the head of the one were Chatelherault and Huntly. Maitland and Kirkaldy were the leaders of the other. Their high rank, their extensive property, and the numbers of their followers, rendered the former confiderable. The latter were indebted for their importance to their perfonal abilitics, and to the ftrength of the caftle of Edinburgh, which was in their poffeffion. The regent had no intention to comprehend both in the fame treaty; but as he dreaded that the queen's party, if it remained entire, would be able to thwart and embarrafs his administration, he refolved to divide and weaken it, by a feparate negotiation. He made the first overture to Kirkaldy and his affociates, and endeavoured to renew the negotiation with them, which, during the life of his predeceffor, had been broken off by his owu artifices. But Kirkaldy knew Morton's views, and fystem of government, to be very different from those of the former regent. Maitland confidered him as a perfonal and implacable enemy. They received repeated affurances of protection from France; and though the fiege of Rochelle employed the French arms at that time, the fame hopes, which had fo often deceived the party, still amufed them, and they expected that the obfinacy of the hugonots would foon be fubdued, and that Charles would then be at liberty to act with vigour in Scotland. Meanwile, a fupply of money was fent, and if the caftle could be held out till Whitfunday, effectual aid was promifed °. Maitland's genius delighted in forming fchemes that were dangerous; and Kirkaldy poffeffed the intrepidity neceffary for putting them in execution. The caftle, they knew, was fo fituated, that it might defy all the regent's power. Elizabeth, they hoped, would not violate the treaty with France, by fending forces to his affiftance; and if the French should be able to land any confiderable body of men, it might be poffible to deliver the queen from captivity, or at leaft to balance the influence of France and England in fuch a manner, as to refcue Scotland from the difhonourable dependence upon the latter, under which

d Digges, 296. 312.

admini-

C Digges, 314.

B. VI.

which it had fallen. This fplendid but chimerical project they preferred to the friendship of Morton. They encouraged the negotiation, however, because it ferved to gain time; they proposed, for the fame purpose, that the whole of the queen's party should be comprehended in it, and that Kirkaldy should retain the command of the casses of the fix months after the treaty was signed. His interest prompted the regent to reject the former; his penetration discovered the danger of complying with the latter; and all hopes of accommodation vanished f.

As foon as the truce expired, Kirkaldy began to fire on the city of Edinburgh, which, by the return of the inhabitants whom he had expelled, was devoted as zealoufly as ever to the king's eaufe. But as the regent had now fet on foot a treaty with Chatelherault and Huntly, the ceffation of arms ftill continued with them.

They were lefs forupulous than the other party, and liftened eagerly to his overtures. The duke was naturally unfteady, and the approach of old age increafed his irrefolution, and averfion to action. The miferies of civil difcord had afflicted Scotland almoft five years, a length of time far beyond the duration of any former conteft. The war, inftead of doing fervice, had been detrimental to the queen ; and more ruinous than any foreign invafion to the kingdom. In profecuting it, neither party had gained much honour ; both had fuffered great loffes ; and had exhaufted their own eftates, in wafting those of their adverfaries. The commons were in the utmost f Melv. 235, &c.

mifery,

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

216.

mifery, and longed ardently for a peace which might terminate this fruitless but destructive quarrel.

A great flep was taken towards this defirable event, by the treaty concluded at Perth [Feb. 23], between the regent on one hand, and Chatelherault and Huntly on the other, under the mediation of Killegrew, Elizabeth's ambaffador<sup>g</sup>. The chief articles in it were thefe: that all the parties comprehended in the treaty should declare their approbation of the reformed. religion, now established in the kingdom; that they should fubmit to the king's government, and own Morton's authority as regent; that they fhould acknowledge every thing done in opposition to the king, fince his coronation, to be illegal; that on both fides the prifoners who had been taken fhould be fet at liberty, and the eftates which had been forfeited fhould be reftored to their proper owners; that the act of attainder paffed against the queen's adherents should be repealed, and indemnity granted for all the crimes of which they had been guilty fince the fifteenth of June one thousand five hundred and fixty-feven; and that the treaty should be ratified by the common confent of both parties in parliament h.

Kirkaldy, though abandoned by his affociates, who neither difcovered folicitude nor made provision for his fafety, did not lofe courage, nor entertain any thoughts of accommodation<sup>1</sup>. Though

<sup>8</sup> See Append. No. XXXIX. <sup>b</sup> Crawf. Mem. 251. <sup>i</sup> Melvil, whofe brother, fir Robert, was one of thofe who joined with Kirkaldy in the defence of the caftle, and who

B. VI.

Though all Scotland had now fubmitted to the king, he still refolved to defend the castle in the queen's name, and to wait the arrival of the promifed fuccours. The regent was in want of every thing neceffary for carrying on a fiege. But Elizabeth, who determined at any rate to bring the diffentions in Scotland to a period, before the French could find leifure to take part in the quarrel, foon afforded him fufficient fupplies. Sir William Drury marched into Scotland with fifteen hundred foot, and a confiderable train of artillery. The regent joined him with all his forces [April 25]; and trenches were opened, and approaches regularly carried on against the castle. Kirkaldy, though difcouraged by the loss of a great fum of money, remitted to him from France, and which fell intothe regent's hands through the treachery of fir James Balfour, the most corrupt man of that age, defended himfelf with bravery, augmented by defpair. Three-and-thirty days he refifted all the efforts of the Scotch and English, who pushed on their attacks with courage and with who was himfelf ftrongly attached to their party, afferts that Kirkaldy offered to accept of any reafonable terms of compoficion, but that all his offers were rejected by the regent. Melv. 240. But as Elizabeth was, at that time, extremely defirous of refloring peace in Scotland, and her ambaffador Killegrew, as well as the earl of Rothes, ufed their utmoft endeavours to perfuade Kirkaldy to accede to the treaty of Perth, it feems more credible to impute the continuance of hoftilities to Kirkaldy's obtinacy, his diftruft of Morton, or his hope of foreign aid, than to any other caufe.

That this was really the cafe, is evident from the politive teftimony of Spotfw. 269, 270. Camd. 448. Johnft. Hift. 3, 4. Digges, 334. Crawford's account agrees, in the main, with theirs, Mem. 263.

VOL. II.

emulation.

U

emulation. Nor did he demand a parly, till the fortifications were battered down, and one of the wells in the caftle dried up, and the other choaked with rubbish. Even then, his spirit was unfubdued, and he determined rather to fall gloriously behind the last intrenchment, than to yield to his inveterate enemies. But his garrifon was not animated with the fame heroic or defperate refolution, and, rifing in a mutiny, forced him to capitulate. He furrendered himfelf to Drury [May 29], who promifed, in the name of his mistrefs, that he should be favourably treated. Together with him, James Kirkaldy his brother, lord Home, Maitland, fir Robert Melvil, a few citizens of Edinburgh, and about one hundred and fixty foldiers, were made prifoners k.

Several of the officers, who had been kept in pay during the war, prevailed on their men to accompany them into the Low-countries, and entering into the fervice of the States, added, by their gallant behaviour, to the reputation for military virtue, which has always been the characterific of the Scottifh nation.

Thus by the treaty with Chatcherault and Huntly, and the furrender of the caftle, the civil wars in Scotland were brought to a period. When we review the ftate of the nation, and compare the ftrength of the two factions, Mary's partifans among the nobles appear, manifeftly, to have been fuperior both in numbers and in power. But thefe advantages were more than counterbalanced by others, which their antagonists enjoyed. Political abilities, military skill, and all the talents which times of action form, or call forth, appeared chiefly on the king's fide. Nor could their enemies boaft of any man, who equalled the intrepidity of Murray, tempered with wifdom; the profound faga-city of Morton; the fubtle genius, and in-finuating addrefs, of Maitland; or the fuccefsful valour of Kirkaldy; all of which were, at first, employed in laying the foundations of the king's authority. On the one fide, measures were concerted with prudence, and executed with vigour; on the other, their refolutions were rash, and their conduct feeble. The people, animated with zeal for religion, and prompted by indignation against the queen, warmly fup-ported the king's cause. The clergy threw the whole weight of their popularity into the same fcale. By means of these, as well as by the powerful interpolition of England, the king's government was finally eftablished. Mary lost even that shadow of fovereignty, which, amidst all her fufferings, fhe had hitherto retained among part of her own fubjects. As fhe was no longer permitted to have an ambaffador at the court of England, the only mark of dignity which she had, for some time, enjoyed there, fhe must henceforth be confidered as an exile ftripped of all the enfigns of royalty; guarded with anxiety in the one kingdom, and totally deferted or forgotten in the other.

& Cald. ii. 408. Melv. 240. Crawf. Mem. 265. antagonifis

B. VI.

Kirkaldy and his affociates remained in Drury's cuftody, and were treated by him with great humanity, until the queen of England, whofe prifoners they were, fhould determine their fate.

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

220

Morton infifted that they flould fuffer the punifhment due to their rebellion and obflinacy; and declared that, fo long as they were allowed to live, he did not reckon his own perfon or authority fecure; and Elizabeth, without regarding Drury's honour, or his promifes in her name, gave them up to the regent's difpofal. He firft confined them in feparate prifons; and foon after [August 3], with Elizabeth's confent, condemned Kirkaldy, and his brother, to be hanged at the crofs of Edinburgh. Maitland, who did not expect to be treated more favourably, prevented the ignominy of a public execution, by a voluntary death, and " ended " his days," fays Melvil, " after the old Roman " fashion 1."

While the regent was wreaking his vengeance on the remains of her party in Scotland, Mary, incapable of affording them any relief, bewailed their misfortunes in the folitude of her prifon. At the fame time her health began to be much impaired by confinement and want of exercife. At the entreaty of the French ambaffador, lord Shrewfbury, her keeper, was permitted to conduct her to Buxton-wells, not far from Tuthbury, the place of her imprifonment. Cecil, who lately had been created baron of Burleigh, and lord high treafurer of England, happened to be there at the fame time. Though no minister ever entered more warmly into the views of a fovereign, or gave stronger proofs of his fidelity and attachment, than this great man, yet fuch was Elizabeth's distrust of every per-

I Melv. 242.

B. VI.

fon who approached the queen of Scots, that her fufpicions, in confequence of this interview, feem to have extended even to him; and, while Mary juftly reckoned him her most dangerous enemy, he found fome difficulty in perfuading his own miftrefs that he was not partial to that unhappy queen<sup>m</sup>.

The duke of Alva was this year recalled from the government of the Netherlands, where his haughty and oppreflive administration roufed a fpirit, in attempting to fubdue which, Spain exhausted its treasures, ruined its armies, and loft its glory. Requefens, who fucceeded him, was of a milder temper, and of a lefs enterprifing genius. This event delivered Elizabeth from the perpetual difquietude, occasioned by Alva's negotiations with the Scottish queen, and his zeal for her intereft.

1574.] Though Scotland was now fettled in profound peace, many of the evils which accompany civil war were ftill felt. The reftraints of law, which, in times of public confusion, are little regarded even by civilized nations, were totally defpifed by a fierce people, unaccultomed to a regular administration of justice. The diforders in every corner of the kingdom were become intolerable; and, under the protection of the one or the other faction, crimes of every kind were committed with impunity. The regent fet himfelf to redrefs these, and by his industry and vigour, order and fecurity were reestablished in the kingdom. But he lost the reputation due to this important fervice, by the > m Strype, ii. 248. 288. U 3

avarice

avarice which he discovered in performing it; and his own exactions became more pernicious to the nation than all the irregularities which he restrained ". Spies and informers were every where employed; the remembrance of old offences was revived; imaginary crimes were invented; petty trefpaffes were aggravated; and delinquents were forced to compound for their lives, by the payment of exorbitant fines. At the fame time the current coin was debafed ": licences were fold for carrying on prohibited branches of commerce; usual taxes were impofed on commodities; and all the refinements in opprefion, from which nations fo imperfectly polifhed as the Scots are ulually exempted, were put in practice. None of these were complained of more loudly, or with greater reason, than his injuffice towards the church. The thirds of benefices, out of which the clergy received their fubfiftence, had always been flowly and irregularly paid to collectors appointed by the general affembly; and, during the civil wars, no payment could be obtained in several parts of the king-

n See Append. No. XL.

• The corruption of the coin, during Morton's adminifiration, was very great. Although the quantity of current money coined out of a pound of bullion was gradually increated by former princes, the frandard or fineness fuffered little alteration, and the mixture of alloy was nearly the fame with what is now ufed. But Morton mixed a fourth part of alloy with every pound of filver, and funk, by confequence, the value of coin in proportion. In the year 1581, all the money coined by him was called in, and appointed to be recoined. The frandard was reflored to the fame purity as formerly. Ruddim. Præf. to Anderf. Diplom. p. 74:

222

dom,

1574. HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

dom. Under colour of redreffing this grievance, and upon a promife of affigning every minister a flipend within his own parifh, the regent extorted from the church the thirds to which they had right by law. But the clergy, instead of reaping any advantage from this alteration, found that payments became more irregular and dilatory than ever. One minister was commonly burdened with the care of four or five parishes, a pitiful falary was allotted him, and the regent's infatiable avarice feized on the reft of the fund P.

The death of Charles IX. which happened this year, was a new misfortune to the Scottifh queen. Henry III. who fucceeded him, had not the fame attachment to her perfon; and his jealoufy of the houfe of Guife, and obfequioufnefs to the queen mother, greatly alienated him from her intereft.

The death of the duke of Chatelherault [Jan. 22, 1575] must likewife be confidered as fome lofs to Mary. As the parliament had frequently declared him next heir to the crown, this entitled him to great refpect among his countrymen, and enabled him, more than any other perfon in the kingdom, to counterbalance the regent's power.

Soon after, at one of the ufual interviews between the wardens of the Scottish and English marches, a fcusse happened, in which the English were worsted; a few killed on the spot; and fir James Forrester, the warden, with several gentlemen who attended him, taken prisoners. But both

P Crawf. Mem. 272. Spotf. 273. Cald. ii. 420. 427. Elizabeth 224

B. VI.

Elizabeth and the regent were too fenfible of the advantage which refulted from the good underflanding that fubfifted between the two kingdoms, to allow this flight accident to interrupt it.

doms, to allow this flight accident to interrupt it. The domeftic tranquillity of the kingdom was in fome danger of being diffurbed by an-other caufe. Though the perfons raifed to the dignity of bifhops poffeffed very fmall revenues, and a very moderate degree of power, the clergy, to whom the regent and all his measures were become extremely odious, began to be jealous of that order. Knowing that corruptions steal into the church gradually, under honourable names, and upon decent pretences, they were afraid that, from fuch fmall beginnings, the hierarchy might grow in time to be as powerful and oppreflive as ever. The chief author of these fuspicions was Mr. Andrew Melvil, a man distinguished by his uncommon erudition, by the severity of his manners, and the intrepidity of his mind. But, bred up in the retirement of a college, he was unacquainted with the arts of life; and being more attentive to the ends which he purfued, than to the means which he employed for promoting them, he often defeated laudable defigns, by the impetuofity and imprudence with which he carried them on. A queftion was moved by him in the affembly, " whether the office of bishop, as now exercised in the kingdom, were agreeable to the word of God?" In the ecclefiaftical judicatories, continual complaints were made of the bishops for neglect of duty, many of which their known remissing to well justified. The bishop of Dunkeld, being accused of dilapidating ing his benefice, was found guilty by the affembly. The regent, inftead of checking, connived at thefe difputes about ecclefiaftical government, as they diverted the zeal of the clergy from attending to his daily encroachments on the patrimony of the church 9.

1576.] The weight of the regent's oppreffive administration had, hitherto, fallen chiefly on those in the lower and middle rank; but he began now to take fuch fteps as convinced the nobles, that their dignity would not long exempt them from feeling the effects of his power. An accident, which was a frequent caufe of diffenfion among the Scottish nobles, occasioned a difference between the earls of Argyll and Athol. A vaffal of the former had made fome depredations on the lands of the latter. Athol took arms to punish the offender; Argyll, to protect him; and this ignoble quarrel they were ready to decide in the field, when the regent, by interposing his authority, obliged them to difband their forces. Both of them had been guilty of irregularities, which, though common, were contrary to the letter of the law. Of thefe the regent took advantage, and refolved to found on them a charge of treafon. This defign was revealed to the two earls by one of Morton's retainers. The common danger, to which they were exposed, compelled them to forget old quarrels, and to unite in a close confederacy for their mutual defence. Their junction rendered them formidable; they defpifed the fummons which the regent gave them

9 Cald. Affemblies, 1574, &c. Johnst. Hift. 15.

225

to

to appear before a court of juffice; and he was obliged to defift from any further profecution. But the injury he intended made a deep imprefiion on their minds, and drew upon him fevere vengeance r.

Nor was he more fuccelsful in an attempt which he made, to load lord Claud Hamilton with the guilt of having formed a confpiracy against his life. Though those who were fupposed to be his accomplices, were feized and tortured, no evidence of any thing criminal appeared; but, on the contrary, many circumflances discovered his innocence, as well as the regent's fecret views, in imputing to him fuch an odious defign<sup>s</sup>.

1577.] The Scottish nobles, who were almost equal to their monarchs in power, and treated by them with much distinction, observed these arbitrary proceedings of a regent with the utmost indignation. The people, who, under a form of government extremely simple, had been little accustomed to the burden of taxes, complained loudly of the regent's rapacity. And all began to turn their eyes towards the young king, from whom they expected the redress of all their grievances, and the return of a more gentle and more equal administration.

James was now in the twelfth year of his age. The queen, foon after his birth, had committed him to the care of the earl of Mar, and during the civil wars he had refided fecurely in the caftle of Stirling. Alexander Erskine, that nobleman's brother, had the chief direction of F Crawf. Mem. 285.

• Ibid. 287• his

B. VI-

his education. Under him, the famous Buchanan acted as preceptor, together with three other masters, the most eminent the nation afforded for skill in those fciences which were deemed neceffary for a prince. As the young king shewed an uncommon passion for learning, and made great progrefs in it, the Scots fancied that they already difcovered in him all those virtues which the fondnefs or credulity of fubjects ufually afcribe to princes during their minority. But as James was still far from that age at which the law permitted him to affume the reins of government, the regent did not fufficiently attend to the fentiments of the people, nor reflect how naturally thefe prejudices in his favour might encourage the king to anticipate that period. He not only neglected to fecure the friendship of those who were about the king's perfon, and who poffeffed his ear, but had even exafperated fome of them by perfonal injuries. Their refentment concurred with the ambition of others, in infusing into the king early fufpicions of Morton's power and defigns. A king, they told him, had often reafon to fear, feldom to love, a regent. Prompted by ambi-tion, and by interest, he would endeavour to keep the prince in perpetual infancy, at a diftance from his fubjects, and unacquainted with bufinefs. A fmall degree of vigour, however, was fufficient to break the yoke. Subjects naturally reverence their fovereign, and become impatient of the temporary and delegated jurif-diction of a regent. Morton had governed with rigour unknown to the ancient monarchs of Scotland. The nation groaned under his oppreflions, fions, and would welcome the first prospect of a milder administration. At prefent the king's name was hardly mentioned in Scotland, his friends were without influence, and his favourites without honour. But one effort would discover Morton's power to be as feeble as it was arbitrary. The fame attempt would put himfelf in possession of his just authority, and refcue the nation from intolerable tyranny. If he did not regard his own rights as a king, let him liften, at least, to the crises of his people<sup>t</sup>.

These suggestions made a deep impression on the young king, who was trained up in an opinion that he was born to command. His approbation of the defign, however, was of fmall confequence, without the concurrence of the nobles. The earls of Argyll and Athol, two of the most powerful of that body, were animated with implacable refentment against the regent. To them the cabal in Stirlingcaftle communicated the plot which was on foot ; and they entering warmly into it, Alexander Erskine, who, fince the death of his brother, and during the minority of his nephew, had the command of that fort, and the cuftody of the king's perfon, admitted them fecretly into the king's prefence. They gave him the fame account of the milery of his fubjects, under the regent's arbitrary administration ; they complained loudly of the injustice with which themfelves had been treated, and befought the king, as the only means for redreffing the grievances of the nation, to call a council of all the nobles.

5 Melvil, 249.

James

B. VI.

1577.]. HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

James confented, and letters were iffued in his name for that purpole; but the two earls took care that they fhould be fent only to fuch as were known to bear no good will to Morton<sup>u</sup>. The number of thefe was, however, fo confiderable, that on the day appointed, far the greater part of the nobles affembled at Stirling ; and fo highly were they incenfed against Morton, that although, on receiving intelligence of Argyll and Athol's interview with the king, he had made a feint as if he would refign the regency, they advifed the king [March 24, 1578], without regarding this offer, to deprive him of his office, and to take the administration of government into his own hands. Lord Glamis the chancellor, and Herries, were appointed to fignify this refolution to Morton, who was at that time in Dalkeith, his usual place of refidence. Nothing could equal the joy with which this unexpected refolution filled the nation, but the furprife occasioned by the feeming alacrity with which the regent descended from fo high a station. He neither wanted fagacity to forefec the danger of refigning, nor inclination to keep posseffion of an office, for the expiration of which the law had fixed fo distant a term. But all the fources whence the faction of which he was head derived their ftrength, had either failed, or now fupplied his adverfaries with the means of humbling him. The commons, the city of Edinburgh, the clergy, were all totally alienated from liim, by his multiplied oppressions. Elizabeth, having lately bound herfelf by treaty, to > u Spotf. 278. X

FOL. II.

fend

B. VI. fend a confiderable body of troops to the affiftance of the inhabitants of the Netherlands, who were ftruggling for liberty, had little leifure to attend to the affairs of Scotland ; and as she had nothing to dread from France, in whofe councils the princes of Lorrain had not at that time much influence, she was not difpleased, perhaps, at the birth of new factions in the kingdom. Even those nobles, who had long been joined with Morton in faction, or whom he had attached to his perfon by benefits, Glamis, Lindfay, Rutliven, Pitcairn the fecretary, Murray of Tillibardin comptroller, all deferted his falling fortunes, and appeared in the council at Stirling. So many concurring circumftances convinced Morton of his own weaknefs, and determined him to give way to a torrent, which was too impetuous to be refifted. He attended the chancellor and Herries to Edinburgh [March 12]; was prefent when the king's acceptance of the government was proclaimed; and, in the prefence of the people, furrendered to the king all the authority to which he had any claim in virtue of his office. This ceremony was accompanied with fuch exceffive joy and acclamations of the multitude, as added, no doubt, to the anguish which an ambitious fpirit must feel, when compelled to renounce supreme power: and convinced Morton how entirely he had loft the affections of his countrymen. He obtained, however, from the king an act containing the approbation of every thing done by him in the exercile of his office, and a pardon, in the most ample form that his fear or caution could devife, of all paft offences, crimes, and treafons.

1578.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

treafons. The nobles, who adhered to the king, bound themfelves under a great penalty, to procure the ratification of this act in the first parliament *.

A council of twelve pecrs was appointed to affift the king in the administration of affairs. Morton, deferted by his own party, and unable to ftruggle with the faction which governed abfolutely at court, retired to one of his feats, and feemed to enjoy the tranquillity, and to be occupied only in the amufements of a country life. His mind, however, was deeply difquieted with all the uneafy reflections which accompany difappointed ambition, and intent on schemes for recovering his former grandeur. Even in this retreat, which the people called the Lion's den, his wealth and abilities rendered him formidable ; and the new counfellors were fo imprudent as to roufe him, by the precipitancy with which they haftened to ftrip him of all the remains of power. They required him to furrender the caftle of Edinburgh, which was still in his possession. He refused at first to do fo, and began to prcpare for its defence; but the citizens of Edinburgh having taken arms, and repulfed part of the garrifon, which was fent out to guard a convoy of provisions, he was obliged to give up that important fortress without relistance. This encouraged his adverfaries to call a parliament to meet at Edinburgh, and to multiply their demands upon him, in fuch a manner, as convinced him that nothing lefs than his utter ruin would fatisfy their inveterate hatred.

Their power and popularity, however, began already to decline. The chancellor, the ableft x Spotfw. 278. Crawf. Mem. 289. Cald. ii. 522. and and moft moderate man in the party, having been killed at Stirling, in an accidental rencounter between his followers and those of the earl of Crawford; Athol, who was appointed his fucceffor in that high office, the earls of Eglinton, Caithness, and lord Ogilvie, all the prime favourites at court, were either avowed papifts, or fuspected of leaning to the opinions of that fect. In an age when the return of popery was so much and so justly dreaded, this gave universal alarm. As Morton had always treated the papifts with rigour, this unfeasonable favour to perfons of that religion made all zealous protestants remember that circumstance in his administration with great praife y.

Morton, to whom none of these particulars were unknown, thought this the proper juncture for fetting to work the inftruments which he had been preparing. Having gained the confidence of the earl of Mar, and of the countels his mother, he infinuated to them, that Alexander Erskine had formed a plot to deprive his nephew of the government of Stirling-caftle, and the cuftody of the king's perfon; and eafily induced an ambitious woman, and a youth of twenty, to employ force to prevent this fuppofed injury. The earl repairing fuddenly to Stirling [April 26], and being admitted as usual into the caftle with his attendants, feized the gates early in the morning, and turned out his uncle, who dreaded no danger from his hands. The foldiers of the garrifon fubmitted to him as their governor, and, with little danger and no effusion of blood, he became

y Spotf. 283.

mafter

B. VI.

1578.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

mafter both of the king's perfon, and of the fortrefs z.

An event fo unexpected occafioned great con. fternation. Though Morton's hand did not appear in the execution, he was univerfally believed to be the author of the attempt. The new counfellors faw it to be neceffary, for their own fafety, to change their meafures, and, inftead of purfuing him with fuch implacable refentment, to enter into terms of accommodation with an adverfary, still fo capable of creating them trouble. Four were named, on each fide, to adjust their differences. They met not far from Dalkeith; and when they had brought matters near a conclusion, Morton, who was too fagacious not to improve the advantage which their fecurity and their attention to the treaty afforded him, fet out in the night-time for Stirling, and having gained Murray of Tillibardin, Mar's uncle, was admitted by him into the caftle [May 24]; and managing matters there with his ufual dexterity, he foon had more entirely the command of the fort tlian the earl himfelf. He was likewife admitted to a feat in the privy council, and acquired as complete an ascendant in it a.

As the time appointed for the meeting of parliament at Edinburgh now approached, this gave him fome anxiety. He was afraid of conducting the young king to a city whofe inhabitants were fo much at the devotion of the adverse faction. He was no less unwilling to leave James behind at Stirling. In order to avoid this dilemma, he issued a proclamation in the king's name, chang-

2 Cald. ii. 535.

a Ibid. ii. 536.

ing

ing the place of meeting from Edinburgh to Stirling caftle. This Athol and his party represented as a step altogether unconstitutional. The king, faid they, is Morton's prifoner; the pretended counfellors arc his flaves ; a parliament, to which all the nobles may repair without fear, and where they may deliberate with freedom, is abfolutely neceffary for fettling the nation, after diforders of fuch long continuance. But in an affembly, called contrary to all form, held within the walls of a garrifon, and overawed by armed men, what fafety could members expect ? what liberty could prevail in debate ? or what benefit refult to the public? The parliament met, how-ever, on the day appointed [July 25], and notwithstanding the protestation of the earl of Montrofe and lord Lindfay, in name of their party, proceeded to bufinefs. The king's acceptance of the government was confirmed; the act granted to Morton, for his fecurity, ratified ; fome regulations, with regard to the numbers and authority of the privy council, were agreed upon ; and a penfion for life granted to the counters of Mar, who had been fo instrumental in bringing about the late revolution b.

Meanwhile Argyll, Athol, and their followers, took arms, upon the fpecious pretence of refcuing the king from captivity, and the kingdom from oppression. James himself, impatient of the fervitude in which he was held, by a man whom he had long been taught to hate, fecretly encouraged their enterprise; though, at the fame time, he was obliged not only to difavow them

b Cald. ii. 547. Parl. 5 Jac. 6.

B. VI.

in public, but to levy forces against them, and even to declare, by proclamation [Aug. 11], that he was perfectly free from any constraint, either upon his perfon or his will. Both fides quickly took the field. Argyll and Athol were at the head of feven thousand men; the earl of Angus, Morton's nephew, met them with an army five thousand strong; neither party, however, was eager to engage. Morton distrusted the fidelity of his own troops. The two earls were fenfible that a fingle victory, however complete, would not be decifive; and as they were in no condition to underake the fiege of Stirlingcaftle, where the king was kept, their ftrength would foon be exhaufted, while Morton's own wealth, and the patronage of the queen of England, might furnish him with endless refources. By the mediation of Bowes, whom Elizabeth had fent into Scotland to negotiate an accommodation between the two factions, a treaty was concluded, in confequence of which, Argyll and Athol were admitted into the king's prefence ; fome of their party were added to the privy council ; and a convention of nobles called, in order to bring all remaining differences to an amicable iffue c.

As foon as James affumed the government into his own hands, he difpatched the abbot of Dunfermling to inform Elizabeth of that event; to offer to renew the alliance between the two kingdoms; and to demand poffeffion of the . eftate which had lately fallen to him by the death of his grandmother the counters of Lennox.

c Crawf. Mem. 307.

That

236

That lady's fecond fon had left one daughter, Arabella Stewart, who was born in England. And as the chief objection against the pretenfions of the Scottish line to the crown of England, was that maxim of English law, which excludes aliens from any right of inheritance within the kingdom, Elizabeth, by granting this demand, would have established a precedent in James's favour, that might have been deemed decifive, with regard to a point which it had been her conftant care to keep undecided. Without fuffering this delicate question to be tried, or allowing any new light to be thrown on that, which the confidered as the great mystery of her reign, fhe commanded lord Burleigh, mafter of the wards, to fequester the rents of the eftate ; and by this method of proceeding, gave the Scottifh king early warning how necessary it would be to court her favour, if ever he hoped for fuccefs in claims of greater importance, but equally liable to be controverted d.

1579.] After many delays, and with much difficulty, the contending nobles were at laft brought to fome agreement. But it was followed by a tragical event. Morton, in token of reconcilement, having invited the leaders of the oppofite party to a great entertainment, Athol the chancellor was foon after taken ill, and died within a few days [April 24]. The fymptoms and violence of the difeafe gave rife to flrong fufpicions of his being poifoned; and though the phyficians, who opened his body, differed in opinion as to the caufe of the diftem-

4 Camd. 461.

B. VI.

per, the chancellor's relations publicly accufed Morton of that odious crime. The advantage which visibly accrued to him, by the removal of a man of great abilities, and averse from all his measures, was deemed a sufficient proof of his, guilt by the people, who are ever fond of imputing the death of eminent perfons to extraordinary causes.

The office of chancellor was beftowed upon Argyll, whom this preferment reconciled, in a great measure, to Morton's administration. He had now recovered all the authority which he poffeffed during his regency, and had entirely broken, or baffled, the power and cabals of his enemies. None of the great families remained to be the objects of his jealoufy, or to obstruct his defigns, but that of Hamilton. The earl of Arran, the eldeft brother, had never recovered the shock which he received from the ill fuccess of his paffion for the queen, and had now altogether loft his reafon. Lord John, the fecond brother, was in poffeffion of the family eftate. Lord Claud was commendator of Paifly; both of them young men, ambitious and enterprifing. Morton dreaded their influence in the kingdom ; the courtiers hoped to fhare their fpoils among them; and as all princes naturally view their fucceffors with jealoufy and hatred, it was eafy to infuse these passions into the mind of the young king. A pretence was at hand to juffify the most violent proceedings. The pardon, ftipulated in the treaty of Perth, did not extend to fuch as were acceffary to the murder of the re-

e Spotfw. 306.

gents

gents Murray or Lennox. Lord John and his brother were fuspected of being the authors of both thefe crimes, and had been included in a general act of attainder on that account. Without fummoning them to trial, or examining a fingle witness to prove the charge, this attainder was now thought fufficient to fubject them to all the penalties which they would have incurred by being formally convicted. The earls of Morton, Mar, and Eglinton, together with the lords Ruthven, Boyd, and Cathcart, received a commiffion to feize their perfons and eftates. On a few hours warning, a confiderable body of troops was ready, and marched towards Hamilton in hoftile array. Happily the two brothers made their escape, though with great difficulty. But their lands were confifcated ; the caftles of Hamilton and Draffan besieged ; those who desended them punished. The earl of Arran, though incapable, from his fituation, of committing any crime, was involved, by a shameful abufe of law, in the common ruin of his family ; and as if he, too, could have been guilty of rebellion, he was confined a cl se prisoner. These proceedings, so contrary to the fundamental principles of juffice, were all ratified in the fubfequent parliament f.

About this time Mary fent by Naué her fecretary, a letter to her fon, together with fome jewels of value, and a veft embroidered with her own hands. But as fhe gave him only the title of prince of Scotland, the meffenger was difmiffed without being admitted into his prefence <sup>g</sup>.

> f Crawf. Mem. 311. Spothw. 306. & Crawf. Mem. 314.

> > Though

B. VI.

Though Elizabeth had, at this.time, no particular reason to fear any attempt of the popish princes in Mary's favour, fhe still continued to guard her with the fame anxious care. The acquifition of Portugal, on the one hand, and the defence of the Netherlands, on the other, fully employed the councils and arms of Spain. France, torn in pieces by inteffine commotions, and under a weak and capricious prince, defpifed and diftrufted by his own fubjects, was in no condition to difturb its neighbours. Elizabeth had long amufed that court by carrying on a treaty of marriage with the duke of Alençon, the king's brother. But whether, at the age of forty-five, fhe really intended to marry a prince of twenty; whether the pleafure of being flattered and courted, made her liften to the addreffes of fo young a lover, whom the allowed to vifit her at two different times, and treated with the most diftinguishing respect; or whether confiderations of interest predominated in this as well as in every other transaction of her reign, are problems in hiftory which we are not concerned to refolve. During the progrefs of this negotiation, which was drawn out to an extraordinary length, Mary could expect no affiftance from the French court, and feems to have held little correspondence with it; and there was no period in her reign, wherein Elizabeth enjoyed more perfect fecurity.

Morton feems at this time to have been equally fecure ; but his fecurity was not fo well-founded. He had weathered out one florm, had crushed his adversaries, and was again in posses of the fole direction of affairs. But as the king was now

B. VI.

now of an age when the character and difpofitions of the mind begin to unfold themfelves, and to become vifible, the finalleft attention to thefe might have convinced him, that there was reafon to expect new and more dangerous attacks on his power. James early difcovered that exceffive attachment to favourites, which accompanied him through his whole life. This paffion, which naturally arifes from inexperience, and youthful warmth of heart, was, at his age, far from being culpable; nor could it well be expected that the choice of the objects, on whom he placed his affections, should be made with great skill. The most confiderable of them was Efme Stewart, a native of France, and fon of a fecoud brother of the earl of Lennox. He was diffinguished by the title of lord D'Aubigné, an estate in France, which defcended to him from his anceftors, on whom it had been conferred, in reward of their valour and fervices to the French crown. He arrived in Scotland about this time [Sept. 8], on purpofe to demand the eftate and title of Lennox, to which he pretended a legal right. He was received at firft by the king with the refpect due to fo near a relation. The gracefulnefs of his perfon, the elegance of his drefs, and his courtly behaviour, made a great impression on James, who, even in his more mature years, was little able to refift these frivolous charms; and his affection flowed with its usual rapidity and profusion. Within a few days after Stewart's appearance at court, he was created lord Aberbrothock, foon after earl, and then duke of Lennox, governor of Dunbarton caftle, captain of the guard, first lord

1579.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

lord of the bed-chamber, and lord high chamberlain. At the same time, and without any of the envy or emulation which is usual among candidates for favour, captain James Stewart, the fecond fon of lord Ochiltree, grew into great confidence. But notwithftanding this union, Lennox and captain Stewart were perfons of very opposite characters. The former was natu-rally gentle, humane, candid, but unacquaint-ed with the state of the country, and misled or mifinformed by those whom he trufted; not unworthy to be the companion of the young king in his amusements, but utterly disqualified for acting as a minister in directing his affairs. The latter was remarkable for all the vices which render a man formidable to his country, and a pernicious counsellor to his prince; nor did he posses any one virtue to counterbalance these vices, unless dexterity in conducting his own defigns, and an enterprifing courage, superior to the fense of danger, may pass by that name. Unrestrained by religion, regardless of de-cency, and undifmayed by opposition, he aimed at objects seemingly unattainable; but under a prince void of experience, and blind to all the defects of those who had gained his favour, his audacity was successful; and honours, wealth, and power were the reward of his crimes.

Both the favourites concurred in employing their whole address to undermine Morton's credit, which alone obstructed their full possession of power. As James had been bred up with an aversion for that nobleman, who endeavoured rather to maintain the authority of a tutor, than to yol. 11.  $\chi$  act act with the obscquiousness of a minister, they found it no difficult matter to accomplifu their defign. Morton, who could no longer keep the king shut up within the walls of Stirling-castle, having called a parliament to meet at Edinburgh [Oct. 17], brought him thither. James made his entry into the capital with great folemnity; the citizens received him with the loudest acclamations of joy, and with many expensive pageants, according to the mode of that age. After a long period of thirty-feven years, during which Scotland had been fubjected to the delegated power of regents, or to the feeble government of a woman; after having fuffered all the miferies of civil war, and felt the infolence of foreign armies, the nation rejoiced to fee the fceptre once more in the hands of a king. Fond even of that shadow of authority, which a prince of fiftéen could possels, the Scots flattered themfelves, that union, order, and tranquillity would now be reftored to the kingdom. James opened the parliament with extraordinary pomp, but nothing remarkable passed in it.

- B. VI.

1580.] Thefe demonstrations, however, of the people's love and attachment to their fovereign, encouraged the favourites to continue their infinuations againft Morton; and as the king now refided in the palace of Holyrood-houfe, to which all his fubjects had accefs, the cabal againft the carl grew daily ftronger, and the intrigue, which occafioned his fall, ripened gradually.

Morton began to be fenfible of his danger, and endeavoured to put a ftop to the career of Lennox's preferment, by reprefenting him as a formidable formidable enemy to the reformed religion, a fecret agent in favour of popery, and a known emiffary of the houfe of Guife. The clergy, apt to believe every rumour of this kind, fpread the alarm among the people. But Lennox, either out of complaifance to his mafter, or convinced by the arguments of fome learned divines whom the king appointed to inftruct him in the principles of the proteftant religion, publicly renounced the errors of popery in the church of St. Giles, and declared himfelf a member of the church of Scotland, by figning her confeffion of faith. This, though it did not remove all fufpicions, nor filence fome zealous preachers, abated, in a great degree, the force of the accufation <sup>h</sup>.

On the other hand, a rumour prevailed that Morton was preparing to feize the king's perfon and to carry him into England. Whether defpair of maintaining his power by any other means, had driven him to make any overture of that kind to the Englifh court, or whether it was a calumny invented by his adverfaries to render him odious, cannot now be determined with certainty. As he declared at his death that fuch a defign had never entered into his thoughts, the latter feems to be most probable. It afforded a pretence, however, for reviving the office of lord chamberlain, which had been for fome time difufed That honour was conferred on Lennox, Alexander Erskinc, Morton's capital enemy, was his deputy; they had under them a band of gentlemen, who were appointed conflantly to attend the king, and to guard his perfon<sup>i</sup>.

h Crawf. Mem. 319: Spotfw. 308.

¥ 2

men,

Morton was not ignorant of what his enemies intended to infinuate by fuch unufual precautions for the king's fafety; and as his laft refource, applied to Elizabeth, whole protection had often flood him in flead in his greateft difficulties. In confequence of this application, Bowes, her envoy, accused Lennox of practices against the peace of the two kingdoms, and infifted, in her name, that he fhould inftantly be removed from the privy council. Such an unprecedented demand was confidered by the counfellors as an affront to the king, and an encroachment on the independence of the kingdom. They affected to call in question the envoy's powers, and upon that pretence refused him farther audience ; and he retiring in difgust, and without taking leave, fir Alexander Home was fent to expostulate with Elizabeth on the fubject. After the treatment which her envoy had received, Elizabeth thought it below her dignity to admit Home into her presence. Burleigh, to whom he was commanded to impart his commiffion, reproached him with his mafter's ingratitude towards a benefactrefs who had placed the crown on his liead, and required him to advife the king to beware of facrificing the friendship of fo necessary an ally to the giddy humours of a young man, without experience, and strongly suffected of principles and attachments

i Crawf. Mem. 320.

incom-

1580.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

incompatible with the happiness of the Scottish nation.

This accufation of Lennox, hastened, in all probability, Morton's fall. The act of indemnity, which he had obtained when he refigned the regency, was worded with fuch fcrupulous exactnels, as almost fcreened him from any legal profecution. The murder of the late king was the only crime which could not, with decency, he inferted in a pardon granted by his fon. Here Morton still lay open to the penalties of the law, and captain Stewart, who fhunned no action, however desperate, if it led to power or to favour, entered the council-chamber while the king and nobles were affembled [Dec. 30], and falling on his knees, accufed Morton of being acceffary, or, according to the language of the Scottish law, art and part, in the confpiracy against the life of his majefty's father, and offered, under the ufual penalties, to verify this charge by legal evidence. Morton, who was present, heard this acculation with firmness; and replied with a difdainful smile, proceeding either from contempt of the infamous character of his accufer, or from consciousness of his own innocence, " that his known zeal in punishing those who were fuspected of that detestable crime, might well exempt himfelf from any fulpicion of being acceffary to it; nevertheless, he would cheerfully submit to a trial, either in that place or in any other court ; and doubted not but his own innocence, and the malice of his enemies, would then appear in the cleareft light." Stewart, who was still on his knees, began to inquire how he would reconcile his beftowing fo many honours

¥ 3

on

on Archibald Douglas, whom he certainly knew to be one of the murderers, with his pretended zeal against that crime. Morton was ready to answer. But the king commanded both to be removed. The earl was confined, first of all to his own houfe, and then committed to the caftle of Edinburgh [Jan. 2, 1581], of which Alexander Erfkine was governor; and as if it had not been a fufficient indignity to fubject him to the power of one of his enemies, he was foon after carried to Dunbarton, of which Lennox had the command. A warrant was likewife iffued [Jan. 18] for apprehending Archibald Douglas; but he, having received timely intelligence of the approaching danger, fled into England k.

The earl of Angus, who imputed thefe violent proceedings, not to hatred against Morton alone, but to the ancient enmity between the houses of Stewart and of Douglas, and who believed that a confpiracy was now formed for the destruction of all who bore that name, was ready to take arms in order to refcue his kinfman. But Morton abfolutely forbad any fuch attempt, and declared that he would rather fuffer ten thousand deaths, than bring an imputation upon his own character by feeming to decline a trial<sup>1</sup>.

Elizabeth did not fail to interpole, with warmth, in behalf of a man who had contributed fo much to preferve her influence over Scotland. The late transactions in that kingdom had given her great uneafiness. The power which Len-

k Crawf. Mem. 323. 1 Johnst. 64. Spotfw. 317. nox

E. VI.

1581.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

nox had acquired independent of her was dangerous; the treatment her ambaffadors had met with differed greatly from the respect with which the Scots were in use to receive her ministers; and the attack now made on Morton fully convinced her that there was an intention to fow the feeds of difcord between the two nations, and to feduce James into a new alliance with France, or into a marriage with fome popifh princefs. Full of thefe apprehensions, she ordered a confiderable body of troops to be affembled on the borders of Scotland, and difpatched Randolph as her ambaffador into that kingdom. He addreffed himfelf not only to James, and to his council, but to a convention of eftates, met at that time. He began with enumerating the extraordinary benefits which Elizabeth had conferred on the Scottish nation, that without demanding a fingle foot of land for herfelf, without encroaching on the liberties of the kingdom in the fmalleft article, fhe had, at the expence of the blood of her fubjects and the treasures of her crown, rescued the Scots from the dominion of France, established among them true religion, and put them in poffeffion of their ancient rights: that from the beginning of civil diffentions in the kingdom, the had protected those who espoufed the king's cause, and by her affiftance alone, the crown had been preferved on his head, and all the attempts of the adverse faction baffled : that an union, unknown to their anceftors, but equally beneficial to both kingdoms, had fubfifted for a long period of years; and though fo many popifh princes had combined to diffurb this happy flate of things, her her care, and their conftancy, had hitherto defeated all thefe efforts : that the had obferved of late an unufual coldnefs, diftruft, and eftrangement in the Scottish council, which she could impute to none but to Lennox, a fubject of France, a retainer to the house of Guise, bred up in the errors of popery, and still suspected of favouring that superstition. Not fatisfied with having mounted fo fast to an uncommon height of power, which he exercifed with all the rafhncfs of youth, and all the ignorance of a ftranger; nor thinking it cnough to have deprived the earl of Morton of the authority due to his abilities and experience, he had confpired the ruin of that nobleman, who had often expofed his life in the king's caufe, who had contributed more than any other fubject to place him on the throne, to refift the encroachments of popery, and to preferve the union between the two kingdoms. If any zeal for religion remained among the nobles in Scotland, if they wished for the continuance of amity with England, if they valued the privileges of their own order, hc called upon them, in the name of his mistrefs, to remove fuch a pernicious counfellor as Lennox from the prefence of the young king, to refcue Morton out of the hands of his avowed enemy, and fecure to him the benefit of a fair and impartial trial: and if force was neceffary towards accomplishing a defign to falutary to the king and kingdom, he promifed them the protection of his miftrefs in the enterprife, and whatever affiftance they fhould demand either of men or money m.

m Cald, iii. 6. Strype, ii. 621.

But

B. VI.

But these extraordinary remonstrances, accompanied with fuch an unufual appeal from the king to his fubjects, were not the only means employed by Elizabeth in favour of Morton, and againft Lennox. She perfuaded the prince of Orange to fend an agent into Scotland, and under colour of complimenting James on account of the valour which many of his fubjects had difplayed in the fervice of the States, to enter into a long detail of the reftlefs enterprifes of the popish princes against the protestant religion ; to befeech him to adhere inviolably to the alliance with England, the only barrier which fecured his kingdom against their dangerous cabals; and, above all things, to diffrust the infinuations of those who endeavoured to weaken or to diffolve that union between the British nations, which all the protestants in Europe beheld with fo much pleafure ".

James's counfellors were too intent upon the deftruction of their enemy to liften to thefe remonftrances. The officious interpolition of the prince of Orange, the haughty tone of Elizabeth's meffage, and her avowed attempt to excite fubjects to rebel againft their fovereign, were confidered as unexampled infults on the majefty and independence of a crowned head. A general and evalive anfwer was given to Randolph. James prepared to affert his own dignity with fpirit. All thofe fulpected of favouring Morton were turned out of office, fome of them were required to furrender themfelves prifoners; the men capable of bearing arms throughout the kingdom were commanded to be in readinefs to take the field; and troops were levied and pofted on the borders. The Englifh ambaffador, finding that neither the public manifefto which he had delivered to the convention, nor his private cabals with the nobles, could excite them to arms, fled in the night-time out of Scotland, where libels againft him had been daily publifhed, and even attempts made upon his life. In both kingdoms every thing wore an hoftile afpect. But Elizabeth, though fhe wifhed to have intimidated the Scottifh king by her preparations, had no inclination to enter into a war with him, and the troops on the borders, which had given fuch umbrage, were foon difperfed °.

n Cald. iii. 9. See Append. No. XLI.

The greater folicitude Elizabeth difcovered for Morton's fafety, the more eagerly did his enemies drive on their fehemes for his deftruction. Captain Stewart, his accufer, was first appointed tutor to the earl of Arran, and foon after both the title and effate of his unhappy ward, to which he advanced fome frivolous claim, were conferred upon him. The new-made peer was commanded to conduct Morton from Dunbarton to Edinburgh; and by that choice the earl was not only warned what fate he might expect, but had the cruel mortification of feeing his deadly enemy already loaded with honours, in reward of the malice with which he had contributed to his ruin.

The records of the court of jufliciary at this period are loft. The account which our hifto-

o Crawf. Mem. 328. Stripe, ii. App. 138.

rians

B. VI.

1581.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

rians give of Morton's trial is inaccurate and unfatisfactory. The proceedings against him feem to have been carried on with violence. During the trial, great bodies of armed men were drawn up in different parts of the city. The jury was composed of the earl's known enemies; and though he challenged feveral of them, his objections were over-ruled. After a short confultation, his peers found him guilty of concealing, and of being art and part in the confpiracy against the life of the late king. The first part of the verdict did not furprife him, but he twice repeated the words art and part with fome vehemence, and added, " God knows it is not fo." The doom which the law decrees against a traitor, was pronounced. The king, however, remitted the cruel and ignominious part of the fentence, and appointed that he should fuffer death next day, by being beheaded P.

During that awful interval, Morton poffeffed the utmoft composure of mind. He supped cheerfully; suppose the rest of the night in his usual manner, and employed the rest of his time in religious conferences, and in acts of devotion with some ministers of the city. The clergymen who attended him, dealt freely with his conference, and preffed his crimes home upon him. What he confessed with regard to the crime for which he suffered, is remarkable, and supplies, in some measure, the imperfection of our records. He acknowledged, that on his return from England, after the death of Rizio, Bothwell had informed him of the confpiracy against the king, which the queen, as he told him, knew of and approved; that he folicited him to concur in the execution of it, which at that time he abfolutely declined; that foon after, Bothwell himfelf, and Archibald Douglas in his name, renewing their folicitations to the fame purpose, he had required a warrant under the queen's hand, authorizing the attempt, and as that had never been produced, he had refufed to be any farther concerned in the matter. "But," continued he, " as I neither confented to this treasonable act, nor affifted in the committing of it, fo it was impofiible for me to reveal, or to prevent it. To whom could I make the difcovery? The queen was the author of the enterprife. Darnly was fuch a changeling, that no fecret could be fafely communicated to him. Huntly and Bothwell, who bore the chief fway in the kingdom, were themfelves the perpetrators of the crime." These circumstances, it must be confessed, go some length towards extenuating Morton's guilt ; and though his apology for the favour he had fhown to Archibald Douglas, whom he knew to be one of the conspirators, be far less fatisfactory, no uneafy reflections feem to have difquieted his own mind on that account 9. When his keepers told him that the guards were attending, and all things in readiness, "I praife my God," faid he, " I am ready likewife." Arran commanded these guards; and even in those moments when the most implacable hatred is apt to relent, the malice of his enemies could not forbear this infult. On the scaffold, his behaviour was calm;

P Spotfw. 314. Johnst. 65. Crawf. Mem. 332. Cald. iii. 45. Arnot's Crimin. Trials, 388.

him

252

9 Crawf Mem. App. iii.

his

B. VI.

his countenance and voice unaltered; and after fome time fpent in devotion, he fuffered death with the intrepidity which became the name of Douglas. His head was placed on the public gaol of Edinburgh; and his body, after lying till fun-fet on the fcaffold, covered with a beggarly cloak, was carried by common porters to the ufual burial-place of criminals. None of his friends durft accompany it to the grave, or difcover their gratitude and refpect by any fymptoms of forrow <sup>r</sup>.

Arran, no less profligate in private life, than audacious in his public conduct, foon after drew the attention of his countrymen, by his infamous marriage with the countels of March. Before he grew into favour at court, he had been often entertained in her husband's house, and without regarding the laws of hospitality or of gratitude, carried on a criminal intrigue with the wife of his benefactor, a woman young and beautiful, but, according to the defcription of a cotemporary hiftorian, " intolerable in all the imperfections incident to her fex." Impatient of any refiraint upon their mutual defires, they, with equal ardour, wilhed to avow their union pub-licly, and to legitimate, by a marriage, the off-fpring of their unlawful paffion. The countefs petitioned to be divorced from her hufband, for a reafon which no modeft woman will ever plead. The judges, over-awed by Arran, paffed fentence without delay. This infamous scene was concluded by a marriage, folemnifed with great pomp [July 6], and beheld by all ranks of men with the utmost horror s.

r Crawf. Mem. 334. Spotfw. 314. Spot VOL. 11. Z

s Spotfw. 315. A par-

A parliament was held this year [Oct. 24], at the opening of which fome difputes arofe between Arran and the earl now created duke of Lennox. Arran, haughty by nature, and pushed on by his wife's ambition, began to affect an equality with the duke, under whole protection he had hitherto been contented to place himfelf. After various attempts to form a party in the council against Lennox, he found him fixed fo firmly in the king's affections, that it was impoffible to fhake him; and rather than lofe all intereft at court, from which he was banished, he made the most humble submissions to the favourite, and again recovered his former credit. This rupture contributed, however, to render the duke still more odious to the nation. During the continuance of it, Arran affected to court the clergy, pretended an extraordinary zeal for the proteft. ant religion, and laboured to confirm the fufpicions which were entertained of his rival, as an emiffary of the house of Guile, and a favourer of popery. As he was supposed to be acquainted with the duke's most fecret defigns, his calumnies were liftened to with greater credit than was due to his character. To this rivalship between Lennox and Arran, during the continuance of which each endeavoured to conciliate the goodwill of the clergy, we must ascribe feveral acts of this parliament uncommonly favourable to the church, particularly one which abolished the practice introduced by Morton, of appointing but one minister to several parishes.

No notice hath been taken for feveral years of ecclefiaftical affairs. While the civil government underwent fo many extraordinary revolutions, the church church was not free from convultions. Two objects chiefly engroffed the attention of the . clergy. The one was, the forming a fyftem of difcipline, or ecclesiaftical polity. After long labour, and many difficulties, this fystem was at last brought to fome degree of perfection. The affembly folemnly approved of it, and appointed it to be laid before the privy council, in order to obtain the ratification of it in parliament, But Morton, during his administration, and those who, after his fall, governed the king, were equally unwilling to see it earried into execution; and by starting difficulties, and throwing in objections, prevented it from receiving a legal fanction. The other point in view was, the abolition of the epifcopal order. The bishops were fo devoted to the king, to whom they owed their promotion, that the function itself was by fome reekoned dangerous to civil liberty. Being allowed a feat in par-liament, and diffinguished by titles of honour, thefe not only occafioned many avocations from their spiritual functions, but soon rendered their character and manners extremely different from those of the clergy in that age. The nobles viewed their power with jealoufy; the populace confidered their lives as profane; and both wifhed their downfal with equal ardour. The per-fonal emulation between Melvil and Adamfon, a man of learning, and eminent for his popular eloquence, who was promoted, on the death of Douglas, to be archbishop of St. Andrew's, mingled itself with the paffions on cach fide, and heightened them. Attaeks were made in every affembly on the order of bifhops; their privileges were were gradually circumfcribed; and at laft an act was paffed, declaring the office of bishop, as it was then exercifed within the realm, to have neither foundation nor warrant in the word of God; and requiring, under pain of excommunication, all who now poffeffed that office, inftantly to refign it, and to abftain from preaching or administering the facraments, until they should receive permission from the general assembly. The court did not acquiesce in this decree. A vacancy happening foon after in the fee of Glafgow, Montgomery minister at Stirling, a man vain, fickle, prefumptuous, and more apt, by the blemishes in his character, to have alienated the people from an order already beloved, than to reconcile them to one which was the object of their hatred, made an infamous fimoniacal bargain with Lennox, and on his recommendation was chosen archbishop. The presbytery of Stirling, of which he was a member, the prefbytery of Glafgow, whither he was to be tranflated, the general affembly, vied with each other in profecuting him on that account. [1582] In order to fcreen Montgomery, James made trial both of gentle and of rigorous measures, and both were equally ineffectual. The general affembly was just ready to pronounce against him the fentence of excommunication, when an herald entered, and commanded them in the king's name, and under pain of rebellion, to ftop further proceedings. Even this injunction they defpifed; and though Montgomery, by his tears and feeming penitence, procured a short respite, the sentence was at last iffued by their appointment, and published in all the churches throughout the kingdom.

7. 2

256

B. VI.

The

The firmness of the clergy in a collective body was not greater than the boldnefs of fome individuals, particularly of the ministers of Edinburgh. They inveighed daily against the corruptions in the administration; and, with the freedom of fpeech admitted into the pulpit in that age, named Lennox and Arran as the chief authors of the grievances under which the church and kingdom groaned. The courtiers, in their turn, complained to the king of the infolent and feditious fpirit of the clergy. In order to check the boldnefs of their discourses, James iffued a proclamation, commanding Dury, one of the most popular ministers, not only to leave the town, but to abstain from preaching in any other place. Dury complained to the judicatories of this incroachment upon the immunities of his office. They approved of the doctrine which he had delivered; and he determined to difregard the royal proclamation. But the magiftrates being determined to compel him to leave the city, according to the king's orders, he was obliged to abandon his charge, after protefting publicly at the crofs of Edinburgh, against the violence which was put upon him. The people accompanied him to the gates with tears and lamentations; and the clergy denounced the vengeance of Heaven against the authors of this outrage t.

In this perilous fituation flood the church, the authority of its judicatories called in queftion, and the liberty of the pulpit reftrained, when a

<sup>t</sup> Cald. Affemb. 1576-1582. Spotfw. 277, &c. fudden fudden revolution of the civil government procured them unexpected relief.

The two favourites, by their afcendant over the king, poffeffed uncontrolled power in the kingdom, and exercifed it with the utmost wantonnefs. James ufually refided at Dalkeith, or Kinneil, the feats of Lennox and of Arran, and was attended by fuch company, and employed in fuch amufements, as did not fuit his dignity. The fervices of those who had contributed most to place the crown on his head were but little remembered. Many who had oppofed him with the greatest virulence, enjoyed the rewards and honours to which the others were entitled. Exalted notions of regal prerogative, utterly incon-fiftent with the conflitution of Scotland, being instilled by his favourites into the mind of the young monarch, unfortunately made, at that early age, a deep impression there, and became the fource of almost all his subsequent errors in the government of both kingdoms". Courts of juffice were held in almost every county, the proprietors of land were called before them, and upon the flighteft neglect of any of the numerous forms which are peculiar to feudal holdings, they were fined with unufual and intolerable rigour. The lord chamberlain revived the obfolete jurifdiction of his office over the boroughs, and they were fubjected to actions no lefs grievous. A defign feemed likewife to have been formed to exafperate Elizabeth, and to diffolve the alliance with her, which all good protestants u Cald. iii. 152.

cfteemed

B. VI.

efteemed the chief fecurity of their religion in Scotland. A clofe correfpondence was carried on between the king and his mother, and confiderable progrefs made towards uniting their titles to the crown, by fuch a treaty of affociation as Maitland had projected; which could not fail of endangering or diminifhing his authority, and muft have proved fatal to thofe who had acted againft her with greateft vigour <sup>x</sup>.

All thefe circumstances irritated the impatient fpirit of the Scottish nobles, who refolved to tolerate no longer the infolence of the two minions, or to fland by, while their prefumption and inexperience ruined both the king and kingdom. Élizabeth, who, during the administration of the four regents, had the entire direction of the affairs of Scotland, felt herfelf deprived of all influence in that kingdom ever fince the death of Morton, and was ready to countenance any attempt to refcue the king out of the hands of favourites who were leading him into meafures to repugant to all her views. The earls of Mar and Glencairn, lord Ruthven, lately created earl of Gowrie, lord Lindfay, lord Boyd, the tutor of Glamis, the eldest fon of lord Oliphant, with feveral barons and gentlemen of diffinction, entered into a combination for that purpofe; and as changes in administration, which, among polished nations, are brought about slowly and filently, by artifice and intrigue, were in that rude age effected fuddenly and by violence, the king's fituation, and the fecurity of the favourites,

× Cald. iii. 157.

B. VI.

ites, encouraged the confpirators to have immediate recourfe to force.

James, after having refided for fome time in Athol, where he enjoyed his favourite amufement of hunting, was now returning towards Edinburgh with a small train. He was invited to Ruthven caftle, which lay in his way ; and as he fuspected no danger, he went thither in hopes of farther sport. The multitude of strangers whom he found there gave him fome uneafines; and as those who were in the fecret arrived every moment from different parts, the appearance of fo many new faces increafed his fears. He concealed his uneafinefs, however, with the utmost care ; and next morning prepared for the field, expecting to find there fome opportunity of making his efcape. But just as he was ready to depart, the nobles entered his bedchamber in a body, and prefented a memorial against the illegal and oppreffive actions of his two favourites, whom they reprefented as most dangerous enemies to the religion and liberties of the nation. James, though he received this remonstrance with the complaifance which was neceffary in his prefent fituation, was extremely impatient to be gone; but as he approached the door of his apartment, the tutor of Glamis rudely stopped him. The king complained, expostulated, threatened, and finding all these without effect, burst into tears : " No matter," faid Glamis fiercely, " better children wcep than bearded men." Thefe words made a deep imprefion on the king's mind, and were never forgotten. The confpirators, with-out regarding his tears or indignation, difmiffed fuch of his followers as they fuspected; allowed none none but perfons of their own party to have accefs to him; and, though they treated him with great refpect, guarded his perfon with the utmost care. This enterprife is ufually called, by our historians, The raid of Ruthven<sup>y</sup>.

Lennox and Arran were aftonished to the last degree at an event fo unexpected, and fo fatal to their power. The former endeavoured, but without fuccefs, to excite the inhabitants of Edinburgh to take arms in order to refcue their fovereign from captivity. The latter, with his ufual impetuofity, mounted on horfeback the moment he heard what had befallen the king, and with a few followers rode towards Ruthven caftle; and as a confiderable body of the confpirators, under the command of the earl of Mar, lay in his way ready to oppose him, he separated himself from his companions, and with two attendants arrived at the gate of the caftle. At the fight of a man fo odious to his country, the indignation of the confpirators role, and inftant death must have been the punishment of his rashnefs, if the friendship of Gowrie, or some other caufe not explained by our historians, had not faved a life fo pernicious to the kingdom. He was confined, however, to the caftle of Stir-ling, without being admitted into the king's presence.

The king, though really the prifoner of his own fubjects, with whofe conduct he could not help difcovering many fymptoms of difguft, was obliged to publifh a proclamation, fignifying his approbation of their enterprife, declaring that he was at full liberty, without any reftraint or violence offered to his perfon; and forbidding any attempt against those concerned in the Raid of Ruthven, under pretence of refcuing him out of their hands. At the fame time [Aug. 28], he commanded Lennox to leave Scotland before the twentieth of September z.

y Cald. iii. 134. Spotfw. 320. Melv. 357.

was

Soon after, fir George Carey and Robert Bowes arrived as ambafiadors from Elizabeth. The pretext of their embaffy was to inquire after the king's fafety; to encourage and countenance the confpirators was the real motive of it. By their interceffion, the earl of Angus, who, ever fince the death of his uncle Morton, had lived in exile, obtained leave to return. And the acceffion of a nobleman fo powerful and fo popular ftrengthened the faction <sup>a</sup>.

Lennox, whofe amiable and gentle qualities had procured him many friends, and who received private affurances that the king's favour towards him was in no degree abated, feemed refolved, at first, to pay no regard to a command extorted by violence, and no lefs difagreeable to James, than it was rigorous with regard to himfelf. But, the power of his enemies, who were mafters of the king's perfon, who were fecretly fupported. by Elizabeth, and openly applauded by the clergy, deterred him from any enterprife, the fuccels of which was dubious, and the danger certain, both to himfelf and to his fovereign., He put off the time of his departure, however, by various artifices, in expectation either that. Jame's might make his efcape from the confpi-

2 Cald. iii. 135- 138.

a Ibid. iii. 152.

rators,

E. VI.

rators, or that fortune might prefent fome more favourable opportunity of taking arms for his relief.

On the other hand, the confpirators were extremely folicitous not only to fecure the approbation of their countrymen, but to obtain fome legal fanction of their enterprife. For this purpose they published a long declaration, containing the motives which had induced them to venture on fuch an irregular ftep, and endeavoured to heighten the public indignation against the favourites, by reprefenting, in the ftrongeft colours, their inexperience and infolence, their contempt of the nobles, their violation of the privileges of the church, and their oppreffion of the people They obliged the king, who could not with fafety refuse any of their demands, to grant them a remiffion in the most ample form; and not fatisfied with that, they applied to the affembly of the church [Oct. 3], and eafily pro-cured an act, declaring, " that they had done " good and acceptable fervice to God, to their " fovereign, and to their native country ;" and requiring all fincere protestants to concur with them in carrying forward fuch a laudable enterprife. In order to add the greater weight to this act, every minister was enjoined to read it in his own pulpit, and to inflict the cenfures of the church on those who fet themselves in oppofition to fo good a caufe. A convention of estates affembled a few days after, passed an act to the fame effect, and granted full in-demnity to the confpirators for every thing they had done b.

b Cald. iii. 177. 187. 200. Spotfw. 322.

James

James was conducted by them, first to Stirling, and afterwards to the palace of Holyroodhoufe; and though he was received every where with the external marks of refpect due to his dignity, his motions were carefully observed, and he was under a restraint no less strict than at the first moment when he was feized by the confpirators. Lennox, after eluding many commands to depart out of the kingdom, was at last obliged to begin his journey. He lingered, however, for fome time in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, as if he had still intended to make fome effort towards reftoring the king to liberty. But either from the gentleness of his own difpolition, averfe to bloodshed and the diforders of civil war, or from fome other caufe unknown to us, he abandoned the defign, and fet out for France, by the way of England [Dec. 30]. The king iffued the order for his departure with no lefs reluctance than the duke obeyed it ; and both mourned a feparation, which neither of them had power to prevent. Soon after his arrival in France, the fatigue of the journey, or the anguish of his mind, threw him into a fever. In his last moments he discovered fuch a firm adherence to the protestant faith, as fully vindicates his memory from the imputation of an attachment to popery, with which he had been uncharitably loaded in Scotland c. As he was the earlieft, and beft beloved, he was, perhaps, the most deferving, though not the most able, of all James's favourites. The warmth and tendernels c Spotfw. 324. Cald. iii. 172.

of his master's affection for him was not abated

264

B. VI.

by

by death itfelf. By many acts of kindnefs and generofity towards his pofterity, the king not only did great honour to the memory of Lennox, but fet his own character in one of its moft favourable points of view.

The fuccefs of the confpiracy which deprived James of liberty made great noife over all Europe, and at last reached the ears of Mary in the prifon to which she was confined. As her own experience had taught her what injuries a captive prince is exposed to fuffer; and as many of those who were now concerned in the enterprise against her fon, were the fame perfons whom she confidered as the chief authors of her own miffortunes, it was natural for the tenderness of a mother to apprehend that the fame calamities were ready to fall on his head; and fuch a prospect did not fail of adding to the distress and horror of her own fituation. In the anguish of her heart, fhe wrote to Elizabeth, complaining in the bittereft terms of the unprecedented rigour with which she herself had been treated, and befeeching her not to abandon her fon to the mercy of his rebellious fubjects; nor permit him to be involved in the fame misfortunes under which the had to long groaned. The peculiar vigour and acrimony of ftyle, for which this letter is remarkable, difcover both the high fpirit of the Scottish queen, unfubdued by her fuffer-ings, and the violence of her indignation at Elizabeth's artifices and feverity. But it was ill adapted to gain the end which she had in view, and accordingly it neither procured any mitigation of the rigour of her own confinement, nor any interpolition in favour of the king d.

. VOL. II.

d. Camd. 489.

1583.]

1583.] Henry III. who, though he feared and hated the princes of Guife, was often obliged to court their favour, interpofed with warmth, in order to extricate James out of the hands of a party fo entirely devoted to the English intereft. He commanded M. de la Motte Fenelon, his ambaffador at the court of England, to repair to Edinburgh, and to contribute his utmost endeavours towards placing James in a fituation more fuitable to his dignity. As Elizabeth could not, with decency, refuse him liberty to execute this commission, she appointed Davison to attend him into Scotland as her envoy, under colour of concurring with him in the negotiation, but in reality to be a fpy upon his motions, and to obstruct his fuccess. James, whose title to the crown had not hitherto been recognifed by any of the princes on the continent, was extremely fond of fuch an honourable embaffy from the French monarch; and, on that account, as well as for the fake of the errand on which he came, received Fenelon with great refpect [Jan. 7]. The nobles, in whofe power the king was, did not relifh this interpolition of the French court, which had long loft its ancient influence over the affairs of Scotland. The clergy were alarmed at the danger to which religion would be exposed, if the princes of Guife should recover any afcendant over the public councils. Though the king tried every method for reftraining them within the bounds of decency, they declaimed against the court of France, against the princes of Guife, against the ambassador, against entering into any alliance with fuch notorious perfecutors of the church of God, with a vehemence which no regular government would now tolerate, ate, but which was then extremely common. The ambaffador, watched by Davifon, diftrufted by the nobles, and exposed to the infults of the clergy and of the people, returned into England without procuring any change in the king's fituation, or receiving any answer to a proposal which he made, that the government should be carried on in the joint names of James and the queen his mother <sup>e</sup>.

266

B. VI.

Meanwhile James, though he diffembled with great art, became every day more uneafy under his confinement; his uneafinefs rendered him continually attentive to find out a proper opportunity for making his efcape; and to this attention he at last owed his liberty, which the king of France was not able, nor the queen of England willing to procure for him. As the confpirators had forced Lennox out of the kingdom, and kept Arran at a diftance from court, they grew fe-cure; and imagining that time had reconciled the king to them, and to his fituation, they watched him with little care. Some occasions of difcord had arifen among themfelves; and the French ambaffador, by fomenting thefe during the time of his refidence in Scotland, had weakened the union, in which alone their fafety confifted f. Colonel William Stewart, the commander of the band of gentlemen who guarded the king's perfon, being gained by James, had the principal merit in the fcheme for reftoring his mafter to liberty. Under pretence of paying a vifit to the earl of March, his

<sup>c</sup> Cald. iii. 207. Spotfw. 324. Murdin, 372, &c. See Appendix, No. XLiI. f Camd. 482.

grand-

grand-uncle, James was permitted to go from Falkland to St. Andrew's [June 27]. That he might not create any fufpicion, he lodged at first in an open defenceles house in the town, but pretending a curiofity to fee the caftle, no fooner was he entered with fome of his attendants whom he could truft, than colonel Stewart commanded the gates to be fhut, and excluded all the reft of his train. Next morning the earls of Argyll, Huntly, Crawford, Montrole, Rothes, with others to whom the fecret had been communicated, entered the town with their followers; and though Mar, with feveral of the leaders of the faction, appeared in arms, they found themfelves fo far outnumbered, that it was in vain to think of recovering poffeffion of the king's perfon, which had been in their power fomewhat longer than ten months. James was naturally of fo foft and ductile a temper, that those who were near his perfon commonly made a deep impreffion on his heart, which was formed to be under the fway of favourites. As he remained implacable and unreconciled to the confpirators during fo long a time, and at a period of life when refentments are rather violent than lafting, they must either have improved the opportunities of infinuating themfelves into favour with little dexterity, or the indignation with which this first infult to his perfon and authority filled him, muft have been very great.

His joy at his efcape was youthful and exceffive. He refolved, however, by the advice of fir James Melvil, and his wifeft counfellors, to act with the utmost moderation. Having called into his prefence the leaders of both factions, the neigh1582.7

neighbouring gentry, the deputies of the adjacent boroughs, the minifters, and the heads of colleges, he declared, that although he had been held under reftraint for fome time by violence, he would not impute that as a crime to any man, but, without remembering the irregularities which had been fo frequent during his minority, would pafs a general act of oblivion, and govern all his fubjects with undiftinguifhing and equal affection. As an evidence of his fincerity, he vifited the earl of Gowrie at Ruthven-eaftle, and granted him a full pardon of any guilt he had contracted, by the crime committed in that very place g.

But James did not adhere long to this prudent and moderate plan. His former favourite, the earl of Arran, had been permitted for fome time to refide at Kinneil, one of his country feats. As foon as the king felt himfelf at liberty, his love for him began to revive, and he expressed a ftrong defire to fee him. The courtiers violently opposed the return of a minion, whose infolent and overbearing temper they dreaded, as much as the nation detefted his crimes. James, however, continued his importunity, and promifing that he should continue with him no longer than one day, they were obliged to yield. This interview rekindled ancient affection ; the king forgot his promife; Arran regained his afcendant over him; and within a few days refumed the exercife of power, with all the arrogance of an undeferving favourite, and all the rafhnefs peculiar to himfelf h.

The first effect of his influence was a proclamation with regard to those concerned in the

AA3

8 Melv. 2.72.

h Ibid. 274.

Raid

Raid of Ruthven. They were required to ac-knowledge their crime in the humbleft manner; and the king promifed to grant them a full pardon, provided their future conduct were fuch as did not oblige him to remember paft miscarriages. The tenor of this proclamation was extremely different from the act of oblivion which the confpirators had been encouraged to expect. Nor did any of them reckon it fafe to rely on a promife clogged with fuch an equivocal condition, and granted by a young prince under the dominion of a minister void of faith, regardles of decency, and transported by the defire of revenge even beyond the usual ferocity of his temper. Many of the leaders, who had at first appeared openly at court, retired to their own houles; and, foreleeing the dangerous ftorm which was gathering, began to look out for a rétreat in foreign countries 1.

Elizabeth, who had all along protected the confpirators, was extremely difgufted with meafures which tended fo vifibly to their deftruction, and wrote to the king a harfh and haughty letter [Aug. 7], reproaching him in a ftyle very uncommon among princes, with breach of faith in recalling Arran to court; and with imprudence in proceeding fo rigoroufly againft his beft and most faithful fubjects. James, with a becoming dignity, replied, that promifes extorted by violence, and conditions yielded out of fear, were no longer binding, when thefe were removed; that it belonged to him alone to choofe what minifters he would employ in his fervice; and that

1 Melv. 278. Spotfw. 326. Cald. iii. 330.

B. VI.

that though he refolved to treat the confpirators at Ruthven with the utmost clemency, it was neceffary, for the fupport of his authority, that fuch an infult on his perfon should not pass altogether uncenfured <sup>k</sup>.

Elizabeth's letter was quickly followed by Walfingham her fecretary, whom fhe appointed her ambaffador to James, and who appeared at the Scottifh court [Sept. 1], with a fplendour and magnificence well calculated to pleafe and dazzle a young prince. Walfingham was admitted to feveral conferences with James himfelf, in which he infifted on the fame topics contained in the letter, and the king repeated his former anfwers.

After fuffering feveral indignities from the arrogance of Arran and his creatures, he returned to England, without concluding any new treaty with the king. Walfingham was, next to Burleigh, the minister on whom the chief weight of the English administration rested; and when a perfon of his rank stept fo far out of the ordinary road of bufinefs, as to undertake a long journey in his old age, and under a declining state of health, some affair of consequence was fupposed to be the cause, or some important event was expected to be the effect, of this measure. But as nothing conspicuous either occasioned or followed this embasfy, it is probable that Elizabeth had no other intention in employing this fagacious minister, than to difcover, with exactness, the capacity and dispofition of the Scottish king, who was now arrived at a time of life when, with fome degree of certainty, conjectures might be formed concerning his character and future conduct. As James poffeffed talents of that kind, which make a better figure in converfation than in action, he gained a great deal by this interview with the Englifh fecretary, who, notwithftanding the cold reception which he met with, gave fuch an advantageous reprefentation of his abilitics, as determined Elizabeth to treat him, henceforward, with greater decency and refpect<sup>1</sup>.

k Melv. 279.

Elizabeth's eagerness to protect the confpirators rendered James more violent in his proceedings against them. As they had all refused to accept of pardon upon the terms which he had offered, they were required, by a new proclamation, to furrender themfelves prifoners. The earl of Angus alone complied; the reft either fled into England, or obtained the king's licence to retire into foreign parts. A convention of estates was held, the members of which, deccived by an unworthy artifice of Arran's, declared those concerned in the Raid of Ruthven to have been guilty of high treafon; appointed the act paffed last year approving of their conduct to be expunged out of the records; and engaged to fupport the king in profecuting the fugitives with the utmost rigour of law.

The confpirators, though far from having done any thing that was uncommon in that age, among mutinous nobles, and under an unfettled flate of government, must be acknowledged to have been guilty of an act of treason against their

1 Melv. 293. Cald. iii. 258. Jebb, ii. 536.

2

B. VI.

their fovereign ; and James, who confidered their conduct in this light, had good reafon to boast of his clemency, when he offered to par-don them upon their confessing their crime. But, on the other hand, it must be allowed that, after the king's voluntary promife of a general oblivion, they had fome reafon to com-plain of breach of faith, and, without the most unpardonable imprudence, could not have put their lives in Arran's power.

1584. ] The interest of the church was confiderably affected by thefe contrary revolutions. While the confpirators kept possefion of power, the clergy not only recovered, but extended their privileges. As they had formerly declared the hierarchy to be unlawful, they took fome bold measures towards exterminating the epifcopal order out of the church; and it was owing more to Adamfon's dexterity in perplexing and lengthening out the process for that purpole, than to their own want of zeal, that they did not deprive, and perhaps excommunicate, all the bishops in Scotland. When the king recovered his liberty, things put on a very different aspect. The favour bestowed upon Arran, the enemy of every thing decent and facred, and the rigorous profecution of those nobles who had been the most zealous defenders of the protestant cause, were considered as fure prefages of the approaching ruin of the church. The clergy could not conceal their apprehenfions, nor view this impending danger in filence. Dury, who had been reftored to his office as one of the ministers of Edinburgh, openly applauded the Raid of Ruthwen in the pulpit, at which the king was fo enraged, that, notwithstanding fome fymptoms of his fubmission, he commanded him to refign his charge in the city. Mr. Andrew Melvil, being fummoned before the privy council, to answer for the doctrine which he had uttered in a fermon at St. Andrew's, and accufed of comparing the prefent grievances of the nation with those under James III. and of intimating obliquely that they ought to be redreffed in the fame manner, thought it incumbent on him to behave with great firmnefs. He declined the jurifdic. tion of a civil court, in a caufe which he maintained to be purely ecclefiaftical; the prefbytery, of which he was a member, had, as he contended, the fole right to call him to account for words fpoken in the pulpit; and neither the king nor council could judge, in the first inftance, of the doctrinc delivered by preachers, without violating the immunities of the church. This exemption from civil jurifdiction was a privilege which the popifh ecclefiaftics, admirable judges of whatever contributed to increase the luftre or power of their body, had long ftruggled for, and had at last obtained. If the fame plea had now been admitted, the proteftant clergy would have become independent on the civil magistrate; and an order of men extremely useful to fociety while they inculcate those duties which tend to promote its happines and tranquillity, might have become no lefs pernicious, by teaching, without fear or control, the most dangerous principles, or by exciting their hearers to the most desperate and lawless actions. The king, jealous to excels of his prerogative, was alarmed at this daring encroachment on it; and as Melvil, by his learning and zeal, had acquired the reputation and authority of head of the party, he refolved to punifh him with the rigour which that pre-eminence rendered neceffary, and to difcourage, by a timely feverity, the revival of fuch a dangerous claim. Melvil, however, avoided his rage, by flying into England; and the pulpits refounded with complaints that the king had extinguifhed the light of learning in the kingdom, and deprived the church of the ableft and moft faithful guardian of its liberties and difcipline <sup>m</sup>.

at

274

preroga-

These violent declamations of the clergy against the measures of the court were extremely acceptable to the people. The conspirators, though driven out of the kingdom, ftill poffeffed great influence there; and as they had every thing to fear from the refentment of a young prince, irritated by the furious counfels of Arran, they never ceafed foliciting their adherents to take arms in their defence. Gowrie, the only perfon among them who had fubmitted to the king, and accepted of a pardon, foon repented of a step which lost him the efteem of one party, without gaining the confidence of the other; and, after fuffering many mortifications from the king's neglect and the haughtiness of Arran, he was at last commanded to leave Scotland, and to refide in France. While he waited at Dundee for an opportunity to embark, he was informed that the earls of Angus, Mar, and the tutor of Glamis, had

m Spotfw. 330. Cald. iii. 304.

concerted

concerted a fcheme for furprifing the caftle of Stirling. In his fituation, little perfuasion was neceffary to draw him to engage in it. Under various pretexts he put off his voyage, and lay ready to take arms on the day fixed by the conspirators for the execution of their enterprise. His lingering fo long at Dundee, without any apparent reason, awakened the fuspicion of the court, proved fatal to himfelf, and difappointed the fuccefs of the confpiracy. Colonel William Stewart furrounded the houfe where he lodged with a body of foldiers, and, in fpite of his reliftance, took him prisoner. Two days after, Angus, Mar, and Glamis feized the caftle of Stirling, and erecting their flandard there, published a manifesto, declaring that they took arms for no other reason but to remove from the king's prefence a minion who had acquired power by the most unworthy actions, and who exercifed it with the most intolerable infolence. 'The account of Gowrie's imprifonment ftruck a damp upon their spirits. They imputed it to treachery on his part, and fuspected, that as he had formerly deferted, he had now betrayed them. At the fame time Elizabeth having neglected to fupply them in due time with a fum of money, which she had promifed to them, and their friends and vaffals coming in flowly, they appeared irrefolute and difheartened; and as the king, who acted with great vigour, advanced towards them at the head of twenty thousand men, they fled precipitately towards England, and with difficulty made their efcapen.

n Home's Hift. of Houfe of Dougl. 376. Spotfw. 330. Calderw. iii. 324, &c.

B. VI.

This rafh and feeble attempt produced fuch effects as ufually follow difappointed confpiracies. It not only hurt the caufe for which it was undertaken, but added ftrength and reputation to the king; confirmed Arran's power; and enabled them to purfue their meafures with more boldnefs and greater fuccefs. Gowrie was the first victim of their refentment. After a very informal trial, a jury of peers found him guilty of treafon, and he was publicly beheaded at Stirling.

To humble the church was the king's next ftep. But as it became necessary, for this purpose, to call in the aid of the legislative authority, a parliament was haftily fummoned [May 22]: and while fo many of the nobles were banished out of the kingdom, or forbidden to appear in the king's prefence; while Arran's haughtinels kcpt some at a distance, and intimidated others; the meeting confifted only of fuch as were abfolutely at the devotion of the court. In order to conceal the laws which were framing from the knowledge of the clergy, the lords of the articles were fworn to fecrecy; and when some of the ministers, who either fufpected or were informed of the danger, deputed one of their number to declare their apprehenfions to the king, he was feized at the palace-gate, and carried to a diftant prifon. Others, attempting to enter the parliament-house, were refused admittance °; and fuch laws were paffed, as totally overturned the conftitution and dif-cipline of the church. The refusing to acknowledge

> 9 Cald. iii. 365. B B

VOL. II.

1584.]

knowledge the jurifdiction of the privy council; the pretending an exemption from the authority of the civil courts; the attempting to diminifh the rights and privileges of any of the three eftates in parliament, were declared to be high treafon [May 22]. The holding affemblies, whether civil or ecclefiaftical, without the king's permiffion or appointment; the uttering, either privately or publicly, in fermons or in declamations, any falfe and fcandalous reports againft the king, his anceftors, or minifters, were pronounced capital crimes P.

- When thefe laws were published at the crofs of Edinburgh, according to the ancient cuftom, Mr. Robert Pont, minister of St. Cuthbert's and one of the lords of feffion, folemnly protefted against them, in the name of his brethren, becaufe they had been paffed without the knowledge or confent of the church. Ever fince the Reformation, the pulpits and ecclefiaftical judicatories had both been effeemed facred. In the former, the clergy had been accustomed to cenfure and admonish with unbounded liberty. In the latter, they exercifed an uncontrolled and independent jurifdiction. The blow was now aimed at both thefe privileges. Thefe new ftatutes were calculated to render churchmen as inconfiderable as they were indigent : and as the avarice of the nobles had ftripped them of the wealth, the king's ambition was about to deprive them of the power, which once belonged to their order. No wonder the alarm was univerfal, and the complaints loud. All the mi-

P Parl. 8 Jac. VI.

nifters

B. VI.

1584.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. 279

nisters of Edinburgh forfook their charge, and fled into England. The most eminent clergy-men throughout the kingdom imitated their example. Defolation and altonishment appeared in every part of the Scottish church; the people bewailed the lofs of paltors whom they efteem-ed; and full of confernation at an event fo unexpected, openly expressed their rage against Arran, and began to fufpect the king himfelf to be an enemy to the reformed religion 9.

BOOK VII.

WHILE Scotland was torn by intelline fac-W tions, Elizabeth was alarmed with the rumour of a project in agitation for fetting Mary at liberty. Francis Throkmorton, a Chefhire gentleman, was fufpected of being deeply concerned in the defign, and on that fufpicion he was taken into cuftody. Among his papers were found two lifts, one of the principal harbours in the kingdom, with an account of their fituation, and of the depth of water in each; the other, of all the eminent Roman catholics in England. This circumstance confirmed the fufpicion against him, and fome dark and defperate confpiracy was fup-pofed just ready to break out. At first he boldly avowed his innocence, and declared that the two papers were forged by the queen's

> 9 Spotfw. 333. BB2

minifters,

ministers, in order to intimidate or enfnare him; and he even endured the rack with the utmoft fortitude. But being brought a fecond time to the place of torture, his refolution failed him, and he not only acknowledged that he had held a fecret correspondence with the queen of Scots, but difcovered a defign that was formed to invade England. The duke of Guife, he faid, undertook to furnish troops, and to conduct the enterprife. The pope and king of Spain were to fupply the money neceffary for carrying it on; all the English exiles were eager to take arms; many of the catholics at home would be ready to join them at their landing; Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador, who was the life of the confpiracy, fpared no pains in fomenting the fpirit of difaffection among the English, or in hastening the preparations on the continent; and by his command, he made the two lifts, the copies whereof had been found in his poffeffion. This confession he retracted at his trial; returned to it again after fentence was paffed upon him; and retracted it once more at the place of execution<sup>a</sup>.

To us in the prefent age, who are affifted in forming our opinion of this matter by the light which time and hiftory have thrown upon the defigns and characters of the princes of Guife, many circumftances of Throkmorton's confefion appear to be extremely remote from truth, or even from probability. The duke of Guife was, at that juncture, far from being in a fituation to undertake foreign conquefts. Without a Hollingshead, 1370.

either

B. VII.

either power or office at court; hated by the king, and perfecuted by the favourites; he had no leifure for any thoughts of diffurbing the quiet of neighbouring states; his vast and ambitious mind was wholly occupied in laying the foundation of that famous league which thook the throne of France. But at the time when Elizabeth detected this confpiracy, the clofe union between the house of Guise and Philip was remarkable to all Europc; and as their great enterprise against Henry III. was not yet difclosed, as they endeavoured to conceal that under their threatenings to invade England, Throkmorton's difcovery appeared to be extremely probable; and Elizabeth, who knew how ardently all the parties mentioned by him wifhed her downfall, thought that fhe could not guard her kingdom with too much care. The indifcreet zeal of the English exiles increased her fears. Not fatisfied with inceffant outcries against her feverity towards the Scottish queen, and her cruel perfecution of her catholic fubjects, not thinking it enough that one pope had threatened her with the fentence of excommunication, and another had actually pronounced it, they now began to difperfe books and writings in which they endeavoured to perfuade their difciples, that it would be a meritorious action to take away her life; they openly exhorted the maids of honour to treat her as Judith did Holofernes, and, by fuch an illustrious deed, to render their own names honourable and facred in the church throughout all future ages b. For all thefe

> b Camd. 497. B B 3

reafons,

reafons, Elizabeth not only inflicted the punifhment of a traitor on Throkmorton, but commanded the Spanish ambassiador instantly to leave England; and that she might be in no danger of being attacked within the island, she determined to use her utmoss efforts, in order to recover that influence over the Scottish councils, which she had for some time entirely lost.

There were three different methods by which Elizabeth might hope to accomplifh this; either by furnishing fuch effectual aid to the banished nobles, as would enable them to refume the chief direction of affairs; or by entering into fuch a treaty with Mary, as might intimidate her fon, who being now accustomed to govern, would not be averfe from agreeing to any terms rather than refign the feeptre, or admit an affociate in the throne; or by gaining the earl of Arran, to fe-cure the direction of the king his mafter. The laft was not only the eafieft and fpecdieft, but moft likely to be fuccefsful. This Elizabeth refolved to purfue ; but without laying the other two altogether afide. With this view fhe fent Davifon, one of her principal fecretaries, a man of abilities and addrefs, into Scotland. A minister fo venal as Arran, hated by his own countrymen, and holding his power by the most precarious of all tenures, the favour of a young prince, accepted Elizabeth's offers without hefitation, and deemed the acquifition of her protection to be the most folid foundation of his own greatnefs. Soon after [Aug. 13] he confented to an interview with lord Hunfdon, the governor of Berwick, and being honoured with the pompous title of licutenant general for the king, he appeared at the

the place appointed with a fplendid train. In Hunidon's prefence he renewed his promifes of an inviolable and faithful attachment to the Englifh intereft, and affured him that James fhould enter into no negotiation which might tend to interrupt the peace between the two kingdoms; and as Elizabeth began to entertain the fame fears and jealoufies concerning the king's marriage, which had formerly difquieted her with regard to his mother's, he undertook to prevent James from liftening to any overture of that kind, until he had previoufly obtained the queen of England's confent <sup>c</sup>.

The banished lords and their adherents foon felt the effects of Arran's friendship with England. As Elizabeth had permitted them to take refuge in her dominions, and feveral of her minifters were of opinion that fhe ought to employ her arms in defence of their caufe, the fear of this was the only thing which reftrained James and his fa-vourite from proceeding to fuch extremities against them, as might have excited the pity or indignation of the English, and have prompted them to exert themfelves with vigour in their behalf. But every apprehension of this kind being now removed, they ventured to call a parliament [Aug. 22], in which an act was passed, attainting Angus, Mar, Glamis, and a great number of their followers. Their eftates devolved to the crown, and according to the practice of the Scottifh monarchs, who were obliged to reward the faction which adhered to them, by dividing with it the fpoils of the vanquished, James dealt out the greater part of thefe to Arran and his affociates <sup>d</sup>.

Cald. iii. 491. Melv. 315. Sce Append. No. XLIII.

284

Nor was the treatment of the clergy lefs rigor-ous. All minifters, readers, and profeffors in colleges, were enjoined to fubfcribe, within forty days, a paper teflifying their approbation of the laws concerning the church enacted in laft parliament. Many, overawed or corrupted by the court, yielded obedience ; others flood out. The flipends of the latter were fequeftered, fome of the more active committed to prifon, and numbers compelled to fly the kingdom. Such as complied, fell under the fufpicion of acting from mercenary or ambitious motives. Such as adhered to their principles and fuffered in confe-quence of it, acquired high reputation, by giving this convincing evidence of their firmnels and fincerity. The judicatories of the church were almost entirely suppressed. In some places scarce as many ministers remained, as to perform the duties of religious worship; they foon funk in reputation among the people, and being prohi-bited not only from difcourfing of public affairs, but obliged, by the jealoufy of the administration, to frame every fentiment and expression in fuch a manner as to give the court no offence, their fermons were deemed languid, infipid, and contemptible; and it became the general opi-nion, that together with the most virtuous of the nobles and the most faithful of the clergy, the power and vigour of religion were now banished out of the kingdom .

d Cald. iii, 527.

e Ibid. iii. 589. Meanwhile,

Meanwhile, Elizabeth was carrying on one of those fruitless negotiations with the queen of Scots, which it had become almost matter of form to renew every year. They ferved not only to amufe that unhappy princels with fome profpect of liberty; but furnished an apology for eluding the folicitations of foreign powers in her behalf; and were of use to overawe James, by shewing him that she could at any time set free a dangerous rival to difpute his authority. Thefe treaties fhe fuffered to proceed to what length she pleased, and never wanted a pretence for breaking them off, when they became no longer neceffary. The treaty now on foot was not, perhaps, more fincere than many which preceded it; the reasons, however, which rendered it ineffectual were far from being frivolous.

As Crichton, a jefuit, was failing from Flanders towards Scotland, the ship on board of which he was a paffenger happened to be chafed by pirates, who, in that age, often infefted the narrow feas. Crichton, in great confusion, tore in pieces some papers in his cuftody, and threw them away; but by a very extraordinary accident, the wind blew them back into the fhip, and they were immediately taken up by fome of the paffengers, who carried them to Wade, the clerk of the privy council. He, with great industry and patience, joined them together, and they were found to contain the account of a plot faid to have been formed by the king of Spain and the duke of Guife, for invading England. The people were not yet recovered from the fear and anxiety occafioned by the confpiracy in which Throk-3

Throkmorton had been engaged, and as his difcoveries appeared now to be confirmed by additional evidence, not only all their former apprehenfions recurred, but the confternation became general and exceffive. As all the dangers with which England had been threatened for fome years flowed either immediately from Mary herfelf, or from fuch as made use of her name to juftify their infurrections and confpiracies, this gradually diminished the compassion due to her fituation, and the English, instead of pitying, began to fear and to hate her. Elizabeth, under whofe wife and pacific reign the English enjoyed tranquillity, and had opened fources of wealth unknown to their anceltors, was extremely beloved by all her people; and regard to her fafety, not lefs than to their own intereft, animated them against the Scottish queen. In order to difcourage her adherents, it was thought neceffary to convince them, by fome public deed, of the attachment of the English to their own fovereign, and that any attempt against her life would prove fatal to her rival. With this view an affociation was framed [Oct. 19], the fubfcribers of which bound themfelves by the most folemn oaths, " to defend the queen against all her enemies, foreign and domeffic ; and if violence should be offered to her life, in order to favour the title of any pretender to the crown, they not only engaged never to allow or acknowledge the perfon or perfons by whom, or for whom, fuch a deteftable act should be committed, but vowed, in the prefence of the eternal God, to profecute. fuch perfon or perfons to the death, and to purfue fue them with their utmost vengeance, to their utter overthrow and extirpation<sup>f</sup>." Perfons of all ranks fubfcribed this combination with the greatest eagerness and unanimity<sup>g</sup>.

286

B. VII.

Mary confidered this affociation, not only as an avowed defign to exclude her from all right of fucceffion, but as the certain and immediate forerunner of her destruction. In order to avert this, fhe made fuch feeble efforts as were still in her power, and fcnt Naué, her fecretary, to court, with offers of more entire refignation to the will of Elizabeth, in every point, which had been the occasion of their long enmity, than all her fufferings hitherto had been able to extort h. But whether Mary adhered inflexibly to her privileges as an independent fovereign, or, yielding to the neceffity of her fituation, endeavoured, by conceffions, to footh her rival, fhe was equally unfuccefsful. Her firmnefs was imputed to obflinacy, or to the fecret hope of foreign affiftance ; her conceffions were either believed to be infincere. or to flow from the fear of fome imminent danger. Her prefent willingnefs, however, to comply with any terms was fo great, that Walfingham warmly urged his mistress to come to a final agreement with her i. But Elizabeth was perfuaded, that it was the fpirit raifed by the affociation which had rendered her fo paffive and compliant. She always imagined that there was fomething mysterious and deceitful in all Mary's actions, and fuspected her of carrying on a dangerous correspondence with the English catho-f State Trials. i. 122. 8 Camd. 499. h Id. ib. i See App. No. XLIV.

lics,

288

lics, both within and without the kingdom. Nor were her fuspicions altogether void of foundation. Mary had, about this time, written a letter to fir Francis Inglefield, urging him to haften the execution of what fhe calls the Great Plot or Defignment, without hefitating on account of any danger in which it might involve her life, which she would most willingly part with, if, by that facrifice, fhe could procure relief for fo great a number of the oppreffed children of the church k. Inftead, therefore, of hearkening to the overtures which the Scottifly queen made, or granting any mitigation of the hardships of which she complained, Elizabeth refolved to take her out of the hands of the earl of Shrewfbury, and to appoint fir Amias Paulet and fir Drue Drury to be her keepers. Shrewfbury had difcharged his truft with great fidelity, during fifteen years, but, at the fame time, had treated Mary with gentlenefs and refpect, and had always fweetened harfh commands by the humanity with which he put them in execution. The fame politeness was not to be expected from men of an inferior rank, whofe fevere vigilance, perhaps, was their chief recommendation to that employment, and the only merit by which they could pretend to gain favour or preferment <sup>1</sup>.

As James was no lefs eager than ever to deprive the banished nobles of Elizabeth's protection, he appointed the master of Gray his ambassiand to the court of England, and intrusted him with the conduct of a negotiation k Strype, iii. 246.

1 Camd. 500.

for

for that purpofe. For this honour he was in-debted to the envy and jcaloufy of the earl of Arran. Gray poffeffed all the talents of a courtier; a graceful perfon, an infinuating addrefs, boundlefs ambition, and a reftlefs and intriguing fpirit. During his refidence in France, he had been admitted into the most intimate familiarity with the duke of Guife, and, in order to gain his favour, had renounced the protestant religion, and profeffed the utmost zeal for the captive queen, who earried on a fecret correspondence with him, from which fhe expected great advantages. On his return into Scotland, he paid court to James with extraordinary affiduity, and his accomplishments did not fail to make their usual impression on the king's heart. Arran, who had introduced him, began quickly to dread his growing favour ; and flattering himfelf, that absence would efface any fentiments of tendernefs, which were forming in the mind of a young prince, pointed him out, by his malicious praifes, as the most proper perfon in the kingdom for an embaffy of fuch importance; and contributed to raife him to that high dignity, in order to hasten his fall. Elizabeth, who had an admirable dexterity in difeovering the proper inftruments for carrying on her defigns, endea-voured, by careffes, and by prefents, to fecure Gray to her intereft. The former flattered his vanity, which was great; the latter fupplied his profuseness, which was still greater. He abandoned himfelf without referve to Elizabeth's direction, and not only undertook to retain the king under the influence of England, but acted as a fpy upon the Scottish queen, and betrayed VOL. II. CC to

to her rival every fecret that he could draw from her by his high pretensions of zeal in her fervice <sup>m</sup>.

Gray's credit with the English court was extremely galling to the banished nobles. Elizabeth no longer thought of employing her power to reftore them; fhe found it eafier to govern Scotland by corrupting the king's favourites; and, in compliance with Gray's folicitations, fhe commanded the exiles to leave the north of England [Dec. 31], and to remove into the heart of the kingdom. This rendered it difficult for them to hold any correspondence with their partifans in Scotland, and almost impossible to return thither without her permiffion. Gray, by gaining a point which James had fo much at heart, riveted himfelf more firmly than ever in his favour; and, by acquiring greater reputation, became capable of ferving Elizabeth with greater fuccefs<sup>n</sup>.

1585.] Arran had now poffeffed for fome time all the power, the riches, and the honours, that his immoderate ambition could defire, or the fondnefs of a prince, who fet no limits to his liberality towards his favourites, could beftow. The office of lord chancellor, the higheft and moft important in the kingdom, was conferred upon him, even during the life of the earl of Argyll, who fucceeded Athol in that dignity °; and the public beheld, with aftonifhment and indignation, a man educated as a foldier of fortune, ignorant of law, and a contemner of juffice, appointed to prefide in parliament, in the privy council, in the court of feffion, and intrusted with the fupreme disposal of the property of his fellow-fubjects. He was, at the fame time, governor of the caffles of Stirling and Edinburgh, the two principal forts in Scotland; provoft of the city of Edinburgh : and as if by all thefe accumulated dignities his mcrits were not fufficiently recompenfed, he had been created lieutenant general over the whole kingdom. No perfon was admitted into the king's prefence without his permiffion; no favour could be obtained but by his mediation. James, occupied with youthful amufements, devolved upon him the whole regal authority. Such unmerited elevation increafed his natural arrogance, and rendered it intolerable. He was no longer content with the condition of a fubject, but pretended to derive his pedigree from Murdo duke of Albany; and boafted openly, that his title to the crown was preferable to that of the king himfelf. But, together with thefe thoughts of royalty, he retained the meannels fuitable to his primitive indigence. His venality as a judge was fcandalous, and was exceeded only by that of his wife, who, in defiance of decency, made herfelf a party in almost every fuit which came to be decided, employed her influence to corrupt or to overawe the judges, and almost openly dic-tated their decisions P. His rapaciousness as a minister was infatiable. Not fatisfied with the revenues of fo many offices ; with the effate and bonours which belonged to the family of Hap Cald, iii. 331. Scotftarvet's Staggering State, 7. C C 2 milton; 292

m Strype, iii. 302. Melv. 316. n Cald. iii. 643. • Crawf. Offic. of State, App. 447.

pointed

B. VII.

milton; or with the greater part of Gowrie's lands, which had fallen to his fhare ; he grafped at the poffeffions of feveral of the nobles. He required lord Maxwell to exchange part of his eftate, for the forfeited lands of Kinneil ; and becaufe he was unwilling to quit an ancient inheritance for a possession fo precarious, he stirred up against him his hereditary rival, the laird of Johnfton, and involved that corner of the kingdom in a civil war. He committed to prifon the earl of Athol, lord Home, and the maîter of Caffils; the first, because he would not divorce his wife the daughter of the earl of Gowrie, and entail his eftate on him; the fecond, becaufe he was unwilling to part with fome lands adjacent to one of Arran's eftates; and the third, for refusing to lend him money. His fpies and informers filled the whole country, and intruded themfelves into every company. The nearest neighbours distrusted and feared each other. All familiar fociety was at an end. Even the common intercourfes of humanity were interrupted, no man knowing in whom to confide, or where to utter his complaints. There is not perhaps in hiftory an example of a minifter fo univerfally deteftable to a nation, or who more justly deferved its deteffation 9.

Arran, notwithftanding, regardlefs of the fentiments, and defpifing the murmurs of the people, gave a loofe to his natural temper, and proceeded to acts ftill more violent. David Home of Argaty, and Patrick his brother, having received letters from one of the banifhed lords, about private businefs, were condemned and put to death, for holding correspondence with rebels. Cunninghame of Drumwhafel, and Douglas of Mains, two gentlemen of honour and reputation, were accufed of having confpired with the exiled nobles to feize the king's perfon. A fingle witnefs only appeared; the evidence they produced of their innocence was unanfwerable; their accufer himfelf not long after acknowledged that he had been Suborned by Arran; and all men believed the charge against them to be groundless; they were found guilty, notwithstanding, and fuffered the death of traitors r [Feb. 9].

9 Spotfw. 337, 338.

vate

About the fame time that these gentlemen were punished for a pretended conspiracy, Elizabeth's life was endangered by a real one. Parry, a doctor of laws, and a member of the house of commons, a man vain and fantastic, but of a refolute fpirit, had lately been reconciled to the church of Rome; and fraught with the zeal of a new convert, he offered to demonstrate the fincerity of his attachment to the religion which he had embraced, by killing Elizabeth. Cardinal Allen had published a book, to prove the murder of an excommunicated prince to be not only lawful, but a meritorious action. The pope's nuncio at Venice, the jefuits both there and at Paris, the English exiles, all approved of the defign. The pope himfelf exhorted him to perfevere; and granted him for his encouragement, a plenary indulgence, and remiffion of his fins. Cardinal di Como wrote to him a letter to the fame purpofe. But though he often got accefs

> r Spotfw. 338. Cald. iii. 794. CC3

to

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

294

to the queen, fear, or fome remaining fenfe of duty, reftrained him from perpetrating the crime. Happily, his intention was at laft difcovered by Nevil, the only perfon in England to whom he had communicated it; and having himfelf voluntarily confeffed his guilt, he fuffered the punifhment which it deferved <sup>s</sup> [March 2].

punifhment which it deferved <sup>s</sup> [March 2]. Thefe repeated confpiracies against their fo-vereign awakened the indignation of the English parliament, and produced a very extraordinary statute, which, in the end, proved fatal to the queen of Scots. By this law the affociation in defence of Elizabeth's life was ratified, and it was further enacted, " That if any rebellion shall be " excited in the kingdom, or any thing attempted to the hurt of her majefty's perfon, by or for " any perfon pretending a title to the crown, the queen shall empower twenty-four perfons, " by a commiffion under the great feal, to exa-" mine into, and pass fentence upon fuch of-" fences; and after judgment given, a proclama-tion fhall be iffued, declaring the perfons whom " they find guilty, excluded from any right to " the crown; and her majefty's fubjects may " lawfully purfue every one of them to the death, with all their aiders and abettors: and " if any defign against the life of the queen take effect, the perfons by or for whom fuch a deteftable act is executed, and their iffues, " being in any wife affenting or privy to the fame, fhall be difabled for ever from pretending to the crown, and be purfued to death in the " like manner "." This act was plainly levelled

* State Trials, vol. i. 103. t Ibid. i. 123.

at

B. VII.

1585.]

at the queen of Scots; and whether we confider it as a voluntary expression of the zeal and concern of the nation for Elizabeth's fafety, or whether we impute it to the influence which that artful princess preferved over her parliaments, it is no easy matter to reconcile it with the general principles of justice or humanity. Mary was thereby rendered accountable not only for her own actions, but for those of others; in confequence of which, she might forfeit her right of fuccession, and even her life itself.

Mary juftly confidered this act as a warning to prepare for the worft extremities. Elizabeth's ministers, it is probable, had refolved by this time to take away her life; and fuffered books to be published, in order to perfuade the nation that this cruel and unprecedented measure was not only neceffary but just ". Even that short period of her days which remained, they rendered uncomfortable, by every hardship and indignity which it was in their power to inflict. Almost all her fervants were difmiffed, shc was treated no longer with the refpect due to a queen; and, though the rigour of feventeen years imprifonment had broken her conflitution, she was confined to two ruinous chambers, fcarcely habitable, even in the middle of fummer, by reafon of cold. Notwithstanding the scantinefs of her revenue, she had been accustomed to diftribute regularly fome alms among the poor in the village adjoining to the caftle. Paulet now refused her liberty to perform this pious and humane office, which had afforded her great

" Strype, iii. 299.

confolation

296

confolation amidst her own fusserings. The castle in which she resided was converted into a common prifon; and a young man, fufpected of popery, was confined there, and treated under her eye with fuch rigour, that he died of the ill ufage. She often complained to Elizabeth of these multiplied injuries, and expostulated as became a woman and a queen; but as no political reason now obliged that princess to amuse her any longer with fallacious hopes, far from granting her any redrefs, fhe did not even deign to give her any anfwer. The king of France, clofely allied to Elizabeth, on whom he depended for affistance against his rebellious subjects, was afraid of efpoufing Mary's caufe with any warmth; and all his folicitations in her behalf were feeble, formal, and inefficacious. But Castelnau, the French ambaffador, whofe compaffion and zeal for theunhappy queen fupplied the defects in his inftructions, remonstrated with fuch vigour against the indignities to which fhe was exposed, that, by his importunity, he prevailed at length to have her removed to Tuthbury ; though fhe was confined the greater part of another winter in her prefent wretched habitation x.

Neither the infults of her enemies, nor the neglect of her friends, made fuch an impreffion on Mary, as the ingratitude of her fon. James had hitherto treated his mother with filial refpect, and had even entered into negotiations with her, which gave umbrage to Elizabeth. But as itwas not the interest of the English queen that his good correspondence should continue, Gray, x Jebb, vol. ii. 576-598.

who,

B. VII.

who, on his return into Scotland, found his favour with the king greatly increafed by the fuc-cefs of his embaffy, perfuaded him to write a harsh and undutiful letter to his mother, in which he expressly refused to acknowledge her to be queen of Scotland, or to confider his affairs as connected, in any wife, with her's. This cruel requital of her maternal tendernefs overwhelmed Mary with forrow and defpair. "Was it for " this," faid she, in a letter to the French ambaffador [March 24], " that I have endured fo " much, in order to preferve for him the inherit-66 ance to which I have a just right ? I am " far from envying his authority in Scotland. I " defire no power there; nor with to fet my " foot in that kingdom, if it were not for the " pleafure of once embracing a fon, whom I have " hitherto loved with too tender affection. " Whatever he either enjoys or expects he de-" rived it from me. From him I never received " affistance, fupply, or benefit of any kind. Let " not my allies treat him any longer as a king : " he holds that dignity by my confent; and if " a fpeedy repentance do not appeale my just " refentment, I will load him with a parent's " curfe, and furrender my crown, with all my " pretenfions, to one who will receive them with " gratitude, and defend them with vigour y." The love which James bore to his mother, whom he had never known, and whom he had been early taught to confider as one of the most abandoned perfons of her fex, cannot be fuppofed ever to have been ardent; and he did not now take any

Y Murdin, 566. Jebb, ii. 571. See Append. No. XLV. pains pains to regain her favour. But whether her indignation at his undutiful behaviour, added to her bigoted attachment to popery, prompted Mary at any time to think ferioufly of difinheriting her fon; or whether thefe threatenings were uttered in a fudden fally of difappointed affection, it is now no eafy matter to determine. Some papers which are ftill extant feem to render the former not improbable z.

Cares of another kind, and no lefs difquieting, occupied Elizabeth's thoughts. The calm which fhe had long enjoyed, feemed now to be at an end; and fuch ftorms were gathering in every quarter, as filled her with just alarm. All the neighbouring nations had undergone revolutions extremely to her difadvantage. The great qualities which Henry III. had difplayed in his youth, and which raifed the expectations of his fubjects fo high, vanished on his afcending the throne; and his acquiring fupreme power feems not only to have corrupted his heart, but to have impaired his understanding. He foon lost the efteem and affection of the nation ; and a life divided between the austerities of a superstitious devotion, and the extravagancies of the most diffolute debauchery, rendered him as contemptible as he was odious on account of his rapacioufnefs, his profusion, and the fondnefs with which he doated on many unworthy minions. On the death of his only brother, those fentiments of the people burft out with violence. Henry had no children, and though but thirty-two years of age, the fucceffion of the crown was already

Z See Append. No. XLVI.

confidered

confidered as open. The king of Navarre, a diftant defcendant of the royal family, but the undoubted heir to the crown, was a zealous protestant. The profpect of an event fo fatal to their religion, as his afcending the throne of France, alarmed all the catholics in Europe ; and induced the duke of Guife, countenanced by the pope, and aided by the king of Spain, to appear as the defender of the Romish faith, and the afferter of the cardinal of Bourbon's right to the crown. In order to unite the party, a bond of confederacy was formed, diffinguished by the name of the Holy League. All ranks of men joined in it with emulation. The fpirit fpread with the irrefiftible rapidity which was natural to religious paffions in that age. The destruction of the reformation, not only in France, but all over Europe, feemed to he the object and with of the whole party; and the duke of Guife, the head of this mighty and zealous body, acquired authority in the kingdom, far fuperior to that which the king himfelf poffeffed. Philip II. by the conqueft of Portugal, had greatly increased the naval power of Spain, and had at last reduced under his dominion all that portion of the continent which lies beyond the Pyrenean mountains, and which nature feems to have deftined to form one great monarchy. William prince of Orange, who first encouraged the inhabitants of the Netherlands to affert their liberties, and whofe wifdom and valour formed and protected the rifing commonwealth, had fallen by the hands of an affaffin. The fuperior genius of the prince of Parma had given an entire turn to the fate of the war in the Low Countries; all his enterprifes. concerted concerted with confummate fkill, and executed with equal bravery, had been attended with fuccefs; and the Dutch, reduced to the laft extremity, were on the point of falling under the dominion of their ancient mafter.

None of those circumstances, to which Elizabeth had hitherto owed her fecurity, exifted any longer. She could derive no advantage-from the jealoufy which had fubfifted between France and Spain ; Philip, by means of his confederacy with the duke of Guife, had an equal fway in the councils of both kingdoms. The hugonots were unable to contend with the power of the, league; and little could be expected from any diversion which they might create. Nor was it probable that the Netherlands could long employ the arms, or divide the strength of Spain. In this fituation of the affairs of Europe, it became neceffary for Elizabeth to form a new plan of conduct; and her wildom in forming it was not greater than the vigour with which fhe carried it The meafures most fuitable to her natural 011. temper, and which fhe had hitherto purfued, were cautious and fafe; those which fhe now adopted were enterprising and hazardous. She preferred peace, but was not afraid of war, and was capable, when compelled by neceffity, not only of defending herfelf with spirit, but of attacking her enemies with a boldness which averted danger from her own dominions. She immediately furnished the hugonots with a confiderable fupply in money. She carried on a private negotiation with Henry III. who, though compelled to join the league, hated the leaders of it, and wilhed for their destruction. She openly under-undertook the protection of the Dutch commonwealth, and fent a powerful army to its affiftance. She endeavoured to form a general confederacy of the proteftant princes, in opposition to the popifh league. She determined to proceed with the utmost rigour against the queen of Scots, whose fufferings and rights afforded her enemies a fpecious pretence for invading her dominions. She refolved to redouble her endeavours, in order to effect a closer union with Scotland, and to extend and perpetuate her influence over the councils of that nation.

She found it no difficult matter to induce most of the Scottish courtiers to promote all her defigns. Gray, fir John Maitland, who had been advanced to the office of fecretary, which his brother formerly held, fir Lewis Bellenden, the justice clerk, who had fucceeded Gray as the king's refident at London, were the perfons in whom the chiefly confided. In order to direct and quicken their motions, the difpatched fir Edward Wotton along with Bellenden into Scotland [May 29]. This man was gay, well-bred, and entertaining ; he excelled in all the exercifes for which James had a paffion, and amufed the young king by relating the adventures which he had met with, and the obfervations lie had made during a long refidence in foreign countries ; but under the veil of these fuperficial qualities, he concealed a dangerous and intriguing fpirit. He foon grew into high favour with James, and while he was feemingly attentive only to pleafure and diversions, he acquired influence over the, public councils, to a degree which was indecent for a stranger to possels a.

VOL. II.

Nothing,

Nothing, however, could be more acceptable to the nation, than the propofal which he made of a strict alliance between the two kingdoms, in defence of the reformed religion. The rapid and alarming progrefs of the popifh league feemed to call on all protestant princes to unite for the prefervation of their common faith. James embraced the overture with warmth, and a convention of estates [July 29] empowered him to conclude fuch a treaty, and engaged to ratify it in parliament b. The alacrity with which James concurred in this meafure muft not be wholly afcribed either to his own zeal, or to Wotton's addrefs; it was owing in part to Elizabeth's liberality. As a mark of her motherly affection for the young king, fhe fettled on him an annual penfion of five thousand pounds; the fame fum which her father had allotted her before she ascended the throne. This circumftance, which the took care to mention, rendered a fum, which in that age was far from being inconfiderable, a very acceptable prefent to the king, whofe revenues, during a long minority, had been almost totally diffipated c.

But the chief object of Wotton's intrigues was to ruin Arran. While a minion fo odious to the nation continued to govern the king, his affiftance could be of little advantage to Elizabeth. And though Arran, ever fince his interview with Hunfdon, had appeared extremely for her intereft, fhe could place no great confidence in a man whofe conduct was to capricious and irregular, and who, notwithftanding

2

b Spotfw. 339.

c Cald iii. 505.

his

his protestations to the contrary, still continued a fecret correspondence both with Mary and with the duke of Guife. The banished lords were attached to England from affection as well as principle, and were the only perfons among the Scots whom, in any dangerous exigency, fhe could thoroughly truft. Before Bellenden left London, they had been fummoned thither, under colour of vindicating themfelves from his accufations, but, in reality, to concert with him the most proper meafures for reftoring them to their country. Wotton purfued this plan, and endeavoured to ripen it for execution; and it was greatly facilitated by an event neither uncommon nor confiderable. Sir John Forster, and Ker of Ferniherft, the English and Scottish wardens of the middle marches, having met, according to the cuftom of the borders, about midfummer, a fray arofe, and lord Ruffel, the earl of Bedford's eldeft fon, happened to be killed. This fcuffle was purely accidental, but Elizabeth chofe to confider it as a defign formed by Ker, at the infligation of Arran, to involve the two kingdoms in war. She infifted that both fhould be delivered up to her; and though James eluded that demand, he was obliged to confine Arran in St. Andrew's, and Ker in Aberdeen. During his absence from court, Wotton and his affociates carried on their intrigues without interruption. By their advice, the banished nobles endeavoured to accommodate their differences with lord John and lord Claud, the duke of Chatelheraultis two fons, whom Morton's violence had driven out of the kingdom [Oct. 16]. Their common fuffer-ings, and common intereft, induced both parties DD2 to to bury in oblivion the ancient difcord which had fubfilted between the houfes of Hamilton and Douglas. By Elizabeth's permiffion, they returned in a body to the borders of Scotland. Arran, who had again recovered favour, infifted on putting the kingdom in a pofture of defence; but Gray, Bellenden, and Maitland, fecretly thwarted all his meafures. Some neceffary orders they prevented from being iffued; others they rendered ineffectual by the manner of execution ; and all of them were obeyed flowly, and with reluctance d.

304

Wotton's fertile brain was, at the fame time, big with another and more dangerous plot. He had contrived to feize the king, and to carry him by force into England. But the defign was happily difcovered; and, in order to avoid the punishment which his treachery merited, he departed without taking leave °.

Meanwhile the banished lords hastened the execution of their enterprife ; and as their friends and vaffals were now ready to join them, they entered Scotland. Wherever they came, they were welcomed as the deliverers of their country, and the most fervent prayers were addreffed to Heaven for the fuccefs of their arms. They advanced, without lofing a moment, towards Stirling, at the head of ten thousand men. The king, though he had affembled an army fuperior in number, could not venture to meet them in the field, with troops whofe loyalty was extremely dubious, and who at best were far from being hearty in the caufe ; nor was either the town or caftle provided for a fiege. The gates, however, of both were shut, and the nobles encamped at St. Ninian's. That fame night they furprifed the town [Nov. 2], or more probably it was betrayed into their hands; and Arran, who had undertaken to defend it, was obliged to fave himself by a precipitate flight. Next morning they invefted the caftle, in which there were not provisions for twenty-four hours; and James was neceffitated immediately to hearken to terms of accommodation. They were not fo elated with fuccefs as to urge extravagant demands, nor was the king unwilling to make every reasonable concession. They obtained a pardon, in the most ample form, of all the offences which they had committed; the principal forts in the kingdom were, by way of fecurity, put into their hands; Crawford, Montrofe, and colonel Stewart, were removed from the king's prefence ; and a parliament was called [Dec. 10], in order to establish tranquillity in the nation f.

d Spotfw. 340. C Melv. 335.

vided

Though a great majority in this parliament confifted of the confederate nobles and their adherents, they were far from difcovering a vindictive fpirit. Satisfied with procuring an act, refloring them to their ancient honours and eftates, and ratifying the pardon granted by the king, they feemed willing to forget all paft errors in the administration, and fpared James the mortification of feeing his ministers branded with any public note of infamy. Arran alone, deprived of all his honours, ftripped of his borrowed fpoils, and declared an enemy to his country by public proclamation, funk back into obfcurity, and must henceforth be mentioned by his primitive title of captain James Stewart. As he had been, during his unmerited prosperity, the object of the hatred and indignation of his countrymen, they beheld his fall without pity, nor did all his fufferings mitigate their refertment in the leaft degree.

> f Cald. iii. 795. DD 3

public

The clergy were the only body of men who obtained no redrefs of their grievances by this revolution. The confederate nobles had all along affected to be confidered as guardians of the privileges and difcipline of the church. In all their manifestos they had declared their refolution to reftore thefe, and by that popular pretence had gained many friends. It was now natural to expect fome fruit of these promises, and fome returns of gratitude towards many of the most eminent preachers who had fuffered in their caufe, and who demanded the repeal of the laws paffed the preceding year. The king, however, was refolute to maintain these laws in full authority; and as the nobles were extremely folicitous not to difguft him, by infifting on any difagrceable requeft, the claims of the church in this, as well as in many other inftances, were facrificed to the intereft of the laity. The ministers gave vent to their indignation in the pulpit, and their impatience under the difappointment broke out in fome expreffions extremely difrespectful even to the king himfelf g.

1586.] The archbishop of St. Andrew's, too, felt the effects of their anger. The provincial

s Spotfw. 343.

fynod

lynod of Fife fummoned him to appear, and to anfwer for his contempt of the decrees of former affemblies, in prefuming to exercife the functions of a bifhop. Though he refufed to acknowledge the jurifdiction of the court, and appealed from it to the king, a fentence of excommunication, equally indecent and irregular, was pronounced againft him. Adamfon, with no lefs indecency, thundered his archiepifcopal excommunication againft Melvil and fome other of his opponents.

Soon after [April 13], a general affembly was held, in which the king, with fome difficulty, obtained an act, permitting the name and office of bishop still to continue in the church. The power of the order, however, was confiderably retrenched. The exercise of discipline, and the infpection of the life and doctrine of the clergy, were committed to prefbyteries, in which bishops fhould be allowed no other pre-eminence but that of prefiding as perpetual moderators. They themfelves were declared to be fubject, in the fame manner as other pastors, to the jurisdiction of the general affembly. As the difcuffion of the archbishop's appeal might have kindled unufual heats in the affembly, that affair was terminated by a compromife. He renounced any claim of fupremacy over the church, and promifed to demean himfelf fuitably to the character of a bishop, as defcribed by St. Paul. The affembly, without examining the foundations of the fentence of excommunication, declared that it should be held of no effect, and reftored him to all the privileges which be enjoyed before it was pronounced. Notwithstanding the extraordinary tenderness shewn for the honour of the fynod, and the delicacy licacy and refpect with which its jurifdiction was treated, feveral members were fo zealous as to proteft against this decision <sup>h</sup>.

The court of Scotland was now filled with perfons fo warmly attached to Elizabeth, that the league between the two kingdoms, which had been propofed last year, met with no interruption, but from D'Esneval, the French envoy. James himfelf first offered to renew the negotiation. Elizabeth did not fuffer fuch a favourable opportunity to flip, and inftantly difpatched Randolph to conclude a treaty, which she fo much defired [July 5]. The danger to which the protestant religion was exposed, by the late combination of the popifh powers for its deftruction, and the neceffity of a ftrict confederacy among those who had embraced the reformation, in order to obftruct their pernicious defigns, were mentioned as the foundation of the league. The chief articles in it were, that both parties should bind themselves to defend the evangelic religion; that the league should be offensive and defensive against all who shall endeayour to disturb the exercife of religion in either kingdom; that if one of the two parties be invaded, the other, notwithstanding any former alliance, should not, directly or indirectly, affift the invader; that if England be invaded in any part remote from Scotland, James should affist the queen with two thoufand horfe and five thoufand foot; that if the cnemy landed or approached within fixty miles of Scotland, the king fhould take the field with his whole forces, in the fame manner as he would do in defence of his own kingdom, h Cald. iii. 894. Spotfw. 346.

Elizabeth,

Elizabeth, in rcturn, undertook to act in defence of Scotland, if it should be invaded. At the fame time fhe affured the king that no ftep fhould. be taken, which might derogate in any degree from his pretensions to the English crown i Elizabeth expressed great fatisfaction with a treaty, which rendered Scotland an ufeful ally, inftead of a dangerous neighbour, and afforded her a degree of fecurity on that fide, which all her ancestors had aimed at, but none of them had been able to obtain. Zeal for religion, together with the bleffings of peace, which both kingdoms had enjoyed during a confiderable period, had fo far abated the violence of national antipathy, that the king's conduct was univerfally acceptable to his own people k. The acquittal of Archibald Douglas, at this time, exposed James to much and deferved cenfure. This man was deeply engaged in the confpiracy against the life of the king his father. Both Morton and Binny, one of his own fervants, who fuffered for that crime, had accufed him of being prefent at the murder 1. He had escaped punishment by flying into England, and James had often required Elizabeth to deliver up a perfon fo unworthy of her protection. He now obtained a licence, from the king himfelf. to return into Scotland; and after undergoing a mock-trial, calculated to conceal, rather than to detect his guilt, he was not only taken into favour by the king, but fent back to the court of England, with the honourable character of his ambaffador. James was now of fuch an age, that i Spotfw. 351. k Camd. 513.

1 See Append. No. XLVII. Arnot, Crim. Trials, 7, &c.

his youth and inexperience cannot be pleaded in excufe for this indecent transaction. It must be imputed to the exceffive facility of his temper, which often led him to gratify his courtiers at the expence of his own dignity and reputation <sup>m</sup>.

B. VII.

Not long after, the inconfiderate affection of the Englifh catholics towards Mary, and their implacable refentment againft Elizabeth, gave rife to a confpiracy which proved fatal to the one queen, left an indelible ftain on the reputation of the other, and prefented a fpectacle to Europe, of which there had been hitherto no example in the hiftory of mankind.

Doctor Gifford, Gilbert Gifford, and Hodgfon, priefts educated in the feminary at Rheims, had adopted an extravagant and enthusiaftic notion, that the bull of Pius V. against Elizabeth was dictated immediately by the Holy Ghoft. This wild opinion they inftilled into Savage, an officer in the Spanish army, noted for his furious zeal and daring courage ; and perfuaded him that no fervice could be fo acceptable to Heaven, as to take away the life of an excommunicated heretic. Savage, eager to obtain the crown of martyrdom, bound himfelf by a folemn vow to kill Elizabeth [April 26]. Ballard, a pragmatical prieft of that feminary, had at that time come over to Paris, and folicited Mendoza, the Spanish ambasiador there, to procure an invafion of England, while the affairs of the league were fo profperous, and the kingdom left naked by fending fo many of the queen's best troops into the Netherlands. Paget and the English exiles demonstrated the m Spotfw. 348. Cald. iii. 917.

fruit-

fruitlefsnefs of fuch an attempt, unlefs Elizabeth were firft cut off, or the invaders fecured of a powerful concurrence on their landing. If it could be hoped that either of thefe events would happen, effectual aid was promifed; and in the mean time Ballard was fent back to renew his intrigues.

He communicated his defigns to Anthony Babington [May 15], a young gentleman in Derbyshire, of a large fortune and many amiable qualities, who having contracted, during his refidence in France, a familiarity with the arch-bishop of Glasgow, had been recommended by him to the queen of Scots. He concurred with Paget, in confidering the death of Elizabeth as a neceffary preliminary to any invafion. Ballard gave him hopes that an end would foon be put to her days, and imparted to him Savage's vow, who was now in London waiting for an opportunity to ftrike the blow. But Babington thought the attempt of too much importance, to rely on a fingle hand for the execution of it, and propofed that five refolute gentlemen fhould be joined with Savage in an enterprife, the fuccefs of which was the foundation of all their hopes. He offered to find out perfons willing to undertake the fervice, whofe honour, fecrecy, and courage they might fafely truft. He accordingly opened the matter to Edward Windfor, Thomas Salifbury, Charles Tilney, Chidioc Tichbourne, Robert Gage, John Travers, Robert Barnwell, John Charnock, Henry Dun, John Jones, and Robert Polly; all of them, except Polly, whofe buftling forward zeal introduced him into their fociety, gentlemen of good families.

B. VII.

families, united together in the bonds of private friendship, strengthened by the more powerful tie of religious zeal. Many confultations were held; their plan of operations was at last fettled; and their different parts affigned [June]. Babington himfelf was appointed to refcue the queen of Scots; Salifbury, with fome others, undertook to excite feveral counties to take arms ; the murder of the queen, the moft dangerous and important fervice of all, fell to Tichbourne and Savage, with four affociates. So totally had their bigoted prejudices extinguished the principles of honour, and the fentiments of humanity fuitable to their rank, that, without fcruple or compunction, they undertook an action which is viewed with horror, even when committed by the meaneft and most profligate of mankind. This attempt, on the contrary, appeared to them no lefs honourable than it was defperate; and in order to perpetuate the memory of it, they had a picture drawn containing the portraits of the fix affaffins, with that of Babington in the middle, and a motto intimating that they were jointly embarked in fome hazardous defign.

The confpirators, as appears by this wanton and imprudent inftance of vanity, feem to have thought a difcovery hardly poffible, and neither diftrufted the fidelity of their companions, nor doubted the fuceefs of their undertaking. But while they believed that their machinations were carried on with the moft profound and impenetrable fecrecy, every flep they took was fully known to Walfingham. Polly was one of his tpies, and had entered into the confpiracy, with no no other defign than to betray his affociates. Gilbert Gifford too, having been fent over to England to quicken the motions of the confpirators, had been gained by Walfingham, and gave him fure intelligence of all their projects. That vigilant minifter immediately imparted the difcoveries which he had made to Elizabeth; and without communicating the matter to any other of the counfellors, they agreed, in order to underftand the plot more perfectly, to wait until it was ripened into fome form, and brought near the point of execution.

312

At last, Elizabeth thought it dangerous and criminal to expofe her own life, and to tempt Providence any farther. Ballard, the prime mover in the whole confpiracy, was arrefted [Aug. 4]. His affociates, difconcerted and ftruck with aftonishment, endeavoured to fave themfelves by flight. But within a few days, all of them, except Windfor, were feized in different places of the kingdom, and committed to the Tower. Though they had undertaken the part, they wanted the firm and determined spirit of affaffins; and, influenced by fear or by hope, at once confessed all that they knew. The indignation of the people, and their impatience to revenge fuch an execrable combination against the life of their fovereign, haftened their trial, and all of them fuffered the death of traitors [Sept. 20] n.

Thus far Elizabeth's conduct may be pronounced both prudent and laudable, nor can fhe be accufed of violating any law of humanity, or of taking any precautions beyond what were nen Camd, 515. State Triols, vol. i. 110.

VOL. II.

ceffary

314

ceffary for her own fafety. But a tragical fcene followed, with regard to which pofterity will pafs a very different judgment.

The frantic zeal of a few rafh young men accounts fufficiently for all the wild and wicked defigns which they had formed. But this was not the light in which Elizabeth and her minifters chofe to place the confpiracy. They wished to perfnade the nation, that Babington and his affociates should be confidered merely as instruments employed by the queen of Scots, the real though fecret author of fo many attempts against the life of Elizabeth, and the peace of her kingdoms. They produced letters, which they afcribed to her, in fupport of this charge. Thefe, as they gave out, had come into their hands by the following fingular and mysterious method of conveyance. Gifford, on his return into England, had been trufted by fome of the exiles with letters to Mary; but in order to make a trial of his fidelity and addrefs, they were only blank papers made up in that form. Thefe being fafely delivered by him, he was afterwards employed without farther foruple. Walfingham having found means to gain this man, he, by the permiffion of that minister, and the connivance of Paulet, bribed a tradefman in the neighbourhood of Chartley, whither Mary had been conveyed, who deposited the letters in a hole in the wall of the caffle, covered with a loofe ftone. Thence they were taken by the queen, and in the fame manner her answers returned. All these were carried to Walfingham, opened by him, decyphered, fealed again fo dexteroully that the fraud could not be perceived, and then transmitted to the the perfons to whom they were directed. Two letters to Babington, feveral to Mendoza, Paget, Englefield, and the English fugitives, were procured by this artifice. It was given out, that in these letters Mary approved of the conspiracy, and even of the affaffination; that fhe directed them to proceed with the utmost circumspection, and not to take arms until foreign auxiliaries were ready to join them; that fhe recommended the earl of Arundel, his brothers, and the young earl of Northumberland, as proper perfons to conduct and to add reputation to their enterprife; that the advifed them, if poffible, to excite at the fame time fome commotion in Ireland; and above all, befought them to concert with care the means of her own escape, fuggesting to them several expedients for that purpofe.

E. VIII

All these circumstances were opened at the trial of the confpirators; and while the nation was under the influence of those terrors which the affociation had raifed, and the late danger had augmented, they were believed without hefitation or inquiry, and fpread a general alarm. Mary's zeal for her religion was well known; and in that age, examples of the violent and fanguinary fpirit which it infpired were numerous. All the cabals against the peace of the kingdom for many years had been carried on in her name; and it now appears evidently, faid the English, that the fafety of the one queen is incompatible with that of the other. Why then, added they, fhould the tranquillity of England be facrificed for the fake of a stranger? Why is a life fo dear to the nation exposed to the repeated affaults of an exasperated rival? The case supposed in the asfociation EE 2 fociation has now happened, the facred perfon of our fovereign has been threatened, and why fhould not an injured people execute that just vengeance which they had vowed ?

315

No fentiments could be more agreeable than thefe to Elizabeth and her ministers. They themfelves had at first propagated them among the people, and they now ferved both as an apology and a motive for their proceeding to fuch extremities against the Scottish queen as they had long meditated. The more numerous the injuries were which Elizabeth had heaped on Mary, the more she feared and hated that unhappy queen, and came at laft to be perfuaded that there could be no other fecurity for her own life, but the death of her rival. Burleigh and Walfingham had promoted fo zealoufly all Elizabeth's measures with regard to Scottish affairs, and had acted with fo little referve in opposition to Mary, that they had reafon to dread the most violent effects of her refentment, if ever she should mount the throne of England. From this additional confideration they endeavoured, with the utmost earnestness, to hinder an event so fatal to themfelves, by confirming their miftrefs's fear and hatred of the Scottish queen.

Meanwhile, Mary was guarded with unufual vigilance, and great care was taken to keep her ignorant of the difcovery of the confpiracy. Sir Thomas Gorges was at laft fent from court to acquaint her both of it, and of the imputation with which fhe was loaded as acceffary to that crime; and he furprifed her with the account juft as fhe had got on horfeback to ride out along with her keepers. She was ftruck with aftonifhment, ment, and would have returned to her apartment, but fhe was not permitted; and in her abfence, her private clofet was broke open, her cabinet and papers were feized, fealed, and fent up to court. Her principal domeftics too were arrefted, and committed to different keepers. Nau and Curle, her two fecretaries, the one a native of France, the other of Scotland, were carried prifoners to London. All the money in her cuftody, amounting to little more than two thouland pounds, was fecured °. And after leading her about for fome days, from one gentleman's houle to another, fhe was conveyed to Fotheringay, a ftrong caftle in Northamptonfhire P.

No farther evidence could now be expected against Mary, and nothing remained but to decide what should be her fate. With regard to this, Elizabeth, and those ministers in whom the chiefly confided, feem to have taken their resolution; but there was still great variety of fentiments among her other counfellors. Some thought it fufficient to difmiss all Mary's attendants, and to keep her under fuch close restraint, as would cut off all possibility of corresponding with the enemies of the kingdom; and as her conflictution, broken by long confinement, and her spirit, dejected with some forrows, could not long support such an additional load, the queen and nation would soon be delivered from all their fears. But though it might be easy to fecure Mary's own person, it was impossible to diminish the reverence which the Roman catholics had for her name, or to extinguish the com-

See Appendix, No. XLVIII. P Camd. 517.

paffion

-

paffion with which they viewed her fufferings; while fuch fentiments continued, infurrections and invafions would never be wanting for her relief, and the only effect of any new rigour would be to render thefe attempts more frequent and more dangerous. For this reafon the expedient was rejected.

A public and legal trial, though the most unexampled, was judged the most unexceptionable method of proceeding; and it had, at the fame time, a femblance of justice, accompanied with an air of dignity. It was in vain to fearch the ancient records for any flatute or precedent to justify fuch an uncommon step, as the trial of a foreign prince, who had not entered the kingdom in arms, but had fled thither for refuge. The proceedings against her were founded on the act of last parliament, and by applying it in this manner, the intention of those who had framed that fevere flatute became more apparent 9.

Elizabeth rcfolved that no circumftance of pomp or folemnity fhould be wanting, which could render this tranfaction fuch as became the dignity of the perfon to be tried. She appointed, by a commiffion under the great feal, forty perfons, the most illustrious in the kingdom by their birth or offices, together with five of the judges, to hear and decide this great caufe. Many difficulties were started by the lawyers about the name and title by which Mary should be arraigned; and while the effentials of justice were fo grofsly violated, the empty forms of it were the objects of their care. They at length agreed that fhe fhould be ftyled "Mary, daughter and " heir of James V. late king of Scots, com-" monly called queen of Scots and dowager of " France"."

9 Camd, 519. Johnft. Hift. 113.

After the many indignities which fhe had lately fuffered, Mary could no longer doubt but that her deftruction was determined. She expected every moment to end her days by poifon, or by fome of thofe fecret means ufually employed againft captive princes. Left the malice of her enemies, at the fame time that it deprived her of life, fhould endeavour likewife to blaft her reputation, fhe wrote to the duke of Guife, and vindicated herfelf, in the ftrongeft terms, from the imputation of encouraging or of being acceffary to the confpiracy for affaffinating Elizabeth<sup>6</sup>. In the folitude of her prifon, the ftrange refolution of bringing her to a public trial had not reached her ears, nor did the idea of any thing fo unprecedented, and fo repugnant to regal majefty, once enter into her thoughts.

On the eleventh of October, the commiffioners appointed by Elizabeth arrived at Fotheringay. Next morning they delivered a letter from their fovereign to Mary, in which, after the bittereft reproaches and accufations, fhe informed her, that regard for the happines of the nation had at last rendered it necessfary to make a public inquiry into her conduct, and therefore required her, as the had lived to long under the protection of the laws of England, to fubmit now to the trial which they ordained to be taken of her crimes. Mary, though furprifed at this message, was neither

5 Strype, iii. 362.

<sup>s</sup> Jebb, ii. 283.

B. VII.

320

neither appalled at the danger, nor unmindful of her own dignity. She protested, in the most fo-lemn manner, that she was innocent of the crime laid to her charge, and had never countenanced any attempt against the life of the queen of Eng-land; but at the fame time refused to acknowledge the jurifdiction of her commiffioners. "I "came into the kingdom," faid fhe, "an inde-"pendent fovereign, to implore the queen's af. "fiftance, not to fubject myfelf to her authority. "Nor is my fpirit fo broken by its paft misfor-"tunes, or fo intimidated by prefent dangers, "as to floop to any thing unbecoming the ma-"jefty of a crowned head, or that will difgrace "the anceftors from whom I am defcended, and " the fon to whom I shall leave my throne. If " I must be tried, princes alone can be my peers. "The queen of England's fubjects, however "noble their birth may be, are of a rank infe-"rior to mine. Ever fince my arrival in this <sup>44</sup> kingdom I have been confined as a prifoner.
<sup>45</sup> Its laws never afforded me any protection.
<sup>46</sup> Let them not now be perverted, in order to
<sup>46</sup> take away my life."

" take away my life." The commiffioners employed arguments and intreaties to overcome Mary's refolution. They even threatened to proceed according to the forms of law, and to pafs fentence againft her on account of her contumacy in refufing to plead; fhe perfifted, however, for two days, to decline their jurifdiction. An argument ufed by Hatton, the vice-chamberlain, at laft prevailed. He told her, that, by avoiding a trial, fhe injured her own reputation, and deprived herfelf of the only opportunity of fetting her innocence in a clear clear light; and that nothing would be more agreeable to them, or more acceptable to the queen their miftrefs, than to be convinced, by undoubted evidence, that fhe had been unjuftly loaded with foul afperfions.

No wonder pretexts fo plaufible fhould impofe on the unwary queen, or that fhe, unaffifted at that time by any friend or counfellor, fhould not be able to detect and elude all the artifices of Elizabeth's ableft minifters. In a fituation equally melancholy, and under circumftances nearly fimilar, her grandfon, Charles I. refufed, with the utmoft firmnefs, to acknowledge the ufurped jurifdiction of the high court of juffice; and pofterity has approved his conduct, as fuitable to the dignity of a king. If Mary was lefs conftant in her refolution, it muft be imputed folely to her anxious defire of vindicating her own honour.

At her appearance before the judges [Oct. 14], who were feated in the great hall of the caftle, where they received her with much ceremony, fhe took care to proteft, that, by condefcending to hear and to give an anfwer to the accufations, which fhould be brought againft her, fhe neither acknowledged the jurifdiction of the court, nor admitted of the validity and juffice of those acts by which they pretended to try her.

The chancellor, by a counter-proteftation, endeavoured to vindicate the authority of the court.

Then Elizabeth's attorney and folicitor opened the charge againft her, with all the circumftances of the late confpiracy. Copies of Mary's letters to Mendoza, Babington, Englefield, and Paget, were produced. Babington's confeffion, those of

B. VII.

of Ballard, Savage, and the other confpirators, together with the declarations of Nau and Curle, her fecretaries, were read, and the whole ranged in the most specious order which the art of the lawyers could devife, and heightened by every colour their eloquence could add.

Mary liftened to their harangues attentively, and without emotion. But at the mention of the earl of Arundel's name, who was then confined in the Tower, fhe broke out into this tender and generous exclamation : "Alas, how much " has the noble house of Howard fuffered for " my fake !"

When the queen's counfel had finished, Mary ftood up, and with great magnanimity, and equal prefence of mind, began her defence. She be-wailed the unhappiness of her own fituation, that after a captivity of nineteen years, during which fhe had fuffered treatment no lefs cruel than unmerited, she was at last loaded with an accusation, which tended not only to rob her of her right of fucceffion, and to deprive her of life itfelf, but to transmit her name with infamy to future ages : that, without regarding the facred rights of fovereignty, fhe was now subjected to laws framed against private perfons; though an anointed queen, commanded to appear before the tribunal of fubjects; and, like a common criminal, her honour exposed to the petulant tongues of lawyers, capable of wrefting her words, and of mifrepresenting her actions : that, even in this dishonourable fituation, she was denied the privileges usually granted to criminals, and obliged to undertake her own defence, without the prefence of any friend with whom to advife, without the aid aid of counfel, and without the use of her own papers.

1586.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

She then proceeded to the particular articles in the acculation. She absolutely denied any correspondence with Babington or Ballard: copies only of her pretended letters to them were produced; though nothing lefs than her handwriting or fubscription was sufficient to convict her of fuch an odious crime: no proof could be brought that their letters were delivered into her hands, or that any anfwer was returned by her direction : the confessions of wretches condemned and executed for fuch a detertable action, were of little weight; fear or hope might ex-tort from them many things inconfiftent with truth, nor ought the honour of a queen to be flained by fuch vile testimony. The declaration of her fecretaries was not more conclusive : pro-mifes and threats might easily overcome the refolution of two ftrangers; in order to fcreen themfelves they might throw the blame on her; hut they could difcover nothing to her preju-dicc, without violating, in the first place, the oath of fidelity which they had fworn to her; and their perjury, in one inftance, rendered them unworthy of credit in another : the letters to the Spanish ambassador were either nothing more than copies, or contained only what was perfectly innocent : " I have often," continued fhe, " made " fuch efforts for the recovery of my liberty, as " are natural to a human creature. Convinced, by the fad experience of fo many years, that " it was vain to expect it from the justice or " generofity of the queen of England, I have " frequently folicited foreign princes, and called " upon

323

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

324

B. VII.

" upon all my friends to employ their whole " interest for my relief. I have likewife en-" deavoured to procure for the English catholics " fome mitigation of the rigour with which they " are now treated; and if I could hope, by my " death, to deliver them from oppression, I am " willing to die for their fake. I wifh, how-" ever, to imitate the example of Efther, not of " Judith, and would rather make interceffion " for my people, than fhed the blood of the " meaneft creature, in order to fave them. I " have often checked the intemperate zeal of " my adherents, when either the feverity of " their own perfecutions, or indignation at the " unheard-of injuries which I have endured, were " apt to precipitate them into violent councils. " I have even warned the queen of dangers to " which thefe harfh proceedings exposed her-" felf. And worn out, as I now am, with cares " and fufferings, the profpect of a crown is " not fo inviting, that I should ruin my foul " in order to obtain it. I am no ftranger to " the feelings of humanity, nor unacquainted " with the duties of religion, and abhor the " deteftable crime of affaffination, as equally " regugnant to both. And, if ever I have given " confent by my words, or even by my thoughts, " to any attempt against the life of the queen of " England, far from declining the judgment of men, I shall not even pray for the mercy of " God "."

Two different days did Mary appear before the judges, and in every part of her behaviour

t Camd. 520, &c.

maintained

maintained the magnanimity of a queen, tempered with the gentlenets and modefty of a woman.

The commiffioners, by Elizabeth's express command, adjourned, without pronouncing any fentence, to the flar-chamber in Weftminiter [Oct. 25]. When affembled in that place, Nau and Curle were brought into court, and confirmed their former declaration upon oath; and after reviewing all their proceedings, the commiffioners unanimoufly deelared Mary "To be acceffary to "Babington's confpiracy, and to have imagined "diverse matters tending to the hurt, death, "and deftruction of Elizabeth, contrary to the "express words of the flatute made for the fe-"curity of the queen's life "."

It is no eafy matter to determine whether the injustice in appointing this trial, or the irregularity in conducting it, were greatest and most flagrant. By what right did Elizabeth claim authority over an independent queen? Was Mary bound to comply with the laws of a foreign kingdom? How could the fubjects of another prince become her judges? or if fuch an infult on royalty were allowed, ought not the common forms of juffice to have been obferved ? If the testimony of Babington and his affociates were fo explicit, why did not Elizabeth fpare them for a few weeks, and by confronting them with Mary, overwhelm her with the full conviction of her crimes ? Nau and Curle were both alive, wherefore did not they appear at Fotheringay, and for what reafon were they produced in the ftarchamber, where Mary was not prefent to hear what

VOL. II.

<sup>u</sup> Camd. 525. E F

what they depofed ? Was this fufpicious evidence enough to condemn a queen ? Ought the meaneft criminal to have been found guilty upon fuch feeble and inconclusive proofs ?

It was not, however, on the evidence produced at her trial, that the fentence againft Mary was founded. That ferved as a pretence to juftify, but was not the caufe of the violent fleps taken by Elizabeth and her minifters towards her deftruction; and was employed to give fome appearance of juffice to what was the offspring of jealoufy and fear. The nation, blinded with refentment againft Mary, and folicitous to fecure the life of its own fovereign from every danger, obferved no irregularities in the proceedings, and attended to no defects in the proof, but grafped at the fufpicions and probabilities, as if they had been irrefragable demonftrations.

The parliament met a few days after fentence was pronounced againft Mary. In that illuftrious affembly more temper and difcernment than are to be found among the people might have been expected. Both lords and commons, however, were equally under the dominion of popular prejudices and paffions, and the fame exceffes of zeal, or of fear, which prevailed in the nation, are apparent in all their proceedings. They entered with impatience upon an inquiry into the confpiracy, and the danger which threatened the queen's life as well as the peace of the kingdom. All the papers which had been produced at Fotheringay were laid before them; and after many violent invectives againft the queen of Scots, both houfes unanimoufly ratified the proceedings of the commiffioners by whom the had been been tried, and declared the fentence against her to be just and well-founded. Not fatisfied with this, they prefented a joint address to the queen, befeeching her, as the regarded her own fafety, the prefervation of the protestant religion, the welfare and wifhes of her people, to publish the fentence; and without farther delay to inflict on a rival, no lefs irreclaimable than dangerous, the punishment which she had merited by fo many crimes. This requeft, dictated by fears unworthy of that great affembly, was enforced by reasons still more unworthy. They were drawn not from justice but from conveniency. The most rigorous confinement, it was pretended, could not curb Mary's intriguing fpirit; her ad-drefs was found, by long experience, to be an overmatch for the vigilance and jealoufy of all her keepers : the fevereft penal laws could not reftrain her adherents, who, while they believed her perfon to be facred, would defpife any danger to which themfelves alone were exposed : feveral foreign princes were ready to fecond their attempts, and waited only a proper opportunity for invading the kingdom, and afferting the Scottish queen's title to the crown. Her life, they contended, was, for these reasons, incompatible with Elizabeth's fafety; and if fhe were fpared out of a falfe clemency, the queen's perfon, the religion and liberties of the kingdom, could not be one moment fecure. Neceffity required that fhe should be facrificed in order to preferve thefe ; and to prove this facrifice to be no lefs just than neceffary, feveral examples in hiftory were produced, and many texts of fcripture quoted ; but both FF2

326

327

B. VII. HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

both the one and the other were mifapplied, and diftorted from their true meaning.

328

Nothing, however, could be more acceptable to Elizabeth, than an addrefs in this ftrain. It extricated her out of a fituation extremely embarraffing; and without depriving her of the power of sparing, it enabled her to punish her rival with lefs appearance of blame. If the chofe the former, the whole honour would redound to her own clemency. If the determined on the latter, whatever was rigorous might now feem to be extorted by the folicitations of her people rather than to flow from her own inclination. Her anfwcr, however, was in a ftyle which fhe often used, ambiguous and evalive, under the appearance of openness and candour ; full of fuch professions of regard for her people, as ferved to heighten their loyalty; of fuch complaints of Mary's ingratitude, as were calculated to excite their indignation ; and of fuch infinuations that her own life was in danger, as could not fail to keep alive their fears. In the end, she befought them to fave her the infamy and the pain of delivering up a queen, her nearest kinfwoman, to punishment; and to confider whether it might not still be poffible to provide for the public fecurity, without forcing her to imbrue her hands in royal blood.

The true meaning of this reply was eafily understood. The lords and commons renewed their former request with additional importunity, which was far from being either unexpected or offensive. Elizabeth did not return any answer more explicit; and having obtained fuch a public fanction of her proceedings, there was no longer any any reafon for protracting this fcene of diffimulation; there was even fome danger that her feigned difficulties might at laft be treated as real ones; fhe therefore prorogued the parliament, and referved in her own hands the fole difpofal of her rival's fate *.

All the princes in Europe obferved the proceedings against Mary with astonishment and horror; and even Henry III. notwithstanding his known averfion to the house of Guile, was obliged to interpofe in her behalf, and to appear in defence of the common rights of royalty. Aubefpine his refident ambaffador, and Bellievre, who was fent with an extraordinary commiffion to the fame purpole [Nov. 21], interceded for Mary with great appearance of warmth. They employed all the arguments which the caufe naturally suggested; they pleaded from justice, from generofity, and humanity; they intermingled reproaches and threats ; but to all thefe Elizabeth continued deaf and inexorable; and having received fome intimation of Henry's real unconcern about the fate of the Scottish queen, and knowing his antipathy to all the race of Guife, fhe trufted that these loud remonstrances would be followed by no violent refentment y.

She paid no greater regard to the folicitations of the Scottifh king, which, as they were urged with greater fincerity, merited more attention. Though her commiffioners had been extremely careful to footh James, by publifhing a declaration, that their fentence againft Mary did, in no degree, derogate from his honour, or invalidate * Camd. 526. D'Ewes, 375.

FF3

y Camd. 531. any 330

any title which he formerly poffeffed; he beheld the indignities to which his mother had been expofed with filial concern, and with the fentiments which became a king. The pride of the Scottifh nation was roufed, by the infult offered to the blood of their monarchs, and called upon him to employ the moft vigorous efforts, in order to prevent or to revenge the queen's death.

At first, he could hardly believe that Elizabeth would venture upon an action fo unprecedented, which tended fo vifibly to render the perfons of princes lefs facred in the eyes of the people, and which degraded the regal dignity, of which, at other times, she was fo remarkably jealous. But as foon as the extraordinary fteps which fhe took discovered her intention, he dispatched fir William Keith to London; who, together with Douglas his ambaffador in ordinary, remonstrated, in the ftrongeft terms, against the injury done to an independent queen, in fubjecting her to be tried like a private perfon, and by laws to which she owed no obedience; and befought Elizabeth not to add to this injury, by fuffering a fentence unjust in itself, as well as difhonourable to the king of Scots, to be put into execution <sup>z</sup>.

Elizabeth returning no anfwer to thefe remonftrances of his ambaffador, James wrote to her with his own hand, complaining in the bittereft terms of her conduct, not without threats that both his duty and his honour would oblige him to renounce her friendship, and to act as became a fon when called to revenge his mother's wrongs<sup>2</sup>.

Z See Append. No. XLIX. Murdin, 573, &c. Birch. Mem. i. 52.
<sup>a</sup> Birch. Mem. i. 52.

B. VIL.

At the fame time he affembled the nobles, who promifed to ftand by luim in fo good a caufe. He appointed ambaffadors to France, Spain, and Denmark, in order to implore the aid of thefc courts; and took other fleps towards executing his threats with vigour. The high ftrain of his letter enraged Elizabeth to fuch a degree, that fhe was ready to difinifs his ambaffadors without any reply. But his preparations alarmed and embarraffed her minifters, and at their entreaty fhe returned a foft and evafive anfwer, promifing to liften to any overture from the king, that tended to his mother's fafety; and to fufpend the execution of the fentence, until the arrival of new ambaffadors from Scotland<sup>b</sup>.

Meanwhile, fhe commanded the fentence againft Mary to be published [Dec. 6], and forgot not to inform the people, that this was extorted from her by the repeated entreaty of both houfes of parliament. At the fame time she dispatched lord Buckhurft and Beale to acquaint Mary with the fentence, and how importunately the nation demanded the execution of it; and though she had not hitherto yielded to these folicitations, she advised her to prepare for an event which might become necessfary for fecuring the protestant religion, as well as quieting the minds of the people. Mary received the messfage not only without symptoms of fear, but with expressions of triumph. "No wonder," faid she, "the English should now thirst for the blood "of a foreign prince, they have often offered "violence to their own monarchs. But after

b Spotfw. 251. Cald. iv. 5.

332

" fo many fufferings, death comes to me as a " welcome deliverer. I am proud to think that " my life is deemed of importance to the catholic " religion, and as a martyr for it I am now willing " to die "

After the publication of the fentence, Mary was ftripped of every remaining mark of royalty. The canopy of flate in her apartment was pulled down; Paulet entered her chamber, and approached her perfon without any ceremony; and even appeared covered in her prefence. Shocked with these indignities, and offended at this gross familiarity, to which fhe had never been accuftomed, Mary once more complained to Elizabeth; and at the fame time [Dec. 19], as her last request, entreated that she would permit her fervants to carry her dead body into France, to be laid among her anceftors in hallowed ground ; that fome of her domestics might be prefent at her death, to bear witness of her innocence, and firm adherence to the catholic faith ; that all her fervants might be fuffered to leave the kingdom, and to enjoy those fmall legacies which fhe should bestow on them, as testimonies of her affection; and that, in the mean time, her al-moner, or fome other catholic prieft, might be allowed to attend her, and to affift her in preparing for an eternal world. She befought her, in the name of Jefus, by the foul and memory of Henry VII. their common progenitor, by their near confanguinity, and the royal dignity with which they were both invefted, to gratify her in-these particulars, and to indulge her fo far as to c Camd. 528. [ebb, 291.

fignify

fignify her compliance by a letter under her own hand. Whether Mary's letter was ever delivered to Elizabeth is uncertain. No anfwer was returned, and no regard paid to her requefts. She was offered a proteftant bifhop or dean to attend her. Them fhe rejected, and without any clergyman to direct her devotions, fhe prepared, in great tranquillity, for the approach of death, which fhe now believed to be at no great diftance <sup>d</sup>.

1587.] James, without lofing a moment, fent new ambaffadors to London [Jan. 1]. Thefe were the mafter of Gray, and fir Robert Melvil. In order to remove Elizabeth's fears, they offered that their mafter would become bound that no confpiracy should be undertaken against her perfon, or the peace of the kingdom, with Mary's confent ; and for the faithful performance of this, would deliver fome of the most confiderable of the Scottish nobles as hoftages. If this were not thought fufficient, they proposed that Mary fhould refign all her rights and pre-tenfions to her fon, from whom nothing in-jurious to the protestant religion, or inconfistent with Elizabeth's fafety, could be feared. The former propofal Elizabeth rejected as infecure; the latter, as dangerous. The ambaffadors were then inftructed to talk in a higher tone; and Melvil executed the commission with fidelity and with zeal. But Gray, with his ufual perfidy, deceived his mafter, who trufted him with a negotiation of fo much importance, and betrayed the queen whom he was employed to fave. He d Camd. 528. Jebb, ii. 295.

encou-

encouraged and urged Elizabeth to execute the fentence against her rival. He often repeated the old proverbial fentence, "The dead cannot "bite." And whatever should happen, he undertook to pacify the king's rage, or at least to prevent any violent effects of his referement. Elizabeth, meanwhile, difcovered all the fymptoms of the most violent agitation and dif-quietude of mind. She shunned fociety, she was often found in a melancholy and musing posture, and repeating with much emphasis these fentences which she borrowed from some of the devices then in vogue; Aut fer aut feri; ne feriare, feri. Much, no doubt, of this apparent uneafinefs must be imputed to diffimulation; it was impossible, however, that a princess, natuwas impossible, however, that a princefs, natu-rally fo cautious as Elizabeth, fhould venture on an action, which might expose her memory to infamy, and her life and kingdom to danger, with-out reflecting deeply, and hefitating long. The people waited her determination in fuspense and anxiety; and left their fear or their zeal should fubfide, rumours of danger were artfully invent-ed, and propagated with the utmoss industry. Aubefpine, the French ambassador, was accused of having fuborned an assadiation to murder the queen. The Spanish fleet was faid by fome to queen. The Spanish fleet was faid by fome to be already arrived at Milfordhaven. Others af-firmed that the duke of Guife had landed with a strong army in Suffex. Now, it was reported that the northern counties were up in arms; next day that the Scots had entered England with all their forces; and a confpiracy, it was

e Spotfw. 352. Murdin, 568. See App. No. L. whifpered, whifpered, was on foot for feizing the queen and burning the city. The panic grew every day more violent; and the people, aftonifhed and enraged, called for the execution of the fentence againft Mary, as the only thing which could reftore tranquillity to the kingdom<sup>f</sup>.

While these fentiments prevailed among her fubjects, Elizabeth thought fhe might fafely venture to ftrike the blow, which fhe had fo long meditated. She commanded Davison [Feb. 1], one of the fecretaries of flate, to bring to her the fatal warrant; and her behaviour on that occafion plainly shewed, that it is not to humanity that we must ascribe her forbearance hitherto. At the very moment fhe was figning the writ which gave up a woman, a queen, and her own nearest relation, into the hands of the executioner, fhe was capable of jefting. "Go," fays fhe to Davifon, " and tell Walfingham what I have now " done, though I am afraid he will die for grief " when he hears it." Her chief anxiety was how to fecure the advantages which would arife from Mary's death, without appearing to have given her confent to a deed fo odious. She often hinted to Paulet and Drury, as well as to fome other courtiers, that now was the time to difcover the fincerity of their concern for her fafety, and that fhe expected their zeal would extricate her out of her prefent perplexity. But they were wife enough to feem not to understand her meaning. Even after the warrant was figned, fhe commanded a letter to be written to Paulet, in lefs ambiguous terms, complaining of his ref Camd. 533, 534.

missels

missness in sparing so long the life of her capital enemy, and begging him to remember at last what was incumbent on him as an affectionate fubject, as well as what he was bound to do by the oath of affociation, and to deliver his fovereign from continual fear and danger, by fhortening the days of his prifoner. Paulet, though rigorous and harfh, and often brutal in the difcharge of what he thought his duty, as Mary's keeper, was neverthelefs a man of honour and integrity. He rejected the propofal with difdain; and lamenting that he fhould ever have been deemed capable of acting the part of an affaffin, he declared that the queen might difpofe of his life at her pleafure, but that he would never ftain his own honour, nor leave an everlafting mark of infamy on his posterity, by lending his hand to perpetrate fo foul a crime. On the receipt of this answer, Elizabeth became extremely peevish; and calling him a dainty and precife fellow, who would promife much, but perform nothing, the proposed to employ one Wingfield, who had both courage and inclination to ftrike the blows. But Davison remonstrating against this, as a deed difhonourable in itfelf, and of dangerous example, she again declared her intention that the fentence pronounced by the commiffioners fhould be executed according to law; and as fhe had already figned the warrant, fhe begged that no farther application might be made to her on that head. By this the privy counfellors thought themfelves fufficiently authorifed to proceed; and prompted, as they pretended, by g Biogr. Britan. article Davifen.

zeal

B. VII.

336

zeal for the queen's fafety, or infligated, as is more probable, by the apprchenfion of the danger to which they would themfelves be exposed, if the life of the queen of Scots were fpared, they affembled in the council chamber; and by a letter under all their hands, empowered the earls of Shrewfbury and Kent, together with the high fheriff of the county, to fee the fentence put in execution <sup>h</sup>.

On Tuesday the feventh of February, the two earls arrived at Fotheringay, and demanded aecefs to the queen, read in her prefence the warrant for execution, and required her to prepare to die next morning. Mary heard them to the end without emotion, and croffing herfelf in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoft, " That foul," faid fhe, " is not " worthy the joys of Heaven, which repines " because the body must endure the stroke of the " executioner; and though I did not expect " that the queen of England would fet the firft " example of violating the facred perfon of a " fovereign prince, I willingly fubmit to that " which Providence has decreed to be my lot ;" and laying her hand on a bible, which happened to be near her, fhe folemnly protefted that fhe was innocent of that confpiracy which Babington had carried on against Elizabeth's life i. She then mentioned the requests contained in her letter to Elizabeth, but obtained no fatisfactory anfwer. She entreated with particular earneftnefs, that now in her last moments her almoner might be fuffered to attend her, and that fhe might enjoy

h Camd. 534. Strype, iii. 361. 364. I Jebb, ii. 301. VOL. 11. GG the

B. VII:

the confolation of those pious inflitutions prefcribed by her religion. Even this favour, which is ufually granted to the vilest criminal, was absolutely denied.

Her attendants, during this conversation, were bathed in tears, and though overawed by the prefence of the two earls, with difficulty fuppreffed their anguish; but no fooner did Kent aud Shrewsbury withdraw, than they ran to their mistrefs, and burst out into the most paffionate expressions of tenderness and forrow. Mary, however, not only retained perfect compofure of mind herfelf, but endeavoured to moderate their exceffive grief; and falling on her knees, with all her domestics round her, she thanked Hezven that her fufferings were now fo near an end, and prayed that the might be enabled to endure what still remained with dccency and with fortitude. The greater part of the evening fhe employed in fettling her worldly affairs. She wrote her teftament with her own hand. Her money, her jewels, and her clothes, fhe diffributed among her fervants, according to their rank or merit. She wrote a fhort letter to the king of France, and another to the duke of Guife, full of tender but magnanimous fentiments, and recommended her foul to their prayers, and her afflicted fervants to their protection. At fupper she ate temperately, as usual, and converfed not only with eafe, but with cheerfulnefs; fhe drank to every one of her fervants, and asked their forgiveness, if ever she had failed. in any part of her duty towards them. At her wonted time fhe went to bed, and flept calmly a few hours. Early in the morning fhe retired into into her clofet, and employed a confiderable time in devotion. At eight o'clock the high fheriff and his officers entered her chamber, and found her still kneeling at the altar. She immediately ftarted up, and with a majeftic mien, and a countenance undifmayed, and even cheerful, advanced towards the place of execution, leaning on two of Paulet's attendants. She was dreffed in a mourning habit, but with an elegance and fplendour which fhe had long laid afide, except on a few festival days. An Agnus Dei hung by a pomander chain at her neck; her beads at her girdle ; and in her hand fhe carried a crucifix of ivory. At the bottom of the flairs the two earls, attended by feveral gentlemen from the neighbouring counties, received her; and there fir Andrew Melvil, the mafter of her houfehold, who had been feeluded for fome weeks from her prefence, was permitted to take his last farewel. At the fight of a miltrefs whom he tenderly loved, in fuch a fituation, he melted into tears; and as he was bewailing her condition, and complaining of his own hard fate, in being appointed to carry the account of fuch a mournful event into Scotland, Mary replied, "Weep not, " good Melvil, there is at prefent great caufe " for rejoicing. Thou shalt this day fee Mary "Stewart delivered from all her cares, and fuch " an end put to her tedious fufferings, as she " has long expected. Bear witnefs that I die " conftant in my religion; firm in my fidelity " towards Scotland; and unchanged in my af-" fection to France. Commend me to my fon. " Tell him I have done nothing injurious to his " kingdom, to his honour, or to his rights; " and GG2

339

340

B. VII.

" and God forgive all those who have thirsted, " without cause, for my blood."

With much difficulty, and after many entreaties, fhe prevailed on the two earls to allow Melvil, together with three of her men fervants and two of her maids, to attend her to the fcaffold. It was erected in the fame hall where fhe had been tried, raifed a little above the floor, and covered, as well as a chair, the cufhion, and block, with black cloth. Mary mounted the fteps with alacrity, beheld all this apparatus of death with an unaltered countenance, and figning herfelf with the crofs, fhe fat down in the chair. Beale read the warrant for execution with a loud voice, to which fhe liftened with a careless air, and like one occupied in other thoughts. Then the dean of Peterborough began a devout discourse, suit-able to her present condition, and offered up prayers to Heaven in her behalf; but fhe declared that fhe could not in confcience hearken to the one, nor join with the other; and kneeling down, repeated a Latin prayer. When the dean had finished his devotions, she with an audible voice, and in the English tongue, recommended unto God the afflicted state of the church, and prayed for profperity to her fon, and for a long life and peaceable reign to Elizabeth. She declared that the hoped for mercy only through the death of Chrift, at the foot of whole image fhe now willingly fhed her blood; and lifting up and kiffing the crucifix, fhe thus addreffed it : "As thy arms, O Jefus, were extended " on the crofs; fo with the outftretched arms " of thy mercy receive me, and forgive my

She

Published Feb? 1. 1798. by Cadell & Davies, Strand .

She then prepared for the block, by taking off her veil and upper garments; and one of the executioners rudely endeavouring to affift, fhe gently checked him, and faid, with a fmile, that fhe had not been accuftomed to undrefs before fo many fpectators, nor to be ferved by fuch valets. With calm but undaunted fortitude fhe laid her neck on the block; and while one executioner held her hands, the other, at the fecond ftroke, cut off her head, which falling out of its attire, difcovered her hair already grown quite grey with cares and forrows. The executioner held it up ftill ftreaming with blood, and the dean crying out, "So perifh all queen Elizabeth's enemies," the earl of Kent alone anfwered Amen. The reft of the fpectators continued filent, and drowned in tears; being incapable, at that moment, of any other fentiments but thofe of pity or admiration <sup>k</sup>.

Such was the tragical death of Mary queen of Scots, after a life of forty-four years and two months, almost nineteen years of which the paffed in captivity. The political parties which were formed in the kingdom, during her reign, have fublisted under various denominations, ever fince that time. The rancour, with which they were at first animated, hath defcended to fucceeding ages, and their prejudices, as well as their rage, have been perpetuated, and even augmented. Among historians, who were under the dominion of all these paffions, and who have either afcribed to her every virtuous and amiable k Camd. 534. Spotfw. 355. Jebb, ii. 300. Strype, iii. 383. See Append, No. LI.

G.G.3

quality;

HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

342

B. VII.

quality, or have imputed to her all the vices of which the human heart is fufceptible, we fearch in vain for Mary's real character. She neither merited the exaggerated praifes of the one, nor the undiftinguished cenfure of the other.

To all the charms of beauty, and the utmoft elegance of external form, the added those accomplifhments which render their impreffion irrefiftible. Polite, affable, infinuating, fprightly, and capable of fpeaking and of writing with equal eafe and dignity. Sudden, however, and violent in all her attachments; becaufe her heart was warm and unfuspicious. Impatient of contradiction ; becaufe fhe had been accuftomed from her infancy to be treated as a queen. No ftranger, on fome occafions, to diffimulation ; which, in that perfidious court where the received her education, was reckoned among the neceffary arts of government. Not infenfible of flattery, or unconfcious of that pleafure with which almost every woman beholds the influence of her own beauty. Formed with the qualities which we love, not with the talents that we admire; fhe was an agreeable woman, rather than an illustrious The vivacity of her fpirit not fufficiently queen. tempered with found judgment, and the warmth of her heart, which was not at all times under the reftraint of difcretion, betrayed her both into errors and into crimes. To fay that she was always unfortunate, will not account for that long and almost uninterrupted fuccession of calamities which befel her ; we must likewife add, that she was often imprudent. Her passion for Darnly was rash, youthful, and exceffive ; and though the fudden transition to the opposite extreme, treme, was the natural effect of her ill-requited love, and of his ingratitude, infolence, and brutality; yet neither thefe, nor Bothwell's artful addrefs and important fervices, can justify her attachment to that nobleman. Even the manners of the age, licentious as they were, are no apology for this unhappy paffion ; nor can they induce us to look on that tragical and infamous fcene which followed upon it, with lefs abhorrence. Humanity will draw a veil over this part of her character which it cannot approve, and may, perhaps, prompt fome to impute fome of her actions to her fituation, more than to her difpositions; and to lament the unhappiness of the former, rather than accuse the perverseness of the latter. Mary's fufferings exceed, both in degree and in duration, those tragical diffreffes which fancy has feigned to excite forrow and commiferation; and while we furvey them, we are apt altogether to forget her frailties, we think of her faults with lefs indignation, and approve of our tears, as if they were shed for a perfor who had attained much nearer to pure virtue.

With regard to the queen's perfon, a circumftance not to be omitted in writing the hiftory of a female reign, all contemporary authors agree in afcribing to Mary the utmost beauty of countenance, and elegance of shape, of which the human form is capable. Her hair was black, though, according to the fashion of that age, she frequently wore borrowed locks and of different colours. Her eyes were a dark grey; her complexion was exquisitely fine; and her hands and arms remarkably delicate, both as to shape and colour. Her stature was of an height that rose to the majeftic. She danced, fhe walked, and rode with equal grace. Her tafte for mufic was juft, and fhe both fung and played upon the lute with uncommon fkill. Towards the end of her life, long confinement, and the coldnefs of the houfes in which fhe had been imprifoned, brought on a rheumatifm, which often deprived her of the ufe of her limbs. No man, fays Brantome, ever beheld her perfon without admiration and love, or will read her hiftory without forrow.

to

None of her women were fuffered to come near her dead body, which was carried into a room adjoining to the place of execution, where it lay for fome days, covered with a coarfe cloth torn from a billiard table. The block, the fcaffold, the aprons of the executioners, and every thing ftained with her blood, were reduced to afhes. Not long after, Elizabeth appointed her body to be buried in the cathedral of Peterborough with royal magnificence. But this vulgar artifice was employed in vain ; the pageantry of a pompous funcral did not efface the memory of those injuries which laid Mary in her grave. James, foon after his acceffion to the English throne, ordered her body to be removed to Weftminsterabbey, and to be deposited among the monarchs of England.

Elizabeth affected to receive the accounts of Mary's death with the most violent emotions of furprife and of concern. Sighs, tears, lamentations, and mourning, were all employed to difplay the reality and greatness of her forrow. Evident marks of diffimulation and artifice may be traced through every period of Elizabeth's proceedings against the life of the Scottish queen. The commission miffion for bringing Mary to a public trial was feemingly extorted from her by the entreaties of her privy counfellors. She delayed publifting the fentence against her till she was twice folicited by both houses of parliament. Nor did she sign the warrant for execution without the utmost apparent reluctance. One scene more of the boldest and most folemn deceit remained to be exhibited. She undertook to make the world believe that Mary had been put to death without her knowledge, and against her will. Davison, who neither sufficient full a victim to it.

1587.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

It was his duty, as fecretary of flate, to lay before her the warrant for execution, in order to be figned; and, by her command, he carried it to the great feal. She pretended, however, that fhe had charged him not to communicate what fhe had done to any perfon, nor to fuffer the warrant to go out of his hands, without her exprefs permiffion ; that, in contempt of this order, he had not only revealed the matter to feveral of her ministers, but had, in concert with them. affembled her privy counfellors, by whom, without her confent or knowledge, the warrant was iffued, and the earls of Shrcwfbury and Kent impowered to put it in execution. Though Davifon denied all this, and with circumftances which bear the ftrongeft marks of truth and credibility ; though it can fcarcely be conceived that her privy council, composed of the perfons in whom the most confided, of her ministers and favourites, would affemble within the walls of her palace, and venture to transact a matter of fo much much importance without her privity, and contrary to her inclination ; yet fo far did fhe carry her diffimulation, that with all the figns of difpleafure and of rage, fhe banished most of her counfellors out of her prefence; and treated Burleigh, in particular, fo harfhly, and with fuch marks of difgust, that he gave up himself for loft, and in the deepeft affliction wrote to the queen, begging leave to refign all his places, that he might retire to his own estate. Davison she instantly deprived of his office, and committed him a close prisoner to the Tower. He was soon after brought to a folemn trial in the Star Chamber [March], condemned to pay a fine of ten thou-fand pounds, and to be imprifoned during the queen's pleafure. He languished feveral years in confinement, and never recovered any degree of favour or of power. As her jealouly and fear had bereaved the queen of Scots of life, in order to palliate this part of her conduct, Elizabeth made no fcruple of facrificing the reputation and happincles of one of the molt virtuous and able men in her kingdom 1.

B. VII.

346

This folemn farce, for it deferves no better name, furnifhed Elizabeth, however, with an apology to the king of Scots. As the profpect of his mother's danger had excited the king's filial care and concern, the account of her death filled him with grief and refentment. His fubjects felt the diffeonour done to him and to the nation. In order to footh both, Elizabeth inflantly difpatched Robert Cary, one of lord

Camd. 536. Strype, iii. 370, See Append. No. LII. Cabala, 229, &c.

Hunfdon's

347 Hunfdon's fons, with a letter expressing her extreme affliction on account of that miferable accident, which, as fhe pretended, had happened far contrary to her appointment or intention. James would not permit her meffenger to enter Scotland; and with fome difficulty received a memorial which he fent from Berwick. It contained the tale concerning Davifon, dreffed up with all the circumstances which tended to exculpate Elizabeth, and to throw the whole blame on his rashness or treachery. Such a defence gave little fatisfaction, and was confidered as mockery added to infult; and many of the nobles, as well as the king, breathed nothing but revenge. Elizabeth was extremely folicitous to pacify them, and the wanted neither able inftruments, nor plaufible reafons, in order to accomplifh this. Leicefter wrote to the king, and Walfingham to fecretary Maitland. They reprefented the certain destruction to which James would expose himself, if, with the forces of Scotland alonc, he should venture to attack a kingdom fo far fuperior in power; that the hiftory of past ages, as well as his mother's fad expeperience, might convince him, that nothing could be more dangerous, or deceitful, than dependence on foreign aid; that the king of France would never wish to fee the British kingdoms united under one monarch, nor contribute to invest a prince fo nearly allied to the house of Guife with fuch formidable power; that Philip might be a more active ally, but would certainly prove a more dangerous one, and, under pretence of affifting him, would affert his own right to the English crown, which he already began openly to

B. VII.

to claim; that the fame flatute, on which the fentence of death against his mother had been founded, would justify the excluding him from the fucceffion to the crown ; that the English, naturally averfe from the dominion of ftrangers, would not fail, if exafperated by his hoftilities, to apply it in that manner; that Elizabeth was difposed to repair the wrongs which the mother had fuffered, by her tenderness and affection towards the fon ; and that, by engaging in a fruit-lefs war, he would deprive himfelf of a noble inheritance, which, by cultivating her friendship, he must infallibly obtain. These representations, added to the confcioufnefs of his own weaknefs, to the fmallnefs of his revenues, to the mutinous fpirit of fomc of the nobles, to the dubious fidelity of others, and to the influence of that faction which was entirely at Elizabeth's devotion, convinced James that a war with England, however just, would in the present juncture be altogether impolitical. All these confiderations induced him to fliffe his refentment; to appear fatisfied with the punishment inflicted on Davison; and to preferve all the fcmblances of friendship with the English court m. In this manner did the cloud which threatened fuch a ftorm pafs away. Mary's death, like that of a common criminal, remain unavenged by any prince ; and whatever infamy Elizabeth might incur, the was exposed to no new danger on that account.

Mary's death, however, proved fatal to the mafter of Gray, and loft him the king's favour, which he had for fome time poffeffed. He was

m Spotsw. 362. Cald. iv. 13, 14. Strype, iii. 377. become become as odious to the nation as favourites, who acquire power without merit, and exercife it without diferetion, ufually are. The treacherous part which he had acted during his late embaffy was no fecret, and filled James, who at length came to the knowledge of it, with altonifhment. The courtiers observed the symptoms of difgust arifing in the king's mind, his enemies feized the opportunity, and fir William Stewart, in revenge of the perfidy with which Gray had betrayed his brother captain James, publicly accufed him before a convention of nobles [May 10], not only of having contributed, by his advice and fuggestions, to take away the life of the queen, but of holding correspondence with popish princes, in order to fubvert the religion eftablished in the kingdom. Gray, unfupported by the king, deferted by all, and confcious of his own guilt, made a feeble defence. He was condemned to perpetual banishment, a punishment very unequal to his crimes. But the king was unwilling to abandon one whom he had once favoured fo highly, to the rigour of justice, and lord Hamilton, his near relation, and the other nobles who had lately returned from exile, in gratitude for the zeal with which he had ferved them. interceded warmly in his behalf.

Having thus accomplified the deftruction of one of his enemies, captain James Stewart thought the juncture favourable for profecuting his revenge on them all. He fingled out fecretary Maitland, the most eminent both for abilities and enmity to him; and offered to prove that he was no lefs acceffary than Gray to the queen's death, and had even formed a defign of delivering YOL. 11. H H up up the king himfelf into the hands of the Englifh. But time and abfence had, in a great meafure, extinguifaed the king's affection for a minion who fo little deferved it. All the courtiers combined againft him as a common enemy; and inftead of gaining his point, he had the mortification to fee the office of chancellor conferred upon Maitland, who, together with that dignity, enjoyed all the power and influence of a prime minifter.

B. V11.

In the affembly of the church, which met this year, the fame hatred to the order of bifhops, and the fame jealoufy and fear of their encroachments, appeared. But as the king was now of full age, and a parliament was fummoned on that occafion, the clergy remained fatisfied with appointing fome of their number to reprefent their grievances to that court, from which great things were expected.

Previous to this meeting of parliament, James attempted a work worthy of a king. The deadly feuds which fubfifted between many of the great families, and which were transmitted from one generation to another, weakened the ftrength of the kingdom; contributed, more than any other circumstance, to preferve a fierce and barbarous fpirit among the nobles; and proved the occasion of many difasters to themfelves and to their country. After many preparatory negotiations, he invited the contending parties to a royal entertainment in the palace of Holy-rood-house; and partly by his authority, partly by his entreaties, obtained their promise to bury their diffentions in perpetual oblivion. From thence he conducted them, in folemn procession, through the the ftreets of Edinburgh, marching by pairs, each hand in hand with his enemy. A collation of wine and fweetmeats was prepared at the public crofs, and there they drank to each other, with all the figns of reciprocal forgivenefs and of future friendfhip. The people, who were prefent at a fpectacle fo unufual, conceived the moft fanguine hopes of feeing concord and tranquillity eftablifhed in every part of the kingdom, and teftified their fatisfaction by repeated acclamations <sup>n</sup>. Unhappily, the effects of this reconciliation were not correfpondent either to the pious endeavours of the king, or to the fond wifhes of the people.

The first care of the parliament was the fecurity of the protestant religion. All the laws passed in its favour, fince the reformation, were ratified; and a new and fevere one was enacted against feminary priests and Jesuits, whose restlets industry in making profelytes, brought many of them into Scotland about this time. Two acts of this parliament deferve more particular notice on account of the confequences with which they were followed.

The one refpected the lands of the church. As the public revenues were not fufficient for defraying the king's ordinary charges; as the administration of the government became more complicated and more expensive; as James was naturally profuse, and a stranger to æconomy; it was necessary, on all these accounts, to provide fome fund proportioned to his exigencies. But no confiderable fum could be levied on the com-

> n Spotfw. 164. Cald. iv. 13. H H 2

mons,

352

mons, who did not enjoy the benefit of an extenfive commerce. The nobles were unaccuftomed to bear the burden of heavy taxes. The revenues of the church were the only fource whence a proper fupply could be drawn. Notwithstanding all the depredations of the laity fince the reformation, and the various devices which they had employed to feize the church lands, fome confiderable portion of them remained ftill unalienated, and were held either by the bishops who poffeffed the benefices, or were granted to laymen during pleafure. All thefe lands were, in this parliament, annexed, by one general law ', to the crown, and the king was empowered to apply the rents of them to his own ufe. The tithes alone were referved for the maintenance of the perfons who ferved the cure, and the principal manfion houfe, with a few acres of land, by way of glebe, allotted for their refidence. By this great acceffion of property, it is natural to conclude that the king must have acquired a vaft inereafe of power, and the influence of the nobles have fuffered a proportional diminution. The very reverfe of this feems, however, to have been the cafe. Almost all grants of church-lands, prior to this act, were thereby confirmed; and titles, which were formerly reckoned precarious, derived thence the fanction of parliamentary authority. James was likewife authorifed, during a limited time, to make new alienations; and fuch was the facility of his temper, ever ready to yield to the folicitations of his fervants, and to gratify their most extravagant demands, that not only 0 Parl. 11 Jac. VI. c. 29.

during

during the time limited, but throughout his whole reign, he was continually employed in beftowing, and his parliament in ratifying, grants of this kind to his nobles; hence little advantage accrued to the crown from that which might have been fo valuable an addition to its revenues. The bishops, however, were great fuf-ferers by the law. But at this juncture neither the king nor his ministers were folicitous about the interests of an order of men, odious to the people, and perfecuted by the clergy. Their enemies promoted the law with the utmost zeal. The profpect of sharing in their spoils induced all parties to confent to it; and after a ftep fo fatal to the wealth and power of the dignified clergy, it was no difficult matter to introduce that change in the government of the church which foon after took place P.

The change which the other flatute produced in the civil conflitution was no lefs remarkable. Under the feudal fyftem, every freeholder, or immediate vaffal of the crown, had a right to be prefent in parliament. Thefe freeholders were originally few in number, but poffeffed of great and extensive property. By degrees thefe vaft poffeffions were divided by the proprietors themfelves, or parcelled out by the prince, or fplit by other accidents. The number of freeholders became greater, and their condition more unequal: befides the ancient barons, who preferved their eflates and their power unimpaired, there arofe another order, whofe rights were the fame, though their wealth and influence were far inferior. But, in rude ages, when the art of government was extremely imperfect, when parliaments were feldom affenibled, and deliberated on matters little interesting to a martial people, few of the leffer barons took their feats, and the whole parliamentary jurifdiction was exercifed by the greater barons, in con-junction with the ecclefiaftical order. James I. fond of imitating the forms of the English conflitution, to which he had been long accuftomed, and defirous of providing a counterpoife to the power of the great nobles, procured an act in the year one thousand four hundred and twenty-feven, difpenfing with the perfonal attendance of the leffer barons, and empowering those in each county to chuse two commillioners to reprefent them in parliament. This law, like many other regulations of that wife prince, produced little effect. All the king's vaffals continued, as formerly, poffeffed of a right to be prefent in parliament; but, unlefs in fome extraordinary conjunctures, the greater barons alone attended. But, by means of the reformation, the conftitution had undergone a great change. The ariftocratical power of the nobles had been much increased, and the influence of the ecclesiaftical order, which the crown usually employed to check their usurpations, and to balance their authority, had diminished in proportion. Many of the abbies and priories had been crected into temporal peerages; and the protestant bishops, an indigent race of men, and odious to the nation, were far from poffeffing the weight and credit which their predeceffors derived from their own exorbitant wealth, wealth, and the fuperfitious reverence of the people. In this fituation, the king had recourfe to the expedient employed by James I. and obtained a law reviving the flatute of one thousand four hundred and twenty-feven; and from that time the commons of Scotland have fent their representatives to parliament. An act, which tended fo visibly to abridge their authority, did not pass without opposition from many of the nobles. But as the king had a right to fummon the leffer barons to attend in perfon, others were apprehenfive of feeing the house filled with a multitude of his dependents, and confented the more willingly to a law which laid them under the reftriction of appearing only by their reprefentatives.

> P Spotfw. 365. HH3

TYERE "

354

1588.] The year one thousand five hundred and eighty-eight began with an universal expectation throughout all Europe, that it was to be diftinguished by wonderful events and revolutions. Several aftrologers, according to the accounts of contemporary hiftorians, had predicted this; and the fituation of affairs in the two principal kingdoms of Europe was fuch, that a fagacious obferver, without any fupernatural intelligence, might have hazarded the prediction, and have forefeen the approach of fome grand crifis. In France, it was evident from the aftonishing progrefs of the league, conducted by a leader whofe ambition was reftrained by no fcruples, and whole genius had hitherto furmounted all difficulties; as well as from the timid, variable, and impolitic councils of Henry III. that either that monarch must fubmit to abandon the throne of which he was unworthy, worthy, or by fome fudden and daring blow cut off his formidable rival. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year, the duke of Guife drove his mafter out of his capital city, and forced him to conclude a peace, which left him only the shadow of royalty; and before the year expired he himfelf fell a victim to the refentment and fear of Henry, and to his own fecurity. In Spain the operations were fuch as promifed fomething ftill more uncommon. During three years Philip had employed all the power of his European dominions, and exhaufted the treafures of the Indies, in vaft preparations for war. A fleet, the greatest that had ever appeared in the ocean, was ready to fail from Lifbon, and a numcrous land army was affembled to embark on board of it. Its deftination was still unknown, though many circumstances made it probable that the blow was aimed, in the first place, against England. Elizabeth had long given fecret aid to the revolted provinces in the Low Countries, and now openly afforded them her protection. A numerous body of her troops was in their fcrvice; the earl of Leicester commanded their armies; fhe had great fway in the civil government of the republic; and fome of its most confiderable towns were in her posseffion. Her fleets had infulted the coafts of Spain, intercepted the galleons from the Weft Indies, and threatened the colonies there. Roufed by fo many injuries, allured by views of ambition, and animated by a fuperstitious zeal for propagating the Romish religion, Philip refolved not only to invade, but to conquer England, to which his descent from the house of Lancaster,

B. VII.

and

1588.7

and the donation of pope Sixtus V. gave him in his own opinion a double title.

Elizabeth faw the danger approach, and prepared to encounter it. The measures for the defence of her kingdom were concerted and carried on with the wifdom and vigour which diftinguished her reign. Her chief care was to fecure the friendship of the king of Scots. She had treated the queen his mother with a rigour unknown among princes; the had often used himfelf harthly, and with contempt, and though he had hitherto prudently suppressed his refentment of thefe injuries, she did not believe it to be altogether extinguished, and was afraid that, in her present situation, it might burft out with a fatal violence. Philip, fenfible how much an alliance with Scotland would facilitate his enterprife, courted James with the utmost affiduity. He excited him to revenge his mother's wrong; he flattered him with the hopes of fharing his conquefts; and offered him in marriage his daughter the infanta Isabella. At the fame time, Scotland fwarmed with priefts, his emiffaries, who feduced fome of the nobles to popery, and corrupted others with bribes and promifes. Huntly, Errol, Crawford, were the heads of a faction which openly efpoufed the interest of Spain. Lord Maxwell, arriving from that court, began to affemble his followers, and to take arms, that he might be ready to join the Spaniards. In order to counterbalance all thefe, Elizabeth made the warmest professions of friendship to the king; and Ashby, her ambassador, entertained him with magnificent hopes and promifes. He affured him, that his right of fucceffion to the crown should be publicly acknowledged in England; that he fhould flould be created a duke in that kingdom; that he should be admitted to some share in the government; and receive a confiderable penfion annually. James, it is probable, was too well acquainted with Elizabeth's arts, to rely entirely on these promises. But he understood his own intereft in the prefent juncture, and purfued it with much fleadinefs. He rejected an alliance with Spain, as dangerous. He refused to admit into his prefence an ambaffador from the pope. He feized colonel Semple, an agent of the prince of Parma. He drove many of the femi-nary priefts out of the kingdom. Hc marched fuddenly to Dumfries, dispersed Maxwell's followers, and took him prifoner. In a convention of the nobles, he declared his refolution to adhere inviolably to the league with England ; and, without listening to the fuggestions of revenge, determined to act in concert with Elizabeth, against the common enemy of the protestant faith. He put the kingdom in a posture of defence, and levied troops to obstruct the landing of the Spaniards. He offered to fend an army to Elizabeth's affiftance, and told her ambal-fador, that he expected no other favour from the king of Spain, but that which Polyphemus had promifed to Ulyffes, that when he had devoured all his companions, he would make him his laft morfel 9.

358

B. VII.

The zeal of the people, on this occafion, was not inferior to that of the king; and the extraordinary danger, with which they were threatened, fuggested to them an extraordinary expedient

9 Camd. 544. Johnst. 139. Spotsw. 360.

dient for their fecurity. A bond was framed for the maintenance of true religion, as well as the defence of the king's perfon and govern-ment, in opposition to all enemies, foreign and domestic. This contained a confession of the protestant faith, a particular renunciation of the errors of popery, and the most folemn promifes, in the name, and through the ftrength of God, of adhering to each other in fupporting the former, and contending against the latter, to the utmost of their power'. The king, the nobles, the clergy, and the people, fubfcribed with equal alacrity. Strange or uncommon as fuch a combination may now appear, many circumstances contributed at that time to recommend it, and to render the idea familiar to the Scots. When roufed by any extraordinary event, or alarmed by any public danger, the people of Ifrael were accuftomed to bind themfelves, by a folemn covenant, to adhere to that religion which the Almighty had established among them; this the Scots confidered as a facred precedent, which it became them to imitate. In that age, no confiderable enterprife was undertaken in Scotland, without a bond of mutual defence, which all concerned reckoned neceffary for their fecurity. The form of this religious confederacy is plainly borrowed from those political ones, of which fo many inftances have occurred ; the articles, ftipulations, and peculiar modes of expression, are exactly the fame in both. Almost all the confiderable popifh princes were then joined in a league for extirpating the reformed religion, and nothing could be more natural, or feemed more efficacious, than to enter into a counter-affociation, in order to oppose the progress of that formidable confpiracy. To thefe caufes did the covenant, which is become fo famous in hiftory, owe its origin. It was renewed at different times during the reign of James'. It was revived with great folemnity, though with confiderable alterations, in the year one thousand fix hundred and thirty-eight. It was adopted by the English in the year one thousand fix hundred and forty-three, and enforced by the civil and ecclefiaftical authority of both kingdoms. The political purpofes to which it was then made fubfervient, and the violent and unconftitutional meafures which it was then employed to promote, it is not our province to explain. But at the juncture in which it was first introduced, we may pronounce it to have been a prudent and laudable device for the defence of the religion and liberties of the nation; nor were the terms in which it was conceived, other than might have been expected from men alarmed with the impending danger of popery, and threatened with an invafion by the most bigoted and most powerful prince in Europe.

> * Dunlop's Collect. of Confess. vol. ii. 108. nothing

360

Philip's eagerness to conquer England did not infpire him either with the vigour or dispatch neceffary to ensure the fuccess of fo mighty an enterprise. His fleet, which ought to have failed in April, did not enter the English channel till the middle of July. It hovered many days on the coast, in expectation of being joined by the s Cald. iv. 129.

prince

B. V11.

prince of Parma, who was blocked up in the ports of Flanders by a Dutch squadron. Continual difafters purfued the Spaniards during that time ; fucceffive florms and battles, which are well known, confpired with their own ill conduct to difappoint their enterprife. And, by the bleffing of Providence, which watched with remarkable care over the protestant religion and the liberties of Britain, the English valour scattered and deflroyed the Armado, on which Philip had arrogantly beftowed the name of Invincible. After being driven out of the English feas, their fhattered fhips were forced to fleer their courfe toward Spain, round Scotland and Ireland. Many of them fuffered shipwreek on these dangerous and unknown coafts. Though James kept his fubjects under arms, to watch the motions of the Spaniards, and to prevent their landing in an hoftile manner, he received with great humanity feven hundred who were forced ashore by a tempest, and after supplying them with necessaries, permitted them to return into their own country.

On the retreat of the Spaniards, Elizabeth fent an ambaffador to congratulate with James, and to compliment him on the firmnefs and generofity he had difcovered during a conjuncture fo dangerous. But none of Athby's promifes were any longer remembered; that minifter was even accufed of having exceeded his powers, by his too liberal offers; and confcious of his own falfehood, or afhamed of being difowned by his court, he withdrew fecretly out of Scotland <sup>t</sup>.

t Johnft. 134. Camd. <48. Murdin, 635. 788. VOL. 11. 11 1589.]

B. VII.

1589.7 Philip, convinced by fatal experience of his own rashness in attempting the conquest of England, by a naval armament, equipped at fo great a diftance, and fubjected in all its ope-rations, to the delays, and dangers, and uncertainties, arifing from feas and winds, refolved to make his attack in another form, and to adopt the plan which the princes of Lorrain had long meditated, of invading England through Scotland. A body of his troops, he imagined, might be eafily wafted over from the Low Countries to that kingdom, and if they could once obtain footing, or procure affiftance there, the frontier of England was open and defenceless, and the northern counties full of Roman catholics, who would receive them with open arms. Meanwhile, a defcent might be threatened on the fouthern coaft, which would divide the English army, diftract their councils, and throw the whole kingdom into terrible convultions. In order to prepare the way for the execution of this defign, he remitted a confiderable fum of money to Bruce, a feminary prieft in Scotland, and employed him, together with Hay, Creighton, and Tyrie, Scottish Jesuits, to gain over as many persons of distinction as possible to his interest. Zeal for popery, and the artful infinuations of thefe emiffaries, induced feveral noblemen to favour a measure which tended fo manifestly to the deftruction of their country. Huntly, though the king had lately given him in marriage the daughter of his favourite the duke of Lennox, continued warmly attached to the Romish church. Craw-ford and Errol were animated with the zeal of new converts. They all engaged in a correspondence 3

ence with the prince of Parma, and, in their letters to him, offered their fervice to the king of Spain, and undertook, with the aid of fix thoufand men, to render him mafter of Scotland, and to bring fo many of their vaffals into the field, that he fhould be able to enter England with a numerous army. Francis Stewart, grandfon of James V. ", whom the king had created earl of Bothwell, though influenced by no motive of religion, for he ftill adhered to the proteflant faith, was prompted merely by caprice, and the veftleffnefs of his nature, to join in this treafonable correfpondence.

All thefe letters were intercepted in England. Elizabeth, alarmed at the danger which threatened her own kingdom, fent them immediately to the king [Feb. 17], and, reproaching him with his former lenity towards the popifh party, called upon him to check this formidable confpiracy by a proper feverity. But James, though firmly attached to the proteftant religion, though profoundly verfed in the theological controverfies between the reformers and the church of Rome, though he had employed himfelf, at that early period of life, in writing a commentary on the Revelations, in which he laboured to prove the pope to be antichrift, had neverthelefs adopted already thofe maxims concerning the treatment of the Roman catholics, to which he adhered through the reft of his life. The Roman catholics were at that time a powerful and active party in England; they were far from being an in-

<sup>u</sup> He was the fon of John Prior of Coldingham, one of James's natural children.

II 2

confider-

364

B. VII.

confiderable faction in his own kingdom. The pope and king of Spain were ready to take part in all their machinations, and to fecond every effort of their bigotry. The opposition of fuch a body to his fucceffion to the crown of England, added to the averfenels of the English from the government of ftrangers, might create him many difficulties. In order to avoid thefe, he thought it neceffary to footh rather than to irritate the Roman catholics, and to reconcile them to his fucceffion, by the hopes of gentler treatment, and fome mitigation of the rigour of those laws, which were now in force against them. This attempt to gain one party by promifes of in-dulgence and acts of clemency, while he adhered with all the obftinacy of a difputant to the doctrines and tenets of the other, has given an air of mystery, and even of contradiction, to this part of the king's character. The papifts, with the credulity of a feet flruggling to obtain power, believed his heart to be wholly theirs; and the protestants, with the jealoufy infeparable from those who are already in possession of power, viewed every act of lenity as a mark of indifference, or a fymptom of apoftacy. In order to pleafe both, James often aimed at an exceffive refinement, mingled with diffimulation, in which he imagined the perfection of government and of kingcraft to confift.

His behaviour on this occafion was agreeable to thefe general maxims. Notwithftanding the folicitations of the queen of England, enforced by the zealous remonstrances of his own clergy, a short imprifonment was the only punishment he inflicted upon Huntly and his affociates. But, he foon had reafon to repent an act of clemency fo inconfistent with the dignity of government. The first use which the conspirators made of their liberty was to affemble their followers, and, under pretence of removing chancellor Maitland, an able minister, but warmly devoted to the English interest, from the king's councils and prefence, they attempted to feize James himfelf. This attempt being defeated, partly by Maitland's vigilance, and partly by their own ill-conduct, they were forced to retire to the North, where they openly erected the flandard of rebellion. But as the king's government was not generally unpopular, or his ministers odious, their own vaffals joined them flowly, and difcovered no zeal in the caufe. The king, in perfon, advancing against them with fuch forces as he could fuddenly levy, they durft not rely fo much on the fidelity of the troops, which, though fuperior in number, followed them with reluctance, as to hazard a battle; but fuffering them to difperfe, they furrendered to the king, and threw themfelves on his mercy. Huntly, Errol, Crawford, and Bothwell, were all brought to a public trial. Repeated acts of treafon were eafily proved againft them. The king, however, did not permit any fentence to be pronounced; and, after keeping them a few months in confinement, he took occafion, amidst the public festivity, and rejoicings at the approach of his marriage, to fet them at liberty x.

he

1589.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

As James was the only defcendant of the ancient monarchs of Scotland in the direct line;

× Spotfw. 373. Cald. iv. 103-130.

B. VII. as all hopes of uniting the crowns of the two kingdoms would have expired with him; as the earl of Arran, the prcfumptive heir to the throne, was lunatic; the king's marriage was, on all these accounts, an event which the nation wifhed for with the utmost ardour. He himself was no lefs defirous of accomplishing it; and had made overtures for that purpose to the eldest daughter of Frederick II. king of Denmark. But Elizabeth, jealous of every thing that would render the accellion of the houle of Stewart more acceptable to the English, endeavoured to perplex James, in the fame manner she had done Mary; and employed as many artifices to defeat or to retard his marriage. His ministers, gained by bribes and promifes, feconded her intention; and though feveral different ambaffadors were fent from Scotland to Denmark, they produced powers fo limited, or infifted on conditions fo extravagant, that Frederick could not believe the king to be in earneft; and fufpecting that there was fome defign to deceive or amufe him, gave his daughter in marriage to the duke of Brunfwick. Not difcouraged by this difappoint-ment, which he imputed entirely to the conduct of his own minifters, James made addreffes to the princefs Anne, Frederick's fecond daughter. Though Elizabeth endeavoured to divert him from this by recommending Catherine the king of Navarre's fifter, as a more advantageous match; though she prevailed on the privy council of Scotland to declare against the alliance with Denmark, he perfifted in his choice ; and defpairing of overcoming the obflinacy of his own mini-iters in any other manner, he fecretly encouraged the the citizens of Edinburgh to take arms. They threatened to tear in pieces the chancellor, whom they accufed as the perfon whofe artifices had hitherto difappointed the wifhes of the king and the expectations of his people. In confe-quence of this, the earl marifchal was fent into Denmark at the head of a fplendid embaffy. He received ample powers and inftructions, drawn with the king's own hand. The marriage articles were quickly agreed upon, and the young queen fet fail towards Scotland. James made great preparations for her reception, and waited her landing with all the impatience of a lover; when the unwelcome account arrived, that a violent tempeft had arifen, which drove back her fleet to Norway, in a condition fo fhattered, that there was little hope of its putting again to fea before the fpring. This unexpected difappointment he felt with the utmost fensibility. He instantly fitted out fome fhips, and, without communicating his intention to any of his council, failed in perfon, attended by the chancellor, feveral noblemen, and a train of three hundred perfons, in quest of his bride. He arrived fafely in a fmall harbour near Upflo [Oct. 22], where the queen then refided. There the marriage was folemnized [Nov. 24]; and as it would have been rash to truft those boifterous feas in the winter feafon, James accepted the invitation of the court of Denmark, and repairing to Copenhagen, paffed feveral months there, amidst continual feasting and amufements, in which both the queen and himfelf had great delight y.

y Melvil, 352. Spotfw. 377. Murdin, 637.

No

B. VII.

No event in the king's life appears to be a wider deviation from his general character, than this fudden fally. His fon Charles I. was capable of that exceffive admiration of the other fex, which arifes from great fenfibility of heart, heightened by elegance of tafte; and the ro-mantic air of his journey to Spain fuited fuch a difposition. But James was not fusceptible of any refined gallantry, and always expressed that contempt for the female character which a pedantic erudition, unacquainted with politenefs, is apt to infpire. He was exafperated, however, and rendered impatient by the many obstacles which had been laid in his way. He was anxious to fecure the political advantages which he ex-pected from marriage; and fearing that a delay might afford Elizabeth and his own minifers an opportunity of thwarting him by new intrigues, he fuddenly took the refolution of preventing them, by a voyage from which he expected to return in a few weeks. The nation feemed to applaud his conduct, and to be pleafed with this appearance of amorous ardour in a young prince. Notwithstanding his absence fo long beyond the time he expected, the nobles, the clergy, and the people, vied with one another in loyalty and obedience; and no period of the king's reign was more remarkable for tranquillity, or more free from any eruption of those factions which fo often difturbed the kingdom.

END OF THE SECOND VOLUME.

