PREFACE

TO THE ## FIRST EDITION.

I DELIVER this book to the world with all the diffidence and anxiety natural to an author on publishing his first performance. The time I have employed, and the pains I have taken, in order to render it worthy of the public approba-tion, it is, perhaps, prudent to conceal, until it be known whether that approbation shall ever be bestowed upon it.

But as I have departed, in many inftances, from former hiltorians, as I have placed facts in a different light, and have drawn characters with new colours, I ought to account for this conduct to my readers; and to produce the evidence, on which, at the diftance of two centuries, I prefume to contradict the teftimony of lefs remote, or even of contemporary hiltorians. The transactions in Mary's reign gave rife to two parties, which were animated against each other with the fiercest political hatred, embittered by religious zeal. Each of these produced hiftorians of confiderable merit, who adopted all their fentiments, and defended all their actions. Truth was not the fole object of these authors. Blinded by prejudices, and heated by the part which they themfelves had acted in the fcenes they

they defcribe, they wrote an apology for a faction, rather than the hiftory of their country. Succeeding Historians have followed these guides almost implicitly, and have repeated their errors and mifreprefentations. But as the fame paffions which inflamed parties in that age have defcended to their posterity; as almost every event in Mary's reign has become the object of doubt or of difpute; the eager spirit of controversy soon discovered, that without some evidence more authentic and more impartial than that of fuch Historians, none of the points in question could be decided with certainty. Records have therefore been fearched, original papers have been produced, and public archives, as well as the re-positories of private men, have been ranfacked by the zeal and curiosity of writers of different parties. The attention of Cecil to collect whatever related to that period, in which he acted fo confpicuous a part, hath provided fuch an immenfe ftore of original papers for illustrating this part of the English and Scottish history, as are almost fufficient to fatisfy the utmost avidity of an Antiquary. Sir Robert Cotton (whofe library is now the property of the Public) made great and valuable additions to Cecil's collection; and from this magazine, Digges, the compilers of the Cabbala, Anderson, Keith, Haynes, Forbes, have drawn most of the papers which they have printed. No Hiftory of Scotland, that merits any degree of attention, has appeared fince thefe collections were published. By confulting them, I have been enabled, in many inftances, to cor-rect the inaccuracies of former Hiltorians, to avoid their miltakes, and to detect their milrepresentations.

But

But many important papers have efcaped the notice of those industrious Collectors; and, after all they have produced to light, much still remained in darkness, unobserved or unpublished. It was my duty to search for these; and I found this unpleasant task attended with considerable utility.

The library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, contains not only a large collection of original papers relating to the affairs of Scotland, but copies of others no lefs curious, which have been preferved by Sir Robert Cotton, or are extant in the Public Offices in England. Of all thefe the curators of that library were pleafed to allow me the perufal.

Though the British Museum be not yet open to the Public, Dr. Birch, whose obliging difposition is well known, procured mc access to that noble collection, which is worthy of the magnificence of a great and polished nation.

That vaft and curious collection of papers relating to the reign of Elizabeth, which was made by Dr. Forbes, and of which he publifhed only two volumes, having been purchafed fince his death, by the Lord Vifcount Royfton, his Lordfhip was fo good as to allow me the ufe of fourteen volumes in quarto, containing that part of them which is connected with my fubject.

Sir Alexander Dick communicated to me a very valuable collection of original papers, in two large volumes. They relate chiefly to the reign of James. Many of them are marked with Archbifhop Spotifwood's hand; and it appears from feveral paffages in his Hiftory, that he had perufed them with great attention. Mr. Calderwood, an eminent Prefbyterian Clergyman of the laft century, compiled an Hiftory of Scotland from the beginning of the reign of James V. to the death of James VI. in fix large volumes: wherein he has inferted many papers of confequence, which are no where elfe to be found. This Hiftory has not been publifhed, but a copy of it, which ftill remains in manufcript, in the poffeffion of the church of Scotland, was put into my hands by my worthy friend the Reverend Dr. George Wifhart, principal Clerk of the Church.

Sir David Dalrymple not only communicated to me the papers which he has collected relating to Gowrie's confpiracy; but, by explaining to me his fentiments with regard to that problematical paffage in the Scottifh hiftory, has enabled me to place that transaction in a light which difpels much of the darknefs and confusion in which it has been hitherto involved.

Mr. Goodall, though he knew my fentiments with regard to the conduct and character of Queen Mary to be extremely different from his own, communicated to me a volume of manuferipts in his poffellion, which contains a great number of valuable papers copied from the originals in the Cottonian Library and Paper Office, by the late Reverend Mr. Crawford, Regius Profeffor of Church Hiftory in the University of Edinburgh. I likewife received from him the original Register of letters kept by the Regent Lennox during his administration.

I have confulted all thefe papers, as far as I thought they could be of any ufe towards illuftrating that period of which I write the hiftory. With

PREFACE.

With what fuccefs I have employed them to confirm what was already known, to afcertain what was dubious, or to determine what was controverted, the Public must judge.

I might eafily have drawn, from the different repositories to which I had accefs, as many papers as would have rendered my Appendix equal in fize to the most bulky collection of my predeceffors. But I have fatisfied myfelf with publishing a few of the most curious among them, to which I found it neceffary to appeal as vouchers for my own veracity. None of thefc, as far as I can recollect, ever appeared in any former collection.

I have added a Critical Differtation concerning the murder of King Henry, and the genuineness of the Queen's letters to Bothwell. The facts and observations which relate to Mary's letters, I owe to my friend Mr. John Davidson, one of the Clerks to the Signet, who hath examined this point with his usual acuteness and industry.

ELEVENTH EDITION.

It is now twenty-eight years fince I published the History of Scotland. During that time I have been favoured by my friends with feveral remarks upon it; and various strictures have been made by perfons, who entertained fentiments different from mine, with respect to the transactions in the reign of Queen Mary. From whatever quarter information came, in whatever mode it has been communicated, I have confidered it calmly and with attention. Wherever I perceived that I had erred, either in relating events, or in delineating characters, I have, without hefitation, corrected those errors. Wherever I am fatisfied that my original ideas were just and well-founded, I adhere to them; and refting upon their conformity to evidence already produced, I enter into no difcuffion or controverly in order to fupport them. Wherever the opportunity of confulting original papers either in print or in manufcript, to which I had not formerly access, has enabled me to throw new light upon any part of the Hiftory, I have made alterations and additions, which, I flatter myfelf, will be found to be of fome importance.

BOOK L

Containing a Review of the SCOTTISH Hiftory previous to the Death of JAMES V.

THE first ages of the Scottish history are dark and fabulous. Nations, as well as men, arrive at maturity by degrees, and the events, which happened during their infancy or early youth, cannot be recollected, and deferve not to be remembered. The gross ignorance which anciently covered all the North of Europe, the continual migrations of its inhabitants, and the frequent and destructive revolutions which these occasioned, render it impoffible to give any authentic account of the origin of the different kingdoms now eftablifhed there. Every thing beyond that fhort period to which well-attefted annals reach, is obfcure; an immense fpace is left for invention to occupy; each nation, with a vanity inseparable from human nature, hath filled that void with events calculated to difplay its own antiquity and luftre. Hiftory, which ought to record truth and to teach wildom, often fets out with retailing fictions and abfurdities.

The Scots carry their pretenfions to antiquity as high as any of their neighbours. Relying upon uncertain legends, and the traditions of their bards, still more uncertain, they reckon up a feries

feries of kings feveral ages before the birth of Chrift; and give a particular detail of the oc-currences which happened in their reigns. But with regard to the Scots, as well as the other northern nations, we receive the earlieft accounts on which we can depend, not from their own, but from the Roman authors. When the Romans, under Agricola [A. D. 81], first carried their arms into the northern parts of Britain, they found it poffeffed by the Caledonians, a fierce and warlike people; and having repulfed, rather than conquered them, they erected a ftrong wall between the firths of Forth and Clyde, and there fixed the boundaries of their empire. Adrian, on account of the difficulty of defending fuch a diftant frontier, contracted the limits of the Roman province in Britain [A. D. 121], by building a fecond wall, which ran between Newcastle and Carlisle. The ambition of fucceeding Emperors endeavoured to recover what Adrian had abandoned; and the country between the two walls was alternately under the dominion of the Romans and that of the Caledonians. About the beginning of the fifth century, the inroads of the Goths and other Barbarians obliged the Romans, in order to defend the centre of their empire, to recall those legions which guarded the frontier provinces; and at that time they quitted all their conquests in Britain.

A. D. 421.] Their long refidence in the ifland had polifhed, in fome degree, the rude inhabitants, and the Britons were indebted to their intercourfe with the Romans, for the art of writing, and the ufe of numbers, without which it is impoffible impoffible long to preferve the memory of paft events.

North Britain was, by their retreat, left under the dominion of the Scots and Picts. The former, who are not mentioned by any Roman author before the end of the fourth century, were probably a colony of the Celtæ or Gauls: their affinity to whom appears from their language, their manners, and religious rites ; circumitances more decifive with regard to the origin of nations, than either fabulous traditions, or the tales of ill-informed and credulous annalifts. The Scots, if we may believe the common accounts, fettled at first in Ireland; and, extending themfelves by degrees, landed at laft on the coaft opposite to that island, and fixed their habitations there. Fierce and bloody wars were, during feveral ages, carried on between them and the Picts. At length, Kenneth II. the fixty-ninth king of the Scots (according to their own fabulous authors) obtained a complete victory over the Picts [A. D. 838], and united under one monarchy, all the country, from the wall of Adrian to the northern ocean. The kingdom henceforward became known by its prefent name, which it derived from a people who at first fettled there as ftrangers, and remained long obfcure and inconfiderable.

From this period the hiftory of Scotland would merit fome attention, were it accompanied with any certainty. But as our remote antiquities are involved in the fame darknefs with those of other nations, a calamity peculiar to ourfelves has thrown almost an equal obscurity over our more recent transactions. This was occasioned by the B 2 malicious malicious policy of Edward I. of England. Towards the end of the thirteenth century, this monarch called in queftion the independence of Scotland ; pretending that the kingdom was held as a fief of the crown of England, and fubjected to all the conditions of a feudal tenure. In order to eftablish his claim, he feized the public archives, he ranfacked churches and monasteries, and getting poffeffion, by force or fraud, of many hiftorical monuments, which tended to prove the antiquity or freedom of the kingdom, he carried fome of them into England, and commanded the reft to be burned<sup>a</sup>. An univerfal oblivion of past transactions might have been the effect of this fatal event, but some imperfect chronicles had efcaped the rage of Edward; foreign writers had recorded fome important facts relating to Scotland; and the traditions concerning recent occurrences were fresh and worthy of credit. These broken fragments John de Fordun, who lived in the fourteenth century, collected with a pious industry, and from them gleaned materials which he formed into a regular history. His work was received by his countrymen with applaufe; and as no recourfe could be had to more ancient records, it fupplied the place of the authentic annals of the kingdom. It was copied in many monasteries, and the thread of the narrative was continued by different monks through the fubfequent reigns. In the beginning of the fixteenth century, John Major and Hector Boethius published their his-tories of Scotland, the former a fuccinct and dry writer, the latter a copious and florid one, and both equally credulous. Not many years after, Buchanan undertook the fame work; and if his accuracy and impartiality had been, in any degree, equal to the elegance of his tafte and to the purity and vigour of his ftyle, his hiftory might be placed on a level with the most admired compositions of the ancients. But, instead of rejecting the improbable tales of chronicle writers, he was at the utmost pains to adorn them; and hath clothed, with all the beauties and graces of fiction, those legends, which formerly had only its wildnefs and extravagance.

The hiftory of Scotland may properly be divided into four periods. The first reaches from the origin of the monarchy, to the reign of Kenneth II. The fecond from Kenneth's conqueft of the Picts, to the death of Alexander III. The third extends to the death of James V. The laft, from thence to the acceffion of James VI. to the crown of England.

The first period is the reign of pure fable and conjecture, and ought to be totally neglected, or abandoned to the industry and credulity of antiquaries. Truth begins to dawn in the fecond period, with a light, feeble at first, but gradually increasing, and the events which then happened may be flightly touched, but merit no particular or laborious inquiry. In the third period, the hiftory of Scotland, chiefly by means of records preferved in England, becomes more authentic : not only are events related, but their caufes and effects explained; the characters of the actors are difplayed; the manners of the age defcribed; the revolutions in the conflitution pointed out : and here every Scotfman should begin not to read only, only, but to fludy the hiftory of his country. During the fourth period, the affairs of Scotland were fo mingled with those of other nations, its fituation in the political flate of Europe was fo important, its influence on the operations of the neighbouring kingdoms was fo visible, that its hiftory becomes an object of attention to foreigners; and without fome knowledge of the various and extraordinary revolutions which happened there, they cannot form a just notion with respect either to the most illustrious events, or to the characters of the most diffinguished perfonages, in the fixteenth century.

The following hiftory is confined to the laft of thefe periods: to give a view of the political flate of the kingdom during that which immediately preceded it, is the defign of this preliminary Book. The imperfect knowledge which flrangers have of the affairs of Scotland, and the prejudices Scotfmen themfelves have imbibed with regard to the various revolutions in the government of their country, render fuch an introduction equally neceffary to both.

The period from the death of Alexander III. to the death of James V. contains upwards of two centuries and a half, from the year one thoufand two hundred and eighty-fix, to the year one thoufand five hundred and forty-two.

It opens with the famous controverfy concerning the independence of Scotland. Before the union of the two kingdoms, this was a queftion of much importance. If the one crown had been confidered not as imperial and independent, but as feudatory to the other, a treaty of union could not have been concluded on equal terms, and every every advantage which the dependent kingdom procured, mult have been deemed the conceffion of a fovereign to his vaffal. Accordingly, about the beginning of the prefent century, and while a treaty of union between the two kingdoms was negociating, this controverfy was agitated with all the heat which national animofities naturally infpire. What was then the fubject of ferious concern, the union of the two kingdoms had rendered a matter of mere curiofity. But though the objects which at that time warmed and interefted both nations exift no longer, a queftion which appeared fo momentous to our anceftors cannot be altogether indifferent or uninftructive to us.

Some of the northern counties of England were early in the hands of the Scottifh kings, who, as far back as the feudal cuftoms can be traced, held thefe poffeffions of the kings of England, and did homage to them on that account. This homage, due only for the territories which they held in England, was in no wife derogatory from their royal dignity. Nothing is more fuitable to feudal ideas, than that the fame perfon fhould be both a lord and a vaffal, independent in one capacity, and dependent in another<sup>b</sup>. The crown of England

<sup>b</sup> A very fingular proof of this occurs in the French hiftory. Arpin fold the vicomté of the city Bourges to Philip I. who did homage to the count of Sancerre for a part of these lands, which held of that nobleman A. D. 1100. I believe that no example, of a king's doing homage to one of his own subjects, is to be met with in the histories either of England or Scotland. Philip le Bel abolished this practice in France A. D. 1302. Henault Abregé Chronol. Somewhat fimilar to this, is a charter of the Abbot of Melros, A. D. 1535, confituting James V. the bailiff or fteward land was, without doubt, imperial and independent, though the princes who wore it were, for many ages, the vaffals of the kings of France; and, in confequence of their poffeffions in that kingdom, bound to perform all the fervices which a feudal fovereign has a title to exact. The fame was the condition of the monarchs of Scotland; free and independent as kings of their own country, but, as possefing English territories, vallals to the king of England. The English monarchs, fatisfied with their legal and uncontroverted rights, were, during a long period, neither capable, nor had any thoughts of usurp-ing more. England, when conquered by the Saxons, being divided by them into many fmall kingdoms, was in no condition to extend its dominion over Scotland, united at that time under one monarch. And though thefe petty principalities were gradually formed into one kingdom, the reigning princes, exposed to continual invalions of the Dancs, and often subjected to the voke of those formidable pirates, feldom turned their arms towards Scotland, and were little able to eftablish new rights in that country. The first kings of the Norman race, bufied with introducing their own laws and manners into the kingdom which they had conquered, or with maintaining themfelves on the throne which fome of them poffelfed by a very dubious title, were as little folicitous to acquire new authority, or to form new pretensions in Scotland. pected calamity that befel one of the Scottifh Kings firft encouraged the Englifh to think of bringing his kingdom under dependence. William firnamed the Lion being taken prifoner at Alnwick, Henry II. as the price of his liberty, not only extorted from him an exorbitant ranfom, and a promife to furrender the places of greateft firength in his dominions, but compelled him to do homage for his whole kingdom. Richard I. a generous prince, folemnly renounced this claim of homage, and abfolved William from the hard conditions which Henry had impofed. Upon the death of Alexander III. near a century after, Edward I. availing himfelf of the fituation of affairs in Scotland, acquired an influence in that kingdom which no Englifh monarch before him ever poffeffed, and, imitating the interefted policy of Henry, rather than the magnanimity of Richard, revived the claim of fovereignty to which the former had pretended.

fovereignty to which the former had pretended. Margaret of Norway, grand-daughter of Alexander, and heir to his crown, did not long furvive him. The right of fucceffion belonged to the defeendants of David earl of Huntingdon, third fon of king David I. Among thefe, Robert Bruce and John Baliol, two illuftrious competitors for the crown, appeared. Bruce was the fon of Ifabel, earl David's fecond daughter; Baliol, the grandfon of Margaret the eldeft daughter. According to the rules of fucceffion which are now eftablifhed, the right of Baliol was preferable, and notwithftanding Bruce's plea of being nearer in blood to earl David, Baliol's claim, as the reprefentative of his mother and grandmother, would be deemed inconteftible. But

But in that age the order of fucceffion was not afcertained with the fame precifion. The queftion appeared to be no lefs intricate, than it was important. Though the prejudices of the people, and perhaps the laws of the kingdom, favoured Bruce, each of the rivals was supported by a powerful faction. Arms alone, it was feared, must terminate a difpute too weighty for the laws to decide. But, in order to avoid the miseries of a civil war, Edward was chosen umpire, and both parties agreed to acquiefce in his decree. This had well nigh proved fatal to the independence of Scotland; and the nation, by its eagerness to guard against a civil war, was not only exposed to that calamity, but almost fubjected to a foreign yoke. Edward was artful, brave, enterprifing, and commanded a powerful and martial people, at peace with the whole world. The anarchy which prevailed in Scot-land, and the ambition of competitors ready to facrifice their country in order to obtain even a dependent crown, invited him first to feize, and then to fubject the kingdom. The authority of an umpire, which had been unwarily beftowed upon him, and from which the Scots dreaded no dangerous confequences, enabled him to execute his ichemes with the greater facility. Under pretence of examining the question with the utmost folemnity, he fummoned all the Scottish barons to Norham, and having gained fome and intimidated others, he prevailed on all who were prefent, not excepting Bruce and Baliol, the competitors, to acknowledge Scotland to be a fief of the English crown, and to fwear fealty to him as their fovereign or liege lord. This ftep led to

to another ftill more important. As it was vain to pronounce a fentence which he had not power to execute, Edward demanded poffeffion of the kingdom, that he might be able to deliver it to him whofe right fhould be found preferable; and fuch was the pufillanimity of the nobles, and the impatient ambition of the competitors, that both affented to this ftrange demand, and Gilbert de Umfraville, earl of Angus, was the only man who refufed to furrender the cattles in his cuftody to the enemy of his country. Edward finding Baliol the moft obfequious and the leaft formidable of the two competitors, foon after gave judgment in his favour. Baliol once more profeffed himfelf the vaffal of England, and fubmitted to every condition which the fovereign whom he had now acknowledged was pleafed to preferibe.

Edward, having thus placed a creature of his own upon the throne of Scotland, and compelled the nobles to renounce the ancient liberties and independence of their country, had reafon to conclude that his dominion was now fully established. But he began too foon to affume the mafter; his new vaffals, fierce and independent, bore with impatience a yoke, to which they were not accuftomed. Provoked by his haughtinefs, even the paffive fpirit of Baliol began to mutiny. But Edward, who had no longer ufe for fuch a pageant king, forced him to refign the crown, and openly attempted to feize it as fallen to himfelf by the rebellion of his vallal. At that critical period arofe fir William Wallace, a hero, to whom the fond admiration of his countrymen hath afcribed many fabulous acts of prowefs, though his real valour, as well as integrity and wildom, wifdom, are fuch as need not the heightenings of fiction. He, almost fingle, ventured to take arms in defence of the kingdom, and his boldnefs revived the fpirit of his countrymen. At laft, Robert Bruce, the grandfon of him who flood in competition with Baliol, appeared to affert his own rights, and to vindicate the honour of his country. The nobles, ashamed of their former bafenels, and enraged at the many indignities offered to the nation, crowded to his ftandard. In order to crush him at once, the English monarch entered Scotland at the head of a mighty army. Many battles were fought, and the Scots, though often vanquished, were not fubdued. The ardent zeal with which the nobles contended for the independence of the kingdom, the prudent valour of Bruce, and above all a national enthusiasm inspired by such a cause, baffled the repeated efforts of Edward, and counterbalanced all the advantages which he derived from the number and wealth of his fubjects. Though the war continued with little intermiffion upwards of feventy years, Bruce and his pofterity kept poffeffion of the throne of Scotland, and reigned with an authority not inferior to that of its former monarchs.

But while the fword, the ultimate judge of all difputes between contending nations, was employed to terminate this controverfy, neither Edward nor the Scots feemed to diftruft the juftice of their caufe; and both appealed to hiftory and records, and from thefe produced, in their own favour, fuch evidence as they pretended to be unanfwerable. The letters and memorials addreffed by each party to the Pope, who who was then reverenced as the common father, and often appealed to as the common judge of all christian princes, are still extant. The fabulous tales of the early British history; the partial teftimony of ignorant chroniclers; fuppolititious treaties and charters; are the proofs on which Edward founded his title to the fovereignty of Scotland; and the homage done by the Scotlift monarchs for their lands in England is prepofte-roufly fuppofed to imply the fubjection of their whole kingdom . Ill-founded, however, as their right was, the English did not fail to revive it in all the fubfequent quarrels between the two kingdoms; while the Scots difclaimed it with the utmost indignation. To this we must impute the fierce and implacable hatred to each other, which long inflamed both. Their national antipathies were excited, not only by the ufual circumftances of frequent hostilities, and reciprocal injuries; but the English confidered the Scots as vaffals who had prefumed to rebel, and the Scots, in their turn, regarded the English as usurpers who aimed at enflaving their country.

1306.] At the time when Robert Bruce began his reign in Scotland, the fame form of government was eftablished in all the kingdoms of Europe. This furprising fimilarity in their conflitution and laws demonstrates that the nations which overturned the Roman empire, and erected these kingdoms, though divided into different tribes, and distinguished by different names, were either derived originally from the fame fource, or had been placed in fimilar fitua-

tions. When we take a view of the feudal fyftem of laws and policy, that flupendous and fingular fabric erected by them, the first object that strikes us is the king. And when we are told that he is the fole proprietor of all the lands within his dominions, that all his fubjects derive their poffeffions from him, and in return confecrate their lives to his fervice; when we hear that all marks of diffinction, and titles of dignity, flow from him as the only fountain of honour ; when we behold the most potent peers, on their bended knees, and with folded hands, fwearing fealty at his feet, and acknowledging him to be their fovereign and their liege lord; we are apt to pronounce him a powerful, nay an absolute monarch. No conclusion, however, would be more rash, or worfe founded. The genius of the feudal government was purely ariftocratical. With all the enfigns of royalty, and with many appearances of despotic power, a seudal king was the most limited of all princes.

Before they fallied out of their own habitations to conquer the world, many of the northern nations feemed not to have been fubject to the government of kingsd; and even where monarchical government was established, the prince possesfed but little authority. A general rather than a king, his military command was extensive, his civil jurifdiction almost nothing . The army which he led was not composed of foldiers, who could be compelled to ferve, but of fuch as voluntarily followed his ftandard f. Thefe conquered not for their leader, but for themfelves;

and being free in their own country, renounced not their liberty when they acquired new fettlements. They did not exterminate the ancient inhabitants of the countries which they fubdued, but feizing the greater part of their lands, they took their perfons under protection. The difficulty of maintaining a new conquest, as well as the danger of being attacked by new invaders, rendering it neceffary to be always in a posture of defence, the form of government which they established was altogether military, and nearly refembled that to which they had been accustomed in their native country. Their general still continuing to be the head of the colony, part of the conquered lands were allotted to him ; the remainder, under the name of beneficia or fiefs, was divided among his principal officers. As the common fafety required that thefe officers should, upon all occasions, be ready to appear in arms, for the common defence, and should continue obedient to their general, they bound themfelves to take the field, when called, and to ferve him with a number of men in proportion to the extent of their territory. These great officers again parcelled out their lands among their followers, and annexed the fame condition to the grant. A feudal kingdom was properly the encampment of a great army; military ideas predominated, military fubordination was established, and the poffeffion of land was the pay which foldiers received for their perfonal fervice. In confequence of thefe notions, the poffession of land was granted during pleafure only, and kings were elective. In other words, an officer difagreeable to his general was deprived of his pay, and the perfon who

who was most capable of conducting an army was chosen to command it. Such were the first rudiments, or infancy of feudal government.

rudiments, or infancy of feudal government. But long before the beginning of the fourteenth century, the feudal fyftem had undergone many changes, of which the following were the moft confiderable. Kings, formerly elective, were then hereditary; and fiefs, granted at firft during pleafure, defcended from father to fon, and were become perpetual. Thefe changes, not lefs advantageous to the nobles than to the prince, made no alteration in the ariftocratical fpirit of the feudal conftitution. The king, who at a diftance feemed to be invefted with majefty and power, appears, on a nearer view, to poffefs almoft none of thofe advantages which beftow on monarchs their grandeur and authority. His revenues were fcanty; he had not a ftanding army; and the jurifdiction he poffeffed was circumfcribed within very narrow limits.

At a time when pomp and fplendor were little known, even in the palaces of kings; when the officers of the crown received fcarcely any falary befides the fees and perquifites of their office; when embaffies to foreign courts were rare; when armies were composed of foldiers who ferved without pay; it was not neceffary that a king fhould poffefs a great revenue; nor did the condition of Europe, in those ages, allow its princes to be opulent. Commerce made little progrefs in the kingdoms where the feudal government was established. Inflitutions, which had no other object but to infpire a martial fpirit, to train men to be foldiers, and to make arms the only honourable profession, naturally discouraged the commercommercial arts. The revenues arifing from the taxes imposed on the different branches of commerce, were by confequence inconfiderable; and the prince's treafury received little fupply from a fource, which, among a trading people, flows with fuch abundance as is almost inexhaustible. A fixed tax was not levied even on land; fuch a burthen would have appeared intolerable to men who received their effates as the reward of their valour, and who confidered their fervice in the field as a full retribution for what they poffeffed. The king's demesnes, or the portion of land which he still retained in his own hands unalienated. furnished subfistence to his court, and defrayed the ordinary expence of government3. The only ftated taxes which the feudal law obliged vaffals to pay to the king, or to those of whom they held their lands, were three: one when his eldest fon was made a knight; another when his eldest daughter was married; and a third in order to ranfom him if he should happen to be taken prifoner. Befides thefe, the king received the feudal cafualties of the ward, marriage, &c. of his own vaffals. And, on fome extraordinary occafions, his fubjects granted him an aid, which they diftinguished by the name of a benevolence, in order to declare that he received it not in confequence of any right, but as a gift flowing from their good willh. All these added together, produced a revenue fo fcanty and prccarious, as naturally incited a feudal monarch to aim at diminishing the exorbitant power and wealth of the nobility, but inftead of enabling him to carry on his fchemes with full effect, kept him in continual indigence, anxiety, and dependence.

Nor could the king fupply the defect of his revenues by the terror of his arms. Mercenary troops and flanding armies were unknown as long as the feudal government fubfifted in vigour. Europe was peopled with foldiers. The vaffals of the king, and the fub-vaffals of the barons, were all obliged to carry arms. While the poverty of princes prevented them from for-tifying their frontier towns, while a campaign continued but a few weeks, and while a fierce and impetuous courage was impatient to bring every quarrel to the decision of a battle, an army, without pay, and with little discipline, was sufficient for all the purposes both of the fecurity and of the glory of the nation. Such an army, how-ever, far from being an engine at the king's difpofal, was often no lefs formidable to him, than to his enemies. The more warlike any people were, the more independent they became; and the fame perfons being both foldiers and fubjects, civil privileges and immunities were the confequence of their victories, and the reward of their martial exploits. Conquerors, whom mercenary armies, under our prefent forms of government, often render the tyrants of their own people, as well as the fcourges of mankind, were commonly, under the feudal conftitution, the most indulgent of all princes to their fubjects, because they stood most in need of their assistance. A prince, whom even war and victories did not render the master of his own army, poffeffed hardly any fhadow of military power during times of peace. His difbanded banded foldiers mingled with his other fubjects; not a fingle man received pay from him; many ages elapfed even before a guard was appointed to defend his perfon; and defititute of that great inftrument of dominion, a ftanding army, the authority of the king continued always feeble, and was often contemptible.

Nor were thefe the only circumftances which contributed towards depreffing the regal power. By the feudal fystem, as has been already ob-ferved, the king's judicial authority was extremely circumscribed. At first, princes seem to have been the fupreme judges of their people, and, in perfon, heard and determined all controverfies among them. The multiplicity of caufes foon made it neceffary to appoint judges, who, in the king's name, decided matters that belonged to the royal jurifdiction. But the Barbarians, who over-ran Europe, having deftroyed most of the great cities, and the countries which they feized being cantoned out among powerful chiefs, who were blindly followed by numerous dependants, whom, in return, they were bound to protect from every injury; the administration of justice was greatly interrupted, and the execution of any legal fentence became almost impracticable. Theft, rapine, murder, and diforder of all kinds. prevailed in every kingdom of Europe, to a degree almost incredible, and fcarcely compatible with the fubfistence of civil fociety. Every offender sheltered himself under the protection of fome powerful chieftain, who fcreened him from the purfuits of justice. To apprehend, and to punish a criminal, often required the union and effort effort of half a kingdom<sup>1</sup>. In order to remedy thefe evils, many perfons of diffinction were entrufted with the administration of justice within their own territories. But what we may prefume was, at first, only a temporary grant, or a perfonal privilege, the incroaching spirit of the nobles gradually converted into a right, and rendered hereditary. The lands of some were, in process of time, erected into baronies, those of others into regalities. The jurifdiction of the former was extensive; that of the latter, as the name implies, royal, and almost unbounded. All causes, whether civil or criminal, were tried by judges, whom i A remarkable inftance of this occurs in the following history, fo late as the year one thousand five hundred and fixty-one. Mary, having appointed a court of justice to be held on the borders, the inhabitants of no lefs than eleven counties were fummoned to guard the perfon who was to act as judge, and to enable him to enforce his decifions. The words of a proclamation, which afford fuch a convincing proof of the feeblenefs of the feudal government, deferve our notice .- " And becaufe it is neceffary for the execution of her Highnefs' commandments and fervice, that her juffice be well accompanied, and her authority fufficiently fortified, by the concurience of a good power of her faithful fubjects-Therefore commands and charges all and fundry earls, lords, barons, freeholders, landed-men, and other gentlemen, dwelling within the faid counties, that they, and every one of them, with their kin, friends, fervants, and houshold-men. well bodin in feir of war in the most substantious manner, [i. e. completely armed and provided, ] and with twenty days victuals to meet and to pafs forward with him to the borough of Jedburgh, and there to remain during the faid space of twenty days, and to receive fuch direction and commands as shall be given by him to them in our Sovereign Lady's name, for quietness of the country; and to put the fame in execution under the pain of lofing their life, lands, and goods." the lord of the regality appointed; and if the king's courts called any perfon within his territory before them, the lord of regality might put a ftop to their proceedings, and by the privilege of repledging, remove the caufe to his own court, and even punifh his vafial, if he fubmitted to a foreign jurifdiction<sup>k</sup>. Thus almoft every queftion in which any perfon who refided on the lands of the nobles was interefted, being determined by judges appointed by the nobles themfelves, their vafials were hardly fenfible of being, in any degree, fubject to the crown. A feudal kingdom was fplit into many fmall principalities, almoft independent, and held together by a feeble and commonly an imperceptible bond of union. The king was not only ftripped of the authority annexed to the perfon of a fupreme judge, but his revenue fuffered no fmall diminution, by the lofs of thofe pecuniary emoluments, which were, in that age, due to the perfon who adminiftered juffice.

In the fame proportion that the king funk in power, the nobles rofe towards independence. Not fatisfied with having obtained a hereditary right to their fiefs, which they formerly held during pleafure, their ambition aimed at fomething bolder, and by introducing entails, endeavoured, as far as human ingenuity and invention can reach that end, to render their poffeffions unalienable and everlafting. As they had full power to add to the inheritance tranfmitted to them from their anceftors, but none to diminifu it, time alone, by means of marriages, legacies, and other accidents, brought continual acceffions of wealth, and of dignity; a great family, like a river, became confiderable from the length of its courfe, and as it rolled on, new honours and new property flowed fucceflively into it. Whatever influence is derived from titles of honour, the feudal barons likewise possessed in an ample manner. These marks of distinction are, in their own nature, either official or perfonal, and being annexed to a particular charge, or beftowed by the admiration of mankind upon illustrious characters, ought to be appropriated to thefe. But the fon, however unworthy, could not bear to be ftripped of that appellation by which his father had been diftinguished. His prefumption: claimed what his virtue did not merit; titles of honour became hereditary, and added new luftre to nobles already in poffeffion of too much power. Something more audacious and more extravagant ftill remained. The fupreme direction of all affairs, both civil and military, being committed to the great officers of the crown, the fame and fafety of princes, as well as of their people, depended upon the fidelity and abilities of thefe officers. But fuch was the preposterous ambition of the nobles, and fo fuccefsful even in their wildeft attempts to aggrandize themfelves, that in all the kingdoms where the feudal inftitutions prevailed, most of the chief offices of state were annexed to great families, and held, like fiefs, by hereditary right. A perfon whofe undutiful behaviour rendered him odious to his prince, or whole incapacity expoled him to the contempt of the people, often held a place of power and trult of the greatest importance to both. In Scotland, the offices of lord justice general, great chamberlain.

berlain, high fteward, high conftable, earl marfhal, and high admiral, were all hereditary; and in many counties, the office of fheriff was held in the fame manner.

Nobles, whofe property was fo extensive, and whofe power was fo great, could not fail of being turbulent and formidable. Nor did they want instruments for executing their boldest defigns. That portion of their lands which they parcelled cut among their followers, fupplied them with a numerous band of faithful and determined vaffals; while that which they retained in their own hands, enabled them to live with a princely fplendor. The great hall of an ambitious baron was often more crowded than the court of his fovereign. The strong castles in which they refided afforded a fecure retreat to the difcontented and feditious. A great part of their revenue was fpent upon multitudes of indigent but bold retainers. And if at any time they left their retreat to appear in the court of their fovereign, they were accompanied, even in times of peace, with a vaft train of armed followers. The ufual retinue of William the fixth earl of Douglas confisted of two thousand horse. Those of the other nobles were magnificent and formidable in proportion. Impatient of fubordination, and forgetting their proper rank, fuch potent and haughty barons were the rivals, rather than the fubjects of their prince. They often defpifed his orders, infulted his perfon, and wrefted from him his crown. The hiftory of Europe, during feveral ages, contains little elfe but the accounts of the wars and revolutions occafioned by their exorbitant ambition.

But,

But, if the authority of the barons far exceeded its proper bounds in the other nations of Europe, we may affirm that the balance which ought to be preferved between a king and his nobles was almost entirely lost in Scotland. The Scottish nobles enjoyed, in common with those of other nations, all the means for extending their authority which arife from the ariftocratical genius of the feudal government. Befides thefe, they poffeffed advantages peculiar to themfelves: the accidental fources of their power were confiderable; and fingular circumstances concurred with the spirit of the conftitution to aggrandize them. To enumerate the most remarkable of these, will ferve both to explain the political flate of the kingdom, and to illustrate many important occurrences in the period now under our review.

I. The nature of their country was one caufe of the power and independence of the Scottifh. nobility. Level and open countries are formed for fervitude. The authority of the fupreme magistrate reaches with ease to the most distant corners; and when nature has erected no barrier and affords no retreat, the guilty or obnoxious are foon detected and punished. Mountains, and fens, and rivers, fet bounds to defpotic power, and amidst these is the natural feat of freedom and independence. In fuch places did the Scottish nobles usually fix their refidence. By retiring to his own caftle, a mutinous baron could defy the power of his fovereign, it being almost impracticable to lead an army, through a barren country, to places of difficult access to a fingle man. The fame caufes which checked the progrefs of the Roman arms, and rendered dered all the efforts of Edward I. abortive, often protected the Scottish nobles from the vengeance of their prince; and they owed their perfonal independence to those very mountains and marshes which faved their country from being conquered.

II. The want of great cities in Scotland contributed not a little to increase the power of the nobility, and to weaken that of the prince. Wherever numbers of men affemble together, order must be established, and a regular form of government must be instituted, the authority of the magistrate must be recognized, and his decifions meet with prompt and full obedience. Laws and fubordination take rife in cities; and where there are few cities as in Poland, or none as in Tartary, there are few or no traces of a wellarranged police. But under the feudal governments, commerce, the chief means of affembling mankind, was neglected; the nobles, in order to ftrengthen their influence over their vaffals, refided among them, and feldom appeared at court, where they found a fuperior, or dwelt in cities, where they met with equals. In Scotland, the fertile counties in the fouth lying open to the English, no town fituated there could rife to be great or populous amidft continual inroads and alarms: the refidence of our monarchs was not fixed to any particular place; many parts of the country were barren and uncultivated; and in confequence of these peculiar circumstances, added to the general caufes flowing from the nature of the feudal inftitutions, the towns in Scotland were few, and very inconfiderable. The vaffals of every baron occupied a diffinct por-TOL. I. tion D tion of the kingdom, and formed a feparate and almost independent fociety. Instead of giving aid towards reducing to obedience their feditious chieftain, or any whom he took under his protection, they were all in arms for his defence, and obstructed the operations of justice to the utmost. The prince was obliged to connive at criminals whom he could not reach; the nobles, confcious of this advantage, were not afraid to offend; and the difficulty of punishing almost affured them of impunity.

III. The division of the country into clans had no fmall effect in rendering the nobles confi-derable. The nations which over-ran Europe were originally divided into many fmall tribes; and when they came to parcel out the lands which they had conquered, it was natural for every chieftain to bellow a portion, in the first place, upon those of his own tribe or family. Thefe all held their lands of him; and as the fafety of each individual depended on the general union, thefe fmall focieties clung together, and were diftinguished by fome common appellation, either patronymical or local, long before the in-troduction of furnames, or enfigns armorial. But when these became common, the descendants and relations of every chieftain alfumed the fame name and arms with him; other vaffals were' proud to imitate their example, and by degrees they were communicated to all those who held of the fame fuperior. Thus clanships were formed; and in a generation or two, that confanguinity, which was, at first, in a great measure, imaginary, was believed to be real. An artificial union was converted into a natural one; men willingly followed followed a leader, whom they regarded both as the fuperior of their lands, and the chief of their blood, and ferved him not only with the fidelity of vaffals, but with the affection of friends. In the other feudal kingdoms, we may obferve fuch unions as we have defcribed imperfectly formed; but in Scotland, whether they were the production of chance or the effect of policy, or introduced by the Irifn colony above mentioned, and ftrengthened by carcfully preferving their genealogies both genuine and fabulous, clanships were univerfal. Such a confederacy might be overcome, it could not be broken; and no change of man-ners, or of government, has been able, in fome parts of the kingdom, to diffolve affociations which are founded upon prejudices fo natural to the human mind. How formidable were nobles at the head of followers, who, counting that caufe just and honourable which their chief approved, rushed into the field at his command, ever ready to facrifice their lives in defence of his perfon or of his fame; against fuch men a king contended with great difadvantage; and that cold fervice which money purchafes or authority extorts, was not an equal match for their ardour and zeal.

IV. The fmallnefs of their number may be mentioned among the caufes of the grandeur of the Scottish nobles. Our annals reach not back to the first division of property in the kingdom; but as far as we can trace the matter, the original poffeffions of the nobles feem to have been extenfive. The ancient thanes were the equals and the rivals of their prince. Many of the earls and barons who fucceeded them, were masters of territories no lefs ample. France and England, countries D 2 countries wide and fertile, afforded fettlements to a numerous and powerful nobility. Scotland, a kingdom neither extensive nor rich, could not contain many fuch overgrown proprietors. But the power of an ariftocracy always diminishes in proportion to the increase of its numbers; feeble if divided among a multitude, irrefiftible if centered in a few. When nobles are numerous, their operations nearly refemble those of the people; they are roufed only by what they feel, not by what they apprehend; and fubmit to many arbi-trary and opprefive acts, before they take arms against their fovereign. A fmall body, on the contrary, is more fensible, and more impatient; quick in difcerning, and prompt in repelling danger; all its motions are as fudden as those of the other are flow. Hence proceeded the extreme jealoufy with which the Scottish nobles observed their monarchs, and the fierceness with which they opposed their incroachments. Even the virtue of a prince did not render them lefs vigilant, or lefs eager to defend their rights; and Robert Bruce, notwithftanding the fplendor of his victories and the glory of his name, was upon the point of ex-periencing the vigour of their refiftance, no lefs than his unpopular defcendant James III. Befides this, the near alliance of the great families by fre-quent intermarriages, was the natural confequence of their fmall number; and as confanguinity was, in those ages, a powerful bond of union, all the kindred of a nobleman interested themselves in his quarrel, as a common caufe; and every conteft the king had, though with a fingle baron, foon drew upon him the arms of a whole confederacy.

V. Thofe

V. Thofe natural connexions, both with their equals and with their inferiors, the Scottifh nobles ftrengthened by a device, which, if not peculiar to themfelves, was at least more frequent among them, than in any other nation. Even in times of profound peace, they formed affociations, which, when made with their equals, were called leagues of mutual defence; and when with their inferiors, bonds of manrent. By the former, the contracting parties bound themfelves mutually to affift each other in all caufes and against all perfons. By the latter, protection was ftipulated on the one hand, and fidelity and perfonal fervice promifed on the other<sup>1</sup>. Self-prefervation, it is probable, forced men at first into these confederacies; and while diforder and rapine were univerfal, while government was unfettled, and the authority of laws little known or regarded, near neighbours found it neceffary to unite in this manner for their fecurity, and the weak were obliged to court the patronage of the ftrong. By degrees, thefe affociations became fo many alliances offenfive and defensive against the throne; and as their obligation was held to be more facred than any tie whatever, they gave much umbrage to our kings, and contributed not a little to the power and independence of the nobility. In the reign of James II. William the eighth earl of Douglas entered into a league of this kind with the earls of Crawford, Rofs, Murray, Ormond, the lords Hamilton, Balveny, and other powerful barons; and fo formidable was this combination to the king, that he had recourfe to a measure no less violent than unjuft, in order to diffolve it.

> Act 30, Parl. 1424. Act 43, Parl. 1555. D 3 VI. The

VI. The frequent wars between England and Scotland proved another caufe of augmenting the power of the nobility. Nature has placed no barrier between the two kingdoms; a river, almost every where fordable, divides them towards the east: on the west they are separated by an imaginary line. The flender revenues of our kings prevented them from fortifying, or placing garrifons in the towns on the frontier; nor would the jealoufy of their fubjects have permitted fuch a method of defence. The barons, whole eftates lay near the borders, confidered themfelves as bound both in honour and in intereft to repel the enemy. The wardenships of the different marches, offices of great power and dignity, were generally beftowed on them. This gained them the leading of the warlike counties in the fouth; and their vaffals, living in a flate of perpetual hoftility, or enjoying at best an infecure peace, became more inured to war than even the reft of their countrymen, and more willing to accompany their chieftain in his most hardy and dangerous enterprifes. It was the valour, no lefs than the number of their followers, that rendered the Douglafes great. The nobles in the northern and midland counties were often dutiful and obfequious to the crown, but our monarchs always found it impracticable to fubdue the mutinous and ungovernable fpirit of the borderers. In all our domeftic quarrels, those who could draw to their fide the inhabitants of the fouthern counties were almost fure of victory; and, confcious of this advantage, the lords who poffeffed authority there were apt to forget the duty which they owed their fovereign, and to afpire beyond the rank of fubjects.

VII. The

VII. The calamities which befel our kings contributed more than any other caufe to diminifh the royal authority. Never was any race of monarchs lo unfortunate as the Scottifh. Of fix fucceffive princes, from Robert III. to James VI. not one died a natural death; and the minorities, during that time, were longer, and more frequent, than ever happened in any other kingdom. From Robert Bruce to James VI. we reckon ten princes; and feven of thefe were called to the throne while they were minors, and almost infants. Even the most regular and best esta-blished governments feel fensibly the pernicious effects of a minority, and either become languid and inactive, or are thrown into violent and unnatural convulsions. But under the imperfect and ill-adjusted fystem of government in Scotland, these effects were still more fatal; the fierce and mutinous fpirit of the nobles, unrestrained by the authority of a king, fcorned all fubjection to the delegated jurifdiction of a regent, or to the feeble commands of a minor. The royal authority was circumferibed within narrower limits than ever; the prerogatives of the crown, naturally inconfiderable, were reduced almost to nothing; and the ariftocratical power gradually rofe upon the ruins of the monarchical. Left the perfonal power of a regent should enable him to act with too much vigour, the authority annexed to that office was fometimes rendered inconfiderable by being divided; or, if a fingle regent was chofen, the greater nobles, and the heads of the more illuftrious families, were feldom raifed to that dignity. It was often conferred upon men who posseffed little influence, and excited no jealoufy. They, confcious confcious of their own weaknefs, were obliged to overlook fome irregularities, and to permit others; and in order to fupport their authority, which was destitute of real strength, they endeavoured to gain the most powerful and active barons, by granting them possessions and immunities, which raifed them to ftill greater power. When the king himfelf came to affume the reins of government, he found his revenue wasted or alienated, the crown lands feized or given away, and the nobles fo accuftomed to independence, that, after the ftruggles of a whole reign, he was feldom able to reduce them to the fame flate in which they had been at the beginning of his minority, or to wreft from them what they had ufurped during that time. If we take a view of what happened to each of our kings who was fo unfortimate as to be placed in this fituation, the truth and importance of this obfervation will fully appear.

1329.] The minority of David II. the fon of Robert Bruce, was diffurbed by the pretentions of Edward Baliol, who, relying on the aid of England, and on the fupport of fome difaffected barons among the Scots, invaded the kingdoms The fuccels which at first attended his arms obliged the young king to retire to France; and Baliol took poffefion of the throne. A fmall body of the nobles, however, continuing faithful to their exiled prince, drove Baliol out of Scotland; and after an absence of nine years, David returned from France, and took the government of the kingdom into his own hands. But nobles who were thus wafting their blood and treasure in defence of the crown, had a right to the undisturbed poffession of their ancient privileges; leges; and even fome title to arrogate new ones. It feems to have been a maxim in that age, that every leader might claim as his own, the territory which his fword had won from the enemy. Great acquifitions were gained by the nobility in that way: and to thefe the gratitude and liberality of David added, by diffributing among fuch as adhered to him, the vaft poffeffions which fell to the crown by the forfeiture of his enemies. The family of Douglas, which began to rife above the other nobles in the reign of his father, augmented both its power and its property during his minority.

1405.] James I. was feized by the English during the continuance of a truce, and ungeneroufly detained a prifoner almost nineteen years. During that period the kingdom was governed, first by his uncle Robert duke of Albany, and then by Murdo the fon of Robert. Both thefe noblemen afpired to the crown; and their unnatural ambition, if we may believe most of our historians, not only cut short the days of prince David, the king's elder brother, but prolonged the captivity of James. They flattered them-felves that they might flep with lefs opposition into a throne, when almost vacant: and, dreading the king's return as the extinction of their au-thority and the end of their hopes, they carried on the negociations for obtaining his liberty with extreme remiffnels. At the fame time, they neglected nothing that could either footh or bribe the nobles to approve of their fcheme. They flackened the reins of government; they allowed the prerogative to be encroached upon; they fuffered the most irregular acts of power, and

and even wanton inftances of opprefilion, to pafs with impunity; they dealt out the patrimony of the crown among thofe whofe enmity they dreaded or whofe favour they had gained; and reduced the royal authority to a flatc of imbecility, from which fucceeding monarchs laboured in vain to raife it.

1437.] During the minority of James II. the adminification of affairs as well as the cuftody of the king's perfon were committed to fir William Crichton and fir Alexander Livingfton. Jealoufy and difcord were the effects of their conjunct authority, and each of them, in order to ftrengthen himfelf, beftowed new power and privileges upon the great men whofe aid he courted. While the young earl of Douglas, encouraged by their divisions, erected a fort of independent principality within the kingdom; and forbidding his vafials to acknowledge any authority but his own, he created knights, appointed a privy council, named officers civil and military, affumed every enfign of royalty but the title of king, and appeared in public with a magnificence more than royal.

1460.] Eight perfons were chofen to govern the kingdom during the minority of James III. Lord Boyd, however, by feizing the perfon of the young king, and by the afcendant which he acquired over him, foon engroffed the whole authority. He formed the ambitious project of raifing his family to the fame pitch of power and grandeur with those of the prime nobility; and he effected it. While intent on this, he relaxed the vigour of government, and the barons became accuftomed, once more, to anarchy and independence. dependence. The power which Boyd had been at fo much pains to acquire, was of no long continuance, and the fall of his family, according to the fate of favourites, was fudden and deftructive; but upon its ruins the family of Hamilton rofe, which foon attained the higheft rank in the kingdom.

As the minority of James V. was longer, it was likewife more turbulent, than those of the preceding kings. And the contending nobles, encouraged or protected either by the king of France or of England, formed themfelves into more regular factions, and difregarded more than ever the restraints of order and authority. The French had the advantage of feeing one devoted to their interest raised to be regent. This was the duke of Albany, a native of France, and a grandfon of James II. But Alex-ander lord Home, the most eminent of all the Scottifh peers who furvived the fatal battle of Flowden, thwarted all his measures during the first years of his administration; and the intrigues of the queen-dowager, fifter of Henry VIII. rendered the latter part of it no lefs feeble. Though supported by French auxiliaries, the nobles despited his authority, and regardless either of his threats or his intreaties, peremptorily refused, two feveral times, to enter England, to the borders of which kingdom he had led them. Provoked by thefe repeated inftances of contempt, the regent abandoned his troublefome station, and, retiring to France, preferred the tranquillity of a private life, to an office destitute of real authority. Upon his retreat, Douglas earl of Angus became master of the king's king's perfon, and governed the kingdom in his name. Many efforts were made to deprive him of his ufurped authority. But the numerous vaffals and friends of his family adhered to him, becaufe he divided with them the power and emoluments of his office; the people reverenced and loved the name of Douglas; he exercifed, without the title of regent, a fuller and more abfolute authority than any who had enjoyed that dignity; and the ancient, but dangerous, pre-eminence of the Douglafes feemed to be reitored.

To thefe, and to many other caufes, omitted or unobferved by us, did the Scottifh nobility owe that exorbitant and uncommon power, of which inftances occur fo frequently in our hiftory. Nothing however demonstrates fo fully the extent of their power, as the length of its duration. Many years after the declension of the feudal fystem in the other kingdoms of Europe, and when the arms or policy of princes had, every where, shaken, or laid it in ruins, the foundations of that ancient fabric remained, in a great measure, firm and untouched in Scotland.

The powers which the feudal inflitutions vefted in the nobles, foon became intolerable to all the princes of Europe, who longed to poffefs fomething more than a nominal and precarious authority. Their impatience to obtain this, precipitated Henry III. of England, Edward II. and fome other weak princes, into rafh and premature attempts against the privileges of the barons, in which they were difappointed or perifhed. Princes, of greater abilities, were content to initigate evils which

which they could not cure; they fought occupation for the turbulent fpirit of their nobles in frequent wars; and allowed their fiery courage to evaporate in foreign expeditions, which, if they brought no other advantage, fecured at leaft domefic tranquillity. But time and acci-dents ripened the feudal governments for deftruction. Towards the end of the fifteenth century, and beginning of the fixteenth, all the princes of Europe attacked, as if by concert, the power of their nobles. Men of genius then undertook with fuccefs, what their unskilful predeceffors had attempted in vain. Lewis XI. of France, the most profound and the most adventurous genius of that age, began, and in a fingle reign almost completed the scheme of their destruction. The fure but concealed policy of Henry VII. of England produced the fame effect. The means, indeed, employed by thefe monarchs were very different. The blow which Lewis ftruck was fudden and fatal. The artifices of Henry refembled those flow poifons which wafte the conftitution, but become not mortal till fome diftant period. Nor did they produce confequences lefs oppofite. Lewis boldly added to the crown whatever he wrefted from the nobles. Henry undermined his barons, by encouraging them to fell their lands, which enriched the commons, and gave them a weight in the legislature unknown to their predeceffors. But while thefe great revolutions were carrying on in two kingdoms with which Scotland was intimately connected, little alteration happened. there; our kings could neither extend their own prerogative, nor enable the commons to encroach VOL. I. upon upon the ariftocracy; the nobles not only retained most of their ancient privileges and poffeffions, but continued to make new acquisitions.

This was not owing to the inattention of our princes, or to their want of ambition. They were abundantly fenfible of the exorbitant power of the nobility, and extremely folicitous to humble that order. They did not, however, poffefs means fufficient for accomplifhing this end. The refources of our monarchs were few, and the progrefs which they made was of courfe inconfiderable. But as the number of their followers, and the extent of their jurifdiction, were the two chief circumflances which rendered the nobles formidable; in order to counterbalance the one, and to reftrain the other, all our kings had recourfe to nearly the fame expedients.

I: Among nobles of a fierce courage, and of unpolifhed manners, furrounded with vaffals bold and licentious, whom they were bound by intereft and honour to protect, the caufes of difcord were many and unavoidable. As the contending parties could feldom agree in acknowledging the authority of any common fuperior or judge, and their impatient fpirit would feldom wait the flow decifions of jultice, their quarrels were ufually terminated by the fword. The offended baron affembled his vaffals, and wafted the lands, or fhed the blood, of his enemy. To forgive an injury was mean; to forbear revenge, infamous or cowardly<sup>m</sup>. Hence quarrels were tranf-

m The fpirit of revenge was encouraged, not only by the manners, but, what is more remarkable, by the laws of thole ages. If any perfon thought the profecution of an injury offered transmitted from father to fon, and, under the name of deadly feuds, fublisted for many generations with unmitigated rancour. It was the interest of the crown to foment rather than to extinguish these quarrels; and by feattering or cheristing the feeds of difcord among the nobles, that union, which would have rendered the aristocracy invincible, and which must at once have annihilated the prerogative, was effectually prevented. To the fame cause, our kings were indebted for the fuccess with which they fometimes attacked the most powerful chieftains. They employed private revenge to aid the impotence of public laws, and arming against the perfon who had incurred their displeasfure, those rival families which wished his fall, they rewarded their fervice by sharing among them the spoils of the vanquished. But this expedient, though it ferved to humble individuals, did not weaken the body of the nobility. Those who fered to his family, too troublefome, or too dangerous, the Salique laws permitted him publicly to defift from demanding vengeance; but the fame laws, in order to punish his cowardice, and want of affection to his family, deprived him of the right of fucceffion. Henault's Abregé Chronol. p. 81. Among the Anglo-Saxons, we find a fingular inftitution diftinguished by the name of fodal.tium; a voluntary affociation, the object whereof was the perfonal fecurity of those who joined in it, and which the feeblenefs of government at that time rendered neceffary. Among other regulations, which are contained in one of these fill extant, the following deferves notice : " If any affociate shall either eat or drink with a perfon who has killed any member of the fodalitium, unlefs in the prefence of the king, the bishop, or the count, and unlefs he can prove that he did not know the perfon, let him pay a great fine." were now the inftruments of their prince's vengeance, became, in a fhort time, the objects of his fear. Having acquired power and wealth by ferving the crown, they, in their turn, fet up for independence: and though there might be a fluctuation of power and of property; though old families fell, and new ones role upon their ruins; the rights of the ariftocracy remained entire, and its vigour unbroken.

II. As the administration of justice is one of the most powerful ties between a king and his fubjects, all our monarchs were at the utmost pains to circumfcribe the jurifdiction of the barons, and to extend that of the crown. The external forms of fubordination, natural to the feudal fystem, favoured this attempt. An ap-peal lay from the judges and courts of the barons to those of the king. The right, how-ever, of judging in the first instance belonged to the nobles, and they eafily found means to de-feat the effect of appeals, as well as of many other feudal regulations. The royal jurifdiction was almost confined within the narrow limits of the king's demefues, beyond which his judges claimed indeed much authority, but poffelfed next to none. Our kings were fenfible of thefe limitations, and bore them with impatience. But it was impossible to overturn in a moment what was fo deeply rooted; or to ftrip the nobles at once of privileges which they had held fo long, and which were wrought almost into the frame of the feudal conftitution. To accomplish this, however, was an object of uni-form and anxious attention to all our princes. James I. led the way here, as well as in other inftances, instances, towards a more regular and perfect police. He made choice, among the effates of parliament, of a certain number of perfons, whom he diffinguished by the name of Lords of Seffion, and appointed them to hold courts for deter-mining civil caufes three times in the year, and forty days at a time, in whatever place he pleafed to name. Their jurifdiction extended to all matters which formerly came under the cogni-zance of the king's council, and being a com-mittee of parliament, their decifions were final. James II. obtained a law, annexing all regalities, which fhould be forfeited, to the crown, and de-claring the right of jurifdiction to be unalienable for the future. James III. imposed fevere penalties upon those judges appointed by the barons, whose decisions should be found on a review to be unjuft; and, by many other regula-tions, endeavoured to extend the authority of his own court <sup>n</sup>. James IV. on pretence of remedy-ing the inconveniences arifing from the fhort terms of the court of Seffion, appointed other judges called Lords of Daily Council. The Seffion was an ambulatory court, and met feldom: the Daily Council was fixed, and fat conflantly at Edinburgh. Edinburgh; and though not composed of mem-bers of parliament, the fame powers which the Lords of Seffion enjoyed were vefted in it. At laft James V. crecked a new court that ftill fubfifts, and which he named the College of Julice, the judges or Senators of which were called Lords of Council and Selfion. This court not only exercifed the fame jurifdiction which formerly be-longed to the Seffion and Daily Council, but п Аса 26 Р. 1469. Аса 94 Р. 1493. Аса 99 Р. 1487. Е 3 пси new rights were added. Privileges of great importance were granted to its members, its forms were prefcribed, its terms fixed, and regularity, power, and fplendour conferred upon it ". The perfons conflituted judges in all these different courts had, in many respects, the advantage of those who prefided in the courts of the barons; they were more eminent for their skill in law, their rules of proceeding were more uniform, and their decifions more confiftent. Such judicatories became the objects of confidence, and of veneration. Men willingly fubmitted their property to their determination, and their encroachments on the jurifdictions of the nobles were popular, and for that reafon fuccefsful. By devices of a fimilar nature, the jurifdiction of the nobles in criminal caufes was reftrained, and the authority of the court of Jufficiary extended. The crown, in this particular, gaining infenfibly upon the nobles, recovered more ample authority; and the king, whole jurifdiction once re-fembled that of a baron rather than that of a fovereign P, came more and more to be confidered

· Keith, App. 74, &c.

P The most perfect idea of the feudal fystem of government may be attained by attending to the ftate of Germany, and to the history of France. In the former, the feudal inflitutions still fubfist with great vigoor; and though altogether abolished in the latter, the public records have been fo carefully preferved, that the French lawyers and antiquaries have been enabled, with more certainty and precision than those of any other country in Europe, to trace its rife, its progress, and revolutions. In Germany, every principality may be confidered as a fief, and all its great princes as vaffals, holding of the emperor. They posses all the feudal privileges; their fiefs are perpetual; their jurisdictions within their dered as the head of the community, and the fupreme difpenfer of juffice to his people. Thefe acquifitions of our kings, however, though comparatively great, were in reality inconfiderable; and, notwithftanding all their efforts, many of the feparate jurifdictions poffeffed by the nobles remained in great vigour, and their final abolition was referved to a diftant and more happy period.

their own territories feparate and extensive ; and the great offices of the empire are all hereditary, and annexed to particular families. At the fame time the emperor retains many of the prerogatives of the feudal monarchs. Like them, his claims and cretenfions are innumerable, and his power fmall ; his jurisdiction within his own demefnes or hereditary countries is complete; beyond the bounds of thefe it is almost nothing; and fo permanent are feudal principles, that although the feudal fystem be overturned in almost every particular state in Germany, and although the greater part of its princes have become abfolute, the original feudal constitution of the empire still remains, and ideas peculiar to that form of government direct all its operations, and determine the rights of all its princes. Our obfervations, with regard to the limited jurifdiction of kings under the feudal governments, are greatly illustrated by what happened in France. The feeblenefs and dotage of the defcendants of Charlemaigne encouraged the peers to usurp an independent jurifdiction. Nothing remained in the hands of the crown; all was feized by them. When Hugh Capet afcended the throne, A. D. 987, he kept poffeffion of his private patrimony the Conté of Paris; and all the jurifdiction which the kings his fucceffors exercised for fome time, was within its territories. There were only four towns in France where he could eftablish Grands Baillis, or royal judges; all the other lands, towns, and baillages belonged to the nobles. The methods to which the French monarchs had recourse for extending their jurifdiction, were exactly fimilar to those employed by our princes. Henault's Abregé, p. 617, &c. De l'Espit des Loix, liv. 30, ch. 20, &c.

B. I.

But befides these methods of defending their prerogative and humbling the ariftocracy, which may be confidered as common to all our princes, we shall find, by taking a review of their reigns, that almost every one of our kings, from Robert Bruce to James V. had formed fome particular fystem fordepressing the authority of their nobles, which was the object both of their jealoufy and terror. This conduct of our monarchs, if we reft fatisfied with the accounts of their hiftorians. must be confidered as flowing entirely from their refentment against particular noblemen; and all their attempts to humble them must be viewed as the fallies of private paffion, not as the confe-quences of any general plan of policy. But, though fome of their actions may be imputed to those passions, though the different genius of the men, the temper of the times, and the flate of the nation, necefiarily occafioned great variety in their fchemes; yet without being chargeable with exceflive refinement, we may affirm, that their end was uniformly the fame; and that the project of reducing the power of the ariftocracy, fometimes avowed, and purfued with vigour; fometimes concealed, or feemingly fufpended; was never altogether abandoned.

No prince was ever more indebted to his nobles than Robert Bruce. Their valour conquered the kingdom, and placed him on the throne. His gratitude and generofity befowed on them the lands of the vanquifhed. Property has feldom undergone greater or more fuddeu revolutions, than those to which it was fubject at that time in Scotland. Edward I. having forfeited feited the effates of molt of the ancient Scottifh barons, granted them to his English subjects. Thefe were expelled by the Scots, and their lands feized by new mafters. Amidit fuch rapid changes, confusion was unavoidable; and many posseffed their lands by titles extremely defec-tive. During one of those truces between the 'two nations, occafioned rather by their being weary of war than defirous of peace, Robert formed a' fcheme for checking the growing power and wealth of the nobles. He fummoned them to appear, and to fhew by what rights they held their lands. They affembled accordingly, and the queftion being put, they flarted up at once, and drew their fwords, " By thefe, faid they, we acquired our lands, and with thefe we will defend them." The king, intimidated by their boldnefs, prudently dropped the project. But fo deeply did they refent this attack upon their order, that, notwithftanding Robert's po-pular and fplendid virtues, it occafioned a dangerous confpiracy against his life.

David his fon, at first an exile in France, afterwards a prifoner in England, and involved in continual war with Edward III. had not leifure to attend to the internal police of his kingdom, or to think of retrenching the privileges of the nobility.

Our hiftorians have been more careful to relate the military than the civil transactions of the reign of Robert II. Skirmisches and inroads of little confequence they defcribe minutely; but with regard to every thing that happened during feveral years of tranquillity, they are altogether filent.

The

The feeble administration of Robert III. must likewife be passed over slightly. A prince of a mean genius, and of a frail and sickly constitution, was not a fit perfon to enter the lists with active and martial barons, or to attempt wresting from them any of their rights. The civil transactions in Scotland are better known fince the beginning of the reign of James I. and a complete feries of our laws fup-plies the defects of our historlans. The English made fome amends for their injustice in detaining that prince a prifoner, by their generous care of his education. During his long refidence in England he had an opportunity of obferving the feudal fystem in a more advanced state, and refined from many of the imperfections which ftill adhered to it in his own kingdom. He faw there nobles great, but not independent; a king powerful, though far from abfolute: he faw a regular administration of government; wife laws enacted; and a nation flourishing and happy, becaufe all ranks of men were accuftomed to obey them. Full of these ideas, he returned into his native country, which prefented to him a very different fcene. The royal authority, never great, was now contemptible, by having been fo long delegated to regents. The ancient patrimony and revenues of the crown were almost totally alienated. During his long absence the name of king was little known, and lefs regarded. The licence of many years had rendered the nobles independent. Universal anarchy prevailed. The weak were exposed to the ra-pine and oppression of the strong. In every corner some barbarous chiestain ruled at pleafure.

fure, and neither feared the king, nor pitied the people q.

James was too wife a prince to employ open force to correct fuch inveterate evils. Neither the men nor the times would have borne it. He applied the gentler and lefs offenfive remedy of laws and statutes. In a parliament held immediately after his return, he gained the confidence of his people by many wife laws, tending vifibly to re-eftablish order, tranquillity, and justice in the kingdom. But at the fame time that he endcavoured to fecure these bleffings to his fubjects, he discovered his intention to recover those poffeffions of which the crown had been unjuftly bereaved; and for that purpose obtained an act, by which he was impowered to fummon fuch as had obtained crown lands during the three laft reigns, to produce the rights by which they held them . As this statute threatened the property of the nobles, another which paffed in a fublequent parliament aimed a dreadful blow at their power. By it the leagues and combinations which we have already defcribed, and which rendered the nobles fo formidable to the crown, were declared unlawful<sup>s</sup>. Encouraged by this fucces in the beginning of his enterprise, James's next step was still bolder and more decisive.

9 A cotemporary monkish writer describes these calamites very feelingly in his rude Latin. In diebus illis, non erat lex in Scotia, sed quilibet potentiorum juniorem oppressint; et totum regnum suit unum latrocinium; homicidia, deprædationes, incendia, et cætera maleficia remanferunt impunita; et jussitia relegata extra terminos regni exulavit. 5 Act 30 P. 1424.

During

During the fitting of parliament, he feized at once his coufin Murdo duke of Albany, and his fons; the earls of Douglas, Lennox, Angus, March, and above twenty other peers and barons of prime rank. To all of them, however, he was immediately reconciled, except to Albany and his fons, and Lennox. These were tried by their peers, and condemned; for what crime is now unknown. Their execution ftruck the whole order with terror, and their forfeiture added confiderable poffeffions to the crown. He fcized likewife the earldoms of Buchan and Strathern upon different pretexts, and that of Mar fell to him by inheritance. The patience and inactivity of the nobles, while the king was proceeding fo rapidly towards aggrandizing the crown, are amazing. The only obstruction he met with was from a flight infurrection headed by the duke of Albany's youngeft fon, and that was eafily fuppreffed. The fplendour and prefence of a king, to which the great men had been long unaccustomed, infpired reverence : James was a prince of great abilities, and conducted his operations with much prudence. Hc was in friendship with England, and closely allied with the French king : he was adored by the people, who enjoyed unufual fecurity and happinefs under his administration : and all his acquisitions, however fatal to the body of the nobles, had been gained by attacks upon individuals; wcre obtained by decifions of law; and being founded on circumitances peculiar to the perfons who fuffered, might excite murmurs and apprehenfions, but afforded no colourable pretext for a general rebellion. It was not fo with the next attempt attempt which the king made. Encouraged by the facility with which he had hitherto advanced, he ventured upon a meafure that irritated the whole body of the nobility, and which the events fhew, either to have been entered into with too much precipitancy, or to have been carried on with too much violence. The father of Gcorge Dunbar earl of March had taken arms against Robert III. the king's father; but that crime had been pardoned, and his lands reftored by Robert duke of Albany. James, on pretext that the regent had exceeded his power, and that it was the prerogative of the king alone to pardon treafon, or to alienate lands annexed to the crown, obtained a fentence, declaring the pardon to be void, and depriving Dunbar of the earldom. Many of the great men held lands by no other right than what they derived from grants of the two dukes of Albany. Such a decifion, though they had reason to expect it in confequence of the flatute which the king had obtained, occafioned a general alarm. Though Dunbar was, at prefent, the only fufferer, the precedent might be extended, and their titles to poffeffions, which they confidered as the rewards of their valour, might be fubjected to the review of courts of law, whole forms of proceeding, and jurifdiction, were in a martial age little known, and extremely odious. Terror and difcontent fpread fast upon this discovery of the king's intentions; the common danger called on the whole order to unite, and to make one bold stand, before they were stripped fucceffively of their acquisitions, and reduced to a flate of poverty and infignificance. The prevalence of these sentiments VOL. I. among F

among the nobles encouraged a few defperate men, the friends or followers of those who had been the chief fufferers under the king's administration, to form a confpiracy against his life. The first uncertain intelligence of this was brought him while he lay in his camp before Roxburgh castle. He durst not confide in nobles to whom he had given fo many caufes of difguft, but inftantly difmiffed them and their vaffals, and, retiring to a monaftery near Perth, was foon after murdered there in the most cruel manner. All our historians mention with aftonishment this circumstance of the king's disbanding his army, at a time when it was to neceffary for his prefervation. A king, fay they, furrounded with his barons, is fecure from fecret treafon, and may defy open rebellion. But those very barons were the perfons whom he chiefly dreaded; and it is evident from this review of his administration, that he had greater reason to apprehend danger, than to expect defence from their hands. It was the misfortune of James, that his maxims and manners were too refined for the age in which he lived. Happy had he reigned in a kingdom more civilized ! his love of peace, of justice, and of elegance, would have rendered his schemes successful; and instead of perifhing becaufe he had attempted too much, a grateful people would have applauded and fe-conded his efforts to reform and to improve them.

Crichton, the most able man of those who had the direction of affairs during the minority of James II. had been the minister of James I. and well acquainted with his resolution of humbling the the nobility. He did not relinquish the design, and he endeavoured to infpire his pupil with the fame sentiments. But what James had attempted to effect flowly, and by legal means, his fon and Crichton purfued with the impetuofity natural to Scotfmen, and with the fierceness peculiar to that age. William the fixth earl of Douglas was the first victim to their barbarous policy. That young nobleman, (as we have already observed,) contemning the authority of an infant prince, almost openly renounced his allegiance, and aspired to independence. Crichton, too highspirited to bear fuch an infult, but too weak to curb or to bring to justice fo powerful an of-fender, decoyed him by many promifes to an interview in the caftle of Edinburgh, and, not-withstanding these, murdered both him and his brother. Crichton, however, gained little by this act of treachery, which rendered him univerfally odious. William the eighth earl of Douglas was no lefs powerful, and no lefs formidable to the crown. By forming the league which we already mentioned with the earl of Crawford and other barons, he had united against his fovereign almost one half of his kingdom. But his credulity led him into the fame Inare which had been fatal to the former earl. Relying on the king's promifes, who had now attained to the years of manhood, and having obtained a fafe-conduct under the great feal, he ventured to meet him in Stirling caftle. James urged him to diffolve that dangerous confederacy into which he had entered : the earl obftinately refufed. " If you will not," faid the enraged monarch, drawing his dagger, " this fhall ;" and F 2 ftabbed ftabbed him to the heart. An action fo unworthy of a king filled the nation with aftonifhment and with horror. The earl's vaffals ran to arms with the utmost fury, and dragging the fafe-conduct, which the king had granted and violated, at a horfe's tail, they marched towards Stirling, burnt the town, and threatened to befiege the caftle. An accommodation, however, enfued; on what terms is not known. But the king's jealoufy, and the new earl's power and refentment, prevented it from being of long continuance. Both took the field at the head of their armies, and met near Abercorn. That of the earl, composed chiefly of borderers, was far fuperior to the king's, both in number and in valour; and a fingle battle muft, in all probability, have decided whether the houfe of Stuart or of Douglas was henceforth to pollefs the throne of Scotland. But while his troops impatiently expected the fignal to engage, the earl ordered them to retire to their camp; and fir James Hamilton of Cadyow, the perfon in whom he placed the greatest confidence, convinced of his want of genius to improve an opportunity, or of his want of courage to feize a crown, deferted him that very night. This example was followed by many; and the earl, defpifed or forfaken by all, was foon driven out of the kingdom, and obliged to depend for his fubfiftence on the friendship of the king of England. The ruin of this great family, which had so long rivalled and overawed the crown, and the terror with which fuch an example of unfuccefsful ambition filled the nobles, fecured the king, for fome time, from opposition; and the royal authority remained mained uncontrolled and almost absolute. James did not fuffer this favourable interval to pass unimproved; he procured the confent of parliament to laws more advantageous to the prerogative, and more fubversive of the privileges of the ariftocracy, than were ever obtained by any former or fubfequent monarch of Scotland.

By one of thefe, not only all the vaft poffefions of the earl of Douglas were annexed to the crown, but all prior and future alienations of crown lands were declared to be void, and the king was impowered to feize them at pleafure, without any procefs or form of law, and oblige the poffeffors to refund whatever they had received from them<sup>1</sup>. A dreadful inftrument of oppreffion in the hands of a prince !

Another law prohibited the wardenship of the marches to be granted hereditarily; restrained, in several instances, the jurifdiction of that office; and extended the authority of the king's courts<sup>u</sup>.

By a third, it was enacted, that no regality, or exclutive right of administering justice within a man's own lands, should be granted, in time to come, without the confent of parliament*; a condition which implied almost an express prohibition. Those nobles who already possesses that great privilege, would naturally be folicitous to prevent it from becoming common, by being beflowed on many. Those who had not themfelves attained it, would envy others the acquisition of fuch flattering diffinction, and both would concur in rejecting the claims of new pretenders.

By a fourth act, all new grants of hereditary offices were prohibited, and those obtained fince the death of the last king were revoked <sup>y</sup>.

Each of thefe ftatutes undermined fome of the great pillars on which the power of the ariftocracy refted. During the remainder of his reign, this prince purfued the plan which he had begun with the utmost vigour; and had not a fudden death, occasioned by the fplinter of a cannon which burft near him at the fiege of Roxburgh, prevented his progress, he wanted neither genius nor courage to perfect it; and Scotland might, in all probability, have been the first kingdom in Europe which would have feen the fubversion of the feudal fystem.

James III. difcovered no lefs eagernefs than his father or grandfather to humble the nobility; but, far inferior to either of them in abilities and addrefs, he adopted a plan extremely impolitic, and his reign was difastrous, as well as his end tragical. Under the feudal governments, the nobles were not only the king's ministers, and poffeffed of all the great offices of power or of truft; they were likewife his companions and favourites, and hardly any but them approached his perfon, or were intitled to his regard. But James, who both feared and hated his nobles, kept them at an unufual diftance, and bestowed every mark of confidence and affection upon a few mean perfons, of profeffions fo difhonourable as ought to have rendered them unworthy of his prefence. Shut up with thefe in his caftle of Stirling, he feldom appeared in public, and amufed himfelf in architecture, mufie, and other arts,

arts, which were then little efteemed. The nobles beheld the power and favour of thefe minions with indignation. Even the fanguinary measures of his father provoked them less than his neglect. Individuals alone fuffered by the former; by the latter, every man thought him-felf injured, becaufe all were contemned. Their difcontent was much heightened by the king's recalling all rights to crown lands, hereditary offices, regalities, and every other concession which was detrimental to his prerogative, and which had been extorted during his minority. Combinations among themfelves, fecret intrigues with England, and all the usual preparatives for civil war, were the effects of their refentment. Alexander duke of Albany, and John earl of Mar, the king's brothers, two young men of turbulent and ambitious spirits, and incensed against James, who treated them with the fame coldness as he did the other great men, entered deeply into all their cabals. The king detected their defigns before they were ripe for execution, and, feizing his two brothers, committed the duke of Albany to Edinburgh caftle. The earl of Mar, having remonstrated with too much boldnefs against the king's conduct, was murdered, if we may believe our hiftorians, by his command. Albany, apprehenfive of the fame fate, made his escape out of the castle, and fled into France. Concern for the king's honour, or indignation at his measures, were perhaps the motives which first induced him to join the malecontents. But James's attachment to favourites rendering him every day more odious to the nobles, the profpect of the advantages which might be derived from their

their general difaffection, added to the refentment which he felt on account of his brother's dcath, and his own injuries, foon infpired Al-bany with more ambitious and criminal thoughts. He concluded a treaty with Edward IV. of England, in which he affumed the name of Alexander king of Scots; and in return for the affiftance which was promifed him towards dethroning his brother, he bound himfelf, as foon as he was put in poffeffion of the kingdom, to fwear fealty and do homage to the English monarch, to renounce the ancient alliance with France, to contract a new one with England, and to furrender fome of the ftrongeft caffles and most valuable counties in Scotland z. That aid, which the duke fo bafely purchased at the price of his own honour and the independence of his country, was punctually granted him, and the duke of Gloucester with a powerful army conducted him towards Scotland. The danger of a foreign invalion obliged James to implore the affiftance of those nobles whom he had fo long treated with con-tempt. Some of them were in clofe confederacy with the duke of Albany, and approved of all his pretenfions. Others were impatient for any event which would reftore their order to its ancient pre-eminence. They feemed, however, to enter with zeal into the measures of their fovereign for the defence of the kingdom against its invaders<sup>a</sup>, and took the field at the head of a powerful army of their followers, but with a Itronger difposition to redress their own gricvances, than to annoy the enemy; and with a fixed refolution of punishing those minions, whose infolence they could no longer tolerate. This refolution they executed in the camp near Lauder, with a military difpatch and rigour. Having previoully concerted their plan, the earls of Angus, Huntly, Lennox, followed by almost all the barons of chief note in the army, forcibly entered the apartment of their fovereign, feized all his favourites except one Ramfay, whom they could not tear from the king, in whofe arms he took shelter, and, without any form of trial, hanged them inftantly over a bridge. Among the most remarkable of those who had engroffed the king's affection, were Cochran a mafon, Hommil a taylor, Leonard a fmith, Rogers a musician, and Torsifan a fencing-master. So defpicable a retinue discovers the capriciousness of James's character, and accounts for the indignation of the nobles, when they beheld the favour due to them, beftowed on fuch unworthy objects. James had no reafon to confide in an army fo little under his command, and, difmiffing it, fhut himfelf up in the caftle of Edinburgh. After various intrigues, Albany's lands and hononrs were at length reftored to him, and he feemed even to have regained his brother's favour by fome important fervices. But their friendship was not of long duration. James abandoned himfelf once more to the guidance of favourites; and the fate of those who had fuffered at Lauder did not deter others from courting that dangerous pre-eminence. Albany, on pretext that an attempt had been made to take away his life by poifon, fled from court, and, retiring to his caftle at Dunbar, drew thither a greater number of barons barons than attended on the king himfelf. At the fame time he renewed his former confederacy with Edward; the earl of Angus openly nego-tiated that infamous treaty; other barons were ready to concur with it; and if the fudden death of Edward had not prevented Albany's receiving any aid from England, the crown of Scotland would probably have been the reward of this unworthy combination with the enemies of his country. But, inftead of any hopes of reigning in Scotland, he found, upon the death of Edward, that he could not refide there in fafety; and flying first to England, and then to France, he seems from that time to have taken no part in the affairs of his native country. Emboldened by his retreat, the king and his ministers multiplied the infults which they offered to the nobility. A ftanding guard, a thing unknown under the feudal governments, and in-confiftent with the familiarity and confidence with which monarchs then lived amidst their nobles, was raifed for the king's defence, and the command of it given to Ramfay, lately created earl of Bothwell, the fame perfon who had fo narrowly efcaped when his companions were put to death at Lauder. As if this pre-caution had not been fufficient, a proclamation was iffued, forbidding any perfon to appear in arms within the precincts of the court<sup>b</sup>; which, at a time when no man of rank left his own house without a numerous retinue of armed followers, was, in effect, debarring the nobles from all accefs to the king. James, at the fame time, became fonder of retirement than ever, and, funk in indolence or fuperstition, or attentive only to amufements, devolved his whole autho-rity upon his favourites. So many injuries provoked the most confiderable nobles to take arms, and having perfuaded or obliged the duke of Rothefay, the king's cldeft fon, a youth of fifteen, to fet himfelf at their head, they openly declared their intention of depriving James of a crown of which he had discovered himself to be fo unworthy. Roufed by this danger, the king quitted his retirement, took the field, and encountered them near Bannockburn; but the valour of the borderers, of whom the army of the malecontents was chiefly composed, foon put his troops to flight, and he himfelf was flain in the purfuit. Sufpicion, indolence, immoderate attachment to favourites, and all the vices of a feeble mind, are visible in his whole conduct; but the character of a cruel and unrelenting tyrant feems to be unjustly affixed to him by our historians. His neglect of the nobles irritated, but did not weaken them; and their difcontent, the immoderate ambition of his two brothers, and their unnatural confederacics with England, were fufficient to have difturbed a more vigorous administration, and to have rendered a prince of fuperior talents unhappy. The indignation which many perfons of rank expressed against the conduct of the confpirators, together with the terror of the fentence of excommunication which the Pope pronounced against them, obliged them to use their victory with great moderation and humanity. Being confcious how detestable the crime of imbruing their hands in the blood of their fovereign appeared, peared, they endeavoured to regain the good opinion of their countrymen, and to atone for the treatment of the father, by their loyalty and duty towards the fon. They placed him inftantly on the throne, and the whole kingdom foon united in acknowledging his authority.

James IV. was naturally generous and brave ; he felt, in an high degree, all the paffions which animate a young and noble mind. He loved magnificence, he delighted in war, and was eager to obtain fame. During his reign, the ancient and hereditary cnmity between the king and nobles feems almost entirely to have ceased. He envicd not their fplendor, becaufe it contributed to the ornament of his court; nor did hc dread their power, which he confidered as the fecurity of his kingdom, not as an object of terror to himfelf. This confidence on his part met with the proper return of duty and affection on theirs; and in his war with England, he experienced how much a king, beloved by his nobles, is able to perform. Though the ardour of his courage, and the fpirit of chivalry, rather than the profpect of any national advantage, induced him to declare war against England, fuch was the zeal of his fubjects for the king's glory, that he was followed by as gallant an army as ever any of his anceftors had led upon English ground. But though James himfelf formed no fcheme dangerous or detrimental to the ariftocracy, his reign was diffinguished by an event extremely fatal to it; and one accidental blow humbled it more than all the premeditated attacks of preceding kings. In the rafh and unfortunate battle of Flowden, a brave nobility chofe rather to die than than to defert their fovereign. Twelve earls, thirteen lords, five eldeft fons of noblemen, and an incredible number of barons, fell with the king <sup>c</sup>. The whole body of the nobles long and fenlibly felt this difafter; and if a prince of full age had then afcended the throne, their confternation and feeblenefs would have afforded him advantages which no former monarch ever poffeffed.

But James V. who fucceeded his father, was an infant of a year old; and though the office of regent was conferred upon his coufin the duke of Albany, a man of genius and enterprife, a native of France, and accustomed to a government where the power of the king was already great; though he made many bold attempts to extend the royal authority; though he put to death lord Home, and banished the earl of Angus, the two noblemen of greateft influence in the kingdom, the ariftocracy loft no ground under his administration. A stranger to the manners, the laws, and the language of the people whom he was called to rule, he acted, on fome occafions, rather like a viceroy of the French king than the governor of Scotland; but the nobles afferted their own privileges, and contended for the interest of their country, with a holdnefs which convinced him of their independence, and of the impotence of his own authority. After feveral unfuccefsful ftruggles, he voluntarily re-tired to France; and the king being then in his thirteenth year, the nobles agreed that he fhould affume the government, and that eight perfons should be appointed to attend him by turns, and

He gained fome of his colleagues, removed others, and intimidated the reft. When the term of his attendance expired, he still retained authority, to which all were obliged to fubmit, becaufe none of them was in a condition to difpute it. The affection of the young king was the only thing wanting to fix and perpetuate his power. But an active and high-fpirited prince fubmitted, with great impatience, to the reftraint in which he was kept. It ill fuited his years or difposition to be confined as a prifoner within his own palace; to be treated with no refpect, and to be deprived of all power. He could not, on fome occafions, conceal his refentment and indignation. Angus forefaw that he had much to dread from thefe; and as he could not gain the king's heart, he refolved to make fure of his perfon. James was continually furrounded by the earl's fpies and confidents; many eyes watched all his motions, and obferved every flep he took. But the king's

the caffle of Stirling, the refidence of the queen his mother, and the only place of ftrength in the kingdom which was not in the hand of the Douglafes. The nobles, of whom fome were influenced by their hatred to Angus, and others by their refpect for the king, crowded to Stirling, and his court was foon filled with perfons of the greatest diffinction. The earl, though astonished at this unexpected revolution, refolved at

at first to make one bold push for recovering his authority, by marching to Stirling at the head of his followers; but he wanted either courage or strength to execute this refolution. attainted, and after cleaping from many dangers, and enduring much mifery, he was at length ob-liged to fly into England for refuge. James had now not only the name, but, though extremely young, the full authority of a king. He was inferior to no prince of that age in gracefulnefs of perfon, or in vigour of mind. His underftanding was good, and his heart warm; the former capable of great improve-ment, and the latter fuffertible of the beft imment, and the latter fusceptible of the best impreffions. But, according to the usual fate of princes who are called to the throne in their infancy, his education had been neglected. His private preceptors were more ready to flatter than to inftruct him. It was the interest of those who governed the kingdom to prevent him from knowing too much. The earl of Angus, in order to divert him from bufinefs, gave him an early tafte for fuch pleafures as afterwards occupied and engroffed him more than became a king. Accordingly, we difcover in James all the features of a great but uncultivated spirit. On the one hand, violent paffions, implacable refentment, an immoderate defire of power, and the utmost rage at difappointment. On the other, love to his people, zeal for the punifh-ment of private oppreffors, confidence in his fa-vourites, and the most engaging openness and affability of behaviour.

What

What he himfelf had fuffered from the exorbitant power of the nobles, led him early to imitate his predeceffors in their attempts to humble them. The plan he formed for that purpose was more profound, more fystematic, and purfued with greater conflancy and fleadinefs, than that of any of his anceftors; and the influence of the events in his reign upon those of the fubfequent period render it neceffary to explain his conduct at greater length, and to enter into a more minute detail of his actions. He had penetration enough to difcover those defects in the fchemes adopted by former kings which occafioned their miscarriage. The example of James I. had taught him, that wife laws operate flowly on a rude people, and that the fierce fpirit of the feudal nobles was not to be fubdued by thefe alone. The effects of the violent measures of James II. convinced him, that the oppreffion of one great family is apt either to excite the fufpicion and refentment of the other nobles, or to enrich with its fpoils fome new family, which would foon adopt the fame fentiments, and become equally formidable to the crown. He faw, from the fatal end of James III. that neglect was still more intolerable to the nobles than oppreffion, and that the ministry of new men and favourites was both difhonourable and dangerous to a prince. At the fame time, he felt that the authority of the crown was not fufficient to counterbalance the power of the ariftocracy, and that without fome new acceffion of thrength, he could expect no better fuccefs in the struggle than his ancestors. In this extremity he applied himfelf to the clergy, hoping that that they would both relifh his plan, and concur, with all their influence, in enabling him to put it in execution. Under the feudal government the church, being reckoned a third eftate, had its representatives in parliament; the number of thefe was confiderable, and they poffeffed great influence in that affembly. The superstition of former kings, and the zeal of many ages of ig-norance, had bestowed on ecclesiastics a great proportion of the national wealth; and the authority which they acquired by the reverence of the people, was fuperior even to that which they derived from their riches. This powerful body, however, depended entirely on the crown. The popes, notwithstanding their attention to extend their usurpations, had neglected Scotland as a diftant and poor kingdom, and permitted its kings to exercife powers which they difputed with more confiderable princes. The Scottifh monarchs had the fole right of nomination to vacant bishoprics and abbeysd; and James naturally concluded, that men who expected preferment from his favour, would be willing to merit it by promoting his defigns. Happily for him, the nobles had not yet recovered the blow which fell on their order at Flowden; and if we may judge either from their conduct, or from the character given of them by fir Ralph Sadler, the English envoy in Scotland, they were men of little genius, of no experience in bufinefs, and incapable of acting either with unanimity or with vigour. Many of the clergy, on the other hand, were diftinguished by their great abilities, and no less by their ambition. Various causes of difgust fubfifted between them and the martial nobles, who were apt to view the pacific character of ecclefiaftics with fome degree of contempt, and who envied their power and wealth. By acting in concert with the king, they not only would gratify him, but avenge themfelves, and hoped to aggrandize their own order, by depreffing thofe who were their fole rivals. Secure of fo powerful a concurrence, James ventured to proceed with greater boldnefs. In the first heat of refentment, he had driven the earl of Angus out of the kingdom; and, fenfible that a perfon fo far fuperior to the other nobles in abilities might create many obftacles which would retard or render ineffectual all its fchemes, he folennly fwore, that he would never permit him to return into Scotland; and, notwithstanding the repeated folicitations of the king of England, he adhered to his vow with unrelenting obfinacy. He then proceeded to repair the fortifications of Edinburgh, Stirling, and other caftles, and to fill his magazines with arms and ammunition. Having taken these precautions by way of defence, he began to treat the nobility with the utmost cold-nels and referve. Those offices, which they were apt from long poffeffion to confider as appropriated to their order, were now bestowed on ecclesiaftics, who alone poffeffed the king's ear, and, together with a few gentlemen of inferior rank, to whom he had communicated his fchemes, were intrusted with the management of all public affairs. Thefe ministers were chosen with judg-ment; and cardinal Beatoun, who foon became the most cminent among them, was a man of fuperior genius. They ferved the king with tidelity, fidelity, they carried on his meafures with vigour, with reputation, and with fuccefs. James no longer concealed his diftruft of the nobles, and fuffered no opportunity of mortifying them to escape. Slight offences were aggravated into real crimes, and punished with feverity. Every accufation against perfons of rank was heard with pleafure, every appearance of guilt was examined with rigour, and every trial proved fatal to those who were accufed: the banishing Hepburn earl of Bothwell for reafons extremely frivolous, beheading the eldeft fon of lord Forbes without fufficient evidence of his guilt, and the condemning lady Glamis, a fifter of the earl of Angus, to be burnt for the crime of witchcraft, of which even that credulous age believed her innocent, are monuments both of the king's hatred of the nobility, of the feverity of his government, and of the ftretches he made towards abfolute power. By these acts of authority, he tried the spirit of the nobles, and how much they were willing to bear. Their patience increased his contempt for them, and added to the ardour and boldnefs with which he purfued his plan. Meanwhile they observed the tendency of his schemes with concern, and with refentment; but the king's fagacity, the vigilance of his ministers, and the want of a proper leader, made it dangerous to concert any measures for their defence, and impoffible to act with becoming vigour. James and his counfellors, by a falfe ftep which they took, prefented to them, at length, an advantage which they did not fail to improve.

Motives, which are well known, had prompted Henry VIII. to difclaim the pope's authority, and

and to feize the revenues of the regular clergy. His fystem of reformation satisfied none of his fubjects. Some were cnraged becaufe he had proceeded fo far, others murmured becaufe he proceeded no farther. By his imperious temper, and alternate perfecutions of the zealots for popery, and the converts to the protestant opinions, he was equally formidable to both. Henry was afraid that this general diffatisfaction of his pcople might encourage his enemies on the con-tinent to invade his kingdom. He knew that both the pope and the emperor courted the friendship of the king of Scots, and endeavoured to engage him in an alliance against England. He refolved, therefore, to disappoint the effects of their negociations, by entering into a clofer union with his nephew. In order to accomplifin this, he transmitted to James an elaborate me-morial, prefenting the numerous encroachments of the fee of Rome upon the rights of fove-reigns<sup>c</sup>; and that he might induce him more certainly to adopt the fame measures for abolish-ing papal usurpation, which had proved fo effi-cacious in England, he fent ambassfadors into Scotland to propole a perfonal interview with him at York. It was plainly James's intereft to accept this invitation; the affiftance of fo power-ful an ally, the high honours which were pro-mifed him, and the liberal fubfidies he might have obtained, would have added no little dignity to his domeftic government, and muft have greatly facilitated the execution of his favourite plan. On the other hand, a war with England, which he had reafon to apprehend if he rejected

Henry's offers of friendship, was inconfistent with all his views. This would bring him to depend on his barons; an army could not be raifed without their affistance : to call nobles incenfed against their prince into the field, was to unite his enemies, to make them fenfible of their own strength, and to afford them an opportunity of revenging their wrongs. James, who was not ignorant that all these confequences might follow a breach with England, liftened at first to Henry's propofal, and confented to the interview at York. But the clergy dreaded an union, which must have been established on the ruins of the church. Henry had taken great pains to infuse into his nephew his own fentiments concerning religion, and had frequently folicited him by ambaffadors to renounce the usurped dominion of the pope, which was no lefs diffionourable to princes than grievous to their fubjects. The clergy had hitherto, with great addrefs, di-verted the king from regarding these folicitations. But, in an amicable conference, Henry expected, and they feared, that James would yield to his intreaties, or be convinced by his arguments. They knew that the revenues of the church were an alluring object to a prince who wanted money, and who loved it; that the pride and ambition of ecclefiaftics raifed the indignation of the nobles; that their indecent lives gave offence to the people; that the protestant opinions were fpreading fast throughout the nation; and that an universal defection from the eftablifhed church would be the confequence of giv-ing the fmalleft degree of encouragement to these principles. For these reasons, they employed

ployed all their credit with the king, and had recourfe to every artifice and infinuation, in order to divert him from a journey, which must have been fo fatal to their intereft. They endeavoured to infpire him with fear, by magnifying the danger to which he would expose his perfon, by venturing fo far into England, without any fecurity but the word of a prince, who, having violated every thing venerable and facred in religion, was no longer to be trufted; and by way of compensation for the sums which he might have received from Henry, they offered an annual donative of fifty thousand crowns; they promised to contribute liberally towards carrying on a war with England, and flattered him with the prospect of immense riches, arising from the forfeiture of perfons who were to be tried and condemned as heretics. Influenced by these confiderations, James broke his agreement with Henry, who, in expectation of meeting him, had already come to York; and that haughty and impatient monarch refented the affront, by de-claring war against Scotland. His army was foon ready to invade the kingdom. James was obliged to have recourfe to the nobles for the defence of liis dominions. At his command they affembled their followers; but with the fame difpolitions which had animated their anceftors in the reign of James III. and with a full refolution of imitating their example, by punifh-ing those to whom they imputed the grievances of which they had reason to complain; and if the king's ministers had not been men of abili-ties superior to those of James III. and of confiderable intereft even with their enemies, who could

could not agree among themfelves what victims to facrifice, the camp of Fala would have been as remarkable as that of Lauder, for the daring encroachments of the nobility on the prerogative of the prince. But though his ministers were faved by this accident, the nobles had foon another opportunity of difcovering to the king their diffatisfaction with his government, and their contempt of his authority. Scarcity of provisions, and the rigour of the fcafon, having obliged the English army, which had invaded Scotland, to retire, James imagined that he could attack them with great advantage in their retreat; but the principal barons, with an obstinacy and difdain which greatly aggravated their difobedience, refufed to advance a ftep beyond the limits of their own country. Provoked by this infult to himfelf, and fufpicious of a new confpiracy against his ministers, the king inftantly difbanded an army which paid fo little regard to his orders, and returned abruptly into the heart of the kingdom.

An ambitious and high-fpirited prince could not brook fuch a mortifying affront. His hopes of fuccefs had been rafh, and his defpair upon a difappointment was exceffive. He felt himfelf engaged in an unneceffary war with England, which, inftead of yielding him the laurels and triumphs that he expected, had begun with fuch circumftances as encouraged the infolence of his fubjects, and expofed him to the foorn of his enemies. He faw how vain and ineffectual all his projects to humble the nobles had been, and that, though in times of peace a prince may endeavour to deprefs them, they will rife during war to their former importance and dignity. Impatience, refentment, indignation, filled his bofom by turns. The violence of these paffions altered his temper, and, perhaps, impaired his reason. He became pensive, fullen, and retired. He feemed through the day to be fwallowed up in profound meditation, and through the night he was diffurbed with those visionary terrors which make imprefiion upon a weak understanding only, or a difordered fancy. In order to revive the king's fpirits, an inroad on the wettern borders was concerted by his minifters, who pre-vailed upon the barons in the neighbouring provinces to raife as many troops as were thought neceflary, and to enter the enemy's country. But nothing could remove the king's averfion to his nobility, or diminifh his jealoufy of their power. He would not even intruft them with the command of the forces which they had affembled; that was referved for Oliver Sinclair his favourite, who no fooner appeared to take poffeffion of the dignity conferred upon him, than rage and indignation occafioned an univerfal mutiny in the army. Five hundred Englifh, who happened to be drawn up in fight, attacked the Scots in this diforder. Hatred to the king, and contempt of their general, produced an ef-fect to which there is no parallel in hiftory. They overcame the fear of death, and the love of liberty; and ten thousand men fled, before a number fo far inferior, without striking a single blow. No man was defirous of a victory, which would have been acceptable to the king and to his favourite; few endeavoured to fave themfelves by flight; the English had the choice of what prifoners 3 prifoners they pleafed to take; and almost every perfon of diftinction, who was engaged in the expedition, remained in their hands f. This aftonifhing event was a new proof to the king of the general difaffection of the nobility, and a new difcovery of his own weaknefs and want of authority. Incapable of bearing thefe repeated infults, he found himfelf unable to revenge them. The deepest melancholy and despair succeeded to the furious transports of rage, which the first account of the rout of his army occafioned. All the violent paffions, which are the enemies of life, preyed upon his mind, and wafted and con-fumed a youthful and vigorous conftitution. Some authors of that age impute his untimely death to poifon; but the difeafes of the mind, when they rife to an height, are often mortal; and the known effects of difappointment, anger, and refentment, upon a fanguine and impetuous temper, fufficiently account for his unhappy fate. " His death (fays Drummond) proveth his mind to have been raifed to an high strain, and above mediocrity; he could die, but could not digeft a difafter." Had James furvived this misfortune, one of two things must have happened : either the violence of his temper would have engaged him openly to attack the nobles, who would have found in Henry a willing and powerful protector, and have derived the fame affistance from him which the malecontents, in f According to an account of this event in the Hamilton MSS. about thirty were killed, above a thouland were taken prifoners, and among them a hundred and fixty perfons of condition. Vol. ii. 286. The fmall number of the English prevented their taking more prifoners.

the fucceeding reign, did from his daughter Elizabeth; in that cafe, a dangerous civil war mult have been the certain confequence. Or, perhaps, neceffity might have obliged him to accept of Henry's offers, and be reconciled to his nobility. In that event the church would have fallen a facrifice to their union; a reformation, upon Henry's plan, would have been eftablifhed by law; a great part of the temporalties of the church would have been feized; and the friendfhip of the king and barons would have been comented by dividing its fpoils.

Such were the efforts of our kings towards reducing the exorbitant power of the nobles. If they were not attended with fuccefs, we muft not, for that reafon, conclude that they were not conducted with prudence. Every circumftance feems to have combined againft the crown. Accidental events concurred with political caufes in rendering the beft-concerted mcafures abortive. The affaffination of one king, the fudden death of another, and the fatal defpair of a third, contributed no lefs than its own natural ftrength to preferve the ariftocracy from ruin.

Amidît thefe ftruggles, the influence which our kings poffeffed in their parliaments is a circumftance feemingly inexplicable, and which merits particular attention. As thefe affemblies were composed chiefly of the nobles, they, we are apt to imagine, must have dictated all their decifions; but, inflead of this, every king found them obfequious to his will, and obtained fuch laws as he deemed neceffary for extending his authority. All things were conducted there with difpatch and unanimity; and, in none of our hilto-historians, do we find an inflance of any opposition formed against the court in parliament, or mention of any difficulty in carrying through the measures which were agreeable to the king. In order to account for this singular fact, it is neceffary to inquire into the origin and constitution of parliament.

The genius of the feudal government, uniform in all its operations, produced the fame effects in fmall as in great focieties; and the territory of a baron was, in miniature, the model of a kingdom. He possessed the right of jurisdiction, but thofe who depended on him being free men, and not flaves, could be tried by their peers only; and, therefore, his vaffals were bound to attend his courts, and to affift both in paffing and executing his fentences. When affembled on thefe occafions, they established, by mutual confent, fuch regulations as tended to the welfare of their fmall fociety; and often granted, voluntarily, fuch fupplies to their fuperior, as his neceffities required. Change now a fingle name; in place of baron, fubfitute king, and we behold a parliament in its first rudiments, and observe the first exertions of those powers, which its members now poffers as judges, as legislators, and as difpenfers of the public revenues. Suitable to this idea are the appellations of the King's Court g, and of the King's Great Council, by which parliaments were anciently diftinguished; and fuitable to this, likewife, were the conflituent members of which it was composed. In all the feudal kingdoms, fuch as held of the king in chief were bound, by the condition of their tenure, to attend and to affift in his courts. Nor was this esteemed a privilege, but a fervice h. It was exacted likewife of bishops, abbots, and the greater ecclefiaftics, who, holding vaft poffeffions of the crown, were deemed subject to the same burden. Parliaments did not continue long in this flate. Cities gradually acquired wealth, a confiderable fhare of the public taxes were levied on them, the inhabitants grew into estimation, and, being enfranchifed by the fovereign, a place in parliament was the confequence of their liberty, and of their importance. But as it would have been abfurd to confer fuch a privilege, or to impofe fuch a burden on a whole community, every borough was permitted to chufe one or two of its citizens to appear in the name of the corporation ; and the idea of representation was first introduced in this manner. An innovation, still more important, naturally followed. The vasials of the crown were originally few in number, and extremely powerful; but as it is impoffible to render property fixed and permanent, many of their poffeflions came gradually, and by various methods of alienation, to be fplit and parcelled out into different hands. Hence arofe the diftinction between the Greater and the Leffer Barons. The former were those who retained their original fiefs undivided, the latter were the new and less potent vaffals of the crown. Both were bound, however, to perform all feudal fervices, and of confequence to give attendance in parliament. To the leffer barons, who formed no inconfiderable body, this was an intolerable grievance. Barons fometimes denied their tenure. boroughs renounced their right of electing, charters were obtained containing an exemption from attendance; and the anxiety with which our anceftors endeavoured to get free from the obligation of fitting in parliament, is furpaffed by that. only with which their posterity folicit to be admitted there. In order to accommodate both parties at once, to fecure to the king a fufficient number of members in his great council, and to fave his vaffals from an unneceffary burden, an eafy expedient was found out. The obligation to perforal attendance was continued upon the greater barons, from which the leffer barons were exempted, on condition of their electing in each county a certain number of representatives, to appear in their name. Thus a parliament became complete in all its members, and was composed of lords spiritual and temporal, of knights of the fhires, and of burgeffes. As many caufes contributed to bring government earlier to perfection in England than in Scotland; as the rigour of the feudal inflitutions abated fooner, and its defects were fupplied with greater facility in the one kingdom than in the other; England led the way in all thefe changes, and burgeffes and knights of the fhire appeared in the parliaments of that nation, before they were heard of in ours. Burgeffes were first admitted into the Scottish parliaments by Robert Bruce 1 [A. D. 1326]; and in the preamble to the laws of Robert III. they are ranked among the constituent members of that affembly. The leffer barons were indebted to James I. for a flatute exempting them from perfonal attendance, and permitting them to elect reprefentatives [A.D. 1427]: the exemption was eagerly laid hold on; but the privilege was fo little valued, that, except in one or two inflances, it lay neglected during one hundred and fixty years; and James VI. first obliged them to fend reprefentatives regularly to parliament <sup>k</sup>.

A Scottifh parliament, then, confifted anciently of great barons, of ecclefiaftics, and a few reprefentatives of boroughs. Nor were thefe divided, as in England, into two houfes, but compofed one affembly, in which the lord chancellor prefided<sup>1</sup>. In rude ages, when the fcience of government was extremely imperfect among a martial people, unacquainted with the arts of peace, ftrangers to the talents which make a figure in debate, and defpifing them, parliaments were not held in the fame effimation as at prefent; nor

D. 1327, it is provided, "that out of the commission of all the fhires shall be chosen a wife and expert man, called the common speaker of the parliament, who shall propose all and fundry needs and causes pertaining to the commons in the parliament or general council." No fuch speaker, it would feem, was ever chosen; and by a fubfequent law the changellor was declared perpetual prefident of parliament.

did haughty barons love those courts in which they appeared with fuch evident marks of inferiority. Parliaments were often haftily af-fembled, and it was, probably, in the king's power, by the manner in which he iffued his writs for that purpole, to exclude fuch as were averle from his measures. At a time when deeds of violence were common, and the reftraints of law and decency were little regarded, no man could venture with fafety to oppose the king in his own court. The great barons, or lords of parlia-ment, were extremely few; even fo late as the beginning of the reign of James VI.<sup>m</sup> they amounted only to fifty-three. The ecclefiaftics equalled them in number, and being devoted implicitly to the crown, for reafons which have been already explained, rendered all hopes of victory in any ftruggle defperate. Nor were the nobles themfelves fo anxious as might be imagined to prevent acts of parliament favourable to the royal prerogative; confcious of their own ftrength, and of the king's inability to carry thefe acts into execution without their concurrence, they trufted that they might either elude or venture to contemn them; and the statute revoking the king's property, and annexing alien-ated jurifdictions to the crown, repeated in every reign, and violated and despifed as often, is a ftanding proof of the impotence of laws when opposed to power. So many concurring causes are fufficient, perhaps, to account for the afcendant which our kings acquired in parliament. But, without having recourse to any of these, a fingle circumftance, peculiar to the conftitution of the Scottifh parliament, the mentioning of which we have hitherto avoided, will abundantly explain this fact, feemingly fo repugnant to all our reafonings concerning the weakness of the king, and the power of the nobles.

As far back as our records enable us to trace the conftitution of our parliaments, we find a committee diftinguished by the name of Lords of Articles. It was their bufinefs to prepare and to digeft all matters which were to be laid before the parliament. There was rarely any bufinefs introduced into parliament, but what had paffed through the channel of this committee; every motion for a new law was first made there, and approved of, or rejected by the members of it; what they approved was formed into a bill, and prefented to parliament; and it feems probable, that what they rejected could not be introduced into the house. This committee owed the extraordinary powers vefted in it to the military genius of the ancient nobles; too impatient to fubmit to the drudgery of civil bufinefs, too impetuous to obferve the forms, or to enter into the details, neceffary in conducting it, they were glad to lay that burden upon a fmall number, while they themfelves had no other labour than fimply to give, or to refuse, their affent to the bills which were prefented to them. The lords of articles, then, not only directed all the proceedings of parliament, but possessed a negative before de-bate. That committee was chosen and constituted in fuch a manner, as put this valuable pri-vilege entirely in the king's hands. It is extremely tremely probable, that our kings once had the fole right of nominating the lords of articles <sup>n</sup>. They came afterwards to be elected by the parliament, and confifted of an equal number out of each eftate, and most commonly of eight temporal and eight fpiritual lords, of eight reprefentatives of boroughs, and of the eight great officers of the crown. Of this body, the eight ecclefiaftics, together with the officers of the crown, were entirely at the king's devotion, and it was fearcely poffible that the choice could fall on fuch temporal lords and burgeffes as would unite in oppofition to his measures. Capable either of influencing their election, or of gaining them when n It appears from authentic records, that a parliament was appointed to be held March 12, 1566, and that the lords of articles were chosen and met on the 7th, five days before the affembling of parliament. If they could be regularly elected fo long before the meeting of parliament, it is natural to conclude, that the prince alone poffeffed the right of electing them. There are two different accounts of the manner of their election at that time, one by Mary herfelf, in a letter to the archbifhop of Glafgow: "We, accompanied with our nobility " for the time, paft to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, for " holding of our parliament on the 7th day of this inftant, " and elected the lords articulars." If we explain these words, according to the strict grammar, we must conclude that the queen herfelf elected them. It is, however, more probable that Mary meant to fay, that the nobles then prefent with her, viz. her privy counfellors, and others, elected the lords of articles. Keith's Hift. of Scotland, p. 331. The other account is Lord Ruthven's, who expressly affirms that the queen herfelf elected them. Keith's Append. 126. Whether we embrace the one or the other of these opinions is of no confequence. If the privy counfellors and nobles attending the court had a right to elect the lords of articles, it was equally advantageous for the crown, as if the prince had had the fole nomination of them.

elected, the king commonly found the lords of articles no lefs obfequious to his will than his own privy council, and, by means of his authority with them, he could put a negative upon his parliament before debate, as well as after it ; and what may feem altogether incredible, the moft limited prince in Europe actually poffeffed, in one inftance, a prerogative which the moft abfolute could never attain °.

<sup>o</sup> Having deduced the hiftory of the committee of lords of articles as low as the fubject of this preliminary book required, it may be agreeable, perhaps, to fome of my readers, to know the fublequent variations in this fingular institution, and the political use which our kings made of these. When parliaments became more numerous, and more confiderable by the admission of the representatives of the lesser barons, the preferving their influence over the lords of articles became likewife an object of greater importance to our kings. James VI. on pretence that the lords of articles could not find leifure to confider the great multitude of affairs laid before them, obtained an act, appointing four perfons to be named out of each effate, who should meet twenty days before the commencement of parliament [Act 222. P. 1594], to receive all fupplications, &c. and rejecting what they thought frivolous, should engross in a book what they thought worthy the attention of the lords of articles. No provision is made in the act for the choice of this felect body, and the king would of courfe have claimed that privilege. In 1633, when Charles I. was beginning to introduce those innovations which gave fo much offence to the nation, he dreaded the opposition of his parliament, and in order to prevent that, an artifice was made use of to secure the lords of articles for the crown. The temporal peers were appointed to choose eight bishops, and the bishops eight peers; these fixteen met together, and elected eight knights of the fhire, and eight burgeffes, and to thefe the crown officers were added as usual. If we can only suppose eight perfons of fo numerous a body, as the peers of Scotland

To this account of the internal confitution of Scotland, it will not be improper to add a view of the political flate of Europe at that period, where the following hiftory commences. A thorough knowledge of that general fyftem, of which every kingdom in Europe forms a part, is not lefs requilite towards underflanding the hiftory of a nation, than an acquaintance with its peculiar government and laws. The latter may enable us to comprehend domeflic occurrences and revolutions; but without the former, foreign tranfac-

Scotland were become by that time, attached to the court, thefe, it is obvious, would be the men whom the bifhops would choofe, and of confequence the whole lords of articles were the tools and creatures of the king. This practice, fo inconfistent with liberty, was abolished during the civil war ; and the statute of James VI. was repealed. After the 1eftoration, parliaments became more fervile than ever. What was only a temporary device in the reign of Charles I. was then converted into a ftanding law. " For my part," fays the Author from whom I have borrowed many of these particulars, " I should have thought it less criminal in our re-" ftoration pariament to have openly beltowed upon the " king a negative before debate, than, in fuch an underhand " artificial manner, to betray their conflituents and the na-" tion." Effays on Brit. Antig. 55. It is probable, however, from a letter of Randolph's to Cecil, 10 Aug. 1560, printed in the Appendix, that this parliament had fome appearance of ancient precedent to justify their unworthy conduct. Various questions concerning the conflituent members of the Scottish parliament; concerning the æra at which the reprefentatives of boroughs were introduced into that affembly; and concerning the origin and power of the committee of lords of articles, occur, and have been agitated with great warmth. Since the first publication of this work, all these disputed points have been confidered with calmness and accuracy in Mr. W ght's Inquiry into the Rife and Progrefs of Parliament, &c. 4to edit. p. 17, &c.

tions muft be altogether myfterious and unintelligible. By attending to this, many dark paffages in our hiftory may be placed in a clear light; and where the bulk of hiftorians have feen only the effect, we may be able to difcover the caufe.

The fubverfion of the fcudal government in France, and its declenfion in the neighbouring kingdoms, occafioned a remarkable alteration in the political flate of Europe. Kingdoms, which were inconfiderable when broken, and parcelled out among nobles, acquired firmnels and ftrength by being united into a regular monarchy. Kings became confcious of their own power and importance. They meditated fchemes of conquest, and engaged in wars at a diftance. Numerous armies were raifed, and great taxes imposed for their fubfistence. Confiderable bodies of infantry were kept in conftant pay; that fervice grew to be honourable; and cavalry, in which the ftrength of European armies had hitherto confifted, thought proper enough for the fhort and voluntary excurfions of barons who ferved at their own expence, were found to be unfit either for making or defending any important conqueft.

It was in Italy, that the powerful monarchs of France and Spain and Germany first appeared to make a trial of their new strength. The division of that country into many small states, the luxury of the people, and their effeminate aversion to arms, invited their more martial neighbours to an easy prey. The Italians, who had been accuftomed to mock battles only, and to decide their interior quarrels by innocent and bloodlefs victories, were associated, when the French invaded their

their country, at the fight of real war; and as they could not refift the torrent, they fuffered it to take its courfe, and to fpeud its rage. Intrigue and policy fupplied the want of ftrength. Neceffity and felf-prefervation led that ingenious people to the great fecret of modern politics, by teaching them how to balance the power of one prince, by throwing that of another into the oppofite feale. By this happy device, the liberty of Italy was long preferved. The feales were poifed by very fkilful hands; the fmalleft variations were attended to, and no prince was allowed to retain any fuperiority that could be dangerous.

A fystem of conduct, purfued with fo much fuccefs in Italy, was not long confined to that country of political refinement. The maxim of preferving a balance of power is founded fo much upon obvious reafoning, and the fituation of Europe rendered it fo neceffary, that it foon became a matter of chief attention to all wife politicians. Every flep any prince took, was observed by all his neighbours. Ambaffadors, a kind of honour-able fpies, authorifed by the mutual jealoufy of kings, refided almost constantly at every different court, and had it in charge to watch all its motions. Dangers were foreseen at a greater dis-tance, and prevented with more ease. Confederacies were formed to humble any power which role above its due proportion. Revenge or felfdefence were no longer the only caufes of hoftility, it became common to take arms out of policy; and war, both in its commencement and in its operations, was more an exercifc of the judgment, than of the paffions of men. Almost every war in Europe became general, and the VOL. I. moft most inconfiderable states acquired importance, becaufe they could add weight to either fcale.

Francis I, who mounted the throug of France in the year one thousand five hundred and fifteen, and Charles V. who obtained the imperial crown in the year one thonfand five hundred and nincteen, divided between them the ftrength and affections of all Europe. Their perpetual enmity was not owing folely either to perfonal jealoufy, or to the caprice of private paffion, but was founded fo much in nature and true policy, that it fub-fifted between their pofterity for feveral ages. Charles fucceeded to all the dominions of the house of Austria. No family had ever gained fo much by wife and fortunate marriages. By acquifitions of this kind the Auftrian princes role, in a fhort time, from obscure counts of Hapfbourg, to be archdukes of Auftria and kings of Bohemia, and were in poffession of the imperial dignity by a fort of hereditary right. Befides thefe territories in Germany, Charles was heir to the crown of Spain, and to all the dominions which belonged to the houfe of Burgundy. The Burgundian provinces engroffed, at that time, the riches and commerce of one half of Europe ; and he drew from them, on many occasions, those immenfe fums, which no people without trade and liberty are able to contribute. Spain furnished. him a gallant and hardy infantry, to whofe difcipline he was indebted for all his conquefts. At the fame time, by the difcovery of the new world, a vein of wealth was opened to him, which all the extravagance of ambition could not exhauft. Thefe advantages rendered Charles the first prince in Europe ; but he wished to be more, and openly afpired afpired to univerfal monarchy. His genius was of that kind which ripens flowly, and lies long concealed; but it grew up, without obfervation, to an unexpected height and vigour. He poffeffed, in an eminent degree, the characteriftic virtues of all the different races of princes to whom he was allied. In forming his schemes, he discovered all the fubtlety and penetration of Ferdinand his grandfather; he purfued them with that obstinate and inflexible perfeverance which has ever been peculiar to the Auftrian blood; and in executing them he could employ the magnanimity and boldnefs of his Burgundian anceftors. His abilities were equal to his power, and neither of them would have been inferior to his defigns, had not Providence, in pity to mankind, and in order to preferve them from the worft of all evils, univerfal monarchy, raifed up Francis I. to defend the liberty of Europe. His dominions were lefs extenfive, but more united, than the emperor's. His fubjects were numerous, active, and warlike, lovers of glory, and lovers of their king. To Charles, power was the only object of defire, and he purfued it with an unwearied and joylefs induftry. Francis could mingle pleafure and elegance with his ambition; and though he neglected fome advantages, which a more phlegmatic or more frugal prince would have improved, an active and intrepid courage fupplied all his defects, and checked or defeated many of the emperor's defigns.

The reft of Europe observed all the motions of these mighty rivals with a jealous attention. On the one fide, the Italians faw the danger which threatened Christendom, and, in order to avert it, it, had recourfe to the expedient which they had often employed with fuccefs. They endeavoured to divide the power of the two contending monarchs into equal fcales, and, by the union of feveral fmall flates, to counterpoife him whofe power became too, great. But what they concerted with much wifdom, they were able to execute with little vigour; and intrigue and refinement were feeble fences against the incroachments of military power.

On the other fide, Henry VIII. of England held the balance with lefs delicacy, but with a ftronger hand. He was the third prince of the age in dignity and in power; and the advantageous fituation of his dominions, his domeftic tranquillity, his immenfe wealth, and abfolute authority, rendered him the natural guardian of the liberty of Europe. Each of the rivals courted him. with emulation ; he knew it to be his interest to keep the balance even, and to reftrain both, by not joining entirely with either of them. But he was feldom able to reduce his ideas to practice; he was governed by caprice more than by principle; and the paffions of the man were an overmatch for the maxims of the king. Vanity and refentment were the great fprings of all his undertakings, and his neighbours eafily found the way, by touching thefe, to force him upon many rash and inconfistent enterprises. His reign was a perpetual feries of blunders in politics; and while he efteemed limfelf the wifest prince in Europe, he was a conftant dupe to those who found it neceffary, and could fubmit to flatter him.

B. 1.

In this fituation of Europe, Scotland, which had hitherto walted her ftrength in the quarrels between France and England, emerged from her obfcurity, took her flation in the fyllem, and began to have fome influence upon the fate of diftant nations. Her affistance was frequently of confequence to the contending parties, and the balance was often fo nicely adjusted, that it was in her power to make it lean to either fide. The part affigned her, at this juncture, was to divert Henry from carrying his arms into the continent. That prince having routed the French at Guinegat and invefted Terouënne, France attempted to divide his forces, by engaging James IV. in that unhappy expedition which ended with his life. For the fame reafon Francis encouraged and affifted the duke of Albany to ruin the families of Angus and Home, which were in the interest of England, and would willingly have perfuaded the Scots to revenge the death of their king, and to enter into a new war with that kingdom. Henry and Francis having united not long after against the emperor, it was the interest of both kings, that the Scots should continue inactive; and a long tranquillity was the effect of their union. Charles endeavoured to break this, and to embarraís Henry by another inroad of the Scots. For this end he made great advances to James V. flattering the vanity of the young monarch, by electing him a knight of the golden fleece, and by offering him a match in the imperial family; while, in return for thefe empty honours, he demanded of him to renounce his alliance with France, and to declare war against England. But James, who had much to lofe, and and who could gain little by clofing with the emperor's propofals, rejected them with decency, and, keeping firm to his ancient allies, left Henry at full liberty to act upon the continent with his whole firength.

Henry himfelf began his reign by imitating the example of his anceftors with regard to Scotland. He held its power in fuch extreme contempt, that he was at no pains to gain its friendfhip; but, on the contrary, he irritated the whole nation, by reviving the antiquated pretenfions of the crown of England to the fovereignty over Scotland. But his own experience, and the examples of his enemies, gave him a higher idea of its importance. It was impossible to defend an open and extensive frontier against the incursions of an active and martial people. During any war on the continent, this obliged him to divide the ftrength of his kingdom. It was necessary to maintain a kind of army of observation in the north of England; and after all precautions, the Scottish borderers, who were fuperior to all mankind in the practice of irregular war, often made fuccefsful inroads, and fpreadterror and defolation over many counties. He fell, at laft, upon the true fecret of policy, with refpect to Scotland, which his predeceffors had too little penetration to difcover, or too much pride to employ. The fituation of the country, and the bravery of the people, made the conquest of Scotland impossible; but the national poverty, and the violence of faction, rendered it an eafy matter to divide, and to govern it. He abandoned, therefore, the former defign, and refolved to employ his utmost address in executing the latter. It had not yet become honour-honourable for one prince to receive pay from another, under the more decent name of a fublidy. But in all ages the fame arguments have been good in courts, and of weight with minifters, fac-tious leaders, and favourites. What were the arguments by which Henry brought over fo many to his interest during the minority of James V. we know by the original warrant ftill extant P, for remitting confiderable fums into Scotland. By a proper diffribution of these, many perfons of note were gained to his party, and a faction which held fecret correspondence with England, and received all its directions from thence, appears henceforward in our domeftic contests. In the fequel of the hiftory, we shall find Henry labouring to extend his influence in Scotland. His fucceffors adopted the fame plan, and improved upon it. The affairs of the two kingdoms became interwoven, and their interefts were often the fame. Elizabeth divided her attention almost equally between them, and the authority which the inherited in the one, was not greater than that which fhe acquired in the other.

BOOK II.

MARY queen of Scots, the daughter of James V. and of Mary of Guife, was born a few days before the death of her father. The fituation in which he left the kingdom alarmed all ranks of men with the profpect of a turbulent and difaftrous reign. A war againft England had been undertaken without neceffity, and carried on without fuccefs. Many perfons of the firft rank had fallen into the hands of the Englifh, in the unfortunate route near the firth of Solway, and were ftill prifoners at London. Among the reft of the nobles there was little union either in their views or in their affections; and the religious difputes occafioned by the opinions of the reformers, growing every day more violent, added to the rage of thole factions which are natural to a form of government nearly ariftocratical.

The government of a queen was unknown in Scotland, and did not imprint much reverence in the minds of a martial people. The government of an infant queen was still more destitute of real authority; and the profpect of a long and feeble minority invited to faction by the hope of impunity. James had not even provided the common remedy against the diforders of a minority, by committing to proper perfons the care of his daughter's education, and the administration of affairs in her name. Though he faw the clouds gathering, and foretold that they would quickly burft into a ftorm, he was fo little able to difperfe them, or to defend his daughter and kingdom against the imminent calamities, that, in mere despair, he abandoned them both to the mercy of fortune, and left open to every pretender the office of regent, which he could not fix to his own fatisfaction.

Cardinal Beatoun, who had for many years been confidered as prime minifter, was the first that claimed that high dignity; and in fupport of his S. H.

his pretenfions, he produced a testament 2, which he himfelf had forged in the name of the late king; and, without any other right, inftantly affumed the title of regent. He hoped, by the affiftance of the clergy, the countenance of France, the connivance of the queen dowager, and the support of the whole popish faction, to hold by force, what he had feized on by fraud. But Beatoun had enjoyed power too long to be a favourite of the nation. Those among the nobles who wished for a reformation in religion dreaded his feverity, and others confidered the elevation of a churchman to the highest office in the kingdom as a depression of themselves. At their instigation, James Hamilton earl of Arran, and next heir to the queen, roufed himfelf from his inactivity, and was prevailed on to afpire to that station, to which proximity of blood gave him a natural title. The nobles, who were affembled for that purpole, unanimoully conferred on him the office of regent; and the public voice applauded their choice b.

No two men ever differed more widely in difpolition and character than the earl of Arran and cardinal Beatoun. The cardinal was by nature of immoderate ambition; by long experience he had acquired addrefs and refinement; and infolence grew upon him from continual fuccefs. His high flation in the church placed him in the way of great civil employments; his abilities were equal to the greateft of thefe; nor did he reckon any of them to be above his merit. As his own eminence was founded upon the power of the church of Rome, he was a zealous defender of that fuperflition, and for the fame reafon an avowed enemy to the doctrine of the reformers. Political motives alone determined him to fupport the one, or to oppofe the other. His early application to public bufinefs kept him unacquainted with the learning and controverfies of the age; he gave judgment, however, upon all points in difpute, with a precipitancy, violence, and rigour, which contemporary hiftorians mention with indignation.

The character of the earl of Arran was, in almost every thing, the reverse of Beatoun's. He was neither infected with ambition, nor inclined to cruelty : the love of eafe extinguished the former, the gentlenefs of his temper preferved him from the latter. Timidity and irrefolution were his predominant failings, the one occafioned by his natural conftitution, and the other arising from a confcioufnefs that his abilities were not equal to his flation. With these dispositions he might have enjoyed and adorned private life; but his public conduct was without courage, or dignity, or confistence: the perpetual flave of his own fears, and, by confequence, the perpetual tool of those who found their advantage in practifing upon them. But as no other perfon could be fet in opposition to the cardinal with any probability of fuccess, the nation declared in his favour with fuch general confent, that the artifices of his rival could not withftand its united ftrength.

The earl of Arran had fcarcely taken poffeffion of his new dignity, when a negociation was opened with England, which gave birth to events of the B. H.

the most fatal confequence to himfelf, and to the kingdom. After the death of James, Henry VIII. was no longer afraid of any interruption from Scotland to his defigns against France; and immediately conceived hopes of rendering this fecurity perpetual, by the marriage of Edward his only fon with the young queen of Scots. He communicated his intention to the prifoners taken at Solway, and prevailed on them to favour it, by the promife of liberty, as the reward of their fuccefs. In the mean time he permitted them to return into Scotland, that, by their prefence in the parliament which the regent had called, they might be the better able to perfuade their countrymen to fall in with his propofals. A caufe, intrusted to fuch able and zealous advocates, could not well mifs of coming to an happy iffue. All those who feared the cardinal, or who defired a change in religion, were fond of an alliance, which afforded protection to the doctrine which they had embraced, as well as to their own perfons, against the rage of that powerful and haughty prelate.

But Henry's rough and impatient temper was incapable of improving this favourable conjuncture. Addrefs and delicacy in managing the fears, and follies, and interefts of men, were arts with which he was utterly unacquainted. The defigns he had formed upon Scotland were obvious from the marriage which he had propofed, and he had not dexterity enough to difguile or to conceal them. Inflead of yielding to the fear or jealoufy of the Scots, what time and accidents would foon have enabled him to recover, he at once alarmed and irritated the whole nation, by demanding that the the queen's perfon fhould be immediately committed to his cuftody, and that the government of the kingdom fhould be put into his hands during her minority.

Henry could not have prefcribed more ignominious conditions to a conquered people, and it is no wonder they were rejected, with indignation, by men who fcorned to purchase an alliance with England at the price of their own liberty. The parliament of Scotland, however influenced by the nobles who returned from England ; defirous of peace with that kingdom ; and delivered, by the regent's confining the cardinal as a prifoner [March 12, 1543], from any opposition to which he might have given rife; confented to a treaty of marriage and of union, but upon terms somewhat more equal. After fome dark and unfuccefsful intrigues, by which his ambaffador endeavoured to carry off the young queen and cardinal Beatoun into England, Henry was obliged to give up his own propofals, and to accept of theirs. On his fide, he confented that the queen should continue to refide in Scotland, and himfelf remain excluded from any fhare in the government of the kingdom. On the other hand, the Scots agreed to fend their fovereign into England as foon as fhe attained the full age of ten years, and inftantly to deliver fix perfons of the first rank to be kept as hostages by Henry, till the queen's arrival at his court.

The treaty was still fo manifestly of advantage to England, that the regent loft much of the public confidence by confenting to it. The car-dinal, who had now recovered liberty, watched for fuch an opportunity of regaining credit, and he

he did not fail to cultivate and improve this to the utmost. He complained loudly that the regent had betrayed the kingdom to its most inveterate enemies, and facrificed its honour to his own ambition. He foretold the extinction of the true catholic religion, under the tyranny of an excommunicated heretic; but above all, he lamented to fee an ancient kingdom confenting to its own fervitude, descending into the ignominious station of a dependent province; and in one hour, the weakness or treachery of a single man furrendering every thing for which the Scottifh nation had struggled and fought during fo many ages. These remonstrances of the cardinal were not without effect. They were addreffed to prejudices and paffions which are deeply rooted in the human heart. The fame hatred to the ancient enemies of their country, the fame jealoufy of national honour, and pride of independence, which, at the beginning of the prefent century, went near to prevent the Scots from confenting to an union with England, upon terms of great advantage, did at that time induce the whole nation to declare against the alliance which had been concluded. In the one period, an hundred and fifty years of peace between the two nations, the habit of being fubjected to the fame king, and governed by the fame maxims, had confiderably abated old animolities, and prepared both people for incorporating. In the other, injuries. were still fresh, the wounds on both fides were open, and, in the warmth of refentment, it was natural to feek revenge, and to be averfe from reconcilement. At the union in one thousand feven hundred and feven, the wildom of parliament

ment defpifed the groundlefs murmurs occafioned by antiquated prejudices; but in one thousand five hundred and forty-three, the complaints of the nation were better founded, and urged with a zeal and unanimity, which it is neither just nor fafe to difregard. A rafh meafure of the Englifh monarch added greatly to the violence of this national animofity. The Scots, relying on the treaty of marriage and union, fitted out feveral ships for France, with which their trade had been interrupted for fome time. Thefe were driven by ftrefs of weather to take refuge in different ports of England; and Henry, under pretext that they were carrying provisions to a king-dom with which he was at war, ordered them to be seized and condemned as lawful prizes c. The Scots, aftonished at this proceeding of a prince, whole interest it was manifestly, at that juncture, to court and to footh them, felt it not only as an injury, but as an infult, and expressed all the refentment natural to an high-fpirited peopled. Their rage rofe to fuch a height, that the English

Englifh ambaffador could hardly be protected from it. One fpirit feemed now to animate all orders of men. The clergy offered to contribute a great fum towards preferving the church from the dominion of a prince, whofe fyftem of reformation was fo fatal to their power. The nobles, after having mortified the cardinal fo lately in fuch a cruel manner, were now ready to applaud and to fecond him, as the defender of the honour and liberty of his country.

Argyll, Huntly, Bothwell, and other powerful barons, declared openly against the alliance with England. By their affistance, the cardinal feized on the perfons of the young queen and her mother, and added to his party the fplendour and authority of the royal name c. of Lennox, whofe return from France he had earneftly folicited. This young nobleman was the hereditary enemy of the houfe of Hamilton. He had many claims upon the regent, and pretended a right to exclude him, not only from fucceeding to the crown, but to deprive him of the poffellion of his private fortune. The cardinal flattered his vanity with the prospect of marrying the queen dowager; and affected to treat him with fo much respect, that the regent became jealous of the a rival in power.

This fulpicion was artfully heightened by the abbot of Paifley, who returned into Scotland fome time before the earl of Lennox, and acted in concert with the cardinal. He was a natural brother of the regent, with whom he had great credit; a warm partifan of France, and a zealous defender of the eftablifhed religion. He took hold of the regent by the proper handle, and endeavoured to bring about a change in his fentiments, by working upon his fears. The defertion of the nobility, the difaffection of the clergy, and the rage of the people; the refentment of France, the power of the cardinal, and the pretenfions of Lennox, were all reprefented with aggravation, and with their moft threatening afpect.

Mean while, the day appointed for the ratification of the treaty with England, and the delivery of the hoftages, approached, and the regent was ftill undetermined in his own mind. He acted to the laft with that irrefolution and inconfiftence which is peculiar to weak men when they are fo unfortunate as to have the chief part in the conduct of difficult affairs. On the 25th of August,

he

he ratified the treaty with Henry<sup>f</sup>; and proclaimed the cardinal, who ftill continued to oppofe it, an enemy to his country. On the third of September, he fecretly withdrew from Edinburgh, met with the cardinal at Callendar, renounced the friend/hip of England, and declared for the interefts of France<sup>g</sup>.

Henry, in order to gain the regent, had not spared the most magnificent promises. He had offered to give the princefs Elizabeth in marriage to his eldelt fon, and to conftitute him king of that part of Scotland which lies beyond the river Forth. But, upon finding his interest in the kingdom to be lefs confiderable than he had imagined, the English monarch began to treat him with little refpect. The young queen was now in the cuftody of his enemies, who grew every day more numerous and more popular. They formed a feparate court at Stirling, and threatened to elect another regent. The French king was ready to afford them his protection; and the nation, out of hatred to the English, would have united in their defence. In this fituation, the regent could not retain his authority, without a fudden change of his meafures; and though he endeavoured, by ratifying the treaty, to preferve the appearances of good faith with England, he was obliged to throw himfelf into the arms of the party which adhered to France.

Soon after this fudden revolution in his political principles, the regent changed his fentiments concerning religion. The fpirit of controverfy was then new and warm : books of that kind were eagerly read by men of every rank; the love of novelty, or the conviction of truth, had led the regent to express great efteem for the writings of the reformers; and, having been powerfully fupported by those who had em-braced their opinions, he, in order to gratify them, entertained, in his own family, two of the most noted preachers of the protestant doctrine ; and, in his first parliament, confented to an act, by which the laity were permitted to read the fcriptures in a language which they understood<sup>h</sup>. Truth needed only a fair hearing to be an overmatch for error. Abfurdities, which had long imposed on the ignorance and credulity of mankind, were detected and exposed to public ridicule; and, under the countenance of the regent, the reformation made great advances. The cardinal obferved its progrefs with concern, and was at the utmost pains to obstruct it. He reprefented to the regent his great imprudence in giving encouragement to opinions fo favourable to Lennox's pretentions; that his own legitimacy depended upon the validity of a fentence of di-vorce, founded on the pope's authority; and that, by fuffering it to be called in question, he weakened his own title to the fucceffion, and furnished his rival with the only argument by which it could be rendered doubtful<sup>i</sup>. These infinuations

i The pretentions of the earl of Lennox to the fucceffion were thus founded. Mary, the daughter of James II. was married to James lord Hamilton, whom James III. created earl of Arran on that account. finuations made a deep impreffion on the regent's timorous fpirit; who, at the profpect of fuch imaginary dangers, was as much flartled as the cardinal could have wifhed; and his zeal for the proteftant religion was not long proof againft his fear. He publicly abjured the doctrine of the reformers in the Francifcan church at Stirling; and declared not only for the political, but the religious, opinions of his new confidents.

The protestant doctrine did not fuffer much by his apoltacy. It had already taken fo deep root in the kingdom, that no difcouragement or feverity could extirpate it. The regent, indeed, confented to every thing that the zeal of the cardinal thought neceffary for the prefervation of the established religion. The reformers were perfecuted with all the cruelty which fuperstition infpires into a barbarous people. Many were condemned to that dreadful death, which the church has appointed for the punishment of its enemies; but they fuffered with a spirit fo nearly refembling the patience and fortitude of the primitive martyrs, that more were converted than terrified by fuch spectacles.

The cardinal, however, was now in poffeffion of every thing his ambition could defire; and exercifed all the authority of a regent, without the envy of the name. He had nothing to fear the grandfon of the princefs Mary. But his father having married Janet Beatoun the regent's mother, after he had obtained a divorce from Elizabeth Home his former wife, Lennox pretended that the fentence of divorce was unjuft, and that the regent being born while Elizabeth Home was Aill alive, ought to be confidered as illegitimate. from the earl of Arran; who, having by his inconfiftency forfeited the public efteem, was contemned by one half of the nation, and little trufted by the other. The pretentions of the earl of Lennox were the only thing which remained to embarraís him. He had very fuccefsfully made ufe of that nobleman to work upon the regent's jealoufy and fear; but, as he no longer flood in need of fuch an inftrument, he was willing to get rid of him with decency. Lennox foon began to fuspect his intention; promifes, flattery, and respect, were the only returns he had hitherto received for fubitantial fervices; but at laft the cardinal's artifices could no longer be conccaled; and Lennox, inflead of attaining power and dignity himfelf, faw that he had been employed only to procure thefe for another. Refentment and difappointed ambition urged him to feek revenge on that cunning prelate, who, by facrificing his intereft, had fo ungeneroully purchased the carl of Arran's friendthip. He withdrew, for that reason, from court, and declared for the party at enmity with the cardinal, which, with open arms, received a convert who added fo much luftre to their caufe.

The two factions which divided the kingdom were still the fame, without any alterations in their views or principles; but, by one of those ftrange revolutions, which were frequent in that age, they had, in the course of a few weeks, changed their leaders. The regent was at the head of the partifans of France and the defenders of popery, and Lennox in the fame station with the advocates for the English alliance, and a reformation in religion. The one laboured to pull down Z. HL.

down his own work, which the other upheld with the fame hand that had hitherto endeavoured to deftroy it.

Lennox's impatience for revenge got the ftart of the cardinal's activity. He furprised both him and the regent by a fudden march to Edinburgh with a numerous army; and might eafily have crushed them, before they could prepare for their defence. But he was weak enough to liften to propofals for an accommodation; and the cardinal amufed him fo artfully, and fpun out the treaty to fuch a length, that the greater part of the earl's troops, who ferved, as is usual wherever the feudal inftitutions prevail, at their own expence, deferted him; and in concluding a peace, inftead of giving the law, he was obliged to receive it. A fecond attempt to retrieve his affairs ended yet more unfortunately. One body of his troops was cut to pieces, and the reft difperfed ; and with the poor remains of a ruined party, he must either have fubmitted to the conqueror, or have fled out of the kingdom, if the approach of an English army had not brought him a short relief.

Henry was not of a temper to bear tamely the indignity with which he had been treated, both by the regent and parliament of Scotland, who, at the time when they renounced their alliance with him, had entered into a new and ftricter confederacy with France. The rigour of the feafon retarded for fome time the execution of his vengeance. But in the fpring, a confiderable body of infantry, which was defined for France, received orders to fail for Scotland, and a proper number of cavalry was appointed to join it by land.

land. The regent and cardinal little expected fuch a vifit. They had trufted that the French war would find employment for all Henry's forces; and, from an unaccountable fecurity, were wholly unprovided for the defence of the kingdom. The earl of Hertford, a leader fatal to the Scots in that age, commanded this army, and landed it, without opposition, a few miles above Leith. He was quickly mafter of that place; and marching directly to Edinburgh, entered it with the fame eafe [May 3, 1544]. After plundering the adjacent country, the richeft and most open in Scotland, he fet on fire both thefe towns; and upon the approach of fome troops gathered together by the regent, put his booty on board the fleet, and with his land forces retired fafely to the English borders, delivering the kingdom, in a few days, from the terror of an invasion, concerted with little policy, carried on at great ex-pence, and attended with no advantage. If Henry aimed at the conqueft of Scotland, he gained nothing by this expedition; if the marriage he had propofed was still in his view, he loft a great deal. Such a rough courtfhip, as the earl of Huntly humoroufly called it, difgufted the whole nation; their averlion for the match grew into abhorrence; and, exafperated by fo many indignities, the Scots were never at any period more attached to France, or more alienated from England k. # The Lords of the Council to the Earl of Hertford, lieutenant in Scotland, April 10, 1544.

THE infruction begins with observing, that the king had originally intended to fortify Leith, and keep poffession of it; but, after mature deliberation, he had finally determined not to make any fettlement in Scotland at prefent, and therefore he is directed not to make any fortification at Leith, or any other place:

" But only for that journey to put all to fire and fword, burn Edinburgh town, fo ufed and defaced, that when you have gotten what you can of it, it may remain for ever a perpetual memory of the vengeance of God lightened upon it, for their falfhood and diflovalty. Many of his own vaffals, preferring their duty to their country before their affection to him, refused to concur in any defign to favour the public enemy. After a few feeble and unfuccefsful attempts to difturb the regent's administration, he was obliged to fly for fafety to the court of England, where Henry rewarded fervices which he had the inclination, but not the power to perform, by giving him in marriage his niece the lady Margaret Douglas. This unhappy exile, however, was deftined to be the father of a race of kings. Thefe barbarous orders feem to have been executed with a rigorous and unfeeling exactnefs, as appears from a feries of letters from lord Hertford, in the fame colleGion, giving a full account of all his operations in Scotland. guid and inactive war, by a peace, in which England, France, and Scotlaud were comprehended. Henry laboured to exclude the Scots from the benefit of this treaty, and to referve them for that vengeance which his attention to the affairs on the continent had hitherto delayed. But although a peace with England was of the laft confequence to Francis I. whom the emperor was preparing to attack with all his forces, he was too generous to abandon allies who had ferved him with fidelity, and he chofe rather to purchafe Henry's friend/hip with difadvantage to himfelf, than to leave them expofed to danger. By yielding fome things to the intereft, and more to the vanity of that haughty prince; by fubmiffion, flattery, and addrefs, he at length prevailed to have the Scots included in the peace agreed upon.

An event which happened a fhort time before the conclution of this peace, rendered it more acceptable to the whole nation. Cardinal Beatoun had not ufed his power with moderation, equal to the prudence by which he attained it. Notwithftanding his great abilities, he had too many of the paffions and prejudices of an angry leader of a faction, to govern a divided people with temper. His refertment againft one party of the nobility, his infolence towards the reft, his feverity to the reformers; and, above all, the barbarous and illegal execution of the famous George Wifhart, a man of honour-able birth and of primitive fanctity, wore out the patience of a fierce age; and nothing but a bold hand was wanting to gratify the public wifh by his deftruction. Private revenge, inflamed and fanctified by a falfe zeal for religion, quickly fupplied this want. Norman Lefly, the eldeft fon of the earl of Rothes, had been treated by the cardinal with injustice and contempt. It was not the temper of the man, or the fpirit of the times, quietly to digeft an affront. As the profession of his adversary fcreened him from the effects of what is called an honourable refentment, he refolved to take that fatisfaction which he could not demand. This refolution deferves as much cenfurc, as the fingular courage and conduct with which he put it in execution excite wonder. The cardinal at that time refided in the caftle of St. Andrew's, which he had fortified at great expence, and, in the opinion of the age, had rendered it impregnable. His retinue was numerous, the town at his devotion, and the neighbouring country full of his dependents. In this fituation, fixteen perfons undertook to furprize his caftle, and to allaffinate himfelf; and their fuccefs was equal to the boldness of the attempt. Early in the morning [May 29, 1546] they feized on the gate of the caftle, which was fet open to the workmen who were employed in finishing the fortifications; and having placed centries at the door of the cardinal's apartment, they awakened his numerous domeftics one by one, and turning them out of the caftle, they, without noife or tumult, or violence to any other perfon, deli-1. 2 vered vered their country, though by a moft unjuftifiable action, from an ambitious man, whofe pride was infupportable to the nobles, as his cruelty and cunning were great checks to the Reformation.

His death was fatal to the catholic religion, and to the French interest in Scotland. The fame zeal for both continued among a great party in the nation; but when deprived of the genius and authority of fo skilful a leader, operated with lefs effect. Nothing can equal the confternation which a blow fo unexpected occafioned among fuch as were attached to him; while the regent fecretly enjoyed an event, which removed out of his way a rival, who had not only eclipfed his greatnefs, but almost extinguished his power. Decency, however, the honour of the church, the importunity of the queen dowager and her adherents, his engagements with France, and above all thefe, the defire of recovering his eldeft fon, whom the cardinal had detained for fome time at Saint Andrew's, in pledge of his fidelity, and who, together with the caftle, had fallen into the hands of the confpirators, induced him to take arms, in order to revenge the death of a man whom he hated.

He threatened vengeance, but was unable to execute it. One part of military fcience, the art of attacking fortified places, was then imperfectly underflood in Scotland. The weapons, the difcipline, and impetuofity of the Scots, rendered their armies as unfit for fieges, as they were active in the field. An hundred and fifty men, which was the greateft number the confpirators E. 11.

rators ever affembled, refifted all the efforts of the rators ever anempled, renited all the efforts of the regent for five months<sup>n</sup>, in a place which a fingle battalion, with a few battering cannon, would now reduce in a few hours. This tedious fiege was concluded by a truce. The regent under-took to procure for the confpirators an abfolu-tion from the pope, and a pardon in parliament; and upon obtaining thefe, they engaged to fur-render the caftle, and to fet his fon at liberty.

It is probable, that neither of them were fineere in this treaty. On both fides they fought only to amufe, and to gain time. The regent had applied to France for afliftance, and expected foon to have the confpirators at mercy. On the other hand, if Lefly and his affociates were not at first incited by Henry to murder the cardinal, they were, in the fequel, powerfully fupported by him. Notwithstanding the filence of con-temporary historians, there are violent prefump-tions of the former; of the latter there is undoubted certainty °. During the fiege, the confpirators had received from England fupplies both of money and provisions; and as Henry was preparing to renew his propofals concerning the marriage and the union he had projected, and to fecond his negotiations with a numerous army, they hoped, by concurring with him, to be in a fituation in which they would no longer need a pardon, but might claim a reward P.

Francis

Francis I. did not long furvive a prince, who had been alternately his rival and his friend; but his fucceffor, Henry II., was not neglectful of the French intereft in Scotland. He fent a confiderable body of men, under the command of Leon Strozzi, to the regent's affiftance. By their long experience in the Italian and German wars, the French had become as dexterous in the conduct of fieges, as the Scots were ignorant; and as the boldnefs and defpair of the confpirators could not defend them against the fuperior art of thefe new affailants, they, after a short resistance, surrendered to Strozzi, who engaged, in the name of the king his mafter, for the fecurity of their lives ; and, as his prifoners, transported them into France. The caftle itself, the monument of Beatoun's power and vanity, was demolifhed, in obedience to the canon law, which, with admirable policy, denounces its anathemas even against the houses in which the facred blood of a cardinal happens to be shed, and ordains them to be laid in ruins 9.

The archbishop of St. Andrew's was bestowed by the regent upon his natural brother, John Hamilton, abbot of Paisley.

The delay of a few weeks would have faved the confpirators. Those ministers of Henry VIII. who had the chief direction of affairs during the minority of his fon Edward VI. conducted themfelves with regard to Scotland, by the maxims of their late mafter, and refolved to frighten the Scots into a treaty, which they had not abilities or address to bring about by any other method.

But

B. 11.

But before we proceed to relate the events which their invation of Scotland occafioned, we shall stop to take notice of a circumstance unobferved by contemporary historians, but extremely remarkable for the difcovery it makes of the fentiments and fpirit which then prevailed among the Scots. The confpirators against Cardinal Beatoun found the regent's eldeft fon in the caftle of St. Andrew's; and as they needed the protection of the English, it was to be feared that they might endeavour to purchafe it, by delivering to them this important prize. The prefumptive heir to the crown in the hands of the avowed enemies of the kingdom, was a dreadful prospect. In order to avoid it, the parliament fell upon a very extraordinary expedient. By an act made on purpofe, they excluded " the regent's eldeft fon from all right " of fucceffion, public or private, fo long as he " fhould be detained a prifoner, and fubilituted " in his place his other brothers; according to " their feniority, and in failure of them, those " who were next heirs to the regent"." Sueceffion by hereditary right is an idea fo obvious and fo popular, that a nation feldom ventures to make a breach in it, but in cafes of extreme neceflity. Such a neceflity did the parliament discover in the present situation. Hatred to England, founded on the memory of past hoftilities, and heightened by the fmart of recent injuries, was the national paffion. This dictated that uncommon statute, by which the order of lineal fucceffion was fo remarkably broken. The modern theories, which reprefent this right as divine and unalienable, and that ought not to be violated upon any confideration whatfoever, feem to have been then altogether unknown.

In the beginning of September, the earl of Hertford, now duke of Somerfet, and protector of England, entered Scotland at the head of eighteen thousand men, and, at the fame time, a fleet of fixty ships appeared on the coast to fe-cond his land forces. The Scots had for some time observed this storm gathering, and were prepared for it. Their army was almost double to that of the enemy, and posted to the greatest advantage, on a rifing ground, above Muffelburgh, not far from the banks of the river Efke. Both these circumstances alarmed the duke of Somerfet, who faw his danger, and would willingly have extricated himfelf out of it, by a new overture of peace, on conditions extremely reafonable. But this moderation being imputed to fear, his propofals were rejected with that fcorn which the confidence of fuccefs infpires; and if the conduct of the regent, who commanded the Scottish army, had been in any degree equal to his confidence, the defluction of the English must have been inevitable. They were in a fituation precifely fimilar to that of their countrymen under Oliver Cromwell in the following century. The Scots had chosen their ground fo well, that it was impoffible to force them to give battle; a few days had exhausted the forage and provision of a narrow country; the fleet could only furnish a fcanty and precarious fubfistence; a retreat therefore was necessary; but

but difgrace, and perhaps ruin, were the confequences of retreating.

On both these occasions, the national heat and impetuofity of the Scots faved the English, and precipitated their own country into the utmost danger. The undifciplined courage of the private men became impatient at the fight of an enemy. The general was afraid of nothing, but that the English might escape from him by flight; and leaving his ftrong camp, he attacked the duke of Somerfet near Pinkey, [September 10, 1547,] with no better fuccefs than his rashnefs deferved. The protector had drawn up his troops on a gentle eminence, and had now the advantage of ground on his fide. The Scottifh army confifted almost entirely of infantry, whofe chief weapon was a long fpear, and for that reason their files were very deep, and their ranks clofe. They advanced towards the enemy in three great bodies, and, as they paffed the river, were confiderably exposed to the fire of the English fleet, which lay in the bay of Musfelburgh, and had drawn near the flore. The English cavalry, flushed with an advantage which they had gained in a skirmish fome days before, began the attack with more impetuofity than good conduct. A body fo firm and compact as the Scots eafily refifted the impreffion of cavalry, broke them, and drove them off the field. The English infantry, however, advanced, and the Scots were at once exposed to a flight of arrows, to a fire in flank from four hundred foreign fu-fileers who ferved the enemy, and to their can-non, which were planted behind the infantry on the highest part of the eminence. The depth and

and closeness of their order making it impossible for the Scots to ftand long in this fituation, the earl of Angus, who commanded the vanguard, endeavoured to change his ground, and to retire towards the main body. But his friends unhappily miftook his motion for a flight, and fell into confusion. At that very instant, the broken cavalry, having rallied, returned to the charge; the foot purfued the advantage they had gained; the profpect of victory redoubled the ardour of both: and in a moment the rout of the Scottifh army became universal and irretrievable. The encounter in the field was not long nor bloody; but in the purfuit, the English discovered all the rage and fiercenefs which national antipathy, kindled by long emulation, and inflamed by reciprocal injuries, is apt to infpire. The purfuit was continued for five hours, and to a great diftance. All the three roads by which the Scots fled, were ftrewed with fpears, and fwords, and targets, and covered with the bodies of the flain. Above ten thousand men fell on this day, one of the most fatal Scotland had ever feen. A few were taken prifoners, and among thefe fome perfons of diffinction. The protector had it now in his power to become mafter of a kingdom, out of which, not many hours before, he was almost obliged to retire with infamy s.

But this victory, however great, was of no real utility, for want of fkill or of leifure to improve it. Every new injury rendered the Scots more averfe from an union with England; and the protector neglected the only meafure which would have made it neceffary for them to have given their confent to it. He amufed himfelf in wafting the open country, and in faking or building feveral petty caffles; whereas, by fortifying a few places which were acceffible by fea, of going to offend, as of flanding to defend, I have thought neceffary here to utter. Hackbutters have they few or none, and appoint their fight most commonly always a-foot. They come to the field well furnished all with jack and skull, dagger and buckler, and fwords all broad and thin, of exceeding good temper, and univerfally fo made to flice, that as I never faw none fo goed, fo I think it hard to devife the better. Hereto every man his pike, and a great kercher wrapped twice or thrice about his neck, not for cold, but for cutting. In their array towards joining with the enemy, they cling and thrust fo near in the fore rank, shoulder and shoulder together, with their pikes in both their hands straight afore them, and their followers in that order fo hard at their backs, laying their pikes over their foregoers fhoulders, that, if they do affail undifcovered, no force can well withftand them. Standing at defence they thruft fhoulders likewife fo nigh together, the fore ranks well nigh to kneeling, floop low before, their fellows behind holding their pikes with both hands, and therewith in the left their bucklers, the one end of their pike against their right foot, and the other against the enemy breast-high; their tollowers croffing their pike points with them forward ; and thus each with other fo nigh as fpace and place will fuffer, through the whole ward, fo thick, that as eafily shall a bare finger pierce through the skin of an angry hedge-hog, as any encounter the front of their pikes." Other curious particulars are found in this journal, from which fir John Hayward has borrowed his account of this expedition.

he would have laid the kingdom open to the Englifh, and, in a fhort time, the Scots muft ei-ther have accepted of his terms, or have fubmitted to his power. By fuch an improvement of it, the victory at Dunbar gave Cromwell the com-mand of Scotland. The battle of Pinkey had no other effect but to precipitate the Scots into new engagements with France. The fituation of the English court may, indeed, be pleaded in excuse for the duke of Somerfet's conduct. That cabal of his enemies, which occafioned his tragical end. was already formed; and while he triumphed in Scotland, they fecretly undermined his power and credit at home. Self-prefervation, therefore, obliged him to prefer his fafety before his fame, and to return without reaping the fruits of his victory. At this time, however, the cloud blew over; the confpiracy by which he fell was not yet ripe for execution; and his prefence fufpended its effects for fome time. The fupreme power still remaining in his hands, he employed it to recover the opportunity which he had loft A body of troops, by his command, feized and fortified Haddingtoun [April, 1548], a place which, on account of its diffance from the fea, and from any English garrifon, could not be defended without great expense and danger.

Meanwhile the French gained more by the defeat of their allies, than the English by their victory. After the death of cardinal Beatoun, Mary of Guise, the queen dowager, took a confiderable share in the direction of affairs. She was warmly attached by blood, and by inclination, to the French interest: and, in order to promote it, improved with great dexterity every event event which occurred. The fpirit and ftrength of the Scots were broken at Pinkey; and in an affembly of nobles which met at Stirling to confult upon the fituation of the kingdom, all eyes were turned towards France, no prospect of fafety appearing but in affistance from that quarter. But Henry II. being then at peace with England, the queen reprefented that they could not expect him to take part in their quarrel, but upon views of perfonal advantage ; and that without extraordinary conceffions in his favour, no affistance, in proportion to their prefent exigencies, could be obtained. The prejudices of the nation powerfully fcconded thefe rcprefentations of the queen. What often happens to individuals, took place among the nobles in this convention; they were fwayed entirely by their paffions; and in order to gratify them, they deferted their former principles, and difregarded their true intereft. In the violence of refentment, they forgot that zeal for the independence of Scotland, which had prompted them to reject the propofals of Henry VIII.; and by offering, voluntarily, their young queen in marriage to the dauphin, eldeft fon of Henry II., and, which was still more, by proposing to fend her immediately into France to be educated at his court, they granted, from a thirst of vengeance, what formerly they would not yield upon any confideration of their own fafety. To gain at once fuch a kingdom as Scotland, was a matter of no fmall confequence to France. Henry, without hefitation, accepted the offers of the Scottish ambassadors, and prepared for the vigorous defence of his new acquifition. Six thousand veteran foldiers, under the command of Monfieur Defsé, affilted by fome of the beft officers who were formed in the long wars of Francis I. arrived at Leith. They ferved two campaigns in Scotland, with a fpirit equal to their former fame. But their exploits were not confiderable. The Scots, foon becoming jealous of their defigns, neglected to fupport them with proper vigour. The caution of the Englifh, in acting wholly upon the defensive, prevented the French from attempting any enterprife of confequence; and obliged them to exhauft their ftrength in tedious fieges, undertaken under many difadvantages. Their efforts, however, were not without fome benefit to the Scots, by compelling the Englifh to evacuate Haddingtoun, and to furrender feveral fmall forts which they poffeffed in different parts of the kingdom.

But the effects of thefe operations of his troops were ftill of greater importance to the French king. The diversion which they occasioned enabled him to wreft Boulogne out of the hands of the Englifh; and the influence of his army in Scotland obtained the concurrence of parliament with the overtures which had been made to him, by the affembly of nobles at Stirling, concerning the queen's marriage with the dauphin, and her education in the court of France. In vain did a few patriots remonstrate against fuch extravagant conceffions, by which Scotland was reduced to be a province of France; and Henry, from an ally, raifed to be master of the kingdom; by which the friendship of France became more fatal than the enmity of England; and every thing was fondly given up to the one, that had been bravely defended against the other. A point of for much confequence was haftily decided in a parliament affembled in the camp before Haddingtoun [ June 5, 1548]: the intrigues of the queen dowager, the zeal of the clergy, and refentment against England, had prepared a great party in the nation for fuch a step; the French general and ambaffador, by their liberality and promifes, gained over many more. The regent himfelf was weak enough to ftoop to the offer of a penfion from France, together with the title of duke of Chatelherault in that kingdom. A confiderable majority declared for the treaty, and the interest of a faction was preferred before the honour of the nation.

Having hurried the Scots into this rafh and fatal refolution, the fource of many calamities to themfelves and to their fovereign, the French allowed them no time for reflection or repentance. The fleet which had brought over their forces was still in Scotland, and without delay convoyed the queen into France. Mary was then fix years old, and by her education in that court, one of the politest but most corrupted in Europe, fhe acquired every accomplifhment that could add to her charms as a woman, and contracted many of those prejudices which occafioned her misfortunes as a queen.

From the time that Mary was put into their hands, it was the intereft of the French to fuffer war in Scotland to languish. The recovery of the Boulonnois was the object which the French king had most at heart ; but a slight diversion in Britain was fufficient to divide the attention and ftrength of the English, whofe domestic factions deprived both their arms and councils of their accustomed vigour. The government of Eng-M 3 land land had undergone a great revolution. The duke of Somerfet's power had been acquired with too much violence, and was exercifed with too little moderation, to be of long continuance. Many good qualities, added to great love of his country, could not atone for his ambition in ufurping the fole direction of affairs. Some of the most eminent courtiers combined against him; and the earl of Warwick, their leader, no lefs ambitious but more artful than Somerfet, conducted his meafures with fo much dexterity as to raife himfelf upon the ruins of his rival. Without the invidious name of protector, he fucceeded to all the power and influence of which Somerfet was deprived, and he quickly found peace to be neceffary for the establishment of his new authority, and the execution of the vaft defigns he had conceived.

Henry was no firanger to Warwick's fituation, and improved his knowledge of it to good purpofe, in conducting the negociations for a general peace. He preferibed what terms he pleafed to the Englifh minifter, who ferupled at nothing, however advantageous to that monarch and his allies [March 24, 1550]. England confented to reftore Boulogne and its dependencies to France, and gave up all pretenfions to a treaty of marriage with the queen of Scots, or to the conqueft of her country. A few fmall forts, of which the Englifh troops had hitherto kept poffeffion, were rafed; and peace between the two kingdoms was eftablifhed on its ancient foundation.

Both the British nations lost power, as well as reputation, by this unhappy quarrel. It was on both fides a war of emulation and refentment, rather B. H.

rather than of intereft; and was carried on under the influence of national animofities, which were blind to all advantages. The French, who entered into it with greater coolnefs, conducted it with more fkill; and by dexteroufly availing themfelves of every circumftance which occurred, recovered poffeffion of an important territory which they had loft, and added to their monarchy a new kingdom. The ambition of the Englifh minifter betrayed to them the former; the inconfiderate rage of the Scots againft their ancient enemies beftowed on them the latter; their own addrefs and good policy merited both.

Immediately after the conclusion of the peace, the French forces left Scotland, as much to their own fatisfaction, as to that of the nation. The Scots foon found, that the calling to their affiftance, a people more powerful than themfelves, was a dangerous expedient. They beheld, with the utmost impatience, those who had come over to protect the kingdom, taking upon them to command in it; and on many occafions they repented the rash invitation which they had given. The peculiar genius of the French nation heightened this difgust, and prepared the Scots to throw off the yoke, before they had well begun to feel it. The French were, in that age, what they are in the prefent, one of the most polished nations in Europe. But it is to be obferved, in all their expeditions into foreign countries, whether towards the fouth or north, that their manners have been remarkably incompatible with the manners of every other people. Barbarians are tenacious of their own cuftoms, becaufe they want knowledge and tafte to difcover cover the reafonablenefs and propriety of cuf-toms which differ from them. Nations, which hold the first rank in politeness, are frequently no less tenacious out of pride. The Greeks were fo in the ancient world; and the French are the fame in the modern. Full of themfelves; flattered by the imitation of their neighbours; and accuftomed to confider their own modes as the flandards of elegance; they feorn to difguife, or to lay afide, the diftinguishing manners of their own nation, or to make any allowance for what may differ from them among others. For this reafon, the behaviour of their armies has, on every occasion, been infupportable to ftrangers, and has always exposed them to hatred, and often to destruction. In that age they over-ran Italy four feveral times by their valour, and loft it as often by their infolence. The Scots, naturally an irafcible and high-fpirited people, and who, of all nations, can leaft bear the most distant infinuation of contempt, were not of a temper to admit all the pretensions of fuch assuming guests. The fymptoms of alienation were foon visible; they feconded the military operations of the French troops with the utmost coldness; their difgust grew infensibly to a degree of indignation that could hardly be reftrained ; and on occafion of a very flight accident, broke out with fatal violence. A private French foldier engaging in an idle quarrel with a citizen of Edinburgh, both nations took arms, with equal rage, in defence of their countrymen. The provoft of Edin-burgh, his fon, and feveral citizens of diftinction, were killed in the fray; and the French were obliged obliged to avoid the fury of the inhabitants, by retiring out of the city. Notwithstanding the ancient alliance of France and Scotland, and the long intercourfe of good offices between the two nations, an aversion for the French took its rife at this time among the Scots, the effects whereof were deeply felt, and operated powerfully through the fubsequent period.

From the death of cardinal Beatoun nothing has been faid of the flate of religion. While the war with England continued, the clergy had no leifure to molest the protestants; and they were not yet confiderable enough to expect any thing more than connivance and impunity. The new doctrines were still in their infancy; but during this short interval of tranquillity, they acquired ftrength, and advanced by large and firm fteps towards a full eftablishment in the kingdom. The first preachers against popery in Scotland, of whom feveral had appeared during the reign of James V., were more eminent for zeal and piety than for learning. Their acquaintance with the principles of the reformation was partial, and at fecond hand; fome of them had been educated in England; all of them had borrowed their notions from the books published there; and in the first dawn of the new light they did not venture far before their leaders. But in a fhort time the doctrines and writings of the foreign reformers became generally known ; the inquifitive genius of the age preffed forward in queft of truth; the difcovery of one error opened the way to others; the downfal of one imposture drew many after it ; the whole fabric which ignorance and fuperftition tion had erected in times of darkness began to totter; and nothing was wanting to complete its ruin, but a daring and active leader to direct the attack. Such was the famous John Knox, who, with better qualifications of learning, and more extensive views, than any of his predeceffors in Scotland, poffeffed a natural intrepidity of mind, which fet him above fear. He began his public ministry at St. Andrew's in the year one thousand five hundred and forty-feven, with that fuccefs which always accompanies a bold and popular eloquence. Inftead of amufing himfelf with lopping the branches, he ftruck di-rectly at the root of popery, and attacked both the doctrine and discipline of the established church, with a vehemence peculiar to himfelf, but admirably fuited to the temper and wifnes of the age.

An adverfary fo formidable as Knox, would not have eafily escaped the rage of the clergy, who observed the tendency and progress of his opinions with the utmost concern. But, at first, he retired for fafety into the caftle of St. Andrew's, and while the confpirators kept poffeffion of it, preached publicly under their protection. The great revolution in England, which followed upon the death of Henry VIII. contributed no less than the zeal of Knox towards demolifhing the popifh church in Scotland. Henry had loofened the chains, and lightened the yoke of popery. The ministers of his fon Edward VI. caft them off altogether, and eftablifhed the protestant religion upon almost the fame footing whereon it now ftands in that kingdom. The influence of this example reached Scotland, and

and the happy effects of ecclesiaftical liberty in one nation, infpired the other with an equal defire of recovering it. The reformers had, hitherto, been obliged to conduct themfelves with the utmost caution, and feldom ventured to preach, but in private houfes, and at a diftance from court ; they gained credit, as happens on the first publication of every new religion, chiefly among perfons in the lower and middle rank of life. But feveral noblemen of the greatest diftinction, having, about this time, openly espoufed their principles, they were no longer under the neceffity of acting with the fame referve; and with more fecurity and encouragement, they had likewife greater fuccefs. The means of acquiring and fpreading knowledge became more common, and the fpirit of innovation, peculiar to that period, grew every day bolder and more universal.

Happily for the reformation, this fpirit was ftill under fome reftraint. It had not yet attained firmnefs and vigour fufficient to overturn a fyftem founded on the deepeft policy, and fupported by the moft formidable power. Under the prefent circumfances, any attempt towards action muft have been fatal to the proteftant doctrines; and it is no fmall proof of the authority, as well as penetration, of the heads of the party, that they were able to reftrain the zeal of a fiery and impetuous people, until that critical and mature juncture, when every ftep they took was decifive and fuccefsful.

Meanwhile their caufe received reinforcement from two different quarters whence they never could have expected it. The ambition of the house of Guife, and the bigotry of Mary of England, England, haftened the fubverfion of the papal throne in Scotland; and by a fingular difpofition of Providence, the perfons who oppofed the Reformation in every other part of Europe with the fierceft zeal, were made inftruments for advancing it in that kingdom.

Mary of Guife poffeffed the fame bold and afpiring fpirit which diftinguished her family. But in her it was fostened by the female character, and accompanied with great temper and address. Her brothers, in order to attain the high objects at which they aimed, ventured upon fuch daring meafures as fuited their great courage. Her defigns upon the fupreme power were concealed with the utmost care, and advanced by addrefs and refinements more natural to her fex. By a dexterous application of those talents, fhe had acquired a confiderable influence on the councils of a nation hitherto unacquainted with the government of women; and, without the fmallest right to any share in the administration of affairs, had engroffed the chief direction of them into her own hands. But fhe did not long reft fatisfied with the enjoyment of this precarious power, which the ficklenefs of the regent, or the ambition of those who governed him, might fo eafily difturb; and fhe began to fet on foot new intrigues, with a defign of undermining him, and of opening to herfelf a way to fuceeed him in that high dignity. Her brothers entered warmly into this fcheme, and fupported it with all their credit at the court of France. The French king willingly concurred in a measure, by which he hoped to bring Scotland entirely under management, and, in any future

ture broil with England, to turn its whole force against that kingdom.

In order to arrive at the defired elevation, the queen dowager had only one of two ways to choose; either violently to wreft the power out of the hands of the regent, or to obtain it by his. confent. Under a minority, and among a warlike and factious people, the former was a very uncertain and dangerous experiment. The latter appeared to be no lefs impracticable. To perfuade a man voluntarily to abdicate the fupreme power; to defcend to a level with those above whom he was raifed ; and to be content with the fecond place where he hath held the firit, may well pais for a wild and chimerical project. This, however, the queen attempted ; and the prudence of the attempt was fufficiently juftified by its fuccefs.

The regent's inconftancy and irrefolution, together with the calamities which had befallen. the kingdom under his administration, raifed the prejudices both of the nobles and of the people against him, to a great height; and the queen fecretly fomented these with much industry. All who wished for a change met with a gracious reception in her court, and their fpirit of difaffection was nourifhed by fuch hopes and promifes, as in every age impose on the credulity of the factious. The favourers of the Reformation being the most numerous and spreading body of the regent's enemies, fhe applied to them with a particular attention; and the gentleness of her disposition, and secming indifference to the religious points in dispute, made all her promises VOL. I. of N of protection and indulgence pafs upon them for fincere. Finding fo great a part of the nation willing to fall in with her meafures, the queen fet out for France [Oct. 1550], under pretence of vifiting her daughter, and took along with her thofe noblemen who poffeffed the greateft power and credit among their countrymen. Softened by the pleafures of an elegant court, flattered by the civilities of the French king, and the careffes of the houfe of Guife, and influenced by the feafonable diftribution of a few favours, and the liberal promife of many more, they were brought to approve of all the queen's pretenfions.

While the advanced by those flow but fure fteps, the regent either did not forefee the danger which threatened him, or neglected to provide against it. The first discovery of the train which was laid, came from two of his own confidents, Carnegie of Kinnaird, and Panter bifhop of Rofs, whom the queen had gained over to her interest, and then employed as the most proper inftruments for obtaining his confent. The overture was made to him in the name of the French king, enforced by proper threatenings, in order to work upon his natural timidity, and fweetened by every promife that could reconcile him to a propofal fo difagreeable. On the one hand, the confirmation of his French title, together with a confiderable penfion, the parliamentary acknowledgment of his right of fuc-ceffion to the crown, and a public ratification of his conduct during his regency, were offered him. On the other hand, the difpleafure of the French king, the power and popularity of the queen queen dowager, the difaffection of the nobles, with the danger of an after-reckoning, were reprefented in the ftrongeft colours.

It was not poffible to agree to a propofal fo extraordinary and unexpected, without fome previous ftruggle; and had the archbifhop of St. Andrew's been prefent to fortify the irrefolute and paffive fpirit of the regent, he, in all probability, would have rejected it with difdain. Happily for the queen, the fagacity and ambition of that prelate could, at this time, be no obftruction to her views. He was lying at the point of death, and in his abfence the influence of the queen's agents on a flexible temper counterbalanced feveral of the ftrongeft paffions of the human mind, and obtained his confent to a voluntary furrender of the fupreme power.

After gaining a point of fuch difficulty with fo much eafe, the queen returned into Scotland [Dec. 1551], in full expectation of taking immediate poffeffion of her new dignity. But by this time the archbifhop of St. Andrew's had recovered of that diftemper, which the ignorance of the Scottifh phyficians had prononnced to be incurable. This he owed to the affiftance of the famous Cardan, one of thofe irregular adventurers in philofophy, of whom Italy produced fo many about this period. A bold genius led him to fome ufeful difcoveries, which merit the efteem of a more difcerning age; a wild imagination engaged him in those chimerical fciences, which drew the admiration of his cotemporaries. As a pretender to aftrology and magic, he was revered and confulted by all Europe; as a proficient in natural philofophy, he was but little known. The archbifhop, it is probable, confidered him as a powerful magician, when he applied to him for relief; but it was his knowledge as a philofopher, which enabled him to cure his difeafe<sup>t</sup>.

Together with his health, the archbishop recovered the entire government of the regent, and quickly perfuaded him to recal that difhonourable promife, which he had been feduced by the artifices of the queen to grant. However great her furprife and indignation were, at this fresh instance of his inconitancy, she was obliged to diffemble, that she might have leifure to renew her intrigues with all parties; with the protestants, whom she favoured and courted more than ever; with the nobles, to whom fhe rendered herfelf agreeable by various arts; and with the regent himfelf, in order to gain whom the employed every argument. But whatever imprefiions her emiffaries might have made on the regent, it was no cafy matter to over-reach or to intimidate the archbifhop. Under his management the negociations were fpun out to a great length, and his brother maintained his ftation with that addrefs and firmnefs, which its importance fo well merited. The univerfal de-fection of the nobility, the growing power of the protestants, who all adhered to the queen dowager, the reiterated folicitations of the

<sup>t</sup> Cardan himfelf was more defirous of being confidered as an aftrologer than a philofopher; in his book De Genituris, we find a calculation of the archbifhop's nativity, from which he pretends both to have predicted his difeafe, and to have effected h's cure. French king, and, above all, the interpolition of the young queen, who was now entering the twelfth year of her age, and claimed a right of nominating whom the pleafed to be regent", obliged him at laft to refign that high office, which he had held many years. He obtained, however, the fame advantageous terms for himfelf, which had been formerly flipulated.

It was in the parliament which met on the tenth of April one thousand five hundred and fifty-four, that the earl of Arran executed this extraordinary refignation; and at the fame time Mary of Guife was raifed to that dignity which had been fo long the object of her wifhes. Thus, with their own approbation, a woman and a ftranger was advanced to the fupreme authority over a fierce and turbulent people, who feldom fubmitted, without reluctance, to the legal and ancient government of their native monarchs.

While the queen dowager of Scotland contributed fo much towards the progrefs of the reformation, by the protection which the afforded it, from motives of ambition, the Englifh queen, by her indifcreet zeal, filled the kingdom with perfons active in promoting the fame caufe. Mary afcended the throne of England on the death of her brother Edward, and foon after married Philip II. of Spain. To the perfecuting fpirit of the Romith fuperfittion, and the fiercenefs of that age, the added the private refentment of her own and of her mother's fufferings, with which the loaded the reformed religion; and the peevithnefs and feverity of her natural temper carried the acrimony of all thefe paffions to the utinoft extreme. The crucity of her perfecution equalled the deeds of those tyrants who have been the greatest reproach to human nature. The bigotry of her clergy could fcarce keep pace with the impetuofity of her zeal. Even the unrelenting Philip was obliged, on fome occafions, to mitigate the rigour of her proceedings. Many among the most eminent reformers fuffered for the doctrines which they had taught; others fled from the ftorm. To the greater part of thefe, Switzerland and Germany opened a fecure afylum; and not a few, out of choice or neceffity, fled into Scotland. What they had feen and felt in England, did not abate the warmth and zeal of their indignation against popery. Their at-tacks were bolder and more fuccessful than ever; and their doctrines made a rapid progrefs among all ranks of men.

Thefe doctrines, calculated to rectify the opinions, and to reform the manners, of mankind, had hitherto produced no other effects ; but they foon began to operate with greater violence, and proved the occafion, not only of fubverting the eftablished religion, but of shaking the throne and endangering the kingdom. The caufes which facilitated the introduction of these new opinions into Scotland, and which diffeminated them fo fast through the nation, merit, on that account, a particular and careful inquiry. The reforma-tion is one of the greateft events in the hiftory of mankind, and, in whatever point of light we view it, is instructive and interesting.

The revival of learning in the fifteenth and fixteenth centuries roufed the world from that lethargy thargy in which it had been funk for many ages. The human mind felt its own ftrength, broke the fetters of authority by which it had been fo long reftrained, and venturing to move in a larger fphere, pufhed its inquiries into every fubject with great boldnefs and furprifing fuccefs.

No fooner did mankind recover the capacity of exercifing their reafon, than religion was one of the first objects which drew their attention. Long before Luther published his famous Thefes, which shook the papal throne, science and philofophy had laid open, to many of the Italians, the imposture and absurdity of the established fuperfition. That fubtle and refined people, fatisfied with enjoying those discoveries in fecret, were little disposed to affume the dangerous character of reformers, and concluded the knowledge of truth to be the prerogative of the wife, while vulgar minds must be overawed and governed by popular errors. But, animated with a more noble and difinterested zeal, the German theologiau boldly erected the standard of truth, and upheld it with an unconquerable intrepidity, which merits the admiration and gratitude of all fucceeding ages.

The occalion of Luther's being first difgusted with the tenets of the Romiss church, and how, from a small rupture, the quarrel widened into an irreparable breach, is known to every one who has been the least conversant in history. From the heart of Germany his opinions spread, with altonissing rapidity, all over Europe; and, whereever they came, endangered or overturned the ancient, but ill-founded system. The vigilance and address of the court of Rome, co-operating with with the power and bigotry of the Auftrian family, fupprefied thefe notions on their first appearance, in the fouthern kingdoms of Europe. But the fierce fpirit of the north, irritated by multiplied impositions, could neither be mollified by the fame arts, nor fubdued by the fame force; and encouraged by fome princes from piety, and by others out of avarice, it eafily bore down the feeble opposition of an illiterate and immoral clergy.

The fuperflition of popery feems to have grown to the most extravagant height in those countries which are fituated towards the different extremities of Europe. The vigour of imagination, and fensibility of frame, peculiar to the inhabitants of fouthern climates, rendered them fusceptible of the deepest impression of fuperflitious terror and credulity. Ignorance and barbarity were no less favourable to the progress of the fame spirit among the northern nations. They knew little, and were disposed to believe every thing. The most glaring absurditics did not shock their gross understandings, and the most improbable fictions were received with implicit affent and admiration.

Accordingly, that form of popery which prevailed in Scotland was of the moft bigotted and illiberal kind. Those doctrines which are most apt to shock the human understanding, and those legends which farthess exceed belief, were proposed to the people without any attempt to palliate or difguise them; nor did they ever call in question the reasonableness of the one, or the truth of the other.

The power and wealth of the church kept pace with the progress of superflition; for it is the E. 15.

the nature of that fuirit to obferve no bounds in its refpect and liberality towards those whose character it efteems facred. The Scottish kings early demonstrated how much they were under its influence, by their vaft additions to the immunities and riches of the clergy. The profuse piety of David I. who acquired on that account the name of Saint, transferred almost the whole crown lands, which were at that time of great extent, into the hands of ecclefiaftics. The example of that virtuous prince was imitated by his fucceffors. The fpirit fpread among all orders of men, who daily loaded the priefthood with new poffeffions. The riches of the church all over Europe were exorbitant; but Scotland was one of those countries wherein they had fartheft exceeded the juft proportion. The Scottifh clergy paid one half of every tax imposed on land; and as there is no reafon to think that in that age they would be loaded with any unequal fhare of the burden, we may conclude that, by the time of the reformation, little lefs than one half of the national property had fallen into the hands of a fociety, which is always acquiring, and can never lofe.

The nature, too, of a confiderable part of their property extended the influence of the clergy. Many eftates, throughout the kingdom, held of the church; church lands were let in leafe at an eafy rent, and were poffeffed by the younger fons and defcendants of the beft families x. The connection between fuperior and vaffal, between landlord and tenant, created dependences, and gave rife to an union of great advantage to the church; and in eftimating the influence of the popifh ecclefiaftics over the nation, thefe, as well as the real amount of their revenues, muft be attended to, and taken into the account.

This extraordinary fhare in the national property was accompanied with proportionable weight in the fupreme council of the kingdom. At a time when the number of the temporal peers was extremely fmall, and when the leffer barons and reprefentatives of boroughs feldom attended parliaments, the ecclefiaftics formed a confiderable body there. It appears from the ancient rolls of parliament, and from the manner of choofing the lords of articles, that the proceedings of that high court muft have been, in a great meafure, under their direction y.

The reverence due to their facred character, which was often carried incredibly far, contributed not a little towards the growth of their power. The dignity, the titles, and precedence of the popifh clergy, are remarkable, both as caufes and effects of that dominion which they had acquired over the reft of mankind. They were regarded by the credulous laity as beings of a fuperior fpecies; they were neither fubject to the fame laws, nor tried by the fame judges z.

y Spotf. Hift. of the Church of Scotland, 449.

Z How far this claim of the clergy to exemption from lay jurifdiction extended, appears from a remarkable transaction in the parliament held in 1546. When that court was proceeding to the forfeiture of the murderers of cardinal Beatoun, and were about to include a pileft, who was one of the aflaffins, in the general fentence of condemnation, odious as the crime was to ecclefiaftics, a delegate appeared in name of the clerical courts, and repledged or claimed exemption of him from the judgment of parliament, as a jpiritual man. This claim was fulfained; and his name is not inferted in the act of forfeiture. Epift. Reg. Scot. ii. 350. 361.

Every guard that religion could fupply, was placed around their power, their poffeffions, and their perfons; and endeavours were used, not without fuccefs, to reprefent them all as equally facred.

The reputation for learning, which, however inconfiderable, was wholly engroffed by the clergy, added to the reverence which they derived from religion. The principles of found philofophy, and of a just tafte, were altogether unknown; inplace of these were substituted studies barbarous and uninftructive; but as the ecclefiaftics alone were conversant in them, this procured them effeem; and a very flender portion of knowledge drew the admiration of rude ages, which knew little. War was the fole profession of the nobles, and hunting their chief amufement; they divided their time between thefe : unacquainted with the arts, and unimproved by fcience, they difdained any employment foreign from military affairs, or which required rather penetration and address, than bodily vigour. Whereever the former were neceffary, the clergy were entrusted; because they alone were properly qualified for the truft. Almost all the high offices in civil government devolved, on this account, into their hands. The lord chancellor was the first fubject in the kingdom, both in dignity and in power. From the earlieft ages of the monarchy, to the death of cardinal Beatoun, fifty-four perfons had held that high office ; and of these, forty-three had been ecclesiaftics a. The lords of feffion were fupreme judges in all matters of civil right; and by its original conftitution, the prefident and one half of the fenators in this court were churchmen.

To all this we may add, that the clergy being feparated from the reft of mankind by the law of celibacy, and undiftracted by those cares, and unincumbered with those burdens, which occupy and oppress other men, the interest of their order became their only object, and they were at full leifure to purfue it.

The nature of their function gave them accels to all perfons, and at all feafons. They could employ all the motives of fear and of hope, of terror and of confolation, which operate moft powerfully on the human mind. They haunted the weak and the credulous; they belieged the beds of the fick and of the dying; they fuffered few to go out of the world without leaving marks of their liberality to the church, and taught them to compound with the Almighty for their fins, by beftowing riches upon thofe who called themfelves his fervants.

When their own induftry, or the fuperfittion. of mankind, failed of producing this effect, the ecclefiaftics had influence enough to call in the aid of law. When a perfon died inteflate, the difpofal of his effects was vefted in the bifhop of the diocefe, after paying his funeral charges and debts, and diffributing among his kindred the fums to which they were refpectively entitled; it being prefumed that no Chriftian would have chofen to leave the world without defining fome part of his fubflance to pious ufes <sup>b</sup>. fond confidence, and childifhly fhun every thing that forces them to think of their mortality, many die without fettling their affairs by will; and the right of administration in that event, acquired by the clergy, must have proved a confiderable fource both of wealth and of power to the church.

At the fame time, no matrimonial or tcftamentary caufe could be tried but in the fpiritual courts, and by laws which the clergy themfelves had framed. The penalty, too, by which the decifions of thefe courts were enforced, added to their authority. A fentence of excommunication was no lefs formidable than a fentence of outlawry. It was pronounced on many occafions, and againft various crimes : and befides excluding thofe, upon whom it fell, from Chriftian privileges, it deprived them of all their rights as men, or as citizens; and the aid of the fecular power concurred with the fuperflition of mankind, in rendering the thunders of the church no lefs deftructive than terrible.

To thefe general caufes may be attributed the immenfe growth both of the wealth and power of the popifh church; and without entering into any more minute detail, this may ferve to difcover the foundations on which a ftructure fo ftupendous was erected.

But though the laity had contributed, by their own fuperfition and profufenefs, to raife the clergy from poverty and obfcurity to riches and eminence, they began, by degrees, to feel and to murmur at their encroachments. No wonder haughty and martial barons fhould view the power and poffeffions of the church with envy; and regard the lazy and inactive character of churchmen with the utmost contempt; while, at the fame time, the VOL. indecent and licentious lives of the clergy gave great and juft offence to the people, and confiderably abated the veneration which they were accuftomed to yield to that order of men.

Immenfe wealth, indolence, grofs ignorance, and above all, the fevere injunction of celibacy, had concurred to introduce this corruption of morals among many of the clergy, who, prefuming too much upon the fubmiffion of the people, were at no pains either to conceal or to difguife their own vices. According to the accounts of the reformers, confirmed by feveral popifh writers, the most open and scandalous diffolution of manners prevailed among the Scottifh clergy c. Cardinal Beatoun, with the fame public pomp which is due to a legitimate child, celebrated the marriage of his natural daughter with the earl of Crawford's fond; and, if we may believe Knox, he publicly continued to the end of his days a criminal correspondence with her mother, who was a woman. of rank. The other prelates feem not to have been. more regular and exemplary than their primate e.

• A remarkable proof of the diffolute manners of the clergy is found in the public records. A greater number of letters of legitimation was granted during the first thirty years after the Reformation, than during the whole period that has elapfed fince that time. These were obtained by the fons of the popsific lergy. The ecclessifics, who were allowed to retain their benefices, alienated them to their children; who, when they acquired wealth, were definous that the stain of illegitimacy might no longer remain upon their families. In Keitb's Catalogue of the Scottiff Biscops, we find several instances of fuch alienations of church lands, by the popsifi incumbents to their natural children.

L. II. HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Men of fuch characters ought, in reafon, to have been alarmed at the first clamours raifed against their own morals, and the doctrines of the church, by the protestant preachers; but the popish ecclesiastics, either out of pride or ignorance, neglected the proper methods for filencing them. Instead of reforming their lives, or difguising their vices, they affected to despise the censures of the people. While the reformers, by their mortifications and austerities, endeavoured to refemble the first propagators of Christianity, the popish clergy were compared to all those perfons who are most infamous in history for the enormity and fcandal of their crimes.

On the other hand, inftead of mitigating the rigour, or colouring over the abfurdity of the eftablifhed doctrines; inftead of attempting to found them upon fcripture, or to reconcile them to reafon; they left them without any other fupport or recommendation than the authority of the church, and the decrees of councils. The fables concerning purgatory, the virtues of pilgrimage, and the merits of the faints, were the topics on which they infifted in their difcourfes to the people; and the duty of preaching being left wholly to monks of the lowest and most illiterate orders, their compositions were flill more wretched and contemptible than the fubjects on which they infifted. While the reformers were attended by crowded and admiring audiences, the popifh preachers were either univerfally deferted, or liftened to with fcorn.

The only device which they employed in order to recover their declining reputation, or to confirm the wavering faith of the people, was equally imprudent and unfuccefsful. As many doctrines of their church had derived their credit at first from the authority of falfe miracles, they now endeavoured to call in thefe to their aid f. But fuch lying wonders as were beheld with unfufpicious admiration, or heard with implicit faith, in times of darknefs and of ignorance, met with a very different reception in a more enlightened period. The vigilance of the reformers detected thefe impostures, and exposed not only them, but the caufe which needed the aid of fuch artifices, to ridicule.

As the popifh ecclefiaftics became more and more the objects of hatred and of contempt, the discourses of the reformers were listened to as fo many calls to liberty; and befides the pious indignation which they excited against those corrupt doctrines which had perverted the nature of true Christianity; besides the zeal which they infpired for the knowledge of truth and the purity of religion; they gave rife alfo, among the Scottifh nobles, to other views and paffions. They hoped to shake off the yoke of ecclefiaftical dominion, which they had long felt to be oppreflive, and which they now difcovered to be unchriftian. They expected to recover poffeffion of the church revenues, which they were now taught to confider as alienations made by their anceftors, with a profusion no lefs undifcerning than unbounded. They flattered themfelves that a check would be given to the pride and luxury of the clergy, who would be obliged, henceforward, to confine themfelves within the fphere peculiar to their facred character. An aversion for the established church. which flowed from for many concurring caufes, which was raifed by confiderations of religion, heightened by motives of policy, and infligated by prospects of private advantage, spread fast through the nation, and excited a spirit that burft out, at last, with irrefistible violence.

Religious confiderations alone were fufficient to have roufed this fpirit. The points in controverfy with the church of Rome were of fo much importance to the happinefs of mankind, and fo effential to Christianity, that they merited all the zeal with which the reformers contended in order to establish them. But the Reformation having been reprefented as the effect of fome wild and enthufiaftic frenzy in the human mind, this attempt to account for the ea-gernefs and zeal with which our anceftors embraced and propagated the protestant doctrines, by taking a view of the political motives alone which influenced them, and by fhewing how naturally thefe prompted them to act with fo much ardour, will not, perhaps, be deemed an unnneceffary digreffion. We now return to the courfe of the hiftory.

1554.] The queen's elevation to the office of regent feems to have transported her, at first, beyond the known prudence and moderation of her character. She began her administration by conferring upon foreigners feveral offices of trust and of dignity; a step which, both from the inability of ftrangers to difcharge thefe offices with propriety, and from the envy which their preferment excites among the natives, is never never attended with good confequences. Vilmort was made comptroller, and entrufted with the management of the public revenues; Bonot was appointed governor of Orkney; and Ru-bay honoured with the cuftody of the great feal, and the title of vice-chancellor<sup>g</sup>. It was with the highest indignation that the Scots beheld offices of the greatest eminence and authority dealt out among ftrangers h. By thefe promotions they conceived the queen to have offered an infult both to their understandings and to their courage; to the former, by fuppoling them unfit for those flations which their ancestors had filled with fo much dignity; to the latter, by imagining that they were tame enough not to complain of an affront, which, in no former age, would have been tolerated with impunity.

While their minds were in this difpolition, an incident happened which inflamed their averfion from French councils to the highest degree. Ever fince the famous contest between the houses of Valois and Plantagenet, the French had been accustomed to embarrals the English, and to divide their ftrength by the fudden and formidable incurfions of their allies, the Scots: But, as these inroads were feldom attended with any real advantage to Scotland, and exposed it to the dangerous refentment of a powerful neigh-bour, the Scots began to grow lefs tractable than formerly, and icrupled any longer to ferve an ambitious ally at the price of their own quiet and fecurity. The change too, which was daily introducing in the art of war, rendercd the affiftance of the Scottish forces of lefs importance to the French monarch. For these reasons, Henry having resolved upon a war with Philip II. and forefecing that the queen of England would take part in her huf-band's quarrel, was extremely folicitous to fecure in Scotland the affiftance of fome troops, which would be more at his command than an undifciplined army, led by chieftains who were almost independent. In profecution of this defign, but under pretence of relieving the nobles from the expence and danger of defending the borders, the queen regent proposed, in parliament [1555], to register the value of lands throughout the kingdom, to impose on them a small tax, and to apply that revenue towards maintaining a body of regular troops in conftant pay. A fixed tax upon land, which the growing expence of go-vernment hath introduced into almost every part of Europe, was unknown at that time, and feemed altogether inconfistent with the genius of feudal policy. Nothing could be more shocking to a generous and brave nobility, than the entrusting to mercenary hands the defence of those territories which had been acquired, or preferved, by the blood of their anceftors. They received this propofal with the utmost diffatisfaction. About three hundred of the leffer barons repaired in a body to the queen regent, and represented their fense of the intended innovation, with that manly and determined boldnefs which is natural to a free people in a martial age. Alarmed at a remonstrance delivered vered in fo firm a tone, and fupported by fuch formidable numbers, the queen prudently abandoned a fcheme which fhe found to be univerfally odious. As the queen herfelf was known perfectly to underftand the circumftances and tcmper of the nation, this meafure was imputed wholly to the fuggeftions of her foreign counfellors; and the Scots were ready to proceed to the moft violent extremities againft them.

The French, instead of extinguishing, added fuel to the flame. They had now commenced hoftilities against Spain, and Philip had prevailed on the queen of England to reinforce his army with a confiderable body of her troops. In order to deprive him of this aid Henry had recourse, as he projected, to the Scots; and attempted to excite them to invade England. But as Scotland had nothing to dread from a princels of Mary's character, who, far from any ambitious scheme of disturbing her neighbours, was wholly occupied in endeavouring to reclaim her heretical fubjects; the nobles, who were affembled by the queen regent at Newbattle, liftened to the folicitations of the French monarch with extreme coldnefs, and prudently declined engaging the kingdom in an enterprife fo danger-ous and unneceffary. What fhe could not obtain by perfuafion, the queen regent brought. about by a stratagem. Notwithstanding the peace which fubfifted between the two kingdoms, the commanded her French foldiers to rebuild a fmall fort near Berwick, which was appointed, by the last treaty, to be rafed. The garrifon of Berwick fallied out, interrupted the work, and ra-vaged the adjacent country. This infult roufed the the fiery fpirit of the Scots, and their promptnefs to revenge the leaft appearance of national injury diffipated, in a moment, the wife and pacific refolutions which they had fo latcly formed. War was determined, and orders inflantly given for raifing a numerous army. But before their forces could affemble, the ardour of their indignation had time to cool, and the Englifh having difcovered no intention to pufh the war with vigour, the nobles refumed their pacific fyftem, and refolved to fland altogether upon the defensive. They marched to the banks of the Tweed [1556], they prevented the incurfions of the enemy; and having done what they thought fufficient for the fafety and honour of their country, the queen could not induce them, either by her entreaties or her artifices, to advance another flep.

While the Scots perfifted in their inactivity, D'Oyfel, the commander of the French troops, who poffeffed entirely the confidence of the queen regent, endeavoured, with her connivance, to engage the two nations in hostilities. Contrary to the orders of the Scottish general he marched over the Tweed with his own foldiers, and invested Werk caftle, a garrifon of the English. The Scots, inftead of feconding his attempt, were enraged at his prefumption. The queen's partiality towards France had long been fufpected; but it was now visible that she wantonly facrificed the peace and fafety of Scotland to the interest of that ambitious and affuming ally. Under the feudal governments it was in camps that fubjects were accuftomed to address the boldest remonstrances to their fovereigns. 254 reigns. While arms were in their hands, they felt their own firength; and at that time all their reprefentations of grievances carried the authority of commands. On this occasion the refentment of the nobles broke out with fuch violence, that the queen, perceiving all attempts to engage them in action to be vain, abruptly difmified her army, and retired with the utmost fhame and difguft; having difcovered the impotence of her own authority without effecting any thing which could be of advantage to France<sup>1</sup>.

It is obfervable, that this first instance of contempt for the regent's authority ean in no degree be imputed to the influence of the new opinions in religion. As the queen's pretentions to the regency had been principally fupported by those who favoured the reformation, and as she still needed them for a counterpoife to the archbishop of St. Andrew's and the partifans of the house of Hamilton, she continued to treat them with great respect, and admitted them to no inconfiderable share in her favour and confidence. Kirkaldy of Grange, and the other furviving confpirators againft cardinal Bea-toun, were about this time recalled by her from banifument; and through her connivance the protestant preachers enjoyed an interval of tran-quillity, which was of great advantage to their caufe. Soothed by these instances of the queen's moderation and humanity, the protestants left to others the office of remonstrating, and the leaders of the oppofite factions fet them the first example of difputing the will of their fovereign.

As the queen regent felt how limited and precarious her authority was, while it depended on the poife of these contrary factions, she endeavoured to establish it on a broader and more fecure foundation, by haftening the conclusion of her daughter's marriage with the dauphin. Amiable as the queen of Scots then was, in the bloom of youth, and confiderable as the territories were which fhe would have added to the French monarchy, reasons were not wanting to diffuade Henry from completing his first plan of marrying her to his fon. The constable Montmorency had employed all his interest to defeat an alliance which reflected fo much luftre on the princes of Lorrain. He had reprefented the impoffibility of maintaining order and tranquillity among a turbulent people during the abfence of their fovereign; and for that reafon had advifed Henry to beftow the young queen upon one of the princes of the blood, who, by refiding in Scotland, might preferve that kingdom an useful ally to France, which, by a nearer union to the crown, would become a mutinous and ungovernable province k. But at this time the conftable was a prifoner in the hands of the Spaniards; the princes of Lorrain were at the height of their power ; and their influence, feconded by the charms of the young queen, triumphed over the prudent, but envious remonstrances of their rival.

The French king accordingly applied to the parliament of Scotland [December 14, 1557], which appointed eight of its members1 to reprefent the whole body of the nation at the marriage of the queen. Among the perfons on whom the public choice conferred this honourable character, were fome of the most avowed and zealous advocates for the reformation; by which may be estimated the degree of respect and popularity which that party had now at-tained in the kingdom. The instructions of the parliament to those commissioners still remain ", and do honour to the wifdom and integrity of that affembly. At the fame time that they manifested, with respect to the articles of marriage, a laudable concern for the dignity and interest of their fovereign, they employed every precaution which prudence could dictate for preferving the liberty and independence of the nation, and for fecuring the fucceffion of the crown in the house of Hamilton.

With regard to each of these the Scots obtained whatever fatisfaction their fear or jealoufy could demand. The young queen, the dauphin, and the king of France, ratified every article with the most folemn oaths, and confirmed them by deeds and form under their hands and feals. But on the part of France all this was one continued scene of studied and elaborate deceit. Previous to these public transactions with the Scottish deputies, Mary had been perfuaded to subficible privately three deeds, equally unjust and invalid; by which, failing the heirs of her

As it gives us a proper idea of the character of the French court under Henry II. wc may obferve that the king himfelf, the keeper of the great feals, the duke of Guife, and the cardinal of Lorrain, were the perfons engaged in conducting this perfidious and difhonourable project. The queen of Scots was the only innocent actor in that fcene of iniquity. Her youth, her inexperience, her education in a foreign country, and her deference to the will of her uncles, must go far towards vindicating her, in the judgment of every impartial perfon, from any imputation of blame on that account.

This grant, by which Mary beftowed the inheritance of her kingdom upon ftrangers, was concealed with the utmost care from her fubjects. They feem, however, not to have been unacquainted with the intention of the French to overturn the fettlement of the fucceffion in favour of the duke of Chatelherault. The zeal with which the Archbishop of St. Andrew's opposed all the measures of the queen regent, evidently proceeded from the fears and fuspicions of that prudent prelate on this head °

The marriage, however, was celebrated with great pomp [April 14, 1558]; and the French, who had hitherto affected to draw a veil over their defigns upon Scotland, began now to unfold their intentions without any difguife. In the treaty of marriage the deputies had agreed that the dauphin fhould affume the name of King of Scotland. This they confidered only as an ho-norary title; but the French laboured to annex it to fome folid privileges and power. They infifted that the dauphin's title fhould be publicly recognifed ; that the Crown Matrimonial fhould be conferred upon him; and that all the rights pertaining to the husband of a queen should be vested in his perfon. By the laws of Scotland a perfon who married an heirefs kept poffeffion of her eftate during his own life, if he happened to furvive her and the children born of the marriage P. This was called the courtefy of Scotland. The French aimed at applying this rule, which takes place in private inheritances, to the fucceffion of the kingdom ; and that feems to be implied in their demand of the Crown Matrimonial, a phrafe peculiar to the Scottish historians, and which they have neglected to explain<sup>4</sup>. The Englifh in the marriage-articles between their queen and Philip of Spain, had fet an example to the age, of that prudent jealoufy and referve with which a foreigner fhould be admitted fo near the throne. Full of the fame ideas the Scottifh deputies had, in their oath of allegiance to the dauphin, expreffed themfelves with reremarkable caution r. Their anfwer was in the fame fpirit, refpectful but firm; and difcovered a fixed refolution of confenting to nothing that tended to introduce any alteration in the order of fucceffion to the crown.

Four of the deputies s happening to die before they returned into Scotland, this accident was univerfally imputed to the effects of poifon, which was fuppofed to have been given them by the emiffaries of the houfe of Guile. The historians of all nations difcover an amazing credulity with respect to rumours of this kind, which are fo well calculated to pleafe the malignity of fome men, and to gratify the love of the marvellous which is natural to all, that in every age they have been fwallowed without examination, and believed contrary to reafon. No wonder the Scots should easily give credit to a fuspicion, dauphin it is evident that, in their opinion, the rights belonging to the Crown Matrimonial fubfifted only during the continuance of the marriage. which received fuch flrong colours of probability, both from their own refertment, and from the known character of the princes of Lorrain, fo little forupulous about the juftice of the ends which they purfued, or of the means which they employed. For the honour of human nature it muft, however, be obferved, that as we can difcover no motive which could induce any man to perpetrate fuch a crime, fo there appears no evidence to prove that it was committed. But the Scots of that age, influenced by national animofities and prejudices, were incapable of examining the circumflances of the cafe with calmnefs, or of judging concerning them with candour. All parties agreed in believing the French to have been guilty of this deteftable action; and it is obvious how much this tended to increafe the averfion for them, which was growing among all ranks of men. Notwithflanding the cold reception which Notwithstanding the cold reception which their propofal concerning the Crown Matrimonial met with from the Scottish deputies, the French ventured to move it in parliament. The partifans of the house of Hamilton, sufficious of their defigns upon the fucceflion, opposed it with great zeal. But a party, which the feeble and unsteady conduct of their leader had brought under much differentiation, was little able to withstand the influence of France, and the address of the queen regent, feconded, on this occasion, by all the numerous adherents of the reformation. Befides, that artful princess dreffed out the French demands in a less offensive garb, and threw in fo many limitations, as feemed to render them of fmall confequence. These either deceived ceived the Scots, or removed their fcruples; and in compliance to the queen, they paffed an act conferring the Crown Matrimonial on the dauphin; and with the fondeft credulity trufted to the frail fecurity of words and ftatutes against the dangerous encroachments of power<sup>1</sup>.

The concurrence of the protestants with the queen regent in promoting a mcafure fo acceptable to France, while the popifh clergy, under the influence of the archbifhop of St. Andrew's, opposed it with fo much violence", is one of those fingular circumstances in the conduct of parties, for which this period is fo remarkable. It may be afcribed, in fome degree, to the dexterous management of the queen, but chiefly to the moderation of those who favoured the reformation. The protestants were by this time almost equal to the catholics both in power and in number ; and, confcious of their own strength, they fubmitted with impatience to that tyrannical authority with which the ancient laws armed the ecclefiaftics against them. They longed to be exempted from this oppreflive jurifdiction, and publicly to enjoy the liberty of profefling those opinions, and of exercifing that worship which so great a part of the nation deemed to be founded in truth, and to be acceptable to the Deity. This indulgence, to which the whole weight of priestly authority was opposed, there were only two ways of obtaining. Either violence must extort it from the reluctant hand of their fovereign, or by prudent compliances they might expect it from her favour or her gratitude. The former is an expedient for the redrefs of grievances, to which no nation has recourfe fuddenly; and fubjects feldom venture upon refiftance, which is their last remedy, but in cafes of extreme neceffity. On this occasion the reformers wifely held the opposite course, and by their zeal in forwarding the queen's defigns, they hoped to merit her protection. This disposition the queen encouraged to the utmost, and amufed them fo artfully with many promifes and fome conceffions, that, by their affiftance, fhe furmounted in parliament the force of a national and laudable jealoufy, which would otherwife have fwayed with the greater number.

Another circumstance contributed fomewhat to acquire the regent fuch confiderable influence in this parliament. In Scotland all the bishoprics, and those abbeys which conferred a title to a feat in parliament, were in the gift of the crown *. From the time of her accession to the regency the queen had kept in her own hands almost all those which became vacant, except fuch as were, to the great difgust of the nation, bestowed upon foreigners. Among these, her brother the cardinal of Lorrain had obtained the abbeys of Kelfo and Melrofs, two of the most wealthy foundations in the kingdom *. By this conduct fhe thinned the ecclefiaftical bench z, which was entirely under the influence of the archbishop of St. Andrew's, and which, by its numbers and authority, usually had great weight in the house, fo as to render any opposition it could give at that time of little confequence.

The earl of Argyll, and James Stewart prior of St. Andrew's, one the most powerful, and the other the most popular leader of the protestants, were appointed to carry the crown and other ensigns of royalty to the dauphin. But from this they were diverted by the part they were called to act in a more interesting scene, which now begins to open.

Before we turn towards this, it is neceffary to obferve, that on the feventeenth of November, one thoufand five hundred and fifty-eight, Mary of England finifhed her fhort and inglorious reign. Her fifter Elizabeth took poffeffion of the throne without oppofition; and the proteftant religion was once more eftablifhed by law in England. The acceffion of a queen who, under very difficult circumftances, had given ftrong indications of thofe eminent qualities, which, in the fequel, rendered her reign fo illuftrious, attracted the eyes of all Europe. Among the Scots both parties obferved her firft motions with the utmoft folicitude, as they eafily forefaw that fhe would not remain long an indifferent fpectator of their tranfactions.

Under many difcouragements and much oppreflion, the reformation advanced towards a full eftablifhment in Scotland. All the low country, the moft populous, and at that time the moft warlike part of the kingdom, was deeply tinc-tured with the proteftant opinions; and if the fame impreffions were not made in the more diftant counties, it was owing to no want of the fame difpolitions among the people, but to the fcarcity of preachers, whofe molt indefatigable zeal could not fatisfy the avidity of thofe who defined their inftructions. Among a people bred to arms, and as prompt as the Scots to act with violence, and in an age when religious paffions had taken fuch ftrong poffeffion of the human mind, and moved and agitated it with fo much violence, the peaceable and regular de-meanour of fo numerous a party is aftonifhing. From the death of Mr. Patrick Hamilton the firft who fuffered in Scotland for the proteftant establishment in Scotland. All the low country, first who fuffered in Scotland for the protestant religion, thirty years had elapsed, and during fo long a period no violation of public order or tranquillity had proceeded from that fect "; and though roufed and irritated by the most cruel excesses of ecclesiastical tyranny, they did, in no instance, transfores those bounds of duty which the law preferibes to fubjects. Befides the prudence of their own leaders, and the protection which the queen regent, from political motives, afforded them, the moderation of the archbishop of St. Andrew's encouraged this pacific disposition. That pre-late, whose private life cotemporary writers tax with great irregularities b, governed the church, "The murder of Cardinal Beatonn was occasioned by prifirst who fuffered in Scotland for the protestant for fome years, with a temper and prudence of which there are few examples in that age. But fome time before the meeting of laft parliament, the archbifhop departed from those humane maxims by which he had hitherto regulated his conduct; and whether in fpite to the queen, who had entered into fo close an union with the protestants, or in compliance with the importunities of his clergy, he let loose all the rage of perfecution against the reformed, fentenced to the flames an aged priest, who had been convicted of embracing the protestant opinions; and fummoned feveral others, fuspected of the fame crime, to appear before a fynod of the clergy, which was foon to convene at Edinburgh. Nothing could equal the horror of the protestants at this unexpected and barbarous execution, but the zeal with which they espouled the defence of a caufe that now feemed devoted to destruction. They had immediate recourse to the queen regent; and as her fuccefs in the parliament, which was then about to meet, depended on their concurrence, fhe not only fheltered them from the impending florm, but permitted them the exercise of their religion with more freedom than they had hitherto enjoyed. Unfatisfied with this precarious tenure by which they held their religious liberty, the protestants laboured to render their possession of it more fecure and independent. With this view they determined to petition the parliament for fome legal protection against the exorbitant and oppreffive jurifdiction of the ecclefiaftical courts, which, by their arbitrary method of proceeding, founded founded in the canon low, were led to fentences the most shocking to humanity, by maxims the most repugnant to justice. But the queen, who dreaded the effect of a debate on this delicate fubject, which could not fail of exciting high and dangerous paffions, prevailed on the leaders of the party, by new and more folemn promifes of her protection, to defift from any application to parliament, where their numbers and influence would in all probability have procured them, if not the entire redrefs, at leaft fome mitigation of their grievances.

They applied to another affembly, to a convo-cation of the popifh clergy, but with the fame ill fuccefs which hath always attended every proposal for reformation addreffed to that order of men. To abandon ulurped power, to renounce lucrative error, are facrifices which the virtue of individuals has, on fome occafions, offered to truth; but from any fociety of men no fuch effort can be expected. The corruptions of a fociety, recommended by common utility, and juftified by univerfal practice, are viewed by its members without fhame or horror; and reformation never proceeds from themfelves, but is always forced upon them by fome foreign hand. Suitable to this unfeeling and inflexible spirit was the behaviour of the convocation in the prefent conjuncture. All the demands of the protestants were rejected with contempt; and the popifi clergy, far from endeavouring, by any prudent conceffions, to footh and to reconcile fuch a numerous body, afferted the doctrines of their church, concerning fome of the most exceptionable

1559.] During the fitting of the convocation, the protestants first began to suspect some change in the regent's disposition towards them. Though joined with them for many years by intereft, and united, as they conceived, by the ftrongest ties of affection and of gratitude, she difcovered on this occafion evident fymptoms, not only of coldness, but of a growing difgust and aversion. In order to account for this our hiftorians do little more than produce the trite obfervations concerning the influence of prosperity to alter the character and to corrupt the heart. The queen, fay they, having reached the utmost point to which her ambition afpired, no longer preferved her accuftomed moderation, but, with an infolence ufual to the fortunate, looked down upon those by whose affistance she had been enabled to rife fo high. But it is neither in the depravity of the human heart, nor in the ingratitude of the queen's disposition, that we must fearch for the motives of her prefent conduct. These were derived from another and a more remote fource, which, in order to clear the fubfequent transactions, we shall endeavour to open with fome care.

The ambition of the princes of Lorrain had been no lefs fuccefsful than daring; but all their fchemes were diftinguished by being vast and unbounded. Though strangers at the court of France, their eminent qualities had raised them, in a short time, to an height of power superior to that of all other subjects, and had placed them on a level even with the princes of the blood themfelves. The church, the army, the revenue, were under their direction. Nothing but the royal dignity remained unattained, and they were elevated to a near alliance with it, by the marriage of the queen of Scots to the dauphin. In order to gratify their own vanity, and to render their niece more worthy the heir of France, they fet on foot her claim to the crown of England, which was founded on pretences not unplautible.

The tragical amours and marriages of Henry VIII. are known to all the world. Moved by the caprices of his love, or of his refentment, that impatient and arbitrary monarch had divorced or beheaded four of the fix queens whom he married. In order to gratify him, both his daughters had been declared illegitimate by act of parliament ; and yet, with that fantaftic inconfiftence which diftinguishes his character, he, in his laft will, whereby he was empowered to fettle the order of fucceffion, called both of them to the throne upon the death of their brother Edward ; and, at the fame time, paffing by the posterity of his eldeft fifter Margaret queen of Scotland, he appointed the line of fucceffion to continue in the descendants of his younger fifter the duchefs of Suffolk.

In confequence of this defination, the validity whereof was admitted by the English, but never recognized by foreigners, Mary had reigned in England without the least complaint of neighbouring princes. But the fame caufes which facilitated her acceffion to the throne, were obstacles to the elevation of her fister Elizabeth, and rendered her possibilition of it precarious and infecure.

fecure. Rome trembled for the catholic faith, under a protestant queen of fuch eminent abilities. The fame superfitious fears alarmed the court of Spain. France beheld with concern a throne, to which the queen of Scots could form fo many pretenfions, occupied by a rival, whole birth, in the opinion of all good catholics, excluded her from any legal right of fucceffion. The impotent hatred of the Roman pontiff, or the flow councils of Philip II. would have produced no fudden or formidable effect. The ardent and impetuous ambition of the princes of Lorrain, who at that time governed the court of France, was more decifive, and more to be dreaded. Inftigated by them, Henry, foon after the death of Mary, perfuaded his daughter-in-law, and her hufband, to affume the title of king and queen of England. They affected to publish this to all Europe. They ufed that flyle and appellation in public papers, fome of which still remain d. The arms of England were engraved on their coin and plate, and borne by them on all occafions. No preparations, however, were made to fupport this impolitic and premature claim. Elizabeth was already feated on her throne; fhe poffeffed all the intrepidity of fpirit, and all the arts of policy, which were neceffary for maintaining that station. England was growing into reputation for naval power. The marine of France had been utterly neglected; and Scotland remained the only avenue by which the territories of Elizabeth could be approached. It was on that fide, therefore, that the princes of Lorrain determined to make their attack °; and, by using the name and pretensions of the Scottish queen, they hoped to roufe the English catholics, formidable at that time by their zeal and numbers, and exafperated to the utmost against Elizabeth, on account of the change which fhe had made in the national religion.

It was vain to expect the affiftance of the Scottifh protestants to dethrone a queen, whom all Europe began to confider the most powerful guardian and defender of the reformed faith. To break the power and reputation of that party in Scotland became, for this reafon, a neceffary flep towards the invafion of England. With this the princes of Lorrain refolved to open their fchcme. And as perfecution was the only method for fuppreffing religious opinions known in that age, or dictated by the defpotic and fanguinary fpirit of the Romish superstition, this, in its utmost violence, they determined to employ. The earl of Argyll, the prior of St. Andrew's, and other leaders of the party, were marked out by them for immediate destruction f; and they hoped, by punishing them, to intimidate their followers. Inftructions for this purpofe were fent from France to the queen regent. That humane and fagacious princefs condemned a meafure which was equally violent and impolitic. By long refidence in Scotland, fhe had become acquainted with the eager and impatient temper of the nation; fhe well knew the power, the number, and popularity of the protestant leaders; and had been a witness to the intrepid and unconquerable refolution which religious fervour could infpire. What then could be gained by roufing this dangerous fpirit, which hitherto all the arts of policy had fcarcely been able to reftrain ? If it once broke loofe, the authority of a regent would be little capable to fubdue, or even to moderate, its rage. If, in order to quell it, foreign forces were called in, this would give the alarm to the whole nation, irritated already at the exceflive power which the French poffeffed in the kingdom, and fufpicious of all their defigns. Amidit the shock which this might occafion, far from hoping to exterminate the protestant doctrine, it would be well if the whole fabric of the eftablished church were not shaken, and perhaps overturned from the foundation. These prudent remonstrances made no impreffion on her brothers ; precipitant, but inflexible in all their refolutions, they infifted on the full and rigorous execution of their plan. Mary, paf-fionately devoted to the intereft of France, and ready, on all occafions, to facrifice her own opinions to the inclinations of her brothers, prepared to execute their commands with implicit fubmiffion<sup>g</sup>, and, contrary to her own judgment, and to all the rules of found policy, fhe became the inftrument of exciting civil commotions in Scotland, the fatal termination of which the forefaw and dreaded.

From the time of the queen's competition for the regency with the duke of Chatelherault, the popific clergy, under the direction of the archbifhop of St. Andrew's, had fet themfelves in oppofition to all her meafures. Her first step toward the execution of her new scheme, was to regain their favour. Nor was this reconcilement a matter of difficulty. The popifh ccclefiaftics, feparated from the reft of mankind by the law of celibacy, one of the boldeft and most fuccessful efforts of human policy; and combined among themfelves in the clofeft and most facred union, have been accuftomed, in every age, to facrifice all private and particular paffions to the dignity and intereft of their order. Delighted on this occasion with the prospect of triumphin, over a faction, the encroachments of which they had long dreaded, and animated with the hopes of relong dreaded, and animated with the hopes of re-eftablifhing their declining grandeur on a firmer bafis, they, at once, cancelled the memory of paft injuries, and engaged to fecond the queen in all her attempts to check the progrefs of the reforma-tion. The queen, being fecure of their affiftance, openly approved of the decrees of the convoca-tion, by which the principles of the reformers were condemned; and at the fame time fhe iffued a proclanation, enjoining all perfons to obferve the approaching feftival of Eafter according to the Romith ritual the Romish ritual.

As it was no longer poffible to miftake the queen's intentions, the proteftants, who faw the danger approach, in order to avert it, employed the earl of Glencairn, and fir Hugh Campbell of Loudon, to expollulate with her concerning this change towards feverity, which their former fervices had fo little merited, and which her reiterated promifes gave them no reafon to expect. She, without difguife or apology, avowed to them her refolution of extirpating the reformed religion out of the kingdom. And, upon their urging her former engagements with an uncourtly, but honeft boldnefs, fhe fo far forgot her ufual moderamoderation, as to utter a fentiment, which, however apt those of royal condition may be to entertain it, prudence should teach them to conceal as much as possible. "The promises of princes," fays she, "ought not to be too carcfully remembered, nor the performance of them exacted, unless it fuits their own conveniency."

The indignation which betrayed the queen into this rafh expression, was nothing in comparison of that with which fhe was animated, upon hearing that the public exercise of the reformed religion had been introduced into the town of Perth. At once fhe threw off the mask, and isfued a mandate, fummoning all the protestant preachers in the kingdom to a court of justice, which was to be held at Stirling on the tenth of May. The protestants, who, from their union, began about this time to be diffinguished by the name of the Con-GREGATION, were alarmed, but not intimidated by this danger; and inftantly refolved not to abandon the men to whom they were indebted for the most valuable of all bleffings, the knowledge of truth. At that time there prevailed in Scotland, with refpect to criminal trials, a cuftom, introduced at first by the institutions of vassalage and clanship, and tolerated afterwards under a feeble government; perfons accufed of any crime were accompanied to the place of trial by a re-tinue of their friends and adherents, affembled for that purpose from every quarter of the kingdom. Authorifed by this ancient practice, the reformed convened in great numbers, to attend their paftors to Stirling. The queen dreaded their 'approach with a train fo numerous, though unarmed; and in order to prevent them from advancing, fhe empowered' 23 powered John Eríkine of Dun, a perfon of eminent authority with the party, to promife in her name, that the would put a ftop to the intended trial, on condition the preachers and their retinue advanced no nearer to Stirling. Eríkine, being convinced himfelf of the queen's fincerity, ferved her with the utmoft zeal; and the proteftants, averfe from proceeding to any act of violence, liftened with pleafure to fo pacific a propolition. The preachers, with a few leaders of the party, remained at Perth; the multitude which had gathered from different parts of the kingdom difperfed, and retired to their own habitations.

But, notwithstanding this folemn promise, the queen, on the tenth of May, proceeded to call to trial the perfons who had been fummoned, and upon their non-appearance the rigour of juffice took place, and they were pronounced outlaws. By this ignoble artifice, fo incompatible with regal dignity, and fo inconfiftent with that integrity which should prevail in all transactions between fovereigns and their fubjects, the queen forfeited the effeem and confidence of the whole nation. The protestants, shocked no lefs at the indecency with which she violated the public faith, than at the danger which threatened themfelves, prepared boldly for their own defence. Erskine, enraged at having been made the inftrument for deceiving his party, inftantly abandoned Stirling, and re-pairing to Perth, added to the zeal of his affociates, by his reprefentations of the queen's inflexible refolution to fupprefs their religion h.

The popular rhetoric of Knox powerfully feconded his reprefentations : he having been carried a prifoner into France, together with the other perfons taken in the caftle of St. Andrew's, foon made his efcape out of that country; and refiding fometimes in England, fometimes in Scotland, had at last been driven out of both kingdoms by the rage of the popifh clergy, and was obliged to retire to Geneva. Thence he was called by the leaders of the protestants in Scotland; and, in compliance with their folicitations, he fet out for his native country, where he arrived a few days before the trial appointed at Stirling. He hurried instantly to Perth, to share with his brethren in the common danger, or to affift them in the common caufe. While their minds were in that ferment, which the queen's perfidioufness and their own danger occasioned, he mounted the pulpit, and by a vehement harangue against idolatry, inflamed the multitude with the utmost rage. The indifcretion of a priest, who, immediately after Knox's fermon, was preparing to celebrate mass, and began to decorate the altar for that purpofe, precipitated them into immediate action. With tumultuary, but irrefistible violence, they fell upon the churches in that city. overturned the altars, defaced the pictures, broke in pieces the images; and proceeding next to the monasteries, they in a few hours laid those fumptuous fabrics almost level with the ground. This riotous infurrection was not the effect of any concert, or previous deliberation : confured by the reformed preachers, and publicly condemned by perfons of most power and credit with the party, it must be regarded merely as an accidental eruption of popular rage 1.

i Knox, Hift. 127, 128.

But

But to the queen dowager thefe proceedings appeared in a very different light. Belides their manifest contempt for her authority, the protestants had violated every thing in religion which fhe deemed venerable or holy; and on both thefe accounts the determined to inflict the feverest vengeance on the whole party. She had already drawn the troops in French pay to Stirling ; with thefe, and what Scottifh forces fhe could levy of a fudden, fhe marched directly to Perth, in hopes of furprifing the protestant leaders before they could affemble their followers, whom, out of confidence in her difingenuous promifes, they had been rashly induced to difmils. Intelligence of thefe preparations and menaces was foon conveyed to Perth. The protestants would gladly have footlied the queen, by addreffes both to herfelf and to the perfons of greateft credit in her court; but finding her inexorable, they, with great vigour took measures for their own defence. Their adherents, animated with zeal for religion, and eager to expose themselves in fo good a caufe, flocked in fuch numbers to Pertli, that they not only fecured the town from danger, but within a few days were in a condition to take the field, and to face the queen, who advanced with an army feven thousand ftrong.

Neither party, however, was impatient to engage. The queen dreaded the event of a battle with men whom the fervour of religion raifed above the fenfe of fear or of danger. The proteftants beheld with regret the earl of Argyll, the prior of St. Andrew's, and fome other eminent perfons of their party, ftill adhering to the queen; and defititute of their aid and counfel, declined declined hazarding an action, the ill fuccefs of which might have proved the ruin of their caufe. The profpect of an accommodation was for thefe reafons highly acceptable to both fides: Argyll and the prior, who were the queen's commiffioners for conducting the negotiation, feem to have been fincerely defirous of reconciling the contending factions; and the earl of Glencairn arriving unexpectedly with a powerful reinforcement to the congregation, augmented the queen's eagerness for peace. A treaty was accordingly concluded, in which it was stipulated that both armies should be disbanded, and the gates of Perth fet open to the queen; that indemnity should be granted to the inhabitants of that city, and to all others concerned in the late infurrection; that no French garrifon should be left in Perth, and no French foldier should approach within three miles of that place; and that a parliament should immediately be held, in order to compose whatever differences might still remain k.

May 29.] The leaders of the congregation, diftruitful of the queen's fincerity, and fenfible that conceffions, flowing not from inclination, but extorted by the neceffity of her affairs, could not long remain in force, entered into a new affociation, by which they bound themfelves, on the first infringement of the prefent treaty, or on the least appearance of danger to their religion, to re-affemble their followers, and to take arms in defence of what they deemed the caufe of God and of their country 1.

The queen, by her conduct, demonstrated these precautions to be the refult of no groundless or k Keith, 89. 1 Knox, 138.

unneceffary fear. No fooner were the proteftant forees difmiffed, than the broke every article in the treaty. She introduced French troops into Perth, fined fome of the inhabitants, banithed others, removed the magiftrates out of office, and, on her retiring to Stirling, the left behind her a garrifon of fix hundred men, with orders to allow the exercise of no other religion than the Roman catholic. The fituation of Perth, a place at that time of fome ftrength, and a town among the most proper of any in the kingdom for the ftation of a garrifon, feems to have allured the queen to this unjustifiable and ill-judged breach of public faith; which the endeavoured to colour, by alleging that the body of men left at Perth was entirely composed of native Scots, though kept in pay by the king of France.

The queen's fcheme began gradually to unfold; it was now apparent, that not only the religion, but the liberties of the kingdom were threatened; and that the French troops were to be employed as inftruments for fubduing the Scots, and wreathing the yoke about their necks. Martial as the genius of the Scots then was, the poverty of their country made it impoffible to keep their armies long affembled; and even a very fmall body of regular troops might have proved formidable to the nation, though confifting wholly of foldiers. But what number of French forces were then in Scotland, at what times, and under what pretext they returned, after having left the kingdom in one thoufand five hundred and fifty, we cannot with any certainty determine. Contemporary hiftorians often felect with little judgment the circumftances, which 1559.]

which they transmit to posterity; and with refpect to matters of the greatest curiosity and importance, leave fucceeding ages altogether in the dark. We may conjecture, however, from fome passages in Buchanan, that the French, and Scots in French pay, amounted at least to three thousand men, under the command of Monssieur D'Oyfel, a creature of the house of Guise; and they were foon augmented to a much more formidable number.

The queen, encouraged by having fo confiderable a body of well-difciplined troops at her command, and infligated by the violent counfels of D'Oyfel, had ventured, as we have obferved, to violate the treaty of Perth, and by that rash action, once more threw the nation into the moft dangerous convultions. The earl of Argyll and the prior of St. Andrew's, inftantly deferted a court where faith and honour feemed to them to be no longer regarded; and joined the leaders of the congregation, who had retreated to the eaftern part of Fife. The barons from the neighbouring counties repaired to them, the preachers roufed the people to arms, and wherever they came, the fame violent operations which accident had occafioned at Perth, were now encouraged. out of policy. The enraged multitude was let loofe, and churches and monasteries, the monuments of ecclefiaftic pride and luxury, were facrificed to their zeal.

In order to check their career, the queen, without lofing a moment, put her troops in motion; but the zeal of the congregation got the flart once more of her vigilance and activity. In that warlike age, when all men were accultomed to arms, and on the leaft prospect of danger were ready to run to them, the leaders of the proteftants found no difficulty to raife an army. Though they fet out from St. Andrew's with a flender train of an hundred horfe, crowds flocked to their ftandards from every corner of the country through which they marched; and before they reached Falkland, a village only ten miles diftant, they were able to meet the queen with fuperior force<sup>m</sup>.

The queen, furprifed at the approach of for formidable a body, which was drawn up by its leaders in fuch a manner as added greatly in appearance to its numbers, had again recourfe to negotiation. She found, however, that the prefervation of the protestant religion, their zeal for which had at first roufed the leaders of the congregation to take arms, was not the only object they had now in view. They were animated with the warmeft love of civil liberty, which they conceived to be in imminent danger from the attempts of the French forces; and thefe two paffions mingling, added reciprocally to each other's ftrength. Together with more enlarged notions in religion, the reformation filled the human mind with more liberal and generous fentiments concerning civil government. The genius of popery is extremely favourable to the power of princes. The implicit fubmiffion to all her decrees, which is exacted by the Romish church, prepares and breaks the mind for political fervitude; and the doctrines of the reformers, by overturning the eftablished fystem of superfition, weakened the firmest foundations of civil tyranny. That bold fpirit of inquiry, which led men to reject theological errors, accompanied them in other fciences, and difcovered every where the fame manly zeal for truth. A new fludy, introduced at the fame time, added greater force to the fpirit of liberty. Men be-came more acquainted with the Greek and Roman authors, who defcribed exquisite models of free government, far fuperior to the inaccurate and oppreflive fystem established by the feudal law; and produced fuch illustrious examples of public virtue, as wonderfully fuited both the circumstances and spirit of that age. Many among the most eminent reformers were themfelves confiderable masters in ancient learning, and all of them eagerly adopted the maxims and fpirit of the ancients with regard to government n. The most ardent love of liberty accompanied the protestant religion throughout all its progrefs; and wherever it was embraced, it rouled an independent fpirit, which rendered men attentive to their privileges as fubjects, and jea-lous of the encroachments of their fovereigns. His principles, authorities, and examples were all drawn from ancient writers. The fame obfervations may be made with regard to Buchanan's Dialogue, De Jure Regni apud Scotos. vernment into the minds of their hearers; and the Scottish barons, naturally free and bold, were prompted to affert their rights with more freedom and boldness than ever. Instead of obeying the queen regent, who had enjoined them to lay down their arms, they demanded not only the redrefs of their religious grievances, but, as a preliminary toward fettling the nation and fecuring its liberties, required the immediate expulsion of the French troops out of Scotland. It was not in the queen's power to make fo important a concession without the concurrence of the French monarch; and as fome time was requifite in order to obtain that, fhe hoped, during this interval, to receive fuch reinforcements from France, as would infure the accomplishment of that defign which she had twice attempted with unequal strength. Meanwhile she agreed to a ceffation of arms for eight days [June 13], and before the expiration of thefe, engaged to tranfport the French troops to the fouth fide of the Forth, and to fend commissioners to St. Andrew's, who fhould labour to bring all differences to an accommodation. As fhe hoped, by means of the French troops, to overawe the protestants in the fouthern counties, the former article in the treaty was punctually executed ; the latter, having been inferted merely to amuse the congregation, was no longer remembered.

By thefe reiterated and wanton inflances of perfidy, the queen loft all credit with her adverfaries; and no fafety appearing in any other courfe, they again took arms with more inflamed refentment, and with bolder and more extensive views. The removing of the French forces had laid laid open to them all the country fituated between Forth and Tay. The inhabitants of Perth alone remaining fubjected to the infolence and exactions of the garrifon which the queen had left there, implored the affiftance of the congregation for their relief. Thither they marched, and having without effect required the queen to evacuate the town in terms of the former treaty, they prepared to befiege it in form. The queen employed the earl of Huntly and lord Erskine to divert them from this enterprife. But her wonted artifices were now of no avail; repeated fo often they could deceive no longer; and without liftening to her offers, the protestants continued the fiege, and foon obliged the garrifon to capitulate.

After the lofs of Perth, the queen endeavoured to feize Stirling, a place of fome ftrength, and, from its command of the only bridge over the Forth, of great importance. But the leaders of the congregation having intelligence of her defign, prevented the execution of it, by an hafty march thither with part of their forces. The inhabitants, heartily attached to the caufe, fet open to them the gates of their town. Thence they advanced with the fame rapidity towards Edinburgh, which the queen, on their approach, abandoned with precipitation, and retired to Dunhar.

The protestant army, wherever it came, kindled or fpread the ardour of reformation, and the utmost excesses of violence were committed upon churches and monasteries. The former were fpoiled of every decoration which was then efteemed facred; the latter were laid in ruins. We

We are apt, at this diftance of time, to condemn the furious zeal of the reformers, and to regret the overthrow of fo many flately fabrics, the monuments of our anceftors magnificence, and among the nobleft ornaments of the kingdom. But amidst the violence of a reformation, carried on in opposition to legal authority, fome irregularities were unavoidable; and perhaps no one could have been permitted more proper to allure and interest the multitude, or more fatal to the grandeur of the established church. How abfurd foever and ill-founded the fpeculative errors of popery may be, fome enquiry and attention are requifite towards difcovering them. The abuses and corruptions which had crept into the public worship of that church, lay more open to obfervation, and by ftriking the fenfes, excited more univerfal difgust. Under the long reign of heathenism, superstition seems to have exhausted its talent of invention, fo that when a superstitious spirit feized Christians, they were obliged to imitate the heathens in the pomp and magnificence of their ceremonies, and to borrow from them the ornaments and decorations of their temples. To the pure and fimple worship of the primitive Christians, there succeeded a species of splendid idolatry, nearly refembling those pagan originals whence it had been copied. The contrariety of fuch obfervances to the spirit of Christianity, was almost the first thing, in the Romish fystem, which awakened the indignation of the reformers, who, applying to thefe the denunciations in the Old Testament against idolatry, imagined that they could not endeavour at suppressing them with too much zeal.

zeal. No talk could be more acceptable to the multitude than to overturn those feats of fuperfition; they ran with emulation to perform it, and happy was the man whofe hand was moft adventurous and fuccessful in executing a work deemed fo pious. Nor did their leaders labour to reftrain this impetuous spirit of reformation. Irregular and violent as its fallies were, they tended directly to that end which they had in view; for by demolishing the monasteries throughout the kingdom, and fetting at liberty their wretched inhabitants, they hoped to render it impoffible ever to rebuild the one, or to reaffemble the other.

But, amidst these irregular proceedings, a circumstance, which does honour to the conduct and humanity of the leaders of the congregation, deferves notice. They fo far reftrained the rage of their followers, and were able fo to temper their heat and zeal, that few of the Roman catholics were exposed to any perfonal infult, and not a fingle man fuffered death °.

At the fame time we discover, by the facility with which these great revolutions were effected, how violently the current of national favour ran towards the reformation. No more than three hundred men marched out of Perth under the earl of Argyll and prior of St. Andrew's P; with this inconfiderable force they advanced. But wherever they came, the people joined them in a body; their army was feldom lefs numerous than five thousand men; the gates of every town were thrown open to receive them; and, without ftriking a fingle blow, they took poffeffion of the capital of the kingdom [June 29].

This rapid and aftonifhing fuccefs feems to have encouraged the reformers to extend their views, and to rife in their demands. Not fatisfied with their first claim of toleration for their religion, they now openly aimed at eftablishing the protestant doctrine on the ruins of popery. For this reafon they determined to fix their refidence at Edinburgh; and, by their appointment, Knox, and fome other preachers, taking possifier of the pulpits, which had been abandoned by the affrightened clergy, declaimed against the errors of popery with fuch fervent zeal as could not fail of gaining many profelytes. In the mean time the queen, who had prudently given way to a torrent which the could not refift, obferved with pleafure that it now began to fubfide. The leaders of the congre-gation had been above two months in arms, and by the expences of a campaign protracted fo long beyond the usual time of fervice in that age, had exhausted all the money which a country, where riches did not abound, had been able to fupply. The multitude, dazzled with their fuccefs, and concluding the work to be already done, retired to their own habitations. A few only of the more zealous or wealthy barons remained with their preachers at Edinburgh. As intelligence is procured in civil wars with little difficulty, whatever was transacted at Edinburgh was foon known at Dunbar. The queen, regulating her own conduct by the fituation of her adverfaries, artfully amufed them with the profpect.

fpect of an immediate accommodation; while, at the fame time, fhe by fludied delays fpun out the negotiations for that purpose to fuch a length, that in the end the party dwindled to an inconfiderable number; and, as if peace had been already re-established, became careless of mi-litary discipline. The queen, who watched for fuch an opportunity, advanced unexpectedly, by a fudden march in the night, with all her forces, and appearing before Edinburgh, filled that city with the utmost consternation. The pro-testants, weakened by the imprudent difpersion of their followers, durst not encounter the French troops in the open field; and were even unable to defend an ill-fortified town against their affaults. Unwilling, however, to abandon the citizens to the queen's mercy, they en-deavoured, by facing the enemy's army, to gain time for collecting their own affociates. But the queen, in fpite of all their refiftance, would have eafily forced her way into the town, if the feafonable conclusion of a truce had not procured her admission without the effusion of blood.

Their dangerous fituation eafily induced the leaders of the congregation to liften to any overtures of peace; and as the queen was looking daily for the arrival of a ftrong reinforcement from France, and expected great advantages from a ceflation of arms, fhe alfo agreed to it upon no unequal conditions. Together with a fulpenfion of hoftilities, from the 24th of July to the 10th of January, it was ftipulated in this treaty, that, on the one hand, the proteftants fhould open the gates of Edinburgh next morning morning to the queen regent ; remain in dutiful fubjection to her government ; abftain from all future violation of religious houfes ; and give no interruption to the established clergy, either in the difcharge of their functions, or in the enjoyment of their benefices. On the other hand, the queen agreed to give no moleftation to the preachers or profeffors of the protestant religion; to allow the citizens of Edinburgh, during the ceffation of hoftilities, to enjoy the exercise of religious worship according to the form most agreeable to the confeience of each individual; and to permit the free and public profeffion of the protestant faith in every part of the kingdom q. The queen, by these liberal concessions in behalf of their religion, hoped to footh the protestants, and expected, from indulging their favourite paffion, to render them more ging their favourite panion, to render them more compliant with refpect to other articles, particu-larly the expulsion of the French troops out of Scotland. The anxiety which the queen ex-pressed for retaining this body of men, rendered them more and more the objects of national jealoufy and aversion. The immediate expulsion of them was therefore demanded anew, and with greater warmth; but the queen, taking advantage of the diftrefs of the adverfe party, cluded the requeft, and would confent to nothing more than that a French garrifon fhould not be introduced into Edinburgh.

The defperate flate of their affairs imposed on . the congregation the neceffity of agreeing to this article, which, however, was very far from giving them fatisfaction. Whatever apprehen-fions the Scots had conceived from retaining the French forces in the kingdom, were abundantly juftified during the late commotions. A fmall body of those troops, maintained in conflant pay, and rendered formidable by regular difcipline, had checked the progress of a martial people, though animated with zeal both for religion and liberty. The fmallest addition to their number, and a confiderable one was daily expected, might prove fatal to the public liberty, and Scotland might be exposed to the danger of being reduced from an independent kingdom, to the mean condition of a province, annexed to the dominions of its powerful ally.

In order to provide against this imminent calamity, the duke of Chatelherault, and earl of Huntly, immediately after concluding the truce, defired an interview with the chiefs of the congregation. Thefe two noblemen, the most potent at that time in Scotland, were the leaders of the party which adhered to the established church. They had followed the queen during the late commotions, and having accels to obferve more narrowly the dangerous tendency of her councils, their abhorrence of the yoke which was preparing for their country furmounted all other confiderations, and determined them rather to endanger the religion which they profeffed, than to give their aid towards the execution of her pernicious defigns. They proceeded farther, and promifed to Argyli, Glencairn, and the prior of St. Andrew's, who were appointed to meet them, that if the queen should, with her ufual infincerity, violate any article in the treaty of truce, or refuse to gratify the wishes of the whole whole nation, by difmiffing her French troops, they would then inftantly join with their countrymen in compelling her to a meafure which the public fafety, and the prefervation of their liberties, rendered neceffary<sup>1</sup>.

[ July 8.] About this time died Henry II. of France; just when he had adopted a fystem with regard to the affairs of Scotland, which would, in all probability, have reftored union and tranquillity to that kingdoms. Towards the clofe of his reign, the princes of Lorrain began visibly to decline in favour, and the constable Montmorency, by the affistance of the duchefs of Valentinois, recovered that afcendant over the pirit of his mafter, which his great ex perience, and his faitliful, though often unfortunate, fervices, feemed justly to merit. That. prudent minister imputed the infurrections in Scotland wholly to the duke of Guife and the cardinal of Lorrain, whofe violent and precipitant councils could not fail of transporting, beyond all bounds of moderation, men whole minds were poffeffed with that jealoufy which is infeparable from the love of civil liberty, or inflamed with that ardour which accompanies religious zeal. Montmorency, in order to convince Henry that he did not load his rivals with any groundlefs accufation, prevailed to have Mclvil t, a Scottish gentleman of his retinue, dif-patched into his native country with instructions to obferve the motions both of the regent and of her adverfaries; and the king agreed to regulate his future proceedings in that kingdom by Melvil's report.

* Knox, 154. * Melv. 49. * The author of the Memoirs. Did

Did hiftory indulge herfelf in these speculations, it would be amufing to inquire what a different direction might have been given by this refolution to the national fpirit; and to what a different iffue Melvil's report, which would have fet the conduct of the malecontents in the most favourable light, might have conducted the public diforders. Perhaps by gentle treatment and artful policy the progress of the reformation might have been checked, and Scotland brought to depend upon France. Perhaps, by gaining poffeffion of this avenue, the French might have made their way into England, and, under colour of fupporting Mary's title to the crown, they might not only have defeated all Elizabeth's measures in favour of the reformation, but have re-established the Roman catholic religion, and deftroyed the liberties of that kingdom. But into this boundlefs field of fancy and conjecture the hiftorian must make no excursions; to relate real occurrences, and to explain their real caufes and effects, is his peculiar and only province.

The tragical and untimely death of the French monarch put an end to all moderate and pacific measures with regard to Scotland. The duke of Guife, and the cardinal his brother, upon the acceffion of Francis II. a prince void of genius and without experience, affumed the chief direction of French affairs. Allied fo nearly to the throne, by the marriage of their niece the queen of Scots with the young king, they now wanted but little of regal dig-nity, and nothing of regal power. This power did not long remain inactive in their hands. The fame valt fchemes of ambition which they had had planned out under the former reign, were again refumed; and they were enabled, by poffeffing fuch ample authority, to purfue them with more vigour and greater probability of fuccefs. They beheld, with infinite regret, the progrefs of the proteftant religion in Scotland; and, fenfible what an unfurmountable obftacle it would prove to their defigns, they bent all their ftrength to check its growth, before it rofe to any greater height. For this purpofe they carried on their preparations with all poffible expedition, and encouraged the queen their fifter to expect, in a flort time, the arrival of an army fo powerful as the zeal of their adverfaries, however defperate, would not venture to oppofe.

Nor were the lords of the congregation either ignorant of those violent counsels which prevailed in the court of France fince the death of Henry, or careless of providing against the danger which threatened them from that quarter. The fuccefs of their cause, as well as their personal fafety, depending entirely on the unanimity and vigour of their own refolutions, they endeavoured to guard against division, and to cement together more closely, by entering into a stricter bond of confederacy and mutual defence. Two perfons concurred in this new affociation, who brought a great acceffion both of reputation and of power to the party. Thefe were, the duke of Chatelherault, and his eldeft fon the earl of Arran. This young nobleman, having refided fome years in France, where he commanded the Scottifh guards, had imbibed the protestant opinions concerning religion. Hurried along by the heat of youth and the zeal of a profelyte, he had uttered fentifentiments with respect to the points in controverfy, which did not fuit the temper of a bigotted court, intent at that juncture on the extinction of the protestant religion; in order to accomplifh which, the greatest excesses of violence were committed. The church was fuffered to wreak its utmost fury upon all who were fufpected of herefy. Courts were erected in different parts of France, to take cognizance of this crime, and by their fentences feveral perfons of diffinction were condemned to the flames.

But, in order to infpire more universal terror, the princes of Lorrain refolved to felect, for a facrifice, fome perfon whofe fall might convince all ranks of men, that neither fplendour of birth, nor eminence in station, could exempt from punishment those who should be guilty of this unpardonable tranfgreffion. The earl of Arran was the perfon deftined to be the unhappy victim ". As he was allied to one throne, and the prefumptive heir to another; as he posseffed the first rank in his own country, and enjoyed an honourable ftation in France; his condemnation could not fail of making the defired impression on the whole kingdom. But the cardinal of Lorrain having let fall fome exprefiions, which raifed Arran's fufpicions of the defign, he escaped the intended blow by a timely flight. Indignation, zeal, refentment, all prompted him to feek revenge upon thefe perfecutors of himfelf and of the religion which he profeffed; and as he paffed through England on his return to his native country, Elizabeth by hopes and promifes inflamed those paffions, and fent him back into Scotland, animated with the fame implacable averfion to France which poffeffed a great part of his countrymen. He quickly communicated thefe fenti-ments to his father the duke of Chatelherault, who was already extremely difgufted with the measures carrying on in Scotland; and as it was the fate of that nobleman to be governed in every inflance by those about him, he now fuffered himfelf to be drawn from the queen regent; and, having joined the congregation, was confidered, from that time, as the head of the party.

But, with refpect to him, this diffinction was mercly nominal. James Stewart, prior of St. Andrew's, was the perfon who moved and actuated the whole body of the protestants, among whom he possessed that unbounded confidence which his strenuous adherence to their intcrest and his great abilities fo justly merited. He was the natural fon of James V. by a daughter of lord Erskine; and as that amorous monarclı had left feveral others a burden upon the crown, they were all defined for the church, where they could be placed in flations of dignity and affluence. In confequence of this refolution, the priory of St. Andrew's had been conferred upon James: but, during fo bufy a period, he foon became difgufted with the indolence and retirement of a monastic life; and his enterprifing genius called him forth to act a principal part on a more pub-lic and confpicuous theatre. The fcene in which he appeared required talents of different kinds : military virtue and political difcernment were equally neceffary in order to render him illustri-ous. These he possessed in an eminent de-gree. To the most unquestionable personal bravery, very, he added great fkill in the art of war, and in every enterprife his arms were crowned with fuccefs. His fagacity and penetration in civil affairs enabled him, amidft the reeling and turbulence of factions, to hold a profperous courfe; while his boldnefs in defence of the reformation, together with the decency, and even feverity, of his manners, fecured him the reputation of being fincerely attached to religion, without which it was impoffible in that age to gain an afcendant over mankind.

It was not without reafon that the queen dreaded the enmity of a man fo capable to obfiruct her defigns. As the could not, with all her addrefs, make the leaft imprefion on his fidelity to his affociates, the endeavoured to leffen his influence, and to featter among them the feeds of jealoufy and diftruft, by infinuating that the ambition of the prior afpired beyond the condition of a fubject, and aimed at nothing lefs than the crown itfelf.

An accufation fo improbable gained but little credit. Whatever thoughts of this kind the prefumption of unexpected fuccefs, and his elevation to the highest dignity in the kingdom, may be alleged to have infpired at any fublequent period, it is certain that at this juncture he could form no fuch vast defign. To dethrone a queen, who was lineal heir to an ancient race of monarclis; who had been guilty of no action by which the could forfeit the effeem and affection of her fubjects; who could employ, in defence of her rights, the forces of a kingdom much more powerful than her own; and to fubstitute in her place, a perfon whom the illegitimacy of his birth, by the practice of all civilized nations, rendered incapable of any inheritance either public or private; was a project S 2 project fo chimerical as the moft extravagant ambition would hardly entertain, and could never conceive to be practicable. The promife too, which the prior made to Melvil, of refiding conflantly in France, on condition the public grievances were redreffed *; the confidence repoled in him by the duke of Chatelherault, and his fon, the prefumptive heirs to the crown; and the concurrence of almost all the Scottish nobles, in promoting the measures by which he gave offence to the French court; go far towards his vindication from those illegal and criminal defigns, with the imputation of which the queen endeavoured at that time to load him.

The arrival of a thousand French foldiers compenfated, in fome degree, for the lofs which the queen sustained by the defection of the duke of Chatelherault. Thefe were immediately commanded to fortify Leith, in which place, on account of its commodious harbour, and its fituation in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and in a plentiful country, the queen refolved to fix the head-quarters of her foreign forces. This unpo-pular measure, by the manner of executing it, was rendered still more unpopular. In order to bring the town entirely under their command, the French turned out a great part of the ancient inhabitants, and taking poffeffion of the houfes, which they had obliged them to abandon, prefented to the view of the Scots two objects equally irritating and offenfive; on the one hand, a number of their countrymen ex-. pelled their habitations by violence, and wandering without any certain abode; on the other, a colony of foreigners fettling with their wives and children in the heart of Scotland, growing into flrength by daily reinforcements, and openly preparing a yoke, to which, without fome timely exertion of national fpirit, the whole kingdom muft of neceffity fubmit.

It was with deep concern that the lords of the congregation beheld this bold and decifive ftep taken by the queen regent : nor did they hefitate a moment, whether they should employ their whole ftrength, in one generous effort, to refcue their religion and liberty from impending destruction. But, in order to justify their own conduct, and to throw the blame entirely on their adversaries, they refolved to preferve the appearances of decency and respect towards their superiors, and to have no recourse to arms without the most urgent and apparent neceffity. They joined, with this view, in an an address to the regent [Sept. 29], reprefenting, in the ftrongeft terms, their diffatisfaction with the measures she was purfuing, and befeeching her to quiet the fears and jealousies of the nation by defisting from fortifying Leith. The queen, confcious of her prefent advantageous fituation, and elated with the hopes of fresh fuccours, was in no disposition for listening to demands utterly inconfiftent with her views, and urged with that bold importunity which is fo little acceptable to princes y.

The fuggeftions of her French counfellors contributed, without doubt, to alienate her flill farther from any fcheme of accommodation. As the queen was ready on all occafions to difcover an extraordinary deference for the opinions of her countrymen, her brothers, who knew her fecret difapprobation of the violent measures they were driving on, took care to place near her fuch per-fons as betrayed her, by their infinuations, into many actions, which her own unbiaffed judgment would have highly condemned. As their fuccefs in the prefent juncture, when all things were haftening towards a crifis, depended entirely on the queen's firmnefs, the princes of Lorrain did not truft wholly to the influence of their ordinary agents; but, in order to add the greater weight to their councils, they called in aid the minifters of religion; and, by the authority of their facred character, they hoped effectually to recommend to their fifter, that fyftem of feverity which they had efpoufed <sup>z</sup>. With this view, but under pretence of confounding the protestants by the skill of such able masters in controvers, they appoint-ed several French divines to reside in Scotland. At the head of these, and with the character of legate from the pope, was Pellevé bishop of Amiens, and afterwards archbifhop and cardinal of Sens, a furious bigot <sup>a</sup>, fervilely devoted to the houfe of Guife, and a proper infirument for re-commending or executing the most outrageous meafures.

Amidst the noife and danger of civil arms, these doctors had little opportunity to display their address in the use of their theological weapons. But they gave no fmall offence to the na-tion by one of their actions. They perfuaded the queen to feize the church of St. Giles in Edinburgh, which had remained, ever fince the late truce, in the hands of the proteflants; and having, by a new and folemn confecration, purified the fabric from the pollution with which they fuppofed the profane ministrations of the proteflants to have defiled it, they, in direct contradiction to one article in the late treaty, rc-eftablished there the rites of the Romiss church. This, added to the indifference, and even contempt, with which the queen received their remonstrances, convinced the lords of the congregation, that it was not only vain to expect any redrefs of their grievances at her hands, but absolutely neceflary to take arms in their own defence.

The eager and impetuous fpirit of the nation, as well as every confideration of good policy, prompted them to take this bold ftep without delay. It was but a fmall part of the French auxiliaries which had as yet arrived. The fortifications of Leith, though advancing fast, were still far from being complete. Under these circumftances of difadvantage, they conceived it poffible to furprife the queen's party, and, by one fudden and decifive blow, to prevent all future bloodfhed and contention. Full of these expectations, they advanced rapidly towards Edinburgh with a numerous army [Oct. 6.]. But it was no eafy matter to deceive an adverfary as vigilant and attentive as the queen regent. With her usual fagacity, fhe both forefaw the danger, and took the only proper courfe to avoid it. Inftead of keeping the field against enemies superior in number, and formidable on a day of battle by the ardour of their courage, fhe retired into Leith, and determined patiently to wait the arrival of new reinforcements. Slight and unfinished as the fortifications 200 fications of that town then were, fhe did not dread the efforts of an army, provided neither with heavy cannon, nor with military flores, and little acquainted with the method of attacking any place fortified with more art than those ancient towers erected all over the kingdom in defence of private property against the incursions of banditti.

Nor did the queen mean while neglect to have recourse to those arts which she had often employed to weaken or divide her adverfaries. By private folicitations and promifes the thook the fidelity, or abated the ardour of fome. By open reproach and accufation fhe blafted the reputation, and diminished the authority of others. Her. emiffaries were every where at work, and notwithftanding the zeal for religion and liberty which then animated the nation, they feem to have laboured not without fuccefs. We find Knox, about this period, abounding in complaints of the luke-warm and languid fpirit which had beguntofpread among his party b. But if their zeal flackened a little, and fuffered a momentary intermiffion, it foon blazed up with fresh vigour, and role to a greater height than ever.

The queen herfelf gave occafion to this, by the reply which the made to a new remonstrance from the lords of the congregation. Upon their arrival at Edinburgh, they once more reprefented to herthe dangers arifing from the increase of the French troops, the fortifying of Leith, and her other measures, which they conceived to be deftructive to the peace and liberty of the kingdom; and in this address they fpoke in a firmer tone, and avowed, more openly than ever, their refolution of proceeding to the utmoft extremities, in order to put a ftop to fuch dangerous encroachments. To a remonftrance of this nature, and urged with fo much boldnefs, the queen replied in terms no lefs vigorous and explicit. She pretended that fhe was not accountable to the confederate lords for any part of her conduct; and upon no reprefentation of theirs would fhe either abandon meafures which fhe deemed neceffary, or difinifs forces which fhe found ufeful, or demolifh a fortification which might prove of advantage. At the fame time fhe required them, on pain of treafon, to difband the forces which they had affembled.

This haughty and imperious ftylc founded harfhly to Scottifh nobles, impatient, from their national character, of the flighteft appearance of injury; accuftomed even from their own monarchs to the moft refpectful treatment; and poffeffing, under an ariflocratical form of government, fuch a fhare of power, as equalled, at all times, and often controlled that of the fovereign. They were fenfible, at once, of the indignity offered to themfelves, and alarmed with this plain declaration of the queen's intentions; and as there now remained but one flep to take, they wanted neither public fpirit nor refolution to take it.

But that they might not feem to depart from the eftablifhed forms of the conftitution, for which, even amidft their most violent operations, men always retain the greatest reverence, they assembled all the peers, barons, and representatives of boroughs, who adhered to their party [Oct.21.]. These formed a convention, which exceeded in number, and equalled in dignity, the usual meetings of parliament.

liament. The leaders of the congregation laid before them the declaration which the queen had given in anfwer to their remonstrance; reprefented the unavoidable ruin which the measures she therein avowed and justified would bring upon the kingdom; and requiring their direction with regard to the obedience due to an administration fo unjust and opprefive, they submitted to their decision a question, one of the most delicate and interesting that can possibly fall under the confideration of subjects.

This affembly proceeded to decide with no lefs difpatch than unanimity. Strangers to those forms which protract business; unacquainted with the arts which make a figure in debate; and much more fitted for action than difcourfe ; a warlike. people always haften to a conclusion, and bring their deliberations to the fhortest iffue. It was the work but of one day, to examine and to refolve this nice problem, concerning the behaviour of fubjects towards a ruler who abufes his power. But however abrupt their proceedings may appear, they were not deftitute of folemnity. As the determination of the point in doubt was conceived to be no lefs the office of divines than of laymen, the former were called to affift with their opinion. Knox and Willox appeared for the whole order, and pronounced, without hefitation, both from the precepts and examples in fcripture, that it was lawful for fubjects not only to refift tyrannical princes, but to deprive them of that authority, which, in their hands, becomes an inftrument for deftroying those whom the Almighty ordained them to protect. The decision of perfons revered fo highly for their facred character, but more for their zeal and their piety, had great weight weight with the whole affembly. Not fatisfied with the common indiferiminate manner of fignifying confent, every perfon prefent was called in his turn to declare his fentiments, and rifing up in order, all gave their fuffrages, without one diifenting voice, for depriving the queen of the office of regent, which the exercised for much to the detriment of the kingdom <sup>c</sup>.

This extraordinary fentence was owing no lefs to the love of liberty, than to zeal for religion. In the act of deprivation, religious grievances are flightly mentioned; and the dangerous encroachments of the queen upon the civil conflitution are produced, by the lords of the congregation, in order to prove their conduct to have been not only just but necessary. The introducing foreign troops into a kingdom at peace with all the world; the feizing and fortifying towns in different parts of the country; the promoting ftrangers to offices of great power and dignity; the debafing the current coind; the fubverting the aucient laws; the impofing of new and burdenfome taxes ; and the attempting to fubdue the kingdom, and to opprefs its liberties, by open and

But under the queen regent's administration, A. D. 1556, a pound weight of gold, although the quantity of alloy was confiderably increased, produced 1441. current money. In 1529, a pound weight of filver, when coined, produced 01. 2 s.; but in 1556, it produced 131. current money. Ruddiman. Præfat. ad Anderf. Diplomat. repeated acts of violence, are enumerated at great length, and placed in the ftrongeft light. On all thefe accounts, the congregation maintained, that the nobles, as counfellors by birth-right to their monarchs, and the guardians and defenders of the conftitution, had a right to interpofe; and thereforc, by virtue of this right, in the name of the king and queen, and with many expressions of duty and fubmission towards them, they deprived the queen regent of her office, and ordained that, for the future, no obedience should be given to her commands<sup>e</sup>.

Violent as this action may appear, there wanted not principles in the conflictution, nor precedents in the hiftory of Scotland, to justify and to authorife it. Under the arithocratical form of government eftablished among the Scots, the power of the fovereign was extremely limited. The more confiderable nobles were themfelves petty princes, poffeffing extensive jurifdictions, almost independent of the crown, and followed by numerous vaffals, who, in every contest, espoufed their chieftain's quarrel, in opposition to the king. Hence the many inftances of the impotence of regal authority, which are to be found in the Scottish history. In every age, the nobles not only claimed, but exercifed the right of controlling the king. Jealous of their privileges, and ever ready to take the field in defence of them, every error in administration was observed, every encroachment upon the rights of the ariflocracy excited indignation, and no prince ever ventured to tranfgrefs the boundaries which the law had prefcribed to prerogative, without meeting refiftance, which fhook or overturned his throne. Encouraged by the fpirit of the conflictution, and countenanced by the example of their anceftors, the lords of the congregation thought it incumbent on them, at this juncture, to inquire into the mal-administration of the queen regent, and to preferve their country from being enflaved or conquered, by depriving her of the power to execute fuch a pernicious fcheme.

The act of deprivation, and a letter from the lords of the congregation to the queen regent, are flill extant<sup>f</sup>. They difcover not only that mafculine and undaunted fpirit, natural to men capable of fo bold a refolution; but are remarkable for a precifion and vigour of exprefilion, which we are furprifed to meet with in an age fo unpolifhed. The fame obfervation may be made with refpect to the other public papers of that period. The ignorance or bad tafte of an age may render the compofitions of authors by profefinon obfcure, or affected, or abfurd; but the language of bufinefs is nearly the fame at all times; and wherever men think clearly, and are thoroughly interefted, they exprefs themfelves with perforcinty and force.

THE lords of the congregation foon found, that their zeal had engaged them in an undertaking, which it was beyond their utmost ability to accomplish. The French garrifon, despising their numerous but irregular forces, refused to furrender Leith, and to depart out of the kingdom; nor were they fufficiently skilful in the art of war to reduce the place by force, or poffeffed of the artillery, or magazines, requifite for that purpose; and their followers, though of undaunted courage, yet being accuftomed to decide every quarrel by a battle, were ftrangers to the fatigues of a long campaign, and foon became impatient of the fevere and conftant duty which a fiege requires. The queen's emiffaries, who found it eafy to mingle with their countrymen, were at the utmost pains to heighten their difgust, which discovered itself first in murmurs and complaints, but on occasion of the want of money for paying the army, broke out into open mutiny. The most eminent leaders were hardly fecure from the unbridled infolence of the foldiers; while fome of inferior rank, interpofing too rashly in order to quell them, fell victims to their rage. Difcord, confternation, and perplexity, reigned in the camp of the reformers. The duke, their general, funk, with his ufual timidity, under the terror of approaching danger, and difcovered manifest fymptoms of repentance for his rafhnefs in efpoufing fuch a defperate caufe. Tn

In this fituation of their affairs, the congregation had recourfe to Elizabeth, from whofe protection they could derive their only reasonable hope of fuccefs. Some of their more fagacious leaders, having forefeen that the party might probably be involved in great difficulties, had early endeavoured to fecure a refource in any fuch exigency, by entering into a fecret correspondence with the court of England a. Elizabeth, aware of the dangerous defigns which the princes of Lorrain had formed against her crown, was early fcnfible of how much importance it would be, not only to check the progress of the French in Scotland, but to extend her own influence in that kingdomb; and perceiving how effectually the prefent infurrections would contribute to retard or defeat the schemes formed against England, she listened with pleasure to these applications of the malecontents, and gave them private affurances of powerful support to their cause. Randolph , an agent extremely proper for conducting any dark intrigue, was dispatched into Scotland, and refiding fecretly among the lords of the congregation, observed and quickened their motions. Money feemed to be the only thing they wanted at that time; and it was owing to a feafonable remittance from England d, that the Scottifh nobles had been enabled to take the field, and to ad_ vance towards Leith. But as Elizabeth was dif. truftful of the Scots, and fludious to preferve ap_ pcarances with France, her fubfidies were beftow.

ed at first with extreme frugality. The fubfistence of an army, and the expences of a fiege, foon exhausted this penurious supply, to which the lords of the congregation could make little addition from their own funds; and the ruin and dispersion of the party must have instantly followed.

In order to prevent this, Cockburn of Ormifton was fent, with the utmoft expedition, to the governors of the town and caftle of Berwick. As Berwick was at that time the town of greateft importance on the Scottifh frontier, Sir Ralph Sadler and Sir James Crofts, perfons of confiderable figure, were employed to command there, and were entrufted with a diferetionary power of fupplying the Scottifh malecontents, according to the exigency of their affairs. From them Cockburn received four thoufand crowns, but little to the advantage of his affociates. The earl of Bothwell, by the queen's inftigation, lay in wait for him on his return, difperfed his followers, wounded him, and carried off the money.

This unexpected difappointment proved fatal to the party. In mere defpair fome of the more zealous attempted to affault Leith; but the French beat them back with difgrace, feized their cannon, and purfuing them to the gates of Edinburgh, were on the point of entering along with them. All the terror and confusion which the profpect of pillage or of maffacre can excite in a place taken by ftorm, filled the city on this occafion. The inhabitants fled from the enemy by the opposite gate; the forces of the congregation were irrefolute and difmayed; and the queen's partifans in the town openly infulted both. At laft, a few of the nobles ventured to face the enemy, who, after plundering fome houfes in the fuburbs, retired with their booty, and delivered the city from this dreadful alarm.

A fecond skirmish, which happened a few days after, was no lefs unfortunate. The French scnt out a detachment to intercept a convoy of provisions which was defigned for Edinburgh. The lords of the congregation, having intelligence of this, marched in all hafte with a confiderable body of their troops, and falling upon the enemy between Reitalrig and Leith, with more gallantry than good conduct, were almost furrounded by a fecond party of French, who advanced in order to fupport their own men. In this fituation a retreat was the only thing which could fave the Scots; but a retreat over marfhy ground, and in the face of an enemy fuperior in number, could not long be conducted with order. A body of the enemy hung upon their rear, horfe and foot fell into the utmost confusion, and it was entirely owing to the over-caution of the French, that any of the party escaped being cut in pieces.

On this fecond blow, the hopes and fpirits of the eongregation funk altogether. They did not think themfelves fecure even within the walls of Edinburgh, but inftantly determined to retire to fome place at a greater diftance from the enemy. În vain did the prior of St. Andrew's, and a few others, oppofe this cowardly and ignominious flight. The dread of the prefent danger prevailed over both the fenfe of honour and zeal for the caufe. At midnight [Nov. 6.] they fet out from Edinburgh in great confusion, and and marched without halting till they arrived at Stirling .

During this laft infurrection, the great body of the Scottish nobility joined the congregation. The lords Seton and Borthwick were the only perfons of rank who took arms for the queen, and affisted her in defending Leith f. Bothwell openly favoured her caufe, but refided at his own houfe. The earl of Huntly, conformable to the crafty policy which diftinguishes his character, amufed the leaders of the congregation, whom he had engaged to affift, with many fair promifes, but never joined them with a fingle man g. The earl of Morton, a member of the congregation, fluctuated in a state of irrefolution, and did not act heartily for the common caufe. Lord Erfkine, governor of Edinburgh caftle, though a proteftant, maintained a neutrality, which he deemed becoming the dignity of his office; and having been entrusted by parliament with the command of the principal fortrefs in the kingdom, he refolved that neither faction should get it into their hands.

A few days before the retreat of the congregation, the queen fuffered an irreparable loss by the defection of her principal fecretary, William Maitland of Lethington. His zeal for the reformed religion, together with his warm remon-ftrances against the violent measures which the queen was carrying on, exposed him fo much to her refentment, and to that of her French counfellors, that he, fuspecting his life to be in danger, withdrew fecretly from Leith, and fled to the lords of the congregation<sup>h</sup>; and they with open arms received a convert, whofe abilities added both ftrength and reputation to their caufe. Maitland had early applied to public bufiness admirable natural talents, improved by an acquaintance with the liberal arts; and, at a time of life when his countrymen of the fame quality were following the pleafures of the chace, or ferving as adventurers in the armies of France, he was admitted into all the fecrets of the cabinet, and put upon a level with perfons of the most confummate experience in the management of affairs. He poffeffed, in an eminent degree, that intrepid spirit which delights in purfuing bold defigns, and was no lefs mafter of that political dexterity which isneceffary for carrying them on with fuccefs. But thefe qualities were deeply tinctured with the neighbouring vices. His addrefs fometimes degenerated into cunning; his acuteness bordered upon excess; his invention, over-fertile, fuggefted to him, on fome occafions, chimerical fystems of policy, too refined for the genius of his age or country; and his enterprifiug fpirit engaged him in projects vaft and fplendid, but beyond his utmost power to execute. All the cotemporary writers, to whatever faction they belong, mention him with an admiration which nothing could have excited but the greatest fuperiority of penetration and abilities.

The precipitate retreat of the congregation increafed to fuch a degree the terror and confusion which had feized the party at Edinburgh, that, before the army reached Stirling, it dwindled to an inconfiderable number. The fpirit of Knox, however, fill remained undaunted and erect, and having mounted the pulpit, he addreffed, to his defponding hearers, an exhortation which wonderfully animated and revived them. The heads of this difcourfe are inferted in his hiftory <sup>1</sup>, and afford a ftriking example of the boldnefs and freedom of reproof affumed by the first reformers, as well as a fpecimen of his own skill in choosing the topics most fitted to influence and rouse his audience.

A meeting of the leaders being called, to confider what courfe they fhould hold, now that their own refources were all exhauited, and their destruction appeared to be unavoidable without foreign aid, they turned their eyes once more to England, and refolved to implore the affiftance of Elizabeth towards finishing an enterprife, in which they had fo fatally experienced their own weaknefs, and the ftrength of their adverfarics. Maitland, as the most able negociator of the party, was employed in this embaffy. In his abfence, and during the inactive feafon of the year, it was agreed to difmifs their followers, worn out . by the fatigues of a campaign which had fo far exceeded the usual time of fervice. But, in order to preferve the counties most devoted to their interest, the prior of St. Andrew's, with part of the leaders, retired into Fife. The duke of Chatelherault, with the reft, fixed his refidence at Hamilton. There was little need of Maitland's addrefs or eloquence to induce Elizabeth to take his country under her protection. She obferved the prevalence of the French counfels, and the progrefs of their arms in Scotland, with great concern; and as fhe well forefaw the dangerous tendency of their fchemes in that kingdom, fhe had already come to a refolution with regard to the part fhe herfelf would act, if their power there fhould grow ftill more formidable.

In order to give the queen and her privy council a full and distinct view of any important matter which might come before them, it feems to have been the practice of Elizabeth's ministers to prepare memorials, in which they clearly flated the point under deliberation, laid down the grounds of the conduct which they held to be most reasonable, and proposed a method for carrying their plan into execution. Two papers of this kind, written by Sir William Cecil with his own hand, and fubmitted by the queen to the confideration of her privy council, ftill remain k; they are entitled, "A fhort difcuffion of the weighty matter of Scotland," and do honour to the industry and penetration of that great minifter. The motives which determined the qucen to espouse fo warmly the defence of the congregation, are reprefented with perfpicuity and force : and the confequences of fuffering the French to establish themselves in Scotland, are predicted with great accuracy and difcernment.

He lays it down as a principle, agreeable to the laws both of God and of nature, that every fociety liath a right to defend itfelf, not only from prefent dangers, but from fuch as may probably enfue; to which he adds, that nature and reafon teach every prince to defend himfelf by the fame means which his adverfaries employ to diftrefs

him. Upon thefe grounds he eftablishes the right of England to interpofe in the affairs of Scotland, and to prevent the conquest of that kingdom, at which the French openly aimed. The French, he observes, are the ancient and implacable enemies of England. Hoftilities had fub-fifted between the two nations for many centuries. No treaty of peace into which they entered had ever been cordial or fincere. No good effect was therefore to be expected from the peace lately agreed upon, which, being extorted by prefent neceffity, would be negligently obferved, and broken on the flighteft pretences. In a very fhort time, France would recover its former opulence; and though now drained of men and money by a tedious and unfuccefsful war, it would quickly be in a condition for acting, and the reftless and martial genius of the people would render action neceffary. The princes of Lorrain, who at that time had the entire direction of French affairs, were animated with the most virulent hatred against the English nation. They openly called in queftion the legitimacy of the queen's birth, and by advancing the title and pretenfions of their niece the queen of Scotland, fludied to deprive. Elizabeth of her crown. With this view, they had laboured to exclude the English from the treaty of Chateau en Cambrefis, and endeavoured to conclude a feparate peace with Spain. They had perfuaded Henry II. to permit his daughterin-law to affume the title and arms of queen of England; and even fince the conclusion of the peace, they had folicited at Rome, and obtained, a bull declaring Elizabeth's birth to be illegitimate. Though the wifdom and moderation of the the conftable Montmorency had for fome time checked their career, yet thefe reftraints being now removed by the death of Henry II. and the difgrace of his minister, the utmost excesses of violence were to be dreaded from their furious ambition, armed with fovereign power. Scotland is the quarter where they can attack England with most advantage. A war on the borders of that country, exposes France to no danger, but one unfuccefsful action there may hazard the crown, and overturn the government, of England. In political conduct, it is childifh to wait till the defigns of an enemy be ripe for execution. The Scottish nobles, after their utmost efforts, have been obliged to quit the field; and, far from expelling the invaders of their liberties, they behold the French power daily increasing, and must at last ceafe from ftruggling any longer in a conteft fo unequal. The invading of England will immediately follow the reduction of the Scottish malecontents, by the abandoning of whom to the mercy of the French, Elizabeth will open a way for her enemies into the heart of her own kingdom, and expose it to the calamities of war, and the danger of conquest. Nothing therefore remained but to meet the enemy while yet at a diftance from England, and by supporting the congregation with a powerful army, to render Scotland the theatre of the war, to crush the designs of the princes of Lorrain in their infancy, and, by fuch an early and unexpected effort, to expel the French out of Britain, before their power had time to take root and grow up to any formidable height. But as the matter was of as much importance portance as any which could fall under the confideration of an Englifh monarch, wildom and mature counfel were neceffary in the first place, and afterwards vigour and expedition in conduct; the danger was urgent, and, by losing a fingle moment, might become unavoidable <sup>1</sup>.

Thefe arguments produced their full effect upon Elizabeth, who was jealous, in an extreme degree, of every pretender to her crown, and no lefs anxious to preferve the tranquillity and happinefs of her fubjects. From thefe motives the had acted, in granting the congregation an early fupply of money; and from the fame principles the determined, in their prefent exigency, to afford them more effectual aid. One of Maitland's attendants was inftantly difpatched into Scotland with the ftrongeft affurances of her protection, and the lords of the congregation were defired to fend commiffioners into England to conclude a treaty, and to fettle the operations of the campaign with the duke of Norfolk<sup>m</sup>.

Meanwhile the queen regent, from whom no motion of the congregation could long be concealed, dreaded the fuccefs of this negotiation with the court of England, and forefaw how little fhe would be able to refift the united effort of the two kingdoms. For this reafon fhe determined, if poffible, to get the flart of Elizabeth ; and by venturing, notwithflanding the inclemency of the winter feafon, to attack the malecontents in their 1559.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. 217 prefent difperfed and helplefs fituation, fhe hoped to put an end to the war before the arrival of their Englifh allies.

A confiderable body of her French forces, who were augmented about this time by the arrival of the count de Martigues, with a thoufand veteran foot, and fome cavalry, were commanded to march to Stirling. Having there croffed the Forth, they proceeded along the coaft of Fife, deftroying and plundering, with exceffive outrage, the houses and lands of those whom they deemed their enemies. Fife was the most populous and powerful county in the kingdom, and most devoted to the congregation, who had hitherto drawn from thence their most confiderable fupplies, both of men and provisions; and therefore, belides punishing the difaffection of the inhabitants, by pillaging the country, the French propoled to feize and fortify St. Andrew's, and to leave in it a garrifon fufficient to bridle the mutinous fpirit of the province, and to keep poffeffion of a port fituated on the main ocean<sup>n</sup>.

But, on this occafion, the prior of St. Andrew's, lord Ruthven, Kirkaldy of Grange, and a few of the moft active leaders of the congregation, pcrformed, by their bravery and good conduct, a fervice of the utmoft importance to their party. Having affembled fix hundred horfe, they infefted the French with continual incurtions, beat up their quarters, intercepted their convoys of provisions, cut off their ftraggling parties, and fo haraffed them with perpetual alarms, that they prevented them for more than three weeks from advancing°.

1560.] At last the prior, with his feeble party, was confirmined to retire, and the French fet out from Kirkaldy, and began to move along the coaft towards St. Andrew's [Jan. 23.]. They had advanced but a few miles, when, from an eminence, they deferied a powerful fleet fleering its courfe up the Frith of Forth. As they knew that the marquis D'Elbeuf was at that time preparing to fail for Seotland with a numerous army, they haftily concluded that these ships belonged to him, and gave way to the most immoderate transports of joy, on the prospect of this long-expected fuecour. Their great guns were already fired to welcome their friends, and to Ipread the tidings and terror of their arrival among their enemies, when a fmall boat from the oppofite coaft landed, and blafted their premature and short-lived triumph, by informing them, that it. was the fleet of England which was in fight, intended for the aid of the congregation, and was foon to be followed by a formidable land army P.

Throughout her whole reign, Elizabeth was cautious, but decifive; and by her promptitude in executing her refolutions, joined to the deliberation with which fhe formed them, her adminifiration became remarkable, no lefs for its vigour, than for its wifdom. No fooner did the determine to afford her protection to the lords of the congregation, than they experienced the activity, as well as the extent of her power. The lafon of the year would not permit her land army to take the field; but left the French fhould, in the mean time, receive new reinforcements, the instantly ordered a strong fquadron to cruife in the Frith of Forth. She feems, by her inftructions to Winter her admiral, to have been defirous of preferving the appearances of friendshiptowards the French 9. But these were only appearances; if any French fleet fhould attempt to land, he was commanded to prevent it, by every act of hostility and violence. It was the fight of this fquadron which occafioned at first fo much joy among the French, but which foon infpired them with fuch terror as faved Fife from the effects of their vengeance. Apprehenfive of being cut off from their companions on the opposite shore, they retreated towards Stirling with the utmost precipitation, and in a dreadful feafon, and through roads almost impaffable, arrived at Leith, haraffed and exhaufted with fatigue r.

The English fleet cast anchor in the road of Leith, and continuing in that flation till the conclufion of peace, both prevented the garrifon of Leith from receiving fuccours of any kind, and confiderably facilitated the operations of their own forces by land.

Soon after the arrival of the English fquadron, the commissioners of the congregation repaired to Berwick, and concluded with the duke of Norfolk a treaty [Feb. 27.], the bond of that union with Elizabeth which was of fo great advantage to the caufe. To give a check to the dangerous and rapid progrefs of the French arms in Scotland, was the profeffed defign of the contracting parties. In order to this, the Scots engaged never to fuffer any clofer union of their country with France; and to defend themfelves to the uttermost against all attempts of conquest. Elizabeth, on her part, promifed to employ in Scotland a powerful army for their affiftance, which the Scots undertook to join with all their forces; no place in Scotland was to remain in the hands of the English; whatever should be taken from the enemy, was either to be rafed, or kept by the Scots, at their choice; if any invafion fhould be made upon England, the Scots were obliged to affift Elizabeth with part of their forces; and to afcertain their faithful obfervance of the treaty, they bound themfelves to deliver hoftages to Elizabeth, before the march of her army into Scotland; in conclusion, the Scots made many protestations of obedience and loyalty towards their own queen, in every thing not inconfiftent with their religion, and the liberties of their country .

The English army, confiling of fix thousand foot and two thousand horse, under the command of lord Gray of Wilton, entered Scotland early in the spring [April 2.]. The members of the congregation assessment of their and having joined them, with great multitudes of their followers, they advanced together towards Leith. The French were little able to keep the field against an enemy so much superior in number. A strong body of troops, defined for their relief, had been scattered by a violent storm, and had either perished on the coast of France, or with difficulty had recovered the ports of that kingdom<sup>t</sup>. But they hoped to be able to defend Leith, till the princes of Lorrain should make. good the magnificent promifes of affiftance, with which they daily encouraged them ; or till fcarcity of provisions should constrain the English to retire into their own country. In order to haften this latter event, they did not neglect the ufual, though barbarous precaution for diffreffing an invading enemy, by burning and laying wafte all the adjacent country ". The zeal, however, of the nation frustrated their intentions; cager to contribute towards removing their oppreffors, the people produced their hidden ftores to fupport their friends; the neighbouring counties supplied every thing neceffary, and far from wanting fubfiftence, the English found in their camp all forts of provisions at a cheaper rate than had for fome time been known in that part of the kingdom x.

On the approach of the English army, the queen regent retired into the caftle of Edinburgh. Her health was now in a declining flate, and her mind broken and depreffed by the misfortunes of her administration. To avoid the danger and fatigue of a fiege, she committed herfelf to the protection of lord Erskine. This nobleman still preferved his neutrality, and by his integrity, and love of his country, merited equally the effeem of both parties. He received the queen herfelf with the utmost honour and respect, but took care to admit no such retinue as might endanger his command of the caffley.

A few days after they arrived in Scotland, the, English invested Leith [April 6.]. The garrison shut up within the town was almost half as numerous as the army which fat down before it, and by an obftinate defence protracted the fiege to a great length. The circumstances of this fiege, related hy contemporary historians, men without knowledge or experience in the art of war, are often obscure and imperfect, and at this diffance of time are not confiderable enough to be entertaining.

B. III.

At first the French endeavoured to keep poffoffion of the Hawk Hill, a rifing ground not far distant from the town, but were beat from it [April 15.] with great flaughter, chiefly by the furious attack of the Scottish cavalry. Within a few days the French had their full revenge; having fallied out with a ftrong body, they entered the English trenches, broke their troops, nailed part of their cannon, and killed at leaft double the number they had loft in the former skirmish. Nor were the English more fortunate in an attempt which they made to take the place by affault ; they were met with equal courage, and repulsed with confiderable loss [May 7.]. From the detail of thefe circumstances by the writers of that age, it is eafy to obferve the different characters of the French and English troops. The former, trained to war, during the active reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. defended themfelves not only with the bravery but with the skill of veterans. The latter, who had been more accuftomed to peace, ftill preferved the intrepid and defperate valour peculiar to the nation, but difcovered few marks of military genius, or of experience in the practice of war. Every misfortune or difappointment during the fiege must be imputed to manifest errors in conduct. The fuccefs 2

cefs of the befieged in their fally was owing entirely to the fecurity and negligence of the English; many of their officers were abfent; their foldiers had left their stations, and their trenches were almoft without a guard z. The ladders which had been provided for the affault, wanted a great deal of the necessary length; and the troops employed in that fervice were ill fupported. The trenches were opened at first in an improper place; and as it was found expedient to change the ground, both time and labour were loft. The inability of their own generals, no lefs than the ftrength of the French garrifon, rendered the progrefs of the English wonderfully flow. The long continuance, however, of the fiege, and the lofs of part of their magazines by an accidental fire, reduced the French to extreme diftrefs for want of provisions, which the prospect of relief made them bear with admirable fortitude.

While the hopes and courage of the French protracted the fiege fo far beyond expectation, the leaders of the congregation were not idle. By new affociations and confederacies, they laboured to unite their party more perfectly. By publicly ratifying the treaty concluded at Berwick, they endeavoured to render the alliance with England firm and indiffoluble. Among the fubfcribers of thefe papers we find the earl of Huntly, and fome others, who had not hitherto concurred with the congregation in any of their meafures <sup>a</sup>. Several of thefe lords, particularly the earl of Huntly, ftill adhered to the popifh church ; but on this occafion neither their religious fentiments, nor their former cautious maxims, were regarded; the torrent of national refentment and indignation against the French hurried them on <sup>b</sup>.

The queen regent, the inftrument, rather than the caufe of involving Scotland in those calamities under which it groaned at that time, died during the heat of the fiege [June 10.]. No princels ever poffeffed qualities more capable of rendering her administration illustrious, or the kingdom happy. Of much difcernment, and no lefs addrefs; of great intrepidity, and equal prudence; gentle and humane, without weaknefs; zealous for her religion, without bigotry; a lover of juffice, without rigour. One circumstance, how-ever, and that too the excess of a virtue, rather than any vicc, poifoned all thefe great qualities, and rendered her government unfortunate, and her name odious. Devoted to the interest of France, her native country, and attached to the princes of Lorrain, her brothers, with most paffionate fondnefs, fhe departed, in order to gratify them, from every maxim which her own wifdom or humanity would have approved. She outlived, <sup>b</sup> The dread of the French power did on many occasions furmount the zeal which the catholic nobles had for their religion. Befides the prefumptive evidence for this, arifing from the memorial mentioned by Burnet, Hift. of the Reformation, vol. iii. 281. and published by him, Append. p. 278; the infructions of Elizabeth to Randolph her agent, put it beyond all doubt, that many zealous papifts thought the alliance with England to be neceffary for preferving the liberty and independence of the kingdom. But even by her enemies these unjustifiable actions were imputed to the facility, not to the malignity, of her nature ; and while they taxed her brothers and French counfellors with rafhnefs and cruelty, they ftill allowed her the praife of prudence and of lenity<sup>c</sup>. A few days before her death, she defired an interview with the prior of St. Andrew's, the earl of Argyll, and other chiefs of the congregation. To them she lamented the fatal issue of those violent counfels which she had been obliged to follow; and, with the candour natural to a generous mind, confessed the errors of her own administration, and begged forgiveness of those to whom they had been hurtful; but at the fame time fhe warned them, amidft their ftruggles for liberty and the flock of arms, not to lofe fight of the loyalty and fubjection which was due to their fovereign 4. The remainder of her time she employed in religious meditations and exercifes. She even invited the attendance of Willox, one of the most eminent among the reformed preach-ers, listened to his instructions with reverence and attention e, and prepared for the approach of death with a decent fortitude.

Nothing could now fave the French troops fhut up in Leith, but the immediate conclusion of a peace, or the arrival of a powerful army from the continent. The princes of Lorrain amufed their party in Scotland with continual expectations of the latter, and had thereby kept alive their hopes and their courage ; but atlast, the lituation of France, rather than the terror of the English arms, or the remonstrances of the Scottifh malecontents, conftrained them, though with reluctance, to turn their thoughts towards pacific councils. The protestants in France were at that time a party formidable by their number, and more by the valour and enterprifing genius of their leaders. Francis II. had treated them with extreme rigour, and discovered, by every ftep he took, a fettled refolution to extirpate their religion, and to ruin those who professed it. At the profpect of this danger to themfelves and to their cause, the protestants were alarmed, but not terrified. Animated with zeal, and inflamed with refentment, they not only prepared for their own defence, but refolved, by fome bold action, to anticipate the fchemes of their enemies; and as the princes of Lorrain were deemed the authors of all the king's violent measures, they marked them out to be the first victims of their indignation. Hence, and not from difloyalty to the king, proceeded the famous confpiracy of Amboife [March 15.]; and though the vigilance and good fortune of the princes of Lorrain difcovered and difappointed that defign, it was eafy to obferve new florms gathering in every province of the kingdom, and ready to burft out with all the fury and outrage of civil war. In this fituation, the ambition of the houfe of Lorrain was called off from the thoughts of foreign conquefts, to

to defend the honour and dignity of the French crown; and inftead of fending new reinforcements into Scotland, it became neeeffary to withdraw the veteran troops already employed in that kingdom<sup>f</sup>.

In order to conduct an affair of fo much importance and delicacy, the princes of Lorrain. made choice of Monluc bishop of Valence, and of the fieur de Randan. As both thefe, especially the former, were reckoned inferior to no perfons of that age in address and political refinement, Elizabeth oppofed to them ambaffadors of equal abilities ; Cecil her prime minister, a man perhaps of the greatest capacity who had ever held that office ; and Wotton dean of Canterbury, grown old in the art of negociating under three fucceffive monarchs. The interests of the French and English courts were soon adjusted by men of so great dexterity in bufinefs; and as France eafily confented to withdraw those forces which had been the chief occasion of the war, the other points in difpute between that kingdom and England were not matters of tedious or of difficult difcuffion.

The grievances of the congregation, and their demands upon their own fovereigns for redrefs, employed longer time, and required to be treated with a more delicate hand. After fo many open attempts, carried on by command of the king and queen, in order to overturn the ancient conflitution, and to fupprefs the religion which they had embraced, the Scottifh nobles could not think themfelves fecure, without fixing fome new barrier against the future encroachments of regal power. But the legal fleps towards accomplifiing this were not fo obvious. The French amhaffadors confidered the entering into any treaty with fubjects, and with rebels, as a condefcenfion unfuitable to the dignity of a fovereign ; and their fcruples on this head might have put an end to the treaty, if the impatience of both parties for peace had not fuggested an expedient, which feemed to provide for the fecurity of the fubject, without derogating from the honour of the prince. The Scottish nobles agreed, on this occafion, to pass from the point of right and privilege, and to accept the redrefs of their grievances as a matter of favour. Whatever additional fecurity their anxiety for perfonal fafety, or their zeal for public liberty, prompted them to demand, was granted in the name of Francis and Mary, as acts of their royal favour and indulgence. And left conceffions of this kind fhould feem precarious, and liable to be retracted by the fame power which had made them, the French ambafiador agreed to infert them in the treaty with Elizabeth, and thereby to bind the king and queen inviolably to obferve them ..

In relating this transaction, contemporary historians have confounded the concessions of Francis and Mary to their Scottish fubjects, with the treaty between France and England; the latter, befides the ratification of former treaties between the two kingdoms, and stipulations with regard to the time and manner of removing both armies out of Scotland, contained an article to which, as the fource of many important events, we shall often have occasion to refer. The right of Elizabeth to her crown is thereby acknowledged in g Keith, 134, &c.

July 6.] Honourable as this article was for Elizabeth herfelf, the conditions fhe obtained for her allies the Scots were no lefs advantageous to them. Monluc and Randan confented, in the name of Francis and Mary, that the French forces in Scotland fhould inftantly be fent back into their own country, and no foreign troops be hereafter introduced into the kingdom without the knowledge and confent of parliament; that the fortifieations of Leith and Dunbar should immediately be rafed, and no new fort be erected without the permiffion of parliament; that a parliament fhould be held on the first day of August, and that affembly be deemed as valid in all respects as if it had been called by the express commandment of the king and queen; that, conformable to the ancient laws and cuftoms of the country, the king and queen should not declare war or conclude peace without the concurrence of parliament; that, during the queen's absence, the administration of government should be vested in a council of twelve perfons, to be chosen out of twenty-four named by parliament, feven of which council to be elected by the queen, and five by the parliament ; that hereafter the king and queen should not advance foreigners to places of trust or dignity in the kingdom, nor confer the offices of treasurer or comptroller of the revenues upon any ecclefiaftic; that an act of oblivion, abolifh-ing the guilt and memory of all offences committed fince the fixth of March one thousand five hundred and fifty-eight, should be passed in the enfuing parliament, and be ratified by the king and queen; that the king and queen should not, under the colour of punishing any violation of their authority during that period, feek to deprive any of their subjects of the offices, benefices, or estates, which they now held; that the redrefs due to churchmen, for the injuries which they had fuftained during the late infurrections, should be left entirely to the cognizance of parliament. With regard to religious controversies, the ambaffadors declared that they would not prefume to decide, but permitted the parliament, at their first meeting, to examine the points in difference, and to reprefent their fenfe of them to the king and queen i.

To fuch a memorable period did the lords of the congregation, by their courage and perfeverance, conduct an enterprife which at firft promifed a very different iffue. From beginnings extremely feeble, and even contemptible, the party grew by degrees to great power; and being favoured by many fortunate incidents, baffled all the efforts of their own queen, aided by the forces of a more confiderable kingdom. The fovereign authority was by this treaty transferred wholly into the hands of the congregation; that limited prerogative, which the crown had hitherto poffeffed, was almost entirely annihilated; and the ariftocratical power, which always predominated in the Scottish government, became fupreme and incontrolable. By this treaty too the influence of

France,

France, which had long been of much weight in the affairs of Scotland, was greatly diminished; and not only were the prefent encroachments of that ambitious ally reftrained, but, by confederating with England, protection was provided against any future attempt from the fame quarter. At the fame time, the controverfies in religion being left to the confideration of parliament, the protestants might reckon upon obtaining whatever decision was most favourable to the opinions which they profeffed.

A few days after the conclusion of the treaty, both the French and English armies quitted Scotland.

The eyes of every man in that kingdom were turned towards the approaching parliament. A meeting, fummoned in a manner fo extraordinary, at fuch a critical juncture, and to deliberate upon matters of fo much confequence, was expected with the utmost anxiety.

A Scottish parliament fuitable to the ariftocratical genius of the government, was properly an affembly of the nobles. It was composed of bifhops, abbots, barons, and a few commiffioners of boroughs, who met altogether in one house. The leffer barons, though poffeffed of a right to be prefent, either in perfon or by their reprefentatives, feldom exercifed it. The expence of attending, according to the fashion of the times, with a numerous train of vaffals and dependants; the inattention of a martial age to the forms and detail of civil government ; but above all, the exorbitant authority of the greater nobles, who had drawn the whole power into their own hands, made this privilege of fo little value, as to be almolt most neglected. It appears from the ancient rolls, that during times of tranquillity, few commissioners of boroughs, and almost none of the leffer barons, appeared in parliament. The ordinary administration of government was abondoned, without fcruple or jealoufy, to the king and to the greater barons, but in extraordinary conjunctures, when the ftruggle for liberty was violent, and the fpirit of oppolition to the crown role to an height, the burgeffes and leffer barons were roufed from their inactivity, and flood forth to vindicate the rights of their country. The turbulent reign of Tames III. affords examples in proof of this obfervation k. The public indignation against the rash defigns of that weak and ill-advised prince, brought into parliament, befides the greater nobles and prelates, a confiderable number of the leffer barons.

The fame caufes occafioned the unufual confluence of all orders of men to the parliament, which met on the firft of Auguft. The univerfal paffion for liberty, civil and religious, which had feized the nation, fuffered few perfons to remain unconcerned fpectators of an affembly, whofe acts were likely to prove decifive with refpect to both. From all corners of the kingdom men flocked in, eager and determined to aid, with their voices in the fenate, the fame caufe which they had defended with their fwords in the field. Befides a full convention of peers, temporal and fpiritual, there appeared the reprefentatives of almost all the boroughs, and above an hundred barons, who, though of the leffer order, were gentlemen of the first rank and fortune in the nation <sup>1</sup>.

1560.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

The parliament was ready to enter on bufinefs with the utmost zeal, when a difficulty was started concerning the lawfulnefs of the meeting. No commiffioner appeared in the name of the king and queen, and no fignification of their confent and approbation was yet received. These were deemed by many effential to the very being of a parliament. But in opposition to this fentiment, the exprefs words of the treaty of Edinburgh were urged, by which this affembly was declared to be as valid, in all respects, as if it had been called and appointed by the express command of the king and queen. As the adherents of the congregation greatly outnumbered their adverfarics, the latter opinion prevailed. Their boldeft leaders, and those of most approved zeal, were chosen to be lords of the articles, who formed a committee of ancient ufe, and of great importance in the Scottifh parliament m. The deliberations of the lords of the articles were carried on with the most unanimous and active zeal. The act of oblivion, the nomination of twenty-four perfons, out of whom the council, intrufted with fupreme authority, was to be elected; and every other thing prefcribed by the late treaty, or which feemed necessary to render it effectual, paffed without dispute or delay. The article of religion employed longer time, and was attended with greater difficulty. It was brought into parliament by a petition from those who adopted the principles of the reformation. Many doctrines of the popifh church were a contradiction to reafon, and a difgrace to religion; its difcipline had become corrupt and oppreflive; and its revenues were both exorbitant and ill-applied. Againft all thefe the proteftants remonstrated with the utmost afperity of ftyle which indignation at their abfurdity, or experience of their pernicious tendency, could infpire; and encouraged, by the number as well as zeal of their friends, to improve fuch a favourable juncture, they aimed the blow at the whole fabric of popery; and befought the parliament to interpofe its authority for rectifying thefe multiplied abufes ".

<sup>m</sup> From an original letter of Hamilton, archbishop of St. Andrew's, it appears, that the lords of articles were chosen in the manner afterwards appointed by an act of parliament, 1633. Keith, p. 487. Spottiswood feems to confider this to have been the common practice. Hist. 149.

Several prelates, zealoufly attached to the ancient superstition, were prefent in this parliament. But duing these vigorous proceedings of the protestants, they flood confounded and at gaze; and perfevered in a filence which was fatal to their caufe. They deemed it impossible to refift or divert that torrent of religious zeal, which was still in its full strength; they dreaded that their opposition would irritate their adverfaries, and excite them to new acts of violence; they hoped that the king and queen would foon be at leifure to put a flop to the eareer of their infolent fubjects, and that, after the rage and havoc of the prefent florm, the former tranquillity and order would be reftored to the church and kingdom. They were willing, perhaps, to faerifice the doctrine, and even the power of the church, in order to enfure the fafety of their own perfons, and to preferve the poffeffion of those revenues which were still in their hands. From

whate-

whatever motives they acted, their filence, which was imputed to the confcioufnefs of a bad caufe, afforded matter of great triumph to the proteftants, and encouraged them to proceed with more boldnefs and alacrity °.

The parliament did not think it enough to condemn those doctrines mentioned in the petition of the protestants; they moreover gave the fanction of their approbation to a confession of faith prefented to them by the reformed teachers P; and composed, as might be expected from fuch a performance at that juncture, on purpole to expose the abfurd tenets and practices of the Romish church. By another act, the jurisdiction of the ecclesiaftical courts was abolished, and the caufes which formerly came under their cognizance were transferred to the decifion of civil judges 9. By a third flatute, the exercise of religious worship, according to the rites of the Romish church, was prohibited. The manner in which the parliament enforced the obfervation of this law difcovers the zeal of that affembly ; the first transgreffion fubjected the offender to the forfeiture of his goods, and to a corporal punifhment, at the difcretion of the judge; banifiment was the penalty of a fecond violation of the law ; and a third act of difobedience was declared to be capital r. Such ftrangers were men at that time to the fpirit of toleration, and to the laws of humanity; and with fuch indecent hafte did the very perfons who had just escaped the rigour of ecclesiaftical tyranny, proceed to imitate those examples of feverity of which they themfelves had fo juftly complained.

The vigorous zeal of the parliament overturned in a few days the ancient fyftem of religion which had been eftablished fo many ages. In reforming the doctrine and discipline of the church, the nobles kept pace with the ardour and expectations even of Knox himfelf. But their proceedings, with refpect to thefe, were not more rapid and impetuous, than they were flow and dilatory when they entered on the confideration of ecclefiaffical revenues. Among the lay members, fome were already enriched with the fpoils of the church, and others devoured in expectation the wealthy bencfices which still remained untouched. The alteration in religion had afforded many of the dignified ecclefiaftics themfelves an opportunity of gratifying their avarice or ambition. The demolition of the monasteries having fet the monks at liberty from their confinement, they inftantly difperfed all over the kingdom, and commonly betook themfelves to fome fecular employment. The abbot, if he had been fo fortunate as to embrace the principles of the reformation from conviction, or fo cunning as to efpoufe them out of policy, feized the whole revenues of the fraternity; and, except what he allowed for the fubfistence of a few fuperannuated monks', applied them entirely to his own ufe. The propofal made by the reformed teachers, for applying thefe revenues towards the maintenance of ministers, the education of youth, and the fupport of the poor, was equally dreaded by all these orders of men. They oppofed it with the utmoft warmth, and by their numbers and authority eafily prevailed on the parliament to give no car to fuch a difagreeable demand<sup>4</sup>. Zealous as the firft reformers were, and animated with a fpirit fuperior to the low confiderations of intercft, they beheld thefe early fymptoms of felfiftnefs and avarice among their adherents with amazement and forrow; and we find Knox expreffing the utmost fensibility of that contempt with which they were treated by many from whom he expected a more generous concern for the fuccels of religion and the honour of its minifters ".

A difficulty hath been flarted with regard to the acts of this parliament concerning religion. This difficulty, which at fuch a diffance of time is of no importance, was founded on the words of the treaty of Edinburgh. By that, the parliament was permitted to take into confideration the ftate of religion, and to fignify their fentiments of it to the king and queen. But, inftead of prescnting their defires to their fovereigns in the humble form of a fupplication or address, the parliament converted them into fo many acts ; which, although they never received the royal affent, obtained, all over the kingdom, the weight and authority of laws. In compliance with their injunctions, the eftablished fystem of religion was every where overthrown, and that recommended by the reformers introduced in its place. The partiality and zeal of the people overlooked or supplied any defect in the form of these acts of parliament, and rendered the observance of them more univerfal than ever had been yielded to the statutes of the most regular or constitutional affembly. By those proceedings, it must, however, be confessed, that the parliament, or rather the nation, violated the last article in the treaty of Edinburgh, and even exceeded the powers which belong to fubjects. But when once men have been accuftomed to break through the common boundaries of fubjection, and their minds are inflamed with the paffions which civil war infpires, it is mere pedantry or ignorance to measure their conduct by those rules which can be applied only where government is in a ftate of order and tranquillity. A nation, when obliged to employ fuch extraordinary efforts in defence of its liberties, avails itfelf of every thing which can promote this great end; and the neceffity of the cafe, as well as the importance of the object, juftify any departure from the common and eftablished rules of the conftitution.

In confequence of the treaty of Edinburgh, as well as by the ordinary forms of buinefs, it became neceffary to lay the proceedings of parliament before the king and queen. For this purpofe, Sir James Sandilands of Calder lord St. Jolin was appointed to repair to the court of France. After holding a courfe fo irregular, the leaders of the congregation had no reafon to flatter themfelves that Francis and Mary would ever approve their conduct, or confirm it by their royal affent. The reception of their ambaffador was no other than they might have expected. He was treated by the king and queen with the utmoft coldnefs, and difmiffed without obtaining the ratification of the parliament's proceedings. From the princes of Lorrain, and their partilans, he endured all the

the fcorn and infult which it was natural for them to pour upon the party he reprefented<sup>x</sup>.

Though the earls of Morton, Glencairn, and Maitland of Lethington, the ambaffadors of the parliament to Elizabeth their protectrefs, met with a very different reception, they were not more fuccessful in one part of the negociation entrusted to their care. The Scots, fensible of the fecurity which they derived from their union with England, were defirous of rendering it indiffoluble. With this view they empowered these eminent leaders of their party to tellify to Elizabeth their gratitude for that feafonable and effectual aid which fhe had afforded them, and at the fame time to befeech her to render the friendship between the nations perpetual, by condescending to marry the earl of Arran, who, though a fubject, was nearly allied to the royal family of Scotland, and, after Mary, the undoubted heir to the crown.

To the former part of this commission Elizabeth liftened with the utmost fatisfaction, and encouraged the Scots, in any future exigency, to hope for the continuance of her good offices; with regard to the latter, fhe difcovered those fentiments to which the adhered throughout her whole reign. Averse from marriage, as some maintain through choicc, but more probably out of policy, that ambitious princes would never admit any partner to the throne; but delighted with the entire and uncontrolled exercise of power, the facrificed to the enjoyment of that, the hopcs of transmitting her crown to her own posterity. marriage with the earl of Arran could not be attended with any fuch extraordinary advantage as to fhake this refolution; fhe declined it therefore, but with many expressions of good-will towards the Scottish nation, and of respect for Arran himself *.

Towards the conclusion of this year, diffinguifhed by fo many remarkable events, there happened one of great importance. On the fourth of December died Francis II. a prince of a feeble conftitution, and of a mean understanding. As he did not leave any iffue by the queen, no incident could have been more fortunate to those who, during the late commotions in Scot-. land, had taken part with the congregation. Mary, by the charms of her beauty, had acquired an entire afcendant over her husband : and as the transferred all her influence to her uncles the princes of Lorrain, Francis followed them implicitly in whatever track they were pleafed to lead him. The power of France, under fuch direction, alarmed the Scottifh malecontents with apprehensions of danger, no lefs formidable than well founded. The inteffine diforders which raged in France, and the feafonable interposition of England in behalf of the congregation, had hitherto prevented the princes of Lorrain from carrying their defigns upon Scotland into execution. But under their vigorous and decifive administration, it was impoffible that the commotions in France could be of long continuance, and many things might fall in to divert Elizabeth's attention, for the future, from the affairs of Scotland. In either of these events, the Scots would fland exposed to all the vengeance which the refentment of the French court could inflict. The blow, however long fufpended, was unavoidable, and must fall at last with redoubled weight. From this profpect and expectation of danger, the Scots were delivered. by the death of Francis; the ancient confederacy of the two kingdoms had already been broken, and by this event the chief bond of union which remained was diffolved. Catherine of Medicis, who, during the minority of Charles IX. her fecond fon, engroffed the entire direction of the French councils, was far from any thoughts of vindicating the Seottifh queen's authority. Catherine and Mary had been rivals in power during the reign of Francis II. and had contended for the government of that weak and unexperienced prince; but as the charms of the wife eafily triumphed over the authority of the mother, Catherine could never forgive fuch a difappointment in her favourite passion, and beheld now, with feeret pleafure, the difficult and perplexing fcene on which her daughter-in-law was about to enter. Mary, overwhelmed with all the forrow which fo fad a reverse of fortune eould occafion ; flighted by the queen-mother z; and forfaken by the tribe of courtiers, who appear only in the funshine of profperity, retired to Rheims, and there in folitude indulged her grief, or hid her indignation. Even the princes of Lorrain were obliged to contract their views; to turn them from foreign to domeftic objects; and inflead of forming vaft projects with regard to Britain, they found it neceffary to think of acquiring and eftablishing an interest with the new administration.

It is impoffible to defcribe the emotions of joy which, on all thefe accounts, the death of the French monarch excited among the Scots. They regarded it as the only event which could give firmnefs and ftability to that fyftem of religion and government which was now introduced; and it is no wonder contemporary hiftorians fhould afcribe it to the immediate care of Providence, which, by unforefeen expedients, can fecure the peace and happinefs of kingdoms in those fituations where human prudence and invention would utterly defpair<sup>a</sup>.

About this time the proteftant church of Scotland began to affume a regular form. Its principles had obtained the fanction of public authority, and fome fixed external policy became neceffary for the government and prefervation of the infant fociety. The model introduced by the reformers differed extremely from that which had been long eftablished. The motives which induced them to depart fo far from the ancient fyftem deferve to be explained.

The licentious lives of the clergy, as has been already obferved, feem to have been among the first things that excited any fuspicion concerning the truth of the doctrines which they taught, and roufed that spirit of inquiry which proved fatal to the popish system. As this difgust at the vices of ecclesiastics was soon transferred to their perfons, and shifting from them, by no violent transition, fettled at last upon the offices which they enjoyed; the effects of the Reformation would naturally have extended not only to the doctrine, but to the form of government in the popifh church; and the fame fpirit which abolifhed the former, would have overturned the latter. But in the arrangements which took place in the different kingdoms and flates of Europe in confequence of the Reformation, we may obferve fomething fimilar to what happened upon the first establishment of Christianity in the Roman empire. In both periods, the form of ecclefiaftical policy was modelled, in fome meafure, upon that of the civil government. When the Chriftian church was patronifed and eftablished by the flate, the jurifdiction of the various orders of the ecclefiaftics, diftinguished by the names of Patriarchs, Archbishops, and Bishops, was made to correspond with the various divisions of the empire ; and the ecclefiaftic of chief eminence in each of thefe poffeffed authority more or lefs extensive in proportion to that of the civil magiftrate who prefided over the fame diffrict. When the Reformation took place, the epifcopal form of government, with its various ranks and de-grees of fubordination, appearing to be most confistent with the genius of monarchy, it was continued, with a few limitations, in feveral provinces of Germany, in England, and in the northern kingdoms. But in Switzerland and fome parts of the Low Countries where the popular form of government allowed more full fcope to the innovating genius of the Reformation, all pre-eminence of order in the church was deftroyed, and an equality established more fuitable to the fpirit of republican policy. As the

the model of cpifcopal government was copied from that of the Christian church as established in the Roman empire, the fituation of the primitive church, prior to its establishment by civil authority, feems to have fuggested the idea, and furnished the model of the latter fystem, which has fince been denominated Presbyterian. The first Christians, oppressed by continual perfecutions, and obliged to hold their religious affentblies by stealth and in corners, were contented with a form of government extremely fimple. The influence of religion concurred with the fenfe of danger, in extinguishing among them the spirit of ambition, and in preferving a parity of rank, the effect of their fufferings, and the caufe of many of their virtues. Calvin, whole decifions were received among many protestants of that age with incredible fubmiffion, was the patron and reftorer of this fcheme of ecclefiaftical policy. The church of Geneva, formed under his eye and by his direction, was deemed the most perfect model of this government; and Knox, who, during his refidence in that city, had fludied and admired it, warmly recommended it to the imitation of his countrymen.

Among the Scottish nobility, fome hated the perfons, and others coveted the wealth, of the dignified clergy. By abolishing that order of men, the former indulged their refentment, and the latter hoped to gratify their avarice. The people, inflamed with the most violent aversion to popery, and approving of every scheme that departed farthest from the practice of the Romish church, were delighted with a system for admirably fuited to their predominant passion: while the 1560.7

the friends of civil liberty beheld with pleafure the proteftant clergy pulling down with their own hands that fabric of ecclefiaftical power which their predeceffors had reared with fo much art and induftry; and flattered themfelves, that by lending their aid to ftrip churchmen of their dignity and wealth, they might entirely deliver the nation from their exorbitant and oppreflive jurifdiction. The new mode of government eafily made its way among men thus prepared, by their various interefts and paffions, for its reception.

But, on the first introduction of his fystem, Knox did not deem it expedient to depart altogether from the ancient form b. Instead of biflops, he proposed to establish ten or twelve fuperintendants in different parts of the kingdom. Thefe, as the name implies, were empowered to inspect the life and doctrine of the other clergy. They prefided in the inferior judicatories of the church, and performed feveral other parts of the episcopal function. Their jurifdiction, however, extended to facred things only; they claimed no feat in parliament, and pretended no right to the dignity or revenues of the former bishops.

The number of inferior clergy, to whom the care of parochial duty could be committed, was ftill extremely fmall; they had embraced the principles of the Reformation at different times, and from various motives; during the public commotions, they were fcattered, merely by chance, over the different provinces of the kingdom; and in a few places only were formed into regular claffes or focieties. affembly of the church [Dec. 20.], which was held this year, bears all the marks of an infant and unformed fociety. The members were but few in number, and of no confiderable rank ; no uniform or confiftent rule feems to have been obferved in electing them. From a great part of the kingdom no representatives appeared. In the name of fome entire counties, but one perfon was prefent ; while, in other places, a fingle town or church fent feveral members. A convention, fo feeble and irregular, could not poffefs extensive authority; and, confcious of their own weaknefs, the members put an end to their debates, without venturing upon any decifion of much importance c.

1561.] In order to give greater ftrength and confiftence to the prefbyterian plan, Knox, with the affiftance of his brethren, composed the first book of discipline, which contains the model or platform of the intended policy d. They prefented it to a convention of estates, which was held in the beginning of this year [Jan. 15.]. Whatever regulations were propofed with regard to ecclefiaftical difcipline and jurifdiction, would have eafily obtained the fanction of that affembly ; but a defign to recover the patrimony of the church, which is there infinuated, met with a very different reception.

In vain did the clergy difplay the advantages which would accrue to the public, by a proper application of ecclefiaftical revenues. In vain did they propose, by an impartial distribution of this fund, to promote true religion, to encourage learning, and to fupport the poor. In vain did they even intermingle threatenings of the divine difpleafure against the unjust detainers of what was appropriated to a facred ufe. The nobles held fast the prey which they had feized; and beftowing upon the proposal the name of a devout imagination, they affected to confider it as a project altogether visionary, and treated it with the utmost fcorn °.

This convention appointed the prior of St. Andrew's to repair to the queen, and to invite her to return into her native country, and to affume the reius of government, which had been too long committed to other hands. Though fome of her fubjects dreaded her return, and others forefaw dangerous confequences with which it might be attended f, the bulk of them defired it with fo much ardour, that the invitation was given with the greatest appearance of unanimity. But the zeal of the Roman catholics got the ftart of the prior in paying court to Mary; and Lefly, afterwards bishop of Rofs. who was commiffioned by them, arrived before him at the place of her refidences. Lefly endeavoured to infuse into the queen's mind fufpicions of her protestant fubjects, and to perfuade her to throw herfelf entirely into the arms of those who adhered to her own religion. For this purpose, he infifted that she should land at Aberdeen; and as the protestant doctrines had made no confiderable progrefs in that part of the kingdom, he gave her affurance of being joined in a few days by twenty thoufand mcn; and flattered her, that with fuch an army, encouraged by her prefence and authority, fhe might eafily overturn the reformed church, before it was firmly fettled on its foundations.

But, at this juncture, the princes of Lorrain were not difposed to liften to this extravagant and dangerous proposal. Intent on defending themselves against Catherine of Medicis, whole infidious policy was employed in undermining their exorbitant power, they had no leifure to attend to the affairs of Scotland, and wilhed their niece to take poffeffion of her kingdom with as little disturbance as possible. The French officers too, who had ferved in Scotland, diffuaded Mary from all violent measures; and, by reprefenting the power and number of the protestants to be irrefiftible, determined her to court them by every art; and rather to employ the leading men of that party as ministers, than to provoke them, by a fruitlefs opposition, to become her enemies <sup>h</sup>. Hence proceeded the confidence and affection with which the prior of St. Andrew's was received by the queen. His reprefentation of the state of the kingdom gained great credit ; and Lefly beheld with regret the new channel in which court favour was likely to run.

Another convention of effates was held in May. The arrival of an ambaffador from France feems to have been the occafion of this meeting. He was infructed to folicit the Scots to renew their ancient alliance with France, to break their new confederacy with England, and to reftore the popific eccletiaftics to the poffeffion of their revenues and the exercise of their functions. It is no eafy matter to form any conjecture conh Mely. 61.

cerning the intentions of the French court in making these extraordinary and ill-timed propofitions. They were rejected with that form which might well have been expected from the temper of the nation <sup>1</sup>.

In this convention, the protestant clergy did not obtain a more favourable audience than formerly, and their profpect of recovering the patrimony of the church still remained as distant and uncertain as ever. But, with regard to another point, they found the zeal of the nobles in no degree abated. The book of difcipline feemed to require that the monuments of popery, which ftill remained in the kingdom, should be demolifhed k; and, though neither the fame pretence of policy, nor the fame ungovernable rage of the people, remained, to juftify or excufe this barbarous havoc, the convention, confidering every religious fabric as a relic of idolatry, paffed fentence upon them by an act in form; and perfons the most remarkable for the activity of their zeal were appointed to put it in execution. Abbies, churches, libraries, records, and even the fepulchres of the dead, perifhed in one common ruin. The ftorm of popular infurrection, though impctuous and irrefiftible, had extended only to a few counties, and foon fpent its rage ; but now a deliberate and univerfal rapine completed the devastation of every thing venerable and magnificent which had efcaped its violence 1.

In the mean time, Mary was in no hafte to return into Scotland. Accuftomed to the elegance, fplendour, and gaiety of a polite court, fhe ftill fondly lingered in France, the fcene of all thefe <sup>i</sup> Knox, 269. 273. k Spotfwood, 153. 1 Ibid. 174. enjoyments, enjoyments, and contemplated with horror the barbarifm of her own country, and the turbulence of her fubjects, which prefented her with a very different face of things. The impatience, however, of her people, the perfuafions of her uncles, but above all the fludied and mortifying neglect with which fhe was treated by the queen mother, forced her to think of beginning this difagreeable voyage<sup>m</sup>. But while fhe was preparing for it, there were fown between her and Elizabeth the feeds of that perfonal jealoufy and difcord, which embittered the life and fhortened the days of the Scottifh queen.

The ratification of the late treaty of Edinburgh was the immediate occafion of this fatal animofity; the true caufe of it lay much deeper. Almoft every article in that treaty had been executed by both parties with a fcrupulous exactnefs. The fortifications of Leith were demolifhed, and the armies of France and England withdrawn within the appointed time. The grievances of the Scottifh malecontents were redreffed, and they had obtained whatever they could demand for their future fecurity. With regard to all thefe, Mary could have little reafon to decline, or Elizabeth to urge, the ratification of the treaty.

The fixth article remained the only fource of conteft and difficulty. No minifter ever entered more deeply into the fchemes of his fovereign, or purfued them with more dextcrity and fuccefs, than Cecil. In the conduct of the negociation at Edinburgh, the found underftanding of this able politician had proved greatly an overmatch for Monluc's refinements in intrigue, and had artfully induced the French ambaffadors, not only to acknowledge that the crowns of England and Ireland did of right belong to Elizabeth alone, but alfo to promife, that in all times to come Mary fhould abftain from using the titles, or bearing the arms, of those kingdoms.

The ratification of this article would have been of the most fatal confequence to Mary. The crown of England was an object worthy of her ambition. Her pretensions to it gave her great dignity and importance in the eyes of all Europe. By many, her title was efteemed preferable to that of Elizabeth. Among the English themselves, the Roman catholics, who formed at that time a numerous and active party, openly espouled this opinion ; and even the protestants, who supported Elizabeth's throne, could not deny the queen of Scots to be her immediate heir. A proper opportunity to avail herfelf of all these advantages could not, in the courfe of things, be far diftant, and many incidents might fall in, to bring this opportunity nearer than was expected. In these circumftances, Mary, by ratifying the article in difpute, would have loft that rank which fhe had hitherto held among neighbouring princes; the zeal of her adherents must have gradually cooled; and she might have renounced, from that moment, all hopes of ever wearing the English crown n.

None of those beneficial confequences escaped the penetrating eye of Elizabeth, who, for this reason, had recourfe to every thing by which she could hope either to sooth or frighten the Scottifh queen into a compliance with her demands; and if that princefs had been fo unadvifed as to ratify the rafh conceffions of her ambaffadors, Elizabeth, by that deed, would have acquired an advantage, which, under her management, muft have turned to great account. By fuch a renunciation, the queftion with regard to the right of fueceffion would have been left altogether open and undeeided; and, by means of that, Elizabeth might either have kept her rival in perpetual anxiety and dependence, or, by the authority of her parliament, she might have broken in upon the order of lineal fueceffion, and transferred the crown to fome other defcendant of the royal blood. The former conduct she observed towards James VI. whom, during his whole reign, fhe held in perpetual fear and fubjection. The latter and more rigorous method of proceeding would, in all probability, have been employed against Mary, whom, for many reafons, she both envied and hated.

Nor was this step beyond her power, unpreeedented in the hiftory, or inconfiltent with the conftitution of England. Though fuceeffion by hereditary right be an idea fo natural and fo popular, that it has been eftablished in almost every civilized nation, yet England affords many memorable inftances of deviation from that rule. The crown of that kingdom having once been feized by the hand of a conqueror, this invited the bold and enterprising in every age to imitate fuch an illustrious example of fortunate ambition. From the time of William the Norman, the regular courfe of defcent had feldom continued through three fueceffive reigns. Those princes, whofe intrigues or valour opened to them a way to

to the throne, called in the authority of the great council of the nation to confirm their dubious titles. Hence parliamentary and hereditary right became in England of equal confideration. That great affembly claimed and actually poffeffed a power of altering the order of regal fucceffion; and even fo late as Henry VIII. an act of parliament had authorifed that capricious monarch to fettle the order of fucceffion at his pleafure. The English, jealous of their religious liberty, and averfe from the dominion of ftrangers, would have eagerly adopted the paffions of their fovereign, and might have been eafily induced to exclude the Scottifh line from the right of fucceeding to the crown. These feem to have been the views of both queens, and thefe were the difficulties which retarded the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh.

But, if the fources of their difcord were to be traced no higher than this treaty, an inconfiderable alteration in the words of it might have brought the prefent queftion to an amicable iffue. The indefinite and ambiguous expression which Cecil had inferted into the treaty, might have been changed into one more limited but more precife; and Mary, instead of promising to abftain from bearing the title of Queen of England in all times to come, might have engaged not to affume that title during the life of Elizabeth, or the lives of her lawful posterity °.

Such

• This expedient for terminating the difference between Elizabeth and Mary was so obvious, that it could not fail of prefenting itself to the view of the English ministers. "There hath been a matter fecretly thought of (fays Cecil in a letter to Throkmorton, July 14, 1561), which I dare communicate to you, although I mean never to be an auyol. I. z thor

Such an amendment, however, did not fuit the views of either queen. Though Mary had been obliged to fuspend for some time the profecution of her title to the English crown, she had not however relinquished it. She determined to revive her claim on the first prospect of fucces, and was unwilling to bind herfelf by a positive engagement, not to take advantage of any fuch fortunate occurrence. Nor would the alteration have been more acceptable to Elizabeth, who, by agreeing to it, would have tacitly recognifed the right of her rival to afcend the throne after her decease. But neither the Scottish nor English queen durft avow these fecret sentiments of their hearts. Any open discovery of an inclination to difturb the tranquillity of England, or to wreft the sceptre out of Elizabeth's hands, might have proved fatal to Mary's pretensions. Any fufpicion of a defign to alter the order of fucceffion, thor thereof; and that is, if an accord might be made betwixt our mistrefs and the Scottish queen, that this should by parliament in Scotland, &c. furrender unto the queen's majetty all matter of claim, and unto the heirs of her body ; and in confideration thereof, the Scottifh queen's intereft should be acknowledged in default of heirs of the body of the queen's majefty. Well, God fend our miftrefs a husband, and by time a fon, that we may hope our posterity shall have a mafculine fucceffion. This matter is too big for weak folks, and too deep for fimple. The queen's majefty knoweth of it." Hardw. State Pap. i. 174. But with regard to every point relating to the fucceffion, Elizabeth was fo jealous, and fo apt to take offence, that her most confidential minifters durft not urge her to advance one flep farther than fhe herfelf chofe to go. Cecil, mentioning fome fcheme about the fucceflion, if the queen fould not marry or leave iffue, adds, with his ufual caution : " This fong hath many parts; but, for my part, I have no fkill but in plain fong." Ibid. 178.

and to fet afide the claim of the Scottifh queenwould have exposed Elizabeth to much and deferved cenfure, and have raifed up against her many and dangerous enemies. These, however carefully concealed or artfully difguised, were, in all probability, the real motives which determined the one queen to folicit, and the other to refuse, the ratification of the treaty in its original form; while neither had recourse to that explication of it, which to an heart unwarped by political interest, and fincerely defirous of union and concord, would have appeared so obvious and natural.

But though confiderations of intereft firft occafioned this rupture between the Britifh queens, rivalíhip of another kind contributed to widen the breach, and female jealoufy increafed the violence of their political hatred. Elizabeth, with all those extraordinary qualities by which fhe equalled or furpaffed fuch of her fex as have merited the greateft renown, difcovered an admiration of her own perfon, to a degree which women of ordinary understandings either do not entertain, or prudently endeavour to conceal. Her attention to drefs, her folicitude to display her charms, her love of flattery, were all exceffive. Nor were these weakness confined to that period of life when they are more pardonable. Even in very advanced years, the wifeft woman of that, or perhaps of any other age, wore the garb, and affected the manners of a girl P. Though Elizabeth was as much inferior to Mary in beauty and gracefulness of perfon, as fhe excelled her in political abilities and in the arts of government, fhe was weak enough to compare herfelf with the Scottifh queen q; and as it was impoffible fhe could be altogether ignorant how much Mary gained by the comparifon, fhe envied and hated her as a rival by whom fhe was eclipfed. In judging of the conduct of princes, we are apt to afcribe too much to political motives, and too little to the paffions which they feel in common with the reft of mankind. In order to account for Elizabeth's prefent, as well as her fubfequent conduct towards Mary, we muft not always confider her as a queen, we muft fometimes regard her merely as a woman.

Elizabeth, though no ftranger to Mary's difficulties with refpect to the treaty, continued to urge her, by repeated applications, to ratify it r. Mary, under various pretences, ftill contrived to gain time, and to elude the requeft. But while the one queen folicited with perfevering importunity, and the other evaded with artful delay, they both ftudied an extreme politeness of behaviour, and loaded each other with professions of fifterly love, with reciprocal declarations of unchangeable efteem and amity.

It was not long before Mary was convinced, that among princes thefe expreflions of friendfhip are commonly far diftant from the heart. In failing from France to Scotland, the courfe lies along the Englifh coaft. In order to be fafe from the infults of the Englifh fleet, or, in cafe of tempefluous weather, to fecure a retreat in the harbours of that kingdom, Mary fent M. her voyage. This requeft, which decency alone obliged one prince to grant to another, Elizabeth rejected, in fuch a manner as gave rife to no flight fufpicion of a defign, either to obftruct the paffage, or to intercept the perfon of the Scottifh queen<sup>s</sup>.

Mary, in a long conference with Throkmorton, the Englifh ambaffador in France, explained her fentiments concerning this ungenerous behaviour of his miftrefs, in a ftrain of dignified expoftulation, which conveys an idea of her abilities, addrefs, and fpirit, as advantageous as any tranfaction in her reign. Mary was at that time only in her eighteenth year; and as Throkmorton's account of what paffed in his interview with her, is addreffed directly to Elizabeth<sup>t</sup>, that dexterous courtier, we may be well affured, did not embellifh the difcourfe of the Scottifh queen with any colouring too favourable.

Whatever refentment Mary might feel, it did not retard her departure from France. She was accompanied to Calais, the place where fhe embarked, in a manner fuitable to her dignity, as the queen of two powerful kingdoms. Six princes of Lorrain, her uncles, with many of the moft eminent among the French nobles, were in her retinue. Catherine, who fecretly rejoiced at her departure, graced it with every circumftance of magnificence and refpect. After bidding adieu to her mourning attendants, with a fad heart, and eyes bathed in tears, Mary left that kingdom, the fhort but only fcene of her life in which fortune fmiled upon her. While the French coaft continued in fight, fhe intently gazed upon it, and musing, in a thoughtful posture, on that height of fortune whence she had fallen, and prefaging, perhaps, the difasters and calamities which embittered the remainder of her days, fhe fighed often, and cried out, " Farewel, France ! " Farewel, beloved country, which I shall never " more behold !" Even when the darkness of the night had hid the land from her view, fhe would neither retire to the cabin, nor tafte food, but commanding acouch to be placed on the deck, she there waited the return of day with the utmost impatience. Fortune foothed her on this occafion; the galley made little way during the night. In the morning, the coaft of France was still within fight, and she continued to feed her melancholy with the profpect; and as long as her eyes could diffinguifh it, to utter the fame tender expressions of regret ". At last a brisk gale arose, by the favour of which for some days, and afterwards under the cover of a thick fog, Mary escaped the English fleet, which, as she apprehended, lay in wait in order to intercept her x; and on the nineteenth of August, after an

<sup>2</sup> Goodall, vol. i. 175. Camden infinuates, rather than affirms, that it was the object of the English fleet to intercept Mary. This, however, seems to be doubtful. Elizabeth positively afferts, that, at the request of the king of Spain, the had fitted out a few fhips of flender force, in order to clear the narrow seas of pirates, which infested them; and she appeals for the truth of this to Mary's own ministers. App-No. VI. Cecil, in a letter to Throkmorton, Aug. 26, 1561, informs him, that " the queen's ships, which were upon the feas to cleanse them of pirates, faw her [i.e. Mary], and faluted an abfence of near thirteen years, landed fafely at Leith in her native kingdom.

Mary was received by her fubjects with fhouts and acclamations of joy, and with every demonfiration of welcome and regard. But as her arrival was unexpected, and no fuitable preparation had been made for it, they could not, with all their efforts, hide from her the poverty of the country, and were obliged to conduct her to the palace of Holyrood-houfe with little pomp. The queen, accuftomed from her infancy to fplendour and magnificence, and fond of them, as was natural at her age, could not help obferving the change in her fituation, and feemed to be decply affected with it <sup>x</sup>.

Never did any prince afcend the throne at a juncture which called for more wifdom in council, or more courage and fleadinefs in action. The rage of religious controverfy was ftill unabated. The memory of paft opprefilon exafperated the proteftants; the fmart of recent injuries rendered the papifts defperate; both were zealous, fierce, and irreconcilable. The abfence of their fovereign had accuftomed the nobles to independence; and during the late commotions, they had acquired fuch an increase of wealth, by the fpoils of the church, as threw great weight into the fcale of the ariftocracy, which flood not in need of any acceffion of power. The kingdom had long been under the government of regents, who exercifed a delegated jurifdiction, attended with little authority, and which infpired no reverence. A state of pure anarchy had prevailed for the two last years, without a regent, without a supreme council, without the power, or even the form, of a regular government<sup>2</sup>. A licentious fpirit, unacquainted with fubordination, and difdaining the reftraints of law and justice, had fpread among all ranks of men. The influence of France, the ancient ally of the kingdom, was withdrawn or defpifed. The English, of enemies become confederates, had grown into confidence with the nation, and had gained an afcendant over all its councils. The Scottish monarchs did not derive more fplendour or power from the friendship of the former, than they had reason to dread injury and diminution from the interpofition of the latter. Every confideration, whether of intereft or of felf-prefervation, obliged Elizabeth to deprefs the royal authority in Scotland, and to create the prince perpetual difficulties, by fomenting the spirit of diffatisfaction among the people.

In this pofture were the affairs of Scotland, when the administration fell into the hands of a young queen, not nineteen years of age, unacquainted with the manners and laws of her country, astranger to her fubjects, without experience, without allies, and almost without a friend.

On the other hand, in Mary's fituation we find fome circumftances, which, though they did not balance thefe difadvantages, contributed however to alleviate them; and, with skilful management, might have produced great effects. Her fubjects, unaccuftomed fo long to the refidence of their prince, were not only dazzled by the novelty and fplendour of the royal prefence, but infpired with awe and reverence. Befides the places of power and profit bestowed by the favour of a prince, his protection, his familiarity, and even his fmiles, confer honour and win the hearts of men. From all corners of the kingdom, the nobles crowded to teftify their duty and affection to their fovereign, and fludied by every art to wipe out the memory of past misconduct, and to lay in a stock of future merit. The amufements and gaiety of her court, which was filled with the most accomplished of the French nobility, who had attended her, began to foften and to polifh the rude manners of the nation. Mary herfelf poffeffed many of those qualifications which raife affection and procure efteem. The beauty and gracefulnefs of her perfon drew univerfal admiration, the elegance and politenefs of her manners commanded general respect. To all the charms of her own fex, she added many of the accomplishments of the other. The progress she had made in all the arts and sciences, which were then deemed neceffary or ornamental, was far beyond what is commonly attained by princes; and all her other qualities were rendered more agreeable by a courteous affability, which, without leffening the dignity of a prince, fteals on the hearts of fubjects with a bewitching infinuation.

From thefe circumftances, notwithftanding the threatening afpect of affairs at Mary's return into Scotland, notwithftanding the clouds which gathered thered on every hand, a political obferver would have predicted a very different iffue of her reign; and whatever fudden gufts of faction he might have expected, he would never have dreaded the deftructive violence of that florm which followed.

While all parties were contending who fhould difcover the most dutiful attachment to the queen, the zcalous and impatient fpirit of the age broke out in a remarkable inftance. On the Sunday after her arrival, the queen commanded mass to be celebrated in the chapel of her palace. The first rumour of this occasioned a fecret murmuring among the protestants who attended the court; complaints and threatenings foon followed; the fervants belonging to the chapel were infulted and abufed; and if the prior of St. Andrew's had not feasonably interposed, the rioters might have proceeded to the utmost excesses.

It is impossible, at this distance of time, and under circumstances fo very different, to conceive the violence of that zeal against popery, which then possefield the nation. Every instance of condescension to the papifts was deemed an act of apoftacy, and the toleration of a fingle mais pronounced to be more formidable to the nation than the invalion of ten thousand armed men b. Under the influence of these opinions, many protestants would have ventured to go dangerous lengths; and, without attempting to convince their fovereign by argument, or to reclaim her by indulgence, would have abruptly denied her the liberty of worfhipping God in that manner which alone fhe thought acceptable to him. But the prior of St. Andrew's and other leaders of <sup>2</sup> Knox, 284. Haines, 372. <sup>b</sup> Knox, 287. the

the party, not only reftrained this impetuous fpirit, but, in fpite of the murmurs of the people and the exclamations of the preachers, obtained for the queen and her domeffics the undiffurbed exercife of the catholic religion. Near an hundred years after this period, when the violence of religious animofitics had begun to fublide, when time and the progress of learning had enlarged the views of the human mind, an English house of commons refused to indulge the wife of their fovereign in the private use of the mass. The protestant leaders deserve, on this occasion, the praife both of wildom and of moderation for conduct fo different. But, at the fame time, whoever reflects upon the encroaching and fanguinary fpirit of popery in that age, will be far from treating the fears and caution of the more zealous reformers as altogether imaginary and defiitute of any real foundation.

The leaders of the protestants, however, by this prudent compliance with the prejudices of their fovereign, obtained from her a proclamation highly favourable to their religion, which was isfued fix days [Aug. 25.] after her arrival in Scotland. The reformed doctrine, though eftablifhed over all the kingdom by the parliament, which met in confequence of the treaty of pacification, had never received the countenance or fanction of royal authority. In order to quiet the minds of those who had embraced that doctrine, and to remove any dread of moleftation which they might entertain, Mary declared, " that until fhe should take final orders concerning religion, with advice of parliament, any attempt to alter or fubvert the religion which the found univerfally practifed practifed in the realm, fhould be deemed a capital crime <sup>c</sup>." Next year a fecond proclamation to the fame effect was published <sup>d</sup>.

The queen, conformably to the plan which had been concerted in France, committed the administration of affairs entirely to protestants. Her council was filled with the most eminent perfons of that party; not a fingle papift was admitted into any degree of confidence e. The prior of St. Andrew's and Maitland of Lethington feemed to hold the first place in the queen's affection, and poffeffed all the power as well as reputation of favourite ministers. Her choice could not have fallen upon perfons more acceptable to her people; and, by their prudent advice, Mary conducted herfelf with fo much moderation, and deference to the fentiments of the nation, as could not fail of gaining the affection of her fubjects f,-the firmest foundation of a prince's power, and the only genuine fource of his happinefs and glory.

A cordial reconcilement with Elizabeth was another object of great importance to Mary ; and though the feems to have had it much at heart, in the beginning of her administration, to accomplift fuch a defirable conjunction, yet many events occurred to widen, rather than to clofe, the breach. The formal offices of friendthip, however, are feldom neglected among princes; and Elizabeth, who had attempted fo openly to obftruct the queen's voyage into Scotland, did not fail, a few days after her arrival, to command Randolph to congratulate her fafe return. that fhe might be on equal terms with her, fent Maitland to the Englifh court, with many ceremonious expressions of regard for Elizabeth <sup>g</sup>. Both the ambassical endors were received with the utmost civility; and on each fide the professions of kindness, as they were made with little fincerity, were listened to with proportional credit.

Both were intrusted, however, with fomething more than with mere matter of ceremony. Raudolph urged Mary, with fresh importunity, to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh. Maitland endeavoured to amufe Elizabeth, by apologizing for the dilatory conduct of his miftrefs with regard to that point. The multiplicity of public affairs fince her arrival in Scotland, the importance of the queftion in dispute, and the absence of many noblemen, with whom fhe was obliged in decency to confult, were the pretences offered in excufe for her conduct; the real caufes of it were those which have already been mentioned. But, in order to extricate herfelf out of thefe difficulties, into which the treaty of Edinburgh had led her, Mary was brought to yield a point, which formerly the feemed determined never to give up. She inftructed Maitland to fignify her willingness to disclaim any right to the crown of England during the life of Elizabeth, and the lives of her posterity ; if, in failure of thefe, fhe were declared next heir by act of parliament b.

Reafonable as this propofal might appear to Mary, who thereby precluded herfelf from difturbing Elizabeth's poffession of the throne, nothing could be more inconfistent with Elizag Keith, 181, &c. Camden, 3<sup>8</sup>7. Buch. 329. VOL. 1. A A beth's beth's interest, or more contradictory to a passion which predominated in the character of that princefs. Notwithstanding all the great qualities which threw fuch luftre on her reign, we may obferve, that she was tinctured with a jealoufy of her right to the crown, which often betrayed her into mean and ungenerous actions. The peculiarity of her fituation heightened, no doubt, and increased, but did not infuse this passion. It defcended to her from Henry VII. her grandfather, whom, in feveral features of his character, the nearly refembled. Like him, the fuffered the title by which fhe held the crown to remain ambiguous and controverted, rather than fubmit it to parliamentary difcuffion, or derive any addition to her right from fuch authority. Like him, fhe obferved every pretender to the fucceffion, not only with that attention which prudence prefcribes, but with that averfion which fufpicion infpires. The prefent uncertainty with regard to the right of fucceffion operated for Elizabeth's advantage, both on her fubjects and on her rivals. Among the former, every lover of his country regarded her life as the great fecurity of the national tranquillity; and chofe rather to acknowledge a title which was dubious, than to fearch for one that was unknown. The latter, while nothing was decided, were held in dependence, and obliged to court her. The manner in which fhe received this ill-timed propofal of the Scottifh queen, was no other than might have been expected. She rejected it in a peremptory tone, with many expressions of a resolution never to permit a point of fo much delicacy to be touched.

About

B. III.

About this time [Sept. 1.] the queen made her public entry into Edinburgh with great pomp. Nothing was neglected which could express the duty and affection of the citizens towards their fovereign. But, amidft thefe demonftrations of regard, the genius and fentiments of the nation discovered themselves in a circumftance, which, though inconfiderable, ought not to be overlooked. As it was the mode of the times to exhibit many pageants at every public folemnity, most of these, on this occasion, were contrived to be reprefentations of the vengeance which the Almighty had inflicted upon idolaters i. Even while they studied to amuse and to flatter the queen, her fubjects could not refrain from teftifying their abhorrence of that religion which fhe profeffed.

To reftore the regular administration of justice, and to reform the internal policy of the country, became the next object of the queen's care. The laws enacted for prefervation of public order. and the fecurity of private property, were nearly the fame in Scotland as in every other civilized country. But the nature of the Scottifh conflitution, the feebleness of regal authority, the exorbitant power of the nobles, the violence of faction, and the fierce manners of the people, rendered the execution of these laws feeble, irregular, and partial. In the counties which border on England, this defect was most apparent ; and the confequence of it most fensibly felt. The inhabitants, strangers to industry, averse from labour, and unacquainted with the arts of peace, fubfifted chiefly by fpoil and pillage; and, being confederated in fepts or clans, committed thefe exceffes not only with impunity, but even with honour. During the unfettled flate of the kingdom from the death of James V. this dangerous licence had grown to an unufual height; and the inroads and rapine of thofe freebooters were become no lefs intolerable to their own countrymen than to the Englift. To reftrain and punifh thefe outrages, was an action equally popular in both kingdoms. The prior of St. Andrew's was the perfon chofen for this important fervice, and extraordinary powers, together with the title of the queen's lieutenant, were vefted in him for that purpofe.

Nothing can be more furprifing to men accuftomed to regular government, than the preparations made on this occafion. They were fuch as might be expected in the rudeft and most imperfect state of fociety. The freeholders of eleven feveral counties, with all their followers completely armed, were fummoned to affift the lieutenant in the discharge of his office. Every thing refembled a military expedition rather than the progrefs of a court of juffice k. The prior executed his commission with fuch vigour and prudence, as acquired him a great increase of reputation and popularity among his countrymen. Numbers of the banditti fuffered the punishment due to their crimes ; and, by the impartial and rigorous administration of justice, order and tranquillity were reftored to that part of the kingdom.

During the absence of the prior of St. Andrew's, the leaders of the popilh faction feem to have taken fome fleps towards infinuating themfelves into the queen's favour and confidence<sup>1</sup>. But the archbifhop of St. Andrew's, the moft remarkable perfon in the party for abilities and political addrefs, was received with little favour at court; and whatever fecret partiality the queen might have towards thofe who profeffed the fame religion with herfelf, fle difcovered no inclination at that time to take the administration of affairs out of the hands to which fle had already committed it.

The cold reception of the archbishop of St. Andrew's was owing to his connection with the house of Hamilton; from which the queen was much alienated. The duke of Guife and the cardinal could never forgive the zeal with which the duke of Chatelherault and his fon the earl of Arran had espouled the cause of the congregation. Princes feldom view their fucceffors without jea-loufy and diftruft. The prior of St. Andrew's, perhaps, dreaded the duke as a rival in power. All these causes concurred in infusing into the queen's mind an averfion for that family. The duke, indulging his love of retirement, lived at a distance from court, without taking pains to infinuate himfelf into favour; and though the earl of Arran openly afpired to marry the queen, he, by a most unpardonable act of imprudence, was the only nobleman of diffinction who opposed Mary's enjoying the exercife of her religion ; and by rashly entering a public protestation against it, entirely forfeited her favour ". At the fame time, the fordid parfimony of his father obliged him either to hide himfelf in fome retirement, or to appear in a manner unbecoming his dignity as first prince of the blood, or his high pretenfions as fuitor to the queen ". His love inflamed by difappointment, and his impatience exasperated by neglect, preyed gradually on his reason; and, after many extravagancies, broke out at last in ungovernable phrenzy.

Towards the end of the year, a convention of eftates was held [Dec. 20.], chiefly on account of ecclefiaftical affairs. The affembly of the church, which fat at the fame time, prefented a petition, containing many demands with refpect to the fupprefling of popery, the encouraging the proteftant religion, and the providing for the maintenance of the clergy°. The laft was a matter of great importance, and the fteps taken towards it deferve to be traced.

Though the number of proteftant preachers was now confiderably increafed, many more were ftill wanted in every corner of the kingdom. No legal provision having been made for them, they had hitherto drawn a fcanty and precarious fubfiftence from the benevolence of their people. To fuffer the ministers of an eftablished church to continue in this state of indigence and dependence, was an indecency equally repugnant to the principles of religion, and to the maxims of found policy ; and would have justified all the imputations of avarice with which the Reformation was then loaded by its enemies. The revenues of the popish church were the only fund which could be employed for their relief; but during the three last years the state of these was greatly altered. A great majority of abbots, priors, and other heads of religious houfes, had, either from a fenfe of duty, or from views of interest, renounced the errors of popery; and, notwithstanding this change in their fentiments, they retained their ancient revenues. Almost the whole order of bifhops, and feveral of the other dignitaries, still adhered to the Romish fuperstition ; and though debarred from every spiritual function, continued to enjoy the temporalities of their benefices. Some laymen, especially those who had been active in promoting the reformation, had, under various pretences, and amidft the licence of civil wars, got into their hands poffeffions which belonged to the church. Thus, before any part of the ancient ecclefiaftical revenues could be applied towards the maintenance of the protestant ministers, many different interests were to be adjusted; many claims to be examined, and the prejudices and paffions of the two contending parties required the application of a delicate hand. After much contention, the following plan was approved by a majority of voices, and acquiefced in even by the popilh clergy themfelves. An exact account of the value of ecclefiaftical benefices throughout the kingdom was appointed to be taken. The prefent incumbents, to whatever party they adhered, were allowed to keep poffeffion :' two-thirds of their whole revenue were referved for their own ufe, the remainder was annexed to the crown ; and out of that, the queen undertook to affign a fufficient mainte-" nance for the protestant clergy P.

religion, the extirpation of the whole order, rather than an act of fuch extraordinary indulgence, might have been expected from the zeal of the preachers, and from the fpirit which had hitherto animated the nation. But, on this occafion, other principles obftructed the operations of fuch as were purely religious. Zeal for liberty and the love of wealth, two paffions extremely oppofitc, concurred in determining the proteftant leaders to fall in with this plan, which deviated fo manifeftly from the maxims by which they had hitherto regulated their conduct.

If the reformers had been allowed to act without controul, and to level all distinctions in the church, the great revenues annexed to ecclefiaftical dignities could not, with any colour of juffice, have been retained by those in whose hands they now were ; but must either have been distributed among the protestant clergy, who performed all religious offices, or must have fallen to the queen, from the bounty of whofe anceftors the greater part of them was originally derived. The former scheme, however suitable to the religious fpirit of many among the people, was attended with manifold danger. The popifh ecclesiastics had acquired a share in the national property, which far exceeded the proportion that was confiftent with the happinels of the king-dom; and the nobles were determined to guard against this evil, by preventing the return of those possessions into the hands of the church. Nor was the latter, which exposed the conftitution to more imminent hazard, to be avoided with lefs care. Even that circumferibed prerogative which the Scottish kings possessed, was the object of jealoufy jealoufy to the nobles. If they had allowed the crown to feize the fpoils of the church, fuch an increase of power must have followed that accesfion of property, as would have raifed the royal authority above controul, and have rendered the most limited prince in Europe the most absolute and independent. The reign of Henry VIII. prefented a recent and alarming example of this nature. The wealth which flowed in upon that prince, from the fuppreffion of the monasteries, not only changed the maxims of his government, but the temper of his mind; and he who had formerly fubmitted to his parliaments, and courted his people, dictated from that time to the former with intolerable infolence, and tyrannized over the latter with unprecedented feverity. And if his policy had not been extremely fhort-fighted, if he had not fquandered what he acquired with a profusion equal to his rapaciousness, and which defeated his ambition, he might have established despotism in England, on a basis so broad and ftrong, as all the efforts of the fubjects would never have been able to shake. In Scotland, where the riches of the clergy bore as great a proportion to the wealth of the kingdom, the acquifition of church lands would have been of no lefs importance to the crown, and no lefs fatal to the ariftocracy. The nobles, for this reason, guarded against fuch an increase of theroyal power, and thereby fecured their own independence.

Avarice mingled itfelf with their concern for the intereft of their order. The re-uniting the poffeffions of the church to the crown, or the beftowing them on the protestant clergy, would have been a fatal blow, both to those nobles who had, by

by fraud or violence, feized part of these revenues, and to those abbots and priors who had totally renounced their ecclesiaftical character. But as the plan which was proposed, gave fome fanction to their usurpation, they promoted it with their utmost influence. The popish ecclesiastics, though the lopping off a third of their revenues was by no means agreeable to them, confented, under their prefent circumstance, to facrifice a part of their posseffions, in order to purchase the fecure enjoyment of the remainder; and after deeming the whole irrecoverably loft, they confidered whatever they could retrieve as fo much gain. Many of the ancient dignitaries were men of noble birth; and as they no longer entertained hopes of reftoring the popifh religion, they wished their own relations, rather than the crown, or the protestant clergy, to be enriched with the spoils of the church. They connived, for this reafon, at the encroachments of the nobles; they even aided their avarice and violence; they dealt out the patrimony of the church among their own relations, and by granting feus and perpetual leafes of lands and tithes, gave, to the utmost of their power, fome colour of legal poffeffion to what was formerly mere ufurpation. Many veftiges of fuch alienations still remain 9. The nobles, with the concurrence of the incumbents, daily extended their encroachments, and gradually ftripped the ecclefiaftics of their richeft and most valuable possessions. Even that third part, which was given up in order to filence the clamours of the protestant clergy, and to be fome equivalent to the crown for its claims, amounted to no confiderable fum. The thirds due by the more powerful nobles, efpecially by fuch as had embraced the reformation, were almost univerfally remitted. Others, by producing fraudulent rentals; by estimating the corn, and other payments in kind, at an undervalue; and by the connivance of collectors, greatly diminiss had much reason to be fatisfied with a device which, at fo fmall expence, fecured to them fuch valuable possibility.

Nor were the protestant clergy confiderable gainers by this new regulation ; they found it to be a more eafy matter to kindle zeal, than to extinguish avarice. Those very men, whom formerly they had fwayed with abfolute authority. were now deaf to all their remonstrances. The prior of St. Andrew's, the earl of Argyll, the carl of Morton, and Maitland, all the most zealous leaders of the congregation, were appointed to affign, or, as it was called, to modify their ftipends. An hundred merks Scottifh was the allowance which their liberality afforded to the generality of ministers. To a few three hundred merks were granted s. About twenty-four thoufand pounds Scottish appears to have been the whole fum allotted for the maintenance of a national church eftablished by law, and efteemed throughout the kingdom the true church of Godt. Even this fum was paid with little exactnefs, and the ministers were kept in the fame poverty and dependence as formerly.

mitigated, in fome degree, the ferocity of the nobles, and accuftomed them to greater mildnefs and humanity; while, at the fame time, her prefence and authority were a check to their factious and tumultuary fpirit. But, as a flate of order and tranquillity was not natural to the feudal ariflocracy, it could not be of long continuance; and this year became remarkable for the moft violent eruptions of inteftine difcord and animofity.

Among the great and independent nobility of Scotland, a monarch could poffefs little authority, and exercise no extensive or rigorous jurifdiction. The interfering of intereft, the unfettled flate of property, the frequency of public commotions, and the fierceness of their own manners, fowed among the great families the feeds of many quarrels and contentions. Thefe, as we have already observed, were frequently decided, not by law, but by violence. The offended baron, without having recourfe to the monarch. or acknowledging his fuperior authority, affembled his own followers, and invaded the lands of his rival in an hoftile manner. Together with his eftate and honours, every nobleman tranfmitted fome hereditary feud to his posterity, who were bound in honour to adopt and to profecute it with unbated rancour.

Such a diffention had fubfitted between the houfe of Hamilton and the earl of Bothwell, and was heightened by mutual injuries during the late commotions<sup>a</sup>. The earl of Arran and Bothwell happening to attend the court at the fame time [February], their followers quarrelled frequently in the ftreets of Edinburgh, and excited dangerous tumults in that city. At lait, the mediation of their friends, particularly of Knox, brought about a reconcilement, but an unfortunate one to both these noblemen x.

A few days after, Arran came to Knox, and, with the utmost terror and confusion, confessed, first to him, and then to the prior of St. Andrew's, that, in order to obtain the fole direction of affairs. Bothwell, and his kinfmen the Hamiltons. had confpired to murder the prior, Maitland, and the other favourites of the queen. The duke of Chatelherault regarded the prior as a rival, who had fupplanted him in the queen's favour, and who filled that place at the helm, which he imagined to be due to himfelf, as first prince of the blood. Bothwell, on account of the perfonal injuries which he had received from the prior during the hoftile operations of the two contending parties, was no lefs exafperated against him. But whether he and the Hamiltons had agreed to cement their new alliance with the blood of their common enemy, or whether the confpiracy exifted only in the frantic and difordered imagination of the earl of Arran, it is impoffible, amidit the contradiction of historians and the defectivenefs of records, politively to determine. Among men inflamed with refentment and impatient for revenge, rash expressions might be uttered, and violent and criminal expedients proposed; and on that foundation, Arran's diftempered fancy might rear the whole fuperstructure of a confpiracy. All the perfons accufed, denied their guilt with the utmost confidence. But the known characters of men, and the violent fpirit of the age, added greatly to the probability of the accufation, and abundantly juftify the conduct of the queen's minifters, who confined Bothwell, Arran, and a few of the ringleaders, in feparate prifons, and obliged the duke to furrender the ftrong caftle of Dumbarton, which he had held ever fince the time of his refigning the office of regent <sup>y</sup>.

The defigns of the earl of Huntly against the prior of St. Andrew's were deeper laid, and produced more memorable and more tragical events. George Gordon earl of Huntly, having been one of the nobles who confpired against James III. and who raifed his fon James IV. to the throne, enjoyed a great share in the confidence of that generous prince z. By his bounty, great acceffions of wealth and power were added to a family already opulent and powerful. On the death of that monarch, Alexander the next earl, being appointed lord lieutenant of all the counties beyond Forth, left the other nobles to contend for offices at court ; and retiring to the north, where his eftate and influence lay, refided there in a kind of princely independence. The chieftains in that part of the kingdom dreaded the growing dominion of fuch a dangerous neighbour, but were unable to prevent his encroachments. Some of his rivals he fecretly undermined, others he fubdued by open force. His eftate far exceeded that of any other fubject, and his fuperiorities and jurifdictions extended over many of the northern counties. With power and poffeffions fo extenfive, under two long and feeble minorities, and amidst the shock of civil commotions, the earls of Huntly might have indulged the most elevated hopes. But happily for the crown, an active and enterprising spirit was not the characteristic of that family, and whatever object their ambition might have in view, they chose rather to acquire it by political address, than to seize it openly and by force of arms.

The conduct of George the prefent earl, during the late commotions, had been perfectly fuitable to the character of the family in that age, dubious, variable, and crafty. While the fuccefs of the lords of the congregation was uncertain, he affifted the queen regent in her attempts to crufh them. When their affairs put on a better afpect, he pretended to join them, but never heartily favoured their caufe. He was courted and feared by each of the contending parties; both connived at his encroachments in the north; and, by artifice and force, which he well knew how to employ alternately, and in their proper places, he added every day to the exorbitant power and wealth which he poffeffed.

He obferved the growing reputation and authority of the prior of St. Andrew's with 'the greateft jealoufy and concern, and confidered him as a rival who had engroffed that fhare in the queen's confidence, to which his own zeal for the popifh religion feemed to give him a preferable title. Perfonal injuries foon increafed the mifunderstanding occasioned by rivalfhip in power. The queen having determined to reward the fervices of the prior of St. Andrew's, by creating him an earl, fhe made choice of Mar, as the place whence he fhould take his title; and, that he might be better able to fupport his new honour, BB 2 beftowed beftowed upon him at the fame time the lands of that name. Thefe were part of the royal demefnes a, but the earls of Huntly had been permitted, for feveral years, to keep poffeffion of them b. On this occasion [Feb. 1.] the earl not only complained, with fome reason, of the loss which he fultained, but had real cause to be alarmed at the intrusion of a formidable neighbour into the heart of his territories, who might be able to rival his power, and excite his opprefied vafials to shake off his yoke.

An incident, which happened foon after [June 27.], increased and confirmed Huntly's sufpicions. Sir John Gordon, his third fon, and lord Ogilvie, had a difpute about the property of an eftate. This difpute became a deadly quarrel. They happened unfortunately to meet in the ftreets of Edinburgh, and being both attended with armed followers, a scuffle enfued, in which lord Ogilvie was dangeroufly wounded by Sir John. The magistrates feized both the offenders, and the queen commanded them to be ftrictly confined. Uuder any regular government, fuch a breach of public peace and order would expose the perfon offending to certain punishment. At this time fome feverity was neceffary, in order to vindicate the queen's authority from an infult, the most hemous which had been offered to it fince her return into Scotland. But, in an age accuftomed to licence and anarchy, even this moderate exercife of her power, in ordering them to be kept in cuftody, was deemed an act of intolerable rigour; and the friends of each party began to convene their vaffals and dependents, in order to overawe, or to frustrate the decifions of justice c. Meanwhile Gordon made his escape out of prison, and flying into Aberdeenshire, complained loudly of the indignity with which he had been treated; and as all the queen's actions were, at this juncture, imputed to the earl of Mar, this added not a little to the refentment which Huntly had conceived against that nobleman.

At the very time [August] when these paffions fermented, with the utmost violence, in the minds of the earl of Huntly and his family, the queen happened to fet out on a progrefs into the northern parts of the kingdom. She was attended by the earls of Mar and Morton, Maitland, and other leaders of that party. The prefence of the queen, in a country where no name greater than the earl of Huntly's had been heard of, and no power fuperior to his had been exercifed for many years, was an event of itfelf abundantly mortifying to that haughty nobleman. But while the queen was entirely under the direction of Mar, all her actions were more apt to be mifreprefented, and conftrued into injuries; and a thousand circumstances could not but occur to awaken Huntly's jealoufy, to offend his pride, and to inflame his refentment. Amidst the agitations of fo many violent paffions, fome irruption was unavoidable.

On Mary's arrival in the north, Huntly employed his wife, a woman capable of executing the commission with abundance of dexterity, to footh the queen, and to intercede for pardon to their fon. But the queen peremptorily required that he should again deliver himfelf into the hands of juffice, and rely on her clemency. Gordon was perfuaded to do fo; and being enjoined by the queen to enter himfelf prifoner in the caffle of Stirling, he promifed likewife to obey that command. Lord Erfkine, Mar's uncle, was at that time governor of this fort. The queen's feverity, and the place in which fhe appointed Gordon to be confined, were interpreted to be new marks of Mar's rancour, and augmented the hatred of the Gordons againft him.

Meantime, Sir John Gordon fet out towards Stirling [Sept. 1.]; but inftead of performing his promife to the queen, made his escape from his guards, and returned to take the command of his followers, who were rifing in arms all over the north. Thefe were deftined to fecond and improve the blow, by which his father proposed, fecretly and at once, to cut off Mar, Morton, and Maitland, his principal adverfaries. The time and place for perpetrating this horrid deed were frequently appointed ; but the executing of it was wonderfully prevented, by fome of those unforeseen accidents, which fo often occur to difconcert the schemes, and to intimidate the hearts, of affaffins d. Huntly's own house at Strathbogie was the laft and most convenient scene appointed for committing the intended violence. But, on her journey thither, the queen heard of young Gordon's flight and rebellion, and refufing, in the first transports of her indignation, to enter under the father's roof, by that fortunate expreffion of her refentment faved her ministers from unavoidable destruction .

The

B. III.

The ill fuccefs of thefe efforts of private revenge precipitated Huntly into open rebellion. As the queen was entirely under the direction of his rivals, it was impoffible to compass their ruin, without violating the allegiance which he owed his fovereign. On her arrival at Invernefs, the commanding officer in the caftle, by Huntly's orders, shut the gates against her. Mary was obliged to lodge in the town, which was open and defencelefs; but this too was quickly furrounded by a multitude of the earl's followers f. The utmost consternation feized the queen, who was attended by a very flender train. She every moment expected the approach of the rebels, and fome ships were already ordered into the river to fecure her escape. The loyalty of the Monroes, Frafers, Mackintofhes, and fome neighbouring clans, who took arms in her defence, faved her from this danger. By their affiftance, fhe even forced the caffle to furrender, and inflicted on the governor the punifhment which his infolence deferved.

This open act of difobedience was the occasion of a measure more galling to Huntly than any the queen had hitherto taken. Lord Erskine having pretended a right to the earldom of Mar, Stewart refigned it in his favour ; and at the fame time Mary conferred upon him the title of earl of Murray, with the estate annexed to that dignity, which had been in the possibility. From this encroachment upon his domains he concluded that his family was devoted to destruction ; and dreading to be stripped gradually of those possibility.

which, in reward of their fervices, the gratitude of the crown had bestowed on himfelf or his anceftors, he no longer difguifed his intentions, but, in defiance of the queen's proclamion, openly took arms. Inftead of yielding those places of ftrength, which Mary required him to furrender, his followers difperfed, or cut inpieces, the parties which the difpatched to take pofferfion of them h; and he himfelf advancing with a confiderable body of men towards Aberdeen, to which place the queen was now returned, filled her fmall court with confternation. Murray had only a handful of men in whom he could confide i. In order to form the appearance of an army, he was obliged to call in the affiftance of the neighbouring barons; but as most of these either fayoured Huntly's defigns, or flood in awe of his power, from them no cordial or effectual fervice could be expected.

With thefe troops, however, Murray, who could gain nothing by delay, marched brifkly towards the enemy [Oct. 28.]. Hc found them at Corrichie, pofted to great advantage; he commanded his northern affociates inflantly to begin the attack; but on the first motion of the enemy, they treacherously turned their backs; and Huntly's followers, throwing afide their spears, and breaking their ranks, drew their fwords, and rushed forward to the pursuit. It was then that Murray gave proof, both of steady courage and of prudent conduct. He stood immoveable on a rising ground, with the small but trusty body of his adherents, who prefenting their spears to the enemy, received them with a determined resolution, which they little expected. The Highland broad fword is not a weapon fit to encounter the Scottish spear. In every civil commotion, the fuperiority of the latter has been evident, and has always decided the contest. On this occasion the irregular attack of Huntly's troops was eafily repulfed by Murray's firm battalion. Before they recovered from the confusion occasioned by this unforeseen refistance, Murray's northern troops, who had fled fo fhamefully in the beginning of the action, willing to regain their credit with the victorious party, fell upon them, and completed the rout. Huntly himfelf, who was extremely corpulent, was trodden to death in the purfuit. His fons, Sir John and Adam, were taken, and Murray returned in triumph to Aberdeen with his prifoners.

The trial of men taken in actual rebellion against their fovereign was extremely short. Three days after the battle, Sir John Gordon was beheaded at Aberdeen. His brother Adam was pardoned on account of his youth. Lord Gordon, who had been privy to his father's defign, was feized in the fouth, and upon trial found guilty of treafon; but, through the queen's clemency, the punishment was remitted. The first parliament proceeded against this great family with the utmost rigour of law, and reduced their power and fortune to the lowest ebb <sup>k</sup>.

k This confpiracy of the earl of Huntly is one of the molt intricate and myfterious paffages in the Scottifh hiftory. As it was a transfaction purely domeftic, and in which the English were little interested, few original papers concerning it have been found in Cecil's Collection, the great florehouse of

B. III.

As the fall of the earl of Huntly is the most important event of this year, it would have been improper of evidence and information with regard to the affairs of this period.

Buchanan fuppofes Mary to have formed a defign about this time of defiroying Murray, and of employing the power of the earl of Huntly for this purpofe. But his account of this whole transaction appears to be fo void of truth, and even of probability, as to deferve no ferious examination. At that time Mary wanted power, and feems to have had no inclination to commit any act of violence upon her brother.

Two other hypotheses have been advanced, in order to explain this matter; but they appear to be equally removed from truth.

I. It cannot well be conceived, that the queen's journey to the north was a fcheme concerted by Murray, in order to ruin the earl of Huntly. I. Huntly had refided at court almoft ever fince the queen's return. Keith, 198. Append, 175, &c. This was the proper place in which to have feized him. To attack him in Aberdeenshire, the feat of his power, and in the midit of his vafials, was a project equally abfurd and hazardous. 2. The queen was not accompanied with a body of troops, capable of attempting any thing against Huntly by violence : her train was not more numerous than was usual in times of greatest tranquillity. Keith, 230. 3. There remain two original letters with regard to this confpiracy; one from Randolph the English relident, and another from Maitland, both directed to Cecil. They talk of Huntly's measures as notorioufly treasonable. Randolph mentions his repeated attempts to affailinate Murray, &c. No hint is given of any previous refolution formed by Mary's minifters, to ruin Huntly and his family. Had any fuch defign ever exifted, it was Randolph's duty to have difcovered it; nor would Maitland have laboured to conceal it from the English fecretary. Keith, 229. 232.

II. To suppose that the earl of Huntly had laid any plan for seizing the queen and her ministers, seems to be no less improbable. 1. On the queen's arrival in the north, he laboured, in good earness, to gain her favour, and to obtain a pardon for his son. Knox, 318. 2. He met the queen, first at improper to interrupt the narrative by taking notice of leffer transactions, which may now be related with equal propriety.

In the beginning of fummer, Mary, who was defirous of entering into a more intimate correfpondence and familiarity with Elizabeth, employed Maitland to defire a perfonal interview with her fomewhere in the north of England. As this propofal could not be rejected with decency, the time, the place, and the circumstances of the meeting, were inftantly agreed upon. But Elizabeth was prudent enough not to admit into her kingdom a rival who outfhone herfelf fo far in beauty and gracefulnefs of perfon; and who excelled fo eminently in all the arts of infinuation and address. Under pretence of being confined to London, by the attention which fhe was obliged to give to the civil wars in France, fhe put off the interview for that feafon 1, and prevented her fubjects from feeing the Scottifh at Aberdeen, and then at Rothemay, whither he would not have ventured to come, had he harboured any fuch treafonable refolution. Knox, 318. 3. His conduct was irrefolute and wavering, like that of a man difconcerted by an unforefeen danger, not like one executing a concerted plan. 4. The most confiderable perfons of his clan fubmitted to the queen, and found furety to obey her commands. Keith, 226. Had the earl been previoufly determined to rife in arms againft the queen, or to feize her minifters, it is probable he would have imparted it to his principal followers, nor would they have deferted him in this manner.

For these reasons, I have, on the one hand, vindicated the earl of Murray from any deliberate intention of ruining the family of Gordon; and, on the other hand, I have imputed the violent conduct of the earl of Huntly to a fudden start of resentment, without charging him with any premeditated purpose of rebellion.

queen, the charms of whofe appearance and behaviour fhe envied, and had fome reafon to dread.

During this year, the affembly of the church met twice [June 2, Dec. 25.]. In both thefe were exhibited many complaints of the poverty and dependence of the church; and many murmurs againft the negligence or avarice of thofe who had been appointed to collect and to diftribute the fmall fund, appropriated for the maintenance of the preachers<sup>m</sup>. A petition, craving redrefs of their grievances, was prefented to the queen; but without any effect. There was no reafon to expect that Mary would difcover any forwardnefs to grant the requeft of fuch fupplicants. As her minifters, though all moft zealous proteftants, were themfelves growing rich on the inheritance of the church, they were equally regardlefs of the indigence and demands of their brethren.

1563.] Mary had now continued above two years in a ftate of widowhood. Her gentle adiniuiftration had fecured the hearts of her fubjects, who were impatient for her marriage, and wifhed the crown to defceud in the right line from their ancient monarchs. She herfelf was the moft amiable woman of the age, and the fame of her accomplifhments, together with the favourable circumftance of her having one kingdom already in her poffeffion, and the profpect of mounting the throne of another, prompted many different princes to folicit an alliance fo illuftrious. Scotland, by its fituation, threw fo much weight and power into whatever fcale it fell, that all Europe waited with folicitude for Mary's determination; and no event in that age excited ftronger political fears and jealoufies; none interefted more deeply the paffions of feveral princes, or gave rife to more contradictory intrigues, than the marriage of the Scottifh queen.

The princes of the houfe of Auftria remembered what vaft projects the French had founded on their former alliance with the queen of Scots; and though the unexpected death, first of Henry and then of Francis, had hindered these from taking effect, yet if Mary should again make choice of a husband among the French princes, the same designs might be revived, and prosecuted with better success.

In order to prevent this, the emperor entered into a negotiation with the cardinal of Lorrain, who had propofed to marry the Scottish queen to the archduke Charles, Ferdinand's third fon. The matter was communicated to Mary; and Melvil, who at that time attended the elector palatine, was commanded to inquire into the character and fituation of the archduke<sup>n</sup>.

Philip II. though no lefs apprehenfive of Mary's falling once more into the hands of France, envied his uncle Ferdinand the acquifition of fo important a prize; and as his own infatiable ambition grafped at all the kingdoms of Europe, he employed his ambaffador at the French court to folicit the princes of Lorrain in behalf of his fon Don Carlos, at that time the heir of all the extenfive dominions which belonged to the Spanish monarchy °.

Catherine

Catherine of Medicis, on the other hand, dreaded the marriage of the Scottifh queen with any of the Auftrian princes, which would have added fo much to the power and pretentions of that ambitious race. Her jealoufy of the princes of Lorrain rendered her no lefs averfe from an alliance which, by fecuring to them the protection of the emperor or king of Spain, would give new boldnefs to their enterprifing fpirit, and enable them to fet the power of the crown, which they already rivalled, at open defiance : and as fhe was afraid that thefe fplendid propofals of the Auftrian family would dazzle the young queen, she instantly difpatched Castelnau into Scotland, to offer her in marriage the duke of Anjou, the brother of her former hufband, who foon after mounted the throne of France P.

Mary attentively weighed the pretentions of fo many rivals The archduke had little to recommend him, but his high birth. The example of Henry VIII. was a warning against contracting a marriage with the brother of her former hufband; and she could not bear the thoughts of appearing in France, in a rank inferior to that which the had formerly held in that kingdom. She listened, therefore, with partiality to the Spanish propositions, and the prospect of such vast power and dominions flattered the ambition of a young and afpiring princes.

Three feveral circumitances, however, concurred to divert Mary from any thoughts of a foreign alliance.

The first of these was the murder of her uncle the duke of Guise. The violence and ambition of that nobleman had involved his country in a civil war; which was conducted with furious animofity and various fuccess. At last the duke laid fiege to Orleans, the bulwark of the protestant caufe ; and he had reduced that city to the laft extremity, when he was affaffinated by the frantic zeal of Poltrot. This blow proved fatal to the queen of Scots. The young duke was a minor; and the cardinal of Lorrain, though fubtle and intriguing, wanted that undaunted and enterprifing courage, which rendered the ambition of his brother fo formidable. Catherine, inftead of encouraging the ambition, or furthering the pretenfions of her daughter-in-law, took pleafure in mortifying the one, and in difappointing the other. In this fituation, and without fuch a protector, it became neceffary for Mary to contract her views, and to proceed with caution; and whatever profpect of advantage might allure her, fhe could venture upon no dangerous or doubtful measure.

The fecond circumftance which weighed with Mary, was the opinion of the queen of England. The marriage of the Scottifh queen interefted Elizabeth more deeply than any other prince; and fhe obferved all her deliberations concerning it with the moft anxious attention. She herfelf feems early to have formed a refolution of living unmarried, and fhe difcovered no fmall inclination to impofe the fame law on the queen of Scots. She had already experienced what ufe might be made of Mary's power and pretentions to invade her dominions, and to difturb her poffeffion of the crown. The death of Francis II. had happily delivered her from this danger, which fhe c c 2 deter-determined to guard against for the future with the utmost care. As the reftless ambition of the Auftrian princes, the avowed and bigoted patrons of the catholic fuperflition, made her, in a particular manner, dread their neighbourhood, fhe inftructed Randolph to remonstrate, in the ftrongeft terms, against any alliance with them ; and to acquaint Mary, that as fhe herfelf would confider fuch a match to be a breach of the perfonal friendship in which they were fo happily united ; fo the English nation would regard it as the diffolution of that confederacy which now fubfifted between the two kingdoms: that, in order to preferve their own religion and liberties, they would, in all probability, take fome ftcp prejudicial to her right of fucceffion, which, as fhe well knew, they neither wanted power nor pretences to invalidate and fet afide. This threatening was accompanied with a promife, but ex-preffed in very ambiguous terms, that if Mary's choice of a hufband fhould prove agreeable to the English nation, Elizabeth would appoint proper perfons to examine her title to the fucceffion, and, if well founded, command it to be publicly recognifed. She obferved, however, a mysterious filence concerning the perfon on whom fhe wished the choice of the Scottish queen to fall. The revealing of this fecret was referved for fome future negotiation. Meanwhile fhe threw out fome obfcure hints, that a native of Britain, or one not of princely rank, would be her fafeft and moft inoffenfive choiceq. An advice offered with fuch an air of fuperiority and command mortified, no doubt, the pride of the Scottifh queen. But, under her prefent circumstances, she was obliged to bear this indignity. Destitute of all foreign affistance, and intent upon the English fuccession, the great object of her wishes and ambition, it became necessary to court a rival, whom, without manifest imprudence, she could not venture to offend.

The inclination of her own fubjects was another, and not the least confiderable circumftance which called for Mary's attention at this conjuncture. They had been taught, by the fatal experience of her former marriage, to dread an union with any great prince, whole power might be employed to opprefs their religion and liberties. They trembled at the thoughts of a match with a foreigner; and if the crown fhould be ftrengthened by new dominions or alliances, they forefaw that the royal prerogative would foon be ftretched beyond its ancient and legal limits. Their eagernefs to prevent this could hardly fail of throwing them once more into the arms of England. Elizabeth would be ready to afford them her aid towards obstructing a measure fo difagreeable to herfelf. It was easy for them to feize the perfon of the fovereign. By the affiftance of the English fleet, they could render it difficult for any foreign prince to land in Scotland. The Roman catholics, now an inconfiderable party in the kingdom, and difpirited by the lofs of the earl of Huntly, could give no obstruction to their defigns. To what violent extremes the national abhorrence of a foreign yoke might have been carried, is manifest from what she had already seen and experienced.

For

B. III.

For thefe reafons Mary laid afide, at that time, all thoughts of foreign alliance, and feemed willing to facrifice her own ambition, in order to remove the jealoufies of Elizabeth, and to quiet the fears of her own fubjects.

The parliament met this year [May 26] for the first time fince the queen's return into Scotland. Mary's administration had hitherto been extremely popular. Her ministers possefied the confidence of the nation; and by confequence, the proceedings of that affembly were conducted with perfect unanimity. The grant of the earldom of Murray to the prior of St. Andrew's was confirmed : the earl of Huntly, and feveral of his vaffals and dependants, were attainted : the attainder against Kirkaldy of Grange, and fome of his accomplices in the murder of cardinal Beatoun, was reverfed : the act of oblivion, mentioned in the treaty of Edinburgh, received the royal fanction. But Mary, who had determined never to ratify that treaty, took care that this fanction should not be deemed any acknowledgment of its validity; fhe granted her confent merely in condefcention to the lords in parliament, who, on their knees, befought her to allay the jealoufies and apprehenfions of her fubjects, by fuch a gracious law .

No attempt was made, in this parliament, to procure the queen's affent to the laws eftablifhing the proteftant religion. Her minifters, though zealous proteftants themfclves, were aware that this could not be urged without manifeft danger and imprudence. She had confented, through their influence, to tolerate and protect the reformed doctrine. They had even prevailed on her to imprifon and profecute the archbishop of St. Andrew's, and prior of Whithorn, for celebrating mafs contrary to her proclamation t. Mary, however, was still passionately devoted to the Romish church; and though, from political motives, she had granted a temporary protection of opinions which the difapproved, there were no grounds to hope that the would agree to establish them for perpetuity. The moderation of those who professed it, was the best method for reconciling the queen to the protestant religion. Time might abate her bigotry. Her prejudices might wear off gradually, and at last the might yield to the wifnes of her people, what their importunity or their violence could never have extorted. Many laws of importance were to be propofed in parliament ; and to defeat all thefe, by fuch a fruitlefs and ill-timed application to the queen, would have been equally injurious to individuals, and detrimental to the public.

The zeal of the proteftant clergy was deaf to all thefe confiderations of prudence or policy. Eager and impatient, it brooked no delay: fevere and inflexible, it would condefcend to no compliances. The leading men of that order infifted, that this opportunity of eftablifhing religion by law, was not to be neglected. They pronounced the moderation of the courtiers, apoftacy; and their endeavours to gain the queen, they reckoned criminal and fervile. Knox folemnly renounced the friendship of the earl of Murray as a man devoted to Mary, and so blindly zealous for her fervice, as to become regardless of those objects which he had hitherto efteemed most facred. This rupture, which is a strong proof of Murray's fincere attachment to the queen at that period, continued above a year and a half<sup>a</sup>.

The preachers being difappointed by the men in whom they placed the greatest confidence, gave vent to their indignation in their pulpits. These echoed more loudly than ever, with declarations against idolatry ; with difinal prefages concerning the queen's marriage with a foreigner; and with bitter reproaches against those who, from interested motives, had deferted that caufe which they once reckoned it their honour to fupport. The people, inflamed by fuch vehement declamations, which were dictated by a zeal more fincere than prudent, proceeded to rafh and unjuftifiable acts of violence [August]. During the queen's abfence, on a progrefs into the weft, mass continued to be cclebrated in her chapel at Holyrood-houfe. The multitude of those who openly reforted thither, gave great offence to the citizens of Edinburgh, who, being free from the reftraint which the royal prefence imposed, affembled in a riotous manner, interrupted the fervice, and filled fuch as were prefent with the utmost consternation. Two of the ringleaders in this tumult were feized, and a day appointed for their trial x.

ed them as fufferers in a good caufe ; and in order to fcreen them from danger, he isfued circular letters [Oct. 8], requiring all who professed the true religion, or were concerned for the prefervation of it, to affemble at Edinburgh on the day of trial, that by their prefence they might comfort and affift their diftreffed brethren y. One of these letters fell into the queen's hands. To affemble the fubjects without the authority of the fovereign, was conftrued to be treason, and a resolution was taken to profecute Knox for that crime, before the privy council [Dec. 15]. Happily for him, his judges were not only zealous protestants, but the very men who, during the late commotions, had openlyrefifted and fet at defiance the queen's authority. It was under precedents, drawn from their own conduct, that Knox endeavoured to shelter himfelf. Nor would it have been an eafy matter for these countellors to have found out a diffinction, by which they could cenfure him, without condemning themfelves. After a long hearing, to the aftonishment of Lethington and the other courtiers z, he was unanimoufly acquitted. Sinclair bishop of Rofs, and prefident of the court of feffion, a zealous papift, heartily concurred with the other counfellors in this decifion 2; a remarkable fact, which shows the unfettled state of government in that age; the low condition to which regal authority was then funk; and the impunity with which fubjects might invade those rights of the crown which are now held facred.

1564.] The marriage of the Scottifh queen continued still to be the object of attention and intrigue.

Though

Though Elizabeth, even while the withed to direct Mary, treated her with a difguftful referve; though the kept her, without neceffity, in a flate of fulpenfc; and hinted often at the perfon whom fhe deftined to be her hufband, without directly mentioning his name; yet Mary framed all her actions to express fuch a prudent refpect for the English queen, that foreign princes began to ima-gine she had given herself up implicitly to her direction b. The prospect of this union alarmed Catherine of Medicis. Though Catherine had taken pleafure all along in doing ill offices to the queen of Scots; though, foon after the duke of Ĝuife's death, she had put upon her a most mortifying indignity, by ftopping the payment of her dowry, by depriving her fubject the duke of Chatelherault of his penfion, and by beftowing the command of the Scottish guards on a Frenchman c; fhe refolved, however, to prevent this dangcrous conjunction of the British queens. For this purpose fhe now employed all her art to appeafe Mary<sup>d</sup>, to whom the had given fo many caufes of offence. The arrears of her dowry were inftantly paid; more punctual remittances were promised for the future; and offers made, not only to reftore, but to extend the privileges of the Scottish nation in France. It was easy for Mary to penetrate into the motives of this fudden change; fhe well knew the character of her mother-in-law, and laid little ftrefs upon profeffions of friendship which came from a princess of fuch a falle and unfeeling heart.

The negotiation with England relative to the marriage, fuffered no interruption from this apb Keith, 248. c Ibid. 244. d See Append. No. VIIIplication plication of the French queen. As Mary, in compliance with the wiftes of her fubjects, and preffed by the ftrongeft motives of intereft, determined fpeedily to marry, Elizabeth was obliged to break that unaccountable filence which fhe had hitherto affected. The fecret was difclofed [March,] and her favourite lord Robert Dudley, afterwards earl of Leicefter, was declared to be the happy man whom fhe had chofen to be the hufband of a queen courted by fo many princes °.

Elizabeth's wifdom and penetration were remarkable in the choice of her ministers; in diftinguishing her favourites, those great qualities were lefs confpicuous. She was influenced in two cafes fo opposite, by merit of very different kinds. Their capacity for business, their knowledge, their prudence, were the talents to which alone fhe attended in chusing her ministers; whereas beauty and gracefulnefs of perfon, polifhed manners, and courtly addrefs, were the accomplishments on which the beftowed her favour. She acted in the one cafe with the wifdom of a queen, in the other the discovered the weakness of a woman. To this Leicefter owed his grandeur. Though remarkable neither for eminence in virtue nor fuperiority of abilities, the queen's partiality diftinguished him on every occasion. She raifed him to the highest honours, she bestowed on him the most important employments, and manifested an affection fo difproportionate to his merit, that, in the opinion of that age, it could be accounted for only by the power of planetary influence f.

The high fpirit of the Scottish queen could not well bear the first overture of a match with a fubject. Her own rank, the fplendour of her former marriage, and the folicitations at this timeof fo many powerful princes, crowded into her thoughts, and made her fenfibly-feel how humbling and difrefpectful Elizabeth's propofal was. She diffembled, however, with the Englifh refident; and though fhe declared, in ftrong terms, what a degradation fhe would deem this alliance, which brought along with it no advantage that could juftify fuch neglect of her own dignity, fhe mentioned the earl of Leicefter, notwithstanding, in terms full of refpect <sup>g</sup>.

Elizabeth, we may prefume, did not wifh that the propofal should be received in any other manner. After the extraordinary marks she had given of her own attachment to Leicefter, and while he was still in the very height of favour, it is not probable fhe could think ferioufly of bestowing him upon another. It was not her aim to perfuade, but only to amufe Mary ". Almost three years were elapsed fince her return into Scotland; and though folicited by her fubjects, and courted by the greatest princes in Europc, she had hitherto been prevented from marrying, chiefly by the artifices of Elizabeth. If at this time the English queen could have engaged Mary to liften to her propofal in favour of Leicefter, her power over this creature of her own would have enabled her to protract the negotiation at pleafure ; and by keeping her rival unmarried, fhe would have rendered the profpect of her fucceffion lefs acceptable to the English.

Leicester's own fituation was extremely delicate and embarrasfing. To gain possession of the most amiable woman of the age, to carry away this prize from fo many contending princes, to mount the throne of an ancient kingdom, might have flattered the ambition of a fubject much more confiderable than him. He faw all thefe advantages, no doubt; and, in fecret, they made their full imprefion on him. But, without offending Elizabeth, he durft not venture on the most diftant difcovery of his fentiments, or take any flep towards facilitating his acquifition of objects fo worthy of defire.

On the other hand, Elizabeth's partiality towards him, which fhe was at no pains to conceal <sup>1</sup>, might infpire him with hopes of attaining the fupreme rank in a kingdom more illuftrious than Scotland. Elizabeth had often declared that nothing but her refolution to lead a fingle life, and his being born her own fubject, would have hindered her from chufing the earl of Leicefter for a hufband. Such confiderations of prudence are, however, often furmounted by love; and Leicefter might flatter himfelf, that the violence of her affection would at length triumph both over the maxims of policy and the fcruples of pride. Thefe hopes induced him, now and then, to conclude the propofal of his marriage with the Scottifh queen to be a project for his deftruction; and he imputed it to the malice of Cecil, who, under the fpecious pretence of doing him honour, intended to ruin him in the good opinion both of Elizabeth and Mary <sup>k</sup>.

A treaty of marriage, proposed by one queen, who dreaded its fuccefs; listened to by another, who was fecretly determined against it; and fcarcely defired by the man himfelf, whofe intereft and reputation it was calculated, in appearance, to promote; could not, under fo many unfavourable circumstances, be brought to a fortunate issue. Both Elizabeth and Mary continued, however, to act with equal diffimulation. The former, notwithstanding her fears of losing Leicester, folicited warmly in his bchalf. The latter, though the began about this time to cast her eyes upon another fubject of England, did not at once venture finally to reject Elizabeth's favourite.

The perfon towards whom Mary began to turn her thoughts, was Henry Stewart lord Darnly, eldeft fon of the earl of Lennox. That nobleman, having been driven out of Scotland under the regency of the duke of Chatelherault, had lived in banishment for twenty years. His wife, lady Margaret Douglas, was Mary's moft dangerous rival in her claim upon the Englifh fucceffion. She was the daughter of Margaret, the eldeft fifter of Henry VIII. by the carl of Angus, whom that queen married after the death of her hufband James IV. In that age, the right and order of fucceffion were not fettled with the fame accuracy as at prefent. Time, and the defame accuracy as at present. Time, and the de-cilion of almost every cafe that can possibly happen, have at last introduced certainty into a matter, which naturally is fubject to all the va-riety arising from the caprice of lawyers, guided by obfcure, and often imaginary analogies. The counters of Lennox, though born of a fecond marriage, was one degree nearer the royal blood of England than Mary. She was the daughter, Mary Mary

1564.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND.

Mary only the grand-daughter, of Margaret. This was not the only advantage over Mary which the countels of Lennox cnjoycd. She was born in England, and by a maxim of law in that country with regard to private inheritances, "whoever is not born in England, or at leaft of parents who, at the time of his birth, were in the obedience of the king of England, cannot cnjoy any inheritance in the kingdom<sup>1</sup>." This maxim, Hales, an Englifh lawyer, produced in a treatife which he publifhed at this time, and endeavoured to apply it to the right of fucceffion to the crown. In a private caufe, thefe pretexts might have given rife to a long and doubtful litigation ; where a crown was at stake, fuch nice difputes and fubtilities were to be avoided with the utmost care. If Darnly should happen to contract an alliance with any of the powerful families in England, or should publicly profess the protest-ant religion, these plausible and popular topics might be fo urged, as to prove fatal to the pretenfions of a foreigner and of a papift.

Mary was aware of all this; and, in order to prevent any danger from that quarter, had early endeavoured to cultivate a friendly correfpondcnce with the family of Lennox. In the year one thoufand five hundred and fixty-two<sup>m</sup>, both the earl and the lady Margaret were taken into cuftody by Elizabeth's orders, on account of their holding a fecret correfpondence with the Scottifh queen.

a foreign prince, fhe entered into a ftill clofer connexion with the earl of Lennox <sup>n</sup>, and invited him to return into Scotland. This fhe endeavoured to conceal from Elizabeth; but a tranfaction of fo much importance did not efcape the notice of that difcerning princefs. She obferved, but did not interrupt it. Nothing could fall in more perfectly with her views concerning Scottifh affairs. She was pleafed to fee the pride of the Scottifh queen floop at laft to the thoughts of taking a fubject to her bed. Darnly was in no fituation to excite her jealoufy or her fears. His father's eftate lay in England, and by means of this pledge fhe hoped to keep the negotiation entirely in her own hands, to play the fame game of artifice and delay which fhe had planned out, if her recommendation of Leicefter had been more favourably received.

As before the union of the two crowns, no fubject of one kingdom could pafs into the other without the permiffion of both fovereigns; no fooner did Lennox, under pretence of profecuting his wife's claim upon the carldom of Angus, apply to Elizabeth for her licence to go into Scotland, than he obtained it. Together with it, fhe gave him letters, warmly recommending his perfon and caufe to Mary's friendfhip and protection<sup>o</sup>. But at the fame time, as it was her manner to involve all her tranfactions with regard to Scotland in fome degree of perplexity and contradiction; fhe warned Mary, that this indulgence of Lennox might prove fatal to herfelf, as his return could not fail of reviving the ancient animofity between him and the houfe of Hamilton.

This admonition gave umbrage to Mary, and drew from her an angry reply, which occafioned for fome time a total interruption of all correfpondence between the two queens P. Mary was not a little alarmed at this; fhe both dreaded the effects of Elizabeth's refentment, and felt fenfibly the difadvantage of being excluded from a free intercourfe with England, where her ambaffadors had all along carried on, with fome fuccefs, fecret negotiations, which increased the number of her partifans, and paved her way towards the throne. In order to remove the caufes of the prefent difficulty, Melvil was fent express to the court of England. He found it no difficult matter to bring about a reconcilement; and foon re-eftablished the appearance, but not the confidence of friendship, which was all that had sublisted for fome time between the two queens.

During this negotiation, Elizabeth's profefions of love to Mary, and Melvil's replies in the name of his miftrefs, were made in the language of the warmeft and moft cordial friendfhip. But what Melvil truly obferves with refpect to Elizabeth, may be extended, without injuffice, to both queens. "There was neither plain dealing, nor upright meaning, but great diffimulation, envy, and fear 9."

Lennox, however, in confequence of the licence which he had obtained, fet out for Scotland, and was received by the queen, not only with the refpect due to a nobleman fo nearly allied to the royal family, but treated with a diftinguifhed familiarity, which could not fail of infpiring him with more elevated hopes. The rumour of his fon's marriage to the queen began to fpread over the kingdom; and the eyes of all Scotland were turned upon him as the father of their future mafter. The duke of Chatelherault was the firft to take the alarm. He confidered Lennox as the ancient and hereditary enemy of the houfe of Hamilton; and, in his grandeur, faw the ruin of himfelf and his friends. But the queen interpofed her authority to prevent any violent rnpture, and employed all her influence to bring about an accommodation of the differences<sup>r</sup>.

The powerful family of Douglas no lefs dreaded Lennox's return, from an apprehenfion that he would wreft the earldom of Angus out of their hands. But the queen, who well knew how dangerous it would be to irritate Morton, and other great men of that name, prevailed on Lennox to purchafe their friendfhip, by allowing his lady's claim upon the earldom of Angus to drop<sup>s</sup>.

The reply which the queen made to these, and her promises of redress, were more fatisfying to the protestants than any they had hitherto obtained ". But, notwithstanding her declarations in their favour, they could not help harbouring many fulpicions concerning Mary's defigns against their religion. She had never once confented to hear any preacher of the re-formed doctrine. She had abated nothing of her bigoted attachment to the Romish faith. The genius of that fuperflition, averfe at all times from toleration, was in that age fierce and unrelenting. Mary had given her friends on the continent repeated affurances of her refolution to re-eftablish the Catholic church x. She had induftrioufly avoided every oportunity of ratifying the acts of parliament one thoufand five hundred and fixty, in favour of the Reformation. Even the protection which, ever fince her return, fhe had afforded the protestant religion, was merely temporary, and declared, by her own proclamation, to be of force only " till the thould take fome final order in the matter of religion y." The vigilant zeal of the preachers was inattentive to none of thefe circumstances. The coldness of their principal leaders, who were at this time entirely devoted to the court, added to their jealoufies and fears. These they uttered to the people, in language which they deemed fuitable to the necessity of the times, and which the queen reckoned difrefpectful and infolent. In a meeting of the general affembly, Maitland publicly accufed Knox of teaching feditious doctrine, concerning the right of fubjects to refift thole fovereigns who trefpafs againft the duty which they owe to the people. Knox was not backward to juftify what he had taught : and upon this general doctrine of refiftance, fo juft in its own nature, but fo delicate in its application to particular cafes, there cnfued a debate, which admirably difplays the talents and character of both the difputants; the acutenefs of the former, embellifhed with learning, but prone to fubtlety; the vigorous underftanding of the latter, delighting in bold fentiments, and fuperior to all fear<sup>2</sup>.

1565.] Two years had already been confumed in fruitlefs negotiations concerning the marriage of the Scottih queen. Mary had full leifure and opportunity to difcern the fallacy and deceit of all Elizabeth's proceedings with refpect to it. But, in order to fet the real intentions of the Englifh queen in a clear light, and to bring her to fome explicit declaration of her fentiments, Mary at laft intimated to Randolph [Feb. 5], that, on condition her right of fucceffion to the crown of England were publicly acknowledged, fhe was ready to yield to the folicitations of his miftrefs in behalf of Leicefter<sup>2</sup>. Nothing could be farther than this from the mind and intention of Elizabeth. The right of fucceffion was a myftery, which, during her whole reign, her jealoufy preferved untouched and unexplained. She had promifed, however, when fhe firft began to interest herfelf in the marriage of the Scottish queen, all that was now demanded. How to retreat with decency, how to elude her former offer, was, on that account, not a little perplexing.

The facility with which lord Darnly obtained permiffion to vifit the court of Scotland, was owing, in all probability, to that embarraffment. From the time of Melvil's embaffy, the countefs of Lennox had warmly folicited this liberty for her fon. Elizabeth was no ftranger to the ambitious hopes with which that young nobleman flattered himfelf. She had received repeated ad-vices from her ministers of the sentiments which Mary began to entertain in his favour b. It was entirely in her power to prevent his ftirring out of London. In the prefent conjuncture, however, nothing could be of more advantage to her than Darnly's journey into Scotland. She had already brought one actor upon the ftage, who, under her management, had, for a long time, amused the Scottish queen. She hoped, no less abfolutely, to direct the motions of Darnly, who was likewife her fubject; and again to involve Mary in all the tedious intricacies of negotiation. These motives determined Elizabeth and her ministers to yield to the folicitations of the countefs of Lennox.

But this deep-laid fcheme was in a moment difconcerted. Such unexpected events, as the fancy of poets afcribes to love, are fometimes really produced by that paffion. An affair which had been the object of fo many political intrigues, and had moved and interested fo many princes, was at last decided by the fudden liking of two young perfons. Lord Darnly was at this time in the first bloom and vigour of youth. In beauty and gracefulnefs of perfon he furpaffed all his cotemporaries; he excelled eminently in fuch arts as add eafe and elegance to 'external form, and which enabled it not only to dazzle, but to pleafe. Mary was of an age, and of a temper, to feel the full power of these accomplishments. The impreffion which lord Darnly made upon her was visible from the time of their first interview [Feb. 13]. The whole bufinefs of the court was to amufe and entertain this illustrious gueft c; and in all those scenes of gaiety, Darnly, whole qualifications were altogether fuperficial and flowy, appeared to great advantage. His conqueft of the queen's heart became completc; and inclination now prompted her to conclude a marriage, the first thoughts of which had been fuggested by confiderations merely political. Elizabeth contributed, and perhaps not without defign, to increafe the violence of this paffion. Soon after Darnly's arrival in Scotland, fhe, in return to that meffage whereby Mary had fignified her willingnefs to accept of Leicefter, gave an anfwer in fuch terms as plainly unravelled her original intention in that intrigue <sup>d</sup>. She promifed, if the Scottifh queen's marriage with Leicefter fhould take place, to advance him to great honours; but with regard to Mary's title to the Englih fucceffion, fhe would neither fuffer any legal inquiry to be made concerning it, nor permit it to be publicly recognifed, until fhe herfelf should declarc her refolution never to marry. Notwithstanding Elizabeth's former promifes, Mary had reafon to expect every thing contained in this reply; her high fpirit, however, could not bear with patience fuch a cruel difcovery of the contempt, the artifice, and mockery, with which, under the veil of friendship, she had been fo long abufed. She burft into tears of indignation, and expressed, with the utmost bitternels, her fense of that difingenuous craft which had been employed to deceive her e.

The natural effect of this indignation was to add to the impetuofity with which the purfued her own fchemc. Blinded by refentment as well as by love, fhe obferved no defects in the man whom fhe had chofen ; and began to take the ncceffary fleps towards accomplifning her defign, with all the impatience natural to those paffions.

As Darnly was fo nearly related to the queen, the canon law made it neceffary to obtain the pope's difpenfation before the celebration of the marriage. For this purpole fhe early fet on foot a negotiation with the court of Rome f.

She was bufy, at the fame time, in procuring the confent of the French king and his mother. Having communicated the defign, and the motives which determined her choice, to Castelnau the French ambaffador, she cmployed him, as the most proper person, to bring his court to fall in with her views. Among other arguments to this purpose, Castelnau mentioned Mary's attachment to Darnly, which he reprefented to be fo violent and deep-rooted, that it was no longer in her own power to break off the match <sup>g</sup>. Nor were the French minifters backward in encouraging Mary's paffion. Her pride would never ftoop to an alliance with a fubject of France. By this choice they were delivered from the apprehenfion of a match with any of the Auftrian princes, as well as the danger of too clofe an union with Elizabeth ; and as Darnly profeffed the Roman catholic religion, this fuited the bigotted fchemes which that court adopted.

While Mary was endeavouring to reconcile foreign courts to a measure which the had fo much at heart, Darnly and his father, by their behaviour, were raifing up enemies at home to obstruct it. Lennox had, during the former part of his life, discovered no great compass of abilities or political wifdom; and appears to have been a man of a weak understanding and violent passions. Darnly was not fuperior to his father in underftanding, and all his paffions were ftill more impetuoush. To these he added that infolence, which the advantage of external form, when accompanied with no quality more valuable, is apt to infpire. Intoxicated with the queen's favour, he began already to affume the haughtinefs of a king, and to put on that imperious air, which majefty itfelf can fcarcely render tolerable.

It was by the advice, or at leaft with the confent, of Murray and his party, that Lennox had been invited into Scotland<sup>i</sup>; and yet, no fooner did he acquire a firm footing in that kingdom, than he began to enter into fecret cabals with those noblemen who were known to be avowed enemies to Murray, and with regard to religion, to be either neutrals or favourers of popery k. Darnly, ftill more imprudent, allowed fome rash expressions concerning those favours which the queen's bounty had conferred upon Murray, to escape him<sup>1</sup>.

But, above all thefe, the familiarity which Darnly cultivated with David Rizio, contributed to increafe the fufpicion and difguft of the nobles.

The low birth and indigent condition of this man placed him in a ftation in which he ought naturally to have remained unknown to posterity. But what fortune called him to act and to fuffer in Scotland, obliges hiftory to defcend from its dignity, and to record his adventures. He was the fon of a mufician in Turin, and having accompanied the Piedmontese ambassador into Scotland, gained admiffion into the queen's family by his skill in music. As his dependant condition had taught him fuppleness of spirit and infinuating manners, he quickly crept into the queen's favour, and her French fecretary happening to return at that time into his own country, was preferred by her to that office. He now began to make a figure in court, and to appear as a man of con-fequence. The whole train of fuitors and expectants, who have an extreme fagacity in difcovering the paths which lead most directly to fuccefs, applied to him. His recommendations were obferved to have great influence over the queen, and he grew to be confidered not only as a favourite, but as a minister. Nor was Rizio careful to abate that envy which always attends fuch an extraordinary and rapid change of fortune. He fludied, on the contrary, to difplay the whole extent of his favour. He affected to talk often and familiarly with the queen in public. He equalled the greatest and most opulent subjects, in richness of drefs, and in the number of his attendants. He discovered, in all his behaviour, that affuming infolence, with which unmerited profperity infpires an ignoble mind. It was with the utmost indignation that the nobles beheld the power, it was with the utmost difficulty that they tolerated the arrogance, of this unworthy minion. Even in the queen's prefence they could not forbear treating him with marks of contempt. Nor was it his exorbitant power alone which exafperated the Scots. They confidered him, and not without reason, as a dangerous enemy to the protestant religion, and fuspected that he held, for this purpofe, a fecret correspondence with the court of Rome m.

It was Darnly's misfortune to fall under the management of this man, who, by flattery and affiduity, eafily gained on his vanity and inex-perience. All Rizio's influence with the queen was employed in his behalf, and contributed, without doubt, towards eftablishing him more firmly in her affections ". But whatever benefit Darnly might reap from his patronage, it did not counterbalance the contempt, and even infamy, to which he was exposed, on account of his familiarity with fuch an upftart.

Though Darnly daily made progrefs in the queen's affections, fhe conducted herfelf, how-

1565.] HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. 315 ever, with fuch prudent referve, as to impofe on Randolph the English resident, a man otherwise shrewd and penetrating. It appears from his letters at this period, that he entertained not the least fuspicion of the intrigue which was carrying on; and gave his court repeated affurances that the Scottish queen had no delign of marrying Darnly °. In the midft of this fecurity, Mary difpatched Maitland to fignify her intention to Elizabeth, and to folicit her confent to the marriage with Darnly. This embaffy was the first thing which opened the eyes of Randolph.

April 18.7 Elizabeth affected the greateft furprife at this fudden refolution of the Scottifh queen, but without reafon. The train was laid by herfelf, and fhe had no caufe to wonder when it took effect. She expressed at the fame time her difapprobation of the match, in the ftrongeft terms; and pretended to forefee many dangers and inconveniencies arifing from it, to both kingdoms. But this top was mere affectation. Mary had often and plainly declared her refolution to marry. It was impoffible fhe could make any choice more inoffensive. The danger of introducing a foreign interest into Britain, which Elizabeth had fo justly dreaded, was entirely avoided. Darnly, though allied to both crowns, and possefied of lands in both kingdoms, could be formidable to neither. It is evident from all thefe circumftances, that Elizabeth's apprehenfions of danger could not poffibly be ferious; and that in all her violent declarations against Darnly, there was much more of grimace than of reality P. There

P. Even the historians of that age acknowledge, that the marriage of the Scottish queen with a subject was far from being 316

There were not wanting, however, political motives of fuch weight, to induce that artful princess to put on the appearance of great dis-pleasure. Mary, intimidated by this, might perhaps delay her marriage; which Elizabeth defired to obstruct with a weakness that little fuited the dignity of her mind and the elevation of her character. Befides, the tranquillity of her own kingdom was the great object of Elizabeth's policy; and by declaring her diffatisfaction with Mary's conduct, she hoped to alarm that party in Scotland, which was attached to the English interest, and to encourage fuch of the nobles as fecretly difapproved the match, openly to oppofe it. The feeds of difcord would by this means be fcattered through that kingdom. Inteftine commotions might arife. Amidst thefe, Mary could form none of those dangerous fchemes to which the union of her people might have prompted her. Elizabeth would become the umpire between the Scottifh queen and her contending subjects; and England might look on with fecurity, while a ftorm, which fhe had raifed, wafted the only kingdom which could poffibly disturb its peace.

In profecution of this fcheme, fhe laid before hcr privy council the meffage from the Scottifh queen [May 1], and confulted them with regard to the anfwer fhe fhould return. determination, it is eafy to conceive, was perfectly conformable to her fecret views. They drew up a remonstrance against the intended match, full of the imaginary dangers with which that event threatened the kingdom 9. Nor did fhe think it enough, to fignify her difapprobation of the meafure, either by Maitland, Mary's ambaffador, or by Randolph, her own refident in Scotland; in order to add more dignity to the farce which the chofe to act, the appointed Sir Nicholas Throgmorton her ambaffador extraor-dinary. She commanded him to declare, in the ftrongeft terms, her diffatisfaction with the ftep which Mary proposed to take; and at the fame time to produce the determination of the privy council, as an evidence that the fentiments of the nation were not different from her own. Not long after, fhe confined the countefs of Lennox as a prifoner, first in her house, and then fent her to the Tower r.

Intelligence of all this reached Scotland before the arrival of the Englifh ambaffador. In the firft transports of her indignation, Mary refolved no longer to keep any measures with Elizabeth; and fent orders to Maitland, who accompanied Throgmorton, to return inftantly to the English court, and in her name to declare to Elizabeth, that after having been amused fo long to fo little purpofe; after having been fooled, and imposed on fo grofsly by her artifices; the was now refolved to gratify her own inclination, and to ask no other confent, but that of her own subjects, in the choice of an husband. Maitland, with his usual fagacity, forefaw all the effects of such a

E E 3 rafh rafh and angry meffage, and ventured rather to incur the difpleafure of his miftrefs, by difobeying her commands, than to be made the inftrument of tearing afunder fo violently the few remaining ties which ftill linked together the two queens<sup>s</sup>.

Mary herfelf foon became fentible of her error. She received the Englifh ambaffador with refpect; juftified her own conduct with decency; and though unalterable in her refolution, fhe affected a wonderful folicitude to reconcile Elizabeth to the mcafure; and even pretcnded, out of complaifance towards her, to put off the confummation of the marriage for fome months<sup>t</sup>. It is probable, however, that the want of the pope's difpenfation, and the profpect of gaining the confent of her own fubjects, were the real motives of this delay.

This confent Mary laboured with the utmost industry to obtain. The earl of Murray was the perfon in the kingdom whose concurrence was of the greatest importance; but she had reason to fear that it would not be procured without extreme difficulty. From the time of Lennox's return into Scotland, Murray perceived that the queen's affections began gradually to be estranged from him. Darnly, Athol, Rizio, all the court favourites, combined against him. His ambitious spirit could not brook this diminution of his power, which his former fervices had so little merited. He retired into the country, and gave way to rivals, with whom he was unable to contend ". The return of the earl of Bothwell, his avowed enemy, who had been accused of a defign 319 upon his life, and who had refided for fome time in foreign countries, obliged him to attend to his own fafety. No intreaty of the queen could perfuade him to a reconcilement with that nobleman. He infifted on having him brought to a public trial, and prevailed, by his importunity, to have a day fixed for it. Bothwell durft not appear in opposition to a man who came to the place of trial attended by five thousand of his followers on horfeback. He was once more conftrained to leave the kingdom; but, by the queen's command, the fentence of outlawry, which is incurred by non-appearance, was not pronounced against him ×.

Mary, fenfible, at the fame time, of how much importance it was to gain a fubject fo powerful and fo popular as the carl of Murray, invited him back to court [May 8], and received him with many demonstrations of refpect and confidence. At last the defired him to fet an example to her other fubjects by fubfcribing a paper, containing a formal approbation of her marriage with Darnly. Murray had many reasons to hefitate, and even to withhold his affent. Darnly had not only undermined his credit with the queen, but discovered, on every occasion, a rooted aversion to his perfon. By confenting to his elevation to the throne, he would give him fuch an acceffion of dignity and power, as no man willingly beftows on an enemy. The unhappy confequences which might follow upon a breach with England, were likewife of confiderable weight with Murray. He had al-ways openly preferred a confederacy with England, before the ancient alliance with France. By his means, chiefly, this change in the fyftem of national politics had been brought about. A league with England had been eftablished; and he could not think of facrificing, to a rafh and youthful paffion, an alliance of fo much utility to the kingdom; and which he and the other nobles were bound, by every obligation, to main-tain y. Nor was the interest of religion forgotten on this occafion. Mary, though furrounded by protestant counfellors, had found means to hold a dangerous correspondence with foreign catholics. She had even courted the pope's protection, who had fent her a fubfidy of eight thoufand crowns<sup>z</sup>. Though Murray had hitherto endeavoured to bridle the zeal of the reformed clergy, and to fet the queen's conduct in the most favourable light, yet her obstinate adherence to her own religion could not fail of alarming him, and by her refolution to marry a papift, the hope of reclaiming her, by an union with a protestant, was for ever cut off<sup>a</sup>. Each of these confiderations had its influence on Murray, and all of them determined him to decline complying at that time with the queen's requeft.

The convention of nobles, which was affembled a few days after [May 14], difcovered a greater difposition to gratify the queen. Many of them, without hefitation, expressed their approbation of the intended match; but as others were startled at the fame dangers which had alarmed Murray, or were influenced by his example to refufe their confent, another convention was appointed at Perth, in order to deliberate more fully concerning this matter <sup>b</sup>.

Meanwhile Mary gave a public evidence of her own inclination, by conferring upon Darnly titles of honour peculiar to the royal family. The opposition she had hitherto met with, and the many contrivances employed to thwart and difappoint her inclination, produced their ufual effect on her heart, they confirmed her paffion, and increased its violence. The fimplicity of that age imputed an affection fo exceffive, to the influence of witchcraft c. It was owing, however, to no other charm, than the irrefiftible power of youth and beauty over a young and tender heart. Darnly grew giddy with his profperity. Flattered by the love of a queen, and the applaufe of many among her fubjects, his natural haughtinefs and infolence became infupportable, and he could no longer bear advice, far lefs contradiction. Lord Ruthven, happening to be the first perfon who informed him that Mary, in order to foothe Elizabeth, had delayed for fome time creating him duke of Albany, he, in a frenzy of rage, drew his dagger, and attempted to ftab him<sup>d</sup>. It re-quired all Mary's attention, to prevent his falling under that contempt to which fuch behaviour defervedly exposed him.

In no fcene of her life was ever Mary's own addrefs more remarkably difplayed. Love fharpened her invention, and made her ftudy every method of gaining her fubjects. Many of the nobles fhe won by her addrefs, and more by her promifes. On fome fhe beftowed lands, to others fhe gave new titles of honour <sup>c</sup>. She even condefcended to court the proteftant clergy; and having invited three of their fuperintendants to Stirling, fhe declared, in flrong terms, her refolution to protect their religion, expressed her willingness to be prefent at a conference upon the points in doctrine which were disputed between the proteftants and papifts, and went fo far as to fhew fome defire to hear fuch of their preachers as were most remarkable for their moderation <sup>f</sup>. By these arts the queen gained wonderfully upon the people, who, unless their jealous be raifed by repeated injuries, are always ready to view the actions of their fovereign with an indulgent eye.

On the other hand, Murray and his affociates were plainly the dupes of Elizabeth's policy. She talked in fo high a firain of her difpleafure at the intended match; fhe treated lady Lennox with fo much rigour; fhe wrote to the Scottifh queen in fuch high terms; fhe recalled the earl of Lennox and his fon in fuch a peremptory manner, and with fuch fevere denunciations of her vengeance if they fhould prefume to difobey <sup>g</sup>; that all thefe exprefions of averfion fully perfuaded them of her fincerity. This belief fortified their feruples with refpect to the match, and encouraged them to oppofe it. They began with forming among themfelves bonds of confederacy and mutual defence; they entered into a fecret eorrefpondence with the Englifh refident, in order to fecure Elizabeth's affiftance when it fhould become needful h; they endeavoured to fill the nation with fuch apprehenfions of danger, as might counterbalance the influence of those arts which the queen had employed.

Befides thefe intrigues, there were fecretly carried on, by both parties, dark defigns of a more criminal nature, and more fuited to the fpirit of the age. Darnly, impatient of that opposition, which he imputed wholly to Murray, and refolving at any rate to get rid of fuch a powerful enemy, formed a plot to affaffinate him, during the meeting of the convention at Perth. Murray, on his part, defpairing of preventing the marriage by any other means, had, together with the duke of Chatelherault and the earl of Argyll, concerted meafures for feizing Darnly, and carrying him a prifoner into England.

If either of these conspiracies had taken effect, this convention might have been attended with confequences extremely tragical; but both were rendered abortive by the vigilance or good fortune of those against whom they were formed. Murray, being warned of his danger by fome retainers to the court, who still favoured his intereft, avoided the blow by not going to Perth. Mary, receiving intelligence of Murray's enterprife, retired with the utmost expedition, along with Darnly, to the other fide of Forth. Confcious, on both fides, of guilt, and inflamed with refentment, it was impossible they could either forget the violence which themfelves had meditated, or forgive the injuries intended against them. From that moment all hope of reconcilement was at an end, and their mutual enmity

<sup>i</sup> The reality of these two opposite confpiracies has given occasion to many disputes and much contradiction. Some deny that any defign was formed against the life of Murray; others call in question the truth of the confpiracy against Darnly. There feen, however, to be plausible reasons for believing that there is fome foundation for what has been afferted with regard to both; though the zeal and credulity of party-writers have added to each many exaggerated circumstances. The following arguments render it probable that fome violence was intended against Murray:

I. This is pofitively afferted by Buchanan, 341. 2. The English refident writes to Cecil, that Murray was affuredly informed that a defign was formed of murdering him at Perth, and mentions various circumstances concerning the manner in which the crime was to be committed. If the whole had been a fiction of his own, or of Murray, it is impoflible that he could have written in this ftrain to fuch a discerning minister. Keith, 287. 3. Murray himself confantly and publicly perfifted in affirming that fuch a defign was formed against his life. Keith, Append. 108. He was required by the queen to transmit in writing an account of the confpiracy which he pretended had been formed against his life. This he did accordingly; but " when it was brought to her majefty by her fervants fent for that purpofe, it appears be her highnefs and her council, that his purgation in that behalf was not fo fufficient as the matter required." Keith, App. 109. He was therefore fummoned to appear within three days before the queen in Holyrood-houfe; and in order to encourage him to do fo, a fafe-conduct was offered to him. Ibid. Though he had once confented to appear, he afterwards declined to do fo. But whoever confiders Murray's fituation, and the character of those who directed Mary's councils at that time, will hardly deem it a decifive proof of his guilt, that he did not choose to risk his person on fuch fecurity. 4. The furious paffions of Darnly, the fiercenefs of his refentment, which forupled at no violence, and the manners of the age, render the imputation of fuch a crime lefs improbable.

II. That Murray and his affociates had refolved to feize Darnly in his return from Perth, appears with still greater certainty ; 1. From the express testimony of Melvil, 112.; although Buchanan, p. 341. and Knox, p. 377. affect, without reason, to represent this as an idle rumour. 2. The queftion was put to Randolph, Whether the governor of Berwick would receive Lennox and his fon, if they were delivered at that place ? His answer was, " that they would not refuse their own, i. e. their own subjects, in whatsoever fort they came unto us, i. e. whether they returned to England voluntarily, as they had been required, or were brought thither by force." This plainly fhews, that fome fuch defign was in hand, and Randolph did not discourage it by the answer which he gave. Keith, 290. 3. The precipitation with which the gueen retired, and the reafon the gave for this fudden flight, are mentioned by Randolph. Keith, 291. 4. A great part of the Scottish nobles, and among thefe the earls of Argyll and Rothes, who were themfelves privy to the defign, affert the reality of the confpiracy. Good. vol. ii. 358.

All these circumstances render the truth of both confpiracies probable. But we may observe how far this proof. though drawn from public records, falls fhort, on both fides, of legal and formal evidence. Buchanan and Randolph, in their accounts of the confpiracy against Murray, differ widely in almost every circumstance. The accounts of the attempt upon Darnly are not more confistent. Melvil alleges, that the defign of the confpirators was to carry Darnly a prifoner into England ; the propofal made to Randoloh agrees with this. Randolph fays, that they intended to carry the queen to St. Andrew's, and Darnly to Caftle Campbell. The lords, in their declaration, affirm the defign of the confpirators to have been to murder Darnly and his father, to confine the queen in Lochleven during life, and to usurp the government. To believe implicitly whatever they find in an ancient paper, is a folly to which, in every age, antiquaries are extremely prone. Ancient papers, however, often contain no more than the flanders of a party, and the lie of the her letters, to repair thither in arms, for the protection of her perfon against her foreign and domeftic enemies k. She was obeyed with all the promptnefs and alacrity with which fubjects run to defend a mild and popular administration. This popularity, however, fhe owed in a great measure to Murray, who had directed her administration with great prudence. But the crime of oppofing her marriage obliterated the memory of his former fervices; and Mary, impatient of contradiction, and apt to confider those who difputed her will, as enemies to her perfon, determined to let him feel the whole weight of her vengeance. For this purpose she fummoned him to appear before her upon a fhort warning, to anfwer to fuch things as fhould be laid to his charge1. At this very time Murray, and the lords who adhered to him, were affembled at Stirling, to deliberate what courfe they fhould hold in fuch a difficult conjuncture. But the current of popular favour ran fo ftrongly against them, and notwithftanding fome fears and jealoufies, there prevailed

day. The declaration of the Bobles referred to, is of this kind; it is plainly rancorous, and written in the very heat of faction. Many things afferted in it are evidently falle or exaggerated. Let Murray and his confederates be as ambitious as we can suppose, they must have had some pretences, and plaufible ones too, before they could venture to imprison their fovereign for life, and to feize the reins of government; but, at that time, the queen's conduct had afforded no colourable excuse for proceeding to fuch extremities. It is likewife remarkable, that in all the proclamations against Murray, of which fo many are published in Keith, Appendix, 108, &c. neither the violent attempt upon Darnly, nor that which he is alleged to have formed against the queen herfelf, are ever once mentioned.

in the nation fuch a general difpolition to gratify the queen in a matter which fo nearly concerned her, that, without coming to any other conclufion, than to implore the queen of England's protection, they put an end to their ineffectual confultations, and returned every man to his own houfe.

Together with this difcovery of the weakness of her enemies, the confluence of her fubjects from all corners of the kingdom afforded Mary an agreeable proof of her own ftrength. While the queen was in this prosperous situation, she determined to bring to a period an affair which had fo long engroffed her heart and occupied her attention. On the twenty-ninth of July, fhe married lord Darnly. The ceremony was performed in the queen's chapel, according to the rites of the Romish church; the pope's bull dispensing with their marriage having been previoufly obtained m. She iffued at the fame time proclamations, conferring the title of king of the Scots upon her husband, and commanding that lience-forth all writs at law should run in the joint names of king and queen n. Nothing can be a ftronger proof of the violence of Mary's love, or the weaknefs of her councils, than this laft ftep. Whether she had any right to choose a husband without confent of parliament, was, in that age, a matter of fome difpute °; that fhe had no right to confer upon him, by her private authority, the title and dignity of king, or by a fimple procla-mation to raife her hulband to be the mafter of her people, feems to be beyond all doubt. cis II. indeed, bore the fame title. It was not, however, the gift of the queen, but of the nation ; and the confent of parliament was obtained, before he ventured to affume it. Darnly's condition, as a fubject, rendered it ftill more neceffary to have the concurrence of the fupreme council in his favour. Such a violent and unprecedented ftretch of prerogative, as the fubfituting a proclamation in place of an act of parliament, might have juftly alarmed the nation. But at that time the queen poffeffed fo entirely the confidence of her fubjects, that, notwithftanding all the clamours of the malecontents, no fymptoms of general difcontent appeared on that account.

Even amidst that fcene of joy which always accompanies fuccefsful love, Mary did not fuffer the courfe of her vengeance against the malecontent nobles to be interrupted. Three days after the marriage, Murray was again fummoned to court, under the feverest penalties, and upon his non-appearance the rigour of justice took place, and he was declared an out-law P. At the fame time the queen fet at liberty lord Gordon, who, ever fince his father's infurrection in the year one thoufand five hundred and fixty-two, had been detained a prifoner ; fhe recalled the earl of Sutherland, who, on account of his concern in that confpiracy, had fled into Flanders; and the permitted Bothwell to return again into Scotland. The first and last of thefe were among the most powerful fubjects in the kingdom, and all of them animated with implacable hatred to Murray, whom they deemed the enemy of their families and the author of their own fufferings. This common hatred became the foundation of the ftricteft union with the queen, and gained them an afcendant over all her councils. Murray himfelf confidered this confederacy with his avowed enemies, as a more certain indication than any meafure flue had yet taken, of her inexorable refertment.

The malecontents had not yet openly taken up arms 9. But the queen having ordered her fubjects to march against them, they were driven to the last extremity. They found themselves unable to make head against the numerous forces which Mary had assembled; and sed into Argyleshire, in expectation of aid from Elizabeth, to whom they had fecretly dispatched a messenger, in order to implore her immediate assistancer.

Meanwhile, Elizabeth endeavoured to embarrafs Mary, by a new deelaration of difguft at her conduct. She blamed both her choice of lord Darnly, and the precipitation with which fhe had concluded the marriage. She required Lennox and Darnly, whom fhe full called her fubjects, to return into England: and at the fame time fhe warmly interceded in behalf of Murray, whose behaviour fhe reprefented to be 9 After their fruitle's confultation in Stirling, the lords retired to their own houfes. Keith, 304. Murray was fiill at St. Andrew's on July 22. Keith, 306. By the places of rendezvous, appointed for the inhabitants of the different counties, August 4, it appears that the queen's intention was to march into Fife, the county in which Murray, Rothes, Kirkaldy, and other chiefs of the malecontents refided. not only innocent but laudable. This meffage, fo mortifying to the pride of the queen, and fo full of contempt for her hufband, was rendered ftill more infupportable by the petulant and faucy demeanour of Tamworth, the perfon who delivered it<sup>s</sup>. Mary vindicated her own conduct with warmth, but with great ftrength of reafon; and rejected the interceffion in behalf of Murray, not without figns of refentment at Elizabeth's pretending to intermeddle in the internal government of her kingdom<sup>t</sup>.

She did not, on that account, intermit in the leaft the ardour with which fhe purfued Murray and his adherents ". They now appeared openly in arms; and having received a fmall fupply in money from Elizabeth *, were endeavouring to raife their followers in the weftern counties. But Mary's vigilance hindered them from affembling in any confiderable body. All her military operations at that time were concerted with wifdom, executed with vigour, and attended with fuccefs. In order to encourage her troops, fhe herfelf marched along with them, rode with loaded piftols ', and endured all the fatigues of war with admirable fortitude. Her alacrity infpired her forces with an invincible refolution, which, together with their fuperiority in number, deterred the malecontents from facing them in the field; but having artfully paffed the queen's army, they marched with great rapidity to Edinburgh, and endeavoured to roufe the inhabitants of that city to arms [August 31]. The queen did not fuffer them to remain long unmolefted; and on her approach, they were forced to abandon that place, and retire in confusion towards the western borders z.

As it was uncertain, for fome time, what route they had taken, Mary employed that interval in providing for the fecurity of the counties in the heart of the kingdom. She feized the places of ftrength which belonged to the rebels; and obliged the confiderable barons, in those thires which she most fuspected, to join in affociations for her defence<sup>2</sup>. Having thus left all the country behind her in tranquillity, fhe, with an army eighteen thoufand ftrong, marched towards Dumfries, where the rebcls then were. During their retreat, they had fent letters to the queen, from almost every place where they halted, full of fubmillion, and containing various overtures towards an accommodation. But Mary, who determined not to let flip fuclı a favourable opportunity of crushing the mutinous spirit of her fubjects, rejected them with difdain. As fhe advanced, the malecontents retired ; and having received no effectual aid from Elizabeth b, they defpaired of any other means of fafety, fled into England, and put themfelves under the protection of the earl of Bedford, warden of the marches [Oct. 20].

Nothing,

Nothing, which Bedford's perfonal friendship for Murray could fupply, was wanting to render their retreat agreeable. But Elizabeth herfelf treated them with extreme neglect. She had fully gained her end, and, by their means, had excited fuch difcord and jealoufies among the Scots, as would in all probability long diftract and weaken Mary's councils. Her bufinefs now was to fave appearances, and to juffify herfelf to the minifters of France and Spain, who accufed her of fomenting the troubles in Scotland by her intrigues. The expedient fhe contrived for her vindication ftrongly difplays her own character, and the wretched condition of exiles, who are obliged to depend on a foreign prince. Murray, and Hamilton abbot of Kilwinning, being ap-pointed by the other fugitives to wait on Elizabeth, inftead of meeting with that welcome re-ception which was due to men, who, out of confidence in her promifes, and in order to forward her defigns, had hazarded their lives and fortunes, could not even obtain the favour of an audience, until they had meanly confented to acknowledge, in the prefence of the French and Spanish ambassadors, that Elizabeth had given them no encouragement to take arms. No fooner did they make this declaration, than the aftonished them with this reply: " You have declared the truth ; I am far from fetting an example of rebellion to my own fubjects, by coun-tenancing those who rebel against their lawful prince. The treafon, of which you have been guilty, is deteftable; and as traitors I banifh you from my prefence "." Notwithftanding this fcene of farce and of falfehood, fo difhonourable to all the perfons who acted a part in it, Elizabeth permitted the malecontents peaceably to refide in her dominions, fupplied them fecretly with money, and renewed her interceffion with the Scottifh queen in their favour<sup>4</sup>.

The advantage fhe had gained over them did not fatisfy Mary; fhe refolved to follow the blow, and to prevent a party, which fhe dreaded, from ever recovering any footing in the nation. With this view fhe called a meeting of parliament; and in order that a fentence of forfeiture might be legally pronounced against the banished lords, she fummoned them, by public proclamation, to appear before it <sup>e</sup>.

The duke of Chatelherault, on his humble application, obtained a feparate pardon [Dec. 1]; but not without difficulty, as the king violently oppofed it. He was obliged, however, to leave the kingdom, and to refide for fomc time in France<sup>f</sup>.

The numerous forces which Mary brought into the field, the vigour with which fhe acted, and the length of time fhe kept them in arms, refemble the efforts of a prince with revenues much more confiderable than those which fhe poffeffed. But armies were then levied and maintained by princes at fmall charge. The vaffal followed his fuperior, and the fuperior attended the monarch, at his own expense. Six hundred horfemen, however, and three companies of foot, befides her guards, received regular pay from the queen. This extraordinary charge, together with the difburfements occafioned by her marriage, exhaufted a treafury which was far from being rich. In this exigency, many devices were fallen upon for raifing money. Fines were levied on the towns of St. Andrew's, Perth, and Dundee, which were fufpected of favouring the malecontents. An unufual tax was imposed on the boroughs throughout the kingdom; and a great fum was demanded of the citizens of Edinburgh, by way of loan. This unprecedented exaction alarmed the citizens. They had recourfe to delays, and ftarted difficulties, in order to evade it. Thefe Mary conftrued to be acts of avowed difobedience, and inftantly committed feveral of them to prifon. But this feverity did not fubdue the undaunted fpirit of liberty which prevailed among the inhabitants. The queen was obliged to mortgage to the city the [uperiority of the town of Leith, by which fhe obtained a confiderable fum of money g. The thirds of ecclefiaftical benefices proved another fource whence the queen derived fome fupply. About this time we find the proteftant clergy complaining more bitterly than ever of their poverty. The army, it is probable, exhaufted a great part of that fund which was appropriated for their maintenance h.

The affemblies of the church were not unconcerned fpectators of the commotions of this turbulent year. In the meeting held the twentyfourth of June, previous to the queen's marriage, feveral of the malecontent nobles were prefeut, and feem to have had great influence on its decifions. The high ftrain in which the affembly addreffed the queen, can be imputed only to those fears and jealoufies with regard to religion, which they endeavoured to infuse into the nation. The affembly complained, with fome bitternefs, of the ftop which had been put to the progress of the reformation by the queen's arrival in Scotland ; they required not only the total fuppreffion of the popifh worfhip throughout the kingdom, but even in the queen's own chapel; and belides the legal eftablishment of the protestant religion, they demanded that Mary herfelf should publicly embrace it. The queen, after fome deliberation, replied, that neither her confcience nor her interest would permit her to take fuch a step. The former would for ever reproach her for a change which proceeded from no inward conviction, the latter would fuffer by the offence which her apoftacy must give to the king of France, and her other allies on the continent i.

It is remarkable, that the profperous fituation of the queen's affairs during this year, began to work fome change in favour of her religion. The earls of Lennox, Athol, and Caffils, openly attended mafs; fhe herfelf afforded the catholics a more avowed protection than formerly; and, by her permiffion, fome of the ancient monks ventured to preach publicly to the people <sup>k</sup>.
