DAVID GARDINER, ESQ.

Cornet in Sir John Cope's Regiment of Dragoons.

DEAR SIR,

WHILE my heart is following you with a truly paternal solicitude through all the dangers of military life in which you are thus early engaged, anxious for your safety amidst the instruments of death, and the far more dangerous allurements of vice. I feel a peculiar pleasure in being able at length, though after such long delays, to put into your hands the memoirs with which I now present you. They contain many particulars, which would have been worthy of your attentive notice, had they related to a person of the most distant nation or age: but they will, I doubt not, command your peculiar regard, as they are sacred to the memory of that excellent man from whom you had the honor to derive your birth, and by whose generous and affectionate care you have been laid under all the obligations which the best of fathers' could confer on a most beloved son.

Here, Sir, you see a gentleman, who, with all the advantages of a liberal and religious education, added to every natural accomplishment that could render him most agreeable, entered, before he had attained the stature of a man, on those arduous and generous services to which you are devoted, and behaved in them with a gallantry and courage which will always give a splendor to his name among the British soldiery, and render him an example to all officers of his rank. But, alas! amidst all the intrepidity of the martial hero, you see him vanquished by the blandishments of pleasures, and, in chase of it, plunging himself into follies and vices, for which no want of education or genius could have been a sufficient excuse. You beheld him urging the ignoble and fatal pursuit, unmoved by the terrors which death was coutinually darting around him, and the most signal deliverances by which providence again and again rescued him from those terrors, till at length he was reclaimed by an ever-memorable interposition of Divine grace. Then you have the pleasure of seeing him become in good earnest a convert to christianity, and by speedy advances growing up into one of its brightest ornaments; his mind continually filled with the great ideas which the gospel of our Redeemer suggests, and bringing the blessed influence of its sublime principles into every relation of military and civil, of public and domestic life. You trace him persevering in a steady and uniform course of goodness through a long series of honorable and prosperous years, the delight of all that were so happy as to know him, and, in his sphere, the most faithful guardian of his country; till, at last, worn out with honorable labors, and broken with infirmities which they had hastened upon him before the time, you see him forgetting them at once at the call of duty and providence; with all the generous ardor of his most vigorous days rushing on the enemies of religion and liberty, sustaining their shock with the most deliberate fortitude, when deserted by those that should have supported him, and cheerfully sacrificing the little remains of a mortal life in the triumphant view of a glorious immortality.

This, Sir, is the noble object I present to your view; and you will, hope, fix your eye continually upon it, and will never allow yourself for one day to forget that this illustrious man is Colonel Gardiner, your ever-honored father, who having approved his fidelity to his death, and received a crown of life, seems, as it were, by what you here read, to be calling out to you from the cloud of witnesses with which you are surrounded, and urging you, by every generous, tender, filial sentiment, to mark the footsteps of his christian race, and strenuously to maintain that combat where the victory is, through Divine grace, certain, and the prize an eternal kingdom in the heavens.

My hopes, Sir, that all these powerful motives will especially have their full efficacy on you, are greatly encouraged by the certainty which I have of your being well acquainted with the evidence of christianity in its full extent: a criminal ignorance of which, in the midst of great advantages for learning them, leaves so many of our young people a prey to deism, and so to vice and ruin, which generally bring up its rear. My life would be a continual burthen to me, if I had not a consciousness in the sight of God, that during the years in which the important trust of your education was committed to my care, I had laid before you the proofs both of natural and revealed religion, in what I assuredly esteem to be, with regard to the judgment, if they are carefully examined, an irresistible light; and that I had endeavoured to attend them with those addresses which might be most likely to impress your heart. You have not, dear Sir, forgotten, and I am confident you can never entirely forget, the assiduity with which I have labored to form your mind, not only to what might be ornamental to you in human life, but above all, to a true taste of what is really excellent, and an early contempt of those vanities by which the generality of our youth, especially in your station, are debased, enervated, and undone. My private as well as publicaddresses for this purpose, I know, will be remembered by you, and the tears of tenderness with which they have so often been accompanied; and may they be so remembered, that they who are most tenderly concerned may be comforted under the loss of such an inestimable friend as Colonel Gardiner, by seeing that his character, in all its most amiable and splendid parts, lives in you; and that how difficult soever it may be to act up to that height of expectation with which the eyes of the world will be fixed on the son of such a father, you are in the strength of Divine grace, attempting it, at least are following him with generous emulation, and with daily solicitude, that the steps may be less unequal.

May the Lord God of your father, and, I will add, of both your pious and honorable parents, animate your heart more and more with such views and sentiments as these! May me guard your life amidst every scene of danger, to be a protection and blessing to those that are yet unborn; and may me give you, in some far distant period of time, to resign it by a gentler dissolution than the hero from whom you sprung, or, if unerring Wisdom appoint otherwise, to end it with equal glory!

Lam, dear Sir,
Your ever-faithful, Affectionate Friend, and Obliged humble Servant,

P. DODDRIDGE.

THE HON. COL. J. GARDINER.

WHEN I promised the public some larger account of the life and character of this illustrious person than I could conveniently insert in my sermon on the sad occasion of his death, I was secure, that, if Providence continued my capacity of writing, I should not wholly disappoint the expectation; for I was furnished with a variety of particulars, which appear to me worthy of general notice, in consequence of that intimate friendship with which he had honored me during the six last years of his life; a friendship which led him to open his heart to me in repeated conversations with an unbounded confidence, [as he then assured me, beyond what he had used with any other man living] so far as religious experiences were concerned: and I had also received several very valuable letters from him during the THE LIFE OF time of our absence from each other, which contained most genuine and edifying traces of his christian character. But I hoped farther to learn many valuable particulars from the papers of his own closet, and from his letters to other friends, as well as from what they more circumstantially knew concerning him: I therefore determined to delay the execution of my promise till I could enjoy these advantages for performing it in the most satisfactory manner; nor have I, on the whole, reason to regret that determination.

I shall not trouble my reader with all the causes which concurred to retard these expected assistances for almost a year: the chief of them were the tedious languishing illness of his afflicted lady, through whose hands it was proper the papers should pass; together with the confusion into which the rebels had thrown them, when they ransacked his seat at Bancton, where most of them were deposited. But having now received such of them as have escaped their rapacious hands, and could conveniently be collected and transmitted, I set myself with the greatest pleasure to perform what I esteem not merely a tribute of gratitude to the memory of my invaluable friend, (though never was the memory of any mortal man more precious and sacred to me,) but out of duty to God and to my fellowcreatures: for I have a most cheerful hope that the narrative I am now to write, will, under the Divine blessing, be a means of spreading, what of all things in the world every benevolent heart will most desire to spread, a warm and lively sense of religion.

My own heart has been so much edified and animated, by what I have read in the memoirs of persons who have been eminent for wisdom and piety, that I cannot but wish the treasure may be more and more increased; and I would hope the world may gather the like valuable fruits from the life I am now attempting; not only as it will contain very singular circumstances which may excite a general curiosity, but as it comes attended with some other particular advantages.

The reader is here to survey a character of such eminent and various goodness as might demand veneration, and inspire him with a desire to imitate it too, had it appeared in the obscurest rank: but it will surely command some peculiar regard, when viewed in so elevated and important a station; especially as it shone, not in ecclesiastical, but military life, where the temptations are so many, and the prevalency of the contrary character so great, that it may seem no inconsiderable praise and felicity to be free from dissolute vice, and to retain what in other professions might be esteemed only a mediocrity of virtue. It may surely with the highest justice be expected that the title and bravery of Colonel Gardiner will invite many of our officers and soldiers, to whom his name has long been honorable and dear, to peruse this account of him with some peculiar attention; in consequence of which it may be a means of increasing the number, and brightening the character of those who are already adorning their office, their country, and their religion, of reclaiming those who will see rather what they ought to be than what they are. On the whole, to the gentlemen of the sword I would particularly offer these memoirs as theirs by so distinguished a title: yet I am firmly persuaded there are none, whose office is so sacred, or whose proficiency in the religious life is so advanced, but they may find something to demand their thankfulness, and to awaken their emulation.

Colonel James Gardiner, of whom we write, was the son of Captain Patrick Gardiner, of the family of Torwood-Head, by Mrs. Mary Hodge, of the family of Glandsmuir. The captain, who was master of a handsome estate, served many years in the army of King William and Queen Anne, and died abroad with the British forces in Germany, quickly after the battle of Hochstet, through the fatigues he underwent in the duties of that celebrated campaign. He had a company in the regiment of foot, once commanded by Colonel Hodge, his valiant brother-in-law, who was slain at the head of that regiment (my memorial from Scotland says) at the battle of Steenkirk, which was fought in the year 1692.

Mrs. Gardiner, our colonel's mother, was a lady of a very valuable character; but it pleased God to exercise her with very uncommon trials; for she not only lost her husband and brother in the service of their country, as before related, but also her eldest son, Mr. Robert Gardiner, on the day which completed the 16th year of his age, at the siege of Namur, in 1695. But there are great reasons to believe God blessed these various and heavy afflictions as the means of forming her to that eminent degree of piety which will render her memory honorable as long as it continues.

Her second son, the worthy person of whom I am now to give a more particular account, was born at Carriden, in Linlih-gowshire, on the 10th of January, A. D. 1687-8; the memorable year of that glorious revolution which he justly esteemed among the happiest of all events. So that when he was slain in defence of those liberties, which God then by so great a providence rescued from utter destruction, i. e. on Sept. 21st, 1745, he was aged 57 years, 8 months, and 11 days.

The annual return of his birth-day was observed by him in the latter and better years of his life in a manner very different from what is commonly practised: for, instead of making it a day of festivity, I am told he rather distinguished it as a season of more than ordinary humiliation before God; both in commemoration of those mercies which he received in the first opening of life, and under an affectionate sense, as well as of his long alienation from the great Author and support of his being, as of the many imperfections which he lamented in the best of his days and services.

I have not met with many things remarkable concerning the earliest years of his life, only that his mother took care to instruct him with great tenderness and affection in the principles of true christianity. He was also trained up in human literature at the school at Linlithgow, where he made a very considerable progress in the languages. I remember to have heard him quote some passages of the Latin classics very pertinently; though his employment in life, and the various turns which his mind took under different impulses in succeeding years, prevented him from cultivating such studies.

The good effects of his mother's prudent and exemplary care were not so conspicuous as she wished and hoped in the younger part of her son's life; yet there is great reason to believe, they were not entirely lost. As they were probably the occasion of many convictions, which in his younger years were over-borne; so I doubt not, that when religious impressions took that strong hold of his heart which they afterwards did, that stock of knowledge which had been so early laid up in his mind was found of considerable service. And I have heard him make the observation, as an encouragement to parents, and other pious friends, to do their duty, and to hope for those good consequences of it which may not immediately appear.

Could his mother, or a very religious aunt (of whose good instructions and exhortations I have often heard him speak with pleasure) have prevailed, he would not have thought of a military life; from which it is no wonder these ladies endeavoured to dissuade him, considering the mournful experience they had of the dan-gers attending it, and the dear relatives they had lost already by it. But it suited his taste; and the ardor of his spirit, animated by the persuasions of a friend who greatly urged it, was not to be restrained. Nor will the reader wonder, that thus excited and supported, it easily overbore their tender remonstrances when he knows that this lively youth fought three duels before he attained the stature of a man; in one of which, when he was eight years old, he received from a boy much older than himself a wound in his right cheek, the scar of which was always very apparent. The false sense of honor which instigated him to it might seem indeed something excusable in those unripened years, and considering the profession of his father, brother, and uncle; but I have often heard him mention this rashness with that regret which the reflection would naturally give to so wise and good a man in the maturity of life. And I have been informed, that after his remarkable conversion, he declined accepting a challenge, with this calm and truly great reply, which in a man of his experienced bravery was exceedingly graceful; "I fear sinning, though you know I do not fear fighting."

He served first as a cadet, which must have been very early: and then, at fourteen years old, he bore an ensign's commission in a Scotch regiment in the Dutch service; in which he continued till the year 1702, when (if my information be right) he received an ensign's commission from Queen Anne, which he bore at the battle of Ramellies, being then in the 19th year of his age. In this ever-memorable action he received a wound in his mouth by a musketball, which hath often been reported to be the occasion of his conversion, that report was a mistaken one; but as some very remarkable circumstances attended this affair, which I have had the pleasure of hearing more than once from his own mouth, I hope my reader will excuse if I give him so uncommon a story at large.

Our young officer was of a party in the Forlorn Hope, and was commanded on what seemed almost a desperate service, to dispossess the French of the church-yard at Ramellies, where a considerable number of them were posted to remarkable advantage. They succeeded much better than was expected; and it may well be supposed that Mr. Gardiner, who had before been in several encounters, and had the view of making his fortune to animate the natural intrepidity of his spirit, was glad of such an opportunity of signalizing himself. Accordingly he had planted his colours on an advanced ground, and while he was calling to his men (probably in that horrid language which is so peculiar a disgrace to our soldiery, and so absurdly common in such articles of extreme danger,) he received a shot into his mouth, which, without beating out any of his teeth, or touching the forepart of his tongue, went through his neck, and came out about an inch and an half on the left side of the vertebræ. Not feeling at first the pain of the stroke, he wondered. what was become of the ball, and in the wildness of his surprise began to suspect he had swallowed it; but dropping soon after, he traced the passage of it by his finger, when he could discover it no other way which I mention as one circumstance, among many which occur, to make it probable that the greater part of those who fall in battle by these instruments of death feel very little anguish from the most mortal wound.

This accident happened about five or six in the evening on the 23rd day of May, in the year 1706; and the army pursuing its advantages against the French, without ever regarding the wounded (which was, it seems, the Duke of Marlborough's constant method,) our young officer lay all night in the field, agitated, as may well be supposed, with a great variety of thoughts. He assured me that when he reflected upon the circumstances of his wound, that a ball should, as he then conceived it, go through his head without killing him, he thought. God had preserved him by miracle, and therefore assuredly concluded he should live, abandoned and desperate as his state then seemed to be. Yet (which to me appeared very astonishing,) he had little thoughts of humbling himself before God, and returning to him after the wanderings of a life so licentiously begun. But expect-ing to recover, his mind was taken up with contrivances to secure his gold, of which he had a pretty deal about him; and he had recourse to a very odd expedient, which proved successful. Expecting to be stripped, he first took out a handful of that clotted gore, of which he was frequently obliged to clear his mouth, or he would have been choaked, and putting it into his left hand, he took out his money (which, I think, was about nineteen pistoles,) and shutting his hand, and besmearing the back part of it with blood, he kept it in this position till the blood dried in such a manner that his hand could not fall open, though any sudden surprise should happen, in which he might lose the presence of mind which that concealment otherwise would have required.

In the morning, the French, who were masters of the spot, though their forces were defeated at some distance, came to plunder the slain; and seeing him to appearance almost expiring, one of them was just applying a sword to his breast to destroy the little remainder of life; when, in the critical moment, upon which all the extraordinary events of such a life as his afterwards proved were suspended, a cordalier, who attended the plunderers, interposed, taking him by his dress for a Frenchman. and said, 'Do not kill that poor child.' Our young soldier heard all that passed, though he was not able to speak one word ; and opening his eyes, made a sign for something to drink. They gave him a sup of some spirituous liquors, which happened to be at hand; by which he said he found a more sensible refreshment than he could remember from any thing he had tasted either before or since. Then signing to the friar to lean down his ear to his mouth, he employed the first efforts of his feeble breath in telling him (what, alas, was a contrived falsehood) that he was nephew to the governor of Huy, a neutral town in the neighbourhood, and that, if he could take any method of conveying him thither, he did not doubt but his uncle would liberally reward him. He had indeed a friend at Huy (who, I think, was governor, and, if I mistake not, had been acquainted with the captain, his father,) from whom he expected a kind reception: but the relation was only pretended. On hearing this, they laid him on a sort of hand-barrow, and sent him by a file of musqueteers towards the place; but the men lost their way, and got into a wood towards the evening, in which they were obliged to continue all night. The poor patient's wound being still undressed, it is not to be wondered that by this time it raged violently. The anguish of it engaged him to beg that they would either kill him outright, or leave him there to die, without the torture of any further motion; and indeed they were obliged to rest for a considerable time, on account of their own weariness. Thus he spent the second night in the open air, without any thing more than a common bandage to staunch the blood. He hath often mentioned it as a most astonishing providence that he did not bleed to death; which, under God, he ascribed to the remarkable coldness of these two nights.

Judging it quite unsafe to attempt carrying him to Huy, from whence they were now several miles distant, his convoy took him early in the morning to a convent in the neighbourhood, where he was hospitably received, and treated with great tenderness, But the cure of his wound was committed to an ignorant barber-surgeon, who lived near the house; the best shift that could then be made at a time when, it may easily be supposed, persons of ability in their profession had their hands full of employment. The tent which this artist applied was almost like a peg driven into the wound; and gentlemen of skill and experience, when they came to hear of the manner in which he was treated, wondered how he could possibly survive such management. But, by the blessing of God, on these applications, rough as they were, he recovered in a few months. The lady abbess, who called him her son, treated him with the affection and care of a mother; and he always declared that every thing he saw within these walls was conducted with the strictest decency and decorum. He received a great many devout admonitions from the ladies there; and they would fain have persuaded him to acknowledge what. they thought so great a deliverance, by embracing the catholic faith, as they were pleased to call it. But they could not succeed; for though no religion lay near his heart, yet he had too much of the spirit of a gentleman lightly to change that form of religion which he wore (as it were) loose about him, as well as too much good sense, to swallow those monstrous absurdities of popery which immediately presented themselves to him, unacquainted as he was with the niceties of the controversy.

When his liberty was regained by an exchange of prisoners, and his health thoroughly established, he was far from rendering unto the Lord according to that wonderful display of Divine mercy which he had experienced. I know very little of the particulars of those wild, thoughtless, and wretched years which lay between the 19th and 30th of his life; except it be that he frequently experienced the Divine goodness in renewed instances, particularly preserving him in several hot military actions, in all which he never received so much as a wound after this, forward as he was in tempting danger; and yet, that all these years were spent in an entire alienation from God, and an eager pursuit of animal pleasure, as his supreme good, The series of criminal amours in which he was almost incessantly engaged during this time must probably have afforded some adventures and occurrences; but the memory of them is perished. Nor do I think it unworthy notice here, that amidst all the intimacy of this friendship, and the many hours of cheerful as well as serious converse which we spent together, I never remember to have heard him speak of any of these intrigues, otherwise than in general with deep and solemn abhorrence. This I the rather mention, as it seemed a most genuine proof of his unfeigned repentance; which, I think, there is great reason to suspect, when people seem to take a pleasure in relating and describing scenes of vicious indulgence, which yet they profess to have disapproved and forsaken.

Amidst all these pernicious wanderings from the paths of religion, virtue, and happiness, he approved himself so well in his military character, that he was made a lieutenant in that year, viz. 1706; and I am told he was quickly promoted to a cornet's commission in Lord Stair's regiment of Scotch Greys; and on the 31st of January, 1714-15, was made a captain-lieutenant in Colonel Ker's regiment of dragoons. He had the honor of being known to the Earl of Stair some time before, and was made his aid-de-camp; and when, upon his Lordship's being appointed ambassador from his late Majesty to the court of France, he made so splendid an entrance into Paris, Captain Gardiner was his master of the horse; and

I have been told that a great deal of the cares of that admirably well-adjusted ceremony fell upon him, so that he gained great credit by the manner in which he conducted it. Under the benign influences of his lordship's favour (which to the last day of his life he retained,) a captain's commission was procured him (dated July 22nd, 1715) in the regiment of dragoons commanded by Colonel Stanhope, (now Earl of Harrington;) and in the year 1717 he was advanced to the majority of that regiment, in which office he continued till it was reduced on Nov. 10th, 1718, when he was put out of commission. But then his Majesty King George I. was so thoroughly apprised of his faithful services that he gave him his sign manuel, entitling him to the first majority that should become vacant in any regiment of horse or dragoons, which happened five years after, to be in Croft's regiment of dragoons, in which he received a commission, dated 1st June, 1724; and on 20th of July the same year, he was made major of an older regiment, commanded by the Earl of Stair.

As I am now speaking of so many of his military preferments, I will dispatch the account of them, by observing, that on the 14th of January, 1729-30, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the same regiment, long under the command of Lord Cadogan; with whose friendship this brave and vigilant officer was also honored for many years. And he continued in this rank and regiment till the 19th of April, 1743, when he received a colonel's commission over a regiment of dragoons, lately commanded by Brigadier Bland, at the head of which he valiantly fell, in the defence of his sovereign and his country, about two years and a half after he received it.

We will now return to that period of his life which passed at Paris, the scene of such remarkable and important events. He continued (if I remember right) several years under the roof of the brave and generous Earl of Stair: to whom he endeavoured to approve himself by every instance of diligent and faithful service; and his lordship gave no inconsiderable proof of the dependance which he had upon him; when, in the beginning of the year 1715, he entrusted him with the important dispatches relating to the discovery, which by a series of admirable policy he had made of a design' which the French king was then forming for invading Great Britain, in favor of the pretender; in which the French apprehended they were so sure of success, that it seemed a point of friendship in one of the chief counsellors of that court to dissuade a dependant of his from accepting some employment under his Britannic Majesty, when proposed by his envoy there; because No. 1.

it was said, that in less than six weeks there would be a revolution in favor of what they called the family of the Stuarts. The captain dispatched his journey with the utmost speed; a variety of circumstances happily occurred to accelerate it; and they, who remember how soon the regiments which that emergency required were raised and armed, will, I doubt not, esteem it a memorable instance, both of the most cordial zeal in the friends of the government, and of the gracious care of Divine Providence over the house of Hanover, and the British liberties, so incomparably connected with its interest.

While Captain Gardiner was at London, in one of the journeys he made upon this occasion, he, with that frankness which was natural to him, and which in those days was not always under the most prudent restraint, ventured to predict, from what he knew of the bad state of the French king's health, that he would not live six weeks, This was made known by some spies who were at St. James's, and came to be reported at the court of Versailles; for he received letters from some friends at Paris, advising him not to return thither, unless he could reconcile himself to a lodging in the Bastile. But he was soon free from that apprehension; for, if I mistake not, before half that time was accomplished, Lewis XIV. died; and it is generally thought his death was hastened by a very accidental circumstance, which had reference to the captain's prophecy: for the last time he ever dined in public, which was a very little while after the report of it had been made there, he happened to discover our British envoy among the spectators. The penetration of this illustrious person was too great, and his attachment to the interest of his royal master too well known, not to render him very disagreeable to that crafty and tyrannical prince whom God had so long suffered to be the disgrace of monarchy, and the scourge of Europe. He at first appeared very languid, as indeed he was; but on casting his eye upon the Earl of Stair, he affected to appear before him in a much better state of health than he really was; and therefore, as if he had been awakened on a sudden from some deep reverie, immediately put himself into an erect posture, called up a labored vivacity into his countenance, and eat much more heartily than was by any means advisable, repeated it two or three times to a nobleman (I think the Duke of Bourbon) then in waiting, " Methinks I eat very well for a man who is to die so soon." But this inroad upon that regularity of living which he had for some time observed, agreed so ill with him, that he never recovered this meal, but died in less than a fortnight. This gave occasion for some humorous people to say, that old

Louis, after all, was killed by a Briton. But if this story be true (which I think there can be no room to doubt, as the colonel, from whom I have often heard it, though absent, could scarce be misinformed), it might more properly be said that he fell by his own vanity; in which view I thought it so remarkable, as not to be unworthy a place in these memoirs.

The captain quickly returned, and continued with small interruptions at Paris at least till the year 1720, and how much longer I do not certainly know. The earl's favor and generosity made him easy in his affairs, though he was (as has been observed above) part of the time out of commission, by breaking the regiment to which he belonged, of which before he was major. This was, in all probability, the gayest part of his life, and the most criminal. ever wise and good examples he might find in the family where he had the honor to reside, it is certain that the French court, during the regency of the Duke of Orleans, was one of the most dissolute under heaven. What, by a wretched abuse of language, have been called intrigues of love and gallantry, were so entirely to the major's then degenerate taste, that, if not the whole business, at least the whole happiness of his life consisted in them; and he had now too much leisure for one who was so prone to abuse it. His fine constitution, than which perhaps there was hardly ever a better, gave him great opportunities of indulging himself in these excesses; and his good spirits enabled him to pursue his pleasures of every kind in so alert and sprightly a manner, that multitudes envied him, and called him, by a dreadful kind of compliment, the happy rake.

Yet still the checks of conscience, and some remaining principles of so good an education, would break in upon his most licentious hours; and I particularly remember he told me, that when some of his dissolute companions were once congratulating him on his distinguished felicity, a dog happened at that time to come into the room, he could not forbear groaning inwardly, and saying to himself, "Oh, that I were that dog!" Such was then his hanpiness, and such perhaps is that of hundreds more, who bear themselves highest in the contempt of religion, and glory in that infamous servitude which they affect to call liberty. But those remonstrances of reason and conscience were in vain; and, in short, he carried things so far in this wretched part of his life, that I am well-assured some sober English gentlemen who made no great pretences to religion, how agreeable soever he might have been to them on other accounts, rather declined than sought his company, as fearing they might have been ensnared and corrupted by it.

Yet I cannot find that in these most abandoned days he was fond of drinking: indeed he never had any natural relish for that kind of intemperance, from which he used to think a manly pride might be sufficient to preserve persons of sense and spirit; as by it they give up every thing that distinguishes them from the meanest of their species, or indeed from animals the most below it; so that, if he ever fell into any excesses of this kind, it was merely out of complaisance to his company, that he might not appear stiff and singular. His frank, obliging, and generous temper procured him many friends; and these principles which rendered him amiable to others, not being under the direction of true wisdom and piety, sometimes made him, in the ways of living he pursued, more uneasy to himself than he might perhaps have been if he could entirely have outgrown them; especially as he was never a sceptic in his principles, but still retained a secret apprehension that natural and revealed religion. though he did not much care to think of either, were founded in truth: and with this conviction his notorious violations of the most essential precepts of both could not but occasion some secret misgivings of heart. His continued neglect of the great Author of his being, of whose perfections he could not doubt, and to whom he knew himself to be under daily and perpetual obligations, gave him, in some moments of involuntary reflection, inexpressible remorse; and this, at times, wrought upon him to such a degree, that he resolved he would attempt to pay him some acknowledgements. Accordingly, for a few mornings he did it; repeating in retirement some passages out of the Psalms, and perhaps other scriptures, which he still retained in his memory; and owning, in a few strong words, the many mercies and deliverances he had received, and the ill returns he had made for them.

I find, among the other papers transmitted to me, the following verses, which I have heard him repeat, as what impressed him a good deal in his unconverted state: and as I suppose they did something towards setting him on his effort toward devotion. and might probably furnish out a part of his orisons, I hope I need make no apology to my reader for inserting them, especially as I do not recollect that I have seen them any where else:-

Attend, my soul! The early birds inspire My grov'ling thought with pure celestial fire; They from their temp'rate sleep awake, and pay Their thankful anthems for the new-born day. See, how the tuneful lark is mounted high, And, poet-like, salutes the eastern sky! He warbles thro' the fragrant air his lays, And seems the beauties of the morn to praise. But man, more void of gratitude, awakes, And gives no thanks for the sweet rest he takes;

Looks on the glorious sun's new kindled flame, Without one thought of Him from whom it came; The wretch unhallow'd does the day begin, Shakes off his sleep, but shakes not off his sin.

But these strains were too devout to continue long in a heart as yet quite unsanctified; for how readily soever he could repeat such acknowledgments of the Divine power, presence, and goodness, and own his follies and faults, he was stopt short by the remonstrances of his conscience, as to the flagrant absurdity of confessing sins he did not desire to forsake, and of pretending to praise God for his mercies, when he did not endeavour to live to his service, and to behave in such a manner as gratitude, if sincere, would plainly dictate. A model of devotion, where such sentiments made no part, his good sense could not digest: and the use of such language before an heart-searching God, merely as an hypocritical form, while the sentiments of his soul were contrary to it, justly appeared to him such daring profaneness, that irregular as the state of his mind was, the thought of it struck him with horror. He therefore determined to make no more attempts of this sort; and was, perhaps, one of the first that deliberately laid aside prayer from some sense of God's omniscience, and some natural principle of honor and conscience.

These secret debates with himself, and ineffectual efforts, would sometimes return: but they were overborne, again and again, by the force of temptation; and it is no wonder that, in consequence of them, his heart grew vet harder: nor was it softened or awakened by some very memorable deliverances which at this time he received. He was in extreme danger by a fall from his horse, as he was riding post (I think in the streets of Calais), when going down a hill the horse threw him over his head, and pitched over him, so that when he rose the beast lay beyond him, and almost dead. Yet though he received not the least harm, it made no serious impression on his mind. In his return from England in the packetboat (if I remember right, but a few weeks after the former accident,) a violent storm that drove up to Harwich tossed them from thence for several hours in a dark night on the coast of Holland, and brought them into such extremity, that the captain of the vessel urged him to go to prayers immediately, if he ever intended to do it at all; for he concluded they would in a few minutes be at the bottom of the sea. In this circumstance he did pray, and that very fervently too; and it was very remarkable, that while he was crying to God for deliverance, the wind fell, and quickly after they arrived at Calais. But the major was so little affected with what had befallen him, that when some of his gay friends, on hearing the story, rallied him upon the efficacy of his prayers, he excused himself from the scandal of being thought much in earnest, by saying that it was at midnight, an hour when his mother and aunt were asleep, or else he should have left that part of the business to them;" a speech which I should not have mentioned, but as it shews in so lively a view the wretched situation of his mind at that time, though his great deliverance from the power of darkness was then nearly approaching. He recounted these things to me with the greatest humility, as shewing how utterly unworthy he was of that miracle of Divine grace, by which he was quickly after brought to so true and so prevalent a sense of religion.

And now I am come to that astonishing part of his story, the account of his conversion, which I cannot enter upon without assuring the reader that I have sometimes been tempted to suppress many circumstances of it, not only as they may seem incredible to some, and enthusiastical to others, but as I am very sensible they are liable to great abuses, which was the reason that he gave me for concealing the most extraordinary from many persons to whom he mentioned some of the rest. And I believe it was this, together with the desire of avoiding every thing that might look like ostentation on this head, that prevented his leaving a written account of it, though

I have often entreated him to do it, as I particularly remember I did in the very last letter I ever wrote him; and pleaded the possibility of his falling amidst those dangers to which I knew his valor might in such circumstances naturally expose him. I was not so happy as to receive any answer to this letter, which reached him but a few days before his death; nor can I certainly say whether he had or had not complied with my request, as it is very possible a paper of that kind, if it were written, might be lost amidst the ravages which the rebels made when they plundered Bancton. The story, however, was so remarkable, that I had little reason to apprehend I should ever forget it; and yet, to guard against all contingencies of that kind, I wrote it down that very evening, as I had heard it from his own mouth; and I have now before me the memoirs of that conversation, dated August 14, 1739, which conclude with these words, (which I added, that if we should both have died that night, the world might not have lost the edifying and affecting history, or have wanted any attestation of it I was capable of giving.) " N. B. I have written down this account with all the exactness I am capable of, and could safely take an oath of it as to the truth of every circumstance, to the best of my remembrance, as the colonel related to me a few hours ago." I do not know that I have reviewed this paper since I wrote it. till I set myself thus publicly to record this extraordinary fact; but I find it punctually to agree with what I have often related from my memory, which I charged carefully with so wonderful and important a fact. It is with all solemnity that I now deliver it down to posterity, as in the sight and presence of God; and I choose deliberately to expose myself to those severe censures which the haughty but empty scorn of infidelity, or principles nearly approaching it, and effectually doing its pernicious work, may very probably dictate upon the occasion, rather than to smother a relation which may, in the judgment of my conscience, be likely to conduce so much to the glory of God, the honor of the gospel, and the good of mankind. One thing more I will only premise, that I hope none who have heard the colonel himself speak something of this wonderful scene will be surprised if they find some new circumstances here; because he assured me, at the time he first gave me the whole narration (which was in the very room in which I now write). that he had never imparted it so fully to any man living before; yet, at the same time, he gave me full liberty to communicate it to whomsoever I should in my conscience judge it might be useful to do it, whether before or after his death. Accordingly I did, while he was alive, recount almost every circumstance I am now going to write, to several pious friends; referring them at the same time to the colonel himself, whenever they might have an opportunity of seeing or writing to him for a farther confirmation of what I told them, if they judged it requisite. They glorified God in him; and I humbly hope many of my readers will also do it. They will soon perceive the reason of so much caution in my introduction to this story, for which therefore I shall make no further apology.

This memorable event happened towards the middle of July, 1719; but I cannot be exact as to the day. The major had spent the evening (and, if I mistake not, it was the sabbath) in some gay company, and had an unhappy assignation with a married woman, of what rank or quality I did not particularly enquire, whom he was to attend exactly at twelve. The company broke up about eleven; and not judging it convenient to anticipate the time appointed, he went into his chamber to kill the tedious hour, perhaps with some amusing book, or some other way. But it very accidentally happened that he took up a religious book which his good mother or aunt had, without his knowledge, slipped into his portmanteau. It was called, if I remember the title exactly, The Christian Soldier, or Heaven taken by Storm; and it was written by No. L.

Mr. Thomas Watson. Guessing by the title of it that he should find some phrases of his own profession spiritualized in a manner which he thought might afford him some diversion, he resolved to dip into it; but he took no serious notice of any thing he read in it; and yet while this book was in his hand, an impression was made upon his mind (perhaps God only knows how.) which drew after it a train of the most important and happy consequences.

There is indeed a possibility, that while he was sitting in this attitude, and reading in this careless and profane manner, he might suddenly fall asleep, and only dream of what he apprehended he saw: but nothing can be more certain, than that, when he gave me this relation, he judged himself to have been as broad awakeduring the whole time as he ever was in any part of his life; and he mentioned it to me several times afterwards as what undoubedly passed, not only in his imagination, but before his eves.

He thought he saw an unusual blaze of light fall upon the book while he was reading, which he at first imagined might happen by some accident in the candle; but lifting up his eyes, he apprehended, to his extreme amazement, that there was before him, as it were suspended in the air, a visible representation of the Lord Jesus Christ upon the cross, surrounded on all sides with a glory; and was impressed, as if a voice, or something equivalent to a voice, had came to him, to this effect, (for he was not confident as to the very words,) "Oh sinner! did I suffer this for thee, and are these thy returns?" But whether this were an audible voice, or only a strong impression on his mind equally striking, he did not seem very confident; though, to the best of my remembrance, he rather judged it to be the former. Struck with so amazing a phenomenon as this, there remained hardly any life in him; so that he sunk down in the arm-chair in which he sat, and continued, he knew not exactly how long, insensible: (which was one circumstance that made me several times take the liberty to suggest, that he might possibly be all this while asleep). But however that were, he quickly after opened his eyes, and saw nothing more than usual.

It may easily be supposed he was in no condition to make any observation upon the time in which he had remained in an insensible state; nor did he throughout all the remainder of the night once recollect that criminal and detestable assignation which had before engrossed all his thoughts. He rose in a tumult of passion not to be conceived, and walked to and fro in his chamber, till he was ready to drop down in unutterable astonishment and agony of heart, appearing to himself the vilest monheart.

ster in the creation of God, who had all his life-time been crucifying Christ afresh by his sins, and now saw, as he assuredly believed, by a miraculous vision, the horror of what he had done. With this was connected such a view both of the majesty and goodnes of God, as caused him to loath and abbor himself, and to repent as in dust and ashes. He immediately gave judgement against himself, that he was most justly worthy of eternal damnation. He was astonished that he had not been immediately struck dead in the midst of his wickedness; and (which I think deserves particular remark) though he assuredly believed that he should ere long be in hell, and settled it as a point with himself for several months, that the wisdom and justice of God did almost necessarily require that such an enormous sinner should be made an example of everlasting vengeance, and a spectacle as such both to angels and men; so that he hardly durst presume to pray for pardon: yet, what he then suffered was not so much from the fear of hell, though he concluded it would soon be his portion, as from a sense of that horrible ingratitude he had shewn to the God of his life, and to that blessed Redeemer who had been in so affecting a manner set forth as crucified before him.

To this he refers in a letter, dated from Douglas, April 1, 1725, communicated to me by his lady; but I know not to whom it was addressed. His words are these: " One thing relating to my conversion, and a remarkable instance of the goodness of God to me, the chief of sinners, I do not remember that I ever told to any other person. It was this: that after the astonishing sight I had of my blessed Lord, the terrible condition in which I was, proceeded not so much from the terror of the law, as from a sense of having been so ungrateful a monster to Him whom I thought I saw pierced for my transgressions." I the rather insert these words, as they evidently attest the circumstance which may seem most amazing in this affair, and contain so express a declaration of his own apprehension

In this view it may naturally be supposed he passed the remainder of the night waking; and he could get but little rest in several that followed. His mind was continually taken up in reflecting on the Divine purity and goodness; the grace which had been proposed to him in the gospel, and which he had rejected; the singular advantages he had enjoyed and abused; and the many favours of Providence which he had received, particularly in rescuing him from so many imminent dangers of death, which he now saw must have been attended with such dreadful and hopeless destruction.

The privileges of his education, which he had so much despised, now lay with an almost insupportable weight on his mind: and the folly of that career of sinful pleasure which he had so many years been running with desperate eagerness and unworthy delight, now filled him with indignation against himself, and against the great deceiver by whom (to use his own phrase) he had been " so wretchedly befooled." This he used often to express in the strongest terms, which I shall not repeat so particularly, as I cannot recollect some of them. But on the whole it is certain, that by what passed before he left his chamber the next day, the whole frame and disposition of his soul was new-modelled and changed; so that he became, and continued to the last day of his exemplary and truly christian life, the very reverse of what he had been before. A variety of particulars, which I am afterwards to mention, will illustrate this in the most convincing manner. But I cannot proceed to them without pausing awhile to adore so illustrious an instance of the power and freedom of Divine grace, and entreating my reader seriously to reflect upon it, that his own heart may be suitably affected; for surely, if the truth of the fact be admitted in the lowest views in which it can be placed (that is, supposing the first impression to have passed in a dream), it must be allowed to have been little, if any thing, less than miraculous. It cannot in the course of nature be imagined how such a dream should arise in a mind full of the most impure ideas and affections, and (as he himself often pleaded) more alienated from the thoughts of a crucified Saviour than from any other object that can be conceived; nor can we surely suppose it should, without a mighty energy of the Divine power, be effectual to produce not only some transient flow of passion, but so entire and so permanent a change in character and conduct.

On the whole, therefore, I must beg leave to express my own sentiments of the matter, by repeating on this occasion what I wrote several years ago, in my eighth sermon on Regeneration, in a passage dictated chiefly by the circumstantial knowledge which I had of this amazing story, and, methinks, sufficiently vindicated by it, if it stood entirely alone; which yet, I must take the liberty to say, it does not; for I hope the world will be well informed that there is at least a second that very nearly approaches it, whenever the established church of England shall lose one of its brightest ornaments, and one of the most useful members which that, or perhaps any other christian communion, can boast: in the mean time may his exemplary life be long continued, and his zealous ministry abundantly prospered! I beg my reader's pardon for this digression. The passage I referred to above is remarkably, though not equally, applicable to both the cases, as it stands in page 263 of the first edition, and page 160 of the second: under that head, where I am shewing that God sometimes accomplishes the great work of which we speak by secret and immediate impressions on the mind. After preceding illustrations, there are the following words on which the colonel's conversion will throw the justest light: "Yea, I have known those of distinguished genius, polite manners, and great experience in human affairs, who, after having outgrown all the impressions of a religious education, after having been hardened rather than subdued by the most singular mercies, even various, repeated, and astonishing deliverances, which have appeared to themselves no less than miraculous: after having lived for years without God in the world, notoriously corrupt themselves, and laboring to the utmost to corrupt others, have been stopt on a sudden in the full career of their sin, and have felt such rays of the Divine presence, and redeeming love, darting in upon their minds, almost like lightning from heaven, as have at once roused, overpowered, and transformed them; so that they have come out of their secret chambers with an irreconcileable enmity to those vices to which, when they entered them, they were the tamest and most abandoned slaves; and have appeared from that very hour the votaries, the patrons, the champions of religion; and after a course of the most resolute attachment to it, in spite of all the reasonings or the railleries, the importunities, or the reproaches of its enemies, they have continued to this day some of its brightest ornaments; a change which I behold with equal wonder and delight, and which, if a nation should join in deriding it, I would adore as the finger of God."

The mind of Major Gardiner continued from this remarkable time till towards the end of October (that is, rather more than three months, but especially the two first of them) in as extraordinary a situation as one can well imagine. He knew nothing of the joys arising from a sense of pardon; but, on the contrary, for the greater part of that time, and with very short intervals of hope toward the end of it, took it for granted that he must, in all probability, quickly perish. Nevertheless, he had such a sense of the evil of sin, of the goodness of the Divine Being, and of the admirable tendency of the christian revelation, that he resolved to spend the remainder of his life, while God continued him out of hell, in as rational and useful a manner as he could; and to continue casting himself at the feet of Divine mercy every day, and often in a day, if peradventure there might be hope of pardon, of which all that he could say was, that he did not absolutely despair. He had at that time such a sense of the degeneracy of his own heart, that he hardly durst form any determinate resolution against sin, or pretend to engage himself by any vow in the presence of God; but was continually crying to him that he would deliver him from the bondage of corruption. He perceived in himself a most surprising alteration with regard to the dispositions of his heart; so that, though he felt little of the delights of religious duties, he extremely desired opportunities of being engaged in them; and those licentious pleasures, which had before been his heaven, were now absolutely his aversion. And indeed, when I consider how habitual all those criminal indulgences were grown to him, and that he was now in the prime of life, and all this while in high health too, I cannot but be astonished to reflect upon it that he should be so wonderfully sanctified in body, as well as soul and spirit, as that for all the future years of his life, he, from that hour, should find so constant a disinclination to, and abhorrence of, those criminal sensualities to which he fancied he was before so invincibly impelled by his very constitution, that he was used strangely to think, and to say, that Omnipotence itself could not reform him without destroying that body, and giving him another. Mr. Spears expresses this wonderful circumstance in these remarkable words: " I was (said the colonel to me) effectually cured of all inclination to that sin I was so strongly addicted to, that I thought nothing but shooting me through the head could have cured me of it; and all desire and inclination to it was removed as entirely as if I had been a sucking child; nor did the temptation return to this day," Mr. Webster's words on the same subject are these: "One thing I have heard the colonel frequently say, that he was much addicted to impurity before his acquaintance with religion; but that, so soon as he was enlightened from above, he felt the power of the Holy Ghost changing his nature so wonderfully, that his sanctification in this respect seemed more remarkable than in any other." On which that worthy person makes this good remark: " So thorough a change of such a polluted nature, evidenced by the most unblemished walk and conversation for a long course of years, demonstrates the power of the Highest, and leaves no room to doubt of its reality." Mr. Spears says this happened in three days' time. But from what I can recollect. all that the colonel could mean by that expression, if he used it (as I concluded he did.) was, that he began to make the observation in the space of three days; whereas, in the space of that time. his thoughts were so taken up with the wonderful views presented to his mind, that he did not immediately attend to it. If he had within the first three days any temptation to seek some ease from the anguish of his mind, in returning to former sensualities, it is a circumstance he did not mention to me; and by what I can recollect of the strain of his discourse, he intimated, if he did not express the contrary.

Nor was he only delivered from that bondage of corruption, which had been habitual to him for many years, but felt in his breast so contrary a disposition, that he was grieved to see human nature, in those to whom he was almost entirely a stranger, prostituted to such low and contemptible pursuits. He therefore exerted his natural courage in a very new kind of combat; and became an open advocate for religion. in all its principles, so far as he was acquainted with them, and all its precepts relating to sobriety, righteousness, and godliness. Yet he was very desirous and cautious that he might not run into an extreme, and made it one of his first petitions to God, the very day after these amazing impressions had been wrought in his mind, that he might not be suffered to behave with such an affected strictness and preciseness as would lead others about him into mistaken notions of religion, and expose it to reproach or suspicion, as if it were an unlovely or uncomfortable thing. For this reason he endeavoured to appear as cheerful in conversation as he conscientiously could; though, in spite of all his precautions, some traces of that deep inward sense which he had of his guilt and misery would at times appear. He made no secret of it, however, that his views were entirely changed, though he concealed the particular circumstances attending that change. He told his most intimate companions freely that he had reflected on the course of life in which he had so long joined them, and found it to be folly and madness, unworthy a rational creature, and much more unworthy persons calling themselves christians. And he set up his standard upon all occasions against principles of infidelity, and practices of vice, as determinately and as boldly as ever he displayed or planted his colors, when he bore them with so much honor in the field.

I cannot forbear mentioning one struggle of this kind which he described to me, with a large detail of circumstances, the first day of our acquaintance. There was at that time in Paris a certain lady (whose name, then well known in the grand and the gay world, I must beg leave to conceal,) who had imbibed the principles of deism, and valued herself much upon being an avowed advocate for them. The major, with his usual frankness (though, I doubt not, with that politeness of manners which was so habitual to him, and which he retained throughout his whole life,) answered her like a man who perfectly saw through the fallacy of her arguments, and was grieved to the heart for her delusion. On this she briskly challenged him to debate the matter at large, and to fix upon a day for that purpose when he should dine with her, attended with any clergyman he might choose, whether of the Protestant or Catholic communion. A sense of duty would not allow him to decline this challenge; and yet he had no sooner accepted it but he was thrown into great perplexity and distress, lest being (as I remember he expressed it when he told me the story) only a christian of six weeks old, he should prejudice so good a cause by his unskilful manner of defending it. However, he sought his refuge in earnest and repeated prayers to God, that he who can ordain strength, and perfect praise, out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, would graciously enable him, on this occasion, to vindicate his truths in a manner which might carry conviction along with it. He then endeavoured to marshal the arguments in his own mind as well as he could; and apprehending that he could not speak with so much freedom before a number of persons, especially before such whose province he might in that case seem to invade, if he had not devolved the principal part of the discourse upon them, he easily admitted the apology of a clergyman, or two to whom he mentioned the affair, and waited on the lady alone upon the day appointed. But his heart was so set upon the business, that he came earlier than he was expected, and time enough to have two hours discourse before dinner; nor did he at all decline, having two young persons, nearly related to the lady, present during the conference.

The major opened it, with a view of such arguments for the christian religion as he had digested in his own mind, to prove that the apostles were not mistaken themselves, and that they could not have intended to impose upon us in the accounts they give of the grand facts they attest; with the truth of which facts, that of the christian religion is most apparently connected. And it was great encouragement to him to find that, unaccustomed as he was to a discourse of this nature, he had an unusual command both of thought and expression; so that he recollected, and uttered every thing as he could have wished. The lady heard with attention; and though he paused between every branch of the argument, she did not interrupt the course of it, till he told her he had finished his design, and waited for her reply. She then produced some of her objections, which he took up and canvassed in such a manner, that at last she burst out into tears, allowed the force of his arguments and replies, and appeared for some time after so deeply impressed with the conversation, that it was observed by several of her friends. And there is great reason to believe that the impression continued, at least so far as to prevent her from ever appearing under the character of an unbeliever or a sceptic.

This is only one specimen among many of the battles he was almost daily called out to fight in the cause of religion and virtue: with relation to which I find him expressing himself thus in a letter to Mrs. Gardiner, his good mother, dated from Paris, the 25th January following, that is, 1719-20, in answer to one, in which she had warned him to expect such trials: "I have (says he) already met with them, and am obliged to fight, and to dispute every inch of ground: but all thanks and praise to the great Captain of my salvation; he fights for me; and then it is no wonder that I come off more than conqueror." By which last expression I suppose he meant to insinuate that he was strengthened and established, rather than overborne by this opposition. Yet it was not immediately that he gained such fortitude. He has often told me how much he felt in those days of the emphasis of those words of the apostle, in which he ranks the trial of cruel mockings with scourgings, and bonds, and imprisonments. The continual railleries with which he was received in almost all companies, where he had been most familiar before, did often distress him beyond measure; so that he has several times declared he would much rather have marched up to a battery of the enemy's cannon, than have been obliged, so continually as he was, to face such artillery as this. But, like a brave soldier in the first action wherein he is engaged, he continued resolute, though shuddering at the terror of the assault; and quickly overcame those impressions, which it is not perhaps in nature wholly to avoid; and therefore I find him in the letter referred to above, which was written about half a year after his conversion, 'quite ashamed to think of the uneasiness which these things once gave him.' In a word, he went on as every resolute christian, by Divine grace, may do, till he turned ridicule and opposition into respect and veneration.

But this sensible triumph over these difficulties was not till his christian experience had been abundantly advanced by the blessing of God on the sermons he heard (particularly in the Swiss chapel), and on the many hours which he spent in devout retirement, pouring out his whole soul before God in prayer. He began, within about two months after his first memorial change, to perceive some secret dawnings of cheerful hope, that vile as he saw himself to be (and I believe no words can express how vile that was), he might nevertheless obtain mercy through a Redeemer. And at length (if I remember right, about the end of October, 1719,) he found all the burthen of his mind taken off at once by the powerful impression of that memorable scripture upon his mind, Rom. iii. 25, 26: "Whom God hath set forth for a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness in the remission of sins,that he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus." He had used to imagine that the justice of God required the danmation of so enormous a sinner as he saw himself to be. But now he was made deeply sensible that the Divine justice might be not only vindicated, but glorified in saving him by the blood of Jesus, even that blood which cleanseth from all Then did he see and feel the riches of redeeming love and grace, in such a manner, as not only engaged him with the utmost pleasure and confidence to venture his soul upon it, but even swallowed up (as it were) his whole heart in the returns of love, which from that blessed time became the genuine and delightful principle of his obedience, and animated him with an enlarged heart, to run the way of God's commandments. Thus God was pleased

(as he himself used to speak) in an hour to turn his captivity. All the terrors of his former state were changed into unutterable joy, which kept him almost continually waking for three nights together, and yet refreshed him as the noblest of cordials. His expressions, though naturally very strong, always seemed to be swallowed up, when he would describe the series of thoughts through which he now passed, under the rapturous experience of that joy unspeakable and full of glory, which then seemed to overflow his soul; as, indeed, there was nothing he seemed to speak of with greater relish. And though the first ecstacies of it afterwards subsided into a more calm and composed delight, yet were the impressions so deep and so permanent, that he assured me, on the word of a christian and a friend, wonderful as it might seem, that for about seven years after this he enjoyed almost an heaven upon earth. His soul was so continually filled with a sense of the love of God in Christ, that it knew little interruption but when necessary converse, and the duties of his station, called off his thoughts for a little time. And when they did so, as soon as he was alone, the torrent returned into its natural channel again; so that from the minute of his awakening in the morning, his heart was rising to God, and triumphing in him; and these thoughts attended him through all the seenes of life, till he lay down on his bed again, and a short parenthesis of sleep (for it was but a very short one that he allowed himself) invigorated his animal powers, for renewing them with greater intenseness and sensibility.

I shall have an opportunity of illustrating this in the most convincing manner below, by extracts from several letters which he wrote to intimate friends during this happy period of time: letters which breathe a spirit of such sublime and fervent piety, as I have seldom met with any where else. In these circumstances it is no wonder that he was greatly delighted with Dr. Watt's imitation of the exxvi. Psalm; since it may be questioned whether there ever was a person to whom the following stanzas of it were more suitable:—

When God reveal'd his gracious name, And chang'd my mournful state, My rapture seem'd a pleasing dream, Thy grace appear'd so great.

The world beheld the glorious change,
And did thine hand confess;
My tongue broke out in unknown strains,

My tongue broke out in unknown strains And sung surprising grace.

"Great is the work," my neighbours cry'd,
And own'd the pow'r divine:
"Great is the work," my heart reply'd;

" And be the glory thine."

COL. GARDINER. 49

The Lord can clear the darkest skies, Can give us day for night; Make drops of sacred sorrow rise To rivers of delight.

Let those that sow in sadness, wait Till the fair harvest come; They shall confess their sheaves are great, And shout the blessings home.

I have been so happy as to get the sight of five original letters which he wrote to his mother about this time, which do, in a very lively manner, illustrate the surprising change made in the whole current of his thoughts, and temper of his mind. Many of them were written in the most hasty manner, just as the courier who brought them was perhaps unexpectedly setting out; and they relate chiefly to affairs in which the public is not at all concerned; yet there is not one of them in which he has not inserted some warm and genuine sentiment of religion. And indeed it is very remarkable, that though he was pleased to honor me with a great many letters, and I have seen several more which he wrote to others, some of them on journeys, where he could have but few minutes at command, vet I cannot recollect that I ever saw any one in which there was not some trace of piety. And the Rev. Mr. Webster, who was employed to review great numbers of them, that he might select such extracts as he should think proper to communicate to me, has made me the same observation. His words are these: "I have read over a vast number of the colonel's letters, and have not found any of them, however short, and wrote in the most passing manner, even when posting, but what is expressive of the most passionate breathings towards his God and Saviour. If the letter consists but of two sentences, religion is not forgotten, which doubtless deserves to be earefully remarked as the most uncontested evidence of a pious mind, ever under the warmest impressions of Divine things."

The major, with great justice, tells the good lady his mother, that when she saw him again, she would find the person indeed the same, but every thing else entirely changed. And she might easily have perceived it of herself by the whole tenor of those letters, which every where breathe the unaffected spirit of a true christian. They are taken up sometimes with giving advice and directions concerning some pious and charitable contributions (one of which I remember amounted to ten guineas, though, as he was then out of commission, and had not formerly been very frugal, it cannot be supposed he had much to spare); sometimes in speaking of the pleasure with which he attended sermons, and expected sacramental opportunities; and other times in exhorting her, established as she was in religion, to labor after a yet more exemplary character and conduct, or in recommending her to the Divine presence and blessing, as well as himself to her players. What satisfaction such letters as these must give to a lady of her distinguished piety, who had so long wept over this dear and amiable son, as quite lost to God, and on the verge of final destruction, it is not for me to describe, or indeed to conceive. But lastily as these letters were written, only for private view, I will give a few specimens from them in his own words, which will serve to illustrate, as well as confirm, what I have hinted above.

"I must take the liberty," says he, in a letter dated on the first day of the new year. or, according to the old style, Dec. 21, 1719, " to entreat you that you would receive no company on the Lord's-day. I know you have a great many good acquaintance, with whose discourses one might be very well edified; but as you cannot keep out and let in whom you please, the best way, in my humble opinion, will be to see none." In another, of Jan. 25, " I am happier than any one can imagine, except I could put him in exactly the same situation with myself, which is what the world cannot give, and no man ever attained to, unless it were from above." In another, dated March 30, which was just before a sacrament-day, "To-morrow, if it please God, I shall be happy; my soul being to be fed with the bread of life, which came down from heaven. I shall be mindful of you all there." In another, of Jan. 29, he thus expresses that indifference for worldly possessions, which he so remarkably carried through all the remainder of his life; " I know the rich are only stewards for the poor, and must give an account of every penny; therefore the less I have, the more easy will it be to render a faithful account of it." And to add no more from these letters at present, in the conclusion of one of them he has these comprehensive and solemn words: " Now that He, who is the case of the afflicted, the support of the weak, the wealth of the poor, the teacher of the ignorant, the anchor of the fearful, and the infinite reward of all faithful souls, may pour out upon you all his richest blessings, shall always be the prayer of him who is entirely yours," &c.

To this account of his correspondence with his excellent mother, I should be glad to add a large view of another, to which she introduced him, with that reverend and valuable person, under whose pastoral care she was placed, I mean the justly celebrated Doctor Edmund Calamy, to whom she could not but early communicate the joyful news of her son's conversion. I am not so happy as to be possessed of the letters which passed between them, which I have reason to believe would make a curjous and valuable collection: but I have had the pleasure of receiving, from my worthy and amiable friend, the Rev. Mr. Edmund Calamy, one of the letters which the doctor, his father, wrote to the major on this wonderful occasion. I perceive by the contents of it that it was the first; and indeed it is dated as early as the third of August, 1719, which must be but a few days after his own account, dated August 4, N. S. could reach England. There is so much true religion and good sense in this paper, and the counsel it suggests may be so seasonable to other persons in circumstances which bear any resemblance to his, that I make no apology to my reader for inserting a large extract from it.

" Dear Sir,-I conceive it will not much surprise you to understand that your good mother communicated to me your letter to her, dated August 4, N. S. which brought her the news you conceived would be so acceptable to her. I, who have been a witness to her concern for you on a spiritual account, can attest with what joy this news was received by her, and imparted to me as a special friend, who she knew would bear a part with her on such an occasion. And indeed, if (as our Saviour intimates, Luke xv. 7-10.) there is in such cases, joy in heaven, and among the angels of God, it may well be supposed, that of a pious No. 2.

mother who has spent so many prayers and tears upon you, and, as it were, travailed in birth with you again, till Christ was formed in you, could not be small. You may believe me if I add that I also, as a common friend of her's and your's, and which is much more of the Prince of light, whom you now declare you heartily fall in with in opposition to that of the dark kingdom, could not but be tenderly affected with an account of it under your own hand. My joy on this account was the greater, considering the importance of your capacity, interests, and prospects; which, in such an age as this, may promise most happy consequences, on your heartily appearing on God's side, and embarking in the interests of our dear Redeemer. If I have hitherto at all remembered you at the throne of grace, at your good mother's desire (which you are pleased to take notice of with so much respect), I can assure you I shall henceforward be led to do it with more concern, and particularly both by duty and inclination. And if I were capable of giving you any little assistance in the noble design you are engaged in, by corresponding with you by letter, while you are at such a distance, I should do it most cheerfully. And, perhaps, such a motion may not be altogether unacceptable; for I am inclined to believe, that when some, whom you are obliged to converse with, observe your behaviour so different from what it formerly was, and banter you upon it as mad and fanciful, it may be some little relief to correspond with one who will take a pleasure in heartening and encouraging you. And when a great many things frequently offer, in which conscience may be concerned where duty may not always be plain, nor suitable persons to advise with at hand, it may be some satis-faction to you to correspond with one with whom you may use a friendly freedom in all such matters, and on whose fidelity you may depend. You may therefore command me in any of these respects, and I shall take a pleasure in serving you .- One piece of advice I shall venture to give you, though your own good sense will make my enlarging upon it less needful; I mean that you would, from your first setting out, carefully distinguish between the essentials of real religion, and those things which are commonly reckoned by its professors to belong to it. The want of this distinction has had very unhappy consequences from one age to another, and perhaps in none more than the present. But your daily converse with your Bible, which you mention, may herein give you great assistance. I move also, that since infidelity so much abounds, you would not only, by close and serious cousideration, endeavour to settle yourself well in the fundamental principles of religion;

but also that, as opportunity offers, you would converse with those books which treat most judiciously on the divine original of christianity, such as Grotius, Abadie, Baxter, Bates, Du Plessis, &c. which may establish you against the cavils that occur in almost all conversations, and furnish you with arguments, which, when properly offered, may be of use to make some impressions on others. But being too much straitened to enlarge at present, I can only add, that if your hearty falling in with serious religion should prove any hindrance to your advancement in the world (which I pray God it may not, unless such advancement would be a real snare to you,) I hope you will trust our Saviour's word, that it shall be no disadvantage to you in the final issue; he has given you his word for it, Matt. xix. 29, upon which you may safely depend; and I am satisfied, none that ever did so at last repented of it. May you go on and prosper, and the God of all grace and peace be with you!

I think it very evident, from the contents of this letter, that the major had not imparted to his mother the most singular circumstances attending his conversion; and, indeed, there was something so peculiar in them, that I do not wonder he was always cautious in speaking of them, and especially that he was at first much on the reserve. We may also naturally reflect, that there seems to have been something very providential in this letter, considering the debate in which our illustrious convert was soon engaged; for it was written but about three weeks before his conference with the lady abovementioned, in the defence of Christianity; or, at least, before the appointment of it. And as some of the books recommended by Dr. Calamy, particularly Abadie and Du Plessis, were undoubtedly within his reach (if our English advocates were not,) this might, by the Divine blessing, contribute considerably towards arming him for that combat, in which he came off with such happy success. And as in this instance, so in many others, they who will observe the coincidence and concurrence of things may be engaged to adore the wise conduct of Providence in events, which, when taken singly and by themselves, have nothing very remarkable in them.

I think it was about this time that this resolute and exemplary christian entered upon that methodical manner of living which he pursued through so many succeeding years of life, and I believe generally, so far as the broken state of his health would allow it, in his latter days, to the very end of it. He used constantly to rise at four in the morning, and to spend his time till six in the secret exercises of devotion, reading, meditation, and prayer; in which last he contracted such a fervency of spirit as I believe few men living ever obtained. This certainly tended very much to strengthen that faith in God, and reverent and animating sense of his presence, for which he was so eminently remarkable, and which carried him through the trials and services of life, with such steadiness, and with such activity; for he, indeed, endured and acted as always seeing Him who is invisible. If at any time he was obliged to go out before six in the morning, he rose proportionably sooner, so that when a journey or a march has required him to be on horseback by four, he would be at his devotions, at farthest, by two. He likewise secured time for retirement in an evening; and that he might have it the more at command, and be the more fit to use it properly, as well as the better able to rise early the next morning, he generally went to bed about ten; and, during the time I was acquainted with him, he seldom ate any supper, but a mouthful of bread and one glass of wine. In consequence of this, as well as of his admirably good constitution, and the long habit he had formed, he required less sleep than most persons I have known; and I doubt not but his uncommon progress in piety was in a great measure owing to these resolute habits of self-denial.

A life any thing like this, could not, to be sure, be entered upon, in the midst of such company as he had been accustomed to keep, without great opposition, especially as he did not entirely withdraw himself from cheerful conversation; but, on the contrary, gave several hours every day to it, lest religion should be reproached, as having made him morose. He, however, early began to practice, which, to the last day of his death he retained, of reproving vice and profaneness; and was never afraid to debate the matter with any, under the consciousness of such superiority in the goodness of his cause.

A remarkable instance of this happened, if I mistake not, about the middle of the year 1720, though I cannot be very exact as to the date of the story. It was however on his first return, to make any considerable abode in England, after this most remarkable change. He had heard, on the other side of the water, that it was currently reported among his companions at home, that he was stark mad; a report at which, no reader who knows the wisdom of the world in these matters, will be much surprised any more than himself. He concluded therefore that he should have many battles to fight, and was willing to dispatch the business as fast as he could; and therefore, being to spend a few days at the country-house of a person of distinguished rank, with whom he had been very intimate, (whose name I do not remember that he told me, nor did I think it proper to enquire after it,) he begged the favour of him that he would contrive matters so, that a day or two after he came down several of their former gay companions might meet at his Lordship's table, that he might have an opportunity of making his apology to them, and acquainting them with the nature and reasons of his change. It was accordingly agreed to; and a pretty large company met on the day appointed, with previous notice that Major Gardiner would be there. Much raillery passed at dinner. to which the major made very little answer. But when the cloth was taken away, and the servants retired, he begged their patience for a few minutes, and then plainly and seriously told them what notious he entertained of virture and religion, and on what considerations he had absolutely determined, that by the grace of God he would make it the care and business of his life. whatever he might lose by it, and whatever censure and contempt he might incur. He well knew how improper it was in such company to relate the extraordinary manner in which he was awakened; which they would probably have interpreted to a demonstration of lunacy, against all the gravity and solidity of his discourse; but he contented himself with such a rational defence of a righteous, sober, and godly life, as he knew none of them could, with any shadow of reason, contest. He then challenged them to propose any thing they could urge, to prove that a life of irreligion and debauchery was preferable to the fear, love, and worship of the eternal God, and a conduct agreeable to the precepts of his gospel. And he failed not to bear his testimony from his own experience (to one part of which many of them had been witnesses,) that after having run the widest round of sensual pleasure, with all the advantages the best constitution and spirits could give him, he had never tasted any thing that deserved to be called happiness till he had made religion his refuge and delight. He testified calmly and boldly the habitual serenity and peace that he now felt in his own breast (for the most elevated delights he did not think fit to plead, lest they should be esteemed enthusiasm), and the composure and pleasure with which he looked forward to objects, which the gayest sinner must acknowledge to be equally unavoidable and dreadful.

I know not what might be attempted by some of the company in answer to this; but I well remember he told me, the master of the table, a person of a very frank and candid disposition, cut short the debate, and said, "Come, let us all call another cause: we thought this man mad, and he is in good earnest proving that we are so." On the whole, this well-judged circumstance saved him a great deal of future trouble. When his former acquaintance observed that he was still conversable and innocently cheerful, and that he was immoveable in his resolutions, they desisted from farther importunity. And he has assured me, that instead of losing any one valuable friend by this change in his character, he found himself much more esteemed and regarded by many who could not persuade themselves to imitate his example.

I have not any memoirs of Colonel Gardiner's life, or any other remarkable event befalling him in it, from the time of his return to England till his marriage in the year 1726; except the extracts which have been sent me from some letters which he wrote to his religious friends during this interval, and which I cannot pass by without a more particular notice. It may be recollected, that in consequence of the reduction of that regiment of which he was major, he was out of commission from November the 10th, 1718, till June the 1st, 1724. And after he returned from Paris. I find all his letters, during this period, dated from London, where he continued, in communion with the Christian Society, under the pastoral care of Dr. Calamy. As his good mother also belonged to the same, it is easy to imagine it must be an unspeakable pleasure to her to have such frequent opportunities of conversing with such a son, of observing in his daily conduct and discourses the blessed effects of that change which Divine grace had made in his heart, and of sitting down with him monthly at that sacred feast, where christians so frequently enjoy the divinest entertainments which they expect on this side beaven. I the rather mention this ordinance, because, as this excellent lady had a very high esteem for it, so she had an opportunity of attending but the very Lord's-day immediately preceding her death, which happened on Thursday, October 7, 1725, after her son had been removed from her almost a year. He had maintained her handsomely out of that very moderate income on which he subsisted since his regiment had been disbanded; and when she expressed her gratitude to him for it, he assured her (I think in one of the last letters she ever received from him,) ' that he esteemed it a great honor that God put it into his power to make,' what he called, "a very small acknowledgment of all her care for him, and especially of the many prayers she had offered on his account, which had already been remarkably answered, and the benefit of which he hoped ever to enjoy."

I apprehend that the Earl of Stair's regiment, to the majority of which he was promoted on the 20th of July, 1724, was then quartered in Scotland; for all the letters in my hand, from that time to the 6th of February, 1726, are dated from thence, and particularly from Douglas, Stranrawen, Hamilton, and Air; but I have the pleasure to find, from comparing these with others of an earlier date from London, and the neighbouring parts, that neither the detriment which he must suffer by being so long out of commission, nor the hurry of affairs while charged with it, could prevent or interrupt that intercourse with heaven, which was his daily feast, and his daily strength.

These were most eminently the happy years of his life; for he had learned to estimate his happiness, not by the increase of honor, or the possession of wealth, or by what was much dearer to his generous heart than either, the converse of the dearest and worthiest human friends; but by nearness to God, and by the opportunities of humble converse with him in the lively exercise of contemplation, praise, and prayer. Now there was no period of his life, in which he was more eminently favored with these; nor do I find any of his letters so overflowing with transports of holy joy, as those which were dated during this time. There are indeed in some of them such very sublime passages, that I have been dublous whether I should communicate them to the public or not, lest I should administer matter of profane ridicule to some, who look upon all the elevation of devotion as contemptible enthusiasm. And it has also given me some apprehensions, lest it should discourage some pious christians, who, after having spent several years in the service of God, and in humble obedience to the precepts of his gospel, may not have attained to any such heights as these. But on the whole, I cannot satisfy myself to suppress them; not only as I number some of them, considered in a devotional view, among the most extraordinary pieces of the kind I have ever met with, but as some of the most excellent and judicious persons I any where know to whom I have read them, have assured me that they felt their hearts in an unusual manner impressed, quickened, and edified by them. I will therefore draw back the veil, and shew my much honored friend in his most secret recesses, that the world may see what those springs were from whence issued that clear, permanent, and living stream of wisdom, piety, and virtue, which so apparently ran through all that part of his life which was open to public observation. It is not to be imagined, that letters written in the intimacy of christian friendship, some of them with the most apparent marks of haste, and amidst a variety of important public cares, should be adorned with any studied elegance of expression, about which the greatness of his soul would not allow him to be at any time very solicitous; for he generally (so far as I could observe) wrote as fast as his pen could move, which happily, both for him and his friends, was very freely. Yet here the grandeur of his subject has sometimes clothed his ideas with a language that is more elevated than is ordinarily to be expected in an epistolary correspondence. The proud scorners, who may deride sentiments and enjoyments like those which this truly great man so experimentally and pathetically describes, I pity from my heart, and grieve to think how unfit they must be for the hallelujahs of heaven, who pour contempt upon the nearest approaches to them; nor shall I think it any misfortune to share with so excellent a person in their profaue derision. It will be infinitely more than equivalent for all that such ignorance and petulance can think and say, if I may convince some who are as yet strangers to religion, how real and how noble its delights are; if I may engage my pious readers to glorify God for so illustrious an instance of his grace; and finally, if I may quicken them, and above all may rouse my own too indo-lent spirit, to follow with less unequal steps an example, to the sublimity of which, I fear, few of us shall after all be able fully to attain. And that we may not be too much discouraged under the deficiency, let it be recollected that few have the advantage of a temper naturally so warm; few have an equal command of retirement; and perhaps hardly any one, who thinks himself most indebted to the riches and freedom of Divine grace, can trace interpositions of it in all respects equally astonishing.

The first of these extraordinary letters which have fallen into my hand is dated nearly three years after his conversion, and addressed to a lady of quality. I believe it is the first that the major ever wrote so immediately on the subject of his religious consolations and converse with God in devout retirement. For I well remember. that he once told me he was so much afraid that spiritual pride should mingle itself with the relation of such kind of experiences, that he concealed them a long time; but observing with how much freedom the sacred writers open all the most secret recesses. of their hearts, especially in the Psalms, his conscience began to be burthened, under an apprehension that for the honor of God, and in order to engage the concurrent praises of some of his people, he ought to disclose them. On this he set himself to reflect, who among all his numerous acquaintauce seemed at once the most expeperienced christian he knew (to whom therefore such things as he had to commumicate might appear solid and credible), and who the humblest. He quickly thought of the Lady Marchioness of Douglas in this view; and the reader may well imagine that it struck my mind very strongly to think that now, more than twenty-four years after it was written, Providence should bring to my hands (as it has done within these few days) what I assuredly believe to be a genuine copy of that very letter, which I had not the least reason to expect I should ever have seen, when I learned from his own mouth, amidst the freedom of an accidental conversation, the occasion and circumstances of it.

It is dated from London, July 21st, 1722, and the very first lines of it relate to a remarkable circumstance, which from others of his letters I find have happened several times. I mean, that when he had received from any of his christian friends a few lines which particularly affected his heart, he could not stay till the stated return of his devotional hour, but immediately retired to pray for them, and to give vent to those religious emotions of mind which such a correspondence raised. How invaluable was such a friend! and how great reason have those of us, who once possessed a large share in his heart, and in those retired and sacred moments, to bless God for so singular a felicity; and to comfort ourselves in a pleasing hope, that we may yet reap future blessings, as the harvest of those petitions which he can no more repeat.

His words are these: "I was so happy as to receive yours just as I arrived, and I had no sooner read it but I shut my door, and sought him whom my soul loveth; I sought him, and found him, and would not let him go till he had blessed us all. 'Tis impossible to find words to express what I obtained; but I suppose it was something like that which the disciples got as they were going to Emmaus, when they said, Did not our hearts burn within us? &c. or rather like what Paul felt, when he could not tell whether he was in the body or out of it." He then mentions his dread of spiritual pride, from which he earnestly prays that God may deliver and preserve him. "This (says he) would have hindered me from communicating these things, if I had not such an example before me as the man after God's own heart, saving, I will declare what God hath done for my soul; and elsewhere, The humble shall hear thereof, and be glad; now I am satisfied that your ladyship is of that number." He then adds, "I had no sooner finished this exercise," that is, of prayer abovementioned, "but I sat down to admire the goodness of my God, that he would vouchsafe to influence by his free spirit so undeserving a wretch as I, and to make me thus mount up with eagles' wings. And here I was lost again, and got into an ocean, where I could find neither bound nor bottom, but was obliged to cry out with the apostle, O the breadth, the length, the depth, the heighth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge! But if I give way to this strain, I shall never have done. That the God of hope may fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that you may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost, shall always be the prayer of him, who is, with the greatest sincerity and respect, your ladyship's," &c.

Another passage to the same purpose I find in a memorandum, which he seems to have written for his own use, dated Monday, March 11, which, I perceive, from many concurrent circumstances, must have been in the year 1722-3. "This day," says he, " having been to visit Mrs. G. at Hampstead, I came home about two, and read a sermon on these words, Psalm exxx. 4: But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared. About the latter end of which there is a description of the miserable condition of those that are slighters of pardoning grace. From a sense of the great obligations I lay under to the Almighty God, who bath made me to differ from such, from what I was, and from the rest of my companions, I kneeled down to praise his holy name; and I know not that in my life-time I ever lay lower in the dust, never having had a fuller view of my own upworthiness. I never pleaded more strongly the merits and intercession of him who I know is worthy; never vowed more sincerely to be the Lord's, and to accept of Christ as he is offered in the gospel, as my king, priest, and prophet; never had so strong a desire to depart, that I might sin no more; but—my grace is sufficient—curbed that desire." I never pleaded greater ferviency for the comforter, which "our blessed Lord hath promised shall abide with us for ever. For all which I desire to ascribe glory, &c. to Him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb."

There are several others of his papers which speak much the same language, which, had he kept a diary, would doubt-less have filled many sheets. I believe my devout readers would not soon be weary of reading extracts of this kind; but not to exceed in this part of my narrative, I shall mention only two more, each of them dated some years after; that is, one from Douglas, April 1st, 1725; and the other from Stranger, the 25th of May following.

The former of these relates to the frame of his spirit on a journey. On the mention of which, I cannot but recollect how often I have heard him say, that some of the most delightful days of his life were days in which he travelled alone (that is, with only a servant at a distance), when he could, especially in roads not much frequented, indulge himself in the pleasures of prayer and praise. In the exercise of which last he was greatly assisted by several Psalms and Hymns, which he had treasured up in his memory, and which he used not only to repeat aloud, but sometimes to sing. With reference to this, I remember the following passage, in a letter which he wrote to me many years after, when, on mentioning my very dear and honored friend, the Rev. Dr. Watts, he says, " How often, in singing some of his Psalms and Hymns, or Lyrics, on horseback, and elsewhere, has the evil spirit been made to flee:

> " Whene'er my heart in tune was found, "Like David's harp of solemn sound."

Such was the 1st of April abovementioned, in the evening of which he writes thus to an intimate friend: "What would I have given this day upon the road for paper, pen, and ink, when the Spirit of the Most High rested upon me! Oh, for the pen of a ready writer, and the tongue of an angel, to declare what God has done this day for my soul! But, in short, it is vain to attempt it; all that I am able to say is only this, that my soul has been joining with the blessed spirits above, in giving glory, and honor, and praise unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb, for ever and ever. My prises began from a renewed view of him, whom I saw pierced for my transgressions. I summoned the whole hierarchy of heaven to join with me; and am persuaded they all echoed back praise to the Most High. Yea, one would have thought the very larks joined me with enulation. Sure then I need not make use of many words to persuade you, that are his saints, to join me in blessing and praising his holy naine." He concludes, "May the blessing of the God of Jacob rest upon you all! Adieu. Written in great haste, late, and weary." Scarce can I here refrain from breaking Scarce can't neer retrain from breaking out in more copious reflections on the exquisite pleasure of true religion, when risen to such eminent degrees, which can thus feast the soul in its solitude, and refresh it on journeys; and bring down so much of heaven to earth as this delightful letter expresses. But the remark is so obvious, that I will not enlarge upon it, but proceed to the other letter abovementioned, which was written the next month, on the Tuesday.

He mentions the pleasure with which he attended a preparation sermon the Saturday before, and then he adds, "I took a walk upon the mountains that are over against Ireland; and I persuade myself, that were I capable of giving you a description of what passed there, you would agree that I had much better reason to remember my God from the hills of Port Patrick. than David from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites from the hill Mizar." I suppose he means in reference to the clearer discoveries of the gospel with which we are favored, " In short," says he immediately afterwards, in that scripture phrase which was become so familiar to him, "I wrestled some hours with the angel of the covenant, and made supplications to him with floods of tears and cries, until I had almost expired: but he strengthened me so, that, like Jacob, I had power with God, and prevailed. "This," adds he, is but a very faint description: you will be more able to judge of it by what you have felt yourself upon the like occasions. After such preparatory work, I need not tell you how blessed the solemn ordinance of the Lord's-supper proved to me; I hope it was so to many. You may believe I should have been exceedingly glad if my gracious Lord had ordered it so, that I might have made you a visit, as proposed; but I am now glad it was ordered otherwise, since he hath caused so much of his goodness to pass before me. Were I to give you an account of the many favors my God hath loaded me with since I parted from you, I must have taken up many days in nothing but writing. I hope you will join with me in praises for all the great goodness he has shewn to your unworthy brother in the Lord."

Such were the ardors and elevations of his soul; but while I record these memorials of them, I am very sensible there are many who will be inclined to censure them, as the flights of enthusiasm; for which reason permit me to add a remark or two on the occasion, which will be illustrated by several other extracts that will be introduced into the seguel of these memoirs. The one is, that he never pretends, in any of the passages cited above, or elsewhere, to have received any immediate revelations from God, which should raise him above the ordinary methods of instruction, or discover any thing to him, whether of doctrines or facts. No man was farther from pretending to predict future events, except it were from the moral prognostications of causes naturally tending to produce them; in tracing of which he had indeed an admirable sagacity, as I have seen some remarkable instances. Neither was he at all inclinable to govern himself by secret impulses upon his mind, leading him to things for which he could assign no reason but the impulse itself. Had he ventured, in a presumption on such secret agitations of mind, to teach, or to do any thing not warranted by the dictates of sound sense, and the word of God, I should readily have acknowledged him an enthusiast, unless he could have produced some other evidence than his own persuasion, to have supported the authority of them. But these ardent expressions, which some may call enthusiasm, seem only to evince a heart deeply affected with a sense of the Divine presence and perfections, and of that love which passeth knowledge; especially as manifested in our redemption by the Son of God, which did indeed inflame his whole soul. And he thought he might reasonably ascribe the strong impressions, to which men are generally such strangers, and of which he had long been entirely destitute, to the agency or influence of the Spirit of God upon his heart; and that in proportion to the degree in which he felt them, he might properly say, God was present with him, and he conversed with God. Now, when we consider the scriptural phrases " of walking with God, of having communion with the Father and his son Jesus Christ, of Christ's coming to them that open the door of their hearts to him, and supping with them; of God's shedding abroad his love in the heart by his Spirit; of his coming with Jesus Christ, and making his abode with any man that loves him; of his meeting him that worketh righteousness; of his making us glad by the light of his countenance," and a variety of other equivalent expressions; I believe we shall see reason to judge much more favorably of such expressions as those now in question, than persons who are themselves strangers to elevated devotion, and perhaps converse but little with their Bible. are inclined to do; especially if they have, as many such persons have, a temper that inclines them to cavil and find fault. And I must further observe, that amidst all those freedoms, with which this eminent christian opens his devout heart to the most intimate of his friends, he still speaks with profound awe and reverence of his heavenly Father, and his Saviour, and maintains (after the example of the sacred writers themselves) a kind of dignity in his expressions, suitable to such a subject, without any of that fond familiarity of language. and degrading meanness of phrase, by which it is, especially of late, grown fashionable among some (who nevertheless may mean well), to express their love and their humility.

On the whole, if habitual love to God, firm faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, a steady dependance on the Divine promises, a full persuasion of the wisdom and goodness of all the dispensations of providence, a high esteem for the blessings of the heavenly world, and a sincere contempt for the vanities of this, can properly be called enthusiasm, then was Colonel Gardiner indeed one of the greatest enthusiasts our age has produced; and in proportion to the degree in which he was so, I must esteem him one of the wisest and happiest of mankind; nor do I fear to tell the world, that it is the design of my writing these memoirs, and of every thing else that I undertake in life, to spread this glorious and blessed enthusiasm, which I know to be the anticipation of heaven, as well as the most certain way to it.

But lest any should possibly imagine, that allowing the experiences which have been described above to have been ever so solid and important, yet there may be some appearance of boasting in so free a communication of them; let me add to what is hinted in reference to this above, that I find in many of the papers before me very genuine expressions of the deepest humility and self-abasement; which, indeed, such holy converse with God in prayer and praise does, above all things in the world, tend to inspire and promote. Thus, in one of his letters, he says, "I am but as a beast before him." In another he calls kimself " a miserable hell-deserving sinner;" and in another, he cried out, "Oh, how good a Master do I serve! but alas, how ungrateful ani I! What can be so astonishing as the love of Christ to us, unless it be the coldness of our sinful hearts towards such a Saviour?" With many other clauses of the like nature, which I shall not set myself more particularly to trace through the variety of letters in which they occur.

It is a farther instance of this unfeigned humility, that when (as his lady with her usual propriety of language expresses it, in one of her letters to me concerning him) " these divine joys and consolations were not his daily allowance," he, with equal freedom in the confidence of christian friendship, acknowledges and laments it. Thus, in the first letter I had the honor of receiving from him, dated from Leicester, July 9th, 1739, when he had been mentioning the blessing with which it had pleased God to attend my last address to him, and the influence it had upon his mind, he adds, " much do I stand in need of every help to awaken me out of that spiritual deadness which seizes me so often. Once. indeed, it was quite otherwise with me, and that for many years:

- " Firm was my health, my day was bright,
 - " And I presum'd 'twould ne'er be night; "Fondly I said within my heart,
- " Pleasure and peace shall ne'er depart.
- " Fleasure and peace shall ne'er depart.
- " But I forgot thine arm was strong, "Which made my mountain stand so long:
- "Which made my mountain stand so long "Soon as thy face began to hide,
- "My health was gone, my comforts died.
- "And here," adds he, "lies my sin, and my folly,"

I mention this, that the whole matter may be seen just as it was, and that other christians may not be discouraged, if they feel some abatements of their fervor, and of those holy joys which they may have experienced during some of the first months or years of their spiritual life. But with relation to the colonel, there is great reason to believe, that these which he laments as his days of spiritual deadness were not unanimated; and that quickly after the date of this letter, and especially nearer the close of his life, he had farther revivings, as the joyful anticipation of those better things in reserve, which were then nearly approaching. And thus Mr. Spears, in the letter mentioned above, tells us he related the matter to him, (for he studies as much as possible to retain the colonel's own words:) "However," says he, "after that happy period of sensible communion, though my joys and enlargements were not so overflowing and sensible, yet I have had habitual real communion with God from that day to this;" the latter end of the year 1743; " and I know myself, and all that know me see, that through the grace of God, to which I ascribe all, my conversation has been becoming the gospel; and let me die whenever it shall please God, or wherever it shall be, I am sure I shall go to the mansions of eternal glory," &c. And this is perfectly agreeable to the manner in which he used to speak to me on this head, which we have talked over frequently and largely. I hope in this connection my reader will forgive my inserting a little story which I received from a very worthy minister in Scotland, and which I shall give in his own words: "At this period," meaning that which followed the first seven years after his conversion, "when his complaint of comparative deadness and languor in religion began, he had a dream; which, though he had no turn at all for taking notice of dreams, yet made a very strong impression on his mind. He imagined that he saw his blessed Redeemer on earth, and that he was following him through a large field, following him whom his soul loved, but much troubled; because he thought his blessed Lord did not speak to him till he came up to the gate of the burying-place, when, turning about, he smiled upon him in such a manner as filled his soul with the most ravishing joy; and, on after reflection, animated his faith, in believing that whatever storms and darkness he might meet with in the way, at the hour of death his glorious Redeemer would lift up upon him the light of his life-giving countenance." My correspondent adds a circumstance, for which he makes some apology, as what may seem whimsical, and yet made some impression on himself: "that there was a remarkable resemblance in the field in which this brave man met death, and that he had represented to him in his dream." I did not fully understand this at first; but a passage in that letter from Mr. Spears, which I have mentioned more than once, has cleared it. " Now observe, Sir, this seems to be a literal description of the place where this christian hero ended his sorrows and conflicts, and from which he entered triumphantly into the joy of his Lord. For after he fell in battle, fighting gloriously for his king and the cause of his God, his wounded body, while life was yet remaining, was carried from the field of battle by the cast side of his inclosure, till he came to the church-yard of Tranent, and was brought to the minister's house, where he soon after breathed out his soul into the hands of his Lord, and was conducted to his presence, where there is fulness of joy, without any cloud or interruption, for ever."

I well know, that in dreams there are divers vanities, and readily acknowledge that nothing certain could be inferred from this; yet it seems at least to shew which way the imagination workert even in sleep; and I cannot think it unworthy of a wise and good man, sometimes to reflect with complacency on any images, which, passing through his mind even in that state, may tend either to express, or to quicken his love to the great Saviour. Those eminently pious divines of the church of England, Bishop Bull and Bishop Kenn, do both intimate its a their opinion, that it may be a part of the service of ministering angels to suggest devout dreams; and I know that the worthy person of whom I speak was well acquainted with that midnight hymn of the latter of those excellent writers, which has these lines:

" Lord, lest the tempter me surprise, "Watch over thine own sacrifice!

" All loose, all idle thoughts cast out;

"And make my very dreams devout!"

Nor would it be difficult to produce other passages much to the same purpose, if it would not be deemed too great a digression from our subject, and too labored a vindication of a little incident, of very small importance when compared with most of those which make up this narrative.

I meet not with any other remarkable event relating to Major Gardiner which can properly be introduced here till the year 1726, when on the 11th day of July he was married to the Right Hon. the Lady Frances Erskine, daughter of the late Earl of Buchan, by whom he had thirteen children, five only of which survived their father, two sons, and three daughters; whom I cannot mention without the most fervent prayers to God for them, that they may always behave worthy the honor of being descended from such parents; and that the God of their father, and of their mother, may make them perpetually the care of his providence, and yet more eminently happy in the constant and abundant influence of his grace.

As her ladyship is still living (and for the sake of her dear offspring and numerous friends, may she long be spared), I shall not here indulge myself in saying any thing of her, except it be that the colonel assured me, when he had been happy in this intimate relation to her more than fourteen years, that the greatest imperfection he knew in her character was, " that she valued and loved him much more than he deserved." And little did he think, in the simplicity of heart with which he spoke this, how high an encomium he was making upon her, and how lasting an honor such a testimony must leave upon her name, long as the memory of it shall continue.

As I do not intend in these memoirs a labored essay on the character of Colonel Gardiner, digested under the various virtues and graces which christianity requires (which would, I think, be a little too formal for a work of this kind, and would give it such an air of panegyric, as would neither suit my design, nor be at all likely to render it more useful), I shall now mention what I have either observed in him, or heard concerning him, with regard to those domestic relations, which commenced about this time, or quickly after. And here my reader will easily conclude, that the resolution of Joshua was from the first adopted and declared, as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. It will naturally be supposed, that as soon as he had a house, he erected an altar in it: that the word of God was read there, and prayers and praises were constantly offered, these were not to be omitted on account of any guest; for he esteemed it a part of due respect to those that remained under his roof, to take it for granted they would look upon it as a very bad compliment to imagine they would have been obliged, by neglecting the duties of religion on their account. As his family increased, he had a minister statedly resident in his house, who both discharged the office of a tutor to his children, and of a chaplain, and who was always treated with a becoming kindness and respect. But in his absence, the colonel himself led the devotions of his family; and they were happy who had an opportunity of knowing with how much solemnity, fervor, and propriety, he did it.

He was constant in attendance upon public worship, in which ane exemplary care was taken that the children and servants might accompany the heads of the family. And how he would have resented the nonattendance of any member of it, may easily be conjectured, from a free but lively passage in a letter to one of his intimate friends, on an occasion which is not material to mention: "Oh, Sir, had I a child of yours under my roof who once neglected the public worship of God, when he was able to attend it, I should have been ready to conclude he had been distracted, and should have thought of shaving his head and confining him in a dark room."

He always treated his lady with a manly tenderness, giving her the most natural evidence of a cordial habitual esteem, and expressing a most affectionate sympathy with her, under the infirmities of a very delicate constitution, much broken, at least towards the latter years of their marriage, in consequence of so frequent pregnancy. He had at all times a most faithful care of all her interests, and especially those relating to the state of religion in her mind. His conversation and his letters concurred to cherish those sublime ideas which christianity suggests; to promote our submission to the will of God, to teach us to center our happiness in the great Author of our being, and to live by the faith in the invisible world. These, no doubt, were frequently the subjects of mutual discourse: and many letters which her ladyship has had the goodness to communicate to me, are the most convincing evidence of the degree in which this noble and most friendly care filled his mind, in the days of their separation; days, which so entire a mutual affection must have rendered exceeding painful, had they not been supported by such eminent sentiments of piety, and sweetened by daily communion with an ever-present and evergracious God.

The necessity of being so many months together distant from his family hindered him from many of those condescending labors in cultivating the minds of his children in early life, which to a soul so benevolent, so wise, and so zealous, would undoubtedly have afforded a very exquisite pleasure. The care of his worthy consort, who well knew that it is one of the brightest parts of a mother's character, and one of the most important views in which the sex can be considered, made him the easier under such a circumstance; but when he was with them, he failed not to instruct and admonish them; and the constant deep sense with which he spoke of Divine things, and the real unaffected indifference which he always shewed for what this vain world is most ready to admire, were excellent lessons of daily wisdom, which I hope they will recollect with advantage in every future scene of life. And I have seen such hints in his letters relating to them, as plainly shew with how great a weight they lay on his mind, and how highly he desired above all things that they might be faithful disciples of Christ, and acquainted betimes with the unequalled pleasures and blessings of religion. He thought an excess of delicacy, and of indulgence, one of the most dangerous faults in education, by which he every where saw great numbers of young people undone; yet he was solicitous to guard against a severity which might terrify or discourage; and though he endeavoured to take all prudent precaution to prevent the commission of faults, yet, when they had been committed, and there seemed to be a sense of them, he was always ready to make the most candid allowances for the thoughtlessness of unripened years, and tenderly to cherish every purpose of a more proper conduct for the time to come.

It was easy to perceive, that the openings of genius in the young branches of his family gave him great delight, and that he had a secret ambition to see them excel in what they undertook. Yet he was greatly cautious over his heart, lest it should be too fondly attached to them; and as he was one of the most eminent proficients I ever knew in the blessed science of resignation to the Divine will, so there was no effect of that resignation which appeared to me more admirable than that which related to the life of his children. An experience, which no length of time will ever efface out of my memory, has so sensibly taught me how difficult it is fully to support the christian character here, that I hope my reader will pardon me (I am sure at least the hearts of wounded parents will,) if I dwell a little longer upon so interesting a subject.

When he was in Herefordshire in the month of July, in the year 1734, it pleased God to visit his little family with the smallpox. Five days before the date of the letter I am just going to mention, he had received the agreeable news that there was a prospect of the recovery of his son, then under that awful visitation; and he had been expressing his thankfulness for it in a letter which he had sent away but a few hours before he was informed of his death; the surprise of which, in this connection, must naturally be very great. But behold (says the reverend and worthy person from whom I received the copy) his truly filial submission to the will of his heavenly Father, in the following lines addressed to the dear partner of his affliction: "Your resignation to the will of God under this dispensation gives me more joy than the death of the child has given me sorrow. He, to be sure, is happy; and we shall go to him, though he shall not return to us. Oh, that we had our latter end always in view !- We shall soon follow! and, Oh! what reason have we to long for that glorious day, when we shall get quit of this body of sin and death under which we now groan, and which No. 3.

renders this life so wretched! I desire to bless God that —— (another of his children) is in so good a way; but I have resigned her. We must not choose for ourselves; and it is well we must not, for we should often make a very bad choice. And therefore it is our wisdom, as well as our duty, to leave all with a gracious God, who hath promised that all things shall work together for good to those that love him; and he is faithful that hath promised, who will infallibly perform it, if our unbelief does not stand in the way.

The greatest trial of this kind that he ever bore was in the removal of his second son, who was one of the most amiable and promising children that has been known. The dear little creature was the darling of all that knew him, and promised very fair, so far as a child could be known by its doing, to have been a great ornament to his family, and blessing to the public. The suddenness of the stroke must no doubt render it the more painful; for this beloved child was snatched away by an illness which seized him about fifteen hours before it carried him off. He died in the month of October, 1733, at near six years old. Their friends were ready to fear that his affectionate parents would be almost overwhelmed with such a loss; but the happy father had so firm a persuasion that God had received the dear little one to the felicities of the celestial world, and at the same time had so strong a sense of the Divine goodness in taking one of his children, and that too, one who lay so near his heart, so early to himself, that the sorrows of nature were quite swallowed up in the sublime joy which these considerations administered. When he reflected what human life is; how many its snares and temptations are; and how frequently children, who once promised very well, are insensibly corrupted, and at length undone; with Solomon, he blessed the dead already dead, more than the living who were yet alive, and felt an unspeakable pleasure in looking after the lovely infant as safely and delightfully lodged in the house of its heavenly Father. Yea, he assured me that his heart was at this time so entirely taken up with these views, that he was afraid that they who did not thoroughly know him might suspect that he was deficient in the natural affections of a parent, while thus borne above the anguish of them by the views which faith administered to him, and which Divine grace supported in his soul.

So much did he, on one of the most trying occasions of life, manifest of the temper of a glorified saint; and to such happy purposes did he retain these lessons of submission to God, and acquiescence in him, which I remember he once inculcated in a letter he wrote to a lady of quality, under the apprehension of a breach in her family, with which providence seemed to threaten her, which I am willing to insert here. though a little out of what might seem its most proper place, rather than entirely to omit it. It is dated from London, June 16, 1722, when speaking of the dangerous illness of a dear relative, he has these words: "When my mind runs thither," that is, to God, as its refuge and strong defence (as the connection plainly determines it), " I think I can bear any thing, the loss of all, the loss of health, of relations, on whom I depend, and whom I love, all that is dear to me, without repining or murmuring. When I think that God orders, disposes, and manages all things, according to the counsel of his own will; when I think of the extent of his providence, that it reaches to the minutest things; then, though a useful friend or dear relative be snatched away by death, I recal myself, and check my thoughts with these considerations: Is he not God, from everlasting, and to everlasting? And has he not promised to be a God to me? A God in all his attributes, a God in all his persons, a God in all his creatures and providences? And shall I dare to say, What shall I do? Was not he the infinite cause of all I met with in the creatures? And were not they the finite effects of his infinite love and kindness? I have daily experienced that the instrument was and is what God makes it to be; and I know that this God hath the hearts of all men in his hands, and the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. If this earth be good for me, I shall have it, for my Father hath it all in possession. If favour in the eyes of men be good for me, I shall have it; for the spring of every motion in the heart of man is in God's hand. My dear - seems to be now dying; but God is all-wise, and every thing is done by him for the best. Shall I hold back any thing that is his own when he requires it? No, God forbid! When I consider the excellency of his glorious attributes, I am satisfied with all his dealings." I perceive by the introduction, and by what follows, that most, if not all this, is a quotation from something written by a lady: but whether from some manuscript or a printed book, whether exactly transcribed or quoted from memory, I cannot determine; and therefore I thought to insert it, as the major (for that was the office he bore then), by thus interweaving it with his letter makes it his own: and as it seems to express in a very lively manner the principles which bore him on to a conduct so truly great and heroic, in circumstances that have overwhelmed many an heart that could have faced danger and death with the greatest intrepidity.

I return now to consider his character in the domestic relation of a master, on which I shall not enlarge. It is, however, proper to remark, that his habitual meekness, and command of his passion, prevented indecent sallies of ungoverned anger towards those in the lowest state of subjection to him (by which some in high life do strangely debase themselves, and lose much of their authority), so the natural greatnesss of his mind made him solicitous to render their inferior stations as easy as he could; and so much the rather, because he considered all the children of Adam as standing upon a level before their great Creator, and had also a deeper sense of the dignity and worth of every immortal soul, how meanly soever it might chance to be lodged, than most persons I have known. This engaged him to give his servants frequent religious exhortations and instructions, as I have been assured by several who have been so happy as to live with him under that character, One of the first letters after he entered on. his christian course expresses the same disposition; in which, with great tenderness, he recommends a servant, who was in a bad state of health, to his mother's care, as he was well acquainted with her condescending temper; mentioning at the same time the endeavours he had used to promote his preparation for a better world, under an apprehension that he would not continue long in this. And we shall have an affecting instance of the prevalency of the same disposition in the closing scene of his life, and in the last words he ever spoke, which expressed his generous solicitude for the safety of a faithful servant who was then near him.

As it was a few years after his marriage that he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in which he continued till he had a regiment of his own, I shall for the future speak of him by that title; and may not, perhaps, find any more proper place in which to mention what it is necessary for me to say of his behaviour and conduct as an officer. I shall not here enlarge on his bravery in the field, though that was very remarkable, as I have heard from others: I say from others, for I never heard any thing of that kind from himself, nor knew till after his death that he was present at almost every battle that was fought in Flanders while the illustrious Duke of Marlborough commanded the allied army there. I have also been assured from many very creditable persons, some of whom were eye-witnesses, that at the skirmish with the rebels at Preston, in Lancashire, (thirty years before that engagement at the other Preston, which deprived us of this gallant guardian of his country,) he signalized himself very particularly; for he headed a little body of men, I think about twelve, and set fire to the barricado of the rebels, in the face of their whole army. while they were pouring in their shot, by which eight of the twelve that attended him fell. This was the last action of the kind in which he was engaged, before the long peace which ensued; and who can express how happy it was for him, and indeed for his country, of which he was ever so generous, and in his latter years so important a friend, that he did not fall then; when the profaneness which mingled itself with his martial rage seemed to rend the heavens, and shocked some other military gentlemen who were not remarkable for their caution in this respect.

But I insist not on things of this nature, which the true greatness of his soul would hardly ever permit him to mention, unless when it tended to illustrate the Divine care over him in these extremities of danger, and the grace of God in calling him from so abandoned a state. It is well known, that the character of an officer is not only to be approved in the day of combat. Col. Gardiner was truly sensible that every day brought its duties along with it; and he was constantly careful that no pretence of amusement, friendship, or even devotion itself, might prevent their being discharged in their season.

I doubt not but the noble persons in whose regiment he was lieutenant-colonel, will always be ready to bear an honorable and grateful testimony to his exemplary diligence and fidelity in all that related to the care of the troops over which he was set, whether with regard to the men or the horses. He knew that it is incumbent on those, whether in civil, ecclesiastical, or military offices, not to content themselves with doing only so much as may preserve them from the reproach of gross and visible neglect, but seriously to consider how much they can possibly do, without going out of their proper sphere, to serve the public, by the due inspection of those committed to their care. The duties of the closet and the sanctuary were so adjusted, as not to interfere with those of the parade, or any other place where the welfare of the regiment called him. On the other hand, he was solicitous not to suffer these things to interfere with religion; a due attendance to which he apprehended to be the surest method of attaining all desirable success in every other interest and conern of life. He therefore abhorred every thing that should look like a contrivance to keep his soldiers employed about their horses and their arms at the seasons of public worship, (an indecency which I wish there were no room to mention); far from that, he used to have them drawn up just before it began; and from the parade they went off to the house of God. He understood the rights of conscience too well to impose his own particular profession in religion on others, or to use those who differed from him in the choice of its modes the less kindly or respectfully on that account. But as most of his own company, and many of the rest, chose (when in England) to attend him to the dissenting chapel, he used to march them hither in due time, so as to be there before the worship began. And I must do them the justice to say, that, so far as I could discern, when I have seen them in large numbers before me, they have behaved with as much reverence, gravity, and decorum, during the time of Divine service, as any of their fellow-worshippers.

That his remarkable care to maintain good discipline among them (of which we shall afterwards speak) might be more effectual, he made himself on all proper occasions accessible to them, and expressed a great concern for their interests, which being so genuine and sincere, naturally discovered itself in a variety of instances. I remember I had once occasion to visit one of his dragoons in his last illness at Harborough, and I found the man upon the borders of eternity: a circumstance which, as he apprehended it himself, must add some weight and credibility to his discourse. And he then told me, in his colonel's absence, that he questioned not but he should have everlasting reason to bless God on Colonel Gardiner's account; for he had been a father to him in all his interests, both temporal and spiritual. He added, that he had visited him almost every day during his illness with religious advice and instructions, as well as taken care that he should want nothing that might conduce to the recovery of his health. And he did not speak of this as the result of any particular attachment to him, but as the manner in which he was accustomed to treat those under his command. It is no wonder that this engaged their affection to a very great degree. And I doubt not, that if he had fought the battle of Preston-Pans at the head of that gallant regiment, of which he had the care for so many years, and which is allowed by most unexceptionable judges to be one of the finest in the British service, and consequently in the world, he had been supported in a very different manner, and had found a much greater number, who would have rejoiced in an opportunity of making their own breasts a barrier in the defence of his.

It could not but greatly endear him to his soldiers, that so far as preferments lay in his power, or were under his influence, they were distributed according to merit; which he knew to be as much the dictate of prudence as of equity. I find by one of his letters before me, dated but a few months after his happy change, that he was solicited to improve his interest with the Earl of Stair in favor of one whom he judged a very worthy person; and that it had been suggested by another who recommended him, that if he succeeded he might expect some handsome acknowledgment. But he answers with some degree of indignation, " Do you imagine I am to be bribed to do justice?" For such it seems he esteemed it, to confer the favor which was asked from him on one so deserving. Nothing can more effectually tend to humble the enemies of a state than that such maxims should universally prevail in it. And if they do not prevail, the worthiest men in an army or fleet may be sunk under repeated discouragements, and the basest exalted, to the infamy of the public, and perhaps to its ruin.

In the midst of all the gentleness which Colonel Gardiner exercised towards his soldiers, he made it very apparent he knew how to reconcile the tenderness of a real, faithful, and condescending friend, with the authority of a commander. Perhaps hardly any thing conduced more generally to the maintaining of his authority than the strict decorum and good manners with which he treated the private gentlemen of his regiment; which has always a great efficacy towards keeping inferiors at a proper distance, and forbids in the least offensive manner, familiarities which degrade the superior, and enervate his influence. The calmness and steadiness of his behaviour on all occasions, did also greatly tend to the same purpose. He knew how mean a man looks in the transport of passion, and would not use so much freedom with many of his men as to fall into such transports before them; well knowing, that persons in the lowest rank of life are aware how unfit they are to govern others who cannot govern themselves. He was also sensible how necessary it is in all who preside over others, and especially in military officers, to check irregularities when they first begin to appear; and that he might be able to do it, he kept a strict inspection over his soldiers; in which view it was observed, that as he generally chose to reside among them as much as he could. (though in circumstances which sometimes occasioned him to deny himself in some interests which was very dear to him,) so when they were around him he seldom staid long in a place, but was frequently walking the streets, and looking into their quarters and stables, as well as reviewing and exercising them himself. It has often been observed, that the regiment of which he was so many years lieutenant-colonel, was one of the most regular and orderly regiments in the public service; so that per-No. 3.

haps none of our dragoons were so welcome as they to the towns where their character was known. Yet no such bodies of men are so blameless in their conduct but something will be found, especially among such considerable numbers, worthy of censure, and sometimes of punishment. This Col. Gardiner knew well how to inflict with a becoming resolution, and with all the severity he judged necessary; a severiry the more awful and impressing, as it was always attended with meekness; for he well knew that when things are done in passion, it seems only an accidental circumstance that they are acts of justice, and that such indecencies greatly obstruct the ends of punishment, both as it relates to the reforming offenders, and to deterring others from an imitation of their faults.

One instance of his conduct, which happened at Leicester, and was related by the person chiefly concerned to a worthy friend, who told it to me, is here inserted: while part of the regiment was encamped in the neighbourhood of that place, the Colonel went incognito to the camp in the middle of the night, for he sometimes lodged at his quarters in the town; one of the sentinels (who ought to have been on duty) had abandoned his post, and on being seized, broke out into some oaths and profane execrations against those that discovered him, a crime of which the colonel had the greatest abhorrence, and on which he never failed to animadvert. The man afterwards appeared much ashamed and concerned for what he had done. But the colonel ordered him to be brought early next morning to his own quarters, where he had prepared him a piquet, on which he appointed him a private sort of penance; and while he was put upon it, he discoursed with him seriously and tenderly upon the evils and aggravations of his fault; admonished him of the Divine displeasure which he had incurred, and urged him from the pain he felt, how infinitely more dreadful it must be to fall into the hands of the living God, and indeed to meet the terrors of that damnation which he had been accustomed impiously to call for on himself and his companions. The result of this proceeding was, that the offender accepted his punishment not only with submission, but with thankfulness. He went away with a more cordial affection for his colonel than ever he had before; and spoke of it some years after to my friend in such a manner, that there seemed reason to hope, that it had been instrumental in producing not only a change in his life, but in his heart.

There cannot certainly be a more proper place for mentioning the great reverence this excellent officer always expressed for the blessed name of the blessed God, and the zeal with which be endeavoured to suppress, and if possible to extirpate, that detestable sin of swearing and cursing which every where is so common, and especially among our military men. He often declared his sentiments with respect to this enormity at the head of his regiment; and urged his captains and their subalterns to take the greatest care that they did not give the sanction of their example to that which by their office they were obliged to punish in others. And indeed this zeal on these occasions wrought in a very active, and sometimes in a very remarkable successful manner, not only among his equals, but sometimes among his superiors too. An instance of this in Flanders will hereafter be produced; at present I shall only mention his conduct in Scotland a little before his death, as I have it from a very valuable young minister of that country, on whose testimony I can thoroughly depend; and wishing it may excite many to imitation.

The commanding officer of the king's

The commanding officer of the king's forces then about Edinburgh, with the other colonels, and several other gentlemen of rank in their respective regiments, favored him with their company at Brankton, and took a dinner with him. He too well saw what might happen amidst such a variety of tempers and characters; and fearing lest his conscience might have been ensared by a sinful silence, or that, on the other hand, he might seem to pass the bounds of decency, and infringe upon the laws of hospitality, by animadverting on guests so justly entitled to his regard; he happily determined on the following method of avoiding each of these difficulties: As soon as they were come together, he addressed them with a great deal of respect, and yet at the same time with a very frank and determined air; and told them that he had the honor in that district to be a justice of the peace, and consequently that he was sworn to put the laws in execution, and among the rest those against swearing; that he could not execute them upon others with any confidence, or by any means approve himself as a man of impartiality and integrity to his own heart, if he suffered them to be broken in his presence by persons of any rank whatsoever; and that therefore he entreated all the gentlemen, who then honored him with their company, that they would be pleased to be upon their guard; and that if any oath or curse should escape them, he hoped they would consider his legal animadversion upon it as a regard to the duties of his office, and the dictates of his conscience, and not as owing to any want of deference to them. The commanding-officer immediately supported him in this declaration, as entirely becoming the station in which he was, assuring him that he would be ready to pay the penalty, if he inadvertently transgressed; and when Colonel Gardiner on any occasion stepped out of the room, he himself undertook to be the guardian of the law in his absence; and as one of the inferior officers offended during this time, he informed the colonel, so that the fine was exacted, and given to the poor, with the universal approbation of the company. The money which was forfeited on this account by his own officers, whom he never spared, or by any other of his soldiers who rather chose to pay than submit to corporal punishment, was by the colonel's order laid by in a bank till some of the private men fell sick, and then it was laid out in providing them with proper help and accommodations in their distress. The story spread in the neighbourhood, and was perhaps applauded highly by many, who wanted the courage to go and do likewise. But it may be said of the worthy person of whom I write, with the utmost propriety, that he feared the face of no man living, where the honor of God was concerned. In all such cases he might be justly said, in scripturephrase, to set his face like a flint; and I assuredly believe, that had he been in the presence of a sovereign prince, who had been guilty of this fault, his looks at least would have testified his grief and surprise, if he had apprehended it unfit to have borne his testimony any other way.

Lord Cadogan's regiment of dragoons, during the years I have mentioned, while he was lieutenant-colonel of it, was quartered in a great variety of places, both in England and Scotland, from many of which I have letters before me; particularly from Hamilton, Ayr, Carlisle, Hereford, Maidenhead, Leicester, Warwick, Coventry, Stamford, Harborough, Northampton, and several other places, especially in our inland parts. The natural consequence was, that the colonel, whose character was on many accounts so very remarkable, had a very extensive acquaintance; and I believe I may certainly say, that wherever he was known by persons of wisdom and worth, he was proportionably respected, and left behind him traces of unaffected devotion, humility, benevolence, and zeal, for the support and advancement of religion and virtue.

The equable tenor of his mind in these respects is illustrated by his letters from several of these places: and though it is but comparatively a small number of them which I have now in my hands, yet they will afford some valuable extracts, which I shall therefore lay before my reader, that he may the better judge as to his real character, in particulars of which I have already discoursed, or which may hereafter occur.

In a letter to his lady, dated from Carlisle, Nov. 10th, 1733, when he was on his journey to Herefordshire, he breathes out his grateful cheerful soul in these words: "I bless God, I was never better in my life-time; and I wish I could be so happy as to hear the same of you; or rather (in other words) to hear that you had obtained an entire trust in God. That would infallibly keep you in perfect peace; for the God of truth hath promised it. Oh, how ought we to be longing to be with Christ, which is infinitely better than any thing we can propose here! To be there, where all complaints shall be for ever banished; where no mountains shall separate between God and our souls; and I hope it will be some addition to our happiness, that you and I shall be separated no more; but that as we have joined in singing praises to our glorious Redeemer here, we shall sing them in a much higher key through an endless eternity. Oh, eternity! eternity! What a wonderful thought is eternity!"

From Leicester, August 6th, 1739, he writes thus to his lady: "Yesterday I was at the Lord's table, where you and the children were not forgotten; but how wouderfully was I assisted when I came home, to plead for you all with many tears!" And then, speaking of some intimate friends, who were impatient (as I suppose by the connection) for his return to them, he takes occasion to observe the necessity "of endeavouring to compose our minds, and to say with the psalmist, my soul, wait thou only upon God." Afterwards, speaking of one of his children, of whom he heard that he made a commendable progress in his learning, he expressed his satisfaction in it, and adds: "6" But how much greater joy would it give me to hear that he was greatly advanced in the school of Christ! Oh, that our children may be but wise to salvation, and may grow in grace, as they do in stature!"

These letters, which to so familiar a friend evidently lay open the heart, and shew the ideas and affections which were lodged deepest there, are sometimes taken up with an account of sermons he had attended, and the impressions they had made upon his mind. I shall mention one only, as a specimen of many more, which was dated from a place called Cohorn, April 15th: We had here a minister from Wales, who gave us two excellent discourses on the love of Christ to us, as an argument to engage our love to him. And, indeed, next to the greatness of his love to us, methinks that there is nothing so astonishing as the coldness of our love to him. Oh, that he would shed abroad his love upon our hearts by his Holy Spirit, that ours might be kindled into a flame! May God enable you to trust in him, and then you will be kept in perfect peace!"

We have met with many traces of that habitual gratitude to the blessed God, as his heavenly Father and constant Friend, which made his life probably one of the happiest that ever was spent on earth. I cannot omit one more, which appears to me the more worthy of notice, as being a short turn in an hasty letter as any I remember to have seen of his, which he wrote from Leicester, in June, 1739: " I am now under the deepest sense of the many favors the Almighty has bestowed upon me: surely you will help me to celebrate the praises of our gracious God and kind Benefactor." This exuberance of grateful affection, which, while it was almost every hour pouring itself forth before God in the most genuine and emphatical language, felt itself still as it were straitened for want of a sufficient vent, and therefore called on others to help him with their concurrent praises, appears to me the most glorious and happy state in which a human soul can find itself on this side heaven.

Such was the temper which this excellent man appears to have carried along with him, through such a variety of places and circumstances: and the whole of his deportment was suitable to these impressions. Strangers were agreeably struck with his first appearance, there was so much of the christian, the well-bred man, and universal friend in it; and as they came more intimately to know him, they discovered more and more the uniformity and consistency of his whole temper and behaviour; so that whether he made only a visit for a few days to any place, or continued there for many weeks or months, he was always beloved and esteemd, and spoken of with that ho-nourable testimony from persons of the most different denominations and parties; which nothing but true sterling worth, (if I may be allowed the expression,) and that in an eminent degree, can secure.

Of the justice of this testimony, which I had so often heard from a variety of persons, I myself began to be a witness about the time when the last-mentioned letter was dated. In this view I believe I shall never forget that happy day, June 13th, 1739, when I first met him at Leicester. I remember, I happened that day to preach a lecture from Psalm exix. 158, "I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved because they kept not thy law." I was large in describing that mixture of indignation and grief, (strongly expressed by the original word there) with which the good man looks on the daring transgressors of the Divine law; and in tracing the causes of that grief, as arising from a regard to the Divine honour, and to the interest of a Redcemer, and a compassionate concern for the misery such offenders bring on themselves, and for the mischief they do to the world about them. I little thought how exactly I was drawing Col. Gardiner's character under each of those heads; and I have often reflected upon it as a happy providence, which opened a much speedier way than I could have expected, to the breast of one of the most amiable and useful friends which I ever expect to find upon earth. We afterwards sung a hymn, which brought over again the leading thoughts in the sermon, and struck him so strongly, that on obtaining a copy of it, he committed it to his memory, and used to repeat it with so forcible an accent, as shewed how much every line impressed his very soul. In this view the reader will pardon my inserting it; especially as I know not when I may get time to publish a volume of these serious. though artless composures, which I sent him in manuscript some years ago, and to which I have since made very large additions;

> Arise my tend'rest thoughts, arise, To torrents melt my streaming eyes! And thou my heart with anguish feel! Those evils which thou canst not heal!

See human nature sunk in shame! See scandals pour'd on Jesus's name! The Father wounded through the Son! The word abus'd, the soul undone!

See the short course of vain delight Closing in everlasting night! In flames that no abatement know, The briny tears for ever flow. My God, I feel the mournful scene; My bowels yearn o'er dying men: And fain my pity would reclaim, And suatch the fire-brands from the flame,

But feeble my compassion proves, And can but weep where most it loves; Thine own all-saving arm employ, And turn these drops of grief to joy!

The colonel, immediately after the conclusion of the service, met me in the vestry, and embraced me in the most affectionate manner, as if there had been a long friendship subsisting between us; assured me that he had for some years been intimately acquainted with my writings, and desired that we might concert measures for spending some hours together before I left the town. I was so happy as to be able to secure an opportunity of doing it; and I must leave it upon record, that I cannot recollect I was ever equally edified by any conversation I remember to have enjoyed. We passed that evening and the next morning together; and it is impossible for me to describe the impression which the interview left upon my heart. I rode all the remainder of the day; and it was my unspeakable happiness that I was alone, since I could be no longer with him; for I can hardly conceive what other company would not then have been an incumbrance. The views which he gave me even then (for he No. 3.

began to repose a most obliging confidence in me, though he concealed some of the most extraordinary circumstances of the methods by which he had been recovered to God and happiness), with those cordial sentiments of evangelical piety and extensive goodness, which he poured out into my bosom with so endearing a freedom, fired my very soul; and I hope I may trily say (what I wish and pray many of my readers may also adopt for themselves) that I glorified God in him. Our epistolary correspondence immediately commenced upon my return; and though, through the multiplicity of business on both sides, it suffered many interruptions, it was in some degree the blessing of all the following years of my life, till be fell by those unreasonable and wicked men, who had it in their hearts with him to have destroyed all our glory, defence, and happiness.

The first letter I received from him was so remarkable, that some persons of eminent piety to whom I communicated it would not be content without copying it out, or making some extracts from it. I persuade myself, that my devout reader will not be displeased that I insert the greatest part of it here; especially as it serves to illustrate the affectionate sense which he had of the Divine goodness in his conversion, though more than twenty years had passed since that memorable event happened. Having mentioned my ever dear and honored friend, Dr. Isaac Watts, on an occasion which I hinted before, he adds, "I have been in pain these several years, lest that excellent person should have been called to heaven before I had an opportunity of letting him know how much his works have been blessed to me, and of course of returning him my hearty thanks; for though it is owing to the operation of the Blessed Spirit that any thing works effectually upon our hearts, yet if we are not thankful to the instrument which God is pleased to make use of, whom we do see, how shall we be thankful to the Almighty, whom we have not seen? I desire to bless God for the good news of his recovery, and entreat you to tell him, that although I cannot keep pace with him here in cele-brating the high praises of our glorious Redeemer, which is the greatest grief of my heart; yet I am persuaded that when I join the glorious company above, there will be no drawbacks, none will out-sing me there; because I shall not find any that will be more indebted to the wonderful riches of Divine grace than I.

"Give me a place at thy saints' feet, has felt the Almighty power, which raised our glorious Redeemer from the grave, to believe his case singular; but I have made every one in this respect submit, as soon as he has heard my story. And if you seemed so surprised at the account which I gave you, what will you when you hear it all?

" Oh, if I had an angel's voice,

" And could be heard from pole to pole; "I would to all the list'ning world

" Proclaim thy goodness to my soul."

Fle then concludes, after some expressions of endearment (which, with whatever pleasure I review them, I must not here insert): "If you knew what a natural aversion I have to writing, you would be astonished at the length of this letter, which is, I believe, the longest I ever wrote. But my heart warms when I write to you, which makes my pen move the easier. I hope it will please our gracious God long to preserve you a blessed instrument in his hand of doing great good in the church of Christ; and that you may always enjoy a thriving soul in a healthy body shall be the continual prayer of," &c.

As our intimacy grew, our mutual affection increased; and "my dearest friend" was the form of address with which most of the epistles of his last years were begun and ended. Many of them are filled up with the sentiments of those writings which I 55555555555555555555555 published during these years, which he read with great attention, and of which he speaks in terms which it becomes me to suppress, and to impute in a considerable degree to the kind prejudices of so endeared a friend-ship. He gives me repeated assurances, "That he was daily mindful of me in his prayers;" a circumstance which I cannot recollect without the greatest thankfulness; the loss of which I should more deeply, lament, did I not hope that the happy effect of these prayers might still continue, and might run into all my remaining days. It might be a pleasure to me to make several extracts from many others of his letters; but it is a pleasure which I ought to suppress, and rather to reflect with unfeigned humility how unworthy I was of such regards from such a person, and of that Divine goodness which gave me such a friend as him. I shall therefore only add two general remarks, which offer themselves from several of his letters. The one is, that there is in some of them, as our freedom increased, an agreeable vein of humor and pleasantry; which shews how far he was from placing any part of it in a gloomy melancholy, or stiff formality. The other is, that he frequently refers to domestic circumstances, such as the illness or recovery of my children, &c. which is surprising how a man of his extensive and important business could so distinctly bear upon his mind. But his memory was good, and his heart was yet better; and his friendship was such, that nothing which sensibly affected the heart of one whom he honored with it left his own but slightly touched. There is all imaginable reason to believe that in many instances his prayers were not only offered for us in general terms, but varied as our particular situations required. Many quotations might verify this; but I decline troubling the reader with an enumeration of passages, in which it was only the abundance of friendly sympathy that gave this truly great as well as good man, so cordial a concern.

After this correspondence, carried on for the space of about three years, and some interviews which we had enjoyed at different places, he came to spend some timewith us at Northampton, and brought with him his lady and his two eldest children. I had here an opportunity of taking a much nearer view of his character, and surveying it in a much greater variety of lights than before; and my esteem for him increased in proportion to these opportunities. What is written above, with respect to his conduct in relative life, was in a great measure drawn from what I now saw; and I shall mention here some other points in his behaviour, which particularly struck my mind; and likewise shall touch on his sentiments on some topics of importance which he freely communicated to me, and which were remarkable, on account of that wisdom and. propriety which I apprehended in them.

There was nothing more observable in Col. Gardiner than the exemplary gravity, composure, and reverence with which he attended public worship. Copious as he was in his secret devotions before he engaged in it, he always began them so early as not to be retarded by them when he should resort to the house of God. He, and all his soldiers who chose to worship with him, were generally there before the service began, that the entrance of so many of them at once might not disturb the congregation already engaged in devotion, and that there might be the better opportunity for bringing the mind to a becoming attention, and preparing it for converse with the Divine Being. While acts of worship were going on, whether of prayer or singing, he always stood up; and whatever regard he might have for persons who passed by him at that time, though they were to come into the same pew, he never paid any compliment to them; and often has he expressed his wonder at the indecorum of breaking off our address to God to bow to a fellow-creature; which he thought a much greater indecency than it would be, on a like occasion and circumstance, to interrupt an address to our prince. During the time of preaching, his his eye was commonly, fixed upon the minister, though sometimes turning round upon the auditory, where if he observed any to trifle, it filled him with a just indignation. And instances have been known, in which he communicated it to some friend of the person who was guilty of it, that proper application might be made to prevent it for the time to come.

A more devout communicant at the table of the Lord has, perhaps, been seldom known. Often have I had the pleasure to see that manly countenance softened to all the marks of humiliation and contrition on this occasion, and to discern, in spite of all his efforts to conceal them, streams of tears flowing down from his eyes, while he has been directing them to those memorials of his Redeemer's love. And some who have conversed intimately with him after he came from that ordinance, have observed a visible abstraction from surrounding objects; by which there seemed reason to imagine, that his soul was wrapt in holy contemplation. And I particularly remember, that when we had spent a great part of the following Monday in riding together, he made an apology to me for being so absent as he seemed, by telling me "that his heart was flown upwards, before he was aware, to Him whom, having not seen, he loved; and that he was rejoicing in him with such unspeakable joy, that he could not hold it down to creature converse."

In all the offices of friendship he was remarkably ready, and a most sweet and engaging manner of performing them which greatly heightened the obligations he conferred. He seemed not to set any high value upon any benefit he bestowed; but did it without the least parade, as a thing which in those circumstances came of course, where he had professed love and respect; which he was not over-forward to do, though he treated strangers, and those who were his inferiors, very courteously, and always seemed glad of an opportunity of doing them good.

He was particularly zealous in vindicating the reputation of his friends in their absence: and though I cannot recollect an opportunity of observing this immediately, not being present with him when any ill was spoken of others at all; yet, by what he has said with relation to attempts to injure the character of worthy and useful men, I have reason to believe that no man living was more sensible of the baseness and infamy, as well as the cruelty of such a conduct. He knew and despised the low principles of resentment for unreasonable expectations disappointed, of personal attachment to men of some crossing interests, of envy, and of party zeal, from whence such a conduct often proceeds; and was particularly offended, when he found it (as he frequently did) in persons that set up for the greatest patrons of liberty, virtue, and candor. He looked upon the murderers of reputation and usefulness as some of the vilest pests of society; and plainly shewed, on every proper occasion, that he thought it the part of a generous, benevolent man, to exert himself in tracing and hunting down the slander, that the authors or abettors of it might be less ca-

The most plausible objection that was ever made to Colonel Gardiner's character was his too great attachment to some religious principles, established indeed in the churches both of England and Scotland, but which of late years have been much disputed, and which, it is at least generally supposed, not a few in both have thought proper to depart, whatever expedients they may have found to quiet their consciences, in subscribing those formularies in which they are plainly taught. His zeal was especially apparent in opposition to those doctrines which seemed to derogate from the Divine honors of the Son and Spirit of God, and from the freedom of Divinegrace, or the reality and necessity of its operations in the conversion and salvation

With relation to these, permit me to observe, that it was his most stedfast persuasion that all those notions which represent our blessed Redeemer and the Holy Spirit as mere creatures, or which set aside the atonement of the former, or the influence of the latter, do sap the very foundation of christianity, by rejecting the most glorious doctrines peculiar to it. He had attentively observed (what indeed is too obvious) the unhappy influence which the denial of these principles often has on the character of ministers, and on their success, and was persuaded that an attempt to substitute that mutilated form of christianity which remains, when these essentials of it are taken away, has proved one of the most successful methods which the enemy of souls has ever taken in these latter days to lead men by insensible degrees into deism, vice, and perdition. He also sagaciously observed the artful manner in which obnoxious tenets are often maintained or insinuated, with all that mixture of zeal and address with which they are propagated in the world, even by those who had most solemnly professed to believe, and engaged to teach the contrary: and as he really apprehended that the glory of God, and the salvation of souls was concerned, his piety and charity made him eager and strenuous in opposing what he judged to be errors of so pernicious a nature. Yet I must declare, that according to what I have known of him (and he opened his heart op these topics to me with as much freedom as to any man living), he was not ready upon light suspicions to charge tenets which he thought so pernicious on any, especially where he saw the appearance of a good temper and life, which he always reverenced and loved in persons of all sentiments and professions. He severely condemned causeless jealousies, and evil surmisings of every kind; and extended that charity, in this respect, both to clergy and laity, which good Bishop Burnet was so ready, according to his own account, to limit the latter, " of believing every man good till he knew him to be bad, and his notions right till he knew them wrong." He could not but be very sensible of the unhappy consequences which may follow, on attacking the characters of men, especially of those who are ministers of the gospel; and if, through a mixture of human frailty, from which the best of men in the best of their meanings and intentions are not entirely free, he has ever, in the warmth of his heart, dropped a word which might be injurious to any on that account (which very seldom happened), he would gladly retract it on better information, which was perfectly agreeable to that honest and generous frankness of temper, in which I never knew any man who exceeded him.

of sinners.

Indeed, it was his deliberate judgment, that the Arian, Socinian, and Pelagian doctrines, were highly dishonorable to God, and dangerous to the souls of men; and that it was the duty of private christians to be greatly on their guard against those ministers by whom they are entertained, lest their mind should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. Yet he sincerely abhorred the thought of persecution for conscience sake: of the absurdity and iniquity of which, in all its kinds and degrees, he had as deep and rational a conviction as any man I could name. And indeed the generosity of his heroic heart could hardly bear to think that those glorious truths, which he so cordially loved, and which he assuredly believed to be capable of such fair support, both from reason and the word of God, should be disgraced by methods of defence, and propagation, common to the most impious and ridiculous falsehoods. Nor did he by any means approve of passionate and furious ways of vindicating the most vital and important doctrines of the gospel; for he knew that to maintain the most benevolent religion in the world by such malevolent and infernal methods was destroying the end to accomplish the means; and that it was as impossible that true christianity should be supported thus, as it is that a man should long be nourished by eating his own flesh. To display the genuine fruits of christianity in a good life, to be ready to plead with meekness and sweetness for the doctrines it teaches, and to labor by every office of humanity and goodness to gain upon them that oppose it, were the weapons with which this good soldier of Jesus Christ faithfully fought the battles of the Lord. These weapons will always be victorious in his cause; and they who have recourse to others of a different temperature, how strong soever they may seem, and how sharp soever they may really be, will find them break in their hands when they exert them most furiously, and are much more likely to would themselves than to conquer the enemies they oppose.

But while speaking of Colonel Gardiner's charity in this respect, I must not omit that of another kind, which has indeed engrossed the name of charity much more than it ought, excellent as it is; viz. almsgiving, for which he was very remarkable, and it is wondered how he was able to do so many generous things this way; but his frugality fed the spring. He made no pleasurable expence upon himself, and was contented with a very decent appearance in his family, without affecting such an air of grandeur as could not have been supported without sacrificing to it satisfactions far nobler, and to a temper like his far more delightful. The lively and tender feelings of his heart in favor of the distressed and afflicted made it a self-indulgence to him to relieve them; and the deep conviction he had of the vain transitory nature of the enjoyments of this world, together with the sublime view he had of another, engaged him to dispense his bounties with a very liberal hand, and even to seek out proper objects of them; and, above all, his sincere and ardent love to the Lord Jesus Christ, engaged him to feel with a true sympathy the concerns of his poor members. In consequence of this, he honored several of his friends with commissions for the relief of the poor; and particularly, with respect to some under my pastoral care, he referred it to my discretion to supply them with what I thought expedient; and frequently pressed me in his letters to be sure not to let them want. And where persons standing in need of this charity happened, as they often did, to be persons of remarkably religious dispositions, it was easy to perceive that he not only loved, but honored them; and really esteemed it an honor which providence conferred upon him that he should be made, as it were, the almoner of God for the relief of such.

I cannot forbear relating a little story here, which, when the colonel himself heard it, gave him such exquisite pleasure, that I hope it will be acceptable to several of my readers. There was in a village about three miles from Northampton, and in a family which of all others near me was afterwards most indebted to him (though he had never then seen any member of it) an aged and poor, but eminently good woman, who had, with great difficulty, in the exercise of much faith and patience, diligence and humility, made shift to educate a large family of children, after the death of her husband, without being chargeable to the parish; which, as it was quite beyond her hope, she often spoke of it with great delight. At length, when worn out with age and infirmities, she lay upon her dying bed, she did in a most lively and affecting manuer express her hope and joy in the views of approaching glory. Yet, amidst all the triumph of such a prospect, there was one remaining care and distress which lay heavy upon her mind; which was, that as her journey and her stock of provisions were both ended together, she feared that she must either be buried at the parish expence, or leave her most dutiful and affectionate daughters the house stripped of some of the few moveables which remained in it, to perform the last office of duty to her, which she had reason to believe they would do. While she was combating with this only remaining anxiety, I happened to come in, and to bring with mea guinea, which the generous colonel had sent by a special message, on hearing the character of the family, for its relief. A present like this (probably the most considerablethey had ever received in their lives) coming in this manner from an entire stranger, at such a crisis of time, threw my dying friend (for such, amidst all her poverty, I rejoiced to call her) into a perfect transport of joy. She esteemed it a singular favor of Providence, sent to her in her last moments, as a token for good, and greeted it as a special mark of that loving-kindness of God which should attend her for ever. She would therefore be raised up in her bed, that she might bless God for it upon her knees, and with her last breath pray for her kind and generous benefactor, and for him who had been the instrument of directing his bounty into. that channel. After which she soon expired with such tranquillity and sweetness: as could not but most sensibly delight all who beheld her, and occasioned many who knew the circumstances to glorify God on. her behalf.

The colone's last residence at Northampton was in June and July, 1742, when Lord Cadogan's regiment of dragoons was quartered here; and I cannot but observe, that wherever that regiment came, it was remarkable, not only for the fine appearance it made, and for the exactness with which, it performed its various exercises (of which it had about this time the honor to receive.

the most illustrious testimonials), but also for the great regularity of the soldiers. Many of the officers copied after the excellent pattern which they had constantly before their eyes; and a great number of their private men seemed to be persons, not only of strict virtue, but of serious piety. Doubtless they found their account in it; not only in the serenity and happiness of their own minds, which is beyond comparison the most important consideration; but also in some degree, in the obliging and respectful treatment which they generally met with in their quarters. This is mentioned, because I am persuaded that if gentlemen of their profession knew, and would reflect, how much more comfortable they make their own quarters by a sober, orderly, and obliging conduct, they would be regular out of mere self-love, if they, were not influenced, as I heartily wish they may always be, by a nobler principle.

Towards the latter end of this year he embarked for Flanders, and spent some considerable time with the regiment at Glient, where he much regretted the want of those religious opportunities which had made his other abodes delightful. But as he had made so eminent a progress in that Divine life, which they are all intended to promote, be could not be inactive in the service of God. I have now before me a letter dated from thence, October 16th, 1742, in which he writes, " As for me, I am indeed in a dry and barren land, where no water is, rivers of water run down mine eyes, because nothing is to be heard in our Sodom but blaspheming the name of my God: and I am not honored as the instrument of doing any great service. 'Tis true I have reformed six or seven field-officers of swearing. I dine every day with them, and have entered them into a voluntary contract to pay a shilling to the poor for every oath; and it is wonderful to observe the great effect it has had already. One of them told me this day at dinner, that it had really such an influence upon him, that being at cards last night when another officer fell a swearing, he was not able to bear it, but rose up, and left the company. So you see, restraints at first arising from a low principle may improve to something better."

During his abode here, he had a great deal of business upon his hands, and had also in some long marches the care of more regiments than his own; and it has been very delightful to me to observe what a degree of converse with heaven, and the God of it, he maintained amidst the scenes of hurry and fatigue; of which the reader may find a remarkable specimen in the following letter, dated from Lichwick, in the beginning of April, 1743, which was one of the last I received from him while abroad, and begins with these words: "Yesterday being the Lord's-day, at six in the morning I had the pleasure of reeeiving yours at Nortonick; and it proved a Sabbath-day's blessing to me. Some time before it reached me (it may be observed that his former custom of rising so early to his devotions was still retained), I had been wrestling with God with many tears, and after reading it, I returned to my knees again to give hearty thanks to him for all his goodness to you and yours, and also to myself, in that he hath been pleased to stir up so many who are dear to him, to bemindful of me at the throne of grace." And then, after the mention of some particulars, he adds: "Blessed and adored for ever be the holy name of my heavenly Father, who holds my soul in life, and my body in perfect health! Were I to recount his mercy and goodness to me, even in the midst of all these hurries, I should never have done .- I hope your Master will still encourage you in his work, and make you a blessing to many. My dearest friend, I am more yours than I can express, and shall remain so while I am J. G."

By this correspondence I had a farther opportunity of discovering that humble resignation to the will of God which made so amiable a part of his character, and of which I had before seen so many instances. He speaks, in the letter from which I have just been giving an extract, of the hope that he had expressed in a former, of seeing us again that winter; and he adds, "To be sure, it would have been a great pleasure to me; but we poor mortals form projects, and the Almighty Ruler of the Universe disposes of all as he pleases. A great many of us were getting ready for our return to England, when we received an order to march to Frankfort, to the great surprise of the whole army; neither can any of us comprehend what we are to do there, for there is no enemy in that country, the French army being marched into Bavaria, where we cannot follow them. But it is the will of the Lord, and his will be done! I desire to bless and praise my heavenly Father that I am entirely resigned to it. 'Tis no matter where I go, or what becomes of me, so that God be glorified in my life, or my death. I should rejoice much to hear that all my friends were equally resigned."

The mention of this article reminds me of another relating to the view he had of obtaining a regiment for himself; he endea-voured to deserve it by the most faithful services; some of them indeed beyond what the strength of his constitution would well bear; for the weather in some of these marches proved exceedingly bad, and yet he would be always at the head of his people, that he might look to every thing that concerned them with the exactest care.

This obliged him to neglect the beginning of a feverish illness; the natural consequence of which was, that it grew very formidable, forced a long confinement upon him, and gave animal nature a shock which it never recovered.

Meantime, as he had the promise of a regiment before he quitted England, his friends were continually expecting an occasion of congratulating him on having received the command of one. But still they were disappointed; and on some of them. the disappointment seemed to set heavy. As for the colonel himself, he seemed quite easy about it; and appeared greater in that easy situation of mind than the highest military honors and preferments could have made him. With great pleasure do I at this moment recollect the unaffected serenity, and even indifference, with which he expresses himself upon this occasion, in a letter to me, dated about the beginning of April, 1743. "The disappointment of a regiment is nothing to me; for I am satisfied, that had it been for God's glory, I should have had it, and should have been sorry to have it on any other terms. My heavenly Father has bestowed upon me infinitely more than if he had made me emperor of the whole world.

There are several parallel expressions in other letters; and those to his lady, about the same time, were just in the same strain.

An extract from one, which was written from Aix la Chapelle, April 21st, the same year, has these words: " People here think I must be sadly troubled at not having got a regiment, (for six out of seven vacant are now disposed of;) but they are strangely mistaken, for it has given me no sort of trouble; my heavenly Father knows what is best for me: and blessed, and for ever adored be his name, he has given me an entire resignation to his will; besides, I don't know that ever 1 met with any disappointment since I was a christian, but it pleased God to discover to me that it was plainly for my advantage, by bestowing something better upon meafterwards, many instances of which I am able to produce; and therefore should be the greatest monster if I did not trust in him."

I should be guilty of a great omission, in not adding how remarkably the event corresponded with his faith on this occasion: for, whereas he had no intimation or expectation of anything more than a regiment of foot, his Majesty was pleased, out of his great goodness, to give him a regiment of dragoons, which was then quartered just in his own neighbourhood. And it is properly remarked by the reverend and worthy person who communicated this letter to me, that when the colonel thus expressed himself, he could have no prospect of what he afterwards so soon obtained; as General

Bland's regiment, to which he was advanced. was only vacant on the 19th of April, that is, two days before the date of this letter, when it was impossible he should have any notice of that vacancy. And it also deserves observation, that some few days after the colonel was thus unexpectedly promoted to the command of these dragoons, Brigadier Cornwallis's regiment of foot, then in Flanders, became vacant: now had this happened before his promotion to General Bland's, Colonel Gardiner in all probability would only have had that regiment of foot, and so have continued in Flauders. When the affair was issued, he informed Lady Frances of it, in a letter dated from a village near Frankfort, May the 3rd, in which he refers to his former of the 21st of April, observing how remarkably it was verified " in God's having given him (for so he expresseth it, agreeably to the views he continually maintained of the universal agency of Divine Providence) what he had no expectation of, and what was so much better than that which he had missed, a regiment of dragoons quartered at his own door."

It appeared to him, that by this remarkable event, Providence called him home. Accordingly, though he had other preferencest offered him in the army, he chose to return; and the more willingly, as he did not expect there would have been any action. Just at this time it pleased God to give him an awful instance of the uncertainty of human prospects and enjoyments, by that violent fever which seized him at Ghent, in his way to England: and perhaps the more severely, for the efforts he made to push on his journey, though he had for some days been indisposed, it was one of the first fits of severe illness he had ever met with, and he was ready to look upon it as a sudden call into eternity; but it gave him no painful alarm in that view. He committed himself to the God of his life, and in a few weeks he was so well recovered as to be capable of pursuing his journey, though not without difficulty; and I cannot but think it might have conduced much to a more perfect recovery than he ever attained, to have allowed himself a longer repose, in order to recruit his exhausted strength and spirits. But there was an activity in his temper not easy to be restrained; and it was now stimulated, not only by a desire of seeing his friends, but of being with his regiment, that he might omit nothing in his power to regulate their morals and their discipline, and to form them for public service. Accordingly he passed through London about the middle of June, 1743, where he had the honor of waiting on their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, and re-No. 4.

ceiving from both the most obliging tokens of favor and esteem. He arrived at Northampton, on Monday, the 20th of June, and spent part of three days there. But the great pleasure which his return and preferment gave us was much abated by observing his countenance so sadly altered, and the many marks of languor and remaining disorder which evidently appeared; so that he really looked ten years older than he had done ten months before, I had, however, a satisfaction sufficient to counterbalance much of the concern which this alteration gave me, in a renewed opportunity of observing, indeed more sensibly than ever, in how remarkable a degree he was dead to the enjoyments and views of this mortal life. When I congratulated him on the favorable appearances of Providence for him in the late event, he briefly told me the remarkable circumstances that attended it with the most genuine impressions of gratitude to God for them; but added, that as his account was increased with his income, power, and influence, and his cares were proportionably increased too, it was as to his own personal concern much the same to him whether he had remained in his former station, or been elevated to this; but if God should by this means honor him as an instrument of doing more good than he could otherwise have done, he should rejoice in it.

The near views he had taken of eternity in the illness from which he was so imperfectly recovered, had not in the least alarmed him; but that he would have been entirely willing, had such been the determination of God, to have been cut short in a foreign land, without any earthly friend near him, and in the midst of a journey, undertaken with hopes and prospects so pleasing to nature, which appeared to me no inconsiderable evidence of the strength of his faith. But we shall wonder the less at his extraordinary resignation, if we consider the joyful and assured prospect which he had of an happiness infinitely superior beyond the grave; of which that worthy minister of the church of Scotland, who had an opportunity of conversing with him quickly after his return, and having the memorable story of his conversion from his mouth, writes thus in his letter to me, dated Jan. 14th, 1746-7: " When he came to review his regiment at Linlithgow, in the summer, 1743, after having given me the wonderful story as above, he concluded in words to this purpose:-Let me die whenever it shall please God, or wherever it shall be, I am sure I shall go to the mansions of eternal glory, and enjoy my God and my Redeemer in heaven for ever."

While he was with us at this time, he appeared deeply affected with the sad state of things, as to religion and morals; and seemed to apprehend that the rod of God was hanging over so sinful a nation. He observed a great deal of disaffection, which the enemies of the government had, by a variety of artifices, been raising in Scotland for years: and the number of Jacobites there, together with the defenceless state in which our island then was, with respect to the number of its forces at home (of which he spoke at once with great concern and astonishment), led him to expect an invasion from France, and an attempt in favor of the Pretender, much sooner than it happened. I have heard him say, many years before it came so near being accomplished, that a few thousands might have a fair chance for marching from Edinburgh to London uncontroled, and throw the whole kingdom into an astonishment. And there is great reason to believe that this was one main consideration which engaged him to make such haste to his regiment, then quartered in those parts, as he imagined there was not a spot of ground where he might be more like to have a call to expose his life in the service of his country, and perhaps, by appearing on a proper call early in its defence, be instrumental in suppressing the beginnings of the most formidable mischief. How rightly he judged in these things, the event did too evidently

The evening before our last separation, as I knew I could not entertain the invaluable friend who was then my guest more agreeably, I preached a sermon in my own liouse, with some peculiar reference to his case and circumstances, from those evermemorable words, than which I have never felt any more powerful and more comfortable: " Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him; I will set him on high, because he hath known my name: he shall call upon me, and I will answer him; I will be with him in trouble, I will deliver him, and honor him; with long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation." Psalm xci. 14-16. This scripture could not but lead our meditations to survey the character of the good man, as one who knows the name of the blessed God (has such a deep apprehension of the glories and perfections of his nature), as determinately to set his love upon him, to make him the supreme object of his most ardent and constant affection. suggested as the most sublime and animating hopes to persons of such a character, that their prayers shall be always acceptable to God: that though they may, and must, be called out to their share in the troubles and calamities of life, yet they may assure themselves of the Divine presence in all; which shall issue in their deliverance, in their exaltation, sometimes to distinguished honor and esteem among men, and it may be, in a long course of useful and happy years, on earth; at least, which shall undoubtedly end in seeing, to their perpetual delight, the complete salvation of God in a world where they shall enjoy length of days for ever and ever, and employ them all in adoring the great Author of their salvation and felicity. It is evident that these natural thoughts on such a scripture were matters of universal concern. Yet had I known that this was my last address to Colonel Gardiner, as a minister of the gospel, and foreseen the scenes through which God was about to lead him, I hardly know what considerations could have been suggested with more peculiar propriety. The attention, elevation, and delight, with which he heard them, was very apparent, and the pleasure which the observation of it gave me continues to this moment. And let me be permitted to digress so far as to add, that this is indeed the great support of a christian minister, under the many discouragements and disappointments which he meets with, in his attempts to fix upon the profligate or the thoughtless part of mankind a deep sense of religious truth; that there is another important part of his work, in which he may hope to be more generally successful; as by plain, artless, but serious discourses, the great principles of christian duty and hope may be nourished and invogorated by good men, their graces watered as at the root, and their souls animated both to persevere and improve in holiness. And when we are effectually performing such benevolent offices, so well suiting our immortal natures, to persons whose hearts are cemented with ours in the bonds of the most endearing and sacred friendship, it is too little to say it overpays the fatigue of our labors; it even swallows up all sense of it in the most rational and sublime pleasure.

An incident occurs to my mind which happened that evening, which at least for the oddness of it may deserve a place in these memoirs. I had then with me one Thomas Porter, a poor but very honest and religious man (now living at Hatfield Broadoak, in Essex), who is quite unacquainted with letters, so as not to be able to distinguish one from another, yet is master of the contents of the Bible in so extraordinary a degree, that he has not only fixed an immense number of texts in his memory, but merely by hearing them quoted in sermons, has registered there the chapter and verse in which these passages are to be found: this is attended with a marvellous facility, in directing those that can read to turn to them, and a most unaccountable talent of fixing on such as suit almost every imaginable variety of circumstances in common life. There are two considerations in 144 this case which make it the more wonderful; the one, that he is a person of a very low genius, having besides a stammering, which makes his speech almost unintelligible to strangers, so wild and awkward a manner of behaviour, that he is frequently taken for an ideot, and seems in many things to be so; the other, that he grew up to manhood in a very licentious course of living, and an entire ignorance of Divine things, so that all these exact impressions on his memory have been made in his riper years. I thought it would not be disagreeable to the colonel to introduce to him this odd phenomenon, which many hundreds of people have had a curiosity to examine, and among all the strange things I have seen in him, none equalled what passed on this occasion. On hearing the colonel's profession, and receiving some hints of his religious character, he ran through a vast variety of scriptures, beginning at the Pentateuch, and going on to the Revelation, relating either to the dependance to be fixed on God for the success of military operations, or to the instances and promises occurring there of his care of good men in the most imminent dangers, or to the encouragement to despise perils and death while engaged in a good cause, and supported by the views of a happy immortality. He quoted more than twenty of these passages; and I know not who could have chose them with greater propriety. The last of this catalogue was that from which I afterwards preached on the lamentable occasion of this great man's fall: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." We were all astonished at so remarkable a fact; and doubtless many of my readers will think the memory of it worthy of being thus preserved.

But to return to my main subject: the next day after the sermon and conversation I took my last leave of my inestimable friend, after attending him some part of his way northward. The first stage of our journey was to the cottage of that poor but religious family, which have been mentioned above, as relieved, and indeed in a great measure subsisted, by his charity. And nothing could be more delightful than to observe the condescension with which he conversed with these his humble pensioners. We there put up our last united prayers together; and he afterwards expressed, in the strongest terms I ever heard him use on such an occasion, the singular pleasure with which he had joined in them. Indeed it. was no small satisfaction to me to have an opportunity of recommending such a valuable friend to God's protection and blessing, with that particular freedom and enlargement on what was peculiar in his circumstances, which hardly any other situation, unless he had been quite alone, could so conveniently have admitted. We went from thence to the table of a person of distinction in the neighbourhood, where he had an opportunity of shewing in how decent and graceful a manner he could unite the christian and the gentleman, and give conversation an improving and religious turn, without violating any of the rules of polite behaviour, or saying and doing any thing which looked at all constrained or affected. Here we took our last embrace, committing each other to the care of the God of heaven; and the colonel pursued his journey to the north, where he spent all the remainder of his days.

The more I reflect upon this appointment of Providence, the more I discern of the beauty and wisdom of it; not only as it led directly to that glorious period of life with which God had determined to honor him, and in which it becomes all his friends to rejoice, but also as the retirement on which he entered could not but have a happy tendency to favor his more immediate and compleat preparation for so speedy a remove. To which we may add, that it must probably have a very powerful influence to promote the interests of religion (incomparably the greatest of all interests) among the members of his own family; who must surely edify much by such daily lessons as they received from his lips, when they saw them illustrated and enforced by so admirable an example, and this for two complete years. 'Tis the more remarkable, as it cannot be found from the memoirs of his life in my hands that he had ever been so long at home since he had a family, or indeed since his childhood, ever so long at a time in any one place.

With how clear a lustre his lamp shone, and with what holy vigor his loins were girded up in the service of his God, in these his latter days, it may be learned in part from the letters of several excellent persons in the ministry, or in secular life. with whom I have since conversed or corresponded. And in his many letters, dated from Bankton during this period, there is still further evidence how happy he was amidst those infirmities of body, which his tenderness for me would seldom allow him to mention: for it appears from them what a daily intercourse he kept up with heaven, and what delightful communion with God crowned his attendance on public ordinances, and his sweet hours of devout retirement. He mentions his sacramental opportunities with peculiar relish; crying out as in a holy rapture, in reference to one and another of them, "Oh how gracious a master do we serve! How pleasant is his service! How rich the entertainments of his love! Oh how poor and cold are our services! But quotations of this sort need not to be multiplied after those given above, which may be a sufficient specimen of many more in the same strain. This hint may suffice to shew that the same ardor of soul held out in a great measure to the last; and indeed it seems that towards the close of life, like the flame of a lamp almost expiring, it sometimes exerted an unusual blaze.

He spent much of his time at Bankton in religious solitude; and one most intimately conversant with him assures me, that the traces of that delightful converse with God which he enjoyed in it might easily be discerned in that solemn, yet cheerful, countenance with which he often came out of his closet. Vet his exercises there must sometimes have been very mournful, considering the melancholy views which he had of the state of our public affairs. " I should be glad," says he, in a letter which he sent me about the close of the year 1743, "to hear what wise and good people among you think of the present circumstances of things. For my own part, though I thank God I fear nothing for myself, my apprehensions for the public are very gloomy, considering the deplorable prevalency of almost all kinds of wickedness amongst us-the natural consequence of the contempt of the gospel. I am daily offering up my prayers to God for this sinful land of ours, over which his judgment seems to be gathering; and my strength is sometimes so exhausted with those strong cries and tears, which I pour out before God on this occasion, that I am hardly able to stand when Farise from my knees. If we have many remaining to stand in the breach with equal fervency, I hope, crying as our provocations are, God will still be entreated for us, and save us."

Most of the other letters I had the pleasure of receiving from him after our last separation, were either filled, like those of former years, with tender expressions of affectionate solicitude for my domestic comfort and public usefulness, or relate to the writings I published during this time, or to the affairs of his eldest son, then under my care. But these are things which are by no means of a nature to be communicated here. It is enough to remark in the general, that the christan was still mingled with all the care of the friend and the parent.

But it is incumbent upon me to observe, that during this time, and for some preceding years, his attention, ever wakeful to such concerns, was much engaged by some religious appearances which happened about this time both in England and Scotland, of which some may be curious to know his sentiments. He communicated them to me with the most unreserved freedom; and I cannot apprehend myself under any engagements to conceal them, as I am No. 4.

persuaded that it will be no prejudice to his memory that they should be publicly known.

From Colonel Gardiner's pen it was that I received the first notice of that evermemorable scene which was opened at Kilsyth, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Mac-Culloch, in the month of February, 1741-2. He communicated to me the copy of two letters from that eminently-favored servant of God, giving an account of that extraordinary success which had within a few days accompanied his preaching; when, as in a little more than a fortnight, a hundred and thirty souls, who had before continued in long insensibility under the faithful preaching of the gospel, were awakened on a sudden to attend it, as if it had been a new revelation brought down from heaven, and attested by as astonishing miracles as ever were wrought by Peter or Paul, though they heard it only from a person under whose ministry they had sat for several years. Struck with a power and majesty in the word of God, which they had never felt before, they crowded his house night and day, making their applications to him for spiritual direction and assistance, with an earnestness and solicitude, which floods of tears, that swallowed up their own words and his, could not sufficiently express. The colonel mentioned this at first to me as a matter of eternal praise, which he knew would rejoice my very soul; and when he saw it spread in the neighbouring parts, and observed the glorious reformation which it produced in the lives of great multitudes, and the abiding fruits of it for succeeding months and years, it increased and confirmed his joy. But the facts relating to this matter have been laid before the world in so authentic a manner, and the agency of Divine grace in them has been so rationally vindicated, and so pathetically represented, in what the reverend and judicious Mr. Webster has written upon that subject, that it is altogether superfluous for me to add any thing farther than my hearty prayers, that the work may be, as it was apparently, glorious and divine.

It was with great pleasure that he received any intelligence of a like kind from England: whether the clergy of the established church or dissenting ministers, whether our own countrymen or foreigners, were the instruments of it. And whatever weakness or errors might mingle themselves with valuable qualities in such as were active in such a work, he appeared to love and honor them in proportion to the degree he saw reason to believe their hearts were devoted to the service of Christ, and their attempts owned and succeeded by him. I mentioned one of these gentlemen who had been very successful in the ministry, and had seemed to have met with some very unkind usage, he says, "I had rather be that despised persecuted man, to be an instrument in the hand of the Spirit in converting so many souls, and building up so many in their holy faith, than I would be emperor of the whole world." Yet this steady and judicious christian (for such he most assuredly was), at the same time that he esteemed a man for his good intention and his worthy qualities, did not suffer himself to be hurried away into all the singularity of his sentiments, or to admire his imprudence or excesses. On the contrary, he saw and lamented that artifice which the great father of fraud has so long and so successfully been practising; who, like the enemies of Israel, when he cannot entirely prevent the building of God's temple, does, as it were, offer his assistance to carry on the work, that he may thereby get the most effectual opportunities of obstructing it. The colonel often expressed his astonishment at the wide extremes into which some, whom on the whole he thought very worthy men, were permitted to run in many doctrinal and speculative points; and discerned how evidently it appeared from hence, that we cannot argue the truth of any doctrine from the success of the preacher, since this would be a kind of demonstration, which might equally prove both parts of a contradiction. Yet when he observed, that an high regard to the atonement and righteousness of Christ, and to the free grace of God in him, exerted by the operation of the Divine Spirit, was generally common to all who had been peculiarly successful in the conversion and reformation of men (how widely soever their judgments might differ in other points, and how warmly soever they might oppose each other in consequence of that diversity), it tended greatly to confirm his faith in these principles, as well as to open his heart in love to all of every denomination who maintained an affectionate regard to them. And though what he remarked as to the conduct and success of ministers of the most opposite strains of preaching, confirmed him in these sentiments, yet he always esteemed and loved virtuous and benevolent men, even where he thought them most mistaken in the notions they formed of religion, or in the methods by which they attempted to serve it.

While I thus represent what all who knew him must soon have observed of Colonel Gardiner's affectionate regard to these peculiar doctrines of our holy religion, it is necessary also to inform my reader that it was not his judgment that the attention of ministers, or their hearers, should be wholly engrossed by these, excellent as they are; but that all the parts of the scheme of truth and duty should be regarded in their due connection and proportion. Far from that connection and proportion; far from that distempered taste, which can bear nothing but cordials, it was his deliberate judgment that the law should be preached as well as the gospel: and hardly any thing gave him greater offence than the irreverent manner in which some, who have been ignorantly extolled as the most evangelical preachers, have sometimes been tempted to speak of the former, much indeed to the scandal of all consistent and judicious christians. He delighted to be instructed in his duty, and to hear much of the inward exercises of the Spiritual and Divine life. And he always wished, so far as I could observe, to have these topics treated in a rational as well as a spiritual manner, with a solidity and order of thought, with perspicuity and weight of expression; as well knowing that religion is a most reasonable service; that God has not chosen idiots or lunatics as the instruments, or nonsense as the means of building up his church; and that though the charge of enthusiasm is often fixed on christianity and its ministers in a wild, undeserved, and indeed, on the whole, enthusiastical manner, by some of the loudest or most solemn pretenders to reason; yet there is really such a thing as enthusiasm, against which it becomes the true friends of revelation to be diligently on their guard, lest christianity, instead of being exalted, should be greatly corrupted and debased, and all manner of absurdity; both in doctrine and practice, introduced by methods, which, like persecution, throw truth and falsehood on a level, and render the grossest errors at once more plausible and more incurable. He had too much candor and equity to fix general charges of this nature; but he was really, and I think not vainly, apprehensive that the emissaries and agents of the most corrupt church that ever dishonored the christian name (by which it will easily be understood he meant that of Rome) might very possibly insinuate themselves into societies, to which they could not otherwise have access, and make their advantage of that total resignation of the understanding, and contempt of reason and learning, which nothing but ignorance, delirium, or knavery can dictate, to lead men blindfold whither it pleased, till it set them down at the foot of an altar, where transubstantiation itself is consecrated.

I cannot more properly introduce another part of the colonel's character, which, obvious as it was, I have not yet touched upon; viz. his tenderness to those who were under any spiritual distress; wherein he was indeed an example to ministers, in a duty more peculiarly theirs. I have seen many amiable instances of this myself, and have been informed of many others; one of which happened about the time of that awakening in the western parts of Scotland, which I touched upon before, when the Rev. Mr. M'Laurin, of Glasgow, found occasion to witness the great propriety, judgment, and felicity of manner, with which he addressed spiritual consolation to an afflicted soul, who applied to the professor at a time when he had not an opportunity immediately to give audience to the case. And indeed, as long ago as the year 1726, I find him writing to a friend in a strain of tenderness in this regard which might well have become the most affectionate and experienced pastor. He there congratulates him on some religious enjoyments lately received (in part, it is said, by his means), when, among others, he had this modest expression: "If I have been made any way the means of doing you good, give the whole glory to God, for he has been willing to shew that the power was entirely of himself, since he has been pleased to make use of so very weak an instrument." In the same letter he admonishes his friend that he should not be too much surprised, if, after having been (as he expresses it) upon the mount, he should be brought into the valley again; and reminds him that "we live by faith, and not by sensible assurance;" representing that there are some such full communications from God as seem almost to swallow up the actings of faith, from whence they take their rise: "whereas when a christian who walketh in darkness, and sees no light, will yet hang, as it were, on the report of an absent Jesus," and, as one expresses it, in allusion to the story of Jacob and Joseph, "can put himself as on the chariot of the promises to be borne on to Him whom now he sees not; there may be sublimer and more acceptable actings of a pure and strong faith than in moments which afford the soul a much more ranturous delight." This is the substance of what he says in the excellent letter. Some of the phrases made use of might not perhaps be intelligible to several of my readers, for which reason they are not all exactly transcribed; but this is plainly and fully his meaning, and most of the words are his own. The sentiment is surely very just and important; and happy would it be for many excellent persons, who, through wrong notions of the nature of faith (which was never more misrepresented than now among some), are perplexing themselves with groundless doubts and scruples, if it were more generally understood, admitted, and considered.

An endeared friend, who was most intimately conversant with the colonel during the last two years of his life, has favored me with an account of some little circumstances relating to him, which I esteem as precious fragments, by which the consistent tenor of his character may be further illustrated. I shall therefore insert them here, without being very solicitous as to the order in which they are introduced.

He perceived himself evidently in a very declining state from his first arrival in Britain, and seemed to entertain a fixed apprehension that he should continue but a little while longer in this life. " He expected death (says my good correspondent), and was delighted with the prospect," which did not grow less amiable by a nearer approach. The word of God, with which he had as intimate acquaintance as most men I ever knew, and on which, especially on the New Testament, I have heard him make many very judicious and accurate remarks, was still his daily study; and it furnished him with matter of conversation, much to the edification of those that were about him. It was recollected that among other passages he had lately spoken of the following, as having made a deep impression on his mind: "My soul, wait thou only upon God!" He would repeat it again and again, "only, only, only!" So plainly did he see, and so deeply did he feel, the vanity of creature-confidences and expectations. With the strongest attestation would be often mention those words in Isaiah, as verified by long experience: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on 111111111111111 thee, because he trusteth in thee." And with peculiar satisfaction would be atter those heroic words in Habakkuk, which he found of proof against every fear and contingency: "Though the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat, the flocks shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls, yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." The 145th Psalm was also spoken of by him with great delight, and Dr. Watts' version of it, as well as several other of that excellent person's poetical composures. My friend, who transmits to me this account, adds the following words, which I desire to insert with the deepest sentiments of unfeigned humility and self-abasement before God, as most unworthy the honor of contributing in the least degree to the joys and graces of one so much my superior in every part of the christian character: " As the joy, with which good men see the happy fruits of their labors, makes a part of the present reward of the servants of God, and the friends of Jesus, it must not be omitted, even in a letter to you, that your spiritual hymns were among the most delightful and soul-improving repasts; particularly those, on beholding transgressors with grief, and Christ's message." What is added, concerning my book of the Rise and Progress of Religion, and the terms in which he expressed his esteem for it, I cannot suffer to pass my pen; only desire most sincerely to bless God, that especially by the last chapters of that treatise I had an opportunity at so great a distance of exhibiting some offices of christian friendship to this excellent person in the closing scenes of life, which it would have been my greatest joy to have performed in person, had Providence permitted me then to have been near him.

The former of those hymns my correspondent mentions, as having been so agreeable to Colonel Gardiner, are given in the 112th page of this work. The latter, which is called Christ's message, took its rise from Luke iv. 18, and sequel, and is as follows:

Hark! the glad sound!

Hark! the glad sound! the Saviour comes, The Saviour promis'd long; Let ev'ry heart prepare a throne, And ev'ry voice a song.

II.

On him the Spirit largely pour'd, Exerts its sacred fire: Wisdom, and might, and zeal, and love, His holy breast inspire.

111.

He comes the pris'ners to release, In satan's bondage held: The gates of brass before him burst. The iron fetters yield.

IV

He comes from thickest films of vice
To clear the mental ray;
And on the eye-balls of the blind,
To your celestial day*.

30

He comes the broken heart to bind,
The bleeding soul to cure;
And with the treasures of his grace
T' eurich the humble poor.

VI.

His silver trumpets publish loud The jub'lee of the Lord; Our debts are all remitted now, Our heritage restor'd.

VII.

Our glad hosannas, Prince of Peace, Thy welcome shall proclaim; And heaven's eternal arches ring, With thy beloved name.

* This stanza is mostly borrowed from Mr. Pope.

There is one hymn more I shall beg leave to add, plain as it is, which Colonel Gardiner has been heard to mention with particular regard, as expressing the innost sentiments of his soul; and they were undoubtedly so in the last rational moments of his expiring life. It is called, Christ precious to the believer: and was composed to be sung after a sermon on I Peter ii. 7:

No. 4.

3.

Jesus! I love thy charming name,
'Tis music to my ear:
Fain would I sound it out so loud,
That earth and heaven should hear.

11.

Yes, thou art precious to my soul, My transport and my trust; Jewels to thee are gaudy toys, And gold is sordid dust.

TIT.

All my capacious powers can wish, In thee most richly meet: Nor to my eye is life so dear, Nor friendship half so sweet.

IV.

Thy grace still dwells upon my heart, And sheds its fragrance there? The noblest balm of all its wounds, The cordial of its care.

I'll speak the honors of thy name With my last lab'ring breath; Then speechless clasp thee in my arms, The autitode of death.

Those who were intimate with Colones Gardiner must have observed how readily he was to give a devotional turn to any subject that occurred. And in particular the spiritual and heavenly disposition of his soul, discovered itself in the reflections and improvements which he made when reading history; in which he took a great deal of pleasure, as persons remarkable for their knowledge of mankind, and observation of Providence, generally do. There is an instance of this before me, which, though too natural to be at all surprising, will doubtless be pleasing to the devout mind. He had just been reading in Rollin's extract from Xenophon the answer which the lady of Tigranes made, when all the company were extolling Cyrus, and expressing the admiration with which his appearance and behaviour struck them: the question being asked her, what she thought of him? she answered, I don't know; I did not observe him. On what then, said one of the company, did you fix your attention? On him, replied she, (referring to the generous speech which her husband had just made,) who said he would give a thousand lives to ransom my liberty. "Oh, (cried the colonel, when reading it,) how ought we to fix our eyes and hearts on Him who, not in offer, but in reality, gave his own precious life to ransom us from the most dreadful slavery, and from eternal destruction!" But this is only one instance among a thousand. His heart was habitually set upon Divine things; and he had such a permanent and overflowing sense of the love of Christ, that he could not forbear connecting such reflections with a multitude of more distant occasions occurring in daily life, where less advanced christians would not have thought of them: and thus, like our great Master, he made every little incident a source of devotion, and an instrument of holy zeal.

Enfeebled as his constitution was, he was still intent on improving his time to some valuable purposes; and when his friends expostulated with him, that he gave his body so little rest, he used to answer, " It will rest long enough in the grave."

The July before his death, he was persuaded to take a journey to Scarborough for the recovery of his health; from which he was at least encouraged to expect some little revival. After this he had thoughts of going to London, and designed to have spent part of September at Northampton. The expectation of this was mutually agreeable: but Providence thought fit to disconcert the scheme. His love for his friends in these parts occasioned him to express some regret on his being commanded back: and I am pretty confident, from the manner in which he expressed himself in one of his last letters to me, that he had some more important reasons for wishing an opportunity of making a London journey just at that crisis; which, as the reader will remember, was before the rebellion broke out: but as Providence determined it otherwise, he acquiesced; and I am well satisfied, that could he have distinctly foreseen the approaching event, so far as it concerned his own person, he would have esteemed it the happiest summons he ever received. While he was at Scarborough, I find by a letter dated from thence, July 26th, 1745, that he had been informed of the gaiety which so unseasonably prevailed at Edinburgh, where great multitudes were then spending their time in balls, assemblies, and other gay amusements, little mindful of the rod of God which was then hanging over them: on which occasion he hath this expression, "I am greatly surprised that the people of Edinburgh should be employed in such foolish diversions when our situation is at present more melancholy than ever I saw it in my life. But there is one thing which I am very sure of that comforts me, viz. that it shall go well with the righteous, come what will."

Quickly after his return home the flame burst out, and his regiment was ordered to Stirling. It was in the eastle there that his lady and eldest daughter enjoyed the last happy hours of his company; and, I think, it was about eight or ten days before his death that he parted from them there, A remarkable circumstance attended that parting, which hath been touched upon by 166 surviving friends in more than one of their letters to me. His lady was so affected when she took her last leave of him, that she could not forbear bursting out into a flood of tears, with other marks of unusual emotion. And when he asked her the reason, she urged the apprehension she had of losing such an invaluable friend amidst the dangers to which he was then called out as a very sufficient apology. Upon which she took particular notice, that whereas he had generally comforted her on such occasions, by pleading with her that remarkable hand of Providence which had so frequently in former instances been exerted for his preservation, and that in the greatest extremity, he said nothing of it now, but only replied, in his sententious manner, "We have an eternity to spend together."

That heroic contempt of death, which had offen discovered itself in the midst of former dangers, was manifested now in his discourse with several of his most intimate friends. I have reserved for this place one genuine expression of it many years before, which I thought might be mentioned with some advantage here. About July, 1725, he had been sent to some place, not far from Hamilton, to quell a mutiny among some of our troops: I know not the particular occasion; but I remember to have hear I him mention it as so ferce a one, that he scarce ever apprehended himself in a more hazardous circumstance. Yet he quelled it by his presence alone, and the expostulations he used, evidently putting his life into their hands to do it. The particulars of the story struck me much; but I do not exactly remember them as to venture to relate them here. I only observe that in a letter now before me, dated the 16th of July, of that year, and which evidently refers to this event, he writes thus: I have been very busy, hurried about from place to place; but, blessed be God, all is over without bloodshed. And pray let me ask. What made you shew so much concern for me in your last? were you afraid I should get to heaven before you? or can any evil befal those who are followers of that which is good?"

And as these were his sentiments in the vigor of his days, so neither did declining years, and the infirmities of a broken constitution, on the one hand, or any desires of enjoying the honors and profits of so high a station, or, what was much more to him, the converse of the most affectionate of wives, and so many amiable children and friends, on the other, enervate his spirits in the least; but as he had in former years often expressed it to me and several others, as his desire, "That if it were the will of God, he might have some honorable call to sacrifice his life in defence of religion and the liberties of his country:" so when it appeared to him most probable that he might be called to it immediately, he met the summons with the greatest readiness. This appears in part from a letter which he wrote to the Rev. Mr. Adams, of Falkirk, just as he was on marching from Stirling, which was only eight days before his death: "The rebels," says he, " are advancing to cross the Frith; but I trust in the Almighty God, who doth whatsoever he pleases in the armies of heaven, and with the inhabitants of the earth." And the same gentleman tells me, that a few days after the date of this he marched through Falkirk with his regiment; and though he was then in so languishing a state, that he needed his assistance as a secretary to write for some reinforcements, which might put it in his power to make a stand, as he was very desirous to have done, he expressed a most genuine and noble contempt of life, when to be exposed in the defence of a worthy

These sentiments wrought in him to the last in the most effectual manner; and he seemed for a while to have infused them into the regiment which he commanded: for they expressed such a spirit in their marching from Stirling, that I am assured the colonel was obliged to exert all his authority to prevent their making incursions on the rebel army, which then lay very near them: and had it been thought proper to send him the reinforcements he requested, none can say what the consequence might have been; but he was ordered to march as fast as possible, to meet Sir John Cope's forces at Dunbar, which he did: and that hasty retreat, in concurrence with the news they soon after received of the surrender of Edinburgh to the rebels, either by the treachery or weakness of a few, in opposition to the judgment of by far the greater and better part of the inhabitants, struck a panic into both the regiments of dragoons, which became visible in some very apparent and remarkable circumstances in their behaviour. This affected Col. Gardiner so much, that, on the Thursday before the fatal action at Preston-Pans, he intimated · to an officer of considerable rank and note, that he expected what the event would be, as in fact it was. In this view, there is all imaginable reason to believe he had formed his resolution as to his own personal conduct; which was, "that he would not, in case of the flight of those under his command, retreat with them;" by which, as it seemed, he was reasonably apprehensive he might have stained the honor of his former services, and have given occasion for the enemy to have spoken reproachfully. He much rather chose, if Providence gave him the call, to leave in his death an example of fidelity and bravery, which might very probably be (as in fact it seems indeed to have been) of much greater service than in the days of remaining life he could expect to render it. I conclude these to have been his views, not only from what was known of his general character and temper, but likewise from some intimations which he gave to a very worthy person from Edinburgh, who visited him the day before the action; to whom he said, "I cannot influence the conduct of others as I could wish, but I have one life to sacrifice to my country's safety, and that shall not be spared;" or words to that effect.

There have been such a multitude of inconsistent reports of the circumstances of Colonel Gardiner's death, that there was reason almost to despair of my being able to give the reader any particular satisfaction concerning so interesting a scene; but by a happy accident I have very lately had an opportunity of being exactly informed of the whole, by that brave man Mr. John Forster, his faithful servant (worthy the honor of serving such a master), whom I had seen with him at my house some years before. He attended him in his last hours, and gave me the narration at large; which he would be ready, if it were requisite, to attest upon oath. From his mouth I wrote it down with the utmost exactness, and could easily believe, from the genuine and affectionate manner in which he related the particulars, that, according to his own expression, "his eye and his heart were continually upon his honored master during the whole time.

On Friday, September the 20th, (the day before the battle which transmitted him to his immortal crown,) when the whole army was drawn up about noon, the colonel rode through all the ranks of his own regiment, addressing them at once in the most respectful and animating manner, both as soldiers and christians, to engage them to exert themselves courageously in the service of their country, and to neglect nothing that might have a tendency to prepare them for whatsoever event might happen. They seemed much affected with the address, and expressed a very ardent desire of attacking the enemy immediately; a desire in which he and another very gallant officer of dis-tinguished rank, dignity, and character, both for bravery and conduct, would gladly have gratified them with, if it had been in the power of either. He earnestly pressed it on the commanding-officer, both as the soldiers were then in better spirits than it could be supposed they would be after passing the night under arms; and also, as the circumstance of making an attack would be some encouragement to them, and probably some terror to the enemy, who would have had the disadvantage of standing on the defence; a disadvantage with which those wild barbarians (for such most of them were) perhaps would have been more struck than better disciplined troops, especially when they fought against the laws of their country too. He also apprehended, that by marching to meet them, some advantage might have been secured with regard to the ground; with which it is natural to imagine he must have been perfectly acquainted, as it lay just at his own door, and had rode over it so many hundred times. When mentioning these things, I do not pretend to be capable of judging how far this advice was, on the whole, right. A variety of circumstances, to me unknown, might make it otherwise. It is certain, however, that it was brave. But it was over-ruled in this respect, as it also was in the disposition of the cannon, which he would have planted in the centre of our army, rather than just before his regiment, which was in the right wing; where he was apprehensive that the horses, which had not been in an engagement be-fore, might be thrown into some disorder by the discharge so very near them. He urged this the more, as he thought the attack of the rebels might probably be made in the centre of the foot, where he knew there were some brave men, on whose standing he thought, under God, the success of the day depended. When he found that he could not carry either of these points, nor some others, which, out of regard to the common safety, he insisted upon with some unusual carnestness, he dropped some intimations of the consequences which he apprehended, and which did in fact follow; and submitting to Providence, he spent the remainder of the day in making as good a disposition as circumstances would allow.

He continued all night under arms, wrapped up in his cloak, and generally sheltered under a rick of barley which happened to be in the field. About three in the morning he called his domestic servants to him, of which there were four of them in waiting. He dismissed three of them with the most affectionate christian advice, and such solemn charges relating to the performance of their duty and the care of their souls, as seemed plainly to intimate that he apprehended it, at least very probable, he was taking his last farewel of them. There is great reason to believe that he spent the little remainder of the time, which could not be much above an hour, in those devout exercises of soul which had so long been habitual to him, and to which so many circumstances did then concur to call him. The army was alarmed by break of day by the noise of the rebels' approach, and the attack was made before sun-rise, yet when it was light enough to discern what passed. As soon as the enemy came within gun-shot they made a furious fire, and it is said that the dragoons which constituted the left wing immediately fled. The colonel at the beginning of the onset, which in the whole lasted but a few minutes, received a wound by a bullet in his left breast, which made him give a sudden spring in his saddle; upon which his servant, who had led the horse, would have persuaded him to retreat; but he said it was only a wound in the flesh, and fought on, though he presently after received a wound in the thigh. In the meantime it was discerned that some of the enemy fell by him; and particularly one man, who had made him a treacherous visit but a few days before, with great professions of zeal for the present establishment.

Events of this kind pass in less time than the description of them can be written, or than it can be read. The colonel was for a few moments supported by his men, and particularly by that worthy person Lieut.-Colonel Whitney, who was shot through the arm here, and a few months after fell nobly in the battle of Falkirk; and by

Lieutenant West, a man of distinguished bravery; as also by about fifteen dragoons, who stood by him to the last. But after a faint fire the regiment in general was seized with a panic; and though their colonel and some other gallant officers did what they could to rally them once or twice, they at last took a precipitate flight: and just in the moment when Colonel Gardiner seemed to make a pause, to deliberate what duty required him to do in such a circumstance, an accident happened, which must, I think, in the judgment of every worthy and generous man, be allowed a sufficient apology for exposing his life to so great a hazard, when his regiment had left him. He saw a party of the foot, who were then bravely fighting near him, and whom he was ordered to support, had no officer to head them; upon which he said eagerly, in the hearing of the person from whom I had this account, "Those brave fellows will be cut to pieces for want of a commander;" or words to that effect: which while he was speaking, he rode up to them, and cried aloud, "Fire on, my lads; and fear nothing!" But just as the words were out of his mouth, a highlander advanced towards him with a scythe fastened to a long pole, with which he gave him a deep wound on his right arm, that his sword dropped out of his hand; and at the same time several others coming about him while he was thus dreadfully entangled with that most cruel weapon, he was dragged off from his horse, The moment he fell, another highlander, who, if the king's evidences at Carlisle may be credited (as I know not why they should not, though the unhappy creature died denying it,) was one Macnaught, who was executed about a year after, gave him a stroke either with a broad-sword or a Lockaber-axe, (for my informant could not exactly distinguish,) on the hinder part of his head, which was the mortal blow. All that his faithful attendant saw farther at this time was, that as his hat was falling off he took it into his left hand, and waved it as a signal for him to retreat; and added what were the last words he ever heard him speak,-" Take care of yourself!" upon which the servant retired.

It was reported at Edinburgh on the day of the battle, by what seemed a considerable authority, that as the colonel laid in his wounds, he said to a chief of the opposite side, "You are fighting for an earthly crown; I am going to receive an heavenly one!" or something to that purpose. When I preached the sermon, long since printed, on occasion of his death, I had great reason to believe this report was true, though before the publication of it I began to be in doubt; and on the whole, after the most strict enquiry I could possibly make at this distance, I cannot get any convincing evidence of it. Yet I must here observe, that it does not appear impossible that something of this kind might indeed be uttered by him, as his servant testifies that he spoke to him after receiving that fatal blow, which would seem most likely to have taken away the power of speech: and it is certain he lived several hours after he fell. If therefore any thing of this kind did happen, it must have been just about this instant. But as to the story of his being taken prisoner, and carried to the pretended prince, (who by the way afterwards rode his horse, and entered upon it into Derby,) with several circumstances which were grafted upon that interview, there is the most undoubted evidence of its falsehood: for his attendant mentioned above assures me, that he himself immediately fled to a mill, at the distance of about two miles from the spot of ground on which the colonel fell, where he changed his dress, and, disguised like a miller's servant, returned with a cart as soon as possible, which yet was not till near two hours after the engagement. The hurry of the action was then pretty well over, and he found his much-honored master, not only plundered of his watch and other things of value, but also stripped of his upper garments and boots; yet still

breathing: and adds, that though he were not capable of speech, yet, on taking him up, he opened his eyes; which makes it something questionable whether he was altogether insensible. In this condition, and in this manner, he conveyed him to the church of Tranent, from whence he was immediately taken into the minister's house, and laid in bed, where he continued breathing, and frequently groaning, till about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, when he took his final leave of pain and sorrow, and undoubtedly rose to those distinguished glories which are reserved for those who have been so eminently and remarkably

From the moment in which he fell, it was no longer a battle, but a rout and carnage. The cruelties which the rebels (as it is generally said, under the command of Lord Elcho.) inflicted on some of the king's troops, after they had asked quarter, were dreadfully legible on the countenances of many who survived it. They entered Col. Gardiner's house before he was carried off from the field; and, notwithstanding the strict orders which the unhappy Duke of Perth (whose conduct is said to have been very humane in many instances.) gave to the contrary, every thing of value was plundered, to the very curtains of the beds and hangings of the rooms. His papers were all thrown into the wildest disorder, and his house made an hospital for the reception of those who were wounded in the action.

Such was the close of a life which had been so zealously devoted to God, and filled up with so many honorable services. This was the death of him who had been so highly favored by God, in the method by which he was brought back to him after so long and so great an estrangement, and in the progress of so many years, during which (in the expressive phrase of the most antient writers,) he had walked with him: to fall as God threatened the people of his wrath they should die, "with tumult, with shouting, and with the sound of the trumpet," Amos ii. 2. Several other very worthy, and some of them very eminent persons, shared the same fate, either now in the battle of Preston-Pans, or quickly after in that of Falkirk: Providence, no doubt, permitting it, to establish our faith in the rewards of an invisible world, as well as to teach us to cease from man, and fix our dependance on an Almighty arm.

The remains of this christian hero (as I believe every reader is now convinced he may justly be called) were interred the Tuesday following, September 24, at the parish-church of Trenant, where he had usually attended Divine service with great solemnity. His obsequies were honored with the presence of some persons of distinction, who were not afraid of paying that last piece of respect to his memory, though the country was then in the hands of the enemy. But, indeed, there was no great hazard in this; for his character was so well known, that even they themselves spoke honorably of him, and seemed to join with his friends in lamenting the fall of so brave and worthy a man.

The remotest posterity will remember for whom the honor of subduing this unnatural and pernicious rebellion was reserved; and it will endear the person of the illustrious Duke of Cumberland to all but the open or secret abettors of it in the present age, and consecrate his name to immortal honors among all the friends of religion and liberty who shall rise after us. And I dare say it will not be imagined that I at all derogate from his glory, in suggesting that the memory of that valiant and excellent person, whose memoirs are now concluding, may in some measure have contributed to that signal and complete victory with which God was pleased to crown the arms of his Royal Highness: for the force of such an example is very animating, and a painful consciousness of having deserted such a commander, in such extremity, must at least awaken, where there was any spark of generosity, an earnest desire to revenge his death on those who had sacrificed his blood, and that of so many other excellent persons, to the views of their ambition, rapine or birectry.

rapine, or bigotry. The reflections made in my funeral sermon on my honored friend, and in the dedication of it to his worthy and most afflicted lady, supercede many things which might otherwise have properly been added here. I conclude, therefore, with humbly acknowledging the wisdom and goodness of that awful Providence, which drew so thick a gloom around him in the last hours of his life, that the lustre of his virtues might dart through it with a more vivid and observable ray. It is abundant matter of thankfulness, that so signal a monument of grace, and such an ornament of the christian profession, was raised in our age and country, and spared for so many honorable and useful years. Nor can all the tenderness of the most affectionate friendship, while its sorrows bleed afresh in the view of so tragical a scene, prevent my adoring the gracious appointment of the great Lord of all events, that when the day in which he must have expired without an enemy appeared so very near, the last ebb of his generous blood should be poured out as a kind of sacred libation to the liberties of his country, and the honors of his God! that all the other virtues of his character, embalmed as it were by that precious stream, might diffuse around a more extensive fragrancy, and be transmitted to the most remote posterity with that peculiar charm which they cannot but derive from their connection with so gallant a fall; an event (as that apostle, of whose spirit he so deeply drank, has expressed it,) according to his earnest expectation, and his hope that in him Christ might be glorified in all things, whether by his life or by his death.

In the midst of so many more important articles, I had really forgot to say any thing of the person of Col. Gardiner, of which, nevertheless, it may be proper here to add a word or two. He was, as I am informed, in younger life remarkably graceful and amiable; and I can easily believe it, from what I knew him to be when our acquaintauce began, though he was then turned of fifty, and had gone through so many fatigues as well as dangers, which could not but leave some traces on his countenance. He was tall, (I suppose something more than six feet,) well proportioned, and strongly built; his eyes of a dark grey, and not very large; his forehead pretty high; his nose of a length and height no way remarkable, but very well suited to his other features; his cheeks not very prominent, his mouth moderately large, and his chin rather a little inclining (when I sins can rather a rate infining constant in the knew him) to be peaked. He had a strong voice, and lively accent, with an air very intrepid, yet attempered with much gentleness; and there was something in his manner of address more perfectly easy and obliging, which was in a great measure the result of the great candour and benevolence of his natural temper, and which no doubt was much improved by the deep humility which Divine grace had wrought into his heart, as well as his having been accustomed from his early youth to the company of persons of distinguished rank and polite behaviour. The celebrated Mons, Faubert himself has spoken of him as one of the best horsemen that has ever been known; and there was indeed something so singularly graceful in his appearance in that attitude, that it was sufficient (as what is very eminent in its kind generally is,) to strike an eye not formed on any critical rules.
