PREFACE.

IN submitting the following Treatise on Draughts to the notice of the public, the Author does not feel as if any elaborate apology were necessary for doing so. The merits of the Game itself, the extent to which it is practised, and the absolute want of a variety of sterling works on the subject, might well justify a new and extended treatise, emanating from one who can boast of the lengthened experience and comparative success in play, which the author of this work is enabled to do.

In regard to the Game itself, all who are in the least acquainted with it, will at once acknowledge its peculiar adaptation as a domestic amusement, to answer the beneficent purposes which such curious inventions seem intended to subserve. Though wanting in the beautiful variety and interesting complexity of the kindred game of Chess, it is not without certain other advantages that may go far to countervail. The simplicity of its rules is such that the most moderate capacity may acquire, with suddenness and ease, a degree of knowledge of the game, sufficient to stimulate and entice the learner to greater proficiency. Nor can this simplicity be justly charged against the game, so long as there is afforded ample scope for the most profound calculation, as well as excitement for the most listless imbecility. The Author may, not unjustly perhaps, be suspected of undue partiality for his favourite game; but, granting only what few will deny, the legitimacy of such means of mental recreation, he humbly conceives that the game of Draughts is highly deserving of encouragement as peculiarly if not exclusively adapted to a large class of persons indeed. Of many of those who are numbered amongst its enthusiastic admirers, it is not too much to affirm that had they not been made acquainted with so congenial a pastime they would have been found resorting to no other. It would be difficult indeed, to invent a domestic amusement possessed of equal advantages. It is at once peaceful and exciting; simple and abstruse. It is suited alike to childhood and to old age, as well as to the vigour of manhood. It can suffuse with pleasurable excitement, the most phlegmatic temperament; and at the same time is so opposed to turbulence and strife as to be perfectly consistent with female delicacy.

But it is possible to conceive without any violent stretch of the fancy, that, even in a moral and intellectual point of view, the merits of this curious game are not made up of mere negations. It is certain that the habits and qualities that are requisite for the chequered board are exactly those that are needed in the chequered scenes of life. The learner will soon find that to cope successfully with others, he must acquire the hardy habits of self-reliance and patient investigation. He may learn after many an evolution, a pointed moral, from the disastrous consequences that often result from even a momentary want of caution; and his stoicism will sometimes be put to the proof, when he is suffering the ridicule occasioned by the exposure of an unworthy stratagem.

It may appear somewhat strange that a game so ancient, so widely practised, and accompanied with so many recommendations, should have had so little done for its fuller developement by means of published treatises. This of course can only be accounted for by the rare combination, in a high degree, of perspicacity, study and experience, which can alone justify any one in assuming to himself the responsibility of dictating on so abstruse a subject. But without making any disparaging remarks on the labours of others, and therefore passing over some minor works, the Author is anxious to express his obligations to the excellent treatise of JOSHUA STURGES. Some of the games of this Author are so excellent that nothing is left to be desired; but of the remainder it must be admitted that while some of them lead to weak and erroneous conclusions, a greater number of them exhibit so much timidity in their design and execution, that it may be said, their only merit is that they are without fault, and their fault is that they are without merit. The best of Sturges' games however, will be found embodied in the following work; but even these are in almost every case accompanied with new and striking variations. Indeed, it has been the Author's aim from the first to render his work as original as possible, that for once, the making up of a book on draughts may not be like the making up of drugs, merely pouring out of one vessel into another. But in regard to the merits of his work generally, it would not be becoming in him to speak. This however he may say, that his experience in play has been very great in that part of Scotland where the game is most successfully practised; and the oldest of his games, having stood the test of many years, may be recognised by some as those that contributed so much to the almost unbroken uniformity of his success. And even the games that may be considered as new, he hopes will be found in no way deficient; no labour and pains having been spared to render them worthy. He therefore submits the work to the candid public desirating on his own part, a thorough examination of his games, convinced that he has more to fear from the superficial critic than from the accomplished player. In fine he will rest satisfied if, to any considerable extent he may be found to have presented the game with new attractions and invested it with new interest either to the young learner or to the old connoisseur..

GENERAL REMARKS.

To know in any situation whether you have the move, you may count the men and the squares, and if the men are even and the squares odd, or the men odd and the squares even and your turn to play, you have the move. For example, place on the board, on square 32 a White man, on square 4 a Black man; count the squares from 8 to 27; they are 6, which is even and the men are odd. Black playing first has the move. But place on squares 1 and 4 black men,; on squares 32 and 30 white men, black playing first has not the move, because the men and squares are both even. This rule holds whatever the number of men; but when there are many it signifies very little whether you have the move or not in most cases. Sometimes having the move is a disadvantage as when some of the men are forced into a position in which they cannot be played. However it is frequently a great advantage to have the move, when there are few men on the board. It has never been the author's practice to employ the above rule nor indeed any other for finding the move; he merely glances from one side to the other comparing the position of the men and finds it easy to ascertain the move.

It is a mistaken notion with most players that giving man for man changes the move. In certain circumstances it invariable does of course. But place a black man on square 8, a black king on square 26, a white king on square 7, a white king on 10; white plays, 7, 11, black takes from 8 to 15, white from 10 to 19 and gains the move. Thus lifting a man and putting it in for your opponent to take gains the move at all times. But again, place a black man on square 6, a black king on 22, a white man on 15, a white king on 5; in this position black wants the move. Play 22.18, white 5. 1, black 18.11, white 1.10, and black still wants the move. Let black play 22.18, white 15.11, black 18.15 white 5. 1, black 15. 8, white 1.10, black 8.11, and black has now the move. Thus it is that the move is won and lost alternately.

VII.

The Author thinks it superfluous to give directions for playing. He takes it for granted that all who seek to gain advantage from a book on draughts, will have got acquainted with the mode of playing the men, by some other means. The black men are generally placed upon the first twelve squares and the white on the last twelve. But the player may count the squares from either side as suits himself best. It will be seen from the diagram how the squares are numbered, In regard to the variations it will be understood that A carries to A and B to B, and so on.

RULES OF THE GAME.

1. The first move to be taken by each player alternately.
2. Pointing over the Board, or in any way interrupting your adversary from having a full view of the men, is not allowed.
3. When it is your turn to play, if you delay longer than three minutes, your adversary may call upon you to move; and when so called upon, should you delay five minutes longer you will be adjudged to have lost the Game.
4. The Men may be properly placed upon the Squares in any part of the Game, provided you intimate your intention to your adversary; but after being so placed, whichever player touches a man, must move it somewhere, if practicable; and if the man so moved has been visibly over the angle separating the squares the party is playing from and to, that move must be completed.
5. While a Match or Game is pending, neither party must quit during the time previously agreed upon, without his adversary's consent, under the penalty of losing the Match.
6. When you move for the purpose of giving man for man, if your adversary neglect to take your man, he must stand the huff,—viz: you remove from the board the man with which your adversary might have taken yours; or if you see it is more to your advantage you can compel him to take it.
7. The act of Huffing is not reckoned as a move.

END OF THE GAMES.

CRITICAL POSITIONS.

A great number of the most useful Critical Positions are introduced in the finishing of the foregoing Games. The following seldom occur in playing a Game. The figures having a line down the centre, show the position of the men before commencing to play; those under, point out the movements to be made. The figures marked with a star are Kings. The letters b and w signify Black and White Men.
