KING of SWEDEN.

BOOK I.

HARLES XII. King of Sweden, a man the notic extraordinary, perhaps, that ever appeared in the world, was born June 27. 1632. Il the grent qualities of his anceflors were united in tim; nor bal he may other fault or misfortune, but hat he carried them beyond all bounds.

At fix years old he'ms taken from the women, and nut under the utilion of Yt., de Nordwopenfer, a wife and underflauding man. The first book he was made o read was Pull'indorf's introduction to the billory of Europe, that he might be foon made acquainted with his own dominions, and tho'ted his meighbours. He then learn the German language, which he ever litter fooke as well as his mother tongue. At even uter the could manage a harder, and the violent excercises he delighted in, and which diffeovered his neclinations to war, lud early no foundation of a viporous conflictution, which enabled him to fupport the fastgues his temper led him to underge.

Though good natured in his infincy, he difcoveed an invincible obfinacy; the only way to gain upon him was to touch upon his honour; if they named but glory, they could get any thing from him. If, had a great averlion to learning of Latin; but whe' they told him that the kings of Poland and Denmariunderflood it, he foon applied himfelf to it, and retained fo much of it, as to be able to talk it all the zeft of his life. They endesvoured to engage him tu learn French after the fame manner; but he could no be prevailed upon, fo long as he lived, ever to make whe of it, not even with the French embalfadors whe wanderflood no other language.

they made him read Quintus Curtius; and he took fancy to that book, which the fubject infpired him with rather than the ftyle. The perfon who explained this author to him, having afked him what he thought of Alexander, I think, fays the prince, that nwould be like him : But, fays the other, be lived bu. two und thirty years. Ab ! replies he, and is not that enough, when one has conquered kingdoms? They did not fail to carry thefe answers to the king his father who upon hearing them would cry out, this child will excel me, and even go beyond the great Gultavus. One day he was diverting himfelf in the king' apartment with looking upon two plans, the one of a town in Hungary, taken by the Turks, from the emperor, and the other of Riga the capital of Livonia. a province conquered by the Swedes about a century ago Under the plan of the town of Hungary were the ewords taken from the book of Job, The Lord be the name of the Lord. The young prince, upon reading this, ftrait took a pencil, and wrote under the plan of Riga, The Lord hath given it to mex and the devil [hall not take it from me. Thus in the most indifferent actions of his childhood, fome little traces of his refolute difpolition would often fall from him, which di covered what he would one day be. He was eleven years old when he loft his mother ric Eleonora, dasphere of Frederick III, King of mmark, a princels of great virtue, and worby of mater confidence than her hulband repold in her, His father Charles XI. died within four years after ty on the style of April 1697, in the forty fecond ar of his age, and the thirty faventh of his reign. He left to his fon, then fifteen years old, a throne used and refpected abroad; fubjects poor, but vane and loyal; a treatury in good order, and manad by able minitters.

Charles XII. upon his coming to the crown, not ly found himfelf abfolute and undifturbed matter of eden and Finland, but alfo of Livonia, Carelia, d Ingria ; he was farther poffelled of Wilmar, Wiurg, the illes of Rugen, Oefel, and the molt beattal part of Pomerania, with the dutchy of Bremen d Verden, all the conquelts of his anceftors, and nured to the crown by long possession, and the foon treaties of Munfter and Oliva, fupported by the gun under the direction of the father, was conclud under that of the fon; and he found himfelf the metor of Europe, from the momenthe began to reign. The laws of Sweden fix the majority of their kings the age of fifteen years. But Charles XI. who was will, till he fhould come to be eighteen; and by is difpolition he favoured the ambitious views of is mother Eduiga Eleonora of Hölltein, the dowaof Charles X. who was appointed by the king ber a, to be guardian to the young king her grandfon. I regent of the kingdom, in conjunction with a uncil of five perfons.

One day in the month of November, the fame year in his futher died, when he had been taking a retwo f fordral regiments, and Piper the counfellor of re flood by him, the king appeared quite loff in a sth of hought. That I take the hearty, fays Piper to him, of afking your majefty upon what it is that yo thoughts are fo feriously imployed? Lamthinking, answer the king, that I am capable of commanding thefe, bra fellows yonder, and don't care that either they, or should receive orders from a woman. Piper immediate laid hold of the opportunity of railing his fortune, a knowing his own interest fufficient to venture on dangerous an enterprize, as removing the queen frc. the regency, and haltening the king's majority, man of fpirit, and fought to make himfelf confiderab he flattered him with the thought of being made t king's confident, which Sparre very eafily believed, to the whole upon himfelf, and laboured for none but I per. The counfellors of the regency were foon draw into the scheme, and hastily proceeded to the execuon of it, that they might thereby the more readily r commend themfelves to the king's efteem.

They went in a body to propofe it to the quee who did not in the least expect fuch a declaratio fellors of the regency laid the matter before then They were all unanimous in their approbation, an the point was carried with a rapidity, that nothin could withitand; fo that Charles XII. did but with reign, and in three days the flates conferred the g verament upon him. The queen's power and interfell in an inftant, and the afterwards led a private lit which was more fuitable to her age, though lefs her humour. The king was crowned on the 24th Décember following. He made his entry into Stoc holm upon a forrel horfe, fhod with filver, having sceptre in his hand, and a crown upon his head, amis the acclamations of a whole people, adorers of eve novelty, and forming to menifelves great expediat nly privilege remaining to him among fo many as rere claimed by his predeceffors. After having anoined the king according to cultom, whill he was holding the crown in his hands, in order to put it upon if head, Charles fnatched it haftly from the archhihop, and crowned himfelf, looking fternly all the while pon the poor prelate. The crowd, who are always mfly impoled on by an air of grandeur, applicated his action of the king. Even thofe who had growtee uolt under the tyranny of the father, were betrayed mothe tolly of praifing in the fon that ftern behaviur which was the prelage of their flavery.

As foon as Charle's walk come the malfer of the goeramment, he gave his set and the management of afmirs to coundellor Piper, who was in reality his first minilter, though he wanted the name. He foon after treated him a count, which is a dignity of great emitence in Sweden, and not an empty title, to be taken ap without any confequence.

The beginning of the king's adminifestion did not tifte any favourable ideas of him; he feemed to be more impatient after rule, than deferving of it. He and indeed no dangerous pation; but there was nofung to be obferved in his conduct, except the tranports of youth and oblinney. He appeared proud duct arcelief of bolinels. Even the embalindors who relided at his court, took him for a perfon of a mean apacity, and repredented hims sloch to their andlers. The Swedes had entertained the fame opinion of him herdfeven, for that no one as yet knew his real chaacter; he was not even acquainted with it him(if, sin he florms, which all at nore were gathering in the Yourh, furrified him with an opportunity of difulaying thole great talents which as yet thay concelled.

Three powerful princes taking the advantage of is youth, configured his ruin almost at the same inant. The first was Frederick IV. King of Denmark, is coutin; the second Augustus, Elector of Saxony, and the king of Poland: Peter the great, Czar o Mufeovy was the third and the moft dangerous.

Thefe then were the enemies which were preparing all together to fall upon the infancy of Charles XII

The while rs of the te preparations alarmed the king's council, and they deliberated upon them in his prefence; and fome of them were proposing to diver the form by negotiations. Charlessifing from his feat with an air of pravity and refolution, Centlegen, flay he, I am refoleed near to enter upon an unjuft war, nor put an each of a juft are but by the deliration of an enmies. My refolution is fixed. I studies a state the frifwake flad declare againf me, and when I have congured him, may hope to firthe a terror into the ref. Thefewords altonihed all the old councilors, they looked upon one souther without daving to reply, and at laft, althaned to hope lefs than their king, they received his orders for the war with admiration.

They were fill more furprized, when they faw himm of a fudden renounce all the most innocent amusements of youth. From the moment he prepared for the war, he entered upon a new courfe of life, from which he never after departed in one fingle particular. Full of the idea of Alexander and Caefar, he propofed to imitate those two conquerors in every thing but their vices. .He no more admired magnificence, sports, and recreations; he reduced his table to the utmost frugality. He had been fond of gajety and drefs. but was ever after clad like a common foldier. They had fulpected him of having entertained a paffion for a lady of his court; but whether the fulpicion was just or no, 'tis certain he renounced all conversation with the women for ever after; not only through fear of becoming a flave to them, but to give the foldiers an verest difcipline; or it may be, through the vanity of being the fole prince who knew how to suppress an inclination fo difficult to be conquered. He determiand allo to ablain from wine all the refl of his life; and, as has been pretended, to pointh hindlef for an excefs, which, as they fay, led hum into the commiffion of fome irregularities: nothing is more ablofute of a substantiation of the substantiation of the orget the mallery over his realon, but it over-heated is conflictuion, which was awremough already; he foon after left off beer too, and confined himfelf to are water. Biddes, fobriery was a virue till then unknown in the North, and he was defineus of being anded to the Swedes in every particular.

He began with affuring his brother-in law the duke of Holftein, of affiftance. Eight thousand men were mmediately fent into Pomerania, a province not far rom Holftein, to ftrengthen the duke against the atacks of the Danes. And the duke indeed had need If them. His dominions were already ravished, the afile of Gottorp taken, and the town of Tonningen sreffed by a clofe Gege, to which the king of Denmark was come in perfon, to enjoy a conquest he thought reure. This fmall fpark began to inflame the empire. On one fide the Saxon troops of the king of Poland, hofe of Brandenburg, Wolfembuttle, and Heffe Cafel, marched to join the Danes. On the other, the ing of Sweden's eight thousand men, the troops of Ianover and Zell, and three Dutch regiments went p affift the duke. Whilft the little country of Holftein ras thus made the theatre of the war, two fquadrons, he one from England, and the other from Holland, ppeared in the Baltick. Thefe two effates were guaintees of the treaty of Altena, which the Dattes had roken: they were eager to relieve the oppreffed duke. ecaufe the interest of their trade was incompatible ith the growing power of the king of Denmark. hey knew the Dane, if he was once maffer of the palnge of the Sound, would be tempted to impofe hard riws on the trading nation, fhould he ever be firong aough to do it with fafety. And this reafon has long engaged the English and Dutch, as much as possible hold the ballance even between the princes of th North. They joined themfelves to the young king Sweden, who feemed ready to be crushed by fo mar enemies, united together against him, and fuccoure him for the fame reafons the others fell upon him, be caufe they thought him incapable of defending him felf. In the mean time Charles fet out for his first cam paign on the 8th of May new ftyle in the year 1700 He left Stockholm, and never after returned thither An immense body of people attended him as far as Ca relfcroon, offering up their prayers for him, and bun fling into tears of admiration. Before he left Sweder he eftablished at Stockholm a council of defence, mad up of feveral fenators. This commiffion was to take care of all that regarded the fleet, the troops and forti fications of the country. The body of the fenate way to regulate every thing belides provisionally within the kingdom. Having thus fettled order and regularit in his dominions, his mind, now free from every a ther care, was bent wholly upon the war. His fleet con filted of three and forty veffels, that which carried him named the king Charles, and the biggeft they had even feen. was a thip of an hundred and twenty guns count Piper his first minister, general Renchild, an the count de Guifcard, embassador of France i Sweden, embarked with him. He joined the squadron of the allies. The Danish fleet declined the engage ment, and gave the three united fleets the opportuni ty of drawing to near to Copenhagen, as to throw fome bombs into the town.

The king then, as in a fudden transport, takin count Piper and general Renchild, by the bundt And what, faid he, if we (headd loy hold of the opport tanity of waking a defecut, and beinge Cipebogen A lond, wakin is is blacked up (heat? ere immediately given for five thouland men to emark, who lay upon the coaft of sweden, and werce oried to the troops they had on board. The king quinted his velifel, and entered into a lighter frigate; and hey diffacted three hundred gerandiers in final hallos towards the flore. Among thefe fhallops were mail flat-bottomed boars, which eartied the Ickienes, the Chevaux de Frize, and the influments of the piamiers. Five hundred felest men followed after in oherfhallops. Then came the king's men of war, with wo English frigates and two Dutch, which were to ayour the defent withtheir cannon.

Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, is fluate in the ifle of Zealand, in the midft of a beautiful plain, hich has the Sound on the north welt, and the baltock on the early, where the king of Sweden then laytop in the unexpected movement of the velfels, which treatmed a defective, the inhabitants in a conflernation the inactivity of their own fleet, and the motion of the Swedift flips, looked round with terror to fee in any place the florm would full. The fleet of Charles opped over againft Humblebek within feven miles of lopeningen. Immediately the Danes drew up their parket to the place. The foot were polied behind hick entrenchments, and what strillery they could the thinker was directed againft the Swedes.

The king then quitted his frigat, to throw himshift sto the faith failon, a the head of his guards. Th fmall boats were but about an hundred vards off th fhore; Charles, impatient of landing, threw himfel from the shallop into the fea, with his fword in hi hand, and the water up to his middle. The minifters the embaffador of France, the officers and foldiers ftrait followed his example, and marched to fhore a midft a shower of musket shot, which the Danes dif charged. The king, who had never in his life befor heard a difcharge of mufkets loaden with ball, afkee Major Stuart, who flood next him, What whiftling tha was which he had in his ears. 'Tis the noife of the mul ket ball which they fire upon you, fays the major. That' right, fays the king, henceforward it shall be my mufick And that moment the major who explained the noil to him, received a fhot in the fhoulder: and a lieute nant on the other fide of him fell dead at his feet. I is usual for troops that are attacked in their retrench ments to be beaten, becaufe the affailants have gene rally an impetuofity, which the defenders canno have: belides, to wait for the enemy in one's lines is generally a confession of one's own weakness, and the other's advantage. The Danish horse and foo took to their heels after a faint refistance. As foon as the king was mafter of their retrenchments, he fell or his knees to thank God for the first fuccess of his arms He immediately caufed redoubts to be raifed towards the town, and himfelf marked out the encampment At the fame time he fent back his veffels to Schonen a part of Sweden not far from Copenhagen, for freff recruits of nine thousand men. Every thing conspired to affift the vivacity of Charles. The nine thousand mer were upon the fhore ready to embark, and the next morning a favourable wind brought them to him.

tot to bombard the town. He received them on horfetack at the head of his regiment of guards, and the leputies fell upon their knees before him. He demanled of the town four hundred thousand rix-dollars, vith orders to fupply his camp with all forts of proviions, which he promifed they fhould be honefly paid or. They brought him the provisions, becaufe they urft not refuse them, but were in no expectation that he conqueror would youchfafe to pay for them; and hofe who brought them were altonished to find that ney were paid generoufly and without delay by the neaneft foldiers in the army. There had long reigned the Swedish troops a strict discipline, which contriunted not a little to their conqueft; and the young ing made it still more fevere. There was not a folier that dared to refule payment for whatever he ought, much less go a marauding, or even flir out f the camp. He would not fo much as allow his troops iter a victory the privilege of stripping the dead, till acy had his permission, and eafily brought them to the blervance of his order. Prayers were conftantly faid a his camp twice a day, at feven in the morning, and our in the afternoon; and he never failed to be prcnt at them himfelf, to give his foldiers an example f piety, as well as valour. His camp, which was far etter governed than Copenhagen, had every thing in bundance; and the country people chofe rather to Il their provisions to their enemies the Swedes than their own countrymen, who did not pay to well for em, And the townfmen were more than once oblied to fetch their provisions from the king of Sween's camp, which they wanted in their markets.

The king of Denmark was then in Holtlein, whither feemed to Nave marched only to raife the forge of onningen. He faw the Baltick covered with his oneies thips, a young conqueror already malter of Zeand and ready to take polfelion of the capital. Billinde a declaration, that whoever would take up erms against the Swedes should have their liberty. Thi declaration was of great weight in a country, wherall the peafants, and even many of the townlimen were flaves. But Charles XII. was in no fear of an army o flaves. He let the king of Denmark know, that he made war for no other reafon but to oblige him to make peace; and that he mult either refolve to do julite. to the duke of Holftein, or fee Copenhagen dellrog ed, and his kingdom put to fire and fword. The Dane was too fortunate to have to do with a conqueror who valued himfelf upon his juffice. A congrefs was appointed to meet in the town of Travendal, on the frontiers of Holftein. The king of Sweden would no fuffer the artifice of the minifters to protract the ne gotiations into any length ; he would have the treaty finished with as much rapidity as he made his defcent into Zealand. And it was effectually concluded or the 5th August, to the advantage of the duke of Holftein, who was indemnify'd from all the expences of the war, and delivered from oppression. The king of Sweden would accept of nothing for himfelf, being fatisfied with having relieved his ally, and humbled his enemy. Thus Charles XII. at eighteen years old, began and ended this war in lefs than fix weeks.

Precidily at the fame time the king of Poland laid fage in perfon to the town of Rigs, the capital of Lie works; and the Czar was upon his march on the call at the head of an hundred thoufond men. Rigs was d. Inded bytheold cound "allberg, a Swedil Beneral, who at the age of fourfcore joined all the fire of youth to the experience of fixery campaigns. Count Flemming, fince. minifer of Poland, a great mus both in the field and at the council-board, and Mr. Patkul, carried on the fiege unfler the king's directions; the one with all the activity proper to his character, and the other with the urmoff oblinacy of revenge. But notwinflanding feveral advantage which the befores that gained, the experience of the sid Count d<sup>1</sup> Alberg rendred all their efforts fruitefs, and the king of Poland defpaired of gaining the own, fleet laft laid hold of an honourable opporunity of ming the fiege. Riga was foll of merchants goods biologing to the Dutch. The flates general refered their embaffador attending upon king Auguity, to make proper repredentations of it to him. Eheiking of Poland did not fland in need of much intrativ. He coolented to raife the fiege, rather than section the leaft damage to bis allies, who were not nightly furprized at this excels of complaifance, as they knew the real caufe of it.

No more then remained for Charles XII. to do, for he fiaithing his first campaign, than to march against his rival in glory, Peter Alexiowitz. He was the more 'nraged against him, as there were still three Muscovite mbail dors at Stockholm, who were ready to fwear b the renewing an inviolable peace. He who valued imfelf upon a fevere probity, could not comprehend yow a legiflator like the Czar could make a jeft of what ught to be held fo facred. The young prince, full f honour, did not fo much as dream, that there ould be a different morality for princes and private elto, which he had much better have fuppreffed. He ledged for a reafon of the war, that they had not B Riga; and that they had fold provisions too dear D-hisemhaffadors. Thefe were the griefs, for which e-ravished Ingria with a hundred thousand men.

He appeared before Narva at the head of this sreat may do the firld of Odober, in a fealon more levere that elimate, than the month of January is at Paris. The Oper, who in fuch weather would dometimes ride off four hundred leagues to fea amine or canal, for red is trades no more than he fpared himfelf. Befides, a knew that the Swedes, evening the time of Gafaa knew that the Swedes, evening the time of Gafak Adeb a would be the set of the first of Gafa-as well as in fummer, and he wanted to acculton the Mufcovites alfo to lofe all difficition of feafons, and to make them one day at leaft equal to the Swedes. Thus at a time when the froit and fnows oblige other autions in temperate climates to a fufpenfion of arms, the Czar Peter hald fiege to Narva, within thirty degrees of the pole, and Charles XII, was upon his march to relieve it.

The Czar was no fooner arrived before the place, than he made hafte to put in practice what he had lately learnt abroad in his travels. He drew out his comp fortified it on all fides, raifed redoubts at certain diftances, and opened the trench himfelf. He had given the command of his army to the duke de Croy a German, and an able general, but at that time very little affifted by the Mufcovite officers. For himfelf, he had only the rank of a fingle lieutenant in his own troops. He judged it neceffary to give his nobility an example of military obedience, who 'till then had been undifciplinable, and accuftomed to march at the head of ill armed flaves without any experience or order. He had a mind to teach them, that places in the army were to be obtained by fervices; he began himfelf with beating a drum, and was raifed to an officer by degrees. "Tis by no means to be wondered at, that he who at Amfterdam turned carpenter to procure himfelf fleets, should become a lieutenant at Narva to teach his nation the art of war.

The Mofcovies are frong and indefarigable, and, it may be, accourage out as the Swedes; but it requires time to form experienced troops, and diffipiline to make them invincible. The only good foldiers in the army were hirty thoufnd Stretletfer, who were is Alufcove what he janifaries are in Turky. The tell were Barbarians forced from their forrells, and covered over with the fains of wild bealls, form armed with atrows, and others with clubs; few of them had fufers nor had any of thom feen a regular face; there may ot one good cannoneer in the whole army. An hunred and fifty cannon, which one would have thought uft have foon laid the little town of Narva in afhes. ere fcarce able to make a breach, whilft the artillery f the town deitroyed every moment whole ranks a the trenches. Narva was almost without fortifiations, and Count Hoorn who commanded there. ad not a thousand regular troops; and yet this impenfe army was not able to reduce it in ten weeks. On the 15th of November, the Czar had informaion that the king of Sweden, having croffed the fea with two hundred transports, was upon his march o relieve Narva. The Swedes were no more than wenty thousand; but the Czar had no advantage xcept superiority of number. Far therefore from defsifing his enemy, he employed all the art he had to apprefs him; and, not content with an hundred thouand men, he was getting ready another army to oppofe him, and check his progrefs. He had already given orders for near forty thousand recruits, who were coming up from Plefcow, with great expedition. He went in perfon to hallen their march that he might mem in the king between the two armies Nor was this all ; a detachment of thirty thousand men from the camp before Narva, were polled at a leapue's diftance from the town directly in the king of Sweens road. Twenty thousand ftreleties were placed Farther off upon the fame road, and five thousand others made up an advanced guard ; and he must neceffarily force his way thro' the body of all thefe troops before he could reach the camp, which was fort fied with a rampart and double foffe. The king of Sweden had landed at Pernaw in the gulph of Riga with about fixteen thousand foot, and a few more than four thouland horfe.

From Pernaw he had made a precipitate march as far as Kevel, followed by all his hor'e, and only four thoushad of his foot. But he full kept on his march, without waiting for the reft of his troops; and foon found himself with his eight thousand men only, be fore the first posts of the enemy. He without helita tion attacked them one after another ; without giving them time to learn with how fmall a number they had to engage. The Mufcovites feeing the Sweden come upon them, made no dubt but they had a whole army to encounter with; and the advanced guard of five thousand men immediately fled upor their approach. The twenty thousand beyond them, terrified with the fight of their countrymen, made no refiftance: and carried their confernation and confusion among the thirty thousand, who were polted within a league of the camp; and the pannick feizing upon them too, they retired to the main body of the army without firiking a blow. These three pofts were carried in two days and an half; and what upon other occasions would have been reckoned three victories, did not retard the king's march the fpace of one hour. He appeared then at laft with his eight thousand men, wearied with the fatigues of fo long a vites, with an hundred and fifty pieces of brafs cannon in their front: and he fcarce allowed them any time for reft, before he gave his orders for the attack without delay.

The fignal was two fifter, and the word in German, With the oil of God. A general officer having reprefented to him the great hazard of the attempt, What, fays he, do you make any mellion whether with my eight Handmahraus Suedier I hall as i reat a hundred thouland Malcoviter's but upon reflection, Karing there was too much oftentation in what he fail, he ran after the officer in a moment, And are not you fays he, of the fame optimal's have not 1 a challe advanttage over the energy a the one, that their having can be of meteric to them, and the other, that the place issing frain, their great number will only imamode them, and it thus is easily 1 fault be fureer than she. er did not think fit to differ from him, and thus they marched against the Muscovites about noon on the 30th of November 1700.

As foon as the cannon of the Swedes had made a preach in the entrenchments, they advanced with their payonets at the end of their fusces, well loaded with ball, which they furioufly difcharged upon their enemies. The Mufcovites flood their fire for half an hour, without quitting their pofis. The king attacked the Czar's quarter, which lay on the other fide of the camp, and was in hopes of a rencounter, as not knowing that the emperor was gone in queft of the forty thousand men, who were daily expected. Upon the first difeharge of the enemy's shot, the king received a ball in his left shoulder; but it grazed only in a slight manner upon the flefh ; his activity even hindred him from perceiving that he was wounded. Prefently after his horfe was killed under him. A fecond had his head carried off by a cannon ball. And as he was minibly mounting a third, Thefe fellows, fays he, make me exercife, and then he went on to engage and g ve orders with the fame prefence of mind as before. Within three hours the entrenchments were carried on all fides. The king purfued the right of his enemy as far as the river of Narva, with his left wing, if one might properly call by that name, about four thouland men. who were in purfuit of near fif y thoufand. The bridge broke under them as they fled, and the river was in a moment covered with the dead. The reft in defpair returned to their camp, without knowing whither they went; and finding certain barracks they took their polts behind them. There they defended themfelves for a while, as not knowing how to make their escape. But at last their generals Dolhorouky, Gollowin, and Fedorowitz, furrendered themfelves to the sking, and laid their arms at his majelty's feet. And in the inflant they were offering them, came up the duke of Croy, the general of the army, to furrende himfelf with thirty officers.

\* Charles received all these prisoners of diffinction with as eafy a politenels, and as obliging an air, as i he had been to pay them the honours of an entertain. ment in his own court. He put only the general officers under a guard; all the fubaltern officers and fol-b diers were difarmed and conducted to the river of Narva, where they were furnished with boats to carry them over, and return them back to their own homes. In the mean time night came on, and the right wing of the Mulcovitesstill continued fighting. The Swedes had not loft fifteen hundred men ; eighteen thousand Muscovites had been killed in their entrenchments; a. great number was drowned; many had paffed the river ; but still there remained enough in the camp to exterminate the Swedes even to the laft man. But it is not the number of the dead, but the terror of those who furvive that gives the finishing stroke to victories. The king employed the fmall remains of the day in feizing upon the enemy's artillery. He pofted himfelf to advantage between their camp and the town, and there flept fome hours on the ground, wrapt up in his cloak, expediing to fall at day-break upon the left wing of the enemy, which was not yet entirely routed. But at two o' clock in the morning general Wade, who commanded that wing, having heard of the gracious reception the king had given to the other generals, and how he had fent home all the fubaltern officers and foldiers, defired he would grant him the fame favour. The conqueror made answer, That he fould have it, if he would draw near at the head of his troops, and lay down his arms and colours at his feet. The general appeared foon after with his Mufcovites, to the number of about thi ty thousand. They marched foldiers and officers, with their heads uncovered, acrofs lefs than feven thousand Swedes. The foldiers as they paffed before him, threw down their fufees and fwords upon the ground, and the officers preinted him with their enfigns and colours. He cauled he whole multitude to crofs the river, without reuting a fingle foldier priloner. If he had put them inder the guard, the number of the priloners would  $\mathbf{i}$  leaft have been five times greater than that of the conquerors.

He then entered victorious into Narva, attended y the Duke of Croy and the other general officers f the Muscovites. He ordered their swords to be reored to them; and being informed, they wanted noney, and that the tradelmen of Narva refused to ruft them, he fent the Duke of Croy a thousand duats, and every Muscovite officer five hundred, who ould never fufficiently admire the civility of their reatment, of which they could not form to them elves the leaft idea. Immediately a relation of the victory gas drawn up at Narva to be fent to Stockholm and the allies of Sweden; but the king cut off with his own and whatever was reported too much to his own dvantage, or to the detriment of the Czar. Among t e prifoners taken at the battle of Narva, here was one, who was a great inflance of the revoations of fortune. He was the eldeff fon and heir to the king of Georgia. They call him the Carfes, a name which fignifies prince or fon cf Cara anongfi all the Tartner, as well as in Mufcovy; for he word Car fignifies king among the antient Scyhians from whom all thele people are defecteded, and s by no means derived from the Caefars of Rome, fo ong unknown to the Barbatians. His fatther Mitel-

The Cart was advancing by long marches with an army of forty thouland Rullians, in expectation of forrounding his enemy on all fides. In the mid-way he had intelligence of the battle of Narva, and the difperition of his whole camp. He judged in too comvenient with his forty thouland, raw and undifejine ed, to engage with a congueror, who had halely deflexyed an hundred thouland inteenhed in their campe. He returned back from whence he came, full partiing his arefolution of difeiplining his troops, a the ame time that he civilized his fulpieds. This opinion was fo general, that public swayers were ordered to be put up to faint Nicholäs the parton of Mofeovy, pon the occalion. The orm was too fingular to be here omitted. It runs has.

THE King of Poland with resion expedied, that his enemy, already victorious over the Danes and the MaGowites, would come next to even this fay on him. He entered into a league more first than we with the Carr, and the two primees agreed upon n interview, the better to contrive their meafures. They met at Birlen, a finalitow in Lithuania, with us any of thef formalities, which feree only to retard bulinels, and were neither agreeable to their fitu ation nor their humour. They palfed fifteen days to gether in the enjoyment of feveral extravagant plea fures; for the Czar, amidt his cares for the reformation of his kingdom, could never correct in himfelhis dangerous inclination to debauchery.

Count Piper, the King of Sweden's principal mile nifter had the first information of the interview intended between the Emperor of Mufcovy and the King of Poland. He advifed his mafter to oppofe to their measures a little of that policy which he had hitherte too much difregarded. Charles XII. liftened to him and for the first time gave confent to the use of intriguing, a practice fo frequent in other courts. There was in the Swedifh troops a young Scots gentleman. who was one of those that leave their country, where they are very poor, in a lucky feafon, and are to be met with in all the armies of Europe. He fpoke the German tongue extremely well, and could eafily accommodate himfelf to whatever part he fhould undertake. Him therefore they choie to be a fpy upon the conferences of the two kings. Heapplied himfelf to the colonel of the regiment of Saxon horfe, who were to ferve as guards to the Czar during the interview. He paffed for a gentleman of Brandenbourg, and his addrefs and certain well-placed fums eafily procured him a lieutenancy in the regiment. When he came to Birfen he artfully infinuated himfelf into the familiarity of the fecretaries of the ministers, and was made a party in all their pleafures; and whether it was that he took the advantage of their indifcretion over a bottle, or that he gained them by prefents, but he certainly drew from them all the fecrets of their mafters. and made halte to give an account of them to Charles find Mufcovites into Poland, to be trained up to war, and promifed to pay king Augultus three millions of "rixdollers within the fpace of two years. This treaity, if it had been executed, might have proved fatal to the King of Sweden. "Twas a ready and certain way to make the Mufcovites good foldiers; and perhaps it was forging chains for one part of Europe.

Charles XII. used his utmost endeavours to prevent the King of Poland from reaping the benefit of this treaty. After he had paffed the winter at Narva, he appeared in Livonia near that very town of Riga, which King Augustus had fo unfuccesfully belieged. The Saxon troops were posted along the river Duna. which is very broad in that place, and Charles was to difpute the paffage as he lay on the other fide the river. The Saxons were not commanded by their prince, who then lay fick, but were headed by Ferdinand Duke of Courland, one of the bravelt princes in the North, and Mareschal Stenau, an officer of reputation. The King of Sweden had alone formed the plan of the passage, he was about to attempt. He cauled great boats to be made after a new manner. whole fides were far higher than ordinary, and could be lifted up or let down like a draw-bridge. When lift up they covered the troops they carried ; and when let down, they ferved as a bridge to land by. He made use likewise of another ftratagem. Having obferved that the wind blew directly from the North, where he lay, to the South, where his enemies were incamped, he fet fire to a large heap of wet ftraw, which fpreading a thick fmoke over the river, hindred the Saxons from feeing his troops, or judging what he was about to do. By means of this cloud he fent out barks loaden with more of the fame fmoaking ftraw, fo that the cloud encreasing, and being driven by the wind directly in the face of his enemies, it made it impossible for them to know whether he * A rixdoller is worth about as much as a French was upon his paffage or not. He alone conducted the execution of his (chenet, and being got into the midfl of the river, Well, fays he to General Renchild, the Dana will be at goad to ut at the fas af Gonhagenide my word for it, General, we shall beat them. He got to the other field in a quarter of an hour; and was vext to find that three people had legst allore before film. He immediately landed his cannon, and drew up his troops before the enemy, who were quite blinded with finoak, and could not make any oppotion but by a few random flot. And the wind harving difperfed the mill, the Saxoas faw the King ef-Sweden already upon his march againt them.

Mareschal Stenau loft not a moment, but at the first appearance of the Swedes fell furioufly upon them. with the belt part of his horfe: The violent flock of that troop falling upon the Swedes in the inftant they were forming their battalions, threw them into diforder. They gave way, were broken, and purfued even into the river. The King of Sweden rallied them in a moment in the midft of the water, with as much cafe, as if he had been making a review. The foldiers then marching more clofe than before, beat back Marefchal Stenau, and advanced into the plain. The Duke of Courland finding his troops in a confternation, made them retire very dexteroully into a dry place, flanked with a morals, and a wood where his artillery lay. The advantage of the ground, and the time he had given the Saxons to recover from their first furprize, reftored them to their courage. Charles immediately fell upon them, having with him fifteen thousand men; and the Duke of Courland about twelve thousand. The battle was rough and bloody; the duke had two horfes killed under him. and thrice penetrated into the midit of the king's guard : but being at last beat off his horfe with a blow from a mufket, his army fell into confusion, and difputed the victory no longer. His cuiraffiers carried im off with great difficulty, all over bruifed and half lead, from the thickeft of the fight, and from under he horfes heels, which trampled on him.

The King of Sweden upon this vitory makes hale o Mistaa, the capital of Courland, and takes it. All he towns in the duchy furement to him at differention; r was rather a journey than a conqueft. He paffed without delay into Lithuania, and conquered wherever he came. And he found a pleading fatisfation, a he owned himfelf, when he entered the town of firfen in triumph, where the King of Poland and the Izar had plotted his defiru?ion but a few months bebre.

It was in this place that he laid the defign of dewroning the king of Poland by the hands of the foles themfelves. As he was one day at table wholly alken up with the thoughts of this enterprife, and derving his uikal lobriety, in a profound lifence, ppearing, as it were, buried in the greatness of his conceptions; a German colonel, who waited upon im, faid loud enough to be heard, that the meals hich the Czar and the king of Poland had made in the fame place were fomething different irom thole f his mylely. Yzes, fays the king rifing, and f call the more coffly poil thrie digeliton.

The ofinal goard of Poland is an army which ought tways to (hibfi at the expence of the republic, It make up of two bodies independent of each other ader two different grand generals. The firl body that of Poland, and fhould confit of fix and thirty pouland men; the fecond to the number of twelve avoidnd is that of Lithouria. The two grand geerals are independent of each other; and though eye be nominated by the king, they never give an account of their actions to any but the republic, and ave a forpreme authority over their troops. The solonds are abfolate malters of their regiments, and belongs to them to procure them fulfenance as they can, and pay them. But as they are feldom pait themfolves, they lay wafe the country, and ruin the hutbandmen to fatisfy their own greedinefs, and tha of their foldiers. The Polith lords appear in their armies with more magnifeence than in their town and their tents are better furnified than their houfe. The horfe which makes up two thirds of the army is almoft all compoled of genulemen, and is remark able for the gracefulnefs of the riders, the beauty of the horfes, and the richnefs of the accourtement and harnefs.

Their Gens d'Armes effecially, which they dia infaulth into Honffars and Panceraes, march always attended by feveral valets, who lead their, horfes which have ornamented bridles with plates of filve and filver nails, embroideed facilies, faddle-bow and filver nails, embroideed facilies, faddle-bow with large houfings trailing after the Turkith maaner whole magnificence the Poles firive to imitate a much as they. caa.

But how gorgeous foever, the cavalry might appear the foot were as wretched and ragged, all cloathed and ill strated, without proper furniture or any thing uniform; and yet thele foot who refemble the vagabod Tartars, fupport hunger and cold, fatiguer and all the weights of war, with incredible refolution.

One may fill obferve in the Point follows, a character of the ancient Sarmatae their ancellors, a little difcipine, the fame fury in the aflault, the fame readines to run away and return to the battle, and the fame cruel difposition to flaughter, when they are conguerors.

The king of Poland at first flattered kinfl than in his neceffity thefe two armies would fight for him that the Polsh Polpolite would arm at his orders, and that all thefe forces joined to the Saxons his fubjects and the Mufcovites his allies, would make up a body, before which the fmaller number of the Swedes would not venture to appear. But he faw himfelf almoit on a fudden deprived of thefe fuccours by the very care had taken to have them all together.

Accultomed in his hereditary dominions to abfolute power, he too readily supposed that he could govern in Poland as in Saxony. The beginning of his reign raifed malecontents. His first proceedings provoked the party which had opposed his election, and alienated almost all the reft. The Poles murmured to fee their towns filled with Saxon garrifons. and their frontiers with Muscovite troops. The mation far more jealous of maintaining their own liberty, than concerned in diffurbing their neighbours. did notlook upon king Augustus's war with Sweden. and the invalion of Livonia, as an enterprize advanrageous to the republic. 'Tis not an eafy matter to Thinder a free nation from difcerning their true interefts. The Poles perceiving, that if this war undertaken without their confent fhould prove unfuccefsful, their country lying open on all fides, would become a prey to the king of Sweden ; and if it should fucceed, they should be fubdued by their own king, who being then mafter of Livonia, as well as Saxony, would enflave Poland, as it lies between those two countries, which are filled with fortified places. In this alternative, either of becoming flaves to the king whom they had elected, or of being ravifhed by Charles XII. who was justly incenfed, they only raifed an outcry against the war, which they judged to be rather declared against themselves, than against Sweden ; and they looked upon the Saxons and Mufcovites as the inffruments of their chains. Upon the king of Sweden's defeating all that had oppofed his paffage, and advancing with a victorious army into the heart of Lithuania, they clamoured loud against . their fovereign, and with fo much the more freedom, becaufe he was unfortunate.

Lithuania was then divided into two parties, than of the Princes Sapieba, and that of Oginfky. Thefel two factions had begun from private quarrels, and degenerated into a civil war. The king of Sweden drew over to his intereft the princes Sapieba; and Oginfky, being but badly affifted by the Saxons, found his party almost extinguished. The Lithuanian army, which thefe troubles and want of money had reduced to a fmall number, was in part difperfed by the conqueror. The few who held out for the king of Poland, were feparated into fmall bodies of wandering troops, which over-ran the country, and fubfifted by fpoil. So that Augustus beheld nothing in Lithuania, but the weaknefs of his own party, the hatred of his fubjects, and the army of the enemy conducted by a young prince. incenfed, victorious and implacable.

There was indeed an army in Poland, but inflead of fix and thirty thouland men, the number preferibed by the laws, it confilted but of eighteen thoufand. And it was not only ill paid and ill-armed, but the generals were undetermined what courfe they fhould take.

The king's belt refuge was to order the nobility to follow him; but he durft not expose himfelf to a refulal, which would have too much difcovered his weaknefs, and confequently increafed it.

In this flate of trouble and uncertainty, all the Palatinates of the kingdom demanded a diet of the king 1 in like manner as in England in times of difficulty, all the bodies of the flate prefent addreffes to the king, to define him to call a parliament. Augufus flood more in meed of an army than a diet, where the adison of king are examined. He was obliged however to call one, that he might not each perate the nation beyond a polibility of reconcilement. A diet therefore was appointed to meet at Warfaw on the fecond of Deember 1701. ne Sapieba, the Lubomirfky and their friends, the alatine Lecfinfky treafurer of the crown, and above II, the partizans of the Princes Sobiefky, were all ceretly attached to the king of Sweden.

The most confiderable enemy the king of Poland ad, was Cardinal Radjoufky, archbifhop of Gnefna, rimate of the kingdom, and prefident of the diete. de was a man full of artifice and referve in his conuct; entirely governed by an ambitious woman, whom the Swedes called Madame la Cardinale, who ever ce fed to pulh him on to intrigue and faction. The primate's talent lay chiefly in making his advanage of the conjunctures which fell in his way, withut endeavouring to give rife to them. He would appear nrefolved when he was most absolutely determied in his projects, feeking always to gain his ends y ways which feemed most opposite to them. King John Sobiefky, the predeceffor of Augustus, had forperly made him bifhop of Warmelant, and vice-chanellor of the kingdom. And Radjoufky, whillt a priate bifhop, obtained the cardinals hat by the favour f the fame prince. This dignity foon opened him he way to the primacy ; and this uniting in his peron whatever is apt to impose upon others, he was h a condition to intrigue with impunity.

Upon the death of john he ufce-bins 'trimoff' endeaours to place "price' junes Solvfely upon the throne y at the torrent of hatted they bore to the father, nongbio great man as he was, fet afide the fon. The cardinal primate then joined with the Abbe de Tolgnac, emballador of France, to give the brews to the prince of Conti, who in reality was elected, but the money and troops of Saxony got the better of his foquence. He at laft infered himfelf to be drawn ato the party which crowned the elector of Saxony, and winted with impatience for an opportunity to ave givition between the nation and the new king. The vicion's of Charlas XI. protector of prince james Sobirfly, the civil war of Lithunania, the general didifications of all mean minds to king Augultu gave the cardinal hopes that the time was now comwhen he might be able to fend back Augultus int Saxony, and open to the form of king John the wato the throne. This prince, before, the innocenobject of the Poles hate, was now become their ide from the time that king Augultus grewout of favour but he durft not induge hinfelf in the thoughts of fo great a revolution; and yet the cardinal had infenfibly liad the foundations of it.

He at first feemed defirous of reconciling the kinc. with the republic : he fent circular letters dictated in appearance by the fpirit of concord and charity, ufuar and noted fnares, but fuch as never fail to entrap he wrote a pathetic letter to the king of Sweden conjuring him in the name of him, whom all Chriflians equally adore, to give peace to Poland, and her king. Charles XII. answered the cardinal's intentions, more than his words. In the mean time he remained in the great duchy of Lithuania with his victorious army, declaring that he would not diffurb the diet ; that he made war against Augustus and the Saxons, and not against Poland; and that far from defigning any thing against the republic, he came too refcue it from oppression. These letters and these answers were for the publick. The emisfaries which went and came continually from the cardinal to Count Piper, and the private affemblies held at the prelates house, were the fprings that moved the diet. They proposed to fend an embassy to Charles XII. and required with one confent of the king, that he fhould bring no more Muscovites upon their frontiers, and that he should fend back the Saxon troops.

The bad fortune of Auguflus had already done what the diet demanded of him. The league feoretly concluded with the Mufcovites at Birfen was become as infignificant, as at firlt it had appeared foridable. He was far from being able to fend the Czar ne fifty thousand Germans he had promifed to raife n the empire. The Czar himfelf, a dangerous enemy p Poland, was at that time not very eager to affift ith all his forces a divided kingdom, from whence e was in hopes of reaping fome fpoils. He contentd himfelf with fending twenty thouland Mufcovites nto Lithuania, who did more mifchief there than the wedes, flying continually before the conqueror, and avaging the lands of the Poles, till at laft being purned by the Swedifh generals and finding nothing nore to pillage, they returned by fhoals to their wn country. As for the fcattered remains of the axons army beaten at Riga, king Augustus sent them winter and recruit in Saxony, that this facrifice. owever involuntary, might foften the rage of the acenfed Poles.

The war was then changed into intrigues, and he diet divided into almost as many factions as there ere Palatines. One day the intereft of king Augufus prevailed, and the next were proferibed. Every ody cried out for liberty and juffice, but no body new what it was to be just or free. The time was bent in cabbaling in fecret, and har anguing in public. The diet neither knew what they would, nor what hey should, do. Great companies feldom agree uion proper counfels in times of civil broils, becaufe he bold men in fuch affemblies are generally factious, nd the men of probity timorous. The diet broke p in diforder on the 17th of February 1702, after firee months of caballing and irrefolution. The fenaors, who are the palatines and the bifhops, remaind at Warlaw. The fenate of Poland have a right to make laws provisionally, which the diets feldom difnnul. This body being not fo numerous, and ufed o bufincfs, was far lefs tumultuous, and came to a Augustus chofe rather to receive hard laws from hill conqueror than his fubjects. He determined to after peace of the king of Sweden, and would have conclud ed a private treaty with him. But he was obliged to conceal this ftep from the fenate, whom he looked u pon as an enemy still more untractable. As the af fair was delicate, he intrusted it wholly to the Coun tefs of Konifmar, a Swedish lady of great birth, to whom he was then attached. This Lady, who was fc famous in the world for her wit and beauty, was more capable than any minister whatever to give fuccels to a negotiation. Befides, as the had an elfate ir Charles XIIth's dominions, and had lived long ir his court, the had a plaufible pretence of waiting upon him. She came then to the Swedith camp in Lithuania, and streight applyed herfelf to County Piper, who too lightly promifed her an audience of his mafter. The countels, among the perfections which rendered her one of the most agreeable performent in Europe, had a fingular talent of speaking the languages of feveral countries, which the had never feen, and with as much propriety as if the had been born in them. She would fometimes amufe herfelf with writing French verfes, which might eatily have been miltaken for the composition of a perfon brought op 1 at Verfailles. She made fome for Charles XII. which ought not to be forgotten in his hiftory. She intro-b duced the fabulous gods, commending his different virtues ; and the peace concluded thus, which (be-)e ing rendered into English) is,

CHARLES XH. B. II.

All her wit and charms were loft upon fach a man s the king of Sweden, and he conflantly refuided to the her. But as he frequently rede out to take the ir, fhe refolved to fpeak to him upon the road. Ma accordingly meeting him one day in a narrow oud, fhe alighted out of her coach, as foon as fhe whim. The king made her a low bow without peaking one word to her, turned the bridle of his torfe, and wode back in an inflant. So that the counefs of Konifmar gained no other advantage from her coursey, but the fatisficition of believing that the king f Sweden faced on body but her.

The king of Poland was therefore obliged to throw imfelf into the arms of the fenate. He made them wo propofals by the palatine of Mariembourg : the me that they should leave to him the disposition of he army of the republic, whom he would pay two marters advance out of his own revenue ; and the ther, that they should allow him to bring twelve houfand Saxons back into Poland. The cardinal rimate gave an answer as fevere, as the answer of the king of Sweden. He told the palatine of Marimbourg in the name of the affembly. That they were reployed to fend an embaffy to Charles XII. that beir business now was to reconcile the king with Polant ad Sweden; that it would be of no fervice to pay an my, which would not fight for him, without orders "om the republic ; and for the Saxons, he would advise im to bring none into Poland.

The king in this extremity was defined so for preferring at leaft the appearance of the royal authority, if fint one of hit chamberlains to Charles, to know 7 him, where and how his Swedifh majefly would recive the embadly of the king his malter and of the public. They had unhappily neglected to demand pals-port for his chamberlain to the Swedes. And etking of sweden imprifoned tim, infled of giving madiance, and faid that he expedded to receive.

an embaffy from the republic, and not from king Augulus.

Charles then leaving garrifons behind him in form towns of Lithuania, advanced beyond Grodno, place famous in Europe for the diets that are hell there, but ill built and worfe fortified.

At fome miles from Grodno he met the emball of the republic, which confifted of five fenators. Th Waiwode Galefky, and count Tarlo who fince die in France, were appointed to deliver it. The kin gave them audience in his tent, with a pomp which h always difdained, but then thought neceffary. A lieur tenant general with an hundred Drabans on horfeback who are the guards of the king of Sweden, went t meet the embaffadors ; they lighted off their horfe within fifty foot of the royal tent, and were conducte between two lines of guards under arms to a great antichamber. A major general introduced there from thence into a very large chamber, where the ceiling, floors, and walls, were all covered with Perfian tapeftry. The king received them upon a throne He role and took off his hat upon their first bow ing; and then the king and the embaffadors bein, covered, the Waiwode fpoke first, and count Tarl after him. Their difcourfes were full of caution and obscurity; they did not once pronounce the name of the king of Poland, as they were determined nei ther to speak in his favour, nor openly to complain of him, but only left him to guefs at what the thought not proper to explain. Charles treated eac emballador in private with friendship and confidence But when he came to give his answer to the republic which fent them, and which did not enter into hi measures with a submission fo ready as he expected he told them by count Piper, that he would give a anfwer at Warfaw.

layer by this writing Charles invited all the Poles of the their revenge with his, and precended to flow their interflow and his were the fame. They were notwithflanding very different; but the mifello fupported by a great party, by the difurder of the fenate, and the approach of the ronqueror, made very flrong imprefions. They were obliged to own Charles for their protector, ince he was refored to be fo, and it was well for me, that he contented binefield with taile.

The fenators who oppofed Augustus, published this writing aloud even before his face, and the few who adhered to him, kept filence. At laft when they heard that Charles was advancing by long marches, hey all prepared in confusion to depart; the cardial left Warfaw one of the first ; and the major part ollowed haftily; fome fled to their own country eats waiting to fee how things would terminate, and others to arm their friends. There remained with he king only the emballadors of the emperor and the Zzar, the popes Nuncio, and fome fewbishops and palaines, who were attached to his fortune, he was forced to ly, and nothing yet had been decided in his favour. Before his departure he made hafte to hold a council with the small number of senators, which still reprefented the fenate. But how zealous foever they were for his fervice, they were still Poles, and had dl-conceived fogreat an averfion to the Saxon troops. hat they durft not allow him the liberty of bringing above fix thousand men from thence for his defence ; and they farther voted, that thefe fix thousand men hould be commanded by the grand general of Poland, and immediately fent home after the conclusion of a peace. As to the armies of the republic, they left the difnofition of them to him.

Upon this refolution of the council, the king left Warfaw, being too weak to oppofe the enemy and file fatisfied with the conduct of his own party. He thight publified his orders for altembling the Pufpolite, and armies which were fcarce any thing but bare name. There was nothing to be hoped for ould of Lithuania, where the Swedes were polted. And the army of Poland reduced to a finall number of troops wanted arms, provisions, ard good-will. The greater part of the nobility were ineghidated, unrefolved, on ill-difpoled, and confined lightfelves to their own houfes : their king in vain, the sh authorized by the laws of the flate, gave orders under the pain of death to every gentleman in the country to appear on horfeback and follow him. It was now become a difpute, whether they owed him obedience. His chief dependence was upon the troops of his electorate, where the form of government, being intirely abfolute, left him under no apprehenfions of bing difobeyed. He had already privately given orders for twelve thousand Saxons, who were upon their march with all poffible speed. He farther recalled the eight thousand he had promifed to the emperor to affitt him in his wars against France, and which in the neceffity he was reduced to, he was obliged to withdraw. This introduction of fo many Saxons into Poland, was a fure means of alienating all mens affections: asit was a violation alfo of the law made by his own party, which allowed him but fix thousand : buthe knew very well, that if he was conqueror, they durft not complain; and if he was conquered, they would never forgive his having introduced even fix thousand. Whilft these foldiers were marching up in troops, whilft he was flying from palatinate to palatinate to affemble the nobility that adhered to him, the king of Sweden at laft arrived before Warfaw, on the fifth of May 1702. The gates were opened to him upon the first fummons, He fent away the Polish garrison, difmiffed the city guard, every where polled guards of his own, ordered the inhabitants to bring in their arms, and content with having difarmed them, and not willing to exafectate them, he demanded no more of them than a contribution of an hundred thouland

Press. King Augubus was then getting together his forces at Cracow, and was much furprifed to fee the cardinal primate one of the company. That man, whole heart burnt within him to finish the work he had begun, preturbed to keep up the dcency of his character of the last, and to dethrone his king with a the morpeofful behaviour of a good fubjed. He to the min that the king of Sweden appeared difpoled to a reafonable accommodation, and hambly begged leave that he might attend him. King Augufus granted him what he could not refule, that is, the liberty of doing him a michief.

The cardinal primate, thus covering the baseness of his conduct, by the addition of treachery, made hafte to vifit the king of Sweden, before whom he had never yet ventured to prefent himfelf. He faw his Majefty at Prazg, not far from Warfaw, but without the ceremonies, which had been used towards the embaffadors of the republic. He found the conqueror clad in a coat of coarfe blue cloath, with brafs buttons gilt, jack boots, and buff-fkin gloves that reached up to his elbows, in a room without hangings, in company with the duke of Holftein his brother-in-law, count Piper his ficft minister, and fe- . veral general officers. The king advanced fome fteps to meet the cardinal, and they had a conference together flanding, of about a quarter of an hour, which Charles put an end to by faying aloud, I will never give the Poles peace, till they have elected another king. The cardinal, who waited for this declaration, immediately fignified it to all the palatinates, afturing them he was extremely concerned at it, and at the fame time laying before them the neceffity of complying with the conqueror.

Upon this news the king of Poland faw plainly, that he mult either lofe his crown or preferveit by atms; and he ufed his utmolt efforts to fucceed in that great decisor. All his Saxon troops were arrived from the fromee, s of Saxony. The nobility of the platine of Cracow, where he fill remained, eams in a body a offer him their fervices. He in perfon exhorted every one of finef genellemen to remember the oaths they had taken, and they alfured him that hey would fyill the lait drop of their blood in him to they would fyill the lait drop of their blood in him to they would foll the any of the crown, he went for the sense to feek in perfon the king of Sweden ; and have not long before he found him, for he was already marching again this networks Cracow.

The two kings met on the roth of July 1702, in a large plain near Cilifia, between Warlaw and Cacoow. Augultas had near four and twenty thouland men, and Charles XII, not above twelve thouland. The battle began with the playing of the artillery. Upon the firft volley which was dicharged by the saxons, the duke of Holfein who commanded the Swedithhorder, syoong prime of great courage and virtue, received a cannonball in the reins. The king enquired if the was dead, and was told that he was 3 he made no anfwer, but the tears fell from hir eyes; and then covering luis face for a moment with his hands, on a fudden he jungred his horfe with fury, and rathed into the thickell of the centry, at the head of his guards.

The king' of Poland did all that could be expected from a prime who was ighting for his crown. He thrice led up his troops in perfon to the charge; but dealendant of Charles XII. carried it, and gained a complex twittery. The energy's camp, colours, and artillery, and Augulus' war cheft, were left to him. He made no flay upon the field of battle, but marched frait to Cracow, purfuing the king of Poland, who field before him.

The citizens of Gracow were hold enough to flux their gates upon the conqueror. He cauled them to be burfl open, and took the called by affault. His foldiers, the only men in the world who could abfain from pillage after a v door, did not offer the leaft ill tree the est to any one critizen; but the king made them pay faults for the rafhnels of their refiftance, by raifing them exceffive contributions.

He departed from Cracow in the full refolution of uffuing Aneuftus without intermifion; but within me mile. The fell under him, and oke his thigh. Cracow, where ecks in the han this furgeons. This accident ave Augustus lemme to breathe a little. He caused it mmediately to be fpread throughout Poland and Gerhany, that Charles XII. was killed by his fall. This life report, which was credited for fome time, filled all tiens minds with aftonifhment and uncertainty. In pis fmall interval he affembles all the orders of the . fingdom at Mariembourg, and then at Lublin, who ad before been called together to Sendomir.

In the mean time Charles XII. recovered of his yound, and overturned all before him. Always fixt n his refolution of forcing the Poles themfelves to dehrone their king, by the intrigues of the cardinal priinate, he cauled an affembly to be called ogether at Warfaw to oppofe that at Lublin. His generals rerefented to him that the affair might thus be proracted to a tedious length, and at length vanifh in deays; that during this time the Mulcovites were duily ingaging with the troops he had left behind in Livonia and Ingria, and that the event was not always favourable to the Swedes, and that his prefence there in all probability would very foon become necesfary. Charles, who was as fleady in the execution of his projects, as the was brifk in his actions, answered, though I were to flay here fifty years, I would not leave the place till I had detbroned the king of Poland.

Having augmented his victorious troops with fix thousand horse and eight thousand foot, which he recrived from Sweden, he marched against the remains of the Saxon army he had beaten at Cliffau, which had pained time to rally and recruit, whill his fall from his horfe had confined him to his bed. This army fhanned his approach, and retired towards Penfinds the north-well of Warfaw. The river Bugh lay be tween him and his enemies. Charles fivan over it a the head of his horfe, whill the foot went to feek ford four-what higher. Will the foot went to feek ford four-what higher. Way 1, 1703, he came u with the Saxons at a plass of Peludis. They were commanded by general Star the number of about the thought. The king of Star the number of about march had brought no more about with him, bein confident that a lefs number would have fulficed. Th terror of his arms was to fia approach, without laying fo the battle. General Stenau flood firm for a while with two regiments, but the moment after, he was drawn along in the general flight of his army, which was dif perfed before it was conqueted. The Swedes did no take a thousing priofiners, nor kill fix hundred men having more difficulty in purtoing than defating them.

Augufus who had nothing left him but the features remains of the Saxons beaten on all fides, retired in all halt to Thorn, a town of royal Profila, fituate m pon the Weiffel, and under the protection of Poland. Charles immediately prepared to befiege it. The king of Poland not thinking himfelf feature, withdrew into Saxony. In the mean time Charles, who made nothing of for may brilk marches, fwiming of rivers, and hurrying along with his foot mounted behind historle, was net able tobring up his cannon before Thorn, but was obliged to wait till it was feat him from Sweeden by fea.

Whill he was waiting for it, he took up his quarters within fome miles of the town, and would often advance too near the ramparts, to view it. The plain drefs he always wore was of greater fervice to him than he had ever imagined in thele dangerous walks. It hindered him from being taken notice of, and pointed out by the enemy, as a perfon to be fired at. One day having approached very near with one of hit generals named Lieven, who was dreffed in fearlet trimned with gold, and fearing left the general Louid e.

exceived, hie frait ordered him to walk behind him, adved by that magnanimity fo natural to him, which wen hinder a him from reflecting that he expoled his wen life to a manifelt danger to fave that of his fubwf.

Lieven differning his court too late in having put in aremarkable habit, threth expofed alfo thole that were with him, new tearing equally for the king in tharver place hereas, hefitated a while whether he opt to obey hins; in the moment while this coneft hitde, the king takes him by the arm, puts himcannon ball, which came in flank, firuck the general dead upon that very first which the king had farce quitted. The such of his man, killed directvin his flead, and becaute he had a mind to fave him, a northburd on a little to coolim habit in the notion is ever heid of blobus predefination, and m...de him divers, that he first, which predefination in fo finther a manner, referved him for the execution of rate things.

Every thing fueceded with him, and his negoations and his arms were equally fortunate. If a variant and Marefolal Renchild was in the heart of tole dominions with a great body of the army. Near airty thousand swedes under different generals, dierfed towards the north and the call upon the fromers of Mulcovy, withhood the efforts of the whole mpire of Ruffa, and Chartes was in the welf at the ther end of Poland, at the head of the belt part of is troops.

The king of Denmark, tied down by the treaty of 'ravendal, which his weakned hindred him from reaking, continued filent. The elector of Brandenourg who had acquired the title of king of Prufing, ithout any increale of power, durlt not exprefs his diguit at feeing the king of Sweden fo near his domitons. His grandfather had been deprived of the belt part of Pomerania by Guftavus Adolphus : and he had no fecurity for the reft, but the moderation of Charles. Farther towards the fouth-weft between the rivers of Elbe and Wefer lay the duchy of Bremen, the laft territory of the ancient conquefts of the Swedes, filled with ftrong gase fons, which opened to the conqueror the gates of Saxon, and the empire. Thus from the German ocean almost to the mouth of the Borithenes, which make the breadth of Europe, and to the gates of Mulcow, all was in confternation, and every moment expecting an entire revolution. His veffels were mafters of the Baltic, and employed in transporting prisoners from Poland into hisown country. Sweden alone was calm in the midft of thefe great emotions, tafting the fweets of a profound peace, and enjoying the glory of her king, without bearing the weight of it; fince his victorious troops were paid and maintained at the expence of the conquered.

In this general filence of the North before the arms of Charles XII. the town of Dantzick ventured to difoblige him. Fourteen frigates and forty transport veffels were bringing the king a fupply of fix thousand men, with cannon and ammunition, to finish the fiege of Thorn. Thefe fuccours mult necessarily pafs up the Weiffel. At the mouth of this river lies Dantzick, a rich and free town, enjoying with Elbing and Thorn the fame privileges in Poland, as the imperial towns have in Germany. Its liberty had been attacked by turns, by the Danes, the Swedes, and fome German princes, and was preferved only by the jealoufy which these powers had of each other. Count Steinbock, one of the Swedish generals, affembled the magiltrates in the king's name, demanded a paffage for the troops, and offered to buy powder of them and fome ammunition. The magiltrates, by an ufual imprudence in those who treat with their fuperiors in strength, durst neither absolutely refuse, nor expresflygrant what he demanded. General Stein-back made them give by force more thanks had afked ; and further exacted from the town a contribution of an hundred thouland crowns by way of recompence for their imprudent denial. At laft the recruits, the cannon and ammonition being arrived before Thora, the fiege was begun on the 2ad of September.

Rovel, governor of the place, defended it a month. with a garrifon of five thousand men. And then it was forced to furrender at diferetion. The garrifon were made prifoners of war, and fent into Sweden. Rovel was prefented to the king unarmed. His majefty, who never loft an opportunity of doing honour to merit in his enemies, gave him a fword with his own hand, made him a confiderable prefent in money, and fent him away upon his parole. The honour the town of Thorn had, in having formerly produced Copernicus the founder of the true fystem of the world, had no influence upon a conqueror, too little conversant in such matters, and who knew how to reward nought elfe but valour. This poor petty town was condemned to pay forty thousand crowns ; an excellive contribution for fuch a place !

Elbing a town built upon an arm of the Weiffel, founded by the Teutonic knights, and also annexed to Poland, did not make a proper advantage for the Dantzikers mistake, but hesitated too long about giving paffage to the Swedish troops, and was more feverely punished than Dantzic. Charles entred there in perfon on the 13th of December at the head of four thousand men armed with bayonets at the end of their muskets. The inhabitants in a fright threw themfelves upon their knees in the freets, and begged for mercy. He took from them, all their arms, lodged his foldiers in their houfes, and then having called the magiftrates together, obliged them to raife that very day a contribution of two hundred and fixty thousand crowns. There were in the town two hundred pieces of cannon, and four hundred thousand weight of gun-powder, upon which he feized. The gaining a victory would not have brought him a many advantages. All these fuccesses were forerunners to the dethroning of king Augustus.

The cardinal had fcarce taken an oath to his king that he would attempt nothing against him, before his went to the affembly at Warfaw, but ftill under this pretence of peace. He was attended by three thous fand foldiers raifed upon his own eftate, but upo: coming thither talked of nothing but concord and of bedience. At last he threw off the mask, and on the 14th of February 1704, declared in the name of the affembly, Augustus elector of Saxony uncapable of wearing the crown of Poland. They then pronounced with a common voice, that the throne was vacant The fellion of that day was not yet ended, when at courier from the king of Sweden brings a letter from his majefty to the affembly. The cardinal opens their letter, which contained an order in form of a requelt to elect prince James Sobiefky for their king. They were disposed to obey with joy, and fixed the day of the election. The prince was then at Breflau in Silefia, waiting with impatience for the crown, which his father had wore. He was complimented upon it. and fome flatterers hadeven already given him the title of majefty, in speaking to him. As he was one day hunting at fome leagues off from Brellau with prince Conftantine one of his brothers, thirty Saxon horfemen, fent privately by king Augustus, break out of a sudden upon them from a neighbouring wood, furround the two princes, and carry them off without refistance. Fresh horfes flood ready at a distance, upob which they were immediately carried to Lipfick, and clofe confined. This ftep at once broke all the meafures of Charles, the cardinal, and the allembly at Warfaw.

Fortune, which makes foort with crowned heads, threw king Auguflus almoft at the fame time upon the point of being taken himfelf. He was at dinner within three leagues of Cracow, relying upon an ad-wanced guard poled at fome diffance, when general Renchild came fuddenly upon him, after having cararied off the guard. The king of Poland had but juft lime to get on horfback with ten others. General Renchild parted him ford vays, ready to fize upon himfevery moment. The king fied to Sendomier, and the Swadih general followed him thirter; and it was a fingular piece of good fortune, that he made his efcape.

In the mean time the kings party treated that of the cardinal, and were reciprocelly treated by them, as traitors to their country. The army of the crown lwas divided between the two factions. Augultus forceed at all to accept of fuecours from the Molecouries, trepented that he had not applied to them fooner. Sometimes he marched into Saxony, where this forces were exhaulted; and fometimes he would return into Poland, where they durft not affift him. On the other fude the king of Sweden reigned in Poland calm and vieborious; and more abfolutely than Augultus lad ever done.

Count Piper, who was as much of a politician; as his mafter was of a hero, laid hold of the opportunity to advife Charles XII. to take upon himfelf the crown of Poland. He reprefented to him how cafily the might bring it about with a victorious army, and a powerful party in the heart of a kingdom, which he had already brought under fubjection. He tempted him with the title of defender of the Evangelical religion, a name which flattered the ambition of Charles. It was ofy for him, he faid, to do in Poland what Guftayus Vaza had done in Sweden : to introduce Lutheranifm, and break the chains of the people, now flaves to the nobility and clergy. Charles gave way to the temptaion for a moment; but glory was his idol. He facrificed his interest to it, and the pleafure he would have had in taking Poland from the pope. He told Count Piper, that he liked better to give away kingdoms than gain them, and added fmilling: You were made for the minifler of an Italian princs.

Charles lay ftill near Thorn, in that part of roya Pruffia which belongs to Poland ; he thence obfervect all that was transacted at Warfaw, and kept the neighbouring powers in awe. Prince Alexander brother or the two Sobielkys, who were carried off in Silefia, came to demand vengeance of him: The king promifed it him the more readily, as he judged it eafy, and that he should be thereby revenged himself. But being impatient to give Poland a king, he offered the the throne to prince Alexander, which fortune feemed bent to deny to his brother. He did not in the least expect a refusal. But prince Alexander told him, that nothing should ever engage him to make an advantage of his eldeft brothers misfortune. The king of Sweden, Count Piper, and his friends, and especially the young palatine of Posnania, Staniflaus Lecfinsky, pressed him to accept of it. But he continued firm in his refolution. The neighbouring princes were aftonished at the news, and knew not whom they thould admire moft ; a king of Sweden. who at two and twenty years old gave away the crown of Poland, or Prince Alexander, who refuted to accep: it.

BOOK III.

Y OUNG Stanifus Lechniky was than deputed by the aliembly at Warfaw to give an account to the king of Sweden of leveral differences which had anole among them fince prince James was extride away. Staniflust had a very coggging alpect, full of bravery and fweetneds, with an air of probity and opennels, which is doubled the greatel of alloutward advantager, and adds a greater weight to words than eloquence itide. The differention with which he fooke of king Augustus, of the allembly, the cardinal primate, and the different interefts which divided Poland, made an impreffion upon Charles XII. He was a prince that underflood mankind exceedingly well, and had fucceeded in the choice he had made of his generals and minifiers. He defignedly prolonged the conference, that he might the better found the genius of the young deputy. And after the audience he faid aloud, That he had not feen a man fo fit to reconcile all parties. He firait made inquiry into the character of the palatine of Lecfinsky; and was informed that he was a perfon of great courage and inured to fatigue ; that he lay conftantly upon a kind of ftraw mattrefs, requiring no fervice of his domefticks about his perfon; that he was of a temperance before unknown to that climate ; liberal, and adored by his vaffals; and the only nobleman perhaps in in Poland, who had any friends, at a time when no regard was paid to any ties but those of interalt and faction.

This character, which in many particulars referbled his own, determined him entirely. He advifed with no body, but without any caballing, or even publick deliberation, be faid to two of his generals, flewing them Lecinfix; fee there is the king values the Poles faul have.

His refolution was fart, and Staniflane as yet knew prohing, of the matter, when the cadinal prinste came to wait upon Charles. The prelate was king during the interregum, and was defirous of prolonging his transfert authority. Charles asked him whom he thought in Poland deferving of the crown. I know but three, andwred the cadinal. The firlt is the Prince Sapieba; but his imperious, cruel and defpotick humour will never agree well with a free people. The fecond is Lubormitky, grand general of the crown, put he is too old, and is farther furfpedted of lowing money too much. The third is the palatine of Polnania, more deferving indeed than the other two, if his want of experience did not fender him uncapable of governing fo capricious a nation. The cardinal thus excluded all whom he propofed and would have them believed unfit to reign whom he had pronounced alone worthy of it. The king of Sweden concluded the convertation by telling him, that Strainfaux Leefinsky fhould be their king.

The cardinal had fcarce left the king, before her received a courier from the lady, who was abfolute over him. She told him in her letter, that fhe was refolved to marry her daughter to the fon of Lubormisky, and conjured him to employ all his intereff with the king to give the crown of Poland to the father. The letter came too late, the cardinal had given impressions of Lubormisky, as he could never efface. He used his utmost address to draw the king of Sweden infenfibly into the new interest which he embraced, and ftrove more effectially to divert him from the choice of Staniflaus. But what have you, fays the king, to object againft him ? fir fays the prelate, he is too young. The king drily anfwered he is much about my age, turned his back upon the prelate, and immediately difpatched Count Hoorn to fignify to the affembly at Warfaw, that they muft elect a king in five days, and that they mult chufe Staniflaus Lesfinsky. Count Hoorn arrived upon the 7th of July, and fixed the day of the election on the 12th, as if he had ordered the decampment of a battalion. The cardinal primate, diffappointed of the fruit of fo many intrigues, returned to the affembly, where he left no flone unturned to make the election, wherein he had no fhare, prove abortive. But the King of Sweden coming himfelf incognito to Warfaw, he was obliged to be filent. All that the primate could do was to abfent himfelf from the election ; he determined to act as neuter, without appearing to affift or oppofe the refolution of the king of Sweden. carrying himfelf even between Augustus and Staniflaus, and waiting for an opportunity of prejudicing then both.

On Saturday the 12th of July, the day appointed for the election, about three in the afternoon the affembly met at Colo, the place defigned for the ceremony, and the bifhop of Pofnania prefided inftead of the primate. He came attended with feveral perfons of diffinction, and a large body of gentlemen of the party. The king of Sweden mixt with them that he might in fecret enjoy the fruits of his power. Count Hoorn and two other general officers affifted publickly at the folemnity, as embaffadors extraordinary from Charles to the republic. The feffion lafted till nine in the evening; and the bifhop of Pofnania put any end to it by declaring in the name of the diet, Stani/laus elected king of Poland. Charles XII. was the first in the crowd to cry out vivat ; they threw up their hats into the air, and the noise of the acclamations quite fliffed the cries of the oppofers.

The name of king made no alteration in the manneers of Staniflaus; it only caufed him to turn bis thoughts fornewhat more towards war. A florm had placed him upon the throne, and another might drive him thence. He had one half of his kingdom yet to conquer, and was to fecure himfelf in the other, and being treated as a fovereign at Warfaw, and a rebel at Sendomir; he prepared, by force of arms, to make himfelf acknowledged by all the world.

Charles XII. immediately departed from Warfaw to go finith the conquet of Polond. He had fixed the general rendezvous of hit army before Leopold, the capital of the gratt palatinate of Ruffia, a place confiderable in itielf, and nuch more for the riches it contained. It was thought that it would hold out fifteen days, by means of the fortifications which king Augulus had made there. The conqueror fat down before it on September 5, and the next day carried it by affault; and all that refifted were put to the fivord. The videorings troops who were now mafters of the town, did not difismd to run after pilage, notwithfanding the report of the treafures which were in Leopold; but ranged themfelves in order of battle in the great fquare. There the remains of the garifon came to farrender themfelves prifoners of war. The king then proclaimed his orders by found of trompet, that all the inhabitants who had any effects belonging to king Angultus or his adherents, thould bring them in perfon before night came on, under pain of death. The measures were fo well taken, than few ventured to difloke bilm, and they brought his majely four handred chefts filled with gold and filver voin, pate and other things of vale.

The beginning of Staniflaus's reign was almost the fame day made remarkable by a very different event. Some affairs which abfolutely required his prefence had obliged him to continue at Warfaw. He had with him his mother, his wife, and his two daughters, of which the youngest was then but a year old, and has fince been queen of France. The cardinal primate, the bifhop of Pofnania, and fome great ment of Poland made up his new court. His guards confifted of fix thousand Polanders of the army of the crown, who were lately brought over into his fervice ; and whole fidelity he had not yet made trial of. Gene-h ral Hoorn, the governot of the town, had not with him belides above fifteen hundred Swedes. They were at Warfaw in perfect tranquillity, and Stanif-Jaus reckoned to depart thence in a few days to go h to the conqueft of Leopold : when all of a fudden he received information, that a numerous army was drawing near to the town. This was king Augufaus, who by a fresh effort, and one of the finest marches that ever general made, having eluded the king of Sweden, was coming up with twenty thousand men, to fall upon Warfaw, and carry off his rival. Wasfaw was very ill fortified, and the Polifh troops, Warlaw was very ill fortified, and the Polith troops, who defended it, were not to be relied on. Auguflus had intelligence within the town; and if Staniflaus sarried, he was fure to be undone. He fent his family therefore into Pofnania, under the guard of those Polifh troops, in whom he could put molt confidence. The cardinal primate fled one of the irft to the frontiers of Pruffia, Several gentlemen took different roads. The new king went directly to Charles XII. learning early to fuffer difgrace, and forced to quit his capital within fix weeks after he had been there advanced to the fovereignity. The bifhop of Pofnania, alone could not efcape, being confined to Warfaw by a dangerous illnefs. One part of the fix thousand Polanders followed Staniflaus. and another conducted his family. They feat those into Pofnania, whofe fidelity they would not expose to the temptation of returning into the fervice of king Augustus. As to general Hoorn, who was governor of Warfaw in the name of the king of Sweden. he took up his relidence in the caftle with his fifteen hundred Swedes.

Auguflus entered the capital as a fovereign incenfiel and videorious. Every inhibitant was taxed beyond his abilitics, and ill treated by the folders. The cardinal's palace and all the houfes of the confidence lords with all their pollunder. Count Hoorn flood the conflant fire of the enemy in the calle, wherein he was encloked ; but the place at lalf being no more able to hold ont, he was forced to beat a pairley, and remained priloner of war, with his fifteen hundred Swedes. This was the first davantige that king Auguflus gained, in the torrent of his ill fortune, againft the videorious arms of his enemy.

Count Hoorn, releafed upon his parole, came to Leopold, within a finall time after Stanilaus. He took the liberty of complaining a little to the king of Sweden, that his majelly had not relieved Warfaw. Be not awder much concern about it, my dear couid, (Gay the king) we mult let king Angulus do Jonething by way of amatement, or otherwise be would grow tired of having us fo long in his neighbourhood; but take m word far it, he shall not be the better for this advantage.

The conqueror, accompanied by king Stanillau went in quelt of his enemy at the head of the berpart of his troops. The Saxon army fled conflant before him. The rowns for thirty miles round fenhim their keys, and no day palled which was not fignalized whith fome advantages. Succeffes began t grow too familiar to Charles. He faid it was rathehunting than fighting, and complained of not buyin a victory.

Augufus committed the care of his atmy for fom time to count Shullenburg, a very able general; an indeed he flood in need of all his experience at the head of an army under fuch difcouragements. H was under more concern to prefere his nafler's stroops than to conquer; he acted by firstagem, and the two kings with vigour. He marched off unknow to them, forzed upon advantageous palages, and facified fome horfe, to give time to his foot to reir with fafety.

After feveral artifices and countermarches he found himfelf near Punitz in the palatinate of Pofnania, ima gining that the king of Sweden and king Staniflau were above fifty leagues off from him. But coming thither, he learnt that the two kings had marched thole fifty leagues in nine days, and were ready te fall upon him with ten or twelve thousand horse Shullemburg had not a thoufand herfe, nor above eight thousand foot, and was to keep his ground a gainst a fuperior army, the name of the king of Sweden, and and the natural fears which fo many defeated had raifed in the Saxons. He was ever of opinion, though oppofed in it by the German generals that the foot might fland against the horse in an open campaign, even without the benefit of Ghevaux' de Frife; and he ventured to make trial of it that day against the victorious horse commanded by the two kings, and the most experienced of the wedifh generals. He pofted himfelf fo advantageoufly, that he could not be furrounded ; his first rank bent one knee upon the ground, and was armed with pikes and fufees ; the foldiers flood extremely clofe, and prefentend to the enemies horfe a kind of rampart pointed with pikes and bayonets; the fecond rank bending a little upon the fhoulders of the first, fired over their heads, and the third flanding upright. fired at the fame time behind the other two. The Swedes fell upon the Saxons with their ufual impemolity, who waited for them unfhaken ; the difpharage of the mufkets, the pikes and bayonets flarted the horfes, and fet them a capering initead of adwancing. By this means the Swedesmade their attack in diforder, and the Saxons defended themfelves by acceping their ranks.

If Charles had ordered his horfemen to alight, the army of Shullemburg must have been inevitably detroyed. There was nothing the general was fo much afraid of, and he every moment expected that the enemy would have taken that refolution. But neither the king of Sweden, who had fo often practifed all the stratagems of war, nor any of his generals ever thought of it. This unequal fight of a body of horfe against the foot, though often interrupted and renewed, lasted three hours. The Swedes lost more horfes than men. Shullemburg at laft gave way, but his troops were not broken. He drew them up into an oblong battalion, and, though he had received five wounds in the engagement, he retired in good order in this form about midnight to the fmall town of Gurau, within three leagues of the field of battle. And he fcarce began to breathe in that place. before the two kings appeared fuddenly at his heels. Beyond Guran, towards the river Oder, lay a thick wood, through which the Saxon general led his file tigued army. The Swedes without pauling purfuel him through the thickets of the wood, making the way with difficulty through places which were fcare paffible by people on foot ; and the Saxons had not croffed the wood above five hours before the Swedie horfe. On the other fide the wood runs the river Parts; at the foot of a village named Rutlen. Shu lemburg had fent before in all hafte to get the boat together, and carried his troops acrofs the river which were already half loft. Charles was come to on fide of the river by that time Shullemburg had got t the other. No general ever retreated with fo much art, nor did ever conqueror fo brifkly purfue his e nemy. The reputation of Shullemburg depended up pon his efcaping from the king of Sweden, and the king thought his glory concerned in taking Shullema burg and the reft of his army, he loft no time, but fwam his horfe crofs the river. And thus the Saxon were enclosed between the river Parts, and the great river Oder, which has its fource in Silefia, and i in this place very deep and rapid.

The lofs of Shullemburg appeared inevitable: ht ftill ftrove all he could to extricate himfelf from this extremity by one of those turns of art, which are a valuable as victorious, and the more glorious, becaufer fortune has no fhare in them. He had not above four thousand men left; a mill, which he filled with granadiers, lay on his right hand, and a morafs or his left ; he had a Fosse before him, and his rear guard was upon the banks of the Oder. He had no bridges of boats to throw over the river, but in the evening gave orders for planks. Charles upon his arrival immediately attacks the mill in full perfusion that, after he had taken it, the Saxons must either perifh in the river, or die fword in hand, or at leaft furrender themfelves prifoners at differention with their generals. In the mean while the planks were got ady, and the Saxons paffed the Oder over them jin enight; and when Charles had forced the mill, be and no more of the enemys army. The two mgs honoured this retreat with their commendatist, and it is focke of to this day in the empire ith admiration. And Charles could not help faying, builtenburg has conquered at is day.

But what was thus glorious to Shullemburg, was f very little fervice to king Augulus. He once ore abandoned Poland to his nemies, withdrew insaxony, and repaired the fortifications of Drellen ith precipitation, already with reafon trembling for the capital of his hereditary dominions.

This was Poland induced by Charles XII. His meral after his example had beaten feveral final dies of Mufcovites in Courland, who ever fince e great battle of Narva had not filewn themfelves in final companies and made war in hofe quarrs like the vagabond Tartars, who plunder and in away, and appear ogait but to fly again.

The confercation was folemnized quictly and magficently October 4, 1705, in the town of Wardaw, provishitanding the oftaal collow in Poland of crowng their kings at Cracow. Stanillaus Lecfinfly and s wife Charlotte Opalinska were conferented king ad queen of Poland by the hands of the Archbithop topold, affilted by feveral other prelates. Charles H, was prefent at the ceremony misginic, as he had en at the election; the only fruit he resped from a conqueit.

Whill he was thus giving a king to the conquered plet, and Denmark did not prefume to trouble him; all the king of Prufia courted his friendhip, and ugulta was retired to his hereditary dominions; the car grew every day more formidable. He had ably affilted Acguftas in Poland, but had made werful divertions in Ingria.

He not only began to be a great foldier himfelf, but alfo to teach his Mufcovites the art of war t diffip line was eltablished in this troops : he had great any goos officers; and had learnt the great art of fubfilims his armies. Some of his generals both knew how t fight, and if occafion required, to decline it; any belides, he had got together a fleet which was abl.

Grown ftrong by all thefe advantages which were owing to his genius only, and the abfence of the king of Sweden, he took Narva by affault, on Aut guft 21, 1704, after a regular fiege, having prevents ed its being relieved either by fea or land. As foot as the foldiers were maliers of the town, they fell the plunder, and gave themfelves up to the most enor mous barbarities. The Czar ran from place to place to put a flop to the diforder and maffacre. He hime felf inatched the women out of the hands of the follow diers, who were going to cut their throats, after have ing ravished them. He was even obliged to kill with his own hands feveral Mufcovites, who did not hear ken to his orders. They yet fhew the table in the townhouse at Narva, upon which he laid his fword as he entered, and tell the words, which he fpoke te the citizens, who flocked thither after him : It is not fays he, with the blood of the inhabitants, that my for is flained, but with that of the Mulcovites, which

The Car alpired farther than the defruction otowns. He was at that time laying the foundation of a city not far from Narva, in the middle of his new conquefts. This was the city of Petersburg, which he has fince made the feat of his refidence, and the center of his trade.

The Czar, in thus forming bijmfelf new dominionsheld out fill an helping hand to king Auguftus, who was looling his; he perfoaded him by general Pakal, who had lately palfed into the fervice of Mufeo vy, and was then the Czars embafished in Saxon-

61 to come to Grodno to confer with him once more uoon the unhappy flate of his affairs. King Augustus came thither with fome troops, attended by General Shullemburg, whofe paffage over the Oder had rendered him famous in the north, and in whom he placed his 1.ft hopes. The Czar arrived, with an hundred thousand men marching after him. The two monarchs formed new schemes of war. King Aupultus, as he was dethroned, was no longer afraid of exafperating the Poles by giving up their country to Muscovite troops. It was refolved that the Czar's army should be divided into feveral bodies to oppofe every motion of the king of Sweden. During the ime of this interview, king Augustus instituted the order of the White Eagle, a weak expedient to draw over to his interest certain Polish lords, who were more defirous of real advantages, than a mere nomihal honour, which becomes ridiculous, when held of a prince, who has nothing left to a king but the title. The conference of the two kings ended in an extraordinary manner. The Czar departed fuddenly, and left his troops to his ally, to go and extinguish a rebellion in perfon, which threatened him in Aftracan. He was fearce gone from him, before king Augustus ordered Patkul to be taken up at Drefden. All Euope were in amaze, that, contrary to the laws of nakions, and in appearance, to his own intereft, he hould venture to imprifon the embaffador of the only prince who protected him.

The fecret of the affair was thus. Patkul proferibed in Sweden for having maintained the privileges of Livonia his country, had been general to king Anbullus ; but his high and active fpirit ill agreeing with the haughty difpolition of General Fleming, the kings Favourite, more imperious and more active than himfelf, he had paffed into the fervice of the Czar, whole general he then was and embaffador to Augustus, Hc was a man of great difcernment and had diffeovered that the views of Fleming and the chancellor of Saxony, were to offer preservo the king of Sweden at any trate. He formernormediately a defign to prevent them, and to bring about an accommodation between the Cara and Sweden. The chancellor countermined his project, and cobained leave to feize upon his perform. King Augults toid the Cara; that Patkol was a perifidicat wetch, and woold betray them both. However, he lad no other justl, but that of having ferevel his new maller too well; but an unfafonable piece of fervices is often recompended with the pusifilment of tratform.

In the mean while the hundred thouland Muffacorizes on one fide, divided into feveral fmall bodies, burnt and ravaged the eltares of the adherents to Stanifluezy and Shullemburg on the other was advancing with his freh troops. But the fortune of the Swede, difpended thefe two armics in lefs than two months. Charles XII, and Staniflaus fell upon the feparate bodies of the Mufcovites, one after another ; 16 briffsly, that one Mufcovite general was beaten before her knew of the defeat of his companion.

No obliade could put a flop to the progrefs of the conqueror. If he found a tiver in his way betwich fivin and the enemy, Charles and his Swedes would fivin their horfes over it. One party of Swedes took the baggage of Augultos in which were too hundred thoughnd crowns of filver coin ; Staniflaus made a fiziare of eight hundred thoufand ducats belonging to Prince Menzico the general of the Mafsovites. Charles at the head of his horfe would often march thirty leagues in four and twenty hours, every foldier leading another horfe in his hand to mount, when his own was weary. The Mafcovites, terrified and reduced to a fnall number, fied in diforder beyond the Borifethenes.

Whilf Charles was thus driving the Mufcovites before him into the heart of Lithuania, Shullemburg at laft repaffed the Oder, and came at the head of twenty thouland men to give battle to the grand a

Mareschal Renchild, who was looked upon as the belt general Charles XII had, and was called the Parmenio of the Alexander of the north. These two famous generals, who feemed to fhare in the fate of their mafters, met near Punitz in a place called Frawenflad, a territory already fatal to the troops of Ausuftus. Renchild had no more than thirteen battalions and two and twenty fquadrons, which all togother made about ten thousand men : and Shullemburg had twice as many. It is to be observed, that he had in his army between fix and feven thoufand Mulcovites, which had long been difciplined in Saxony, and were looked upon as experienced foldiers, who joined the German discipline to the Ruffian fierce. neis. The battle of Fravenfisd was fought on Fe-bruary 12, 1706. But this very general Shullemburg, who with four thousand men had in a manner eluded the fortune of the king of Sweden, funk under that of general Renchild. The engagement lafted not i quarter of an hour, the Saxons did not relift a moment, and the Mufcovites threw down their arms ubon the first appearance of the Swedes; the terror was fo fudden, and the diforder fo great, that the conquerors found upon the field of battle feven showand fufees all charged, which they had thrown away without firing. No defeat was ever quicker, more compleat, and more fhameful ; and yet no general had ever made a finer disposition than Shullemburg that day, by the confession of all the Saxons and Swedist Officers, who learnt by the confequence how little buman prudence is miltrels of events.

Among the prifoners there was found an entire retriment of Frenchmen; thefe wretches had been taken offiners by the troops of Saxony in 1704, at the amons battle of Hoelled, fo fatal to the grandear of Lewis XIV. They had ince calified menidews into the fervice of K. Augoflus, who had formed them fatto a regiment of dragoons, had given the command of them to a Frenchman of the family of joycet.

The colonel was killed upon the firft, or rither the only charge of the Sweder: and the entire regiment were made prifoners of war. From that day thefe Frenchmen defired that they might be allowed to ferce Charles XII, and were received in his fervice by a fingular fate, which referved them to change again their conqueron and mafter.

As to the Mufcovites they begged for life upon their knees; but Renchild ordered them to be inhumanly maffacred in cold blood above fix hours after the battle, to revenge on them the violences of their countrymen, and different binfelf of a number of prifoners he knew not what to do with.

But though the troops of Charles XII. lived under fo fevere a difcipline, that they plundered not the towns which were carried by affault, before they had leave ; that they even plundered in a regular manner, and left upon the first fignal, and the Swedes to this day boaft of the difcipline they observed in Saxony ; yet the Saxons complain of most terrible ravages committed by them; contradictions which it would be impossible to reconcile, if we did not confider that men are apt to look upon the fame objects with different views. It can fcarce be conceived but that the conquerors muft at fome times have tranfgreffed the rules of decency ; and the conquered fhould cenfure the flighteft damages, as the most shocking injuries. One day, as the king was riding out near Liplic, a Saxon peafant threw himfelf at his feet to . alk juffice of him againft a grenadier, who had juft taken from him what he had defigned for his family's dinner. The king ordered the foldier to be brought before him, And is it true fays he, with a flern sountenance, that you have robbed this man? fir, fays the foldier, I have not done him fo much mischief, as your majesty has done his master ; you have taken a kingdom from him, and I have only taken a turkey from this fellow. The king gave the poor man ten ducats with. his own hand, and pardoned the foldier for the boldacls of his reply, faying, Remember, friend, if I have taken a kingdom from king Auguflus, I have taken nothing for myfelf.

King Augufus wandring in Poland, and deprived at once both of his kingdom and deklorate, at laft wrote a letter with his own hand to Charles XII. to ask a peace. This letter he fecretly fent by Baron imhof and Monf. Finiten, referendary of the privy bouncil, his two plenipotentiaries came by night to Charles XII's camp, and had a private audience. The king read the letter, and, geatlemen, fays he to the plenipotentiaries. I wail groe you my anywer in a waman. He firair retired into his cabinet, and wrote ts follows:

Confent to give peace upon the following conditions, in which it muss hot be expected that I shall make the least alteration:

1. That king Augustus renounce for ever the crown of Poland; that he acknowledge Stanifaus as lawful king, and that he promise never to remount the throne, not even after the death of Staniflaus.

II. That he renounce all other treaties, and particularly those he has made with Muscowy.

111. That he fend back with honour into my camp the Prince Sobiefky, and all the prisoners he has been able to take.

1V. That he deliver into my honds all the deferters, mbich have entered into his fervice, and particularly John Patkul; and that all proceedings beflopped againft fach as have paffed from his fervice into mine.

He gave this paper to count Piper, charging him to negotiate the reft with the plenipotentiaries of king Augustus.

Whill this peace was filently negotiating in Saxony, fortune feemed to put king Augustus into a condition of obtaining one more bonourable, and of .

of treating with his conqueror upon a more equafooting.

Prince Menzicoff, generalifimo of the Mufcovite army, brought him into Poland a body of thirty thouland men, at a time when he not only did nor define their affillance any longer, but even feared it.

In this nice circumstance there appeared in viewe of the army, one of the Swedifh generals, named Maderfield, at the head of ten thousand men at Califh, near the palatinate of Pofnania. Prince Menzicoff preffed king Augustus to give them battle. Their king in the utmost perplexity delayed it under feveral protexts ; for though the enomy had but one third in number, there were four thousand Swedes in Maderfield's army, and that was enough to render the event doubtful; and to fall upon the Swedes during the negotiation, and lofe the victory, was to ruin him past all redemption. He therefore determined to fend a perfon upon whom he could rely to the general of the enemy, to let him into part of the feeret of the peace, and advife him to retreat ; but this advice had a very different effect from what was expected. General Maderfield imagined that a fnare was laid to intimidate him, and upon the bare force of that imagination he refolved to risk the battle.

The Muffcovites that day conquered the Swedes in a pitched battle for the first time. This viffory, which king Augulus gained almost againft his own inclination, was compleat, and he entered triumphant in the mild of his kingdom, but then a difmantled and rinked town, ready to receive any conqueror, and to acknowledge the firongeft for king. He was tempted to ficize upon this moment of projerity, and to fall upon the king of Sweden in Saxony with the Muffcovite army. But upon receivel any, which till then had been invincible, that the Muffcovites would forfake him upon the full information of the iterativ he had begun; that Saxony, his hereditary dominions, already exhausted of men and money, would be equally ravaged by the Mulcovites and Swedes; that the empire taken up in a war with France could not affift him ; that he fhould be left without dominions. money, or friends; he judged it better to comply with the terms the king of Sweden should impose upon him. Thefe terms were made more fevere, when Charles had imformation, that king Augustus had fallen upon his troops during the negotiation. His paffion and the pleafure of humbling an enemy ftill more, who had gained an advantage over him, made him the more inflexible upon all the articles of the treaty. Thus the victory of king Augustus ferved only to render his lituation the more unfortunate, a circumfance which in all probability never happened to any one but himself.

He had juft fung Te Deum at Warfaw, when Finflen, one of his plenjotentiaries, arrived from Saxony, with the treaty of peace, which deprived him of his crown. Auguftus paufed a while, but figued its, and then fet out for Saxony, in vaim hopes, that his preferge might foften the king of Sweden, and that his energy would pertaps call to mind the antient alliances of their houfes, and the blood which united them.

The two princes firft met at Guntersdorf in Gonne iPers's quarters, without any ceremony. Charles XII, was in Jack boots, with a piece of black taffety tied around his neck inflead of a cravat ; his cloths were as ulual made of a coarfe blev cloth, with bright buttons. He had a long fword by his fide, which had fereed him in the battle of narva, and upon the pummel of which he would often lean. The convertainton turned wholly upon this flrange kind of drets, and thole great boots. Charles XII. told king Augultus, he had not Jaid them atide for far years, except when he went to fleep. B_bleftifies were the fole difcourfe, that paffed between two kings, whereof one had taken away thes crown from the other. Augufus fooke all the while with an air of complationer and faisfailion, which princes and great men accurdionatelo bufined fa know howe to put on in the midfl of the molt cruel mortifications. The two kings direct loggether feveral times a flerwards. Charles always affected to give the right hand to kings Augufus; but fo far from foftening the rigoor of his demands, that he made them full harder. He obliged the King Elector, not only to fend Staniflaus the jewels and recents of the crown, but withal to write him a letter of congratulation upon his acceffion. And he abfolutely inflited upon giving up of general Patkul without delay. Augufus therefore was forced to write his rival the following letter.

SIR and BROTHER,

A S longht to bone regard to the requests of the king majely alon your accellion to the orway, though perhaps the advantagious treaty the King of Sweden has lately concluded for your majely, mights have excuded an form this exercipandence : bouwever, I congratulate your majely, befeeching God, that your fableds may be more faithful for your than they have been to me,

Lipfic. Ap. 8. Augustus King. 1707.

STANISLAUS answered,

SIR and BROTHER,

THE correspondence of your majelly is a fresh obligation which I cowe to the king of Sweden; I have a july fease of the compliments your make ma your my coming to the crown: and I hope my fubjects will have no room to fail of their fedility trowards me as I fail obfere the laws of the kingdom.

STANISLAUS king of POLAND.

King Staniflaus came himfelf to Lipfic, where he one day met King Augullus; but the two princesboued to each other without freaking. This was the heighth of Charles Xilh's triumph, to fee two kings in his court, whereef one had been crowned, and the other dethrond by his arms.

Augustus was farther obliged to order all the magifstrates under him not to treat him as king of Poland any longer, and to efface the title he rencunced, out of the public prayers. He was lefs concerned about fetting the Sobiefkies at liberty; though thefe princes, upon coming out of prifon, refufed to fee him ; but the facrifice of Patkul was a circumstance of great mortification. The Czar on one fide loudly demanded him back as his embaflador, and on the other the King of Sweden made terrible threats, if they refused to give him up to him. Patkul was then thut up in the caftle of Konifting in Saxony. King Augustus thought he might find an expedient to fatisfy Charles XII, and his own honour at the fame time. He fent his guards to deliver up the unhappy prifoner to the Swedifh troops; but fent before a fecret order to the governor of Konifling to let him efcape. Patkuls ill fortune took place of the care that was taken to fave him. The governor knowing him to be very rich, would have had him bought his liberty. But the prifoner relying still upon the law of nations, and informed of the intentions of King Augustus, refused to pay for what he thought he flould obtain for nothing. During this interval, the guards appointed to feize upon him arrived, and immediately gave him up to four Swedifh Officers, who carried him ftraight to the generals quar ters at Alrnftad, where he continued three months tied to a flake with a heavy chain of iron; and thence he was carried to Calimir.

Charles XII. forgetting that Patkul was the Czars embalfador; and confidering only that he was born his fubject, ordered a council of war to pais fentence upon him with the utmost rigour. He was condemned to be broke alive and quarterd. A chaplain came to let him know, that he was to die, without informin him of the manner of his punishment. Upon the inford mation, this man, who had braved death in fo man battles, finding himfelf alone with a prieft, and him courage no longer fupported by glory or paffion the fources of intrepidity, poured out a flood of tears into the chaplains bofom. He was engaged to a Saxon lady named Madam D Enfilden, who had all the advantages of birth, merit and beauty, and whom he had thoughts of marrying much about the fame time that he was given up to punifhment. He defired the chaplain to wait upon her, to comfort her, and affure her that he died full of the tendereft regards for her. When he was led to the place of punithment, and faw the wheels and flakes prepared for his execution, he fell into convultions of terror, and threw himfelf into the arms of the minifier, who embraced hin;, and covered him with his cloak, and wept over him. A Swedifh. officer then read aloud a paper, which contained the following words.

This is to declare, that the experts order of his Majelly, our meft merciful Lord is, that this man, who is a traiter to his country, be broke upon the wheel and guartered, for the reparation of his crimet, and for an example to taker; that every one maxitale care of treafon, and faitsfully force his him. At the words, molt merciful Lord, Patkel cryed out, What mercy? at not they of traiter to his country; alar, for he, I have freed it to well. He received fixten blows, and endured the longeft and moft dreadful rotures, that can be imagined. Thus did the unfortunate John Renold Patkel, embafishor and general to the Emperor of Moleovy.

His members were quartered, and remained expofed upon glibbets, till 1713, when Augufus having regained his throne, ordered theie telimonies of the needfuy he was reduced to at Alranthad to be collected together. They were brought to him in a box to Warlaw, in prefeace of the french mbaffador. The King of Poland fhewing the box to the minilter, faid fimply to thin, See the members of Takkal, without any addition of blame or complaint, r without any of the perfons prefent venturing to oeak upon fo tender and fo mournful a fubject.

Charles behaved in the fame manner towards geeral Fleming, the favourite, and fince the first minier of king Augustus. Fleming was born in the Swe-With Pomerania; and though from his infancy he had een attached to the Elector of Saxony, Charles lookd upon him always as his lubject, and had long emanded him to be given up to him. Fleming, when the faw his mafter in a condition of refufing nothing ed into Pruffia, from whence he wrote a letter to ting Staniflaus, with whom he had been acquainted h Poland, to beg of him, that he would prevail with the king of Sweden to lay ande his refentments against fim. Staniflaus applied in his favour with warmth, and for eight days fucceffively repeated his entreaties, seithout any effect ; at last he almost threw himfelf at he feet of Charles, who faid to him, My brother, at our request I grant you his life : but remember, you will one day repent of what you have done. Indeed Heming did afterwards ferve his mafter againft Stan-Baus, much beyond what his duty obliged him to. About the fame time one Paikel, a Livonian, and n officer in the Saxon troops, who was taken prifoer in the field, was condemned at Stockholm by a scere of the fonte; but his feitence was only to fie his head. This difference of panilhument in the sime cafe hewed too much, that Charles, in putting atkul to fo cruel a death, had fought more to reenge inimfelf than to punifh him. However, Paikel, the his condemnation, propold to the feather, to the king into the feater of making gold, in cafe e would pardon him. He made the experiment in rifonio prefecce of colonel Humilton and the magifcares of the towns; and, whether it further that the had a reality diffeored any diffelful art, or whether he had found out one but that of deceiving plaufibly, which feems molt probable, they carried the gold whice was found at the bottom of the crucible to the min at Stockhalm, and made a report fo juridicially, anu which appeared fo important, that the queen, grand, mother of Charles, ordered the execution to be fat pended, till the king being informed of this partice latit; , fhould fend his orders to Stockholm.

The king made and/wer, That he had refield the parls of a criminal to the interactive of his friends, and he would never grant that to intereff, which he had den edt. friendhip. This indexibility had formething in a very heroical in a prince, who otherwise through the feeret politike. We not never the the fing of Sauden has faid, He did not woulder that the king of Sauden has formuch intificrence about the philosophers flone; he has found it in Szeny.

It was propofial in the Czar's conneil to make retallation by treating the Swedith officers, who wereprofiloners at Mafcow, in the fame manner. But the Czar would not confent to a barbarity, which would have been attended with fuch fattal circumflann ces; there was more Mufcovites prioners in Sweden than Sweden in Mufcov.

He longit for a more advantageous revenge. The body of his cenny's army lay idle in Saxony. Leyemhaup, the king of Sweden's general, who was lefin Poland with about twenty thouland men, was not able to guard the palles in a country without forstand full of faktions. Staniflaus was in the camp or Charles ALI. The emperor of Mulcovy feises upon this conjuncture, and re-enters Poland with about fixty houland men; he divides them into elevralboo dies, and matches with a flying camp as far as Leoo pols, which was not particined by the Swedes.

Poland had then two primates, as well as two kings the one nominated by Augulus, the other by Stani laus. The Primate, nominated by Augulus, fummor, re dthe Alfembly of Leopold, and drew thither all those whom this unfortunate prince had abandoned by the reace of Alranftad, with fuch as the Czars money and brought over to his intereft, and it was propolrd to elect a new king. So that Poland was upon the roint of having three kings at a time, without beag able to fay which was the true one.

During the conferences of Leopold, the Czar united intereft with the Emperor of Germany thro' the ommon fear they had of the king of Sweden, fecret-7 obtained of him a number of German officers. These came daily to make a confiderable augmentatien in his forces, by bringing with them experience and discipline. He engaged them to his fervice by reat rewards ; and for the better encouragement of is own troops, he gave his picture fet round with hamonds to all the general officers and colonels, who had fought at the battle of Califh ; the lower fficers had medals of gold, and every private folfer a medal of filver. These monuments of the actory at Califh were all ftruck in his new town of etersburg, where arts and fciences flourished in pro . prtion as he trained up his troops to a fenfe of emution and glory.

The confution, multiplicity of fations, and contiual ravages prevailing in Poland, hindred the diet of acopold from coming to any refolution. The Czartanlard it to Lublin. But the change of place did out leffen the diforders and uncertainty, which all cankind were in; and the alfembly fatisfied themdres with nether owning Augults, who had abcated, nor Staniflans who had been elefted asund their inclinations; but they were neither fuffitently united, nor refolute enbugh to name another Eng.

King Staniflaus fet out from Alranflad on the 15th, J. July 1707, with general Renchild, fixteen Swedifh regiments, and abundance of money, to appeale all sele troubles in Poland, and make himfelf peaceably wred. He was acknowledged wherever he paffed :

the dicipline of histroops, which the better expOsthe barbarity of the Mulcovites, gained him it e peples inclinations; his extreme affability re-united him almolt all the factions, in proportion as it we known; and his money protored him the greater part of the army of the crown. The Czar fearin be fluxed away for your in a country, which has troops had laid defolate, retired into Lithuanis, whe he had appointed the rendezvous of the feveral bras close of his army, and elfabilited magazines. Th retreat left king Stamifaus in the peaceable polfflin of almolt all Poland.

The only one, who then troubled him in his doe minions, was count Sinaiuky, grand general of th crown, of the nomination of Auguitus. He was perfon of very great shifties, and as medi ambition and was at the head of a third party. He notihe hours do a different so make himfelf elefeld, he we contented to be head of a priry, as he could not knew. The troops of the crown, who continued ur der his earnowly and fasters any other pay, beilde the hiberty of ravging their own country with in punity. And all who had fuffered from their plant to strong apprehensive of it, prefently indmittee to Stanifaus, whole power was daily confirmed. The king of Sweden was then receiving embaffa

The king of Sweden was then receiving emballs dors in his comp at Alendhid, from almost all the princes in Chrilendom. Some defired him to qui the dominions of the empire, and others prefield thin to turn his arms againft the Emepror; and it was then a current report, that be defined to join wit. France, in deprefing the louide of Aufiris. Among these embalfadors, was the fumous John duke of Miribarough, fent by Anne queen of Great Briain This man, who never laid a frege to a town while he did not take, nor forgult a battle which he dinot gain, was at St. James's a perfect courier, thi load of a party in patilament, and in foreign coma rises the moft able negotiator of his time. He did irance as much mitchief by his underflanding, as by is arms; and Fagel, fecretary of the flates general, man of very great merit, has been heard to lay, that one than once the flates general having refolved to spole what the duke of Marlborough was to lay beore them; the duke cane, floke to them in French, a which language he expredied himfelf very ill, and srough them all into his featments.

In conjunction with prince Engence, the companion of his victories, and Heinfust the grand penifonary of Holland, he fupported all the weight of the caterwizes of the allies signifit France. He knew that tharles was exafterated again the empire and the Emperor; that he was fecretly follicited by the French; and that if the conqueror flouid join binnell to Lewis SUV, the allies would be undone.

"The tree, that Charles had given his word is troo, not to intermedde in the war of Levis XIV, with the allies : but the duke of Marlborough did not beleve, that any prince would be for great a flave to his stord, as not to facrifice it to his grandeur and insered. He therefore far out from the Hayes, with a actignt to found the intentions of the king of Sweden,

As foon ashe was arrived at Lipfic, where Charles free was, he applied bindff ferently, not to Gount Piper the first minifier, but to Baron coerts, who ryan to hare the king's confidence with Piper. He old Goerts, that the define of the alice was very thordly to propole to the king of Sweden, to be a ficond time mediator between them and Prance. He aid this, in hores of difcovering by Goerts and/wer, he king's intentions, and becaute he chale much racher to have Charles for an arbitrator than an enemy. It tall, the had his public audience at Lipfic.

Upon his first addrefs to the king, he told him in reach, that he should think himfelf happy, if he could be taught under his orders, what he yet wanted to know in the art of war. He then had a private audience of an hour long, in which the kine Spoke in German, and the duke in French. Th duke, who was never in hafte to make propolition: and had learnt by a long courfe of experience, this art of penetrating into the fentiments of mankiner and finding out the fecret connection between them jumoft thoughts and their actions, geftures, and dil courfe, fixed his eyes attentively upon the king, whe he fpoke to him of war in general. He thought h perceived in his majefty a natural averfion toward France, and obferved that he was pleafed when he talked of the conquests of the allies. He mentioned the Cza to him, and took notice, that his eyes always kind dled at his name, notwithstanding the moderation d the conference ; and he farther remark'd that a man of Mulcovy lay before him upon the table. His wanted no more to determine him in his judgment that the real defign of the king of Sweden, and his fole ambition, were to dethrone the Czar, as he had already done the K. of Poland. He understood, that he had no other views, by continuing in Saxony than to impofe by that means certain hard laws upon the Emperor of Germany. But he knew that the Emperor would comply with them, and that thus mat ters would be eafily made up. He left Charles XII to his natural inclination; and being fatisfied with having discovered his intentions, he made him not kind of propofal.

The king, who had not as yet experienced ill fortune, or even any interruption of his fuccelfs, thought that one year would be fufficient for dethroning the Carr, and that then he might return and raife himafelf by his own power to the dignity of arbiter or. Europe ; but he had a mind firlt to bring down the foirte of the Emperor of Germany.

Count Zober, the Emperor's chamberlain, had fpoke very diffefpedfully of the king of Sweden, in 'theprefence of the Swedifh embaffador at Vienna. The Emperor had made amends, though much againft his will, by banifhing the count. But this would not fatisfy the king of Sweden ; he infufted upon the delivery of count Zober into his hands. The pride of the court of Vienna was obliged to floop, and give the count to the king, who fent him back, after having kept him formetime a prifoner at Sietin.

The Emperor, who was forced to make this and other concessions, abfolutely complied with the will of Charles XII. was named Joseph, the eldelt (on of Leopold, and brother to the wife Emperor Charles VI. who fucceeded him.

Count Wratiflaw, his embaffador with Charles XII. brought the treaty to Leiplic in favour of The Silefians, figned by his mafter's own hand. Charles then faid, he was fatisfied, and was the Emperor's very good friend. However, he was much difgufted the opposition he had found from Rome apon every occasion. He looked with the utmolt contempt upon the weaknefs of that court, which being et prefent an irreconcilable enemy to one half of Europe. is always in diffruft of the other, and supports its credit only by its skill in negotiations. In the mean time he meditated revenge. He told count Wratifwaw, that the Swedes had formerly conquered Rome, and had not degenerated as Rome had done. And the let the Pore know, that he would one day demand back the effects which Queen Christina had left at Rome. One cannot tell how far this young conquefor would have carried his refentments and his arnis, If fortune had profpered his defigns. Nothing them appeared impossible to him. He had even fent priwately feveral officers into Afia, and as far as Egypt, o take the plan of the towns, and inform him of the strength of those countries. 'Tis certain that if any one could have overturned the empire of the Perfimas and Turks, and then have paffed into Italy, it was Charles XII. He was as young as Alexander, as much a foldier, and as enterprifing ; but more ininefatigable, more robust, and more virtuous; and G a the Swedes perhaps exceeded the Macedonians: bu fuch projects, which are looked upon with altonifh ment, when attended with fuccets, are treated a chimaers's when they want it.

At laft, all difficulties being removel, and what ever he had a mind to be executed; after having humbled the Emperor, given law in the empire pro tetled the Lutharian religion in the middl of Roman extholicks, detherned one king, crowned another and feen himfelf the terror of all the princes around bim, he prepared for his departure. The pleafure of Saxony, where he had lain idle a full year, han made no alteration in his manner of living. He mounted on horfe-back three times a day, role a four in the morning, drelled himfelf alone, draufno wine, fat at table but one quarter of an lowar, exercifed histroopzevery day, and knew no other plea.

The Swedes did not yet know, whether their king would lead 'em ; only it was furfoeden in the army that he might go to Mofcow. Some days before his departure, he ordered the grand marefeltal of his houlhold to give him in writing the rout from Lip fic. — He paufed a while at that word, and than the marefeltal might have no fulpicion of his projectihe added (miling — to all the capital cities of Europe. The Marefhal brough him a lift of themall and at the head of them had affected to pat in great letters, The road from Lipfic to Stackholm. The gemerality of the Sweden withed only to return thitter ; but the king was far from the thought of cartrying them back into their own country. I for firs, fays he, whitter you would lead me, but we fhall not return to Stackholm (p form.

The army was already upon their match, and paffed near Drefden. Charles was at their head, and riding, according to his collom, about a quarter on half a mile before his guards. They loft fight of him all at once, and foune of the officers fourced one their horfes to fee where he was; but with all their nquiry they could not find him. The whole army mook the alarm in a moment. They made a halt. and the generals met together; and whilf they were n great confernation, they learnt at last from a Saxnn, who was paffing by, what was become of him. He had a mind, as he passed fo near Drefden, to nake a vifit to king Augustus. He entred the town on horfeback, attended by three or four general oficers, and went directly to alight at the palace. He was got as far as the electors apartment, before it was known that he was in the town. General Fleming naving feen the king of Sweden at a diftance, had only time to run and inform his mafter. All that could be done on fuch an occasion was prefented to the idea of the minister, who laid it before Augustus ; but Charles entered the chamber in his boots, before Augustus had time to recover from his surprife. He was then fick, and in a night gown, but dreffed himfelf prefently. Charles brekfasted with him as a traveller, which came to take leave of his friend, and then he expressed his defire of viewing the fortifications. During the little time that was taken up in walking round them, a Livonian condemned in Sweden, who ferved in the troops of Saxony, thought he could never have a more favourable opportunity of obtaining pardon, and begged of king Augustus, to ask it of Charles; being fully affured, that his majefty could not refufe fo flight a requeft to a prince, from whom he had taken a crown, and in whofe power he then was. Augustus was eafily prevailed upon to undertake it. He flood at a little diffance, from the king of Sweden, and was difcourfing with Hoord, a Swedish general. I believe, fays he fmiling, that your master will not refuse me. You don't know him, replies general Hoord, he will rather refule you here than any where elfe. Augustus, notwithstanding, asked a pardon for the Livonian, of the king, in very prefling terms ; and Charles denied him in Tuch a manner, that he did not think fit to ak it focund time. After laving affiel dome hours in the odd kind of vifit, he embraced king Augultus, an took him leave. Upon his returning to his arm he found all his general officers affembled in a council of war, and asked the reafon. General Renchi told him, they had determined to beliege Dreidein cafe his majelty had been detained a prifonekright, fays the king, they durft not, they durft ma. The next morning, upon the uews that king Augult us held an extraordinary council at Dreiden, Zo fee, fays Renchild, they are delikerizing upon what they found have done reflereday.

BOOK IV.

CHARLES at laft took lester of Saxony in September 1707, followed by an army of three and forty thouland men, formerly covered with leel, but then fluining with gold and liver, and enriched with the floyelis of Posi-ind and Saxony. Every folder carried with him firly crowns in ready money z all the regiments were compleat, and not only for, but in every company there was feveral fupernameraries, who waited for vacant places. Before this army, count Levenhaup, one of his beft generals, waited for him in Poland with twenty thouland ma Finland; and freh recruits were coming to him from Sweden. With all thefe forces it was not doubted bat the mult delarbone the Czar.

The Emperer of Mulcovy was then in Lithunia, employed in keeping up the fpirits of a party, which King Augultus leaned to have renounced. His troops, divided into, feveral bodies, fiel on all fdes upon the firit report of the King of Swedens supproach. He had himfelf advided all his generals never to wait for the coming up of this congreger with unequal force.

The king of Sweden in the midft of his victorious march, received a folemn embaily from the Turks. The embaffador had his audience in count Piper's muarters ; for 'twas there always that ceremonies of bomp were performed. He fupported the dignity of his mafter by a magnificient appearance; and the ing, who was always worfe lodged, worfe ferved, and more plainly clad than the meaneft officer in his firmy, would often fay that his palace was Piper's quarters. The Turkish embassador prefented Charles with an hundred Swedish foldiers ; who having been aken by the Calmucks, fold in Turkey, and redeemd by the grand Seignior, were fent by him to the sing, as the most agreeable prefent he could make him; not that the Ottoman pride pretended to pay bomage to the glory of Charles XII. but because the Bultan, a natural enemy to the Emperors of Mulcovy and Germany, was defirous of ftrength'ning himfelf against them by the friendship of Sweden, and the alfance of Poland. The embaffador complimented Staniflaus upon his advancement to the crown ; and thus he was owned as king in a very little time by Germany, France, England, Spain, and Turkey. There remained only the Pope, who before he acknowledged him, was willing to wait, till time had fettled the crown upon his head, which a turn of fortune might ftrike off.

Charles had fearce given audience to the embaffador of the Oottoman port, before he began his march in fearch of the Mufcovites.

Charles left Staniflaus in Poland with ten thouland Swedes and his new fobjects to affilt him in the prefervation of his kingdons, againd his forcign and domeltic enemics; for himfelf, he marched at the head of his horfe amidit ice and fnow towards Grodno in the month of January 1708.

Charles furmounted all difficulties, advancing fill towards the Boryfthenes. He met with twenty thoufand Mufcovites in his way intrenched in a place named Hollofin, behind a morify, which could not be coma writhout patifing a river. Charles did not wain fathe aflault till the refl of his infantry came up, ber durew himfelf into the water at the head of his focgoards, and crolled the river and the morifs, with the water fometimes above his floulders. Whill Rhthus marched against the encomy, be ordered his hort to pair round the morafs, and fall upon them in flank. The Mufcovites in amaze, what no barrier could de frend them, were at the fame time routed by the kin on foot, and by the fwedlih horfe.

The horfe having made their way through the can nemy, joined the kung in the midft of the battle. If then mounted on horfeback, but fome time after finde ing a young fweldin genteman, named Gulleafirem whom he very much effecened, wounded in the field and unable to march, he obliged bim to take his horfer and continued to command or foot at the head of his infantry. Of all the battles he had ever fought, thi in all probability was the moft glorious, that wherein he was exploid to the molt dameers, and where he flewed the greatedt abilities. The memory of i is preferved by a medal, with this infortion on one fide, Syfwae, Paludes, aggeres, hoffir eidir ; and or to other, Vittines copsa allum latura in ordem.

The Nulcovies thus obliged to fly, repaled the Boryflhennes, which feparates the dominions of Poland from their own country. Charles loft no time in the purfuit, he crofied this great river after them at Mohiloa, the lait town in Poland, which fometimes belongs to the Czar, and fometimes to the Poles, acording to the common fate of frontier places.

The Czar thus feeing his empire, in which he way, giving birth to arts and trade, become a prey to war, which in a little time might ruin all his projects, and perhaps take from him his throne, was inclined tota perace, and even vectored fome proposite by a Polith gentleman, whom he fent to the fwedith army. Charles XII, who had not been tide to grant peace to his memies, but in their capitals, only antwered, I will reat with the Caar at Mufrow. When this haughty anfacer was reported to the Caar, my brother Charles, age he, fill affects to act the Alexander; but I fuster mylel, be will not find a Darius in me.

About thirty miles northward from Mohilon, the slace where the king croffed the Borytherces, along the river, and fill upon the frontier of Poland and Mulcovy, is fusate the country of Neinefiko, in which lies the great road from Poland to Mulcow. This way the Caar retreated, and the king followed by long marches; and to clofe, that part of the rear guard of the Mulcovites was frequently engaged with the dragons of the Swedith war-guard. The latter had geaterially the advantage; but they weskened themfelves yene by conquering in thefe fimall firmitifies, which were never decifive, and in which they always loft asundance of men.

On the 22d of September, in this year 1708, the king attacked a body of ten thousand horse, and fix thoufand Calmouks near Smolensko. The king fell upon them with only fix regiments of horfe, and four thousand foot; broke their ranks upon the first onfet at the head of his Oftrogothic regiment, and forced the enemy to retreat. He advanced upon them through rough and hollow ways, where the Calmouks lay hid ; they then appeared again, and threw themfelves between the regiment where the king was fighting and the relt of the Swedish army. The Muscovites and Calmouks in an inftant furrounded this regiment, and made their way quite up to his majelty. They killed two aids de camp, who fought near his person. The kings horfe was flain under him ; and as one of his equirries was prefenting him with another, both the equerrie and horfe were ftruck dead upon the fpot. Charles fought on foot, encircled by fome of his officers, who immediately flew to relieve him, by furzounding him.

Several of them were taken, wounded or flain, or carried off to a diffance from the king by the multitude that fell upon them, fo that only five men werleft about him. He was quite fpent with faigue, has ving killed above a dozn of the eneny with his ownhand, without receiving fo much as one wound, by that inexprefible good fortune, which till them has ever attended him, and upon which he fill relied. A Jaft, Colonel Dardoff forced his way through the Calmouks with a fingle company of his regiment, anceame time enough to difingage the king. The reft or the Swedes put the Tartars to the flowed; the aremy recovered its ranks, Charles mounted bis hoffeand, futgued as he was, purfued the Mufcovites twolegagues.

The king appointed the rendezvous near the river. Defto., Mizepa prince of Ukraina promifed to meethim there with thirty thouland men, proper amunition and providions and all his treafures, which are immendly large. The levelith army therefore was orderaed to march towards that fide of the country, to the igneat alconithment of all the officers, who knew nocthing of the kings treasy with the Coffacks. Charles font orders to Levenhaup, to bring up his troops, and provifions with all ficed into Ukrania, where he defigned to paß the whice H is that having feared that counity to himdelf, he might conquer MidGovy the next figure, and in the mean time he advanced towards the a triver Derfan, which falls into the Boryfihmes at Kion.

The objiacles they had hither to encountred in their march were trilles to thole they met with in this new road. They were obliged to crofs a foreit full fifty leagues broad, which abounded in marches. General Lagercron, who marched before with five thouland men and pionees led the army thirty miles earlward out of the right way; and they had marched four days before the king diffeored the militake. With difficulbefore the king diffeored the militake. With difficulty they did get into the right road again, but left almoft all their artillery and waggons behind, which were either fuels fail or quite funk in the mad.

They marched for twelve days in this painful and aborious manner, till they had eat up the little bif just that was left, and then they arrived quite fpent with hunger and wearinefs upon the banks of the Defna, in the place where Mazzepa had appointed to meet them ; but inftead of the prince, they found a body of Mulcovites advancing towards the other fide of the river. The king was very much aftonished, aut refolved immediately to pafs the Defna, and at ack the enemy. The banks of the river were to fleep, hat they were obliged to let the foldiers down with ords; and they croffed it, acccording to their ufual manner, fome by fwimming, and others on floars affily made. The body of Mufcovites, which arfived at the fame time, were not above eight thouand men; fo that they made but fmall refiltance. and this obflacle was also furmounted.

Charles advanced farther into this wretched counry, uncertain of his road and Mazeppa's fidelity, azeppa appeared at laft, but rather as a fugitive han a powerful ally. The Mufcovites had difcoveed and prevented his defigns. They had fallen upon ne Coffacks, and cut them to pieces; his principal fiends were taken fword in hand, and thirty of hem had been broke upon the wheel. His towns ere laid in afhes, his treasures plundred, the profions he was preparing for the king of Sweden feiz -; and he was fcarce able to efcape himfelf with thousand men, and fome few horfes loaden with bld and filver. However, he gave the king hopes I fupporting him by his intelligences in this unnown country, and the affection of all the Colfacks. Tho enraged against the Muscovites, came in troops + the camp, and brought them provisions.

Charles hoped at leaft that general Levenhaup ould come and repair this ill fortune. He was to ring with him about fifteen thouland Swedes, who ere more valuable than a hundred thouland Coflacks, ith providions of annunition and victual. He arrived at laft, but almost in the fame condition as Ma zepipa.

He had already paifed the Borythenas above Mc hiloo, and advanced about twenty leagues farther, or the road to Ukrania. He brought the king a convec of eight thouland waggons, with the money he ha rolfed in Lithuania, and as he was upon his march Upon coming up towards Lefino, near the place where the rivers of Proins and Solfa join to difemborge them felves far below into the Borythenes, the Cara appeared at the head of fifty thouland men.

The Swedift general, who had not quite fistee toofinds, refoleed not to entrench. Their man vistories had infpired the Swedes with fo much com falcaces, that they never enquired after the number of the campy, but only where they lay. Levenhau therefore marched againft them without hefitation oo the leventh of Odober 1706, in the afternoon. U pon the full onfet they killed fifteen hundred Mafco viste. The Cara's arry fifthinto confiftion, and fle on all fides; and the Emperor of Rafia was upon the point of feing himfelf entirely defated. He per ceived that the fafty of his dominions depended u pon the shino of that day, and that he was uterl undone if Levenhaup joined the king of Sweden wit a viforious army.

As foon as he fire his troops begin to fall back, he ran to the rear-guard, where the Colfacis and Cal mucks were polied: I charge you, fays he, to fir apon every man that run away, and even to kill me, a I head be for councilly, as to turn my hack. From thence he turned to the van guard, and railled his troops in perions, failfield by prince Menzikof, an prince Colliefin. Levenhaup, who had prefing or ders to join his maller, choile rather to continue on his march than renew the fight, thinking he had donn coungh to difcurate the camery from particing.

At eleven the next morning the Czar attackehim on the entrance upon a morals, and drew ou his army at length, that he might furround him. The Swedes faced about, and the fight lafted two hours with equal refolution. The Mofeovites loft three times as many nen, but fill kept their ground, and the victory was undecided.

At four in the afternoon general layer brought the Car a fupply of troops. The battle was then renewed for the third time, with more fury and eagernels than ever, and lafted till night came on. At laft numbers carried it. The Swedes were broke, routed, and driven as far as to their baggage. Lewenhaup ralled his troops behind his waggoons, ard though the Swedes were conquered, they did not fly. They were about nine thoufand, and not one inagle man of them ron away; and the general drew them up as eafuly in order of battle, as though they had never beep beaten.

The Czar on the other fide paffed the night under arms, and commanded his officers under pain of being cafhiered, and his foldiers under pain of death not to für for plunder.

<sup>1</sup> The next morning at day-break, he ordered a freth affault. Levenhaup had retired to an advantageous ground at fome miles diftance, after having nailed down part of his cannon, and fet fire to his waggons.

The Mufcovice came time enough to hinder the whole convoy from being confuned in the Annes; they feized upon first thouland waggons, which they faved. The Carr, who was defined a fe complexing the defeat of the Swedes, fan general Plag to fall opon them again an bonourable expitualizion, Levenlandy refuied it, and the fifth battle was as bloody as up of the former. Of the nine thouland foldiers he had left, he lolt one hall, and the other remained inbroken. At laft night coming on, Levenhard, after her haging fulfained five battles again fifty thouland men, dwam over the Soffs, followed by the fax those-

Ind men he had left alive, and the wounded wercarried over on floats. The Care loft above usent; thoufand Mufcovites in thefe five engagements, in which he had the gloary of conquering the Swedes, and Levenhaup the reputation of dilpting the Vidorfor three days, and of retreating without being brothen at laft. He then came to his maller's eamp with the honour of having made fo good a defence, bu bringing with him either automation to any.

King Staniflaus would have been glad to have joined Charles at the fame time, but the Muccovites who had conquered Levenhaup, lay in his way, and Siniaufky employed him enough in Polend.

The King of Sweden thus found himfelf without provisions or communication with Poland, furrounded with enemies in the midle of a country, where he had fearce any refuge but his courage.

In this extremity the memorable winter of 1709, which was still more terrible in those frontiers of Europe, than it was in France, carried off part of his army, Charles refolved to brave the feafons, as he had done his enemies, and ventured to make long marches with his troops during the excellive feverity of the weather. 'Twas in one of these marches that two shouland of his men were flarved to death almost before his eyes. The horfemen had no boots, and the foot were without fhoes, and almost without clothes. They were forced to make flockings of the fkins of beailts, in the best manner they could. They often wanted bread. They were obliged to throw the beft part of their cannon into quagmires and rivers, for want of horfes to draw them along. So that this once flourifhing army was reduced to four and twenty thoufand men ready to perifh for hunger. They neither received news from Sweden, nor were able to fend thither. In this condition one fingle officer complained. How, fays the king, are you uneafy that you are fo far from your wife? if you are a foldier indeed, I will carry you to that diflance, that you shall scarce hear from Sweden once in three years.

A folder grambling, ventored to prefer thim, in preferee of the whole army, with a piece of bread, that was black and mouldy, made of barley and outs, the only food they then had, nor had they enough of this: the king received the piece of bread without the left emotion, eat it entirely up, and then fuid coldly to the foldier, P, it not goad, but it may be carent, This fittle turn, if any thing may be called little, that forese to increafe refpect and confidence, contributed more than all the reft to fupport the foweld in army under extremities, which would have been intolerable under any other general.

The Czir, who was as alive as the King of Sweder, Ster having fent freh forces into Poland, to the affinace of the confederates, united under general Snau-Ry againt Staniluus, advanced very foon into Ukramia in the middl of this fevere winter, to oppole the King of Sweden. He continued there with a view of weakening the enemy by final lengagements; for by this means he thought the fwedifi army mult be ruined entirely at laft, as it could not be recented, whilk we as able to draw frefh forces every moment out of his own dominions.

The cold there mult have been excelive indeed, fine it obliged the two armies to agree upon a fufpenfion of arms. But upon the firlt of F chernary they began to engage spain in the midtl of ice and flow. After (everal final Richmithes, and fome dindwanages, the king's army was reduced in April to 18000 wedse. Mazeppa alone, the prince of the Collicks, applied them with the needlaries of life. Without in fullance, the army mult have perified durough unger and mifery. The Czar, in this conjuncture, pfered conditions to Mazeppa, to draw him spain no bis forice. But the Collack continued faithdl o his new ally, whether it were through lear of the erible ponifiement of the wheel, by which he had lofs is friends, or whether through a defice of revenge. Charles with his eighteen thouldnal Sweds, and as many Coffacks, had not laid afide the delign, on hopes of penetrating as far as Molcow. Towards the end of May he went to lay fiege to Pultawa, upor the river Vorsklat, on the borders of Ukrania eastward, about thirteen long leagues from the Boryfthenesie where the Czar had made a magazine. If the king took it, it would open him the road to Mulcow, and in the abundance he should then posses, he could an least wait for the coming up of the fuccours he ftil. expected from Sweden, Livonia, Pomerania, and Poland. His fole refuge being then in the conqueft of Pultawa. He carried on the fiege with vigour. Mazeppa, who had a correspondence in the town, affured him, he would foon be mafter of it, and hope began to revive in his army. His foldiers looked upon the taking of Pultawa as the end of all their miferies.

The king perceived, from the beginning of the fiegethat he had taught his enemies the art of war. Prince Menzikof, notwithflanding all his precautions, threw frefit troops into the town, and the garrifon, by this means amounted to almost ten thoughnd men.

The king continued the fiege with ftill more warmth. he carried the advanced works, gave two affaults to the body of the place, and took the courtine. The flege was in this condition, when the king, having rode into the river to take a nearer view of fome on the works, received a thot from a carabine, which pierced through his boot, and fhattered a bone of his heel. There was not the least alteration observed in his countenance, by which it could be fuspested that he was wounded. He continued calmly to give orders and remained near fix hours on horfeback afterwards. One of his domeflicks at laft perceiving than the fole of his boot was bloody, made hafte to cal the furgeons ; and his pain then began to be fo fbarp that they were forced to take him off his horfe, and carry him into his tent. The furgeons looking upor the wound, obferved, that it already began to mortify, and was of opinion, that the leg muit be cut off.

The army was in the utmoft conflernation; but one of the furgeon named Newman, who was better skilled, and more courageous than the reft, was pofitive, that by making deep incifions, he could fave the king's leg. Fall to wark then prefaults, fays the king, car boldy, four nabing. He held the leg himeff with both is hands, looking upon the incifions that were made, as though the operation had been performed upon another perfon.

As they were laying on the dreffing, he gave orders for an affault the next morning; but the orders were scarce given, before word was brought him, that the Czar appeared with an army of above feventy thoufand men. He was therefore obliged to take another refolution. Charles, wounded, and incapaable of acting, faw himfelf enclosed between the Boryfthenes and the river which runs to Pultawa, in a defart country, without any places of fecurity or ammurition, and oppofed to an army, which had prevented him either from retreating, or being fupplyed with provisions. In this extremity, he allembled no council of war, as might have been expected; but on the feventh of July at night he fent for Marefchal Renchild into his tent, and ordered him, without deliberation, and without unealinefs to prepare to attack the Czar the next morning. Renchild did not difpute his malter's will, but went out with a refolution to obey him. At the door of the king's tent he met count Piper, with whom he had long been at variance, as it often happens between the minilter and the general. Piper asked him, if any thing new had happened: no, fays the general coldly, and paffed on to give his orders. As foon as Piper was entered into the tent, has Renchild faid any thing to you, fays the king to him. Nothing, anfwers Piper. Well then, replies the king, I tell you, that to morrow we thall give battle. Count Piper was aftonished at fo desperate a refolution; but knew well that his malter could not be prevailed on to change his opinion ; he only exprefs'd his altonifhment by his filence, and left the king to fleep till break of day.

"Twas on the 8th of July 1700, that the declive battle of Pultawa was fought between the two molf famous monarchs then in the world, Charles XII. and Peter Alexiowitz. To have a clear idea of this battle, and the place where it was fought, we mult imagine Pultawa lying on the north, the camp of the king of Sweden on the fouth, drawing a little towards the earlt, his bagging about a mile behind him, and the river of Pultawa on the north of the town, runing from earlt ow self.

The Czar had paffed the river about a league from Pulawa towards the well, and was beginning to form his camp.

At day break the Swedes appeared out of their trenches with four cannons for their whole artillery ; the reli were left in the camp with about three thoufand men; and four thoufand remained with the baggage. So that the Swedifa army, which marched againft the enemy, coulfiled of about five and twenty thoufand men, whereof there were not above twelve thoufand requilat troops.

The generals, Renchild, Field, Levenhaup, Slipenbak, Hoorn, Sparte, Hawilton, the Prince of Wirtemberg who was related to the king, and fome others, moli of whom had feen the battle of Narva, put the übaltern officers in min do if hat day, which eight thoufand Swedes had delroyed an army of a hundred thoufand MicGovies in their intrenchments. The officers faid the fame thing to the foldiers, and all encouraged one another as they marched.

The king conducted the march, carried in a litter at the head of his foot. A party of horfe advanced by his order to attack that of the enemy. The basitle began with this engagement at half an hour after four in the morning. The enemy's horfe jay wellward on the right of the Mufcovite earny 1 Prince Perzikof and count Gallowin had placed them at dif-tances between redoubts fortified with cannon. General Slipenbak, at the head of the Sweders, fell upon them. All who have ferved in the Swedith troops know that it was almoft impolible to refif the fary of their firft flock. The Muicovite fquadrons were broken and routed. The Czar himfelf ran to rally them, and his hat was flor through with a musket ball 5 Menzikof had three horfes killed under him; and the Swedes cried out victory.

Charles did not doubt but the battle was gained; he had difpatched General Creus about midnight with five thouland horfe or dragoons, who were to take the enemy in flank, whill he attacked them in front; but his misfortune was, that Creats went out of the way, and did not appear. The Czar, who had thought himfel loft, had time to rally his horfe. He fell upon the kings cavalry in his turn, which not being fupported by Creut's detachment, was broken. likewife, and Slipenbak taken prifoner in the engagement. At the fame time feventy two cannoms from the camp played upon the Swedith horfe, and the Rufilian foot opening from their lines, advanced to attack the Swedith infamtry.

The Czar immediately detatches Prince Menzikof to poli himfelf between Pultawa and the Swedes; prince Menzikof executed his maltery orders with dexterity and readiness; and not only cut of the communication between the Swedith army, and the troops remaining in the camp, before Pultawa, but meeting with a Corp de referee of three thouland men, he forrounded them, and cut them in pieces.

In the mean time the Muſcovite ſoot came out of their lines, and advanced in order into the plain. And on the other fide, the Swedith horfe rallied within ar quarter of a league from the enemy's army. And the king, aflifted by general Renchild, made a diſpofiton for a general engagement.

He ranged what troops were left him in two lines ; his foot were posted in the center, and his horse made made up the two wings. The Gzar difpoled his ar my in the fame manner; he had the advantage or numbers, and of feventy two cannon, whill th Swedes had no more that four, and began to wan powder.

The emperor of Mulcovy was in the center of hi army, having then the title only of major general and feemed to ferve under general Clermetof. Bu he went as emperor from rank to rank, mounted ao a Turkifh horie, which was a prefent from the grand Signior, exhorting the officers and foldiers, and pro miling every one of them rewards.

Charles did all he could to fit his horfe at the head of his troops ; but finding the pollure too painful, he returned to his litter, holding his fword in one hand, and a pilliol in the other.

At nine in the moring the battle was renewed; on of the firld dicharges of the MuGovite cannon carried off the two horges of the king's litter; he caufed two others to be first put to it, and a fecond volley broke the litter in pieces, and overturned the king. The troops which fought near him believes him killed. The Swedes in confermation loft ground, and their powder failing, and the enemy's cannon continuing to play upon them, the firl littine foll back upon the fecond, and the fecond field. In this lad alion the 'swedith army was routed by a fingle line of ten thoufand men of the Mufcovite's foot j for much were matters changed.

The king, carried upon pikes by four grenadices, covered with blood, and all over bruiled with his fall, and fearcely able to fletk, cried out, Swedes, Swedes, Manger and grief renewing his firength, he tried to rally purfued them with their fwords, bayonets, and pikes. The prince of Witrenberg, General Renchild, Hamilton, and Stakelberg, were already taken priloners, the camp before Puluwa' forced, and all in a confifon, which did not admit of any renedy. Cont E-rer with all the officers of the chancery had quitted be camp, and neither knew what to do, nor what was become of the king. They ran from one fide of he plain to the other. Major Bere offered to lead hem to the baggage s but the clouds of duit and moak, which covered the field, and their own conjulion, earlied them first to the counterfarp, of the own, where they were taken priloners by the garviton.

The king would not fly, and could not defend him-Telf. General Poniatosky chanced to be by him that nftant; he was a colonel of the Swedifh guards of king Staniflaus, and a perfon of uncommon merit, whom his attachment to the perfon of Charles had engaged to follow him into Ukrania without any post in the army. He was one, who in all occurrences of his life, and in dangers, where others at most would have only behaved with courage, flewed a command of understanding, which was ever attended with fuccefs. he made a fign to a young Swede named Frederick, the king's first valet de chambre, and as intrepid as his mafter ; they take the king under their arms, and affifted by a Drabant who came up to them, mount him on horfeback, notwithftanding the exceffive painsof his wound. Fredrick got up behind his mailer, and supported him from time to time.

Poniatosky, though he had no command in the army being made a general on this occilion by nefeeffity, drew up five hundred horfe near the king's perfon ; fome of them Drabans, others officers, others private troopers. This body, re-animated by the misforume of their prince, made their way through more than ten regiments of Mafcoviers, and conducted Charles through the middl of the enemy, the fpace foal langue, to the baggage of the Swedith army.

This furprizing retreat was of great confequence in fuch dittrefs, but the king was under a necelity of flying fill farther. They found amongit the baggage count Piper's coach, for the king never had one fince he left Stockholm. They put him into it, ann made towards the Borythenes with all polible faseer. The king, who from the time he was fet on horfer back till he came to the baggeg, had never fpok one fingle word, then asked what was become o count tipper. They told him he was taken with althe officers of chancery: And General Rendollid, and the prime of Wirtenberg? added the king. They are prilones too, fay Sontatoky. Performer the Migeorites I replies Charles, througing up his thouldees. Game on thea, let up to the Tarks rathers. They did not obferve however the left alteration in not known his contition, would have never fuffected him to have been either conquered or wounded.

Whill he was getting off, the Mufcovites feized upon his artillery in the camp before Pultawa, his baggage, and the money he had raifed for carrying on the war, where they found fix millions in specie, the spoils of Poland and Saxony. Near nine thoufand Swedes were killed in the battle, about fix thoufand were taken, three or four thousand ran away, and were never heard of fince. There fill remained near eighteen thousand men, comprehending the Colfacks, with the Swedes and Poles who fled towards the Boryfthenes, under the direction of general Levenhaup. He marched on one fide with these fugitive troops, whilft the king took another road, with with fome of his horfe. The coach in which he road, broke down in his march, and they fet him again on horfeback. And to finish his misfortune, he rambled all night in a wood; there his courage not being able to supply any longer his exhausted spirits, and the pains of his wounds becoming more infupportable by fatigue, and his horfe falling under him thro' excellive wearinefs, he refted himfelf for fome hours at the foot of a tree, in danger of being furprifed every moment by the conquerors, who fought for him on all fides.

At laft, on the 9th of July at night, he found himfelf upon the banks of the Boryfihenes, and Levenwhaup just arrived with the remains of his army. The Swedes faw their king again, whom they judged to whave been dead, with a joy mixed with forrow. The enemy drew nigh, and they had no bridge to a pais over, nor time to make one, nor powder to deeffend themfelves against the enemy who came upon them, nor provisions to hinder the army from perifhing with hunger, who had cat nothing for a whole day : but what gave the Swedes the greateft uneafinefs, was the danger of their king. By good fortune, there was still left a forry calash, which by chance they had brought along with them ; this they embarked in a little boat, and the king and ge-Ineral Mazeppa in another. The latter had faved feveral coffers full of money, but the current being very rapid, and a violent wind beginning to blow, the Coffack threw more than three parts of his treafures into the river, to lighten the boat. Mullern the kings chanchellor, and count Poniatosky, who was now more than ever neceflary to the king, for his remarkable prefence of mind under difficulties, croffed over in other barks with fome of the officers. Three hundred troopers of the king's guards, and a very great number of Poles and Coffacks relying upon the goodmefs of their horfes, ventured to pass the river by fwimming. Their troop keeping close together refifted the current, and broke the waves ; but all who attempted to crofs feparately a little below, were carried away by the ftream, and funk in the river. Of all the foot who tried to pafs over, there were not one who got to the other fide.

Whill the rooted part of the army were in this extremity, Prince Menzikof came up with ten thou fand horfe, having each a foot foldier behind him. The carcalles of the Swedes that lay dead in the way, of their wounds, fatigue, and hunger, furficiently pointed out to Prince Menzikof the road which th body of the army had taken. The prince fent trumpeter to the Swedish general, to offer him a capit tulation. Four general officers were prefently fent by Levenhaup to receive the law of the conqueror. Before that day fixteen thousand foldiers of king Charles would have attacked all the forces of the Ruffian empire, and have perished to the last man, rather than have furrendred ; but after a battle loft, and a flight of two days, not having their eyes any longer upon their prince. who was confirained to fly himfelf, the ftrength of every foldier being fpent, and their courage no longer fupported by any hope, the love of life took place of intrepidity. The whole army were made prifoners of war. Some of the foldiers in defpair to fall into the hands of the Mufcovites, threw themfelves into the Borylthenes; and the reft were made flaves. They all filed off in prefence of prince Menzikof. laving their arms at his feet, as thirty thousand Mufcovites had done nine years before at the king of Sweden's at Narva. But whereas the king then fent back all the Mufcovite prifoners, whom he was not afraid of, the Czar retained all the Swedes that were taken at Pultawa.

Thus the Swedith army, which left Saxony fo triumphant, was now no more. One half of them perithed by want, and the other half were made flaves, or maliacred. Charles XII, had loft, in one day, the fruits of nine years pains, and almolt a hundred battles. He field in a wretched caladh, having Major general Hoord by his field cangeroufly wounded. The refl of his troops followed, fome on foot, others on hor(Sback, and lone in wagens), acrois a defart, where they found neither huts, tents, men, animals or reads, every thing was wanted there even to water tiffd, "Twas then the beginning of July; the country future in the 47th degree ; the dry fand of the defart rendered the heat of the future or infupportale : uh hor(Fe Ed I by his way, and the men were weady to die with third. Coant Poniatosky, who was a little better mounted than the reft, advanced before them into the plain, and having finied a willow, he judged there mußt be water nich, and he fought about, till he found the fipring. This happy difcovery faved the lives of the king of Swedow's little troop. A fifer five days march, he found him/eff upon the banks of the river Hippanis, now called the Bogh by the burbarians. This river joins the Bosyliteness fome miles lower, and falls along with it into the black fea.

Beyond the Bogh, toward the fouth, lies the little town of Ozakou, a frontier of the Turkith empire. The inhabitants feeing a troop of foldiers coming towards them, whole drefs and language they were ftrangers to, refused to carry them over to Ozakou, without an order from Mahomet balhaw, the governour of the town. The bing fent an express to the governour to ask a paffage ; but the Turk not knowing what to do in a country, where a falle ftep very often colls a man his life, durft take nothing upon himfelf, without having first the permission of the basha of the province, who refides at Bender in Beffarabia, thirty leagues from Ozakou. The permiffion came, with orders to pay the king all the bonours due to a monarch allied to the Porte, and to furnish him with all necessary provisions. During thefe delays, the Muscovites having passed the Boryfthenes, purfued the king with all poffible speed, and if they had come an hour fooner, they mult have taken him. He had fcarce passed the Bogh in the Turkish boats, before his enemies appeared, to the number of almost fix thousand horse; and his majefty had the misfortune of feeing five hundred of his little troop, who had not been able to get over time enough, feized by the Muscovites on the other fide the river. The basha of Ozakou asked his pardon by an interpreter for the delays, which had occasioned the taking those five hundred men priloners, and be-fought him not to complain of it to the grand Sig nior. Charles promifed him he would not, but gave him at the fame time a fevere reprimand, as if he hac been fpeaking to one of his own fubjects.

The commander of Bender, who was alfo feral quier, a title which anfwers to that of general, an balla of the province, which fignifies governor and intendant, fent prefently an aga to compliment the king, and offer him a magnificent tent, with proviliont, baggage, waggons, and all the conveniencies officers and attendants requilite to conduct him handformly to Bender.

CHMET III, was at than time emperor of the in 1703. It had been placed upon the throne in 1703. In the room of his brother Multapha, by a revolution like that in England, which transferred the erown from James fecond to his fon-in-law William.

To him the king of Sweden fled for refuge : and he had no fooner fet his foot upon the Sultan's territories at Ozakou, than he wrote him the following letter.

To the moft high, and moft glorious, invincible and august emperor of many empires, king of many kingdoms, head and protector of many nations, may the Almighty blefs and prolong your reign.

T H IS letter figned with our royal hand, is to acquaint your imperial highers, that baving butfed with no loss faces that no uplice the tenesherous breakers of the faith of treaties, and the law of nutany, having driven king Augultus aut of Polandi, of multich he was rather the tyrant than the king, and given the Poles a king of their own nation, who is a given the Poles a king of their own nation, who is a Aping as faras Pultama, heaven has permitted our army, tired our with long marches, and in want of every thing, to be overwhelmed by the enemy that ware thrice in number, and has fuffered this day to be a day of grief and misfortune to us.

Not being in a place to raife new forces, and diffaining to fall into barbariour and prefidious hands, we are some to feek refuge and a fiflance in the territories of your imperial highneft, that we may be enabled to return to Poland, in order to rejoin our armies, and fupport the king we have made there.

What we defire it to have you any fixed, and be our lever yours. As a proof of any fixerer affection, was repreferent toysa, that if you give the Cara, while ambition is neither directed by uplice, nor boown, nor true scurage, time to take the advantage of an differ, he muilt fail upon your territories, when you little expect tim, at he has imaded are countries; but why do I jay when you little expect him? has he wat already built forts upon the Tamais and the Palus Miscait? does he was already tracted are your bis feets?

To prevent this, there can be no way to proper as by a new alliance between your fublime Porte and us, prowided we can bet return to Poland, and to one own flates with your valiant troops, and carry our arms again into the empire of this perfidious Czar, to put a flop to his swinfl ambition.

We shall never forget the favours we shall receive from you, and shall value ourselves upon being inviolably, your faithful friend,

July 13, 1709.

Charles XII. Son of Charles XI.

The king fuffered this letter to be fent away, the' it too much injured the character of his enemies, as well as difguiled his own. Perhaps after having treated the Czar and king Augufles with great refect in his victories, his defeat had fowred him ; or elfe he took for Turkifh breeding, to rail at those againff, whom we ask affiftance.

Achmet, who had been beforehand with him, by fending a folemn embalfy in the time of his vifeories made itin fenfble now of the difference he made between an Emperor of the Turks, and a king of part of Scandinavia, a chriftian wanquihed and fuguive. He did not anfwer him till fix months after, and then refufed to (peak out upon the alliance propoled againd the Czer.

This proposal, fays the fulsan to him in his letter, requires a deliberate examination. I fall leave it to the audidon of my great disan. I salae your friendhip, and grant you mine together with my protection. I have givon order to the fallow of Natolia and Romelia, to previse a guard to condult you fafely where you think preper. Juffy the baffas Scraffaier of Bender, will advonce you face hunired ablars a day, with all neeaffary provisions for yourfelf and your attendants, and borles, that you may live as becomes a hing.

Given at Conftantinople the first day of the month Sheval, the 1121 year of the Hegira.

From the first moment of king Charles's repairing in to the Turkish territories, he had laid the defign of turning the ottoman arms upon his enemies : he already fancied he faw himfelf at the head of the Tur-h kilh forces, reducing Poland again under the yoke, and fubduing Muscovy. M. de Neughaver set out from Ozakou for Constantinople, with the character of king's envoy extraordinary. Count Poniatosky, a perfon equally capable and refolute, of an engrging and agreeable temper, born with the talent of perluading and pleafing all nations, attended the Swedish embaffy, but in a private capacity, in order to found the dispolitions of the Constantinopolitan ministry. without being tied up to the ufual forms, and giving too much ground for fufpicion : he knew how to gain in a fhort time the favour of the grand vifir, who load-

d him with prefents; and had the art to convey a letter of the king of Sweden's to the Sultana Valide. mother to the Emperor then upon the throne, who formerly had been ill ufed by her fon, but now began to recover her interest in the feraglio. He entered into a close friendship with one Bru a Frenchman, who had been chancellor to the French embaffy. This man was perpetually talking of the king of Sweden's exploits to the chief of the fultan's cunuchs, who charmed his miltrefs with repeating them. The Sultana, by a fecret inclination with which most women find themfelves furprized in favour of extraordinary imen, even without having ever feen them, took the king's part openly in the feraglio, fhe called him by no other name than that of her lion : And when will you, faid the fometimes to the fultan her fon, help my lion to devour this Czar ? the even difpenfed with the flrict rules of the feraglio, fo far as to write feveral letters with her own hand to Count Poniatosky, in whole cultody they still are at the time of my writing this hiftory. One of the fhrewdeft of those that entered into Poniatosky's defigns, was Fonefca o Portuguele phylician, fixed at Conftantinople, a learned and ingenious perfon, who joined the knowledge of men to that of his own art, and whole profellion procured him accels to the ottoman Porte, and often an intimacy with the vifirs.

At length the king of Sweden's party was become for powerful at Conflanitopile, by Ponitotky's maangement, that the faction of the Mufeovice envoy thought their only refuge was to poilon him. Accordingly they prevailed upon one of his domeflicks to give him poilon in a dift of coffee; but the crime was difcovered before it was put in execution. The poilon was found in the fervant's hands, in a little phila, which they carried to the grand signifor. The poiloner was tried in full divan, and condenned to the gallies; for the Turkith law avere pointhies fach crimes capitally, as were intended only, but not executed.

The grand vifit appeared as cager as the Sultan valide, to ferve the king of Sweden : he told Ponia toski, giving him at the fame time a purfe of 100 ducats, I will take your king in one hand, and a fuor in the other, and carry him to Mylcow, at the bead of 200000 men.

However the king was conducted to Bender in a pompous manner, thro' the defart that was formerly called the wildernefs of the Geta. The Turks tool care that nothing fhould be wanting upon the road to make his journey agreeable.

The king chofe to encamp near Bender, rather than lodge in the town. The ferafquier Juffuff bafha caufed a magnificent tent to be pitched for him, and tents alfo were provided for all the lords of his retinue. Some time after, the king built a houfe in this place, and his officers did the fame after his example : the foldiers alfo raifed barracks; fo that the camp, by degrees, became a little town. The king being not yet cured of his wound, was obliged to have a carious bone taken out of his foot ; but as foon as he was an ble to mount a horfe, he renewed his usual fatigues, rifing always before the fun, tiring three horfes a day, and exercifing his foldiers ; but fometimes he played at chefs with general Poniatoski, or Mr. de Grothufen, his treasurer. Those who had a mind to gain his favour, attended him at his horfe courfes, and were all day long in their boots. One morning going into the houle of his chancellor Mullern, who was afleep, he forbid them to awake him, and waited in the anti-chamber, where there was a large, fire in the chinoney, and near it feveral pair of fhoes that Mullern had fent for from Germany, for his own ufe. The king threw them all into the fire, and then went a-Way. When the chancellor, upon waking, perceived the fmell of the burnt leather, and had enquired into the reason of it : What a firange king is this, fays he, that his chancellor mult be always booted !

At Bender he found plenty of every thing about him; a happinels very rarely attained to by a fugitive prince : for befides provision more than fufficint, and the five hundred crowns a day which he rebeived from the Otton , munificence, he drew money alfo from France, . borrowed of the merchants at Conftantinople. Part of his money was employed in carrying on intrigues in the feraglio, in purchaling the favour of the vilits, or procuring their ruin. The reft he diffributed profulely amongst his officers, and the Janifaries of Bender. Grothufen. this favourite and treasurer, was the difpenfer of his liberalities ; a man who, contrary to the cultom of perfons in that station, was as much pleafed with giving as his mafter. He brought him one day an account of fixty thousand crowns in two lines. 10000 given to the Swedes and Janifaries by the generous orders of his majelly, and the reft fpent by myfelf. See, fays the king, how I like my friends bould give in their accompts. Mullern makes me read whole pages for the fum of 10000 livers, but I like Grothufen's flile much better. One of his old officers, thought to be a litle covetous, complained to the king, that he gave all to Grothusen. I give money, replies the king, to none but those who know how to make ule of it.

Thus was Charles XII, employed at Bender, where he waited iil an army of Truks flould come to his affifance. To difpole the Ottoman Porte to this war, he detatched about 800 Poles and Collacks of his retinue, with orders to polis the Neiller, that runs by Bender, and to go and obferve what pafled upon the frontiers of Poland.

the Mufcovite troops differfed in those quarters fell immediately upon this little company, and purfued them even to the territories of the grand Seignior,

This was what the king of Sweden expected. His minifters and emiffar ies at the Porte made a great clamour against this irruption, and excited the Turk to vengeance: but the Czar's money removed a difficulties. Tolftoy, his envoy at Conftantinople gave the grand vifir and his creatures part of the fi millions that had been found at Pultawa in the kin of Sweden's military cheft. After fuch a defence the divan found the Czar not guilty. And fo far we they from talking of making war againft him, that they granted fuch honours and priviledges to his en voy, as the Muscovite ministers had never before en joyed at Constantinople. He was fuffered to have feraglio, that is, a palace, in the quarters of the Franks, and to converfe with the foreign ministers Nay, the Czar thought he had power enough to de mand, that general Mazeppa fhould be delivered up to him, as Charles XII had caufed the unfortunat Patkul to be furrendered into his hands. Chourloulys-Ali bafha could no longer refufe any thing to a prince, who backed his demands with millions Thus, the fame grand vifir, who before had made a folemn promife to carry the king of Sweden into Muf covy with 200000 men, had the affurance to make a proposal to him of confenting to the facrifice of general Mazeppa. King Charles was enraged at the question. However, it is not certain how far the vifir would have carried the matter, had not Mazeppa, who was then feventy years of age, died just at this juncture. The king's grief and refentment were very much augmented, when he underflood that Tolftoy, now become the Czar's embaffadorat the Portewas ferved in pulic by the Swedes that had been made flaves at Pultawa, and that thefe brave foldiers were daily fold in the market at Constantinople. Befides, the Mulcovite embaffador declared openly, that the Muffulman troops at Bender were placed rather as a guard upon the king, than to do him honour:

King Charles, abandoned by the grand vilir, and conquered by the Czar's money in Turkey, as he had been by his arms in Ukrania, found himfelf de-aded, fcorned by the Porte, and, in a manner, a rifoner among the Tortars. His attendants began o defpair, himfelf alone remained firm, and did not new the least dejection of spirit, no not for a moment. He imagined the Sultan was ignorant of the ntrigues of his grand vifir, Chourlouly Ali, and reolved to make him acquainted with them, and Ponitofky underftood this old commission. The grand eignior went every Friday to the molque, encompafed with his folacks, a kind of guard whofe trubans were fet with feathers fo high, that they hid the Sulan from the eyes of the people. When any one had e petition to prefent to the grand Seignior, the way to mix himfelf among thefe guards, and hold his peition up in the air. Sometimes the Sultan youchafed to take it himfelf, but more frequently he ordered an aga to take care of it, and afterwards, upon his return from the molque, cauled the petitions to he laid before him. There is no fear of any one's daring to importune him with trifling and unneceffary netitions; for, at Constantinople, they write lefs in a year, than they do at Paris in a day : much lefs Joes any one venture to prefent petitions against the minifters, to whom, for the molt part, the Sultan remits them, without reading them. However, Ponistofky had no other way to convey the king of Swe-Ben's comblaints to the grand Seignior. He drew up a representation against the grand vifir sufficient to ruin him. M. de Feriolle, who was at that time the French embaffador, got it translated into Turkish. A Greek was hired to prefent it, who mingling himfelf among the grand Seignior's guards, held up the paper To high, and for fo long a time, and made fuch a moife, that the Sultan perceived it, and took the memoir himfelf.

Some days after, the Sultan, in anfwer to the king of Sweden's complaints, fent him twenty five Arabian horfes, one of which that had carried his highnefs, was covered with a faddle and houfing enriched with precious flonces, and the firrups were of maffy goin With this prefeat the feat an obliging letter, but conceived in general terms, and fuch as gave realon i fulped that theminilter had done nothing without this Sultan's confact. Chourloudy alfo, who knew how it diffemble, fentive very curious horfset to the King. Bu his majdfly, with a hughty air, told the perfon tha brought them, Go back to year maffer, and tell him bat I don't receive perform from wy caemies.

M. Poniatofki having already had the courage to get a petition prefented against the grand vifir, then formed the dangerous defign of deposing him. He knew the vifir was no favourite of the Sultan's mo ther, and was the averfion both of Killer Aga, the chief of the black eunuchs, and of the aga of the Janifaries : he encouraged all three to fpeak against him. It was very strange to fee a christian, a Pole, an agent, without character, of a Swedish king, that had fled for refuge to the Turks, caballing publickly in a manner at the Porte against a vice-roy of the Ottoman empire, and fuch a one too, as was both an useful minister, and a favourite of his master. Poniatoski had never fucceeded, and the bare attempt had coft him his life, had not a ftronger power than all those in his interests given the last blow to the grand vifir Chourlonly's fortune.

At this junduce the Czar having quartered his forces in Lithuania, and given orders for carrying on the firge of Riga, returned to Mufcow, to thew his people a fight as new as any thing he had yet done in his lingdom. It was a triumph very little inferior to that of the old Romans. He made his entry into Mofcow on the first of January 1710, and a floarithing trade, as his induffy had made it, could inrithing trade, as his induffy had made it, could inport. The proceeding with a regiment of guards, followed by the pieces of artillery taken from the Swedas at Lefnow and Pultawa; each of which was drawn by eight horfes covered with fearlet houfings reaching down to the ground. Then came the flandards, kettle-drums, colours worn at thefe two battles, carried by the officers and foldiers that had taken them : all thefe fpoils were followed by the finest troops of the Czar. After they had filed off, appeared in a chariot made for that purpole, the litter of Charles XII, found in the field of battle at Pultawa all broken to pieces by two ennon fhot. Behind this litter marched all the prifoners two by two, among which was Count Piper first minister of Sweden. the famous Marefchal Renchild, count Levenhaup, the generals Slipenbak, Stakelburg and Hamilton, all the officers and foldiers, who were afterwards difperfed in great Ruffia. They were immediately followed by the Czar, on the fame horfe he rid upon at the battle of Pultawa. A little behind him appeared the generals that had their fhare in the fuccels of this battle. After them came another regiment of guards; and the waggons loaded with Swedish ammunition brought up the rear.

This folemn proceilion was attended with the injeing of all the bells in Mofcow, with the found of drums, kettle-drums, trumpets, and an infinite number of mufical influments andwering each other, with wolleys difcharged from 200 Pieces of cannon, and the acclamations of 500,000 men, who at every flop the Czar made in his triumphal entry, stried out, God greffore the emperer ar Faher.

A Greek named Cuntomir, made prince of Moldavia by the Turks, joined the Czar, whom he already looked upon as conqueror, and made no feropple to betray the Saltan, of whom he held his principality, for the fake of a childin a prince, from whom hexepeded much greater advantages. The Czar entered into a fectet alliance with him, received him into his army, and marching up the contry, arrived in June 1711, at the northern fide of the river Hierafia, now Puth, near Jazy, the cepite of Moldavia.

As foon as the grand vifit recived the news that Peter Alexivoir was come thitber, he fumediately, left the camp at Belgrade, and followed the courfe or the Danube, propofed to pais that river on a bridge on boats near Saccia, in the very fame place where Darius formerly built a bridge that hore his name. The Tarkith army marched with fa much expedition, that they foon came in fight of the Aufcovites, the river Pruth being between them.

The Czar, fure of the pince of Moldavia, little thought the fubiects would fail him. But the Moldavians are often in a different interest from that of their mafter. They liked the Turkish government. which is never fatal to any but the grandees, and effeels a lenity to people that are its tributaries. They feared the Chriftians, efpecially the Mufcovites, who had upon all occasions used them barbaroufly. They brought all their provisions to the Ottoman army. Then undertakers who had engaged to furnish the Muscovites with provisions, performed their promife to the grand vifir, though it was made to the Czar. The Walachians, whole country adjoins to that of Mol-h davia, fhewed the fame regard to the Turks; to fuch a degree had the remembrance of former cruelties alienated their minds from the Mufcovites.

The Cast thus frultrated of his hopes, which perhaps he had upon too light grounds taken up, found is his army on a fudden delligge of provifions, and without forage. In the mean time the Torks paffed the irver that feparated them from the enemy. All the Tartars, according to collom, favan over it, holding e by the tails of their horfes. The Spahi's, which are the Turkifh horfe, did the fame, becaufe the bridges is were not ready time enough.

At length, the whole army being got over, the vifir pitched a camp, and fortified it with trenches. It is flrange the Czar (hould not difjute the paffage of the river, or at leaft repair his fault, by engaging the Tarks immediately, inflead of giving them time to a

The out bis army with fatigue and famine. But that prince feems in this campaign, to have taken all the fleps that could lead to his rain. He found him/dif without provisions, with the river Proth behind him, and near 150000 Turks before him, and about 400000 Tartas continually harafing him on the right hand and the left. Reduced to this extremity, he faid publickly, I am at leaft in as had a cafe as my sirother Charles was at Publicwa.

The indefatigable count Poniatofky, agent to the king of Sweden, was in the grand vilit's army with fome Poles and Swedes, who all thought the Czar's rein inevitable.

As foon as Poniatofky faw that the armies muft infallibly engage, he fent an exprefs to the king of Sweden, who fet out that moment from Bender, followed by forty officers, and enjoying by anticipation ine pleafure of fighting the emperor of Mafcovy.

After many a lofs, and foreral defructive marches, the Czar was driven back upon the Pruth, and had no cover left but forme cheraux de frijfs, and forme waggont. A party of the Janifaries and Spahi's fill immediataly upon his army in that defencelds condition, but they did it in a tumultuous and dilordeily manner, and were received by the Mulcovies with a refolution, which nothing but defpair and the prefonce of their prince could infpire.

The Tarks were twice repulled. But the day following, M. Poniatolky adviled the grand viir to Arave out the Maccovite army, who being defitutes of all provision, would, in a thort time, be obliged, together with their emperor, to furrender at differtion.

The Czar has fince that time more than once acknowledged, that in all his life he never felt fo much unefinefia, sake did that night. He revolved in his mind all that he had been doing for fo many years for the glory and good of his nation; that fo many great defigns perpetually interrupted by faccefilve wars were now in all probability going to perifit with kinn, before they were brought to perfection; that, he mult either die with hunger, or engageners 200000men with feeble troops lefs by half the number than when they fift let out; a cavalry almost difficunted, and the foot worn out with famine and faigue.

About the beginning of the night he called general Gzeremetof to him, and gave him a peremptory orer to get every thing ready by break of day, to charge the Turks with bayonets at the muzzle of their mufkets.

He gave express orders also to burn all the baggage, and that no officer thould keep above one waggon; that in cals of a defeat, the enemy however might not get the booty they expected.

Having feriled every thing with the general in orier to the battle, he retired into his tent full of grief, and feized with corvulions a diffemper he was often troubled with, and which came upon him with double he violence when he was under any great unselfnefs. He forbad all perfors to enter his tent in the night, upon any pretence whatfover, not caring to have any remonitrances made to him againle a defeerate but neeffary refolution, and much lefs that any one fhould be a witnefs of the melancholy condition he was in.

In the mean time the greateft part of his baggage was burnt according to his order, and all the army followed the example, tho' with much regret; but but fome buried fuch things as they fet a more than ordinary value upon. The general officers had already given orders for the march, and endeavoured to infipire the army with a courage which themfelves wanted : but the foldiers, quite exhaulted with fatigue and hanger, marched as men thas had loft both their foirit and theirhopes; and yet, to centrate their coufill more, had their ears filled with the fhrieks and cries of women, of whom their was too great a number in the army. Every one expected death or avery to be their portion the next morning. What relate is no exaggeration : for this is literally the account that was given by fome officers who ferwed in the army.

In this fituation it was thought necessfary to fhew for beace to the Tarks, and that the Czar must be per-

The grand vifit's first demand was, that the Czar, with all his army, fhoald furrender at differeion. The vice chancellor made answer, that his mafter deagned to give him battle within a quarter of an hour, and that the Mufeovites would all be cut to pieces, mather than fubmit to fach dithonourable conditions, Diman feconded shafirod with frefn temonstrances.

Mahomet Biltagi was no foldier. He knew the Jamifaries had been repulfed the day before, and was scafily perfuaded by Ofman not to part with certain indvantages for the hazard of a battle. He immediately granted a faifpenfion of arms for fairs hours, and in that time the terms of the treaty were agreed upon and feited.

During the party there inspended an accident, which chews the word of a Turk is often more to be depended on than we imagine. Two Italian gendemen, related to M. Brillo, lieutenant-colonel of a regimento figrenadiers in the Czar's fervice, going to look for forage, were taken by the Tartars, who carried them it to their camp, and offered to fell them to an officer of the familaries. The Terk enraged at fuch a breach of the familaries. The Tartars, and carried them himfelf before the graud vifir, together with the two prifoners.

The vifir fent the gentlemen back that moment to the Czar, and ordered the principle Tartars concerned in carrying them off to be beheaded.

In the mean time the Kam of Tartary oppoled the conclution of a treaty, which took from him all hopes of pillage. Poniatolky feconded him with very urgent and prefling reafons. But Ofman carried his point, notwithftanding the impatiece of the Tartario and the infigurations of Poniatofky.

The silir though it enough for his malter the grand Signific, to conclude an advatageous peace. He infilted, that the Mufcovites floodd give up Afoph burn the gallys that lay in that port, and demolifi the main citadels apon the Paolus Meeotis; that the grand Seignior floudd have all the cannon and ammunition of thofe fortfelfs; that the CZar fhould draw off his t.cops from Poland, and give no farther dilturbance to the few Cofficks that were fubject to Turkey; and that for the future he fhould pay the Tartasa fubfidy of 40000 fequines per annuer, an odious tribute long fince impoled, but from which the CZar hould delivered his country.

. At length, the treaty was going to be figned, without for much as mentioning the king of Sweden; and all that. Poniatofki could obtain from the vifir, was to infert an article, by which the Mufcovite fhould promile, not to binder the return of Charles XII. and which is pretty remarkable, it was flipulated in this article, that a peace fhould be concluded between the Czar and the king of Sweden, if they were fo difpoled, and could agree upon the terms of it.

On thole conditions, the Car had liberty to retreat with his army, cannon artillery, colours and bagage. The Turks furnifhed him with provifions and there was plenty of every thing in his camp within two hours: fore the figuring of the treatry, which, was begun, concluded and figned the 21ft of July 2711.

Just as the Czzr, refected from the difficulties he was under, was drawing of with drams besting and enfigns difpl.yed, came the king of Sweden, impatient of fighting, and eager to les his enemy hir his hands. He had ride poll shove fifty leagues, from Bender to Jazy, and lighting at count Poniatolky's tent, the count came up to him with a forrowful countenance, and acquinted him by what means he had loft an opportunity which perhaps he would never recover.

The king enraged went directly to the grand vifty, and with all his blood in his face upbraided him with the trenty the had concluded. I have authority, fays the grand vifity, with a caim air, to wage war, and make pace. But, replied the king, have not so ut the whole Majorite army in your power 9 aur laws, fays the vifity with great gravity, command as the grant our enemies prace, when they implore our mercy. All the king in a pation, does it order you to clapup a badt reaty, when you have it in your power to make what forms you pleafe? was it not insumhent upon you to compress the source of a configuration of 2.

The Tark thus driven to a monplus, andwered lity, And who fload govern his empire in his adjence? It is not fit that all kings, fload he can of their kingdows, Charles replied with a finile full of indignation, and then threw himfelf down upon a cuthion. And looking upon the vifir with an air of referencent and contempt, he firstehed out his leg towards liim, and entrangling his four in his rob, which he did by defign, tore it; then rofe up immediately, mounted his horde, and returned to Brade full of defipair.

Poniatofky continued fome time longer with the grand vifir, to try if he could prevail upon him by fofter methods, to make fome better terms with the Czar; but it being prayer-time, the Turk without giving one word of anfwer, went to walh and attend his devotion,

BOOK VI.

Fortune, which before had been fo favourable to the king of Sweden, bore hard upon him now even in the most trifling things. At his return he found his little camp at Bender, and all his apartment undar water, caufed by an intudation of the Neiller. He retired to fome miles diffance, near a village called Varnitä s and as if he had fome færet prellages of his future fortune, built a large heufe of ilone there, capable upon occafion of fulfaining a fiege of fome hours. He furnihed it allo in a very magnificient manner, contrary to his cullom, but in order to keep the Turks more in awe.

Befudes this, he built two more, one for his charcery, and the other for his favourite Grothufen, who kept a tableat his expense. While the king was thus employed in building at Bender, as if he had defigned to continue always in Turkey. Bullagi Mahomet being more apprelentive than ever, of the intrigues and complaints of this prince at the Porte, had fent the emperor of Germany's refident to Vienna, to procure a pafinge for the king of Sweden through the hereditary territories of the houfe of Auftria. This envoy came back in three weeks time, with a promife from the imperial regency, that they would pay Charles XII, all due honoars, and conduct him fiely into Romerania.

In the mean time, M. de Ponitooky wrote, and that from the camp of the grand wifir, an account of the Campaign of Pruth, wherein he accuded Baltagi Mahomet of cowardife and, treachery. This account he entrafled to an old janifary enraged at the vifir<sup>3</sup> weaknefs, and moreover guined by Poniatosky's prefents, who having got leave, went and preferted the letter with his own hands to the Saltan.

Poniatosky fet out from the camp fome days after, and went to the Ottoman Porte, to cabal against the grand vifir, as usual.

All circumdances feemed to favour the defign. The Czar, now at liberty, was in no hafte to perform his promifes. It is cultomary for princes to fend golden keys to the Sultan, when they deliver up any towns to the Turks. The keys of Afoph were not come, CHARLES XII. B. VI.

nd the grand vifir, who was responsible for them, being apprehensive of his master's referement, durft aot appear in his preferce.

The old vifir Courlouly, then in banifhment at Mytelane, thought this a proper opportunity to deprive Achmet of the throne, and to fer up I brahim his nephew, and eldeft fon to Mullapha, a young prince, who was at that time a prifoner of flate togener with his brother Mahomud.

To bring about this defign, it was neceffary that Mahomet Baltagi fhould be prevailed upon to make fure of the Sultan, by marching direally up to Couflantinople with the Janifarjes.

Mahomethad no inclination to any raft and hazardous enterprifes; fo the old vifir applied himfelf to Ofman aga his lieutenant, who emirely governed him. But the letters being intercepted, Courlouly and Ofman were beheaded, which is reckoned an infamous punifilment in Turkey, and their heads laid in the hall of the divan. Among Ofman's treafures, were found a ring which had been prelented him by the Czarina, and 200,000 pieces of gold, in Saxon, Polith, and Mufcovite coin.

As to Baltagi Mohomet, he was banifhed for having been made choice of without his knowledge, to be the inftrument of Chourlouly and Ofman's plot.

The king of Sweden was perpetually folliciting the Porte to fend him back thro' Poland with a numerous 'army. The divan indeed was determined to fend him back, but it was only with a gaard of feven or eight thoutand men, not as a king they were minded to fuccour, but as a gueft they were defirdus to be rid of. With this view Sultan Achmet wrote him the following letter.

Molt rowerful among the kings that worthip Jefus, redreffer of wrongs and injuries, and protector of right in the ports and republics of fouth and North ; thinging in majefly, love of honour and glory, and of our fublime Porte, Charles king of Sweden whole enterprizes God crown with fuccefs.

A 'sou as the moli illuftraus Achmert, formerty Chiaux Pafis, fhall have the honour to deliver you this letter adorned with our imperial fast, be perfounded and convinced of the trath of our intentions consistent thereis, viz. That though two hald defined to fend our ever-silloriour army againfl the Caw a facend time syst that prince, to avoid our jult reformant at his delaying the execution of our treaty concluded on the banks of the Pruth, and renewed again at our Juhime Portehaving furrendered into our hands the coffic and eary of Aloph, and hering endeavoured by the mediation of the English and Daitch amedialisers, caw anticat allier, to calizate a lefting peace with us, we have granted hist requeft, and delivered his primptentiority, who remain with us as hylages, our imperial ratification, having furth received hist rematic.

We have gions au invisiable and Jahatery orders to the right honourable and valiant Drivet Gereal, Han of Baudgiak i Grim Tartary, Noghi and Girealya, and is Jimaelaur fage couglellor and soble levolptier of Bader, (wahm God proferce and agament heir magnifcence and wijfdom) for your return through Paland, according to your find heffort, which has again been laid lafore us in your name. You mush hereage therefore to fet foreward the next winter, under the gnidance of providence, and with an howardole guard, in order to return to your own territories, taking core to pajs thro's Poland in a guardale and frindly manne.

You flight he provided with every thing needfary for your journey by my fablime Porte, at well money at men, hords and wagons. But we advise and exhort you ahore all things, to give the fullel and mole express on ever to all the Sundes and other foliates in your retinner, not to make any bavook, or be guilty of any attion that may either directly or indirectly tend to break this peace and alliance. Hereby you will preferve our good-will, of which we ball endeavour to give you as great and frequent profis is we shall have opportunities. The troops defigned to titend you, thall receive orders agreeable to your impeial intentions in this particular.

Given at our fublime porte of Conflantinople the 14th f the month Rebyal Eureb, 1124. which anfiwers to the 19th of April 1712.

However, this letter did not put the king of Sweken initicly out of hopes. He wrote the Sultan word, that he was ready to go, and flould always acknowledge the favours his highnefs had heaped upon him ; but he added, that he theught the Sultan too jult to fend him away with no other guard than that of a flying camp, in a country already over-tun with the Gza's troops.

Achmet was fo little acquainted with what paffed in Poland, that he fent an aga to fee whether the Czar's forces were fill little ere or not. Two foretraties of the king of Sweden, who underflood the Turkith language, accompanied the aga, in order to confront him in cafe of a fille report.

This aga faw the forces with his own eyes, and gave the Sultan a true account of the matter. Achnet in a rage was going to firangle the grand wift ; but the favourite who protested him, and thought he might have occasion for him, obtained his pardon, and kept him fome time longer in the miniftry.

The grand Signior without more ade confirmed the Mafapointe embalfadors, already as much affed to po to prifon, as an audience, to the feven towers. War was declared afrefh againft the Carr, the horfe rails diplayed, and orders given to all the bother, to raife an army of 200000 fighting men. The Sultan himfelf quitted Configuration and find the court at Addanapple, in order to be race the fast of wet? In this men, times a following from Agailton and the revolutio of Polant to the grand Signion was and the revolutio of Polant to the grand Signion was upon the road at Adrianople. At the head of the embaffy was the palatine of Maffovia with a retinue above 300 perfons.

Thefe were all feized and imprifoned in the fuburbs of the city. Never was the Swedifh party fuler of flopes than upon this occation: but thefe gree preparations came to nothing, and all their expects tions were diappointed.

The divan having thus determined Charles's fate Ifmelferafquier of Bender repaired to Varnits, wher the king was incemped, and acquainted him with the refolutions of the Porte, giving him to underflanc in a civil manner, that there was no time to delay but that he muft be gone.

Charles made no other anfwer than this. That the grand Siguior had promifed him an army, and not guard, and that kings ought to keep their word.

<sup>7</sup> He told the baffa of Bender, that he could not ge till he had wherewithal to pay his debts. For though his Thaim had for a long time been regularly paid his generofity had always forced him to borrow. The bafhaw afked him, how much he wanted? the king anfwered at a venture, a thoughn purfes, which amounts to 1500000 livers of French money, full weight. The bafha wrote to the Porte about it; and the Suitan, inflead of 1000 purfes, granted him 1200, which he first to the bafta of Bender.

When the 1200 purfes were arrived, his treafurer Grothufen, who, by reliding fo'long in Turkey, had learn to formk the language, went to wait upon the batha withous an interpreter, in hopes to get the 1200 purfes from him, and afterwards to form fone new intrigue at the Porte; fally imagining, as they always • Idd, that the Swediffi party would at length arm the Otoman empire againt the Czar.

Grothulen fold the bafta, that the king's equipages could not be got ready without money. But we, fays the baftag-fahl defray all your expenses. Your mafler will be at no charge, while he continues under my protection.

CHARLES XII. B. VI.

Gruthulen replied, that the difference between the Turkish equipage, and thole of the Franks was so great, that they were under a necessity of applying to the Swedith and Polish artificers at Varnjufa.

He affored him, that his mafter was willing to go, and that his money would facilitate and halten his departure. The too credulous bafha gave him the 200, purfes, and within a few days came and defired the king in a very respectful manner to give orders for their departing. But he was extremely furprized, when the king told him he was not ready to to, and that he wanted a thoufand purfes more. The afha, confounded with this answer, was speechlefs for fome time, and then went to a window, where the was feen to fhed fome tears. Afterwards, turning to the king, I shall lofe my head, fays he, for having obliged your majelty. I have given you the 1 200 purfes against the express order of my fovereign. With these words, he took his leave, and was going away full of grief, when the king Ropped him, and told him, he would make an excuse for him to the Sultan. Ah ! replied the Turk, as he was going out, my malter can punish Faults, but not excule them.

Initial balls went to acquaint the Kam of Tartary with the news. The kam having received the fame moder with the balha, not to fuffer the 1200 purfes to be delivered before the king's departure, and having confented to the delivery of them, wass appehentive of the grand Signies's referament as the balha aninely. They wrote both of them to the Porte to clear themfolves, and intrated his highness not to campute the king's enfull to their difobedience.

Charles perfilting in the notion that the karn and the batha defigned to deliver him up into the bands of his nemics, ordered Mr. Fonk, his envoy at the Ottoman court, to ley his complaints againft them perfore the grand Signior, and to alk for 1000 purfs more. But he did it with a view to be refugid, and that he might have a fresh pretence for not departing. All the answer he received was to be clapt up in privfon. The Sultan, in a paffion, called an extraordinary divan, and (which is very rarely done) fpoke himfelf as follows.

I farre even how the king of Sueden, but by bin offert at Pulvano, and the request he made to me to grant this a functionary insuge mayine. I beliare any need of him, or any reagin to bece or fear him; y enwathout confilting any other matients than the bolyticity of a Mulpilaman, and my own gener fity, which field the dew of its flown upon the great as well at the little upon frangers as well as my own judgets? I have received and affled him, bin millers, officers and (ab diver, in every refpect, and for three years and a had bere near-held my hand from latting him with preferst

I have granted him a very confiderable guard to conduct him into his own country. He has affed for 100C, have to defres fome expectes, though 1 per them affer (altendof a thought) those granted him 1200. Affect getting thefe out of the hands of the Serefginier of Bender, he defrees 1000 more, and refufes to go, under pretenes, that the guard is to little, whereast it is hus too large to poss through the country of a friend and afte.

I alk you then, whether it is a breach of the laws of hofficiality, to fend this primes away? and whether forering primes ongot to accuse of exceeding or injuffice in cafe I thould be abliged to make him go by force ? All the divan anflowerd, was; that the grand Signionmight lawfolly do what he had faid.

The multy declared, that the Molfelmans are nobound to holpitality towards infields, much lefs towards the ungrateful, and he granted his Feffa, a kine of Mandate, which, for the moft part, accompanies the important orders of the grand Signor. Thef-Feffa's are reverend as oracles, the' the perions from whom they come are as much the Sultan's flaves as any others

CHARLES XII. B. VI.

The basha of Bender received the order at the kam's, from whence he went immediately to Varnitfa, to know whether the king would go away in a friendly manner, or force him to execute the Sultan's orders.

Charles not used to this threatning language, could not command his temper. Obey your mafter, fays he to the bafha, if you dare, and be gone out of my prefence. The bafha, went off in a rage, and meeting Fabricius by the way, he called out to him without flopping, the king won't hearken to reafon : you'll fee strange things prefently. The fame day he cut off the king's provisions, and removed the guard of janifaries. He fent alfo to the Poles and Coffacks at Varnitfa, to let them know, that if they had a mind to have any provisions, they must leave the king of Sweden's camp, and come and put themfelves under the protection of the Porte at Bender. They all obeyed, and left the king, with only the officers of his houshold and 300 Swedes, to cope with 20,000 Tartars, and 6000 Turks. Now there was no more provision in the camp either for man or horfe; and in the mean time the Turks and Tactars invefted the little camp on all fides.

The king, with all the calmefs in the world, appointed his 300 Swedes to make regular fortifications, and worked at them himfelf. His chancellot, treafurer, fecretaries, valet de chambres, and all his domelies, put their hands to the work. Some barrieaded the windows, others took the bars behind the doors, and planted them in form of butterelise.

In the mean time, every thing being ready for the adiant, Charles's death freed ineviable, but the Sultan's command being not politive to kill him, in cafe of refiltance, the balla prevailed upon the kam to let him find him an expression shart moment to Adrianople, where the grand Signior them was, to receive his highnedis laft orders.

At length, the grand Signior's order being come, to put to the fword all the Swedes that fhould make the leaft refillance, and not to fpare the life of the king; the batha had the civility to thew Fabricias the order, to the intent that he might try his 'unnof to prevail upon Charles. P Experisons went immediately to acquaint him with this bad news. Have you jeen the order you/pask of 7 lays the king, that this under its a fixed forgery of theirs, and that 'unuil my ge. Fabricius full at his feet, put himfelf in a patient's not paroptel. Co back to your Tark, fays the king to him finding, if they attack me, I know how to defend my [eff.

The king's chaplains allo fell upon their knees before him, conjuring him not expole the wretched perfon to certain death ; adding befidee, that refiliance, in this cafewas a moft unwarentable adding how the twas a violation of the laws of hofpitality to refolve to continue with frangers againt their will, who had fo long and generoully fupported him. The king, who had flewed no refeatment egainft Fabricius, grew warm upon this occalion, and told his priefla, that he tock them to pray for him, and not to give him advice.

General Hoord and general Dardoff, whole opinion it had always been not to venture a battle, which in the confequence mult prove fatal, fnewed the king their breafts covered with wounds they received in his fervice, and affuring him they were ready to lie for him; begged that it might at leaft be upon a more neceflary occafion. I have, fays the king, by year wound, and my oun, that we have fraght validatly together. Tan have hitherto dane year daily, do it aeain wow.

It was not long before they faw the Turks and Tartars advancing, in order of battle, to attack the little fortrefs, with ten pieces of ordnance and two mortar pieces. The horfe-tails waved in the air, the clarions founded, the cries of alla, alla, were heard on all fides. Baron Grothufen took notice that the Turks did not mix any abufive language against the king in their cries, but only called him demis-Aafh, which fignifies head of iron, and refolved that moment to go alone and unarmed out of the fortifications. He advanced up to the line of the janifaries, who had almost all of them received money from him, ' Ah, " what my friends !' fays he to them in their own language, ' are you come to mallacre 500 defencelefs Swedes? you brave janifaries, who have pardon-ed 100000 Mufcovites upon their crying Ammon, (i. e. pardon) to you : have you forgot the kindnefs you have received from us ? and would you affaffinate that great king of Sweden, whom ye loved fo much and who has been fo generous to you? my friends, he afks but three days, and the Sultan's orders are not fo ftrict as you are made to believe.'

Thefe words produced an effect which Grothufen himfelf di not expect. The janifaries forewore upon their beards they would not attack the king, and that they would give him the three days he demanded. In valk was the fignal given for the affault. The janifaries far from obeying, threaten to fall upon their leaders, if three days were not granted to the king of Sweden. They came to the balha of Bender's tent in a body, crying out that the Sultan's corders were forged. To this unexpected inforcefilon, the balha had nothing to oppofe but patience.

The baffa returning to Bender, affembled all the officers of the janifaries and the oldeft foldiers, and both read to them, and thewed them the politive order of the Sultan, and the Mufit's felta.

Sixty of the oldeft of them, with venerable grey heards, who had received a thousand prefents from the king's hand, offered to go in perfon to him, and intreat him to pat himfelf into their hands, and permit them to force him as guards.

But neither the propolal of the old janifaries, ner Ponistofky's letters could in the leaft convince the king, that it was polible for him to give way without injuring his honour. He chufe rather to die by the hands of the Turks, than be in any manner their prifoner. He difinitifed the janifaries without fering them, and fent them word, that if ther did not go about their bufinelis he'd lhave their beards for them; which, in the eaft, is reckned the molt provoking affront that can be offered.

Thefe old (bliers, fired with refeatment, returned home, crying as they went, ' Down with this head ' of iron! fince he is refolved to perifh, let him pe-' rifh.' They gave the bafha an account of their committion, and acquitated their contractes at Bender with the firange reception they had mice with, Upon this every one fwore to obey the bafna's order's without delay; and they were now as impatient of going to the allault, as they had been averfe the day before.

The word was given that moment. They marched up to the entrenchments. The Tartars were already waiting for them, and the cannon began to play.

The janifaries on one fule, and the Tattres on the other, forced the little camp in an inflant. Twenty Swedes had fearce time to draw their fwords, before the whole-goo were forrounded, and taken priforers without reliftance. The king was then on borfeback hetween his houfe and his camp, with the generals Hoord, Dordnif and Spare; and feeing that all his foldiers had fuffered themfelves to be taken before his eyes, he faid in cold blood to thofe three officers, Let wige and defend the houfs. We'll fight, adds he with a finite, pre-out et feein.

Immediately he gallops up to the houfe with them, where he had placed about forty domethes and centinels, and which they had fortilied in the beft manner they could.

CHARLES XII. B. VI.

Thefe generals, however acculomed to the oblinet integolity of their malier, could not help being furprized, that in cold blood, and with a jeafing air, he fhoold be refolved to fland out againft ten picces of canon and a whole army. They followed him with fome guards and domeflics, to the number of twenty perfons.

But when they came to the door, they found it befet with Janifaries. Belides, near 200 Torks and Tartars had already got in at a window, and made themfelves maller of all the apartments, except a great hall, whether the king's domellics had retired. It happened luckily, that this hall was near the door, at which the king propofed to enter with this little troop of twenty perforts. He threw himfelf off his horfe with pillol and fword in hand, and his followers did the fame.

The Janifaries fell upon him on all fides, being encouraged by the bafar's promife of eight ducats of gold to each man that fhould but touch his clouths, in cafe they could not take him. He wounded and killed all that came near him. A Junifary, whom he had wounded, clapped his blanderbufs to this face, and if the arm of a Turk had not juffled bins, occafioned by the crowd, that moved backwards, and forewards like waves, the king had been killed. The bail grafed upon his nofe, and took off a piece of his ear, and then broke general Hoord's arm, whole fate it was to be always wounded by his mafter's fide.

The king (truck his fword into the Janifary's breaft, and at the fame time his domeflics, who were that up in the great hall, opened the door to him. He enters as fwift as an arrow with his little troop, and it an inflant they flut the door again, and barricade it with all they can find.

Thus was Charles XII. flut up in this hall with all bis attendants, amounting to about threefcore men, officers, guards, fecretaries, Valet de Chambre's and domethics of all kinds.

The Janifaries and Tartars pillaged the reft of the houfe, and filled the apartments. Come, fays the king, lat us go and drive out thefe barbarians 1 and putting himfelf at the head of his men, he, with his own hands, opened the door of the hall, which faced his bedchamber, goes into it, and free upon the plunderess.

The Tarks loaden with booty, being terrified at the fudden appearance of the king, whom they had been ufed to reverence, threw down their arms, and leapt out of the window, or fied into the cellars. The king taking advantage of the confusion they were in, and his own men being animated with this piece of fucces, they purfued the Tarks from chamber to chamber killed or wounded tholf that had not made their feizpe, and in a quarter of an hour cleared the houfe of the enemy.

The king, in the heat of the fight, perceived two Janifaries who hid themfelves under his bed. He thurth his fourd through one of them, and killed him; j but the other alked pation crying, Amman. I grant you your hic, fays the king, yone condition that you pave fee.

The Swedes at length become malters of the houfe, fhut the windows again, and barricadoed them. In this fluation, they had no want of arms, a groundchamber full of muskets and powder having desped the tumuluons facth of the Janifaries. This they made a very fesionable ufe of, firing clole upon the Tarks thro' the windows, and killag 200 of them in lefs then half aquivrter of an bour.

The cannon played against the house ; but the flones being very fost, it only made holes in the wall but demolished nothing.

The Kam of Tartary, and the bafts, who were defirous of taking the king alive, being afhanned to lofe time and men, and employ an army againfl fixty perfons, thought it proper to fet fire to the houle, in order to oblige the king to furrender. For this purpole, they ordered fome arrows twilled about with lighted matches, to be filte upon the roof, and againit the door and windows; by which means, the houge was immediately in flames. The roof allow fire was ready to tumble upon the Sweder. The king, with a very fedate air, gave orders to exinguith the fire; and dinding a little barrel full of liquor, he lind hold of it himfelf, and with the affiltance of two Sweders, there it upon the place where the fare was molt wis olent; then hedifowered that it was foll of brandy. But the hurry which is infograble from fiche a flate of confusion, hindered him from thinking of it before.

A centinel named Walberg, ventured in this externity to ery, that there was a neefliky for furrendering. What a firance man, fays the king, is this, to imagine that it is not more glorious to be burnt, than taken prifoner I another centinel, named Rofen, had thethought to fay, that the chancery houly, which was but fity paces off, has a flone roof, and was proof againt fire; that it would do well to fally out; and gain that houfe, and their fland upon their defence. A true Swede, cries the king; then he embraed him, and made him a colond on the fort.

The Turks, who all this while encompalied the houle, were fluck with lear and admiration, to fee the Swedes continue in it, notwithflanding it was all in flames. But they were much more forprided when they faw them open the doors, and the king and his men fall upon them in a defperate manner. Charles, and his principal officers, were armed with fword and pilled. Every one fired too pillols at a time in the inflant that the door spenced; and in the twinkling of an eye, throwing away their pillols, and drawing heir fowords, they drove the Turks back the diflance of fifty paces; but the moment after this little troop was furrounded. The king being booted, according to cuflom, threw himfelf down with his fipurts.

difarm him, and bear him away to the bafha's quarter's fome taking hold of his arms, and others of his legs, as the manner is to carry a perfon for fear of incommoding him.

As foom as the king faw himlelf in their hands, he looked upon the janifaries with a fimiling countenance, and they carried him, crying alla, with a mixture of anger and refpect in their faces. His officers were taken at the fame time, and firpt by the Turks and Tartars. It was on the 12th of February, 1713, that this firange adventure hapen'd.

BOOK VII.

T HE bafha of Bender waited with fome flate in his tent, expeding the king; and had by him one Marco for an interpreter. He received the king with great refpect, and prayed him to repofe upon a fopha, but the king took no notice of his civilities, and continued flanding.

The next morning they conveyed the king in a chariot covered with Garlet towards Advinancyle. While they were earrying this king difarmed and a priloner, who not only before had given law to for many countries, had been arbiter of the north, and the terror of all Europe; their happened to appear in the very fame place another initance of the frailky of human greatenefs. King Staniflaus was feized in the Turks dominons, and carried priloner to Bender at the funet time that they were conveying Charles to Advinancyle.

Stanifaus, unfupported by the hand that made him king, having no money, and confequently no friends in Poland, retired to Pomerania, and as the was not able to preferve his own kingdom, had done his beft to defend his benefator's. But in going to take advice of Charles, in relation to his abdicating the kingdom of Poland, he was lopped at Xafii in Moldavia. When he came near Bender, the basha, who was returning back from Charles, fent him an Arabian horfe with fine furniture.

Staniflaus was received at Bender with a difcharge of the artillery; and bating that he was a prifoner, had no great caufe to complain of his ufage there.

As for Charles, he was going to Adrianople, and the town was full of difcourfe beforehand about the battle. The Turks both admired and blamed him; but the divan was fo exafperated, that they threatned to confine him in one of the iflands in the Archipelago.

Some weeks after, there was a fudden change in the feraglio, which the Swedes affirm was owing to a letter that had been delivered to the Sultan in the king their maîter's behalf. The mufti was immediately depofed, the Kam of the Tartars banifhed to an illand in the Archipelago.

In the mean time, Charles was carried to a little callle called Demirtalh, near Adrianople, where multitudes of Turks were waiting to fee him alight. He was conveyed out of the chariot to the callle upon a Sopha; but that he might not be feen, he put a cafinon over his head.

He was buried here in oblivion and inactivity for about eleven months; which following clofe upon the molt violent exercife, make that illnefs real, which he had fome time feigned. In Europe, they verify thought him deal; and the regency which he fettled when he left Stockholm, hearing nothing from him, the fenate wated on the princefs Urice Elonora, to define fine would take the regency in her brother's abfence. She did accept on it; but inding the fenate had a mind to force her to a peace with the Czar and Demmrk, that on every field were falling upon Sweclar, which the knew the king would never raify, file refigned the regency, and wrote him a full account of the matter to Tarkey.

The king received her letters at Demotioa, and those Despote notions which he had early imbided made him quite forget that ever Sweden had been a free flate, or that the fenate used to fhare in the government of it with their former kings.

Wherefore, to prevent any attempts in Sweden againft his authority, and that he might defend his county; heoring nothing more now from the Ottomans but depending only on himfelf: he fignified to the grand vill his delire to be gone, by the way of Germany.

So the day was fet; and Charles before he went, was willing to make a figure as a king, notwithlaning the wretched condition he was in. He made Grothufen his embaffador extraordinary, and fent him in form to take his leave at Contlantinople, with a train of four(core perfors) richly dreffed.

On the first of Ödeber, 17 14, the king began his journey. A capagi Bafua, with fix Chiaoux, went to attend him from Demirtalt, whether he had moved a few days before. The prefents they brought him from the grand légnior were, a large ent of fearlet embroidred with gold, a fabre fet with jewels, eight beautifol Arabian horles with fine faddles and flirrups of mafilve fliver.

The convoy confilled of threefcore carriages, loaden with all forts of provision, and three hundred horfe.

When he came to the Turkifh frontiers, Sthriflaus was going thenceanother way into Germany, intending to retire into the decky of Deux Ponts. Charles affigned to Staniflaus the the revenue of this ducky, which was then reckoned to be about feventy thoufand crowns.

When the king of Swaden came to the German frontiers, he found the emperor had given orderf for lis reception every where with proper flate, Whereeyer hardingers had fixed his rout, great preparations were making to entertain him; and a world of people came to behold the man, whole conquelts and misfortunes, whole fealt additions, nay, and fying fill, had made fo much noife both in Europe and in Afra. But Charles hat no mind to fo much pomp, or to make a flew of the priloner of Bender: but was rather thinking how he might retrive his ill fortune with fome noble firoke before he came back to Stockholm.

So difmiffing his Turkith attendants at Targowitz, on the borders of Tranfylvania; he called his people together in a yard, and bid them take no ihought for him, but make the beft of their way to Straelfand in Pomerania, about three hundred leagues from thence, up the Baltick Fea.

He took no body with him, but one During, a young man, whom he made a colonel alterwards. He parted chearfully with his affects, leaving them in great coulation and concern for him. For a difguife he wores a black peruck, initiaed of his own hair, a gold laced hat, grey cloaths, and a blue coat, paffing for a German officer, and rid polk with only Colonel Daring.

Having rid all the first day without stopping, During not being uled to fuch fatigues, fainted away when he came to alight. The king would not ftay a moment, but asked During, What money he had ? he faid, about a thousand crowns. Give me half, fays the king, I fee you cannot go on ; Ill go without you, During begged he would flay three hours, and he was fure by that time he should be able to go on, and defired him to confider the danger of going alone. The king would not be perfwaded, but made him give him the five hundred crowns, and called for horfes. During, afraid of what might happen, bethought himfelf of this contrivance. He takes the poft mafter afide : Friend, fays he this is my coufin, we are going upon business together, and you see he won't flay for me but three hours; prithee give him the world borfe you have; and let me have a post chaife; or fome such we that was both lame and refly. Away he went about ten at night, through the fnow, and wind, and rain. Ilis fellow-traveller, after a few hours refl, fer our ag in in a chaife with very good horfes. About break of day he overtook the King, with his horfe tired, and walking towards the next fnge.

Then he was forced to get in with During, and flept upon the flraw; and afterwards they never floped, but went on, on horfeback all day, and fleeping in a chaife at night.

Thus, in fixteen days riding, and often in danger of being taken, he came at laft upon the 21ft of November 1714, to the gates of Strailfund, about one in the morning.

The king faid, he was a courier from the king in Turkey, and muft fpeak immediately with general Dukar the governour. The centinel told him, it was too late, the governour was a-bed, and he muft fay till day-light.

The king find it was an offsic of confequence 1 and declared if he did not go diredly and wake the governour, they flouid all be hanged in the morning. At laft a fericant went and called the governour 1 and Dukar, thinking it might be forme general officers, ordered the gates to be opened, and the courier wasbrought up to his chamber.

Daker, rubbing his eyes, afted, What new of his might? It taking took him by the floadler, what, fays he, Duker, have my heft faijetal targed me? In a standard of the sevent here set of joy. The news was all over the town in an inflant. Every body got up; the follers canneabout the governour's houle. The litest were full of people, alking if the news were the? I houring the conduits ran with wine, and the artillery freed.

However, the king was put to bed, which was more than he had been for fixteen days; they were forced to cut off his boots, his legs were 6 wollen with the faigue. He had neither linnen, nor cloaths ; and they provided in halle whatever they could find to fit him. When he had flept fome hours, the first thing he did was to review his troops, and examine the fortifications. And that very day he fent out orders into all parts for renewing the war with more vigour than ever againf all his nemulis.

But Sweden had loft all her foreign provinces, ma had neither trade, nor money, nor credit; her veteran troops were iher Killey or died forwant. Above 100000 Swedes were flaves in Mufcovy; and as many more fold to the Turks and Tartars. The very ipecies of men was vifbly decayed in the country; but notwithfanding all this, their hopes review as foon as ever they heard their king was come to Stradfund.

Such firong imprefiions of admiration and refpect reigned in the hearts of all his fubjects, that multitudes of young people came out of all parts of the country, and offered themfelves to be lifted, hardly leaving hands enough at home for cultivating their lands.

BOOK VIII.

T HE king, during these preparations, gave his only fifter, Uulrica Eleonora in marriag: to Frederick Prince of Hesse Cassel.

This matriage was not honoured with the king's prefence, who was now buily in finiting the fortifications of Strailfund, a place of great importance, which was in danger from the kings of Denmark and Trailla. However, he made his brother-in-law generalifilmo of all the Swedith forces. This prince had ferved the flates general in the French war, and was effected a good foldier, which went a good way towards his match with Charles's filter.

At the mouth of the Oder, a river that divides Pomerania, and paffing by Stetin, falls into the Baltic, there is a little ifland called Ufedom.

Its futuation make it a place of vaft importance; for it commands the Oder both on the right and left, and whoever has it, it mafter of the navigation of that river. The king of Prufils had diflodged the Sveder from thence, keeping that as well as Stein ift his hands, and fail he did it purely for the fake of prace. The Swedes however that retaken it  $n_{TIS}$ , and held too forts there, which were manned only with 250 Pomeranians, commanded by an old swedift officer named Daflep or Dufferp, a man who well deferves to be remembered.

The king of Prufia fent 1500 foot, and 800 drageons into the ifland. They landed without oppofition on the fide of Saine, which the Swedifh officer had left, being a place of leaft importance, and wrwlling to divide his little company, he retired with them into the cafile of Penamondre, refolving to hold out to the laft extremity.

So they wereforced to make a fiege in all the forms. They hisped their artillery at Stein, and least in a zeinforcement of 1000 Prufilm foot and 400 horfe. Soon after they opened the trenches in too places, and played a brilk fire of canono and mortars. In the time of the fiege, a Swedihi folder, fent privately with a letter from Charles, fond means to land on the iffand, and fip into Penamondre. He gave the letter to the commander, which was in the lew ords.

D<sup>0</sup> not fire, till the enemy comes to the brink of the Folfe: fland on your defence till the last drop of I commend you to your good fortune.

CHARLES.

Dufferp, reading the note refolved to obey, and die, as he was bid, to ferve his mafter. By break of day the affault was given. The befreged made their fire as directed, and killed abundance; but the

CHARLE'S XII. B. VIII.

Folle was full, the breach large, and the beflegers too numerous. They entered in two different places at once. The commander now thought he had nothing more to do, than to obey his orders, and fell his life dear: he shandoned the breaches, interached his litile company, who had all honour and courage enough to go with him, and placed them f5 that they fhould not be furrounded. The enemy cameon, wondering his would not atk for quarter. Not he forgut a whole hour, and when he had loft half his foldiers, was killedat all with his listentant and major. There were then a hundred men left, and one officer, who afked their lives, and were taken prifoners. In the commander's pocket they found his mafter's letter, which was carried to the king of Prufia.

At the time when Charles fulfained the lofs of Ufedom, and the neighbouring illands which were quickly taken, While Wifmar wasready to Gurender, with no fleet to help, and Sweden in the utmolt danger, he him/Elf was in Straalfund, and there belieged by 26.000 men.

There was in it a garrilon of 9000 men, and more than all, the king of Sweden himfelf. The kings of Denmark and Profila belieged it with an army of 36000 men, confifting of Prufilans, Danes and Saxons.

Overagainft Strailfund upon the Balrie, is the iffand of Rugen, which ferves for a define to this place, whether the garrifon and people could retire upon occation, if they had but boars. This ifland was of great confequence to Charles; for he knew if once the enemy were maîters of it, he fhould foon be invefted boh by fes and land, and probabily buried in the ruins of Strailfund, or elfe a prifoner to thole whom he had before 6 mouch depifed, and ufed fo hardly. However, the ill flate of his affairs had not allowed him to fend a fufficient garifon to Rugen, there being no more than 2000 regular troops in all upon the ifland. The enemy had been for three months making all proper difficitions for a decent thither, which was very difficult is but having built boats for the purpole, the prime of Ahhalt, by the favour of good weather, landed at laft 12,000 men upon the place, on the 15th of N vember.

That very day the king had been defending an outwork for three hours, and coming back very much fatigued, he was told that the Danes and Pruffians were in Rugen. It was eight o' clock at night, and he went directly in a fifther-boat with Poniatosky, Grothufen, During, Dardorf, and by nine he got to the illand. He joined his two thouland men, that were entrenched near a little haven about three leagues from where the enemy had landed. He marched with them at midnight in great filence. The Prince of Anhalt had used a caution that feemed unneceffary, to entrench his camp. His officers expected nothing in the night, and little thought but Charles was fafe at Straelfund. But the prince, who knew Charles much better, ordered a deep Foffe with Chevaux de de frize upon the edge of it, and took as much precaution as if he had to do with an army of fuperior force.

At two in the morning Charles came to the enemy is comp, without making the lend noife. It is foldiers fail to one another, Game, let at pull up the Chevaux de frife; which words were overheard by the camie moles and the alarm been quickly given, the enemies flood quick to this energy of the the energy declaration of the start of the start of the pullies is that is more than 1 expected it not at all discoursedy, and knowing nothing of their mumbers, nor alway of his, for the night favoured him in that, the solar of the holdeft with him, and all the reft were quick by after him. for faichnes. The king, the generals, and the boldeff of the officers and folders, go ton one another's fhoulders, as in affaults. The fight began in the ememics eamp; and the vigour of the Swedes put the Danes and Profilans into great diforder; but their numbers being too unequal, the Swedes were repulfed in about a quarter of an hour, and repalfed the folg.. The unfortunate king rallied his troops in the field, and the fight was renewed with equal warmth on both fides. He faw his favorite Grothufen and General Daroff fall, and Biffed over the laft in fighing before he was quite ded. During, his companion from Turkey to Strailfand, waskilde before his face.

The king himfelf was flot near the left breaft. Count Poniatosky was near, who having faved his life at Pultawa, had the good fortune to do the like again at Rugen, and remounted him.

The Swedes retired to a part of the illand named Alteferra, where there was a fort they were yet mafters of. From thence the king returned to Straelfund obliged to leave thofe brave troops who had ferved him fo well in that expedition; and they were all made priforers of war in two days after.

In four days the enemy made an affault upon the hornwork, which they took twice, and were beaten off. The king was always fighting among the grenadiers; but at last their number prevailing, they became mafters of it. Charles continued in the place two days after that, and flaid till midnight upon a ravelin that was quite deftroyed by the hombs and cannon. The next day, the chief officers entreated him to flay no longer in a place which could not be defended. But to retreat was now as dangerous as to flay. The Baltic was covered with Musco. vite and Danish ships, and the king, after great danger, landed at Ifted in Scandinavia, and came to Carelferoon in a very different condition from what he' had gone in from thence fifteen years before in a fhip of 120 guns, to give law to all the north.

Charles was going to make a fecond attempt upon

Norway, in OGtober 1718, and he had laid matters for, that he did not doubt to be maller of the country infix months. The winter is fevere encogh in Sweden, to KH the animals that live there; but he chole to go and counquer rocks, where for fnow and ice it is much worfe, rather than try to regain his beautiful provinces in Germany; but he hoped his new allance with the Care would put him foon in a condition to retake them. Befides, his ambition was pleefed with the thought of taking a kingdom from his conquering eacmy

At the mouth of the river Tiltendall, near the bay of Denmark, between Bahus and Anflo, ftands Fredericfhall, a place of great ftrength and importance, which is reckoned to be the key of that kingdom. Charles fat down before it in the month of December. The cold was fo extreme, that the foldiers could hardly break the ground. They might as well opened trenches in a rock ; but the Swedes thought much of no fatigues in which they faw their king take his thare to readily ; and Charles himfelf did never fuffer more than now. His conflitution by eighteen years labour was hardened to that degree, that he would fleep in the open field here in Norway, in the midit of winter upon boards or ftraw, covered only with his cloak, without prejudifing his health. Some of the foldiers in their posts fell down dead with cold, and others that were ready to die durft not complain when they faw their king bear it. A little before this expedition, hearing of a woman in Scandinavia, named Joan Dotter, that had lived feveral months upon nothing but water ; he, who had fludied all his life to bear the worft extremes that human nature can fupport, was refolved, to try how long he was able to fail. He neither eat nor drank, for five days, and on the fixih, in the morning, he rid two leagues to his brother's the prince of Heffe, where he eat very heartily, without feeling the least diforder, either from his long fasting, or his full eating after wards.

On the 11th of December, being St. Andrew's day, he went about nine at night to fee the trenches; and Juding the parallel not advanced to his mind, he was a little vexed at it; but monf Megret; a French engincer, that conducted the freqs, siftured him, the place would be taken in right days time. "We plaul tex, fays the king, what i and be date, and going on with the engineer to examine the works, he dopped at a place where the boyed made an angle with the parallel, and kneeling upon the inner Talus; he leaned with his elbows on the parapet; to look upon the men that were carrying on the trenches by the leanter the two exarrying on the trenches by the two exarrying on the two exarrying on the trenches by the two exarrying on the two exarrying on the trenches by the two exarrying on the two exarr

The leaft circumfainces are taken notice, of, that relate to the death of fo great a man as Charles XII. I mult therefore take upon me to fay, that all the convertation that las been reported by feveral writers, and M. de la Montraye among the reft, between the king and Megret the engineer, is abfolicity faile, And this is what I know to be the truth of the boinfiels.

The king flood with half Kis body exposed to a battery of cannon exactly levelled at the angle where he was. Not a foul was near him, but two Frenchmen, one was Monfieur Siker his aid decamp, a man of great courage and conduct, who came into his fervice in Turkey ; and was particularly attached to the Prince of Helle; the other was this engineer. The cannon fired with chain fhot, to which the king flood more exposed than any of them. Not far behind was count Swerin, who commanded the trenches. Count Poffe, captain of the guard, and one Kulbert an aid-de camp, received his orders. Siker and Megret faw the king the moment he fell upon the parapet, fetching a deep figh. They ran to him, but he was quite dead, a ball of half a pound had ftruck him on the right temple, and made a hole big enough to turn three fingers in. His head lying over the parapet. The left eye was beat in, and the right quite out of its foket. He was dead in an inftant ; but he had the force in that inftant to put his hand to the guard of his fword, and lay in that pofture. At this, Megret, a man of great indifference, faid Let us be going, the play is done. Siker ran immediarely, and told count Swerin, and they all agreed to keep it private till the prime of Heffe could be inkowed of it. They covered the corps with a grey cloak; #ker put on him his hat and wig, and he was carried by the name of capture. Carlbern through the troops, who faw twee dead king pafs, little thinking who it was.

The Prince gave orders prefendly, that none (hould flirr out of the camp, and that all the pafferto Sweden fhould be guarded, till he could take measures for his wife to claim the crown, and to exclude the duke of Holftein, who might poffibly pretend to it.

Thus fell Charles XII. king of Sweden, at the age of fix and thirty years and a half, having known the extremes of prosperity, and of adversity, without being foftened by the one, or in the leaft diffurbed at the other. All his actions, even those of his private life, are almost beyond any measure of probability. Perhaps he was the only man, to be fure he was the only king, that ever had lived without failings. He carried all the virtues of a hero to that excels, that they became faults, and were as dangerous as any of the oppolite vices. His refolution grown to obltinacy, occalioned his misfortunes in Ukrania, and kept him five years in Turkey. His liberality degenerating into profulion, ruined Sweden. His courage becoming rafhnefs, was the occasion of his death. His justice has been fométimes cruelty : and in his latter years, the maintaining his prerogative came not far thort of tyranny. His great qualities, any one of which had been enough to make another prince immortal, were a miffortune to his country. He never began a quarrel with any, but he was rather over warm than wife in his refentment. He was the first that ever had the ambition to be a conqueror, without withing to encreafs his dominions. His defire to gain kingdoms, was only that he might give them away. The paffion he had for glory, for war, and for revenge, made him too little of a politician, without which the world never before faw any prince a conqueror. Before a battle he was full of confidence, exceeding modelf after a victory, and in a defat undaunted. Sparing others no more than he did bimfelf, he made a finall account of his own or his fubjects lives or labours; a man Extracrdimary rather than a great man, and futer to be admired than imitated. His life dowever, may be a k flon to kings, and teach shows that a peaceful and happy reign is more obe defired than for moto dama

Charles XII. was tall and well thaped, he had a fine fore-head, large blue eyes full of fweetnefs, and a handfome nofe : but the lower part of his face was difagreeable, and often the worfe for his laugh, which was very unbecoming; he had little beard or hair; he fpoke little, and it was habitual to him to anfwer only with that laugh. At his table there was always great filence. With all that inflexible temper of his, he was timerous and bashful, and often at a loss in company, for having given himfelf fo wholly up to war, he knew but little of conversation. Before his long leifure in Turkey, he had never read any thing but Caefar's commentaries and the hiftory of Alexander. But he had writ fome obfervations upon war and his own campaigns, from 1700 to 1709. which he owned to the chevalier de Folard, and faid the manufcript was loft at the unfortunate battle of Pultawa.

As to religion, though the fentiments of a prince need not inducence thole of other men; and the opinion of a king 6 ill informed as Charles, can be of no great weight in fuch matters; yet it is proper thatmen's curiofity thould be faitingful in this as well as other particulars concerning him. I have it from the genuteman who gave me mode of the materials of this billory, that Charles was a ferious Lotherm till the year troy; he then faw the famous philolopher Mr. Leibniz at Leiptic, who was a great Freethinker, and talked very freely, having infilled his notions into more princes befides this. Charles learned from this philolopher a good deal of indifference for Lutheraifin: which he carried afterwards much farther, when he had more time in Tart key, and had feen fo many forts of profeffions: Of all this old opinions by retained but one, which was abiolate predefination, a dorine that favoured his contege, and jutified his rath adventures. The Cast had much the fame opinions as to religion and face is but he was many free to talk of them, as he did of every thing clic with we havourises very familiarly is to had his advantage work. Charle, that he had fludied philofophy, and uses a good freeker. I cannot help taking notice here of a flander that is too often foread by credulous or ill-meaning people, who will have it, that when princes die, they were either poilondo or diffinance it and the flow wen't in Germany, that Monfieur Siker was the man that kinled the king of Sweden. That here officer was very unafy at the report a good while; and one dig talking of it to me, he faid thefe very words, 'I might ' have killed herking of Sweden, but I had fuch a veneration for the hero, that though I had intended it, I could not offer to do it.

As foon as he was dead, the fage of Fredrickfull was raifed. The Swedes, who thought his glory rather a burden than a happinets, made peace with all their neighbours as stall as they could, and foon put and to that abloiting power which baron Goerra had made them weary of. The flates went to a free election of king charles's fifter for their queen, and obliged her falemply to renounce her heriditary right to the errown, holding it only by the people's buice, she promifed with repeated oaths, never to fet up arbitrary power; and afterwards, her love of power giving way; to conjugal affection, the yielded the crown to her hulbund, and brought the flates to chuck him who afended the throne upon the fame conditions.

Baron Goerts was feized immediately upon Charles's, death, and condemned by the fenate of Stockholm to be beheaded under the gallows; an influence tather of revenge than juffice, and a cruel infult os the memory of a king whom Sweden yet admires. F I N I S.
