ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The editors would like to thank the staff of the National Library of Scotland, the National Archives of Scotland and Aberdeen City Archives for their courteous and efficient service and advice. We should also like to acknowledge the kind permission of Fife Council Archives for the publication of the Burntisland material. Citation from the Fort Augustus manuscript has been granted with the permission and approval of the Trustees of the National Library of Scotland. Aberdeen City Archives are to be thanked for granting permission to reproduce the records in their care and for allowing digital images of the manuscripts to be taken, significantly speeding up the task of transcription. Particular debts of thanks are also owed to a number of individuals, notably Professor Archie Duncan for bringing the record of the 1555 convention to our attention and Judith Cripps, former archivist at Aberdeen City Archives, who provided considerable help and encouragement with the main body of the records in this volume and whose discovery in the 1980s of Aberdeen's copies of convention minutes has at last borne fruit. A number of others had a more or less unwitting hand in this and we thank them all: John Toller helped with the development of the project and some preliminary work in Aberdeen City Archives; Céline Foggie provided advice on French; Steve Murdoch answered questions and provided references on Robert Buchan, the pearl patentee; Roy Pinkerton on Latin; Siobhan Talbott on trade with France; Martine Van Ittersum and Peter Blom on Dutch placenames, currency and shipping; Chris Whatley on coal; and Kathrin Zickerman on German trade. Any errors which remain are, of course, the fault of the editors rather than these very obliging helpers to whom we are very grateful indeed.

INTRODUCTION

The Convention of Burghs

Although the early history of the body that was to develop into the convention of the royal burghs of Scotland remains somewhat obscure, there is sufficient material in print on the subject for it to be unnecessary to discuss its nature and development at length here. Its origins lie in the thirteenth-century court of the four burghs, presided over by the king's chamberlain. This court, originally consisting of representatives from Berwick, Roxburgh, Edinburgh and Stirling, had jurisdiction over all of the king's burghs. This was possible because of the convenient fact that, when twelfth-century kings founded Scotland's first incorporated towns, a corpus of laws which were to obtain in every burgh, the leges burgorum, was drawn up. This gave Scotland's towns a legal and administrative uniformity virtually unknown elsewhere in western Europe and goes a long way to explaining why there was nothing like the convention of royal burghs in other European states. By the beginning of the fifteenth century, clear efforts were being made to enhance the representative nature of the court by commissioners being sought from all but the most northerly burghs. The court was occasionally referred to as a 'parliament', implying representative and deliberative as well as judicial functions. Although the earliest surviving official records date from 1552, evidence from other sources suggests that, by no later than the 1520s, it had developed into a fairly regular, if not yet annual, meeting.

The convention was an assembly of representatives from all those towns which received a parliamentary summons and whose merchants were permitted to engage in overseas trade. The representatives were known as 'commissioners', in common with the elected members of all representative assemblies in early modern Scotland. Commissioners were elected by the councils of the burghs that they represented and, with the exception of Edinburgh's right to elect both a merchant and a craftsman, they consisted entirely of 'trafficking merchant burgesses'. Indeed, strenuous efforts were made to ensure that this regulation was adhered to, one instance of which is recorded in this volume, when a commissioner from Glasgow at the general convention of 1632 was forbidden to sit because he was ‘ane craftis man’.\(^2\)

As the records published here show, the convention had a wide range of responsibilities, including the defence of the burghs’ collective and individual trading privileges, lobbying central government, promoting manufactures and trade (both internal and international), arbitrating in disputes between burghs, co-ordinating the raising of money for public building projects within burghs, and maintaining and regulating the Scottish staple port at Veere (usually called Campvere in this period) on what was then the island of Walcheren in the province of Zeeland in the Netherlands but is now part of the mainland as the result of land reclamation.

The annual general convention usually met in early July, although it might be moved to avoid clashing with a parliamentary session: for example in 1633, because parliament met towards the end of June, the general convention at St Andrews was postponed until August to allow commissioners to report back on their parliamentary activities before the convention of burghs met. Attendance by representatives from all burghs was expected and fines were imposed upon those failing to send commissioners. Absence was permitted only if a burgh had obtained explicit permission from a previous convention, in which case, an absent burgh had to undertake to pay its normal dues and its proportionate share of any general contributions that were agreed upon, to promise to respect all decisions made by the conventions at which it was not represented, and to spend on public works any expenses that would have been incurred had a commissioner been sent.\(^3\)

‘Particular’ conventions were also held at other times, with as many as four of these additional meetings sometimes taking place in one calendar year. They consisted of representatives from a smaller number of burghs, usually selected in advance at the preceding general convention. Their purpose was to handle business delegated to them by the general convention or, occasionally, to deal with matters arising between conventions, in which case the council of Edinburgh was empowered to choose which burghs to summon.\(^4\)

In addition, what effectively amounted to extraordinary general conventions commonly met immediately before parliamentary sessions, an example of which appears in this volume, with the convention that met at Edinburgh in June 1633.\(^5\)

The Records of the Convention of Royal Burghs

Before the 1580s, the convention's records were not kept systematically, the convention having neither any permanent officers until 1584 nor a fixed location. It is not difficult to see how this must have interfered with the efficient conduct of business and, in 1580 at a convention at Aberdeen, it was lamented that the burghs were 'gretlie prejugit be the inlaik [i.e. lack] of ane generall buke quhilk suld contene the hall lawis and constitution of burrowis'. It was therefore resolved that the burgh council of Edinburgh would 'cause the said buke be maid' and request all the other burghs to send in copies of any 'lawis, actis, and constitutionis' passed by conventions of burghs that were preserved in their own records. They were given until the next general convention in 1580 to carry this out. It was a further two years, however, before the task was complete and the book was presented to the convention by John Guthrie, burgh clerk of Edinburgh, and subsequently the first official clerk to the convention. It was agreed that the council of Edinburgh would retain custody of the records and that any burgh wanting a copy for its own use might have one made for ten merks (£6 13s. 4d.). This was confirmed in 1584 when Guthrie was explicitly appointed as 'thair commoun clark and kepar of thair generall buke'.

As a result of the burghs' failure to begin the systematic compilation of the records of their convention until 1580, the records from before that date are incomplete, consisting only of those acts which were found in the process of commencing the official register. The oldest material in the first manuscript volume is the minute of a convention at Edinburgh in April 1552. It is tempting to see in the first act of that meeting a genuine beginning, for it was a resolution that the burghs should meet annually thereafter. On closer inspection, however, this illusion dissolves, for the act notes that it had long been intended to convene annual meetings, the implication being that, while meetings of the burghs had occurred, the aspiration of regularity had not been realised, so efforts to achieve this were being renewed. There had been previous acts for annual conventions and it is not clear whether this one had any more immediate success. Therefore the only reason that the official records of the convention of burghs commence in 1552 is that these were the earliest minutes that were unearthed as a result of the investigations.

6 John Guthrie was appointed permanent clerk in 1584, having acted as clerk since 1581 (see RCRBS, i, 120, 168, 185). Six years later, the convention appointed James Winram as its legal agent (see RCRBS, i, 348). Not until the later 1670s did the convention begin to meet almost invariably at Edinburgh, although the itinerant nature of general conventions had been in decline since 1660.

initiated at Aberdeen in 1580. The records from between 1552 and 1580 are patchy, for individual burgh records reveal that a number of conventions met during that period for which no records survive. The Victorian published edition of the convention’s records includes various acts from and evidence of additional meetings of burghs from as early as the late thirteenth century, while the record of a convention at Perth in 1555 that is published here for the first time reveals yet another previously lost meeting.¹⁰

From the early 1580s until 1631 the official manuscript record is virtually complete and so, therefore, is the Victorian edition of the convention’s records. At the foot of page 330 of the third volume of Extracts from the Records of the Convention of the Royal Burghs of Scotland there is a short note to the reader in square brackets, following the last entry in the minute of a particular convention of burghs at Edinburgh on 3 March 1631. It states simply that ‘The Convention Records are wanting from 3d March 1631 to 3d July 1649’.¹¹ The record then skips to the general convention of burghs at South Queensferry in July 1649. Much had happened over those eighteen years. Indeed, South Queensferry had not even been a royal burgh in 1631, not being enrolled until 1642, after years of resistance from Linlithgow.¹² When the venture to gather and publish the surviving records of the convention of royal burghs began in the middle of the nineteenth century, a whole volume of records, covering those eighteen years, was missing. The editors made valiant efforts to trace material which might fill that gap, hunting through the municipal archives of Scotland, but to no avail.¹³ All that could be done was to provide brief summaries of some acts from some of those conventions that met in that period from a digest of acts of the convention that had been compiled at its behest in the later seventeenth century, a venture which appears to have been intended to update a similar digest of 1632, although the earlier one is no longer extant.¹⁴ It would seem, from the records of the creation of that digest, and of further revisions of it that were begun in the later 1690s, that the volume covering the years 1631–1649 was still in existence at the beginning of the eighteenth century.¹⁵ How and when it went missing between that date and the middle of the nineteenth century may never be known, although it remains possible that it will yet come to light, mis-shelved in an archive or having found its way into the obscurity of a private collection.

¹³ RCRBS, i, pp. xiii–xvi. See also n. 4 on p. viii where it mentions the missing volume of records from 1631–1649.
¹⁴ See below, 98.
It has, however, proved possible to recover the records of many of the conventions, both general and particular, from seven years of the period covered by that missing volume. It is a tragedy that the minutes of the convention of royal burghs that cover the later 1630s, the prelude to the Covenanting revolution of 1638, the revolution itself, and the bulk of the period of Covenanting rule remain lost. Yet it is a pleasure to be able to present here, for the first time in print, the full record of most of the conventions of burghs from July 1631 until July 1636, and of the general convention of July 1647. No claim is being made for the dramatic rediscovery of the bulk of these records, although those from 1647 were genuinely chanced upon in the course of personal research. The minutes of the conventions between 1631 and 1636 have been known about for some time already, albeit they have been neither widely publicised nor much used. In 1980, Judith Cripps, then city archivist with Aberdeen District Council, on discovering that her archive contained unpublished records of the convention of royal burghs, wrote to her counterpart in Edinburgh, Walter Makey, informing him of this.
She enquired as to whether they were unique, since they were not included in the printed Extracts. Makey replied promptly, expressing interest and describing the material from the 1630s as ‘of the greatest interest’. Nothing further appears to have come of this exchange, however, and it was not until more recent research on the parliamentary activities of the burghs was being carried out that they were uncovered once again.

Aberdeen appears to be unique among Scotland’s parliamentary burghs in retaining such an extensive body of convention records. From the later sixteenth century, in the wake of the decision by the convention of burghs to create and maintain an official register of its own records and to employ a permanent clerk, the burgh council of Aberdeen took the prudent decision to ensure that every returning commissioner brought a full minute of the convention home with him. The first recorded instance of this occurred in November 1589 when Mr David Rutherford ‘producit the haill actis and proceidingis’ of a particular convention which had recently met at Edinburgh. In the following year, the council passed an ‘Ordinance anent the diligence to be reportit be commissionaris to conventiounis’. It included 16 the stipulation that every returning commissioner must ‘produce befoir that conventioun to the quhilk he salbe chosin within aucht dais eftir his returnynig', or face a hefty fine of £20. Thereafter, it was common for the council minutes to record the return of the commissioner and his production of the minutes of the convention.19 At some point, although it was not recorded in Aberdeen's council minutes, the burgh also acquired a copy of the older acts and thus the first volume of convention records held in Aberdeen includes those dating back to 1552 which were compiled between 1580 and 1582 by John Guthrie.20 It is therefore by design, not by accident, that Aberdeen City Archives has the missing records from the 1630s. It is testament to the diligence with which that burgh's archives have been kept over the centuries that many of Aberdeen's copies survive while those which were acquired by other burghs do not. It was not uncommon for commissioners from other burghs to return from conventions with a copy of the full minute of the meeting but only in Aberdeen do they appear to have survived.21 Even there, only those records from before 1637 were bound, while most of those dating from after 1636 appear to have perished or been lost. It is ironic that the first year after Aberdeen's virtually continuous sequence of bound convention minutes fails is 1637, a year in which Aberdeen itself hosted the general convention of burghs.22 There is, however, a clue as to the fate of some of them. The verso of the third-from-last (unnumbered) folio of the first volume of convention records held in Aberdeen contains a note that 'The towne wants the actis of borrows from 1607 to 1617, as lykways they want the acts 1633, as also the acts 1637 and 1638. George Moriesone at Michaelmas 1650 did resave certane actis quhilk he hes not redelyvered.' This is probably the same George Morrison who was provost in the 1650s and possibly also dean of gild in 1631 and a bailie in 1637.23 Of those listed, only the records from 1637 and 1638 appear not to have been returned, for those of 1607, 1617 and 1633 are all bound in the second volume. The note in the first volume also indicates that the records must have been bound for

The Manuscripts

The records of the convention of royal burghs in this volume come from three different sources: the earliest, the record of a convention at Perth in 1555, was unearthed among the Fort Augustus Manuscripts held in the National Library of Scotland; the records of conventions between 1631 and 1636, along with some other papers from the 1640s, are held in Aberdeen City Archives; while the records of a convention at Edinburgh in 1647 are preserved among the burgh records of Burntisland, held in the National Archives of Scotland, Edinburgh.

Fort Augustus Manuscripts, National Library of Scotland, and the Pittenweem Writ, National Archives of Scotland

James D. Marwick's edition of the Records of the Convention of the Royal Burghs of Scotland opens with the records of a convention at Edinburgh in 1552. These are followed immediately by those of another convention at the same burgh in May 1555. Due to the pressure of other business, the Edinburgh meeting was prorogued and the delegates were ordered to re-convene at Perth at the end of July. The minutes of the Perth gathering eluded Marwick, yet it was clear that the meeting had been held for the minutes of a later meeting, in September at Dundee, refer to the previous one at Perth.

The minutes of the convention at Perth on 4 and 5 of August 1555 have recently come to light, engrossed in a sixteenth-century volume containing a copy of Regiam Majestatem and other legal documents that had been kept at Fort Augustus Abbey but is now in the National Library of Scotland. There is nothing to distinguish the minutes amongst the miscellaneous entries in this bulky volume. They simply appear eight lines from the bottom of folio 330v and continue to the end of folio 333v. The Perth minutes are preceded by copies of the five statutes that were approved by the convention at Edinburgh in April 1552 noted above. These are followed immediately by the heading ‘At Perth 4 August 1555’. In contrast to the preceding entry, the record of the Perth meeting is transcribed in full from the sederunt to the final signatures. This appears to be a final copy of the business dealt with by the commissioners at Perth, compiled and attested to by Sir Henry Elder, notary and burgh clerk of Perth on 4 and 5 August 1555.

This material from the conventions of 1552 and 1555 has no obvious connection with either the previous or subsequent entries in what is a rather eclectic volume.

One of the acts of this convention is also preserved in the Pittenweem Writs, held in the National Archives of Scotland. It covers two sides of one folio; the first 20 lines comprise a copy of the heading, the sederunt and the ninth statute passed at Perth in August 1555. The remaining 53 lines are a transcription of an act of parliament of 22 May 1584. This act, ‘Anent the gaige and standart of salmondis heringis and quhite fische and principall stapillis thairof’, does not appear to have any obvious connection with the preceding Perth extract. The two simply seem to have ended up being copied on the same piece of paper.

Records held in Aberdeen City Archives

Aberdeen City Archives holds a substantial collection of manuscripts relating to the convention of royal burghs. The bulk of the material reproduced here comes from the second of three manuscript volumes, the first two of which contain full transcripts of the minutes of most conventions of royal burghs from 1552 to 1636, while the third contains abstracts of the acts of the convention from 1552 to 1669. The material in the first two volumes, up to and including a particular convention of burghs at Edinburgh in March 1631, is identical to that contained in the first two printed volumes of convention records which were taken from the official minutes now held by Edinburgh City Archives. The last six years of records in the second Aberdeen volume are unique and have not previously been published. The abstracts in the third volume are identical to those that were published in the fourth printed volume of convention records. The first two Aberdeen volumes are foliated throughout, with numbers which are clearly in a seventeenth-century hand, suggesting that the records of individual conventions, which were brought back to Aberdeen by returning commissioners were bound within no more than a few decades of their creation. However, there are gaps and inconsistencies in the numbering of the folios. This may indicate that foliation occurred prior to binding and that some records were lost in that process, or that because the records have been bound more than once

(most recently in the first half of the nineteenth century), some folios were lost during their disbinding and rebinding.

In addition to the bound material, Aberdeen City Archives holds a number of bundles of papers relating to the convention of royal burghs. These include some copies of minutes of conventions from the later seventeenth century (all of which are already in print), and from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, as well as letters of instruction to the burgh's commissioners to the convention, and copies of the missives which were despatched to each burgh, requesting the election of the burgh's commissioner and containing a detailed agenda for the forthcoming convention. It was important to the convention that each burgh was an active participant in this representative system and, as can be seen from the records in this volume, it was common for an act to end with the statement that an unresolved matter should be a 'heid of the nixt missive', that is, an item on the agenda of the next convention. This ensured that each burgh council could send its commissioner 'sufficientlie instructed' on these matters and thus able to contribute fully to the discussion. The representative theory was firmly one of delegation, whereby commissioners were directly representing the views of their electors, so much so that if a matter arose which had not been on that year's missive, it was customary to carry it over to the following year. Some of the missives from the period before 1644 have been published in Aberdeen Council Letters; not all of those held by Aberdeen City Archives appear in those volumes. Those from the periods for which full minutes of conventions do not survive are an invaluable source of information on the business of those conventions and therefore the previously unpublished missives for 1641, 1643 and 1648 are included in this volume, having been omitted from the published council letters apparently because they were filed as papers relating to the convention of burghs, rather than as correspondence. There is therefore considerable value in reproducing these missives because their publication helps, at least partially, to fill some of the voids that remain in the surviving minutes of the convention of burghs between 1631 and 1649. These documents (along with the missives for 1638, 1639 and 1642 already published in Aberdeen Council Letters) reveal what business was to be handled at each convention and what had been carried over from previous years.

Burntisland Council Minutes, National Archives of Scotland

Burntisland hosted the general convention of royal burghs in the summer of 1648, as the missive for that year, reproduced here, shows.\(^{37}\) The council of Burntisland was therefore responsible for sending the missives to all burghs that were entitled to elect commissioners. To ensure the accuracy of these missives, when Burntisland’s commissioner returned from the general convention of 1647 at Edinburgh, the council exceptionally had the whole minute of that convention, including the sederunt, copied into its own minute book. The minute is preceded by a sederunt of the burgh council and a single act of the council, recording the return of the burgh’s commissioner: ‘Compeirit Captane Andro Watsone commissioner at the last general conventioun of burrouis hauldin at Edinburgh the fyft day of Julij last and maid report of his commissioun and producit the extract of the whole actis quhairof the tennor followis’.\(^{38}\) The record then takes up twenty-five pages of the council minute book, with the council minutes recommencing immediately thereafter, without even a new page being taken, either at the start or the end of the minutes of the convention. These minutes are not, however, quite as full as those that are preserved at Aberdeen. Aberdeen’s convention minutes are verbatim copies of the official minutes, give or take a few inevitable scribal errors and variations in spelling made by the clerk to the convention in copying the record for Aberdeen’s commissioner to take home with him. Those in the Burntisland council book, on the other hand, are a copy of a copy, having been taken by the burgh clerk from a full official copy that had been brought back by the burgh’s commissioner. The clerk summarised some of the more routine acts and those that related to matters that were not to be raised again at the convention of 1648.\(^{39}\)

The Records and their Significance

This volume contains much material for historians on a wide range of themes including economic affairs, national and local government, internal and international trade, parliamentary affairs, relations between the burghs and the crown, fishing, manufacturing, monopolies, education, and taxation.

The convention at Perth in 1555
In May 1555 a convention of burghs assembled at Edinburgh. It was scheduled at the same time as a parliament called by the regent, Mary of Guise. In their work on parliaments and other meetings of the estates, Mackie and Pryde noted that meetings of parliaments and conventions of burghs were not regularly synchronised until after May 1567, yet these two bodies certainly met at the same time and in the same burgh on 29 May 1555.40

As the printed record indicates, the convention opened as scheduled and immediately put into action a plan to alter the taxes assessed on all of the member burghs. It was remarked at the time that while some burghs had prospered and grown, others had shrunk. A new tax roll was required to reflect this. Consequently, twelve individuals from six burghs, three from north and three from south of the Forth, were nominated to undertake the ‘alteratioun of the extent’.41 However, by 3 June it was clear that, ‘becaus the maist pairt of the provestes forsaidis wer chosin Lordis of Articilis of Parliament’ and were pre-occupied with that role, the convention could not carry out its business. The meeting was prorogued and the delegates warned to convene at Perth at the end of July.42 Those chosen to alter the tax roll were advised to be prepared to present the revised roll at the Perth meeting.
Although the records of that convention eluded the editors of the published convention records, the minutes of the convention at Dundee in September of that year note that the Perth convention had taken place.43

The discovery of the Perth minutes thus fills an important gap in the record.44 The convention comprised twenty commissioners from ten burghs.45
They met over a period of two days, passed eleven acts and approved the new tax roll.46 The acts echo many of the themes most commonly addressed by conventions throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Issues like unfreemen using merchandise, non-resident merchants, and the standardisation of weights and measures were repeatedly expressed at conventions just as they were at Perth in 1555. The Perth minutes thus add little that is new to our knowledge of the workings of the organisation. However, the survival in this manuscript of the complete tax roll compiled in 1555 is unique; although the convention at Dundee in September ratified it, the roll is not incorporated into the minutes of that meeting.47

This copy of a complete tax table provides a benchmark for the middle of the sixteenth century. A partial tax roll on burghs north of the Forth, compiled in 1483, was printed by Marwick in the first volume of the Convention records.48 Seventeen burghs were listed in 1483, two of which had disappeared from the list by 1555. Five, identified in 1555 were not on the list in 1483. A lapse of 72 years makes comparison hypothetical if one takes into account inflation and devaluation of the currency but it is interesting to note that Aberdeen and Dundee were assessed at the same rate in 1483 but by 1555 Dundee was asked to pay £100 more than Aberdeen. In his appendix to volume one, Marwick printed four sixteenth-century assessments imposed on the burghs between 1535 and 1556. All of these represent the burghs' portions of taxes authorised by parliament or the governor or regent.49 Further sixteenth-century alterations of the tax roll, a process undertaken every four years between 1579 and 1594, are increased assessments based upon every £100 of all taxations on each burgh rather than being full, new tables as was the one compiled at Perth in August 1555.50

One other curiosity about the Perth convention is that only nine signatures appear at the end of the tax roll, although twelve assessors were appointed at the Edinburgh meeting.51 The absence of John Erskine of Dun might be explained by his having been drawn away on some official state business since he was a trusted servant of the regent. Although he is named with the nine others in the minute introducing the tax roll, he did not sign it, nor is he included in the sederunt at the opening of the convention.52 He was certainly appointed along with his fellow townsman William Panter but only the latter witnessed the new roll. Erskine may have been present briefly on 5 August, but it seems more likely that the notary simply copied his name from the Edinburgh minutes. The other two absentees, the commissioners from Edinburgh, receive no mention of having been present at Perth at any time during the convention. Furthermore, there is no record of any altercations among the commissioners, yet the Dundee minutes state that Edinburgh's commissioners travelled to Perth but 'departed fra the samyn conventioun, and wald nocht apply thameselfis to this effect, quhairunto

The Pittenweem writ

The Pittenweem writ is a curious document. It opens with a heading that indicates that what will follow is a copy of the minutes of the Perth convention of 1555. The sederunt is identical to that in the Fort Augustus manuscript, except that 'George' Lowell, commissioner for Dundee, is listed as 'James'. The sederunt is followed by a copy of the ninth statute in the Perth agenda. The statute is not copied verbatim, the writer using fewer contractions than the Perth copyist and in places substituting synonyms for a word so that, for example, 'limits' in the Perth copy became 'bounds and liberty' in the Pittenweem document. The ninth statute deals with the regulation of staple goods and makes mention of red and white fish, which surely would have been landed at Pittenweem but was this why it was singled out? Had it been the first or the last item on the agenda that was copied here, one might conclude that the following or preceding pages had gone missing but that cannot have been the case in light of the ensuing item on the same sheet of paper.

The twenty lines devoted to the Perth convention are immediately followed by the text of an act of parliament, with a title but no context or date. This is not, as one might expect, an act passed by the 1555 parliament, but one from May 1584. There is no obvious connection between the two extracts. The content of the second, like the first, refers to the regulation of the fishing trade, though in greater detail. This might explain why they were copied on to the same page but it might be equally plausible that the two were transcribed together simply in an attempt to conserve paper. One might wish for something more from this find. The most that it offers is evidence that the burghs either received or made and saved copies of the statutes of conventions of royal burghs and other relevant documents for their own use and reference.

Conventions from 1631 to 1648

To anyone who has read the records of the convention of burghs in the period before 1631 or after 1648, much of the seventeenth century material in this volume will appear very familiar. Persistent and effective action

53 RCRBS, i, 13.
54 Young, The Parliaments of Scotland, ii, 438–9, suggests that James is the correct name.
55 For the act of parliament, see RPS, 1584/5/25.
56 For a discussion of copies, see above, 6. That Pittenweem had a copy of an act from 1555 is intriguing, given that it did not begin to send commissioners to conventions until 1575, suggesting that the records of the Perth convention were still extant in the 1570s.
continued against ‘unfree traders’, that is those from outwith royal burghs who did not share in their trading privileges. Like many campaigns against many aspects of law-breaking, it was a battle that was never going to be won. Yet the efforts of the convention to ensure that its members took action against unfree traders demonstrate its continued determination to defend the privileges of the royal burghs. Wherever unfree traders were found to be operating, the convention sought to ensure that individual burghs gave undertakings to carry out decisive action against them, and it followed up those undertakings to ensure that they had been fulfilled. Similarly, the willingness of the convention to organise aid to impecunious burghs in carrying out public works, including repairs to harbours, bridges, churches and tolbooths, and the paving of streets continued as before, however difficult that may have become during the straitened times of the 1640s. The range of responsibilities that were taken on by the convention went beyond issues that related directly to trade and urban administration to include education, as can be seen in the continuing efforts to ensure that burgh schools all over Scotland adhered to the same Latin grammar, perhaps one of the earliest instances of such a thing on a national scale. So voluminous are the records from this period that what follows does not seek to be a comprehensive analysis of the material. It would be impossible here to provide an exhaustive account of any, let alone all, of these things. Instead, it seeks to examine a number of significant themes to illustrate the wide range of matters with which the convention of burghs concerned itself in the second quarter of the seventeenth century and therefore its prominent role in national affairs.

The Scots staple port at Veere

From the middle of the sixteenth century, the merchants of Scotland had their ‘staple port’ situated at Veere (which they usually referred to as ‘Campeir’ or ‘Campvere’), a small port on what was then the island of Walcheren in the province of Zeeland in the Netherlands. Previously the staple had been sited at Bruges in Flanders and Middelburg which was situated, like Veere, on Walcheren. All staple goods that were to be exported to the Netherlands (skins, hides, woollen cloth, salmon, tallow and beef) were to be exported exclusively through that port. The advantage to the Scots was that the staple arrangement consisted of an agreement between the royal burghs and the magistrates and council of Veere: neither tolls nor customs were levied on Scottish imports; the Scots were allowed to establish a ‘conciergerie house’ in which their merchants would obtain bed and board; there was an independent court, presided over by the ‘conservator of the Scottish privileges’, with jurisdiction over disputes involving Scottish merchants. After the Reformation, a separate Scots church was established with its own minister and reader, funded by levies on Scottish trade which were collected by ‘factors’ who, like the conservator, were normally expatriate Scots and who acted as agents for Scottish merchants, selling their goods on commission, collecting dues to maintain the church, and pay the stipends of the minister and reader, and returning any balance to Scotland.

As can be seen from the records in this volume, the administration of the staple was one of the most prominent items of business on the agenda of most general conventions. Indeed, it seems to have been a constant headache for the convention, posing all sorts of problems relating to the upkeep of the church, ensuring that the conservator and factors did their jobs properly, and trying to maintain the agreed relationship between the council of Veere and the Scots merchants there. This relationship was not always a happy one, becoming so strained at one point that the convention considered relocating the staple to Middelburg.61 One of the main problems was ensuring that Scots merchants exporting to the Netherlands paid the dues that were required of them.62 However, the problems evident in the 1630s were nothing new, similar difficulties having occurred in the 1620s when relations between the convention and the Veere authorities had reached such a low point that the convention had already considered moving the staple elsewhere, a plan which was again being entertained in the 1660s when Rotterdam was the mooted alternative.63

In many ways it seems puzzling that the convention persisted with the maintenance of the staple at Veere, given the chronic problems of administering the agreement with the magistrates and council of the port and of the upkeep of the minister, reader, conservator, factors and conciergerie house. It is equally bamboozling that there was any enthusiasm for the maintenance of the staple arrangements among the membership of the convention, given the size of the Scottish community at Rotterdam and the fact that so many

Scottish merchants were evidently bypassing Veere in spite of the facility that the factors provided. Why, since it appears to have proved so difficult to maintain meaningful oversight of the activities of Scottish merchants in the Low Countries, was the most drastic solution that they seemed to be willing to entertain the shifting of the staple to another nearby port in Zeeland or to Rotterdam? Scots merchants traded to France, Spain, Germany, England, Ireland, the Scandinavian kingdoms and the other states that fringed the Baltic Sea without the need for a single entrepot in any of those places, while many used the services of agents in the ports to which they traded, rather than travelling in person with their goods. Many Scottish merchants were evidently unwilling to use the staple at Veere, as the numbers known to have evaded payment of their dues is likely to have been only a fraction of the total. In spite of all this, throughout the frequent discussions of the difficulties with the staple, not once did anyone suggest that the institution be disbanded.

The parliament of 1633
The records of the conventions in the summer of 1633 are some of the most interesting and most frustrating in this volume. In that year, Charles I returned to Scotland for the first time since he had left to join the rest of the royal family in England early in 1604 at the age of three. He came north for his Scottish coronation and to hold his first parliament, which would prove to be the only parliament of his reign over which he had any meaningful control. The visit was not a political success. Highly ritualised liturgies were used in the coronation service and other religious services attended by the monarch, breeding what proved to be well-founded fears of a royal desire for radical reforms of Scottish worship along Laudian lines.
The parliamentary session was tightly controlled, dissent was silenced and members were intimidated by the king in casting their votes. Indeed, the parliament appears to have focused opposition to the kingship of Charles I in general as well as to specific aspects of it. It is clear from the minutes of the conventions of burghs that met around the time of parliament that something went wrong and that a number of burgh commissioners did not conduct themselves as they ought to have during this parliamentary session.

in particular, see J.R. Young, 'Charles I and the 1633 Parliament', in K.M. Brown & A.J.
1567–1707 (Edinburgh, 2005).
On 13 June 1633, as had been customary since at least the middle of the sixteenth century, a convention of burghs met at Edinburgh in preparation for the parliamentary session, which began five days later. As the burgh commissioners were almost certainly occupied largely with parliamentary business, the record for that day consists merely of the sederunt and the election of the moderator, for the deliberations of the burghs as a parliamentary estate (rather than as the convention per se) tended not to be recorded in the convention's minutes. Yet it is common to find rather more in the minutes of similar preparatory conventions and it might be surmised that the brevity of the record of this convention indicates a desire to err on the side of caution in recording the burghs' views. The next entry after the election of the moderator is dated Saturday 29 June, the day after parliament had ended. It contains a laconic reference to the need for 'takeing ordour with disordoures in this present conventioun and parhament'. No details of the nature of these 'disordoures' were provided, perhaps because it was deemed expedient not to minute them.

When the general convention met at St Andrews in August, having been postponed from its usual date of early July because of the parliament, the issue was addressed at some length, although the record still gives no specific details. The problem appears to have been one of some burghs breaking with the tactic of voting en bloc on issues of common concern, something which had been a key element of the burghs' parliamentary strategy since the 1570s. The general convention at St Andrews noted that there had been an 'inlaike of lauchfull and uniforme concurrence as is requisit and expedient in the memberes of ane body' and various acts of convention relating to this were cited and ratified. It is, however, unclear to what particular issue in the parliament of 1633 the problem relates, as there is no evidence that the burghs failed to secure any act which they had sought. Indeed, they were delighted to have obtained the passage of a detailed ratification of numerous former statutes in their favour, which they not only inserted in their own records but ordered to be copied into the court records of every burgh. It may be that pressure had been applied by the crown to persuade the burghs to extend their whip system beyond legislation relating to the interests of the burghs into more political matters, voting on which had previously been explicitly reserved to the conscience of the individual commissioner.

Certainly, something untoward occurred involving the burghs’ votes on 28 June, although the only controversy which has been identified in other sources involved the two commissioners from Aberdeen. The burgh’s principal commissioner, its provost Sir Paul Menzies of Kinmundy, had been one of the lords of the articles and therefore probably sympathetic to the king’s programme in parliament. For reasons unknown, although most probably illness, he was unable to attend on the final day when the legislation was to be voted on. As was customary, his ‘assessor’ (a named deputy in the burgh’s parliamentary commission), Sir Patrick Leslie of Iden, took his place but voted against some of the crown’s acts. This probably included that which notoriously combined a confirmation of the royal prerogative with the power to dictate clerical apparel, which caused widespread unease among parliamentarians. They felt torn between denying the king’s prerogative and denying their consciences, as they feared that the king would use the act to prescribe Anglican vestments in Scotland. Charles I was a king who bore grudges and when Aberdeen elected Leslie as its provost two years later, the furious monarch not only overturned the election but debarred Leslie from ever holding office in Aberdeen again.73

The royal visit of 1633 also provided what was potentially a precious opportunity for the burghs’ representatives to lobby the king directly on a number of issues of particular concern. Before 1603, this sort of thing had been commonplace, with conventions of burghs regularly sending delegations to James VI on a whole range of issues. Since the king’s departure for England, however, contact had been much more indirect and difficult, in spite of the establishment of an agent for the burghs at court in 1613.74 Determined to make the most of the opportunity presented by the king’s visit, the particular convention meeting at the time of parliament commissioned the representatives of ten burghs to try to meet him ‘before his Majestie pas in to England’ to discuss the most pressing issues that concerned them, namely fishing, the exclusion of Scottish merchants from English trading privileges, the two ‘extraordinarie’ taxes just voted by parliament, the depredations of Dunkirk pirates, and a number of matters that parliament had remitted to the privy council.75 They met at Edinburgh on 1 July, noted that they had been unable to speak to the king because he was out of town but that he would return in nine days and therefore delegated two of their number, along with the clerk of the convention, to try to meet him then.76 When the general convention

met at St Andrews in August, it transpired that no meeting had taken place. It has been observed that, before his return to England, Charles 'persistently snubbed those who had voted against him in parliament'. Could it be that opposition in parliament by some of the burgesses prevented them from putting their case to the king? At St Andrews, it was resolved that a further particular convention of commissioners from nineteen burghs would meet in October to devise means of dealing with the crown, by direct contact with the privy council and indirectly with the king. That convention made no more progress, finding that, in spite of an agreement on fishing having been achieved, English fishermen continued to operate in Scottish waters and to encroach upon fishing grounds that the Scots believed were reserved to themselves. The matter was, once more, remitted to another particular convention in the following January. Although the failure of the burghs to obtain from the crown a satisfactory response to their grievances was no novelty, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that they had a strong sense of a missed opportunity in the summer of 1633. They had tried to deal directly with Charles I but had failed to attract his attention and the issues which concerned them remained unresolved.

Trade with England and Ireland

While frustration with the events of the summer of 1633 may mark a peak in the burghs' difficult relationship with Charles I, tensions are evident throughout the records in this volume. In 1638, many burg councils were happy to describe the efforts of the Covenanters against their king as the 'common cause' and, although religious and constitutional issues were to the fore in the Covenanters' struggle, there was a wider range of reasons for underlying discontent with Charles I, many of which were shared by different social groups, but some were peculiar to one group or another. Exclusion from the decision-making process at the heart of government, for example, was keenly felt by many peers but it was not something that particularly exercised the burghs. Their enthusiastic support for the Covenanting revolution is already well-known, but these records provide evidence that their discontent was grounded upon a much wider range of issues than their heightened tax burden, upon which historians have tended to concentrate in the past.

80 The phrase is common and can be found, for example, in Glasgow's council minutes, GCA, Cl/1/10, 25 Aug. 1638.
One striking feature of the records from the 1630s is the evidence of a strong sense of grievance within the merchant community over what they perceived as the unequal treatment given to merchants from the different kingdoms ruled by Charles I. While the English navigation laws which excluded non-English ships from trade with England's colonies would not be passed until the Cromwellian era, the failure of a British customs union under James VI (abandoned in 1610 only a few years after it had begun) meant that there was no freedom of trade within the king's dominions. In 1632 the 'equalitie of custome in Ingland, Scotland and Irland' was discussed with what appears to have been a positive outcome, the burghs' agent at court having obtained a 'new gift' of the equality of customs throughout the three kingdoms. However, it transpired that, in spite of a royal command, this had not been proclaimed in Ireland, where a levy of 10s. continued to be demanded for every tun of wine imported in Scottish (but not English) ships. By the summer of 1633, the problem was being described in broader terms as the 'inequalitie of the liberties betuix this kingdome and the kingdome of England', because English merchants were able to trade freely with Ireland, whereas Scottish merchants were not. It was just one of a list of disadvantages that the burghs claimed to be suffering, the other prominent ones being the degree to which English fishing boats (as well as Dutch ones) had the right to fish in Scottish waters, the granting of patents and monopolies by the crown, the depredations of Dunkirk pirates and reform of the coinage. Apparently favourable responses were received from the king on all of these issues and specific undertakings were given to put an end to certain patents and monopolies. However, no positive action appears to have been taken relating to the two key matters of 'restraint in Irland and mutuall participatioun of all native comodiutes betuixt his Majesties thrie kingdomes'.

Many of these issues remained unresolved by the time of the revolution of 1638 and can be added to the growing levels of crown interference in urban government and the economic pressures of the heightened tax burden as reasons for discontent among Scotland's merchant elite. It thus becomes even easier to see why the burghs were so willing to join the revolution against Charles I when it broke out in the winter of 1637–8. Ironically, under the Covenanting regime the burghs would find themselves paying levels of taxation and experiencing economic disruption and central interference that would have made the policies of Charles I appear moderate in comparison, but they could not have known that when they backed the Covenant with such enthusiasm in 1638.88

Privileges in France
While Charles I seems to have had little care to address some of the grievances of his Scottish mercantile subjects as far as their rights in the rest of his dominions were concerned, he was more willing to help them in their trade with France. It has often been assumed that all Franco-Scottish connections, including Scotland’s special economic privileges, were severed in 1560 when Scotland adopted Protestantism and began to realign its foreign policy as a result, and that they certainly vanished in 1603. Current research is demonstrating that this was certainly not the case, a view that is clearly supported in this volume.89

The references to France, specifically Normandy and Picardy, in the minutes of the convention of royal burghs are interesting for a number of reasons. Their principal significance lies in the fact that they demonstrate an undiminished belief among Scots merchants that their ancient trading privileges in France ought to be unaffected by the political and religious changes of the previous seventy years or so. There were even attempts to establish and oversee factors in France to monitor and facilitate Scottish trade, as was the policy in Veere. In spite of the fact that Scottish trade in northern France appears to have been concentrated on only two ports (Dieppe and Le Havre), just as with Veere, it proved difficult to operate such a system. Problems with factors abusing their positions during the later 1620s led to efforts to replace them with people who would swear to be subject to Scots law and to relinquish their own mercantile activities. Persistent efforts by the convention of burghs during the early 1630s were in vain, as it proved impossible to find anyone willing to serve under the direction and authority of the convention of royal burghs in such a capacity.90 There may have been too few Scots in these ports, or perhaps those who were operating as factors were unwilling to cease trading as merchants themselves. It seems 89 For a review of the historiography on this subject, see S. Talbot, 'Introduction', in 'An Alliance Ended? Franco-Scottish Commercial Relations c.1560–1713' (University of St Andrews, PhD thesis, 2010).

90 RCRBS, iii, 203, 221, 285, 312; and see below, 45–6, 69–70, 85–6, 114–15, 134, 164–5.
that the root of the problem with the Scottish factors in France was that they had been profiting by abusing their position. Unlike those in Veere, who were under the jurisdiction of the convention and were forbidden to trade personally so that the interests of the merchants whom they represented would be safeguarded, those in France would sell their own goods first, thus obtaining the best price, before selling the wares of their compatriots.

The convention also discussed the alleged ‘new and heavie impositiounes in France’, whereby customs were being levied on Scottish goods in spite of the Scots’ belief that they had the right to trade freely with France as part of ‘their ancient libertyes in the said kingdome’. It was resolved in 1634 to negotiate directly with Louis XIII by sending and funding an ambassador of their own. This approach was unusual, for it bypassed the normal diplomatic channels, but it had numerous precedents in the history of the convention of burghs. Although the initiative came from the burghs, out of respect for Charles I and to improve the chance of success, the burghs’ ambassador was instructed to go via court and obtain a letter of recommendation from the king, which he duly did. The mission cost 8,000 merks (£5,333 6s. 8d.) and the burghs’ ambassador obtained a 50 per cent reduction in the impositions upon Scottish goods going to France. Unfortunately, the precise nature of the ‘ancient libertyes’ remained undefined but it seems safe to say that, whatever the Scots thought they were, the French were not keen to concede too much. In spite of what was agreed in the 1630s, there were still problems in 1647, when the convention received a complaint from ‘severall merchandis of the great prejudice they sustein throw the great infringment of breaking of our ancient priviledges and liberties within the kingdome of France by augmenting of our customes and laying of heavie impositionis upoun our countriemen in the name of strangeris’. In the 1630s, Edinburgh had advanced the ambassador’s expenses to him and, to refund them, with interest, the convention agreed on an imposition on all Scottish trade with Normandy and Picardy. As a result, the convention then required the burghs to monitor trade through those regions of France so that a levy could be taken to reimburse the costs of the embassy, and this appears to have continued through the 1640s, demonstrating the great expense to which their ambassador went, or the limited nature of Franco-Scottish trade, or perhaps the difficulty of collecting the levy. Another possibility is that a second levy was required to defray further costs incurred at some point after 1636. The French trade of Edinburgh, Dundee and Aberdeen alone raised £1,181 14s. in the first year of the levy, amounting to more than 20 per cent... of the total cost of the ambassador's trip in 1634, while the act from 1647 that related to the levies on trade with Picardy and Normandy appears to refer to a second set of payments beginning in 1642.\textsuperscript{95} Unfortunately, only the fact that the monitoring was carried out was recorded, for the papers containing the details of that trade do not appear to have survived.

\textit{Revision of the burghs' tax roll, 1635}

The 'tart roll’, sometimes called the 'stent roll', of the burghs consisted of a list of the burghs and the proportion of every £100 of taxes which was due from each of them. Parliaments voted taxes, but the burghs reserved the right to apportion their share of those taxes among themselves. The tax roll was also used by the convention to divide up any sums which the burghs agreed to collect on their own initiative, such as the collection of £800 in 1636 to aid Pittenweem in the repair of its harbour.\textsuperscript{96} It was believed that in 1635 Charles I ordered that the existing stent roll, which had pertained since 1612, be recalculated. It has been assumed that nothing was actually done in response to this demand and that the roll remained unaltered between 1612 and 1649, in spite of the remarkably long duration of this period, the enrolment of six new members into the convention and the significant economic upheavals of the 1630s and 1640s.\textsuperscript{97} The records in this volume not only suggest that this was not the case, they also indicate that the initiative in the 1630s may not have come from the king at all but from the burghs themselves. They also indicate that not only was the roll altered in 1635, it appears to have been revised on at least two further occasions thereafter.

The issue was first raised as early as 1633, at the general convention at St Andrews (with no indication that the king had initiated discussion), when it was agreed that commissioners to the next general convention should be sent 'sufficientlie instructed ... whither it salbe expedient to alter the tart roll [of 1612] or not'.\textsuperscript{98} It was then agreed in 1634 that the roll should be recalculated because it 'hes not bein this long tyme alterit' and, as a result, the fortunes of many burghs had changed, a process described in the convention minutes as the 'manifest decay of sum borrowes and increase of utheres'. The cumbersome system by which the convention operated meant that, once this decision had been made, it was necessary to ask every burgh to send its commissioners to the next general convention 'sufficientlie instructid

... anent the alteratioun of the taxt rooll, forme and maner thairof'. At the next general convention, at Perth in 1635, eleven burghs were commissioned to meet at Edinburgh in the following November to recalculate the tax roll. Frustratingly, the volume of convention records in Aberdeen contains no minutes of a meeting at Edinburgh in November. A particular convention did meet in October but its records are not preserved in the Aberdeen volume either, although there are numerous references to its acts in the minutes of the general convention at Glasgow in 1636. The council minutes of Edinburgh did describe the October convention as a committee of burghs for revising the burghs' stent roll but made no subsequent reference to it. While the minutes of the general convention of 1636 contain references to the tax roll (when sums of money were to be apportioned among the burghs) they make no mention of its recent revision. However, the council minutes of Burntisland record the return of its commissioner from the meeting at Edinburgh in October. He reported that the tax roll had been altered but that Burntisland 'was not alterit in the taxt roll bot was continuit in the auld estait as it payit of befor'. It is unclear how long the revised roll of 1635 endured, but it seems to have been revised at least twice before 1649. The records of the general convention of 1647 reveal that the previous general convention, in 1646, had adopted an altered tax roll, while the missive for 1643 suggests that another alteration may have been made in that year, the general convention of 1642 having initiated the process. It would be surprising, given the economic upheavals of the period, had there not been continual pressure for revision of the roll, and 1643 is a likely candidate since complaints arising in 1647 from the alteration of the roll in 1646 were met with the response that the roll had to stand for three years, hence the next alteration occurred in 1649. Given the extent to which tax rolls have been used as a proxy for the fortunes of the burghs relative to each other, it is a matter of some frustration that none of the rolls compiled between 1612 and 1649 survives. Yet it might still be possible, through extensive research in surviving burgh council minutes and accounts, to reconstruct at least some of those lost tax rolls and thus elucidate the relative economic fortunes of Scotland's towns between 1612 and 1649. Much more might then be understood about the effects of the economic upswing of the 1620s and the turmoil and disruption brought about by the Covenanting revolution and wars of the 1640s. It might even prove possible to pin down the timing of the rise of Glasgow more precisely.

Constant councils

Another issue which may well have been a significant new source of contention between the burghs and the crown in the later 1630s, was 'constant councils'. This was a system by which councillors would not be elected annually but new councillors would be chosen only on the death or incapacity of an existing member, as was the case in some other parts of Europe, notably Castile. After an act of parliament of 1469 that lamented the 'gret truble and contensione yeirly for the chesing of the samyne throw multitud and clamor of commonis sympl personis', burgh councils had ceased to be elected by all burgesses. Instead a rotational system was introduced, whereby a proportion of councillors demitted office each year and their replacements were chosen by the old council (both those demitting and those continuing). The magistrates were then elected by a combination of the old and new councillors.

The issue of the manner of election of magistrates and councils was first raised at a particular convention at Edinburgh in October 1635. The records for that convention do not survive, so the terms of the changes discussed at that time are unknown. It is likely, however, that the behaviour of some burgh commissioners at the parliament of 1633 and the subsequent wrangle between Aberdeen and the king over their elections had a part to play in prompting these discussions and may also have been a significant factor in prompting the king to intervene. The first explicit mention of 'constant councils' came in a royal letter that took to new levels the sort of interference in elections that had been common under both Charles I and his father. Charles wrote to the council of Edinburgh in May 1636, intimating that 'we by oure experience doe find that the frequent chainge of persounes in publict effaires does breid inconstancie in governament'. Out of what was described as his zeal for the weal of the burgh, he was 'pleased to recommend unto yow a constant counsal', and to 'will you to order the same among yoursellis'. Other burghs probably received similar letters, for the records of the general convention in 1636 reveal that the issue was whether there should be 'ane constant counsell in ilk burght [or] ane yeirlie chaynge of magistratts', which was to be considered at a particular convention at Edinburgh in the following October. Again, the minutes of that meeting do not survive, for those of the general convention of 1636 are the last of those preserved in the second volume of Aberdeen's convention records. There is evidence, however, that it was to be discussed again at the general convention at Aberdeen in July 1637, for Glasgow specifically instructed its commissioner to vote in favour of constant councils. That should come as no great surprise, and cannot be taken as representative of urban opinion in general, since the archbishop of Glasgow had the right to appoint that burgh's magistrates and, as a result, Glasgow tended to be politically conservative in this period. Whatever was agreed at that convention with regard to constant councils, only days after it ended, a new prayerbook was introduced for public worship, sparking the emergence of open defiance to the government of Charles I which, in turn, led to the drawing up of the National Covenant, revolution and war. Plans for municipal reform were one of the less prominent casualties of these events.

The burghs and the Covenanting revolution
In March 1638, an extraordinary convention of burghs adopted the National Covenant and enjoined all burghs to endorse it. In spite of its tussles with the crown over the previous few years, the only burgh to make a determined stand against subscription of the Covenant was Aberdeen. The burgh thus achieved the dubious honour of being the first town to be occupied in the course of the wars which would rage across Britain and Ireland for the next twelve years, having held out against subscribing the Covenant until May 1639. In spite of the burghs' apparent enthusiasm for the Covenant, the surviving records of the convention from the 1640s are not strikingly different from those of the previous decade, as the merchants of Scotland, perhaps unsurprisingly, remained focused on trade. If the full minutes of more than one convention from the period between 1636 and 1649 were to be unearthed, a different picture might emerge, but as it is the impression is one of business as usual.

The caution with which the convention of burghs tended to proceed is epitomised in the changes that were made to the qualifications for commissioners to the convention. The missives for the general conventions of 1641 and 1643 continue to adhere to the traditional requirements that commissioners had to be men fearing God, adhering to the true religion and resident, taxpaying burgesses of the burghs that they represented, just as had been the case before the revolution.\textsuperscript{114} The missive for the general convention of 1648, the next that survives after 1643, as well as stating that commissioners must be of the true religion, added that there must be no 'suspiion in the contrair' and that commissioners must be 'subscryveris of the Covenant'.\textsuperscript{115} These additional requirements were probably introduced in 1645 or soon afterwards as a result of the royalist rebellion led by James Graham, marquis of Montrose. As well as undermining the confident unity of the Covenanting movement, Montrose had persuaded the council of at least one burgh, Glasgow, to support him.\textsuperscript{116} The stricter conditions for commissioners to the convention of burghs was part of a wider trend of excluding from public office any whose loyalty to the Covenants was in doubt. It would reach its fullest extent in the parliamentary Acts of Classes of 1646 and 1649.\textsuperscript{117}

There are, not surprisingly, signs in the records of the dislocation and disruption caused by war. One is an apparent increase in absenteeism from conventions. In 1641, more than twenty burghs were to be fined for failing to send commissioners to recent conventions or for their commissioners having departed from conventions before they were over.\textsuperscript{118} Another is what appears to have been an increase in burghs seeking help for repairs to harbours and public buildings. Although it had been a common occurrence in conventions before the 1640s, it features more prominently in this period, which perhaps indicates both the direct destructive effects of war and its indirect effects as the burden of taxation to support the army and the general economic dislocation resulting from conflict took their toll. The clearest possible indication of 'the heavie condition of all the ... burghis' as a result of the wars can be found in the forty-first act of the general convention of burghs in 1647, where it is recorded that £35,000 sterling (\£420,000 Scots) was promised 'towards the reparatioun of the burrowis losses be sea and land'.\textsuperscript{119} That parliament agreed to grant such sums to the burghs is compelling evidence that complaints about their miserable state were taken seriously. However, it seems unlikely that very much of that money was ever forthcoming, given the failure of the English to pay most of the 'brotherly assistance' of £300,000 sterling promised in the treaty of London of 1641 and the priority given by the Covenanting regime to military expenditure.\textsuperscript{120} Parliament was often willing to grant payments to impecunious individuals and burghs out of the 'first and reddiest moneyes' that the government would receive.\textsuperscript{121} However, there was rarely anything left over after the army had been paid, and there were often insufficient funds even to pay the army. The missive for 1648 shows that the convention was responding to the economic crisis by seeking to ensure that every burgh was utilising its common lands to the full. Ratification of an act of parliament against dilapidation of common lands was being sought, and five burghs were asked to demonstrate that they were putting that resource to good use.\textsuperscript{122} It was neither a creative nor an innovative way of raising funds and the relatively small sums that could be generated in this way reveal the desperate state of many burghs by the end of the 1640s.

David Wedderburn’s grammar

The de facto authority which the convention expected to exercise over its members is demonstrated in the story of the approval of what was one of Scotland’s first national school textbooks, \textit{A Short Introduction to Grammar} by Mr David Wedderburn, master of the grammar school of Aberdeen.\textsuperscript{123} Until these records were unearthed, it had been assumed that the direction came principally, if not solely, from the privy council, which licensed Wedderburn’s grammar, giving him exclusive copyright for twenty-one years.\textsuperscript{124} The privy council actively sought the approval of the convention of burghs which, in spite of the fact that the opinions of ‘the univerities and collegdis of this kingdome and uther learnt men’ had already been canvassed, was determined to take its own measures to ensure the book’s quality. The convention therefore resolved to pay for 200 copies of the book to be printed for distribution once again to the learned men of the kingdom and that, thereafter, a committee be formed under the authority of the privy council to revise the book along with Wedderburn before its final approval. The minutes of a particular convention of burghs immediately after the general convention record that the privy council had approved the convention's proposal, although intriguingly this was on 31 July while the privy council’s decision was actually dated 2 August. The proposal was duly carried out, and the general convention of burghs in 1632 noted that a new, revised impression of the grammar was to be printed. The convention agreed that it should be used exclusively by all burgh schoolmasters from Martinmas 1632 (11 November), requiring every burgh to report to the next general convention on its diligence in seeing that this was carried out. In setting the price, the convention’s act reveals that the work consisted of two different books, a basic book of ‘rudiments’ to be sold at two shillings and the ‘grammar ... containing therein the etymology, syntax, orthography and prosody’, at four shillings. The privy council did not seek to enforce Wedderburn’s grammar as the only one to be used in Scotland, approving it but allowing the use of others. However, the convention of royal burghs took a different view, insisting in July 1631 that, once it was approved, Wedderburn’s grammar ‘and no other’ should be used in the kingdom’s schools. It does not seem, however, that the book was taken up with the hoped-for enthusiasm. In 1633, 1634 and 1635, the convention repeatedly enjoined the universal use of the grammar, and required commissioners to the following year’s general convention to report their burghs’ use of it in their schools. By 1636, the convention was increasing the pressure on its members, requiring them to ‘conveyne their schoolmasters before them and to enjoin them the teaching of the said grammar under the pain of depriving them’. The convention’s minutes show that there was frequent interaction between it and the privy council, but the records of the latter mention the burghs’ involvement only once. Perhaps this indicates the low esteem in which the aristocratically-dominated council held the merchants. Taking a view more sympathetic to the burghs, however, it may be evidence that the privy council conducted considerably more business than is recorded in its official minutes. The convention was not an organ of the state, for it met without royal summons and was not part of the apparatus of central government. Its involvement in the approval and implementation of the educational policy of the crown demonstrates its capacity to co-operate with government and at least its potential for linking the centre and the localities more effectively than the state could do on its own. It is an illustration of the extent to which Scotland remained, in the first half of the seventeenth century, a highly decentralised state. It also reveals that, in contrast to the crown’s attempt to introduce another book to Scotland, the prayerbook of 1637, engaging in consultation and obtaining consent were not entirely alien to the Scottish regime of Charles I.

EDITORIAL CONVENTIONS

Editorial interventions have been kept to a minimum, but the following conventions have been adopted. Capitalisation has been regularised according to modern usage and some punctuation has been introduced to aid the reader's understanding of the text. The letters i and j, and the letters u, v and w have generally been altered to accord with modern expectations, except in some cases (words such as 'toun') where original spelling has been retained. The letters 'thorn' and 'yogh' have been transcribed as 'th' and 'y' respectively to accord with their pronunciation and to avoid confusion with 'y' and 'z' respectively. Scribal abbreviations (including the ampersand) have been silently extended. Where an unusual or apparently erroneous spelling might be taken to be a mistake by the editors ['sic'] has been inserted. Less common words are explained in footnotes where possible, as are older, less familiar or less obvious spellings of placenames. Where a placename is not that of a royal burgh, the county in which it lies is also given. Errors made by the original copyist mean that single words or short phrases were often repeated in the MS and this repetition has been removed, but noted in footnotes, as has the deliberate repetition of words inserted at the end of a page to indicate the word with which the next page commences. Straightforward editorial interpolations have been inserted in square brackets without explanation, for example when it is virtually certain that a letter or single word has been omitted in error by the copyist or where there is damage to the manuscript but it is fairly clear what would have been in the original. Longer interpolations and those which might be regarded as more speculative have the addition of explanatory material in footnotes. In some instances, it has not proved possible to identify missing text. In a number of places, the manuscripts contain a blank space where the copyist has actually omitted something, for example if he had difficulty reading unfamiliar place and personal names. Where it has not proved possible to determine what has been omitted, an ellipsis has been inserted in square brackets thus ' [... ] '. Where there are numbered folios (as in the case of the records from the National Library of Scotland and Aberdeen City Archives) or pages (as in the case of the material from Burntisland Council Minutes), folio numbers (including recto and verso) or page numbers have been inserted in square brackets within the text. The acts of conventions were normally numbered.
and referred to in subsequent conventions by these numbers. Where act numbers have been omitted by the copyist, to aid cross-referencing they have been inserted in square brackets. Marginalia (notably the short titles which were inserted to facilitate quick identification of individual acts) have been put within braces (curly brackets) at the beginning of the acts to which they relate.

All currency, unless otherwise stated in the text, is given in pounds Scots. The abbreviations for pounds, shillings and pence vary (for example, pounds are represented by 'lb', 'lib', 'libs' and 'Is'), so they are presented here as they are found in the manuscript, with the addition of a full stop. The most common foreign currencies to be mentioned in these records are those of the Low Countries (the United Provinces of the Netherlands, also known as the Dutch Republic, and Flanders, which was under Spanish rule). The currencies of these two countries were closely related to each other. As with sterling and pounds Scots, the Flemish pound was divided into 240 units called 'grooten', with twelve 'grooten' to a shilling. The Dutch guilder was one sixth of a pound, or 40 'grooten'. The guilder was also divided into twenty 'stuivers', each worth two 'grooten'. The smallest coin in circulation was the 'doit', of which there were eight to one 'stuiver' and therefore 160 to one guilder. References to French currency were also common. The French pound (livre, but also called a franc) was divided, as with the other currencies, into twenty shillings (sous), each of twelve pence (deniers).

2 This is written on what would have been the cover sheet of the minutes as they were brought back to Aberdeen by its commissioner. The verso is blank.
3 Inverness. Placenames with the ‘inver’ element were often written in this way, which led, for example, to Innerpeffray in Perthshire, and Innerleithen, in Peebleshire.
4 Inverkeithing, another example of the above.

tioun of borrowis. And this to be ane heid of the nixt missive.

5 It is clear from the text that this folio has been bound out of sequence, as it is in the same hand and completes the act which begins on fo. 392v.

6 This act is noted in the Abstract of Acts of Convention, RCRBS, iv, 529. The rest of the recto and all of the verso of fo. 402 are blank, suggesting that the record of this convention ends here. Fos. 393–4 and 399–401 contain a letter to Aberdeen burgh council from its commissioner and other related papers concerning rates of exchange and coinage. Although relevant to the last act of the preceding particular convention, they are not records of the convention of burghs, and have therefore been omitted from this volume.
Particular Convention at Edinburgh, April 1632

Act Borrowis signatour 26 Aprilis 1632

[fo. 397r]
In the particular conventioun of borrowis haldin at the burgh of Edinburgh the tuentie sext day of Apprile the yeir of God ane thousand sex hundreth threttie tua yeires be the commissioneris of borrowis thair convent, be vertew of ane missive letter direct to theme frome the said burgh of Edinburgh of the of the dait the sext of Apryle instant. The [same] day the commissioneris of borrowis beand convenit, ffor as the commissioneris of borrowis haiffing this manye yeires bygane endeavoured to have maid ane perfyte distinctioun betuixt theme and the burghis of barronye and uther unfrie plaices by whome they have bein so much prejudit and impoverished, and to have had thair liberties putt to dew executioun whairby the foirsaidis usurpers micht have bein suppressed, and especiallie haveing for this effect upone the first of December last ordaynit ane signature to be drawin up conteining ane ratificatioun of thair hail libertyes contenit in the actis of parliament and in thair generall chairtour grauntit to theme be umquhill King David of worthie memorie. Lykas the present commissioneris after mature deliberatioun had anent the said signature has for divers caussis thoght guid that the said chairtour grauntit be the said King David sail not be confirmed, bot rather so much thairof as they have thoght necessar sail be contenit in that pairt of the new signature conteining the hail priveledges of the borrowis and haiffing perused the same they have ordaynit and ordanis the said signature as the samin is conceaved to be writtin over in mundo and docked be the advocat and to be sent to Maister Johnne Hay thair commissioner to be expended be his Majestic. And for that effect ordanis ane letter to be sent thairwith to the said Mr Johnne in thair names earnestlie recommending the prosecutioun thairof to him and withall to intreat his Majestic in thair names for directing ane warrant to the lordis of counsell and exchequer for passing of the same without quesitioun since the same is so well warranted

1 This consists of a single sheet, folded to create four pages, bound so that the text runs vertically. It is the only record from this convention. It is preceded by fo. 395, which contains a list of acts of parliament in favour of the burghs from the reign of James I onwards. This list may relate to an act of the particular convention of Nov. 1631 but it has not been included as there is no indication that it is an act of the convention of burghs.

{Glasgow}
The same day the saidis commissioneres of borrowis being convenit and haveing perused and considderit the commissioun gevin be the burgh of Glasgow to thair commissioner for the present, and finding Johne Andersone ane craftis man to be convynit in commissioun with thair said commissioun, and that they had bene diverse tymes admonisched for the lyke omissioun, yitt continewed in thair oversight. Thairfoir they discharged the said burgh from doing the lyke in tyme coming and that under the pane of ane hundreth punds. And ordainis the said commissioner to intimatt this ordinance to thair burgh at thair homcoming. As lykways to be contenit in the missive that they pretend no ignorance. And in the meanetyme dischairges the said Johne Andersone of all vott and place amangs thame.

12 Literally, 'concerning faithful administration', i.e. he was promising to carry out the duties of moderator with diligence.
13 The phrase 'at the calling of the rollis to pay ane unlaw' is repeated.
14 As often as it shall happen, i.e. for each offence.
15 Although Glasgow's commissioner is John Barnes, it was common for burghs to send an 'assessor' with their commissioner, to deputise if the commissioner were indisposed. In this case, however, because that assessor was a craftsman, he is ineligible as a commissioner.
The same day ordaines the burgh of Dysart to produce thair diligence to the nixt generall conventioun of borrowes in causing William Touche, indweller in Leven, to mak his reall and actual residence within thair burgh or in depryveing him of thair libertie under the pane of twentie pundis and to depairt. This to be ane heid of the nixt missive.

The same day ordaines the burgh of Coupare to produce thair diligence to the nixt generall conventioun in causing of Thomas and William Andersones, indwelleres in Newburgh in Fyffe, to desist from usurping the liberties of the frie royall burrowes under the paine of twentie pundis and to report thair diligence heiranent to the nixt generall conventioun. And this to be ane heid of the nixt missive.

The same day ordaines the burgh of Elgin to produce thair diligence to the nixt generall conventioun of borrowes in restraining of certane inhabitants in Garmouth lyand within thair shereffdome from usurping the libertie of the frie royall borrowes, and ordains the agent to concure and assist with thame and to report thair diligence heiranent to the nixt generall conventioun of borrowes. 16 Leven lies on the Fife coast to the east of Dysart.
17 Newburgh, on the north coast of Fife, was nominally a royal burgh, having been erected in 1631 (see Pryde, The Burghs of Scotland, no. 75). Its failure to be enrolled by the convention or admitted to parliament is testament to the convention’s ability effectively to block the erection of royal burghs by the crown.

50 There is a blank space sufficient for the name of the river. The supplication probably came from the presbytery because the Mearns (Kincardineshire) contained no royal burghs. Inverbervie, although a medieval creation, was not enrolled until 1670, so could not seek financial aid from the convention (see Pryde, The Burghs of Scotland, no. 44). While this could be a bridge over any of a number of rivers, the most likely are the Bervie Water at Inverbervie, the Carton Water or the Cowie Water, both at Stonehaven.

appears to be no fo. 435.

\textsuperscript{15} Literally, 'concerning faithful administration', i.e. he was promising to carry out the duties of moderator with diligence.

\textsuperscript{16} This word is preceded by 'thes'. The copyist presumably started to write 'these', realised his mistake but did not cross it out.

\textsuperscript{17} The phrase 'in the mater' is repeated.

\textsuperscript{18} This is preceded by 'said dyet the', presumably because of the omission of the word 'new' the first time the phrase was written.
how expedient it is that sum conclusioun be maid thairanent before his Majestic pas in to England. Dumbartane      Johne Sempill
Bamffe          Andro Bairde
Aire            James Blaire

[1]
The quhilk day the said commissioneres being con[venit ... con]siddered the particulates remited unto them be the last preceeding conventioun, and finding no opportunitie for speakeing with his Majestie thairanent, thairfoir they ordane Johne Sinclare, Mr James Cockburne, Maister Alexander Guthrie or any two of thame with suche utheres of the borrowes as they can finde for the tyme to attend his Majestie at his cuming backe to this toun the tend of this instant, and to acquaint his Majestie with the said particulares remitted unto this present conventioun and to obten his Majesties answer thairanent giff possibillie they can befoir his passing into England, and to report thair diligence thairanent to the nixt generall conventioun of borrowes that sum farder course may be takin thairanent.

1 This is a copying error, as the first line ends with 'con' which must have been the beginning of 'convenit'. Presumably because the second or a subsequent line also ended with 'con' and another began with 'siddered', the copyist's eye jumped from the end of the first line to the beginning of that one, and thus one or more whole lines were omitted. It is likely that the missing text was something like 'venit anent the third act of the last particular convention at Edinburgh on the 29th of June and having con'.

Irving with[en] the tolbuith of Edinburgh and taking to thair serious consideratioun the humble supplication of the said Johne Irving and that he had givin satisfactioun [p. 76] to the partie offendit by craving him pardoun for his offence and contenting for his chairges, lykas in the presence of the haill conventioun he did againe desire pardoun frome the partie offendit and each of them taking utheris by the hand promising heirefter evir to keip hearty friendshipe and leive ane with uther as brethren, and that the said Johne Irving did also desire pardoun of the offence done be him to the haill burrowis as being ane scandalous and evill exemple of abusing magistracie.
Theirfor the present commissioneris remittis and dischairges the said Johne Irving of any penaltie or uther censure quhatsumevir quhairunto he was \textsuperscript{40} There is a mark in the MS which looks like a hyphen between these two words but, since Inverness had only one bridge across the river Ness, it seems most likely that the mark was intended to act as a comma.

\textsuperscript{41} Probably a mistranscription of Haddington. The word is hard to discern partly because of the downstroke of an 'h' from the line above interfering with what seems to be an initial
'H' followed by what looks like the letter 'a' twice, although there is a dot above the second
'a'. The word is split between two lines, the last four letters being 'toun'. Haddington ('Hadingtoun') seems most likely, given its proximity to the other two in this list, while the three are also the head burghs of the three divisions of Lothian (Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian; the shire of Edinburgh Principal, or Midlothian; and the constabulary of Haddington, or East Lothian, each of which elected its own commissioners to parliament).

50 James Douglas, 2nd earl of Queensberry, was not yet in favour with the Covenanting regime at this point. He had joined the royalist uprising under James Graham, 1st Marquis of Montrose in 1645 (which perhaps explains his apparent militarily rank) and was imprisoned, being released only in March 1647, having paid a hefty fine (RPS, 1646/11/391). He was leading a Covenanting regiment in the summer of 1645 as a 'colonel' (RPS, 1645/7/24/79) but may have been made a general by Montrose.

merchandis in tyme according to the said right and prescript, to which they ought to be tyed under ane certane penaltie and not to be suffered everie ane to writ of the esteate of the mercat at Randomes and oftintymes much above the reat for drawing imployment to themselfis to the grit prejudice of merchandis who afterwards findis the fruit thairof.

11. That all skipperis cumming to the staple port with staple wairis be injoyned and obleidged to have ane formall chartor parttie for the pryce of their conditioned fraucht subscrivit be ane competent number of his merchandis frauchteris to the end that all questiones arraysing ordinarlie upon the different writting of merchandis to thair factoris may be avoyded.

12. That the skipper immediatlie upon thair arrayvell at the staple port delyver thair coquetts to the conservator or his clerk to the end that the entres in the custome hous thair of all staple wairis may be maid be the conservator clerk and if na uther persone or persones be suffered to writt the same that so all disordor and inconvenientis arraysing thairffa may be prevented and eschewed.

13. That the merchandis assignementis upon the factoris and the factoris notitis and promeis for accompt of thair merchandis may be absolut payment to the merchandis and indwelleris in the Law Cuntries and especialie at the staple port and uther townes within the Ylle Walker, and that all factoris and merchandis be inhibited to bargaine with any in the said ylland that will not consent to the premissis.

14. That the conservator grant na warrandis of arrreistment upon any persones guidis or moneyes unles the pairtie arreister find sufficient cautione to persee his actione in tyme convenient befor the conservator court, and incaine of failyie or that efter the proces be intended, heard or discussed he be fund in the wrong to pay all cost, skaith, dampnage, interest, costis and expenssis of the said innocent defender.

15. That some course be takin for preventing straingeris shippis to incroach upon ony sea tread especialie these of the Low Cuntries who inregairde of thair pace with Spaine will ingross all to themselffis with thair grit floytis and saill our schippis clein out of the watteris, and thairfoir it is necessar to raise sum new dewties and impositionis upon all Duchis and utheris straingeris schippis cumming into or going fra any port of this kingdome with any coallis to pay so much besydis everie chalder.

16. That na factor nor priviledgit persone or persones residenteris at the staple port salbe cited personallie to compeir befoir the burrowes at the instance of any merchant or indweller in Scotland unles the pairtie compleiner first hath fund and put in sufficient cautione and surtie for all lawfull chairges expenssis and dampnages of the pairtie cited at the discretion of modificacione of the burrowes incaice he be fund innocent and absolved.

17. To consider of the many inconvenientis and prejudices which must of necessitie follow upon the lait act of burrowes quhairby it is ordained and declared that the factoris and utheris of the natione in all caussis and materis quhatsumever betuixt them and any subject of the kingdome salbe lyable and obleidged to compeir and answer upon any complaint befoir the burrowis whom they ar to acknowledge thair onlie judges and not to decline from them.

18. To tak unto serious consideratione the grit discredite which redoundis to our natione in generall and how prejudiciall it is to all merchandis and especialie to young begineris trafueris in the Low Cuntries that efter the deceise of such persones in this kingdome as ar knawen responsablie, yit thair airis and executoris think na schame to defraud the creditoris in the Netherlandis and force them to ane compositione and quytting of ane pairt of the sowme befoir they will enter in any termes of any aggriement for payment with them, which grit abuse and hurtfull cheating must be in tyme luiked to crosched.

19. To reasone upon the motione of the magistratis of Camheir concerning coallis and uther commodities of this kingdome to be declared staple wairis and to consider of the reasons pro et contra mentioned in my missive letters writtin to the burrowes thairanent in December 1645 and whither or not I sail chirrisch the said motione of the magistratis at Camheir.

20. To tak notice that thair was thrie yeiris since ane cord of skins landit at Camheir without any letter or commissione to any factor, quhairfoir I ordaind Robert Greirson to resseave and sell the same and be comptable thairfoir untill such tyme as the rycht awner should appear, and I did giff advertesiment to the lordis commissioneris of burrowes in Julii 1645 becaus yit thair is none cum to lay clame to the said cord of skynis or frie money thairof which amountis to thriescoir pundis Flymes, whairfoir I desyre the wholl commissioneris of the wholl burghtis respective to inquyre for the right proprietare of the same and examine him about the mark, number, tyme of schipping and in quhat ship and at quhat port they war leadit, and upon certificatone thairof I sail caus the frie money to be payit or anwerit to him or to any having his ordor and sufficient prooffis to the effect foirsaid.

21. To dispose upon the halff of fourtie fyve lib. fyfteine schillinges Fleimis money for the burrowes use seased upon by me in March last and deteined under confiscatione for a pairt of the pryce of certane staple guidis sent to Roterdame and sold be ane merchant in Edinburght thair.

Which haill articles abovewrittin ar remitted to be considerit upon be the generall conventione, and the clerk to report his diligence heiranent to the nixt generall conventione. And this to be ane heid of the nixt missive.

1 ACA, Press 18, Bundle 88. This is written on a single piece of paper, folded once to make four pages. Some of the text is very faded and difficult to read, and some has been lost completely as a result of damage to the edges of the paper. There are marginal numbers and some annotations in a darker ink. Although the numbers are sequential, not every item is numbered, so the numbers probably refer to items in the written instructions given to the burgh's commissioner to take with him, a common practice for conventions of both burghs and parliaments. This bundle also contains examples of some of these letters and there are others published in L.B. Taylor (ed.), Aberdeen Council Letters, 6 vols. (Aberdeen, 1942–61): see, for example, vol. i, 160–64, from 1618. Although of considerable interest, none is reproduced here because they are not records of the convention of royal burghs but of the burgh of Aberdeen.

2 Although this is too faded to read, the general convention of burghs of 1640 met at Irvine (see, for example, Burntisland Council Minutes, NAS, B9/12/7, fo. 99r; Glasgow Council Minutes, GCA, C1/1/10, 26 June 1640).
