INTRODUCTION

EVEN in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, when chapter election had still its recognised place in the appointment of prelates, the interest of the Scottish Crown is clearly discerned, especially in connection with the central and important sees of St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Dunkeld. It was not to be expected that the king would be an idle spectator of promotions, or refrain from the attempt to elevate churchmen who were wise in counsel or prudent in administration. This natural tendency to interference was still further strengthened in opposition to the Papacy. The temporalities could not be left in the gift of an extraneous power; and from the purely financial point of view it was desirable that they should be in the royal hands during the vacancy of a see. Failing to establish its claim to dispose of the temporal possessions, the Papacy next sought, by a system of reservations, to retain the decisive voice in the appointment of the men. The conflict of the protagonists was necessarily fatal to the elective principle. It is true that even in the days of James v. we find chapters going through the old ceremony; but it was either a mere form or an attempt in times of faction to support a candidate whose fortunes would in reality be decided elsewhere and by other means. The Schism had fatally weakened the prestige of one combatant; and when James i. began to govern Scotland the growth of national unity began to exercise a powerful influence upon ecclesiastical affairs. The Popes were inevitably bent upon recovering lost ground, and watched eagerly for intervals of weakness or uncertainty: on the other hand the Crown, impressed by the importance of a strong administration, and alive to the material power of churchmen, was alarmed by the effects which might proceed from a traffic in benefices at Rome. An important factor, too, was the long-standing financial interest of the king in the temporalities during vacancy, and the right of nomination, if it could be successfully asserted, would doubtless add to the profits.

There are three interesting and significant stages in the history of the controversy. The accession of Innocent VIII. in 1484 was almost coincident with important vacancies in Scotland, and James III. feared lest Blackader, Elphinstone, and John Hepburn should not receive the promotion they deserved as 'thankful persons.' The Pope was to be asked to delay for six months before disposing of 'prelacies or dignities elective' in order to hear the royal will, since 'all the prelates of his realm has the first vote in his parliament and of his secret council.'¹ Though the embassy was delayed, the request ultimately elicited a bull of privilege on April 20, 1487. Innocent stated that his predecessors had been accustomed, in providing for cathedral churches and for monasteries above the annual value of two hundred florins auri de camera, to proceed upon the voting of the cardinals, and sometimes, out of regard for sovereigns or temporal lords, to delay decision until the conservators of their interests were able to present petitions in favour of one or other of the candidates. This privilege he was now prepared to extend to the Scottish king, and he would therefore grant in each case a period of eight months, during which representations might be made.² The language of the bull was guarded ; but in reality the indult almost amounted to a concordat by which the Crown was to nominate and the Pope to provide. The financial advantage of the Crown is at once apparent. The temporalities were in the hands of the king until the bulls of provision were produced, and when a nominee was admitted to possession by anticipation, as was often convenient, a composition had to be paid. It is also noticeable that the Parliament of 1481 had affirmed most clearly the right of the Crown to the advowson of benefices sede vacante until the bulls were exhibited.

² In spite of the importance of this bull, and the frequent references to it, the original seems to have disappeared: the text printed in the Archbishops of St. Andrews, i. 157, is taken from a transcript in the Liber Pluscardensis (Bodleian Lib. : Fairfax MSS.).

Alexander VI. and Julius II., though they deferred to the wishes of James IV. with a disastrous facility, do not appear to have expressly renewed the indult; and when, for example, James Betoun was provided to Galloway and Glasgow in rapid succession, it was held at the Roman court that the king had strictly no right to be heard, though the appointments were undoubtedly made in compliance with his representations.¹ After Flodden the indiscreet policy of dictation which Leo X. saw fit to adopt seriously strained the allegiance of Scotland to the Papacy. The Regent Albany, in view of the concordat secured by the French king in 1516, was fully alive to the importance of prosecuting the Scottish cause with vigour. Not till 1520, after prolonged controversy, was obedience made to Leo, who had confirmed the indult of Innocent VIII. in 1518-19,² and had thereafter extended its terms so as to cover, apparently, every kind of transaction which threatened the right of nomination.³

A third stage was reached in 1534-35. James V. desired to procure funds for his College of Justice, and had in 1531 proposed to Clement VII. an ecclesiastical taxation which was clearly exorbitant for the avowed purpose. This permanent addition to the revenues of the Crown was in fact to be devoted to objects which were vaguely described as the administration and protection of the realm. The majority of the prelates, led by Archbishop James Betoun, resisted the ambitious scheme, regarding which, at the outset, they had never been formally consulted by the king. In the end it was Paul III. who confirmed the foundation of the College and granted the sum necessary for endowment, no more than a fraction of what had originally been asked: at the same time he sought to aid the royal exchequer by an indult which permitted James to enjoy the temporalities for a whole year after vacancy.¹

The conduct of James v. in bargaining with Clement VII. for a handsome share of ecclesiastical revenues was justly regarded by the prelates as an infringement of the liberty of the Scottish Church; but their resistance, though partially successful, did not arrest the tendency which has just been traced. The Papacy, as European affairs stood, could not afford to alienate the Crown; and the churchmen, however much they resented exaction, speedily found it necessary to gratify the king by voluntary contribution. James took full advantage of a situation which enabled him to rely upon the indispensable support of the clergy, and, in view of events which were taking shape in England, to derive substantial sums in actual defence, as it was put, of ecclesiastical liberty.

The control which in course of time had been vindicated over promotions did not improve the morale of the clergy. The growth of national unity inevitably engendered controversy with Rome; but for the abuses which weakened the ancient Church the Crown bears its own share of responsibility. Ambitious prelates learned to look to the state as the chief field of their activities, and it became their object to acquire a wealth which the kings were frequently too ready to bestow upon useful servants. It is doubtless true that the necessary expenses of political and diplomatic life, even apart from motives of ostentation, were hard to meet from revenues which could easily have maintained the mere churchman in a becoming dignity, and it is also true that the device of commendation was adopted rather than invented by the central authority at home; but the reckless, and sometimes scandalous manipulation of benefices, which developed along with the royal control, left an indelible mark upon the ecclesiastical affairs of the country.

John Major, writing in the first quarter of the sixteenth century, says of James Kennedy that 'besides St. Andrews he held no benefice—unless it were that of Pittenweem, which amounted to no more than eighty pieces of gold,' and, with a thinly veiled sarcasm, finds himself unable to praise the conduct of the prelate in that 'along with such a bishopric he should have held a benefice in commendam, even though it was a slender one.'¹ Buchanan, while he condemns the degeneracy of successors, seeks to clear Kennedy from any charge of personal greed. 'Summa domi frugalitas et continentia: foris splendor et magnificentia.' No bishop of St. Andrews ever spent so liberally in the public interest, though his revenues were not great in comparison with the wealth of some who came after him. The fashion had not yet reached Scotland of accumulating benefices, and aggravating the evils of avaricious gain by profuse luxury.²

Patrick Graham succeeded Kennedy; and his career, so strangely misunderstood by Buchanan, illustrates from the outset the very acquisitive tendencies which the historian censures. Whatever were the personal motives of that ambitious ecclesiastic, he proved that the corrupt influence of the court upon the Scottish Church was not met by efforts at Rome to preserve purity of administration. The papal gift of the Priory of Pittenweem and the Abbey of Paisley in commendam,¹ even though it was granted to one who came to pose as a reformer, was a mistake in policy as well as an abuse. It was of evil omen for the future: for the present it aroused jealousy and suspicion. Patrick Graham was not James Kennedy; and if he was fortunate enough to succeed to St. Andrews, he could not expect to inherit the prestige of his predecessor, or to have additional wealth and influence thrust upon him by the powers at home when an experienced politician like Thomas Spens occupied the see of Aberdeen. His ambition forced him to become the tool of papal policy. The youth of James III. was the opportunity for the court of Rome to recover ground which had been lost since James I. began to rule, and it is evident that the new Bishop of St. Andrews owed his good fortune in the matter of Pittenweem and Paisley very largely to the hope that he would aid in vindicating papal claims against the national feeling which threatened them.² The elevation of the see to archiepiscopal rank, carried out without a mandate from Scotland, marked a stage in the development of that unity which it was the desire of the Crown to foster. At the time, however, it was naturally regarded as the climax of Graham's offence. It was also a notable incident in the controversy with Rome, lending a certain colour of truth to Buchanan's statement that the archbishop was the opponent and the victim of a corrupt court. Not many years passed before the precedent established by the Papacy in its politic liberality towards Graham appeared in a new and a significant light.

The promotion of William Schevez was an early and very characteristic act of the king's personal government.

¹ Archbishops of St. Andrews, i. 29.

² Ibid., i. 31, 74-6.

Learned in mathematics and astrology, the archbishop collected a comprehensive library, while neither his tastes nor his family connections tempted him to enter more than was necessary into the field of politics. It fell to his lot, however, to represent before Innocent VIII. the views of James upon the vexed question of appointments to prelacies. Buchanan and Lesley regard the reign of this king as the period when the debasing influence of the court began to work disaster in the Church; but it is clear that though the Crown now put forward explicitly the claim to nominate prelates there was a prevalent objection to the practice of annexations, pensions, and commendations.¹ Schevez had his financial troubles; yet there was no resort to a petition for an abbey in commendam. Blackader and Elphinstone were the strong men, and the death of James III. deprived the Archbishop of St. Andrews of the slight political power which he possessed.

When Schevez died, Blackader, who was now Archbishop of Glasgow, might reasonably have expected to succeed on the strength of experience and service. James IV., however, was constantly in need of money, and his scandalous dealings with the see of St. Andrews were suffered by the complaisance of the Roman court. James Stewart, Duke of Ross, and the king's younger brother, became administrator. Holyrood was added in commendam, and in 1500 George Crichtoun was translated from Dunfermline in order to effect an exchange for the advantage of the prince.² In 1503 he came also into possession of Arbroath.³ The significance of these transactions is increased by a consideration of the revenues involved. Bagimond's assessment, which was now jealously conserved in the interests of national and individual economy, rated Arbroath at £4000, the See of St. Andrews, the Priory, and Dunfermline Abbey each at £3333, 6s. 8d. : Holyrood, Paisley, and Kelso (with Lesmahagow) were placed at £2666, 13s. 4d. ; and Melrose was not greatly inferior. The archbishopric of Glasgow and the bishopric of Dunkeld came next in order, and were estimated at half the value of Arbroath. It was thus the fortune of the Duke of Ross to enjoy the three richest benefices in Scotland, if the Priory of St. Andrews be excepted. Blackader had to content himself with Jedburgh, and Elphinstone with the comforts of a good conscience.

The elevation of Alexander Stewart to the administration of St. Andrews was a more flagrant scandal in respect of the age and the origin of the boy ; but policy intervened to prevent an accumulation of benefices such as was enjoyed by the late Duke of Ross. James Betoun, already 'cairfull for the world,' was a servant whom it was necessary to reward ; and it was not till the death of Blackader left a vacancy for Betoun at Glasgow that Dunfermline was available for the king's son. In the case of Arbroath the Earl of Bothwell was strong enough to secure the advancement of a Hepburn. The treatment of the see of St. Andrews by James IV. was a reproach to the royal government as well as an abasement of the Church, and the secularising influence had time, even before Flodden, to create unfortunate precedents. When the chief ecclesiastical position in the land was closed to qualified churchmen, it was necessary to find compensation for those among them who were as indispensable as they were ambitious. The astute diplomacy of Andrew Forman was now more valuable to the king than the prudent finance of James Betoun, and the Bishop of Moray, when he was provided to the Archbishopric of Bourges in France, retained his Scottish see with Pittenweem and Dryburgh and the prospect of Kelso, the last at present in the hands of the Bishop of Caithness.¹ The expansion of Scotland made heavy demands upon those churchmen who chose or were compelled to plunge into politics, and it seems to have been accepted as a matter of course that no one who was able to occupy either archiepiscopal see should be expected to go without at least one of the richer monasteries. Even Andrew Forman, who incurred his full share of odium for the Flodden campaign, and who had infringed on a heroic scale the Acts of Parliament against unauthorised 'impetration' at Rome, was suffered on admission to St. Andrews to retain Dunfermline out of the wreck of his acquisitions.²

In the meantime Arbroath was required for James Stewart, Earl of Moray, who had studied under Erasmus along with his elder brother Alexander. This transaction was negotiated from France under the guidance of Albany, and Forman was able to stipulate for a pension of £1000 out of the monastery. It was fortunate for the Archbishop of St. Andrews that he had the see of Bourges to bargain with, and that Leo x. was anxious to provide for Cardinal Cibo, or he might have emerged from the conflict with little to show. The compromise by which he gained admission to the archbishopric was arranged by Albany, who knew that Forman was doubly unpopular owing to his share in the policy which ended at Flodden, and as the instrument of papal interference, and who speedily realised that it would be a political blunder, as Scotland then stood, to endow so supple an ecclesiastic with superfluous wealth. It is significant of Forman's speculative character, as well as of the state of the Church, that the lands of a friend were sold for ready money to satisfy the Roman Camera in connection with the bulls of St. Andrews, and that the chapter seal of Dunfermline was appended to a bond for 5000 ducats, payable in the event of elevation to the cardinalate.¹

James Betoun was the man in whom Albany placed confidence as leader of the French party. An official before Flodden, the Archbishop of Glasgow was summoned after it to be a statesman. In 1516 he obtained admission to the temporality of Kilwinning at the expense of Forman and his friends :² next year the Earl of Moray resigned Arbroath, not to Forman, though he had the right of regress, but to Betoun; and Albany, who directed the transaction, procured the transference to Moray of the pension which the Archbishop of St. Andrews had enjoyed. There was one feature, however, in Betoun's policy which must have irritated Albany. The latter looked upon Scotland as a source of personal profit and as the convenient instrument of France: the former was determined to avail himself of French support, but he would not risk another military disaster. It was not surprising, therefore, that the Regent, while he could not hesitate to promote Betoun to the Archbishopric of St. Andrews on Forman's death, should at least welcome delays which left the profits of the temporality in the hands of the Crown. It was common talk that Albany made large gains out of the benefices which it was his good fortune to allocate; but if Betoun had to pay, he had the means of recouping himself. With St. Andrews he acquired Dunfermline, which he had held at an earlier stage of his career: Arbroath was retained; and Kilwinning was not given up till it became absolutely necessary to placate the house of Hamilton.

The career of the Archbishop during the decade after Flodden exposed him to the charge of malversation. Yet his patriotism is beyond question. Andrew Forman had sought personal advantage out of national misfortunes for which he was partly responsible: the circumstances of the time almost compelled Betoun to concentrate in his hands such sources of wealth as were available. He spent freely in defence of his country, and he was generous to his relatives, though his generosity savoured of dynastic ambition rather than of ecclesiastical zeal. One nephew, Andrew Durie, was put in possession of Melrose, vacant by the death of the archbishop's brother Robert: a second, George, was secured in the succession to Dunfermline: a third, George Betoun, would have held Kilwinning but for political exigencies which demanded the sacrifice; and a fourth, David, was made Abbot of Arbroath in 1524, with a substantial share in the fruits of the benefice.

The early career of David Betoun owed much to the support and patronage of his uncle. The Archbishop of St. Andrews, though he probably foresaw the danger, was none the less mortified to find himself, after many years of great influence, pushed aside as the king began to assume the reins of government. The younger man, however, had his position to win; and, with a diplomatic address which recalls Andrew Forman, he succeeded in ingratiating himself with James v. while he acquired reputation abroad. He had, indeed, to wait some considerable time in hope of his reward, and to be content with half the fruits of Arbroath; but in 1537 he was secured as coadjutor and successor of St. Andrews, and acquired the profits of the see of Mirepoix at the intercession of Francis I.: little more than a year passed before he was Cardinal; and the death of his uncle in 1538-39 left him in complete possession of more ample resources than had ever been permanently united under the control of a Scottish prelate.

There is an incidental reference in our accounts to the churches belonging to Arbroath which had been assigned to the late archbishop.¹ The entry recalls a controversy between uncle and nephew which had been going on intermittently for many years. When James Betoun resigned the abbey in favour of David in 1524 he stipulated for the reservation of a pension amounting to half the fruits, and the benefice was already burdened with a first charge of £1000 Scots payable to the Earl of Moray. On March 20, 1524-25, a few months after the bulls were received, David Betoun and George Ramsay of Clatty, his cautioner, appeared in the court of the Official at St. Andrews and were ordered to pay the archbishop 2000 merks Scots in the following August and September as the portion due for the crop of 1524 and the terms of Martinmas 1524 and Whitsunday 1525.¹ Next spring negotiations began for the redemption of the Earl of Moray's pension. On March 5, 1525-26, the archbishop and David Betoun handed in an appointment for registration in the Books of Council. The latter bound himself to redeem the pension, and the former in consideration thereof agreed to accept for three years from August 1, 1525, the revenues of certain churches, amounting to £1208 Scots. After the expiry of the period he would uplift half the fruits, according to the original arrangement. A day or two later Moray promised to accept a sum of £3000 Scots, payable in instalments, to extinguish £960 of the total pension, the remaining £40 being transferred to Master David Haliburton till Betoun should procure him a benefice of at least equal value. As we shall have to notice again, David Betoun was compelled to raise 'sums of money and profit beforehand,'² and we find him in 1535 still concerned with the burden. In 1532 the partition between uncle and nephew was under consideration before the Lords of Session, David Betoun seeking a reduction of the letters by which the archbishop was to receive half the fruits. This was just the time when

² Black Register of Arbroath, Aug. 28, 1526.

James Betoun's attitude towards the taxation granted by Clement VII. brought him into difficulties with the king, and when David had made himself an indispensable diplomatic agent abroad. Relations between the two were not very harmonious, and it is quite conceivable that the archbishop disapproved of his nephew's manner of life: at all events it appears that David carried his point and never paid to his uncle more than the £1208 already mentioned.

The desire to handle the wealth of the Church was apparent in the conduct of James IV.; but his methods were somewhat crude, and apt to create disaffection among those churchmen whose prospects of promotion were limited by the favours granted to the Duke of Ross and Alexander Stewart. The policy of James V. was much more subtle, though he overstepped the bounds of discretion in the financial negotiations with Rome over the College of Justice. The years of Albany's regency had brought into prominence a national feeling which resented certain features of the papal interference. Speaking of Henry VIII. in 1539, Cardinal Aleander said that Scotland, twenty-five years ago, had begun to think in the same way, and that he himself had written many letters in name of Louis XII. urging respect for the Holy See. Though the Scots did not intend at that time to abandon the Catholic faith, they wished to manage their own ecclesiastical and civil affairs.¹ James saw clearly that under the conditions which prevailed the Papacy would not venture to alienate him, if it could be avoided, and that the Roman court had financial interests as well as spiritual which might be turned to account. The control which the Crown had already established over the Scottish prelates and the diplomatic necessities of Clement VII., which prevented him from refusing the great ecclesiastical

Ecclesiastical contributions to the state were based upon Bagimond's assessment, as is clearly proved by a collection of taxations in the hand of John Lauder,¹ the writer of the present accounts, and by the figures which these accounts give. To raise £5000, St. Andrews paid about £172 and Arbroath about £206 ;² so that, though the precise method of arriving at the figures does not appear, it is evident that a tax of £10,000 required slightly more than a tithe of the sums at which these benefices were rated.³ The prelates did not contemplate a permanent exaction of this kind with any enthusiasm, and they compounded with the Crown by promising to pay for a limited number of years, while they took steps to represent their case at Rome. A Provincial Council in 1535-36 settled the manner of contribution for the College of Justice,⁴ and soothed the wounded pride of the churchmen, but did not satisfy the king. In 1540-41 he renewed his demands from the spiritual estate and again sought a papal confirmation. The prelates, as before, resisted the design by diplomatic opposition at Rome ;⁵ but they promised a gratuitous offering of £5000.⁶ The voluntary character of the gift, however, was more apparent than real, since the danger to which the faith and the Church were now exposed compelled them to stake their fortunes in an effort to direct the policy of the Crown. Cardinal Betoun was placed in the delicate position of urging the royal wishes upon Paul III.,⁷ and he no doubt contrived to inform him that a confirmation should not be given till James definitely committed himself to hostilities with England. Pope's letter granting a very heavy ecclesiastical taxation did not reach Scotland in time to find the king alive.¹

The lesson of suppression and confiscation which Henry VIII. sought to inculcate did not recommend itself to James V. If he needed money he also required the support of the prelates in dealing with his nobles. It was therefore his object to keep the former in wholesome dread, and to extract such financial aid as their apprehensions or the diplomatic aims of the Papacy might compel them to furnish. These circumstances alone were bound to have an effect upon the treatment of ecclesiastical property; but there were others also which complicated the situation still further.

The sums which were expended at Rome had long been a subject of discussion in Parliament, and a matter for individual regret. The expedition of bulls frequently plunged the ambitious in debt; privileges were granted, maintained, or contested at heavy cost: the fashion of resignation in favorem, which became prevalent in the sixteenth century and accompanied the abuse of nepotism, often involved prolonged litigation; there was, too, the money which passed more secretly from hand to hand. Dilapidation was tempting; but it did not suit the ends of the Crown or of the Papacy. As a consequence, there was every inducement to adopt, where it was possible, a system of administering the Church lands which would provide the requisite funds without apparent damage to ecclesiastical property. The inducements were strengthened by the growing demands of the Crown and the natural disinclination of churchmen to make unnecessary sacrifices out of their annual income.

In 1457 the Parliament advised, anent feufarm, that the king should 'begyne and gif exempill to the laif,' among whom the prelates were included. Erskine remarks that this tenure 'had been in a manner forgotten';¹ but it would probably appear upon investigation that the churchmen had been long acquainted with its value. However that may be, it was a significant step that the Crown should now undertake to confirm feufarms of ecclesiastical lands. We are not, however, in a position to determine how far the process went in this period or what was the attitude of Rome towards a transaction which was alienation in the eye of the Canon Law and could not be permitted unless it was in evidentem utilitatem. The silence of the Great Seal Register up to about the close of the century proves only that resort was not had to the king as the proper authority in confirmation. The language of an Act passed in the Parliament of 1503 sets the matter in a clearer light, and indicates that the encouragement of feufarm grants was now conceived as of national importance. In the narrative of a charter attributed to Archbishop Forman (1515-21), reflecting the attitude adopted in the days of James IV., we find some interesting statements. Parliaments had ordained that the lands of the king and others, prelates as well as temporal lords, should be set in feufarm without diminution of rental or commodity; and to these Acts the prelates, as Scotsmen, were bound to conform. It was expected that the national economy would benefit considerably from such a policy, and in particular it was held that security of tenure would encourage holders to improve their possessions, so that increasing wealth would mean an advance in warlike resources and a stouter defence of king and kingdom against the old enemies or other invaders. The development was not in conflict with the Canons, which permitted emphyteusis under proper safeguards, and it was eminently conducive to the welfare of the realm.² John Major, again, writes that 'if the landlords would let their lands in perpetuity, they might have double and treble the profit which now comes to them—and for this reason: the country folk would then cultivate their land beyond all comparison better, would grow richer, and would build fair dwellings that should be an ornament to the country.’¹

The Register of the Great Seal shows that the tax granted by Clement VII. in 1531 led many of the prelates to feu church lands, and that resort was now had to the Crown for confirmation, with express reference to the action of the Pope. It is also clear from various charters that the approval of the papal authority was regarded as necessary for the complete validity of the grant. A new and exceptional situation had in fact arisen. The temptation to obtain ready money by the manipulation of Church property was to the Scottish ecclesiastic a familiar one. From the Black Register of Arbroath, under the year 1483, we see how sums might be raised for the charges of promotion by the grant of long leases; and in later times David Betoun himself, as abbot, received heavy grassums from tenants in order to redeem the Earl of Moray’s pension. The necessity of making out a good case at Rome for alienation and of obtaining confirmation by papal commission must have contributed to check a natural tendency; and while the national advantage to be gained was clearly discerned in the days of James IV., or even later, the papal authority had no pressing need to forsake an attitude of wise conservatism. The trouble and expense, too, which the grantee would incur in seeking ratification would not be inconsiderable. This is reflected in a charter given by Lindores in 1537-38, where confirmation was to be obtained in Romana curia vel extra, ubi facilius haberi posset.² Again, in a charter of Arbroath, confirmed like that of Lindores by the king, three years were named as the period during which papal authority was to be secured, and that salvis justis impedimentis.¹

The action of Clement VII. necessitated the raising of large sums and made it difficult to forbid the methods which urgent need suggested; but the tax was after all not permanent. Both from the point of view of national economy and from that of his own resources James V. was dissatisfied. In May 1536 he tells Henry VIII. that he is in negotiation with Rome 'especially anent the ordering of great and many possessions and temporal lands given to the Kirk by our noble predecessors.'² Subsequent policy throws a clearer light upon his meaning. It has already been noted that he pressed the Pope for a new tax, which, if confirmed, would authorise the same expedients as before on the part of the churchmen. At the same time he sought to procure facilities which would not be intermittent and which would enable him to obtain contributions without friction. In 1540 Alexander Myln was administering Holyrood and the Priory of St. Andrews for Robert and James Stewart, children of about seven years, and he would not venture to alienate lands or even grant long tacks. James, whose purse was here directly concerned, wrote to the Pope for the requisite faculty on behalf of Myln, and it was apparently granted.³ There can be little doubt that the insistence with which James urged Paul III. to grant powers a latere to Cardinal Betoun was very largely due to the motives under consideration. Such powers would remove the necessity of sending to Rome for authority to feu church lands,⁴ and it is perhaps equally significant that Betoun did not obtain them while James was alive.

After his death the financial difficulties of the churchmen were rather increased than removed. There was a convention of the clergy at St. Andrews in the following May (1543) which voted £10,000, not completely paid up in 1545: again, apparently in January of the year 1545-46, they met in the church of the Blackfriars in Edinburgh to consider a contribution of £13,000, being the half of a sum to be raised for the defence of the Church and the realm.¹ The destruction wrought by the English, which had periodically afflicted the southern monasteries, was now more widespread; and Cardinal Betoun, as the accounts show, spent considerable sums upon munitions of war. With the death of the king, and the division of the realm by faction, there was also the necessity of confirming adherents and of winning the support of waverers. After 1542 the cause of the Church becomes prominent as a motive in the treatment of lands, and charters appear to be a recognised instrument of party.²

The policy of James v. seriously affected the interpretation put upon utilitas as the indispensable condition which had to be satisfied in feufarm grants. A regard for successors and an increase in the annual revenue proportionate to the value set upon security of tenure by the grantee were not compatible with the urgent need for ready money, and the subsequent desire to secure partisans did not improve matters. A comparative examination of the accounts rendered by the Chamberlains of St. Andrews shows how the system of feuing developed in the hands of Cardinal Betoun, though it does not reveal the sums which he gathered from time to time for the favours bestowed. The changes were so considerable that on September 3, 1545 a new rental of the archiepiscopal lands had to be prepared.¹

One or two instances are instructive. In 1542-43 the Cardinal was making a desperate effort to command the situation after the death of the king, and he sought to secure the firm adherence of Argyle. In granting the lands of Mukartshire in feufarm Betoun referred, indeed, to the advantage of the realm and the statutes thereanent, but spoke more emphatically of the services of the earl in the defence of ecclesiastical liberty, and stipulated for an oath of fidelity to himself and of protection to the Church of St. Andrews. Previously the lands had been set for five years at a rent of some £70, with a payment of poultry valued at 42s. and a quinquennial grassum at the rate of two years' fermes: now some £28 were payable annually in place of the grassum, with 40s. as augmentation of feufarm. The result was, if the casualty of a duplicand at the entry of heirs be neglected, that over a period of five years the rental of St. Andrews was raised to the extent of only £10.² Huntly, again, obtained a grant of Keig and Monymusk in the same critical period,³ and that he made a good bargain is sufficiently proved by an instrument completed at his request, in which the Cardinal states that the charter was given without compulsion.⁴ During his captivity Betoun conciliated Lord Setoun by a promise which was duly fulfilled, and the lands of Kyrklistoun were feued.⁵ John Betoun, the Cardinal's nephew, had done good service in holding the castle of St. Andrews in these dangerous weeks, and had besides paid magnas et ingentes pecuniarum summas for the use and defence of the Church : his reward was Kylryne, at an augmentation of 37s. 4d.¹ All these grants, and others, are recorded by the Chamberlain in his account, with a significant note that the Cardinal himself set the lands and received the grassums.²

Paul III., as has been noted, granted a heavy ecclesiastical taxation to James v., unaware of his death. The decision could hardly be revoked under the dangerous circumstances in which Scotland was now placed ; but on the news that Betoun was not at liberty the Pope considered it wise to commission the Patriarch of Aquileia as legate a latere to supervise the collection.³ His visit, to which there are a few references in these accounts, was not a success financially, and it became necessary for the Papacy, however reluctant, to endow the Scottish Cardinal with the powers so frequently sought on his behalf.⁴

It is unfortunate that these accounts do not give us a complete view of Cardinal Betoun's finance. Over and above the sums which he drew from the administration of Mirepoix he enjoyed, as has been seen, the income of Arbroath. At the Reformation the monastery yielded about £2870 in Scots money, and after the deduction of expenses, the chief of which was the maintenance of the convent, the available balance amounted to more than £1370. In addition there were about four hundred chalders of victual, of which considerably more than one-half was free balance.⁵ A comparison of the fermes paid for the lands of the archbishopric, as they appear in the present accounts, with those of 1561 shows at once a considerable reduction of victual in the interval, with a corresponding increase in money ; and it is reasonable to suppose that a similar process had been going on in the case of Arbroath. At all events the proportion of dues paid in kind was so great that the monastery employed not only a granitar but also two officers who appear incidentally in our St. Andrews accounts as the sacrist, whose duty it was to manage the great barn, and another person who attended to the sale of the victual. At the time when the book was procured for the entry of the accounts now set forth, another was purchased for those of Arbroath,¹ which were kept independently. Occasionally a subvention from the monastery appears, as in 1541, when a sum of over £2800 was paid to the Chamberlain of St. Andrews ; but without the second book our view of Betoun's revenue, not to mention that derived from Mirepoix, and of his financial transactions is necessarily very incomplete. It is evident that the Chamberlain and the Granitar of Arbroath were directly responsible for expenses when the Cardinal and his household happened to be there ; and it is equally clear, if proof were needed, that the income of the archbishopric alone would have been quite inadequate to maintain Betoun in the state in which he lived, and still more inadequate to meet the additional expenses which were due to the exigencies of the time.

Even in the case of St. Andrews these accounts furnish remarkably little for a precise estimate. For one thing, they were not rendered at stated intervals : for another, the successive officers presented their reckonings in different ways. It was the duty of the Granitar, who had an assistant and substitute, to collect the dues of victual, to disburse all alms, gifts, fees, and allowances paid in kind as well as what was consumed by the Cardinal and his household. After selling a portion of his stock and paying expenses directly connected with his office he might be ordered to defray other charges, such as the building of the New College or repairs and fortifications at the Castle, according to convenience. A system under which money was handled by two independent officers was not found to work well, and the Granitar who had served under Archbishop James Betoun was superseded by Archibald Betoun of Capildra, the Cardinal's cousin. The next step was to place all money in the hands of the Chamberlain and to displace the officer who had served for many years, uniting the functions of Chamberlain and Granitar in the person of Archibald Betoun. The change, however, was not permanent; and after 1543, whatever the reason, we find a gradual reversion to the older system. These changes and the peculiarities of the various accountants make statistical investigations extremely difficult and sometimes impossible. It is particularly disappointing that we have no means of estimating the sums of ready money which the Cardinal undoubtedly raised by his manipulation of the ecclesiastical property.

One point deserves special attention in passing. As the accounts proceed there is an apparent decline in the sums received under the head of 'grassums' and a steady increase in the money revenue derived from lands. Reference to the Chamberlain account of 1539¹ shows that the grassums there charged were for grants or renewals of tack; on the other hand the account of 1545² incorporates 'grassums' under the general head of money revenue from lands. The explanation is that under the policy of feuing, which culminated in the new rental of 1545,³ 'grassum' acquired a new significance. The charter granted to Argyle in 1542-43, and quoted above, illustrates the fact that, instead of raising the duty payable under a charter to a sum equal to the old rent plus a proportion of the grassum exacted for periodical renewal of tack, and adding the requisite 'augmentation for feufarm,' it was customary to continue the old rent as duty, to charge an annual grassum, and to specify the augmentation. Thus what was formerly grassum is still so entitled, but becomes really an integral part of the feu-duty, and the increase of money rental from land shown under the first head of the Chamberlain accounts is apt to be deceptive. Betoun profited by the charters which he granted, and raised large sums of which the accounts give us only a hint; but the actual increase in the annual revenue of the see was slight.

Another process which does not at first sight appear was the leasing of teinds. At the beginning of Betoun's tenure we find the revenue derived from tacks already granted to be somewhat over £170, and the Granitars continue throughout to charge the teinds as if no change had taken place; but closer inspection indicates that by 1545 the income from leasing exceeded £280, less than £50 short of the return made in 1561.¹ James v. is credited with a projected reform of the teind system in favour of the smaller men; but the Council of 1585-86, to which it was propounded, was in no mood to listen.² An interesting commentary on the tendency under consideration is contained in the section 'Of teinds' adopted by the Council of 1559.³

In connection with those churches which were annexed to the see and not yet set in tack we find several allusions to the 'riders' of the teinds. One or two illustrations will indicate the nature of their duties. The Abbot of Kelso kept a 'ridyne buik,' which was apparently a record of teinds due to him: ⁴ the Accounts of the Collector General of Thirds speak of two bolls of wheat 'riddin doun' from the teinds of Newgrange in the barony of Arbroath;¹ again, the Book of the Assumption of Thirds² under the head of Arbroath alludes to certain defalcations of old rental arising from 'annual ridings (equitationibus) of teinds of churches' and now accepted by the accountants as a permanent modification. One of our entries refers to the officers in question as 'riders and valuator (equitantes et estimantes).'³ In illustration a case may be quoted, where, owing to the destruction caused by a flood, we find certain teinds reduced by an amount which was 'ryddin and esteamed.'⁴ As regards the churches annexed to the see of St. Andrews the work of the riders is not so clearly described; but the effect of it is often apparent in defalcations on the discharge side of the Granitar accounts. It will also be observed that teinds are frequently sold locally to the tenants. Striking variations in price are noted, but the other conditions of sale are unfortunately not explained.

If we exclude the free-will subsidy as extraordinary, and neglect the proceeds from sales of victuals, we find that the average annual income of money was slightly over £4000. In addition the sales brought in an average of about £1000. The sum derived under this latter head was £884 for the crop of 1538: it was £1436 for the crop of 1541: for the crop of 1545 it was over £1600. This increase was due in a measure to the leasing of teinds, but chiefly to the remarkable rise in prices which may be observed.

On a very rough estimate the crop of 1538 realised on an average per chalders of wheat, barley, and oats £12, 15s., £8, and £4, 15s.; for the crop of 1541 the prices were £18, 16s., £13, 7s., and £8; and for the crop of 1545, £28, 16s., £20, 16s., and £12. The year

1539 seems to have been a bad one, and the unpaid dues of victual went up by some 120 chalders: the year of Solway Moss (1542) saw a similar increase of debts, so that more than 390 chalders rested unpaid: the confusion caused by the death of the Cardinal partially accounts for the huge sum of 455 chalders which was then outlying. While these figures serve to illustrate the strain which the country had to bear during Betoun's tenure of St. Andrews, there is corresponding evidence that the Cardinal must have been in great difficulties for money. Inheriting a comfortable balance from the careful finance of his uncle and debts due to him which were not immoderate, he found himself in 1543 faced by a considerable deficit, and he certainly did not leave the finances of the see as he found them.

An interesting charge in the earlier Chamberlain accounts is that of the subsidiium caritativum, which Betoun obtained permission from the Pope to levy for the expenses of his promotion.¹ We learn from a writ of Archbishop Forman that by the practice of the realm the clergy of the diocese, from abbots down to vicars-portioners, were held liable up to one-fourth part of their livings.² The sum raised for Alexander Stewart in 1506 seems to have been £3380;³ but it will be noticed that barely £2900 were received by the Chamberlain on behalf of the Cardinal, and that a considerable majority of the monasteries are absent from the list. Arbroath was naturally excluded: Dunfermline was held by Betoun's cousin: Kelso and Holyrood were unfortunately occupied by sons of the king, and there may have been reasons connected with the royal taxations to explain the absence of others, though remissions to them are not mentioned. The inferior clergy were not treated, apparently, with the same indulgence.

A permanent, though necessarily variable, source of income was the confirmation of testaments, which were classified as 'lesser' and 'greater.' In the former case the quots were paid in at the annual synods by the rural deans; but, though a careful register was supposed to be kept by each, the names and sums are not given in our accounts. The competence of the deans in confirmation ceased when the amount left exceeded £40 after all debts had been cleared. The names of those whose testaments thus came before Betoun's commissaries are fortunately preserved year by year, so that the date of decease can be placed within limits. It was customary to exact a twentieth, and it seems probable that this charge was levied upon the movables, deductis debitis.¹

The 'procurations' and 'synodals,' the 'ordinary burdens' which it was the duty of the rural deans to collect and hand over at the synods, were constantly in arrears.² We find Betoun himself taking steps to overcome the reluctance of his clergy;³ and the Book of Assumptions, in which the annual sum is entered as £494, notes a fall of about £164, due to the fact that 'they are not paid.'

The materials furnished by these accounts of the charge of money and victual will doubtless prove valuable to the expert historical economist; but the average reader will turn with more interest to the varied items contained on the discharge side. It would be impossible even to refer to the many points which suggest themselves for mention. There are, however, a number of facts bearing on the history of Betoun and his time which may be specially noticed.

In 1538-39 the Cardinal was going to the Continent to receive his hat and to transact the diplomatic business which was closely connected with his elevation, when his uncle died and his departure was delayed. Among the affairs which claimed attention was the building of the New College in St. Andrews. It is clear that the project was regarded as of high importance in the struggle against heresy, and that the Cardinal entered heartily into the scheme which his kinsman had drawn. Archbishop James Betoun's interest in learning is reflected in a belated note of a payment in 1537 to John Douglas, then a regent in Montaigu College at Paris, and destined afterwards to hold the see under very different circumstances. David Betoun procured a royal confirmation of the foundation charter, and at once began to supply money for the work. It was carried on with some vigour during the earlier years of his rule. We hear of French masons brought from Falkland, where they were working, to inspect and tender their advice: in 1541 marble for the altar arrived from abroad and was shipped from Leith to St. Andrews; but subsequent years brought disturbance, and the available money was diverted to the more urgent fortification of the Castle. The completion of the plan was thus left to Archbishop Hamilton.

There is reference, also, to the ill-advised campaign against heresy which the Cardinal chose to institute before his departure. A fortnight after his uncle's death there was a prosecution at Holyrood, which is familiar to us from well-known sources, and a sum was allowed for the erection of a great stand on the occasion.

Betoun sailed for France about March 18, 1538-39, arriving at Dieppe on March 23, and he did not return to Scotland till somewhere about the beginning of October. In the accounts there are several references to the arrangements for his finance during the visit. Not long after his arrival at home he received Dr. Hilliard, the Bishop of Durham's chaplain, who slipped into Scotland in December, and over whom the two kings carried on a long diplomatic quarrel. The refugee was at first boarded in the house of a St. Andrews citizen: he was later (1541) an inmate of St. Salvator's College, having been received as a member of the Faculty of Theology in the University,¹ and for some weeks in 1542 before hostilities with England broke out he was kept by the king's order in hiding at the Cardinal's house of Monymele. He did not leave Scotland till 1543, when Betoun was compelled by his political position to assume an appearance of compliance with English views. Though the doctor passes out of our accounts, there is evidence that the Cardinal did not lose sight of him, since in 1545 he was in France and at Betoun's request had private audience of the king. Clearly Hilliard was intended to play some important ecclesiastical part in the event of a successful attack upon the north of England.²

Of the twelve months from January 1539-40 the Cardinal was able to spend only about two in St. Andrews,³ and it was in this year that William Gibson, Dean of Restalrig, and a senator of the College of Justice, was promoted to be suffragan.⁴ The voyage to the isles projected by the king was delayed by proceedings against Captain Borthwick. James went to St. Andrews and was residing in the monastery at the time of the condemnation.⁵ Towards the middle of June the expedition set out. We learn that Betoun sailed in the Mary Willeby, and, since he went at his own charges, we find in the accounts frequent allusion to the supplies taken and the expenses incurred. In this year, too, John Wynram, the sub-prior of St. Andrews, ascended the doctor's chair in Theology, and received a present of £20 from the Cardinal. Besides the stated fees and the expenses of the entertainment which always followed such academic solemnities, Wynram would have to provide 'bonnets' (birreta) for the graduates of the Faculty, of which John Major was dean, and gloves for the distinguished auditors who patronised his inaugural address. Curiously enough Wynram and John Douglas had an important share in the revision of the statutes of the Theologians, just about the time when they were also considering the Book of Discipline, and their conservatism has preserved for us one of the most valuable accounts in existence of the old ceremonial.¹

In May 1541 we hear that the Cardinal's mother is seriously ill, and we find him taking boat at Queensferry and dining at Inverkeithing on his way to visit her: in another entry special medicines have been ordered for her from an apothecary; and on her death Betoun commissions a Frenchman to execute a memorial brass for the tomb of his parents in the church of Markinch.² In public affairs there was continued friction with Henry VIII., and James was anxious to secure papal authority for a renewed taxation of the clergy: it was also desirable to secure payment of the queen's dowry. The Cardinal set out again for France on July 21, charged with diplomatic as well as financial business. He did not intend to belittle Scotland by the simplicity of his equipage. He and his attendants went in the Unicorn, and a second ship, the Mary Welschinghame, was required for the horses, of which he received no fewer than sixteen in gift from various friends on his departure. The Cardinal's tapestries, too, accompanied him, carefully packed in canvas covers. In spite of the fact that the free-will subsidy was for the most part paid up, recourse was had to the Lord Treasurer for a loan of 3000 crowns, refunded in the following February as £3300 Scots, and it is probable that the money was needed to satisfy creditors in connection with the Cardinal's tax for St. Andrews. Before embarking he attended to a matter of family interest. Precepts were signed for the expenses of the two sons of his nephew, John Betoun, who were pupils in the school at Crail.

The Cardinal was abroad for more than a year, and did not reach Leith on his return till August 3, 1542. In the period of his absence we find a detailed reference to the prisoners immured in the Castle. A certain Sir Andrew Urquhart, indeed, seems to have been incarcerated somewhat earlier; but we hear of his death and burial, not of his offence. At this time we read of an Englishman imprisoned by the king, three witches brought from Edinburgh and Dunfermline by order of the vicars-general, two prebendaries of Dunglas, Sir John Wygtoun, curatus of Ballumby, and a condemned thief. Of the witches, we are told that they were sentenced on October 10, and burned. Lauder has preserved in his Formulare a writ relating to this incident. John Major, Provost of St. Salvator's, Peter Chaplain, and Martin Balfour, canons of the college, and John Wynram were commissioned by Betoun to hold the trial, summoning as assessors all the doctors, licentiates, and bachelors of theology, and having given sentence to see it executed.¹ There are also some references to the diocesan synod of this year, held by the suffragan, whose consecration had been an occasion of festivity, and by Alexander Myln as vicars-general. It is worthy of note, too, that the laird of Brunstoun had accompanied Betoun and was sent before him to the king in St. Andrews. His message, no doubt, concerned the support which might be expected from France in the event of the breach with England which the Cardinal desired to compass. It appears that this man was sent back again in November to secure rents due to the queen and the Cardinal, and that he returned to Scotland very shortly before the death of James.¹ We happen to know that Francis sent by him a large sum of money to the Scottish king, and that Crichton was afterwards held to have 'intercepted' 1500 crowns.²

Just before his return from France, Betoun received his kinsmen, David and James, who came under the charge of Sir David Christesoun to be educated. The identity of these boys, however, is not further revealed in our accounts. The Chamberlain paid a sum to the tutor for expenses and provided suitable clothing for the voyage.

The Cardinal sailed from Dieppe, fresh from an interview with the French king, and reached Leith on August 3, three weeks before Haddenrig. Sir Robert Bowis and Sir Roger Lessellis, the English knights who were captured on the field, were taken to St. Andrews in October, in view of the impending invasion, and were comfortably imprisoned in the Castle. Meantime Betoun gave directions to fortify his city. Two guns were shipped from Leith in September, and a great gun arrived in October. It is evident that the English plan was to send a powerful fleet to the Forth and invade by land on the east border; but the land expedition was delayed through insufficiency of preparation, and, so far as we can judge from the entries in our accounts, the naval force did not create an effective diversion. We are told that thirty-four English ships with troops on board remained in the Forth for about a month, hovering between Kinghorn and Leith; that trynschis were constructed at a place called Clayness to resist a landing; and that John Betoun, the Cardinal's nephew, was entrusted as captain with the defence of St. Andrews Castle. The danger does not seem to have prevented Betoun himself from accompanying the Scottish forces to the south. It was indeed part of his plan to enter England, where the presence of a Cardinal might stir up religious discontent and make trouble for Henry. A cover was ordered for his cross: two swords belonging to him were brought forth and cleaned: his servants were armed with spears bought at Kinghorn: for the accommodation of himself and his household two tents were procured, adorned with enseignes of red, white, and yellow taffeta, and with eight painted thanis. Of his actual movements the accounts tell us almost nothing: a small gift to a poor namesake proves that he reached Fulden, within a few miles of Berwick. If the English invasion was futile, the projected inroad by the Scots was even more so, owing to the reluctance of the lords. But after a conference at Edinburgh the Cardinal seems to have carried his point, and, according to Knox, it was planned that he should, in company with Arran, make a feint on the east while the real attack was now to be pushed home on the west. Again the accounts are silent, and the only glimpse of Betoun we have is at Haddington some time in November.

After Solway Moss we find Betoun at St. Andrews for two days at the time of the king's death (December 14). On the 29th he made a payment to the nurse of the queen at Linlithgow; and there are interesting entries regarding the purchase of a manuale or book of occasional offices, and of a mitra simplex, suitable to circumstances of mourning.

The Cardinal's effort to command the situation after the king's death was a failure, and he was arrested on January 27 at a council in Arran's chamber. At the news we learn that the sub-granitar rode to Leith, and from Kinghorn hastened to St. Andrews to warn John Betoun and his men. The Castle was held by a garrison of one hundred till March 24, when the Cardinal was permitted to take up residence there under merely nominal restraint. We find artillery purchased and gunners hired by the captain during these weeks. In the meantime the imprisoned churchman had been consigned to Dalkeith for a few days : he was at Seton throughout the greater part of February : the remainder of his captivity was spent at Blackness. The accounts do not by any means suggest privation. He did not lack company, and was fortunately permitted to enjoy the services of his own cook : the bill for supplies, too, amounted to over £380 ; so that this Lenten season was not one of unrelieved gloom.

Though Betoun was forbidden to leave St. Andrews without Arran's permission, he did not behave as a discredited politician. An offering to the arm of the national saint on April 12 marked his liberation and was an effective manifesto of policy. In the beginning of May he set about providing munitions of war, ordering guns and powder from a French engineer, keeping ' great house ' as was reported in England, and ultimately gathering his supporters around him in July with a view to seizing the infant queen and counteracting the temporary advantage of the English party. While negotiations went on between the factions the Castle continued to be fortified. By the month of October Arran, now under the Cardinal's control, was giving drink silver to the workmen at the Castle,¹ and Sadler had to report that there was no sign on the part of the English faction of an attempt to crush Betoun in his stronghold.² The Patriarch of Aquileia, who had been sent as legate by the Pope on the news of the Cardinal's captivity, and whose special commission it was to raise the ecclesiastical taxation granted when James declared against England, regarded Betoun as financially exhausted.¹ The visit of Grimani was not a success, as it appears, and in December we find Arran writing to Paul III. about the need of money, and urging that powers a latere should now be conferred upon the Cardinal.² The presence of the legate, however, was in one respect of immediate advantage. Betoun had indeed been compelled to feu church lands either to vindicate his liberty or to secure supporters: his restoration to power now enabled him to derive money from a continuation of the policy, and the means of confirmation, so far as Rome was concerned, lay ready to hand.³

Early in the spring of 1544 Henry VIII., in high displeasure at the turn of affairs in Scotland, where Betoun had been made Chancellor, determined on an invasion. The plan most favoured, since it held out the hope of capturing the Cardinal, was a dash upon Edinburgh by sea, and operations on the coast of Fife. Henry's ferocious orders were to 'turn upside down' the town of St. Andrews and spare no creature alive.⁴ Though Hertford was doubtful whether he could penetrate so far, Betoun did not fail to realise that he himself was an objective, and continued to strengthen the Castle, while he provided for his bodily safety by the purchase of a new jak. On May 3 the English commander, assisted by the advice of Captain Borthwick, who sailed with him,⁵ arrived suddenly before Inchkeith, and on the following day effected a landing near Newhaven, forcing a passage into Leith. Betoun was present at the first engagement, 'vestu d'une casacque de vellour jaulne fort descoupee plaine de taffetas blanc avec listes d'or que floccoquent par les descoupeures.'⁶ The Cardinal did not choose to join in a defence of Edinburgh, and preferred to regard his own escape as of chief importance. 'The first man that fled,' said an eyewitness, 'was the holy Cardinal, like a valiant champion.'¹ On Monday, May 5, a man was paid to guide him from Corstorphine to Stirling, where he remained for several days. On the following Thursday, May 8, in great fear for his life, he completed an instrument in the Chapel Royal by which Archibald Betoun, his cousin, John Betoun, his nephew, and Master Bernard Bailie were appointed his testamentary executors.² Meanwhile Edinburgh was being given to the flames, and Hertford, no doubt in the hope of securing the Cardinal, followed up his success by devastating the country to within six miles of Stirling.³ Seeking refuge at Doune, Betoun then passed along the foot of the Ochils to Castle Campbell, whence he was guided by a man of Mukart to Kyncardin, near Auchterarder, the house of the Earl of Montrose. There he remained for eleven days, distributing gifts on his departure to the servants, among whom was William, the Gude Gyde. He was at Falkland on May 21, on his way to St. Andrews,⁴ Hertford having withdrawn to Berwick. It appears that an additional misfortune overtook the Cardinal at this juncture. His men were directed to carry his valuables—'divers silver werk, jewellis, and gudis'—from Kyncardin to St. Andrews, and they were met near Dunning by Tullibardine, who appropriated 'ane grete croce of silver,' a number of silver dishes, and some dozens of silver spoons, valued at £2800 Scots. This bold speculation in the downfall of Betoun was not justified by success. Next spring the Lords of Session decided against Murray; and, since he was apparently unable to restore the silver or refund its value, recourse was had to his lands.⁵

Though the English had retired, there was every reason to proceed with the fortification of the Castle, which might now be necessary to protect Betoun against the indignation of enemies at home. Heavy cargoes of lime arrived at St. Andrews: a Frenchman provided seventy-three beche schulis and a quantity of towys: Master Wolf, who was lodged in the city for a year, received materials for one culvaryne moyane, and afterwards constructed a second: 'gunpowder and the great cannon stok with the wheels thereof,' came from Leith, and 'great iron bullets' from Dunbar. Precautions were evidently taken, too, for the provisioning of the place, and boatloads of victuals were brought across from Arbroath. In this connection it is noticeable that the Granitar, who entered office in May 1543, purchased a few chalders of rye-meal, which continued thereafter to be used for the garrison of the Castle.

The authority of Arran as Governor was suspended in June, and he was threatened with final deposition. The Cardinal was thus not only in fear for his personal safety, but he was also reduced to comparative inactivity. He seems to have remained in St. Andrews, working quietly for the reconstruction of the French party, a project in which he was aided by the ill-judged conduct of the English, whose raids exasperated the Scots, and by the difficulties into which the Boulogne expedition had plunged Henry. Arran might perhaps have been induced to make another change in policy but for a precaution which Betoun had taken in 1543, when he won the earl over. The accounts bear out Knox's statement that 'the Cardinall gatt his eldast sone in pledge, whom he kept in the Castell of Sanctandross, whill the day that Goddis hand punished his pryde.'

There is an undated entry in an account of 1543-44 which states that Sir James Lyell was sent to the church of Glamis to forbid further preaching by Friar John Rogier.¹

Evidently the warning was not heeded. Knox mentions among Betoun's prisoners 'Johne Roger, a Blak Freir, godly, learned, and ane that had fructfully preached Christ Jesus, to the comfort of many in Anguss and Mearnes, whome that bloody man caused murther in the ground of the Sea-toure of Sanctandross, and then caused to cast him ower the craig, sparsing a false bruyt, "That the said Johnne, seaking to flie, had broken his awin craig."'

Another reference, also undated, indicates that Sir John Wigtoun and Sir David Lyndsay, priests, stood a trial; but we are not informed of the result.¹ Knox, speaking of Wishart's preaching in Dundee, accuses the Cardinal of having 'corrupted by money a disperat preast, named Schir Johne Wightone, to slay the said Maister George.' Wishart protected his assailant from the vengeance of the people and 'saved the lyif of him that soght his.'

Betoun succeeded by November in restoring a certain degree of unity among the lords on the basis of defence, and turned his attention to procuring aid from France for the aggressive war which he desired to revive on the first favourable opportunity. He seems to have been chiefly in Edinburgh before and after the success of Ancrum in the spring of 1544-45; but the accounts give us little information regarding him. Besides the cultivation of a proper hostility to England and the securing of aid from France, there were pressing economic problems to be considered. The disastrous effects of Hertford's invasion, which are partially reflected in our accounts, rendered it imperative to keep communications open with the most accessible Continental ports, and for this reason among others we find Scottish diplomacy active at the court of Charles v.² The French forces were slow in setting forth; and a report which reached Edinburgh on May 2 of 'the English-men's incoming'¹ at once persuaded the Cardinal to retire to his stronghold. On May 3, as the accounts tell us, his tapestries and baggage were transported from Kinghorn to St. Andrews. His movements may have been accelerated by suspicions of the plot for his assassination which was now being hatched between certain of the lords and Henry.² There is also evidence that plague broke out this summer. The Court of Session removed to Linlithgow in June:³ later in the year Wishart ministered to the sick in Dundee; and in November we hear of certain poor people in Fife who were suspected of the infection, and were presented by Betoun with a little meal.⁴

The news that the French were coming by the western sea drew him to Glasgow, and occasioned the unseemly brawl between the followers of the Cardinal and the Archbishop over which Knox makes merry. The rivalry between St. Andrews and Glasgow was of old standing; and when David Betoun succeeded his uncle, he had reason to prosecute his case if he was to vindicate a mastery in ecclesiastical affairs. The unsatisfactory relations between James Betoun and the king had led, in 1531, to the complete exemption of Glasgow. It was one of the Cardinal's earliest acts to enter into agreement with Dunbar, and to procure a bull (May 14, 1539) limiting the exemption to the period of the latter's tenure. When Betoun returned from France in 1542, bent upon war with England, he had occasion to require a transumpt, and we find Master Andrew Oliphant sent to Dunkeld in September to get it.⁵ This bull, however, had not settled the Cardinal's right to elevate his cross in the diocese of Glasgow. In November 1539 he had written to Rome for express authority, and a few days later he had actually tried to create a precedent.⁶

A favourable response does not seem to have been secured, since in April 1544, when operations were going on against Lennox, there was another protest from Dunbar, signed in the choir of his cathedral. The outburst in 1545 cannot have been due entirely to ecclesiastical jealousies, or to the 'glorious' folly of the Archbishop of Glasgow: it is evident that he differed from Arran and Betoun on questions of policy, and, if he disapproved of an attack on England at this juncture, he was fully justified by the event.

The significance of the incident is heightened by an additional consideration. The Provincial Council of 1535-36 was summoned at the desire of James v., and was not altogether pleasing to the ecclesiastical authorities. The satisfaction of being formally consulted was somewhat spoiled by a flavour of dictation. According to Angus the king wrote 'bydand the Clarge gyff owr the Cros-presandes and the Owmost Claytht throw all Schotland that thai sowld be na mayr tayne, and at ewere man swld haif his awn teynd payand tharfor for his teyndis syklyk as he payes to his landis lord of his malys, and na meyr for all his hayll tendes.' He also threatened, 'and thai grantit nocht to that at the Kyngis command, that thar sowld be an charg layd to tham that he swld ger tham set all thar the temporall that the Kyrk hau to few, and to hayff for it bot the ald mayll syklyk as the ald rentalys berys.'¹ James Betoun, who held the Council with a very bad grace, and who never paid his share of the contribution for the College of Justice,² invited Dunbar to attend as having consented in Parliament, but did not command him.³ The Convention held at St. Andrews by Cardinal Betoun in May 1543, after his liberation, was of vital importance to the ecclesiastical party, and, though reference was made to primatial authority, the tone of invitation was still predominant.¹ But even in 1545-46 the contribution of £10,000, which had been voted, had not been paid up, and it had become evident that the clergy, however interested in the object of taxation, were feeling the financial strain. In 1545, before the arrival of the French succours, a fresh contribution was proposed, which would compel the churchmen to raise £13,000.² Though Betoun had been appointed legate al latere in 1543-44, his commission was for some reason delayed, and in the summer of 1545 it fell into the hands of the English, where it still remains.³ Apart from this accident, however, it was of vital importance for Betoun's policy that he should have incontestable powers to impose his will upon the churchmen. As the result of an appeal to Paul III. a brief was granted on May 1, 1545, upon the strength of which the Cardinal ultimately held the Provincial Council of 1545-46, at which George Wishart was condemned.⁴ It is clear that Betoun was not able to bring the churchmen to St. Andrews for a council in January, and had to be content with a convention at the Blackfriars in Edinburgh. It is equally clear, further, that the departure of the French troops and the exposed condition of the Border had more to do with the Convention than any authority which Betoun was in a position to exercise. The business of the assembly was not to initiate the ecclesiastical taxation of £13,000, but to secure, if possible, its collection by formal consent, and that speedily.⁵ A section of the clergy was in fact being forced by circumstances and the clever opportunism of the Cardinal to play higher in the game, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that the brawl in Glasgow before Arran's futile expedition was partly the result of some feeling in the west that Betoun's policy was not at that juncture the best for the Church.

² Acts of Council and Session, Ap. 2, 1541.

³ Statuta, i. 249.

Reinforcements and money from France seemed to have united the opposing factions; but while Betoun was writing to Paul III. in a hopeful strain the English authorities were being informed that a good reward was all that was necessary to procure an assassin.¹ In July the Cardinal was at Linlithgow superintending arrangements for the expedition on which the success of his policy was staked. The Chamberlain of St. Andrews was entrusted with the special preparations for Betoun's household, and busied himself in procuring thirty-six barrels and eighty rubbouris, with the requisite horses. Wheat was shipped from the granary at St. Andrews, and sold at Blackness and Dunbar for the sustenance of the lieges or their families. The commissariat arrangements were, however, interrupted by a ludicrous affair. A cargo of meal consigned for Dunbar, and no doubt intended to be a convenient source of supply, fell into the hands of the men of Crail, who promptly appropriated it to present use. A man was sent on horseback to Linlithgow to inform the Cardinal of the presumptuous act; and the burgesses were compelled, when leisure served, to pay for what had been eaten. But the incident gives us a glimpse of the privations which must have been endured by the poor in this time, privations sufficiently attested by the prices revealed in our accounts.

In the days of the Regent Albany the memories of Flodden were too vivid to encourage the Scottish lords to act as the tools of France; and Archbishop James Betoun looked upon a force of Scots at the Border as something to bargain with rather than as the instrument of aggressive war. The Cardinal had forgotten his uncle's experience; nor did he reckon fully with the plague and the lack of victuals, which combined to make the expedition a miserable failure. The French troops, who were paid in debased coin, proved now rather a burden than a help,¹ and we find Betoun selling bread and ale to them after their return from the host. In December they were gathered at Kinghorn for departure, and the Cardinal gave order for four thousand loaves and large quantities of ale for consumption on the voyage, their commander, Lorge, receiving a gift of osay wine.²

The failure of the Scottish host enabled Hertford to retaliate with effect, and the state of Scotland became more miserable than ever. Over and above the faction and plotting at home there was an unfortunate turn of affairs in European politics. By a treaty at Utrecht in January, 1545-46, the Emperor was committed to closer friendship with England, and the French, who had signally failed to create an effective diversion through the Scots, were considering whether they might not tide over present difficulties and recover Boulogne by seeming to approve of an English alliance for the Scottish queen.³ The Cardinal had to consider, therefore, not only his personal safety, but also the security of the Dowager and her child. The laird of Brunstoun, who should have been a good judge of intrigue, informed Henry in October 1545 that Betoun was going to France for aid; that he was trying to bring the young queen to his castle, persuading Arran that she was to be kept for his son; and that the Dowager displayed an indignation which she probably did not feel.⁴ At this juncture we are accordingly not surprised to see great activity at St. Andrews. Knox, speaking of the time after the execution of Wishart, dwells on the confidence of the Cardinal: 'in Babylon, that is, in his new blok-house he was suyre, as he thought.' Our accounts give us no description of the works which had been so long in progress. 'Babylon was almost finished,' and we read of branches and brushwood procured for gabions, and of earth and sods brought to fill them. Provisions, too, were introduced in considerable quantities—a fortunate circumstance for Betoun's assailants.

The sole reference to the act which is so closely associated with Betoun's end is an entry of the expense for 'a servant on horseback with letters of the Governor and the Cardinal to the captain of Edinburgh castle and the provost of Edinburgh for the taking of Master George Wyschart.'¹ Of the Cardinal's own death there is scarcely anything but the date. The last account was not rendered till May 1549, shortly before John Hamilton came into actual possession, and John Lauder, who was still called upon to enter it in the book, broke off suddenly in the midst of the discharge of money, just in time to disappoint our curiosity. The last act of the tragedy as described by Knox will be to the reader of these accounts dramatic enough. 'And so was he brought to the East blokhouse head, and schawen dead ower the wall to the faythless multitude, which wold not beleve befor it saw: How miserably lay David Betoun, cairfull Cardinall.'

JOHN LAUDER THE SECRETARY

John Lauder, who entered almost all these accounts,² was the son of a priest. Studying at St. Andrews, he was received as a master by the Faculty of Arts in 1509 and acted as a temptator or examiner in 1511. He was early

² The other hand seems to be that of Thomas Knox (cf. p. 143), who assisted Lauder in secretarial work. The charter of the Cardinal, for example, conferring full collegiate status upon St. Leonard's College (1545: St. Andrews Univ. MSS.) was written by Lauder and entered in the register by Knox.

associated with Andrew Forman, who, as Bishop of Moray, gave him the tonsure, and subsequently provided him with an indult to hold three incompatible benefices. He was junior secretary to Forman as Archbishop of St. Andrews, and had been created notary by apostolic authority in virtue of powers obtained at Rome by John Sauchy, the chief secretary.¹ On the death of the archbishop Lauder did not enter the service of his successor, James Betoun, with whom he was on bad terms. Working chiefly in the diocese of Glasgow he began the collection known as the St. Andrews Formulare, and entered a very large number of writs which had passed through his hands as junior secretary, with others evidently copied from the register. To these he added writs relating to the western diocese. When David Betoun succeeded to St. Andrews, Lauder, who was now Archdeacon of Teviotdale, assumed the position of chief secretary and continued to add to his book of styles.

On at least two occasions Lauder visited Rome. He acted as agent for Queen Margaret in 1525 when she desired to thwart James Betoun's intention to secure Melrose for his nephew; and he presented the complaint of James v. in 1534 regarding the conduct of the archbishop.² The Treasurer's Accounts, also, show that he did secretarial work in connection with the taxation imposed by Clement VII., to which James Betoun was so bitterly opposed.

His own collection of writs indicates that Lauder was frequently engaged in the pursuit of benefices which were vacant and for which his indult made him eligible. One case is interesting as an illustration of a condition of things which caused great irritation in this period. The vicarage of Kylryne in Fife was held by a canon of Dryburgh, and when a vacancy occurred James Betoun collated the presentee of the chapter. Clement VII. had, however, reserved all benefices falling vacant in eight specified months of the year for his own disposal, and Lauder claimed the vicarage as granted to him by the Pope in commendam. Producing a certificate of the date and place of the former vicar's death, he was fortunate enough to win his case.¹ A subsequent transaction during Lauder's tenure deserves to be noticed. John Betoun, the Cardinal's nephew, obtained a grant of Kylrynne in feufarm about 1543 and negotiated with the vicar. The latter, in a charter sealed by the commendator and convent of Dryburgh and by the Cardinal in February 1543-44, mentioned the desirability of commissioning others to gather fruits that beneficed persons might be free for their ministry, and stated that Kylrynne required heavy expense for the building and repair of the harbour, lie Skynfasthaven, up to the present little frequented, so as to make it suitable for fishing-boats and thus add teinds of fish to the profits of the vicarage, which would be further augmented by the growth of population. On these grounds Lauder, upon payment of a sum of money by John Betoun, granted to him in feufarm all teinds of fish to be caught by boats from the new harbour, for an annual duty of 6s. 8d. payable at Easter, with a duplicand at the entry of heirs.²

On February 4, 1538-39, shortly after Betoun became Cardinal, the Pope granted him a special indult to dispose of benefices in the diocese of St. Andrews falling vacant in the apostolic months.³ On setting out for France in July 1541, Betoun empowered Lauder to present and collate in accordance with a signed list of names which was in the custody of the Chamberlain. He was also directed to make necessary appointments to the consistorial courts with the

³ Ibid., ff. 500, 451.

Chamberlain's consent, and to confirm greater testaments after that officer had signed and sealed them upon receipt of the quots.¹ Lauder was also appointed for life to be principal clerk and notary of the Official's court in St. Andrews, with custody of the seal, books, and papers. He was entitled to choose his subordinates and to enjoy the usual profits, with the exception of that part which fell by custom to the Official himself.²

Lauder's activities in the prosecution of heretics are well known to readers of John Knox and need not be described. The portrait drawn of him is not flattering; but he is entitled to consideration for his masterly penmanship and for the extraordinary industry which makes his Formulare the most valuable collection of evidence in existence for a study of contemporary ecclesiastical administration. It is specially important as recording many fugitive writs of which the originals cannot long have survived the particular occasions and persons concerned.

The date of Lauder's death does not seem to be recorded. He appears incidentally as secretary to Archbishop John Hamilton; but in 1552 the archdeaconry of Teviotdale, or the parsonage of Morebattle, as his benefice is often called, was occupied by another.³

To present these accounts in the original Latin would have required a great amount of space, even if all unnecessary repetition were avoided; and the advantage to the scholar of having the ipsissima verba throughout would hardly have been compensation for the unwieldiness of the book and the number of explanatory notes which must have been added in the interest of readers unfamiliar with the language of such documents. The course which has been followed is a compromise. The first three accounts are printed practically in full, as specimens, and the whole book has been translated with as much reduction and abbreviation as seems consistent with intelligibility. In the vast majority of cases the meaning is perfectly clear, and little of significance can be lost in the rendering. On the other hand care has been taken, where there is any possible doubt of the meaning, to reproduce the original Latin word or phrase for the reader's independent judgment. Occasionally the editor has refrained from definite translation for lack of authority. To solve all the particular difficulties of vocabulary would require long and perhaps fruitless search. It will be noticed, further, that all vernacular words have been carefully preserved. In fact a strict interpretation has been put upon the rule that in every case where the form of expression diverges at all from the familiar the original phraseology should be given.

The variation of spelling in names has also been observed with some care, and an attempt has been made to follow the vagaries of the text. This rule has not been followed, however, with completeness: a few place-names which are well known and recur frequently appear in their present form.

Some words which bear upon the process of accounting have been translated throughout so as to give the reader a clue to the original rather than to satisfy the English ear or reproduce the exact modern equivalent. Arreragia and resta, it should be noted, are not always clearly distinguishable and must be interpreted according to the context; but quittantia, mandatum, and preceptum are uniformly translated by their derivatives. For ordeum 'barley' has always been given instead of 'bear.'

There are frequent repetitions, most of them naturally on the charge side, others recording the periodical remuneration of officers or servants, others again in the lists of dependentie or 'sums depending.' Such opportunities for abbreviation have been taken, and it is necessary to bear this in mind in connection with entries which recur from year to year, since the contents of sections omitted are not included in the Index, though they are indicated in the translation.

Some words and phrases, as has been said, have been reproduced without detailed rendering. In a few cases the editor's hesitation may be culpable, in others judicious. We read, for example, of coarse oatmeal used in the kitchen in lentibus,¹ or more frequently pro lentibus, an element of diet in which the captive English knights participated. To cure the Cardinal's horse Qwhite Bowis a sum was expended pro luce porcina.² Again we find the horses of the stable supplied with what the accountant calls simula.³ Those who are acquainted with the history of baking will be in a position to distinguish the different sorts of bread set before Betoun and his household. The whale which came ashore at Byrehillis will also be an object of legitimate curiosity, as well as the word sallatura, which has been taken with diffidence as an effort for salsura.⁴ There are frequent references to quinterne, which are evidently the books used by the various subordinates in keeping their accounts. In one case a quinterna is specially described as having ten leaves; but other indications of size and shape fail us. Possibly they are the narrow note-books familiar at a later period. In several instances besides these the dictionaries give no assistance. It should be admitted that 'wheat-flour' as a rendering of ador frumenti is a conjecture.

The accounts are entered with the utmost care, the great majority in the hand of John Lauder. Occasional omissions probably account for some arithmetical inconsistencies. The figures have been given as they stand, except in a very few cases where clerical errors which do not affect the ultimate results might prove statistically misleading.

The work of translation and the necessity, amid so much detail, for careful revision and collation have inevitably delayed publication; but whatever the defects of the rendering it is hoped that the presentation of these accounts in an English dress will make more accessible a valuable book of reference. The labour has been much lightened by the very accurate transcript of Mr. Henry Paton, junior. The generous assistance of Dr. Maitland Thomson, to whom so many inquirers are indebted, and the interest of Dr. Hay Fleming, who unfortunately relinquished the editorship of the volume, have always been available. Numerous defects would have been removed by more frequent trespass upon their kindness. Many friends besides have placed their knowledge at command. The Index, to which the book will owe much of its usefulness, has been prepared by Mr. Alexander Mill.

RULES

1. THE object of the Society is the discovery and printing, under selected editorship, of unpublished documents illustrative of the civil, religious, and social history of Scotland. The Society will also undertake, in exceptional cases, to issue translations of printed works of a similar nature, which have not hitherto been accessible in English.

2. The number of Members of the Society shall be limited to 400.

3. The affairs of the Society shall be managed by a Council, consisting of a Chairman, Treasurer, Secretary, and twelve elected Members, five to make a quorum. Three of the twelve elected Members shall retire annually by ballot, but they shall be eligible for re-election.

4. The Annual Subscription to the Society shall be One Guinea. The publications of the Society shall not be delivered to any Member whose Subscription is in arrear, and no Member shall be permitted to receive more than one copy of the Society's publications.

5. The Society will undertake the issue of its own publications, i.e. without the intervention of a publisher or any other paid agent.

6. The Society will issue yearly two octavo volumes of about 320 pages each.

7. An Annual General Meeting of the Society shall be held at the end of October, or at an approximate date to be determined by the Council.

8. Two stated Meetings of the Council shall be held each year, one on the last Tuesday of May, the other on the Tuesday preceding the day upon which the Annual General Meeting shall be held. The Secretary, on the request of three Members of the Council, shall call a special meeting of the Council.

9. Editors shall receive 20 copies of each volume they edit for the Society.

10. The owners of Manuscripts published by the Society will also be presented with a certain number of copies.

11. The Annual Balance-Sheet, Rules, and List of Members shall be printed.

12. No alteration shall be made in these Rules except at a General Meeting of the Society. A fortnight's notice of any alteration to be proposed shall be given to the Members of the Council.

REPORT OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE SCOTTISH HISTORY SOCIETY

THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE SOCIETY was held in Dowell's Rooms, Edinburgh, on the 2nd December 1911,—The Right Hon. The EARL OF ROSEBERY presiding.

The SECRETARY read the Report of the Council as follows:—

During the past year thirteen members have died, and five have resigned.

After filling up the vacancies, twelve candidates for Membership remain on the list.

Since last General Meeting two Volumes have been issued to Members, viz. Wariston's Diary, 1632-1639, and Lady Grisell Baillie's Household Book. Of these the former is the last volume of the First Series of the Society's publications, the other is the first of their New Series, and the first issue for 1909-1910.

Unforeseen delays at press have prevented the issue of The Seafield Correspondence, the Index of which is still in the making. The volume of Miscellaneous Narratives relating to the '45 has been in type for more than a year, but the learned editor's introduction has been delayed by his numerous and harassing engagements.

One volume, The Scots in Poland, which forms part of the issue for 1907-1908, is long overdue; the Council believe that, thanks to the good offices of friends, it may be relied on to appear during 1912.

Of the issue for 1910-1911, one, The Accounts of the Chamberlains and Granitars of Cardinal Beaton, has just gone to press, and the other, Bailie Stuart's Letter Book, is expected to follow shortly.

The Council desire to express their great regret on account of the backward state of the Society's publications; and undertake to do their utmost to rectify matters in this respect as soon as possible.

For 1911-1912 the issue will consist of—

1. Wariston's Diary, volume ii., edited by Dr. Hay Fleming.
2. Miscellany of the Scottish History Society, volume iii.

The principal items to be included in this volume were specified in last year's Report.

Three vacancies in the Council are caused by the retirement in rotation of Mr. A. O. Curle, Dr. Hay Fleming, and Professor Rankine. It is recommended that the two latter be re-elected, and that the third vacancy be filled up by the appointment of Lord Guthrie.

The Accounts of the Hon. Treasurer, of which an abstract is appended hereto, show that the balance in the Society's favour on 10th November 1910 was £671, 15s. 11d., the income for 1910-1911 £540, 14s. 11d., the expenditure £569, 9s. 7d., and the balance at the Society's credit on 10th November 1911 £643, 1s. 3d.

Lord ROSEBERY, in moving the adoption of the Report, said—
Ladies and gentlemen, I have great pleasure in moving the adoption of this report. That pleasure is, perhaps, slightly alloyed by the fact that it is not wholly satisfactory. We have one or two volumes in arrear, and though we may take some pride in the fact that one volume is delayed by the wish for a perfect index—which in old days would not have delayed many volumes—yet I could wish that we were a little more forward with the works that we have had long in hand. But we must remember that some of our editors who give their services so cordially to our work have many other tasks on hand, and that we cannot hope for the full time that they have at their disposal to be given to our business. But at any rate we may feel this, that the books are now well in progress; that we have immediately before us one volume of extraordinary interest to which I propose to refer for a moment; and, lastly, as regards the report, there is the pleasure we must all feel in finding that Lord Guthrie is going to take part in the operations of our Council. Well, ladies and gentlemen, I think that the volume of Lady Grisell Baillie's Household Book is one that makes up for a great many other deficiencies. I hoped when I said that to receive some applause from the ladies present, because it is emphatically a book that would appeal to them, dealing largely with household matters and giving them guidance as to the conduct of their establishments, and a precedent which, though perhaps a little too rigid, may be of inestimable value to them. I very much doubt if any ladies present, or indeed absent, take quite so much pains with their accounts as Lady Grisell Baillie did. We have it on record that in order to work up not her own accounts, but her father's accounts, she once spent two months from five o'clock in the morning till midnight exclusively employed with those avocations, and that when she appeared in the intervals of this industry she was as gay and cheerful as any member of her family. I think, however, she may have furnished too strict a precedent even for the most ambitious of Edinburgh housewives, or Scottish housewives, for I observe such frequent changes in her establishment that I cannot but think her rule was too arbitrary to be applied in these modern and laxer days.

One of the great features of this volume is that it fills up a gap between our other household books—it exactly fills up a gap—and it begins at a most interesting period. No period of household accounts can be quite so interesting to us as the period which begins in the year of the Union, the beginning of the great transformation when Scotland ceased to be separated by a sort of Chinese wall from England, and when the more ambitious and aspiring of our compatriots flocked southwards in order to seek their fortune. That was an intermediate phase, and therefore any household book, or indeed any document that throws light on the life of Edinburgh in the year of the Union, is one of quite exceptional interest. Well, now, the people who are dealt with in this book are also people, I think, of exceptional interest. The husband, Mr. Baillie, and the wife were both Whigs of the extremest type. The husband had suffered greatly for the Whigs, and so did the wife. But the husband was not, I think, in any true sense a very ardent politician, and perhaps the most interesting part of his political career, and one which may furnish a precedent to our own Government in the future, is that after having been for six or seven years a Lord of the Treasury at £1600 a year, by singular favour of the Crown he retired on a pension of full pay for the rest of his life. He was also, what appeals to many of us, a great book collector. He went about with boxes of books, and he really was as sedulous a literary man as I suppose is to be found in those days. What I think is a little difficult to explain, and Mr. Scott Moncrieff, in his admirable preface—admirable, because his preface is a work of enormous labour in analysing these vast accounts, and he has lit it up with a picturesque humour which greatly enlivens the subject—what I think we do not quite understand from Mr. Scott Moncrieff is this, how the income of Mr. Baillie so largely expanded during his life. I think when he was living in Scotland at the time of the Union, as a man of fashion and of Parliament, his whole expenditure did not exceed £600 sterling a year. I think the rental of his house, which I suppose was one adequate to his position, was about £15 a year. But before the end of his life, it is quite clear that even under the careful management of Lady Grisell, he was spending nearly £3000 a year, and that when he went to Naples for his son-in-law's health, he sent back between £6000 and £7000 worth of marble, which would be a considerable sum for a millionaire even in these days; and I do not quite understand how the progress of Mr. Baillie's fortune was achieved, even when we bear in mind his remarkable pension. But that you may think a matter of more importance to him than to ourselves.

His wife, Lady Grisell, on the other hand, is one of the most interesting and picturesque figures of our later history. She was a daughter of Sir Patrick Hume, who afterwards became Lord Marchmont, one of the leading statesmen of his day, and when he was in concealment under the persecution of either Charles II. or James II.—I forget which—she as a girl managed at supper to secrete her meals in an astonishing manner, so as to be able to convey them to her father in his confinement. There is a famous incident that occurred, which is recorded by Lady Murray, her daughter, when one of the children, looking up, said :—‘ Mother, will you look at Grisell? While we have been eating our broth, she has eaten up the whole sheep’s head.’ And, of course, it was a remarkable thing that while they were eating their broth the girl should have conveyed away, apparently into her throat, the staple of the entertainment—but it was to convey it to her suffering father. Many of you will remember that this incident has evidently been borrowed by Dickens in Great Expectations—not, perhaps, one of his most popular and best-known books, but still, like all that he wrote, full of interest. Pip, the little boy at the very beginning of the story, meets a convict in the marshes, and promises to convey food to him; and he has to adopt the same method that Lady Grisell Baillie adopted. His brother-in-law, who is seated at the table with him, opens his eyes wider and wider as he sees the food vanishing, and eventually he breaks out—‘ As a boy I’ve been among many bolters; but I never see your bolting equal yet, Pip, and it’s a mercy you ain’t bolted dead.’ That, I think, is a picturesque incident, and one which evidently our great novelist thought worthy to appropriate. She herself, I think, must have been a remarkable woman. Her daughter speaks of her almost with adoration. She had a happy marriage for forty-eight years. She was so devoted to her son-in-law, Lord Binning, that she took him to Naples, where he died; she quite willingly left her home and went with all her family that huge journey, as it was in those days.

And that is another value of the account book, that it gives not merely her home life in Edinburgh, her home life in the country in Scotland, her home life in London, where she went when her husband was Lord of the Treasury, but it also gives a very elaborate account of her journey to Naples and all the concomitant expenses, and not only that, it gives directions to some other member of her family, I forget who, for a journey in the same direction, giving the best inn in every place, and so throwing an amount of light on the journeying facilities or difficulties of that time, which, I think, would be very difficult to over-estimate. She was a great lady wherever she was, and yet she seems to have kept the strictest possible supervision over the smallest item of her expenditure. With that she was liberal, generous, and self-denying, but, as I say, her excessive thrift, a virtue which is not popular in these days, was one which apparently alienated some of her household, and perhaps not unnaturally. Ladies and gentlemen, I think we may ask ourselves why it is that household books, which are to us the most repulsive form of reading so far as they regard ourselves, should be so extremely interesting when they deal with the past. I think the answer is not difficult. They give us a minute view of the life of the past. I do not think our monthly books will be very picturesque reading for our descendants, but perhaps we do not keep them so closely as she did. And the novelty of many of the apparitions in these books is in itself of singular interest. Take the item of tea. Now tea, we are told, first appeared in Scotland when James II. came to Holyrood as Duke of York, in 1679 or 1680. There it was shown, handed round, as an article of singular luxury and interest, and that was the first appearance of tea in Scotland, if my recollection is correct. The first appearance of tea in Lady Grisell's household book is in the year 1710, when she had to pay nearly 30s. for a pound of tea, and yet, so fascinating was this liquid that she appears to have adhered faithfully to it, in spite of its considerable cost, all through her life.

I will only take one other item in these accounts which strikes me as very remarkable—the item of potatoes. You would have thought there would have been nothing so familiar as the potato to every household, but in all her bills of fare and in all her accounts (I am here relying implicitly on Mr. Scott Moncrieff because I have not analysed them so closely as he has) potatoes only appear once in the course of her long life as an article of food, and that was abroad, and not in Great Britain, and in the year 1733, whereas we know that these accounts begin in 1707. Well, that recalls in a way which ought to be interesting to every man and woman in this city how comparatively recent the introduction of the potato was into this country. I believe the first appearance of the potato in Scottish social history was in the first Duchess of Buccleuch's household book in the year 1701, where the potato appears as an esculent of extraordinary rarity, and I do not think it was introduced into Mid-Lothian, as a growing crop at any rate, until the year 1746, and, when we think what we should do now without potatoes, it is certainly a curious reflection that they should have come into use so lately as they did. Well, these are two practical points in connection with the accounts. I only give them as illustrative of the interest which anybody who cares about the past history of their country can discover in going through the book. I am inclined to think that in future our historians will deal more with books of this kind and utilise more books of this kind than either they have wished or have been able to do hitherto. How Macaulay would have enjoyed and digested such a book as this! It is a perfect picture of manners in itself, and when we come to realise how enormously interesting the history of Scottish manners is to us, we should appreciate, I think, the work of the Society in devoting as much time and space as it has to the production of these household books.

Scottish history, strictly speaking, ends in the year 1707—the history of Scotland as a separate country, with Parliament and institutions of its own. Then there comes another century of social history which, I think, is not inferior to any of the preceding centuries in that particular characteristic. I think you may say there is a separate social history of Scotland quite distinct for fully another century after the Union. If I were to take an arbitrary date, it was down to the Reform Bill of 1832. After that we seem to have got more mingled with the Southern nation, less distinct, less individual, and therefore much less interesting, but if I am right in saying, as I undoubtedly am, that our separate political history ends with the Union, and as I think I am in saying that our separate social history as an interesting and original factor comes pretty nearly to an end with the Reform Bill of 1832, we arrive at the conclusion that Scottish history for the purpose of this Society is, so to speak, a limited area, or, if I may express myself differently, a sealed book—that is to say, something to which there are certain limitations and boundaries, and inside which we should endeavour to explore as assiduously and carefully as possible. Of course it is perfectly true that the Scottish nation is by no means at the end of its tether—it may probably be at the beginning of it—but speaking technically and historically, the area of our Society closes perhaps with the eighteenth century, and, I think, cannot go beyond the first Reform Bill.

Well, I think that is an advantage to any society. It is a dreadful thing to have a society which is like a collection of postage stamps, which can never possibly come to an end. A complete collection of postage stamps has always seemed to me to be, with all respect to collectors, one of the most formidable and hopeless enterprises on which any mortal could embark, for it must always be incomplete. Therefore I rejoice in thinking that our field, though vast, is limited. In that respect it resembles the great book of history, which will last as long as the English language lasts—a definition which perhaps could be applied to no other historical book in the language—I mean Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. There the area is vast, but the area also is limited, and I think we may plume ourselves, and compare ourselves, not without satisfaction, with the position of Gibbon in having an area which is limited, but inside which we ought to expand and to dig and to collect as widely as we can. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I am quite convinced that if that is our idea, and if we don't agree to throw ourselves back too much into the domain of extreme archæology and of charters—which I think I have said before on other occasions, no man or woman ever reads—but if we confine ourselves to developing and exploring the social history of our country, we have got one of the most delightful fields for work which any Scottish society could occupy, and so long as we can find at present, so long as we can continue to find able coadjutors and labourers with us in that field, I am quite sure it will be as unnecessary to use any eloquence at succeeding anniversaries of this Society in moving a resolution implying an unlimited confidence in its success and its future.

Sir THOMAS CLOUSTON, who seconded, made the suggestion that a little attention might be paid to the history of the Orkney and Shetland Islands. They occupied a somewhat unique position; they were a part of Scotland, but never legally became so. They were pledged, and the pledge was never redeemed. There was a large number of documents extant relating to the history of these islands from before 1468 until the end of the seventeenth century. There were certainly, according to the information given to him, probably 150 such documents. There were four or five or more gentlemen who were greatly interested, and who were studying seriously the history of the Orkney Islands from the point of view of these old documents.

LORD ROSEBERY.—I quite agree with Sir Thomas in the great interest of anything connected with the Orkney and Shetland Islands, because, as he justly remarked, they are of Scotland, although not a legal part of Scotland. I am sorry he has thrown out this hint of a new possible foreign complication among those with which we are already familiar, and of course if at any subsequent period they were to be redeemed and any great part of our library consisted of documents relating to them, we might be placed in an anomalous position. I was under the impression there was a society already dealing with this matter in the north. I speak under correction, but I was under the impression that there was a Celtic society which was also publishing a good deal with regard to the Orkney Islands at this time.

SIR THOMAS CLOUSTON said that was so. There were two publications, the old lore and the Saga book, but these were so limited in circulation that in justice to his Scottish fellow-subjects he would desire some of the information collected there should be accessible to the other inhabitants of Scotland.

LORD ROSEBERY.—I must also remind our friend Sir Thomas that our circulation is strictly limited, and we rather pique ourselves upon that point. I was going to make a practical suggestion, that he should ask the gentlemen who he says are zealous in this matter, and willing, I understand, to edit the documents relating to Orkney and Shetland, to communicate with the Council. We would then be able to decide as to whether we could usefully add our exertions to that of the publications already existing.

SIR THOMAS CLOUSTON.—I take the great liberty of correcting you when you use the word Celtic. We have nothing to do with the Celts.

LORD ROSEBERY.—I am aware that they are Scandinavians, but I thought the publication was Celtic.

DR. NEILSON, Glasgow, who moved a vote of thanks to Lord Rosebery, said annual meetings of societies were apt to be dull and formal institutions. It was his Lordship's happy knack which had so constantly in their meetings made the reverse the case. Lord Rosebery had, he thought, since the last annual meeting, acquired a somewhat new reputation as a formidable, drastic, and one might almost say an incendiary critic of books. He was delighted his Lordship found in their productions no occasion for those repressive measures which were suggested in consequence of some observations he had made recently. He was sure the well-earned commendation which had been given to the work and to the fine editing of the work by Mr. Scott Moncrieff, would be of the utmost service to the Society in showing to the world at large that Scotland was helping forward the great cause of social history. He asked them to accord Lord Rosebery their heartiest thanks, recognising that vivifying touch of picturesque historical criticism which had invariably invested their annual meetings with so much interest as to make every one an event in Great Britain.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD seconded, and the vote was heartily accorded.

Lord ROSEBERY, in reply, said—I am much obliged to you for the vote of thanks you have been so good as to pass to me. It always gives me great pleasure to come here, but there is a little difficulty in every year making a speech on Scottish history, when one's acquaintance with it is perhaps not so great as that of many of one's audience. Mr. Neilson referred to some remarks I have made about dead or superannuated books, which caused a considerable amount of perturbation, and which I think have been taken a little too seriously. I don't want anybody to destroy any books they don't want to. I don't want anybody to keep any books they don't want to. I want a sort of freedom. But when I observe the voracious propensity of librarians, who, after all, are collectors—and there is no limit to what a collector may do—when I observe the voracious propensities of librarians, and think of the rate-payers, and of the space which libraries without discrimination must inevitably occupy in the future, I am a little dismayed at the thought that they consider any book good enough to find a place for. My friend Mr. Fraser, the librarian of Aberdeen, has also discussed the matter. He sent me an article in his annual report which referred to this point, and he said no book could be considered quite extinct. He himself had taken the trouble to verify this matter. He had taken a list of fifty books in one particular department of the library, and pointed out that though they might well seem to have been extinct, each of them had been asked for at least once in the course of the last twelve months. That was all perfectly true, but I pointed out to him he had very carefully taken the department of travel as the department from which he would take the test, and I venture to think there is no department of a library in which the books are so rarely dead, if ever dead, as the department of travel. I have never been able to put away any book of travel, however poor it may be, or however apparently jejune its subject. I think that books of travel, if that can be said of any prose books, are almost immortal, and therefore I wish to make this public appeal to Mr. Fraser to try his test in some other department of literature than that of travel. I think I could indicate one or two to him where he would find that some of the books have not been asked for in the last twelve months. I wish he may live to see some of them asked for in the course of his life, for then he will be almost immortal.

The proceedings then terminated.
