O'F THE

TRANSLATOR.

TENAL LAWS, fo confiderable a I part of every fystem of legislation, and of fo great importance to the happinefs, peace and fecurity of every member of fociety, are still to imperfect, and are attended with fo many unneceffary circumftances of cruelty in all nations, that an attempt to reduce them to the ftandard of reafon must be interesting to all mankind. It is not furprifing, then, that this little book hath engaged the attention of all ranks of people in every part of Europe. It is now about eighteen months fince the first publication; in 's which time it hath paffed no lefs than fix editions in the original language; the third 2.2

third of which was printed within fix months after its first appearance. It hath been translated into French; that transflation hath also been feveral times reprinted, and perhaps no book, on any fubject, was ever received with more avidity, more generally read, or more univerfally applauded.

The author is the Marquis BECCARIA, of Milan. Upon confidering the nature of the religion and government under which he lives, the reafons for concealing his name are obvious. The whole was read, at different times, in a fociety of learned men in that city, and was published at their defire. As to the translation, I have preferved the order of the original, except in a paragraph or two, which I have taken the liberty to reftore to the chapters to which they evidently belong, and from which they must have been 'accidentally detached. The French tranflator hath gone much farther; he hath not only transposed every chapter, but every every paragraph in the whole book. But in this, I conceive, he hath affumed a right which belongs not to any tranflator, and which cannot be julfified. His difpofition may appear more fyftematical, but certainly the author has as undoubted a right to the arrangement of his own ideas as to the ideas themfelves; and therefore to deftroy that arrangement, is to pervert his meaning, if he had any meaning in his plan, the contrary to which can hardly be fuppofed.

With regard to the Commentary, attributed to Monf. de Voltaire, my only authority for fuppoing it his, is the voice of the public, which indeed is the only authority we have for molt of his works. Let thole who are acquainted with the peculiarity of his manner judge for themfelves.

The facts above mentioned would preclude all apology for this translation, if any apology were neceffary, for translating into our language a work, which, a 3 from

from the nature of the fubject, must be interefting to every nation; but must be particularly acceptable to the English, from the eloquent and forcible manner in which the author pleads the caufe of liberty, benevolence, and humanity. It may however be objected, that a treatife of this kind is ufelefs in England, where, from the excellence of our laws and government, no examples of cruelty or oppreffion are to be found. But it must alfo be allowed, that much is still wanting to perfect our fystem of legislation; the confinement of debtors, the filth and horror of our prifons, the cruelty of jailors, and the extortion of the petty officers of justice, to all which may be added the melancholy reflection, that the number of criminals put to death in England is much greater than in any other part of Europe, are confiderations which will fufficiently answer every objection. These are my only reafons for endeavouring to diffuse the knowledge of the useful truths contained contained in this little effay; and I fay, with my author, that if I can be infrumental in refcuing a fingle victim from the hand of tyranny or ignorance, his tranfports will fufficiently confole me for the contempt of all mankind.

INTRODUCTION.

IN every human fociety, there is an effort continually tending to confer on one part the height of power and happinefs, and to reduce the other to the extreme of weakness and mifery. The intent of good laws is to oppofe this effort, and to diffuse their influence univerfally and equally. But men generally abandon the care of their most important concerns to the uncertain prudence and difcretion of those, whole interest it is to reject the best and wifest institutions; and it is not till they have been led into a thousand mistakes, in matters the most effential to their lives and liberties, and are weary of fuffering, that they can be induced to apply a remedy to the evils with which they are oppreffed. It is then they begin to conceive, and acknowledge the most palpable truths, which, from their very fimplicity, commonly efcape vulgar minds, incapable of analyfing objects, accustomed to receive impressions without diffinction, and to be determined rather by

by the opinions of others, than by the refult of their own examination.

If we look into hiftory we shall find, that laws which are, or ought to be, conventions bctween men in a ftate of freedom, have been, for the most part, the work of the passions of a few, or the confequences of a fortuitous or temporary neceffity; not dictated by a cool examiner of human nature, who knew how to collect in one point the actions of a multitude, and had this only end in view, the greatest happiness of the greatest number. Happy are those few nations. who have not waited till the flow fucceffion of human viciffitudes should, from the extremity of evil, produce a transition to good; but, by prudent laws, have facilitated the progrefs from one to the other ! And how great are the obligations due from mankind to that philosopher, who, from the obfcurity of his clofet, had the courage to fcatter among the multitude the feeds of uleful truths, fo long unfruitful !

The art of printing has diffufed the knowledge of thofe philolophical truths, by which the relations between fovereigns and their fubjects, and between nations, are difcovered. By this knowledge commerce is animated, and there has fprung up a fpirit of emulation, and indufry, worthy worthy of rational beings. Thefe are the produce of this enlightened age; but the cruelty of pupifhments, and the irregularity of proceeding in criminal cafes, fo principal a part of the legiflation, and fo much neglected throughout Europe, has hardly ever been called in queftion. Errors, accumulated through many centuries, have never been exposed by afcending to general principles; nor has the force of acknowledged truths been ever oppolea to the unbounded licentiouinels of ill-directed power, which has continually produced to many authorized examples of the most unfeeling barbarity. Surely, the groans of the weak, facrificed to the cruel ignorance and indolence of the powerful; the barbarous torments lavished and multiplied with ufelefs feverity, for crimes either not proved, or in their nature impoffible; the filth and horrors of a prifon, increafed by the most cruel tormentor of the miferable, uncertainty, ought to have rouzed the attention of those, whose business is to direct the opinions of mankind.

The immortal Mantequieu has but flightly touched on this fubjedt. Truth, which is eternally the fame, has obliged me to follow the fteps of that great man; but the fludious part of mankind, for whom I write, will eafly di-B 2. ftinguith neceffary to defend it from the ufurpation of each individual, who will always endeavour to. take away from the mais, not only his own portion, but to encroach on that of others. Some motives, therefore, that ftrike the fenfes, were neceffary to prevent the defpotifm of each indidual from plunging fociety into its former chaos. Such motives are the punifhments effablished against the infractors of the laws. I fay, that motives of this kind are neceffary; becaufe experience fhews, that the multitude adopt no established principle of conduct; and because, fociety is prevented from approaching to that diffolution (to which, as well as all other parts of the phyfical and moral world, it naturally tends) only by motives that are the immediate objects of fenfe, and which, being continually prefented to the mind, are fufficient to counterbalance the effects of the paffions of the individual which oppofe the general good. Neither the power of eloquence, nor the fublimest truths, are fufficient to reftrain, for any length of time, those paffions which are excited by the lively impression of present objects.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Right to punifb.

EVERY punifhment, which does not arife from abfolute neceffity, fays the great Montefquieu, is tyrannical. A propolition which may be made more general, thus. Every act of authority of one man over another, for which there is not an abfolute neceffity, is tyrannical. It is upon this, then, that the fovereign's right to punifh crimes is founded; that is, upon the neceffity of defending the public liberty, entrufted to his care, from the ufurpation of individuals; and punifhments are juff in proportion as the liberty, preferved by the fovereign, is facred and valuable.

Let us confult the human heart, and there we fhall find the foundation of the fovereign's right to punifh; for no advantage in moral policy can be lafting, which is not founded on the indelible fentiments of the heart of man. Whatever law-deviates from this principle will always symeet with a refiftance, which will deftroy it in the end; for the finalleft force, continually applied, plied, will overcome the most violent motion communicated to bodies.

No man ever gave up his liberty merely for the good of the public. Such a chimera exifts only in romances. Every individual wifnes, if pollible, to be exempt from the compacts that bind the reft of mankind.

The multiplication of matkind, though flow, being too great for the means which the earth, in its natural flate, offered to fatisfy necefficies, which every day became more numerous, obliged men to feparate again, and form new focieties. Thefe naturally oppoled the firft, and a flate of war was transferred from individuals to nations.

Thus it was necelity that forced men to give up a part of their liberty; it is certain, then, that every individual would chuck to put into the public flock the finalleft portion poffible; as much only as was fufficient to engage others to defendit. The aggregate of theft, the finalleft portions poffible, forms the right of punifing; all that extends beyond this is abufe, not jufface.

Observe, that by juffice I understand nothing more than that bond, which is necessfury to keep the interest of individuals united; without out which, men would return to their original flate of barbarity. All panithments, which exceed the neceflity of preferving this bond, are in their nature unjuft. We thould be cautious how we afficiate with the word juffice, an idea of any thing real, fuch as a phyfical power, or a being that actually exits. I do not, by any means, fpeak of the juffice of God, which is of another kind, and refers immediately to rewards and punithments in a life to come.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

Confequences of the foregoing Principles.

THE laws only can determine the punifument of crimes; and the authority of making penal laws can only refide with the legiflator, who reprefents the whole fociety united by the focial compact. No magiftrate then, (as he is one of the fociety), can, with juffice, inflict on any other member of the fame fociety, punifument that is not ordiated by the laws. But as a punifument, increased beyond the degree fixed by the laws, is the juff punifument, with the addition of another; it follows, that no magiftrate, even under a pretence of zeal, or the public good, flowid increase the punifument already determined by the laws.

If every individual be bound to fociety, fociety is equally bound to him by a contract, which, from its nature, equally binds both paties. This obligation, which defcends from the throne to the cottage, and equally binds the higheft and loweft of mankind, figuites nothing more, than that it is the intereft of all, that conventions, which are ufeful to the greateft number, fload be be punctually obferved. The violation of this compact by any individual, is an introduction to anarchy.

The fovereign, who reprefents the fociety infelf, can only make general laws to bind the members; but it belongs not to him to judge whether any individual has violated the focial compact, or in this cafe there are two parties, one reprefented by the fovereign, who infifts upon the violation of the contract, and the other is the perfon accifed, who denies it. It is neceffary then that there should be a third perfon to decide this conteft; that is to fay, a judge, or magiftrate; from whole determination there should be no appeal; and this determination flouid confit of a fimple affirmation, or negation of fact.

If it can only be proved, that the feverity of punifihments, though not immediately contrary to the public good, or to the end for which they were intended, viz. to prevent crimes, be ufelefs a then fuch feverity would be contrary to thole beneficent virtues, which are the confequence of enlightened reafon, which inflrmfs the fovereign to wifh rather to govern men in a flate of freedom and happinefs, than of flavery. It would alfo be contrary to juffice, and the focial compact. C H A P_a.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Interpretation of Laws.

IUDGES, in criminal cafes, have no right to interpret the penal laws, becaufe they are not legiflators. They have not received the laws from our anceftors as a domeftic tradition, or as the will of a teftator, which his heirs and executors are to obey; but they receive them from a fociety actually exifting, or from the fovereign, its reprefentative. Even the authority of the laws is not founded on any pretended obligation, or ancient convention ; which must be null, as it cannot bind those who did not exist at the time of its inftitution; and unjuft, as it would reduce men, in the ages following, to a herd of brutes, without any power of judging or acting. The laws receive their force and authority from an oath of fidelity, either tacit or expressed, which living fubjects have fworn to their fovereign, in order to reftrain the inteffine fermentation of the private interests of individuals. From hence fprings their true and natural authority. Who then is their lawful interpreter ? The fovereign, that that is, the reprefentative of fociety, and not the judge, whole office is only to examine, if a man have, or have not, committed an action contrary to the laws.

In every criminal caufe the judge (hould reafon fyllogifically. The major (hould be the general law is the minor the conformity of the action, or its opposition to the laws; the conchyford, liberty, or punishment. If the judge be obliged by the imperfection of the laws, or chufes to make any other, or more fyllogifms than this, it will be an introduction to uncertainty.

There is nothing more dangerous than the common axiom : the fpirit of the laws is to be confidered. To adopt it is to give way to the torrent of opinions. This may feem a paradox to vulgar minds, which are more flrongly at feefted by the fmalleft diorder before their eyes, than by the moft pernicious, though remote, confequences produced by one falle principle adopted by a nation.

Our knowledge is in proportion to the number of our ideas. The more complex thefe are, the greater is the variety of politons in which they may be confidered. Every man hath his own particular point of view, and at different C times fees the fame objects in very different lights. The fpirit of the laws will then be the refult of the good or bad logic of the judge; and this will depend on his good or bad digettion ; on the violence of his paffions; on the rank and condition of the abufed, or on his connections with the judge; and on all those circumstances which change the appearance of objects in the fluctuating mind of man. Hence we fee the fate of a delinquent changed many times in paffing through the different courts of judicature, and his life and liberty victims to the falle ideas or ill humour of the judge; who mistakes the vague refult of his own confused reafoning, for the just interpretation of the laws. We fee the fame crimes punished in a different manner at different times in the fame tribunals; the confequence of not having confulted the conftant and invariable voice of the laws, but the erring inftability of arbitrary interpretation.

The diforders that may arife from a rigorous obfervance of the letter of penal-laws, are not to be compared with thofe produced by the interpretation of them. The first are temporary inconveniences which will oblige the legislator to correct the letter of the law, the want of presileness and uncertainty of which has occasioned ed thefe diforders; and this will put a ftop to the fatal liberty of explaining; the fource of arbitrary and venal declamations. When the code of laws is once fixed, it thould be obferved in the literal fende, and nothing more is left to the judge than to determine, whether an action be, or be not, conformable to the written law. When the rule of right, which ought to direct the actions of the philosopher as well as the ignorant, is a matter of controverfy, not of fact, the people are flaves to the magiftrates. The despotifm of this multitude of tyrants is more infupportable, the lefs the diftance is between the oppreffor and the oppreffed; more fatal than that of one, for the tyranny of many is not to be shaken off, but by having recourse to that of one alone. It is more cruel, as it meets with more opposition, and the cruelty of a tyrant is not in proportion to his ftrength, but to the obstacles that oppose him.

Thefe are the means by which fecurity of perfoa and property is beft obtained; which is juft, as it is the purpole of uniting in fociety; and it is utfall, as each perfon may calculate exaCHy the inconveniencies attending every crime. By thefe means fubjects will acquire a fpirit of independence and liberty; however it may appear C_2 to to those, who dare to call the weakness of fubmitting blindly to their capricious and interested opinions, by the facred name of virtue.

Thefe principles will difpleafe those who have made it a rule with themfelves, to transmit to their inferiors the tyranuy they fuffer from their fuperiors. I fhould have every thing to fear, if tyrants were to read my book; but tyrants never read.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of the Obscurity of Laws.

IF the power of interpreting laws be an avil, obscurity in them must be another, as the former is the confequence of the latter. This evil will be still greater, if the laws be written in a language upknown to the people; who, being ignorant of the confequences of their own actions, become neceffarily dependent on a few," who are interpreters of the laws, which, inftead of being public and general, are thus rendered private and particular. What must we think of mankind when we reflect, that fuch is the established custom of the greatest part of our polifhed and enlightened Europe ? Crimes will be lefs frequent, in proportion as the code of laws is more univerfally read, and underflood ; for there is no doubt, but that the eloquence of the paffions is greatly affifted by the ignorance and uncertainty of punifhments.

Hence it follows, that without written laws, no fociety will ever acquire a fixed form of government, in which the power is vefted in the C_3 whole, whole, and not in any part of the fociety; and in which the laws are not to be altered but by the will of the whole, nor corrupted by the force of private intereft. Experience and reafon fnew us, that the probability of human traditions diminifhes in proportion as they are diftant from their fources. How then can laws refult the inevitable force of time, if there be not a lafting monument of the focial compact?

Hence we fee the ufe of printing, which alone makes the public, and not a few individuals, the guardians and defenders of the laws. It is this art which, by diffusing literature, has gradually diffipated the gloomy fpirit of cabal and intrigue. To this art it is owing, that the atrocious crimes of our anceftors, who were alternately flaves and tyrants, are become lefs frequent. Those who are acquainted with the hiftory of the two or three last centuries, may observe, how from the lap of luxury and effeminacy have fprung the most tender virtues, humanity, benevolence, and toleration of human errors. They may contemplate the effects of, what was fo improperly called, ancient fimplicity and good faith; humanity groaning under implacable fuperftition : the avarice and ambition of a few, ftaining ing with human blood the thrones and palaces of kings; fecret treafons, and public maffacres; every noble a tyrant over the people; and the minifiers of the golpel of Chrift bathing their hands in blood, in the name of the God of all mercy. We may talk as we pleafe of the corruption and degeneracy of the prefent age, but happily we fee no fuch horrid examples of cruelty and opprefilon.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Proportion between Crimes and Punifoments.

IT is not only the common intereff of mamkind that erimes fhould not be committed, but that crimes of every kind thould be lefs frequents, in proportion to the evil they produce to fociety, Therefore, the means made ufe of by the legiflature to prevent crimes, fhould be more powerful, in proportion as they are deftructive of the public factery and happinefis, and as the inducements to commit them are fironger. Therefore there ought to be a fixed proportion between crimes and punifilments.

It is impolible to prevent entirely all the diorders which the pallons of mankind catfe in fociety. These difores increase in proportion to the number of people, and the oppolition of private interefls. If we confult hildory, we shall find them increasing, in every flate, with the extent of dominion. In political arithmetic, it is neceffary to fabfitute a calculation of probabilities to mathematical exactness. That force while, continually impels us to our own private intereft, like gravity, acts inceffantly, unlefs it meets with an obflacle to oppole it. The effects of this force are the confided feries of human actions. Punithments, which I would call political obfracles, prevent the fatal effects of private intereft, without defroying the impelling carfe, which is that fendibility in/eparable from man. The legithator acts, in this cafe, like a fkilful architect, who endeavours to counteract the force of gravity by combining the circumflances which may contribute to the frength of his edifice.

The neceffity of uniting in fociety being granted, together with the conventions, which the oppolite interefts of individuals muft neceffarily require, a scale of crimes may be formed, of which the first degree should confist of those which immediately tend to the diffolution of fociety, and the laft, of the fmalleft poffible injuffice done to a private member of that fociety. Between these extremes will be comprehended, all actions contrary to the public good, which are called criminal, and which defcend by infenfible degrees, decreasing from the highest to the lowest. If mathematical calculation could be applied to the obfcure and infinite combinations of human actions, there might be a corresponding scale of punishments defcending from the greatest to the leaft : but it will be fufficient that the wife legiflator mark the principal divisions, without difturbing the order, left to crimes of the firft degree gree be affigned punifhments of the laft. If there were an exact and univerfal feale of crimes and punifhments, we fhould then have a common meafure of the degree of liberty and favery, humanity and cruelty, of different nakons.

Any action, which is not comprehended In the above-mentioned feale, will not be called a enime, or punitished as fuck, except by those who have an intereft in the denomination. The uncertainty of the extreme points of this feale, hath produced a fyftem of morality which contradicts the laws; a multitude of laws that contradict each other; and many which expose the beft men to the fevereft punithments, rendering the ideas of wire and wirtue vague and fluctuatings, and even their exiftence doubtful. Hence that fatal lethargy of policial bodies, which termisnates in their deffruction.

Whoever reads, with a philofophic eye, the hiftory of nations, and their laws, will generally, find, that the ideas of virtue and vice, of a good or a bad citizen, change with the revolution of ages; not in proportion to the alteration of circumflances, and confequently conformable to the common good; but in proportion to the paffions and errors by which the different law-givers were fuccefilively influenced. He will frequently oblerve, that the paffions and vices of opt age, are are the foundation of the morality of the following; that violent paffion, the offspring of fanaticism and enthusiasm, being weakened by time, which reduces all the phenomena of the natural and moral world to an equality, become, by degrees, the prudence of the age, and an ufeful inftrument in the hands of the powerful or artful politician. Hence the uncertainty of our notions of honour and virtue; an uncertainty which will ever remain, becaufe they change with the revolutions of time, and names furvive the things they originally fignified; they change with the boundaries of ftates, which are often the fame both in physical and moral geography. Pleafure and pain are the only fprings of action in beings endowed with fenfibility. Even among the motives which incite men to acts of religion, the invisible Legislator has ordained rewards and punifhments. From a partial diffribution of thefe will arife that contradiction, fo little observed, because so common; I mean, that of punishing by the laws the crimes which the laws have occasioned. If an equal punishment be ordained for two crimes that injure fociety in different degree, there is nothing to deter men from committing the greater, as often as it is attended with greater advantage.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

Of estimating the Degree of Crimes.

THE foregoing reflections authorife me to affert, that crimes are only to be meafured by the injury done to fociety.

They err, therefore, who imagine that a crime is greater, or lefs, according to the intention of the perfon by whom it is committed; for this will depend on the actual impreffion of objects on the fenfes, and on the previous disposition of the mind; both which will vary in different perfons, and even in the fame perfon at different times, according to the fucceffion of ideas, paffions, and circumstances. Upon that fystem, it would be necessary to form, not only a particular code for every individual, but a new penal law for every crime. Men, often with the beft intention, do the greatest injury to fociety, and with the worst. do it the most effential fervices.

Others have estimated crimes rather by the dignity of the perfon offended, than by their confequences to fociety. If this were the true ftandard, the fmallest irreverence to the divine Being ought to be punished with infinitely more feverity, than the affaffination of a monarch. In

In fhort, others have imagined, that the greatnefs of the fin should aggravate the crime. But the fallacy of this opinion will appear on the flighteff confideration of the relations between man and man, and between God and man. The relations between man and man are relations of equality. Neceffity alone hath produced, from the oppolition of private paffions and interefts, the idea of public utility, which is the foundation of human justice. The other are relations of dependence, between an imperfect creature and his Creator, the most perfect of beings, who has referved to himfelf the fole right of being both lawgiver and judge; for he alone can, without injustice, be, lat the fame time, both one and the other. If he hath decreed eternal punifhments for those who difobey his will, shall an infect dare to put himfelf in the place of divine juffice, to pretend to punish for the Almighty, who is himfelf all-fufficient; who cannot receive impressions of pleasure or pain, and who alone, of all other beings, acts without being acted upon? The degree of fin depends on the malignity of the heart, which is impenetrable to finite beings. How then can the degree of finferve as a ftandard to determine the degree of crimes? If that were admitted, men may punish when God pardons, and pardon when God condemns; and thus act in opposition to the fupreme Being.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Division of Crimes.

WE have proved, then, that crimes arc to be estimated by the injury done to fociety. This is one of those palpable truths, which, though evident to the meaneft capacity, yet, by a combination of circumstances, are only known to a few thinking men in every nation, and in every age. But opinions, worthy only of the defpotifin of Afia, and paffions armed with power and authority, have, generally by infenfible and fometimes by violent impreffions on the timid credulity of men, effaced those fimple ideas which perhaps conflituted the first philosophy of infant fociety. Happily the philosophy of the prefent enlightened age feems again to conduct us to the fame principles, and with that degree of certainry which is obtained by a rational examination, and repeated experience.

A ferupulous adherence to order would require, that we hould now examine and diffinguith the different fpecies of crimes, and the modes of punithment; but they are fo variable in their nature, from the different circumflances of of ages and countries, that the detail would be tirefome and endlefs. It will be fufficient for my purpole, to point out the moft general principles, and the moft common and dangerous crrors, in order to undeceive, as well thole who from a mithaken real for liberty, would introduce anarchy and confufion, as thole who pretend to reduce fociety in general to the regularity of a convent.

Some crimes are immediately deftructive of fociety, or its reprefentative; others attack the private fecurity of the life, property, or honour of individuals; and a third clafs confifts of fuch actions as are contrary to the laws which relate to the general good of the community.

The first, which are of the higheft degree, as they are most defiructive to fociety, are called cimes of *Leze-majeljs. Tyranny and ignorance, which have confounded the cleareft terms and ideas, have given this apellation to crimes of a different nature, and confequently have eltablifhed the fame punifment for each; and on this occafion, as on a thoutand others, men have been facrificed victums to a word. Every crime, even of the most private nature, injures fociety; but every crime does not threaten its immediate deffruction. Moral, as well as phyfical actions, have their fphere of activity differently circumforibed, like all the movements of nature, by time and fpace; it is therefore a fophiffical interpretation, the common philofophy of flaves, that would confound the limits of things eftablifted by eternal truth.

To thele fucced crimes which are defluitive of the fecurity of individuals. This fecurity being the principal end of all fociety, and to which every citizen hath an undoubted right, it becomes indifientably neceffary, that to thele crimes the greateft of punilhments thould be affigued.

The opinion, that every member of fociety has a right to do any thing that is not contrary to the laws, without fearing any other inconveniences than those which are the natural contequences of the action itfelf, is a political dogma, which should be defended by the laws, inculcated by the magistrates, and believed by the people; a facred dogma, without which there can be no lawful fociety; a just recompence for our facrifice of that universal liberty of action. common to all fenfible beings, and only limited by our natural powers. By this principle, our minds become free, active, and vigorous; by this alone we are infpired with that virtue which knows no fear, fo different from that pliant prudence.

dence, worthy of those only who can bear a precarious exiftence.

Attempts, therefore, against the life and liberty of a citizen, are crimes of the higheft nature. Under this head we comprehend not only affaffinations and robberies committed by the populace, but by grandees and magistrates; whose example acts with more force, and at a greater distance, destroying the ideas of justice and duty among the fubjects, and fubflituting that of the right of the ftrongeft, equally dangerous to those who exercife it and to those who fuffer.

CHAP: IX.

Of Honour.

THERE is a remarkable difference between the civil laws, those jealous guardians of life and property, and the laws of, what is called, honour, which particularly respects the opinion of others. Honour is a term, which has been the foundation of many long and brilliant reaionings, without annexing to it any precife or fixed idea. How miferable is the condition of the human mind, to which the most distant, and leaft effential matters, the revolution of the heavenly bodies, are more diffinctly known, than the most interesting truths of morality, which are always confused and fluctuating, asthey happen to be driven by the gales of paffion, or received and transmitted by ignorance ! But this will ceafe to appear ftrange, if it be confidered, that as objects, when too near the eye, appear confuled, fo the too great vicinity of the ideas of morality, is the reafon why the fimple ideas, of which they are composed, are cafily confounded; but which must be feparated, before we can investigate the phenomena of human human fenfibility; and the intelligent obferver of human nature will ceafe to be furprifed, that fo many ties, and fuch an apparatus of morality, are neceflary to the fecurity and happinefs of mankind.

Honour, then, is one of thole complex ideas, which are an aggregate not only of fimple ones, but of others fo complicated, that in their various modes of affecting the human mind, they fometimes exclude part of the elements of which they are compoled; retaining only fome few of the molt common, as many algebraic quantities admit one common dividor. To find this common dividor of the, different ideas artached to the word honour, it will be neceffary to go back to the original formation of forciety.

The firft laws, and the firft magiltrates, owed their exilence to the necefity of preventing the diforders, which the natural defpotifm of individuals would unavoidably produce. This was the object of the eftabliftment of fociety, and was either in reality, or in appearance, the principal defign of all codes of laws, even the moft pernicious. But the more intimate con-, nections of men, and the progrets of their knowledge, gave rife to an infinite number of necefities, and mutual acts of friendflip, between tween the members of fociety. These necessities : were not forefeen by the laws, and could not be fatisfied by the actual power of each individual. At this epocha began to be established the defpotifm of opinion, as being the only means of obtaining those benefits which the law could not procure, and of removing those evils, against which the laws were no fecurity. It is opinion, that tormentor of the wife and the ignorant, that has exalted the appearance of virtue above virtue itfelf. Hence the effeem of men becomes not only ufeful, but necessary, to every one, to prevent his finking below the common level. The ambitious man grafps at it, as being neceffary to his defigns ; the vain man fues for it, as a testimony of his merit; the honest man demands it as his due; and the most men confider it as neceffary to their exiftence. .

Honour, being produced after the formation of fociety, could not be a part of the common depofite, and therefore, whill we add under its influence, we return, for that inflant, to a flate of nature, and withdraw ourfelves from the laws, which in this cafe are infufficient for our protection.

Hence it follows, that in extreme political liberty, and in abfolute defpointin, all ideas of honour difappear, or are confounded with others.

thers. In the fuff cafe, reputation becomes ufelefs from the depotifin of the laws; and in the feccond the depotifin of one man, annulling etvil exifience, reduces the reft to a precarious and temporary perforality. Honour, then, is one of the fundamental principles of thofe monarchies, which are a limited defpotifin, and in thefe, like revolutions in defpotic flates, it is a momentary return to a flate of 'nature, and original equality.

CHAP. X.

Of Duelling.

FROM the neceffity of the effeem of others, have airlen fingle combats, and they have been eftablished by the anarchy of the laws. "They are thought to have been unknown to the ancients; perhaps becaufe they did not affemble in their temples, in their theatres, or with their friends, fufpicioufly armed with fwords; and, perhaps, becaufe fingle combats were a common fpectacle, exhibited to the people by gladiators, who were flaves, and whom freemen difdaned. to imitate.

In vain have the laws endeavoured to abolifu this cufform, by punifing the offenders with death. A man of honour, deprived of the effect of others, forefees that he muß be reduced, either to a folitary exifience, infupportable to a focial creature, or become the object of perpetual infult; confiderations fufficient to overcome the fear of death.

What is the reafon that duels are not fo frequent among the common people, as amongft the great? Not only becaufe they do not wear fwords.

fivords, but becaufe to men of that clafs reputation is of lefs importance than it is to thole of a higher rank, who commonly regard each other with diftruft and jealoufy.

It may not be without its ufe to repeat here, what has been mentioned by other writers, wiz. that the beft method of preventing this crime is to punith the aggreffor, that is, the perfon who gave occafion to the duel, and to acquit him, who, without any fault on his fide, is obliged to defend that, which is not fufficiently fecured to him by the laws.

CHAP. XI.

Of Crimes which disturb the public Tranquillity.

ANOTHER clafs of crimes are those which diffurb the public tranquility and the quiet of the citizens, fuch as turnuls and riots in the public fireets, which are intended for commerce and the paffage of the inhabitants, the difcourfes of fanatics, which roule the paffions of the carious multitude, and gain firength from the number of their hearers, who, though deaf to calm and folid reafoning, are always affected by obfeure and myfterious enthufafm.

The illumination of the fireets, during the night, at the public expence; guards flationed in different quarters of the city, the plain and moral difcourfes of religion, referved for the filence and tranquility of churches, and protected by authority; and harangues in fupport of the interefl of the public, delivered only at the general meetings of the nation, in parliament, or where the fovereign refides; are all means to prevent the dangerous effects of the milguided paffions of the people. Thefe should be the principal objects of the vigilance of a magit firste, ftrate, and which the French call Police ; but if this magistrate should act in an arbitrary manner, and not in conformity to the code of laws, which ought to be in the hand of every member of the community, he opens a door to tyranny, which always furrounds the confines of political liberty.

I do not know of any exception to this general axiom, that Every member of the fociety (bould know when be is criminal, and when innocent. If cenfors, and, in general, arbitrary magiftrates, be neceffary in any government, it proceeds from fome fault in the conflitution. The uncertainty of crimes hath facrificed more victims to fecret tyranny, than have ever fuffered by public and folemn cruelty.

What are, in general, the proper punifhments for crimes? Is the punishment of death really uleful, or neceffary for the fafety or good order of fociety? Are tortures and torments confiftent with justice, or do they answer the end propofed by the laws? Which is the beft method of preventing crimes? Are the fame punifhments equally useful at all times? What influence have they on manners? These problems should be folved with that geometrical precifion which the mift of fophiftry, the feduction of eloquence, and the timidity of doubt are unable to refift. If If I have no other merit than that of having firft prefented to my country, with a greater degree of evidence, what other nations have written, and are beginning to practike, I thall account myfelf fortunate; but if, by fupporting the rights of mankind and of invincible truth, I thall contribute to fave from the agonies of death one unfortunate victim of tyranny, or of ignorance, equally fatal, his bleffing, and tears of tranfport, will be a fufficient confolation to me for the contempt of all mankind.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Intent of Punifoments.

FROM the foregoing confiderations it is evident, that the intent of punifhments is not to torment a fenfible being, nor to undo a crime already committed. Is it poffible that orments, and ufelefs cruelty, the influmments of furious finanticifin, or of impotency of tyrants, can be authorized by a political body? which, fo far from being influenced by paffion, flould be the cool moderator of the paffions of individuals. Can the groans of a tortured wretch recal the time paft, or reverfe the crime he has committed ?

The end of punifhment, therefore, is no other, than to prevent others from committing the like offence. Such punifhments, therefore, and fuch a mode of inflicting them, ought to be cholen, as will make ftrongeft and moft lafting imprefitions on the minds of others, with the lasft torment to the body of the criminal.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Credibility of Witneffes.

TO determine exactly the credibility of a witnefs, and the force of evidence, is an important point in every good legiflation. Every man of common fenfe, that is, every one whofe ideas have fome connexion with each other, and whofe fenfations are conformable to those of other men, may be a witness; but the credibility of his evidence will be in proportion as he is interefted in declaring or concealing the truth. Hence it appears, how frivolous is the reafoning of those, who reject the testimony of women on account of their weaknefs; how puerile it is, not to admit the evidence of those who are under fentence of death, because they are dead in law; and how irrational, to exclude perions branded with infamy: for in all thefe safes they ought to be credited, when they have no intereft in giving falle teftimony.

The credibility of a witnefs, then, fhould only diminifh in proportion to the hatred, friendfhip, or connexions fubfifting between him and the delinquent. One witnefs is not fufficient; for whilt:

whilf the accufed denies what the other affirms, truth remains fufpended, and the right that every one has to be believed innocent, turns the balance in his favour.

The credibility of a witnefs is the lefs, as the atrociousnels of the crime is greater, from the improbability of its having been committed; as in cafes of witchcraft, and acts of wanton cruelty. The writers on penal laws have adopted a contrary principle, viz, that the credibility of a witnefs is greater, as the crime is more atrocious. Behold their inhuman maxim, dictated by the most cruel imbecility. In atrocifimis, leviores conjectura sufficiunt, & licet judici jura transgredi. Let us tranflate this fentence, that mankind may fee one of the many unreafonable principles to which they are ignorantly fubiect. In the most atrocious crimes the slightest conjectures are fufficient, and the judge is allowed to exceed the limits of the law. 'The abfund practices of legiflators are often the effect of timidity, which is a principal fource of the contradictions of mankind. The legislators, (or rather lawyers, whole opinions, when alive, were interested and venal, but which after their death become of decifive authority, and are fovereign arbiters of the lives and fortunes of men), terrified by the condemnation of fome innocent perfon, have bur-E 3 dened .

dened the law with pompous and ufelefs formalities, the forupulous obfervance of which will placeanarchical impunity on the throne of juffice; at other times, perplexed by atrocious crimes of difficult proof, they imagined themfelves under a neceffity of fuperfeding the very formalities eflabilithed by themfelves; and thus, at one time, with defpotic impatience, and at another with feminine timidity, they transform their folema ludgments into a game of hazard.

But to return. In the cafe of witchcraft, it is much more probable, that a humber of men flouid be deceived, than that any perion fhould exercife a power which God hath refufed to every created being. In like manner, in cafes of wanton cruelty, the prefumption is always againft the accufer, without fome motive of fear or hate. There are no fpontaneous or fuperfluous fentiments in the heart of man; they are all the uefult of imprefilons on the fenfes.

The credibility of a witnefs may alfo be diminified, by his being a member of a private ricety, whole cuftoms and principles of conduct are either not known, or are different from thofe of the public. Such a man has not only his own paffions, but thofe of the fociety of which he is aemember.

Finally,

Finally, the credibility of a witness is null. when the queftion relates to the words of a criminal; for the tone of voice, the gefture, all that precedes, accompanies and follows the different ideas which men annex to the fame words, may fo alter and modify a man's difcourfe, that it is almost impossible to repeat them precifely in the manner in which they were fpoken. Befides, violent and uncommon actions, fuch as real crimes, leave a trace in the multitude of circumftances that attend them, and in their effects; but words remain only in the memory of the hearers, who are commonly negligent or preindiced. It is infinitely eafier then to found an acculation on the words, than on the actions of a man; for in thefe, the number of circumftances, urged against the accused, afford him variety of means of justification.

CHAP. XIV.

Of Evidence and the Proofs of a Crime, and of the Form of Judgment.

THE following general theorem is of great use in determining the certainty of fact. When the proofs of a crime are dependent on each other, that is, when the evidence of each witnels, taken separately, proves nothing; or when all the proofs are dependent upon oncy the number of proofs neither increase nor diminish the probability of the fact; for the ion- of the whole is no greater than the force of that on which they depend; and it this fails, they all fall to the ground. When the proofs are independent on each other, the proofs are independent on each other, the probability of the fact increases in proportion to the number of proofs; for the fallhood of one does not diminish the veracity of another.

It may feem extraordinary, that I fpeak of probability with regard to crimes, which, to de-, ferve a punifhment, muft be certain. But this paradox.will vanifh, when it is confidered, that, friftly fpeaking, moral certainty is only probability; but which is called a certainty, becaufe every man in his fenfes affents to it from an habit bit produced by the neceffity of acting, and which is anterior to all fpeculation. That certainty which is neceffary to decide that the accufed is guilty, is the very filme which determines every man in the moft important transactions of his life.

The proofs of a crime may be divided into two claffes, perfect and imperfect. I call those perfect which exclude the poffibility of innocence; imperfect; those which do not exclude this poffibility. Of the firth, one cally is fufficient for condemnation; of the lecond, as many are required as form a perfect proof; that is to fay, that though each of thele, feparately taken, does not exclude the poffibility of innocence, it is nevertheless excluded by their union. It found be allo observed, that the imperfect proofs, of which the accufed, if innocent, might clear himfelf, and does not, become perfect.

Buckt is much caller to feel this moral certainty of proofs, than to define it exacitly. For, this reafon, I thiak it an excellent law whicheftablifthes affiftants to the principal judge, and those chosen by lot; for that ignorance, which judges by its feelings, is less fubject to error, than the knowledge of the laws which judges by opinion. Where the laws are clear and precife.

cife, the office of the judge is merely to afcertain the fact. If, in examining the proofs of a crime, acutenefs and dexterity be required; if clearnefs and precifion be neceflary in fumming up the refult; to judge of the refult itelf, nothing is wanting but plain and ordinary good fenfe, a lefs fallacions guide than the knowledge of a judge, accuftomed to find guilty, and to reduce all things to an artificial lyftem, borrowed from his Atudies. Happy the nation, where the knowledge of the law is not a fcience!

It is an admirable law which ordains, that every man shall be tried by his peers; for when life, liberty and fortune are in question, the fentiments, which a difference of rank and fortune infpire, fhould be filent; that fuperiority with which the fortunate look upon the unfortunate, and that envy with which the inferior regard their fuperiors, fhould have no influence. But when the crime is an offence against a fellow-fubject, one half of the judges fhould be peers to the accused, and the other peers to the person offended. So that all private intereft, which, in fpite of ourfelves, modifies the appearance of objects, even in the eyes of the most equitable, is counteracted, and nothing remains to turn afide the direction of truth and the laws. It is also juft. that the accused should have the liberty of excluding cluding a certain number of his judges. Where this liberty is enjoyed for a long time, without any inftance to the contrary, the criminal feems to condemn himfelf.

All trials fhould be public, that opinion, which is the befl, or, perhaps, the only cement of fociety, may curb the authority of the powerful, and the paffions of the judge; and that the people may fay, "We are protected by the laws; we " are not flaves:" a fentiment which infpires courage, and which is the befl tribute to a fovereign who knows his real intereft. I fhall not enter into particulars. There may be fome perfons who expect that I fhould fay all that can be faid upon this fubject; to fuch, what I have already written muth be unintelligible.

CHAP. XV.

Of fecret Acculations.

SECRET accufations are a manifest abuse, but confecrated by cuftom in many nations, where, from the weaknefs of the government, they are necesfary. This cuftom makes men falfe and treacherous. Whoever fuspects another to be an informer, beholds in him an enemy; and, from thence, mankind are accultomed to difguife their real fentiment; and from the habit of concealing them from others, they at last even hide them from themfelves. Unhappy are those, who have arrived at this point ! Without any certain and fixed principles to guide them, they fluctuate in the vaft fea of opinion, and are bufied only in escaping the monsters which furround them; to those, the prefent is always embittered by the uncertainty of the future; deprived of the pleafures of tranquillity and fecurity, fome fleeting moments of happinefs, fcattered thinly through their wretched lives, confole them for the mifery of existing. Shall we, amongst fuch men, find intrepid foldiers to defend their king and country? Amongst fuch men, shall we find incorruptible corruptible magifurates, whe, with the fpirit of freedom and patriotic eloquence, will fupport and explain the true intereft of their fovereign; who, with the tributes, offer up at the throne the love and bleffing of the people, and thus beflow on the palaces of the great, and the humble cottage, peace and fecurity; and to the induffrious a profpect of bettering their lot, that uffelt ferment and vital principle of flates?

Who can defend himfelf from calumny, armed with that impenetrable fixed of tyranny, fecrecy? What a miferable government muft that be, where the fovereign fufpects an enemy in every fubject, and, to fecure the tranquillity of the public, is obliged to facrifice the repofe of every individual!

By what arguments is it pretended, that fecret accufations may be juffifed? The public fafety, fay they, and the fecurity and maintenance of the eftablifhed form of government. But what a frange conflictuion is that, where the government, which hath in its favour not only power but opinion, full more efficacious, yet fears its own fubjects? The indemnity of the informer. Do not the laws defend him fufficiently; and are there fubjects more powerfal than the laws? The neceffity of protecting the informer from infamy. Then fecret calumny is authorifed, and punished only when public. The nature of the crime. If actions, indifferent in themfelves, or even useful to the public, were called crimes, both the accufation and the trial could never be too fecret. But can there be any crime, committed against the public, which ought not to be publicly punified? I refpect all governments; and I fpeak not of any one in particular. Such may fometimes be the nature of circumftances, that when abuses are inherent in the conftitution, it may be imagined, that to rectify them would be to deftroy the conftitution itfelf. But were I to diffate new laws in a remote corner of the universe, the good of posterity, ever prefent to my mind, would hold back my trembling hand, and prevent me from authorifing fecret accufations.

Public accufations, fays Monte/quien, are more conformable to the nature of a republic, where easl for the public good is the principal paflon of a citizen, than of a monarchy, in which, as this featiment is very feeble, from the nature of the government, the best effablifument is that of commiffioners, who, in the name of the public, accufe the infractors of the laws. But in all governments, as well in a republic as in a monarchy, the punifument, due to the crime of which ont accuies another, ought to be inflicted on the informer. CHAP

CHAP. XVI.

Of Torture.

THE torture of a criminal, during the courfe of his trial, is a cruelty confecrated by cuffom in moft nations. It is ufed with an intent either to make him confess his crime, or explain fome contradictions, into which he had been led during his examination; or difeover his accomplices; or for fome kind of metaphyfical and incomprehenfible purgation of infamy; or, finally, in order to difeover other crimes, of which he is not accufed, but of which he may be guilty.

No mart can be judged a criminal until he be found guilty, nor can fociety take from him the public protection, until it have been proved that he has violated the conditions on which it wasgranted. What right, then, but that of power, can authorife the puilthment of a critzen, folong as there remains any doubt of his guilt? The dilemma is frequent. Either he is guilty, or not guilty. If guilty, he flowld only fuffer the puilthment ordained by the laws, and torture becomes ufelefs, as his confedfion is unneceffary. If he be not guilty, you torture the F a innocent: innocent; for, in the eye of the law, every man is innocent; whole crime has not been proved. Befides, it is confounding all relations, to expect that a man fhould be both the accufer and accufed; and that pain fhould be the teft of truth, as if truth refided in the mulcles and fibres of a wretch in torture. By this method, the robuft will efcape, and the feeble be condemmed. Thefe are the inconveniences of this pretended teft of truth, worthy only of a cannibal; and which the Romans, in many refpects barbarous, and whole favage virtue has been too much admired, referved for the flaves alone.

What is the political intention of punifiments? To terrify, and to be an example to others. Is this intention answered, by thus privately torturing the guilty and the innocent? It is doubtlefs of importance, that no crime fhould remain unpunished; but it is useles to make a public example of the author of a crime hid in darknefs. A crime already committed, and for which there can be no remedy, can only be punifhed by a political fociety, with an intention that no hopes of impunity fhould induce others to commit the fame. If it be true, that the number of those, who, from fear or virtue, respect the laws, is greater than of those by whom they are violated, the rifk of torturing an innocent perfon perfon is greater, as there is a greater probability that, ceteris paribus, an individual hath obferved, than that he hath infringed the laws.

There is another ridiculous motive for torture, namely, to purge a man from infamy. Ought fuch an abute to be tolerated in the eighteenth centur? - Can pain, which is a fenlation, have any connection with a moral fendiment, a matter of opinion? Perhaps the rack may be confidered as a refiner's furnace.

It is not difficult to trace this fenfelefs law to its origin; for an abfurdity, adopted by a whole nation, must have fome affinity with other ideas, eftablished and respected by the fame nation. This cuftom feems to be the offspring of religion, by which mankind, in all nations and in all ages, are fo generally influenced. We are taught by our infallible church, that those ftains of fin, contracted through human frailty, and which have not deferved the eternal anger of the Almighty, are to be purged away, in another life, by an incomprehensible fire. Now infamy is a ftain, and if the punifhments and fire of purgatory can take away all fpiritual flains, why fhould not the pain of torture take away those of a civil . nature? I imagine, that the confession of a criminal, which in fome tribunals is required, as being effential to his condemnation, has a fimilar F 2 origin, origin, and has been taken from the myflerious tribunal of penitence, where the confelion of fins is a neceflary part of the facrament. Thus have men abufed the unerring light of revelation; and in the times of tractable ignorance, having no other, they naturally had recourte to it on every occafion, making the moft remote and abfurd applications. Moreover, infamy is a fentiment regulated neither by the laws nor by reafon, but entirely by opinion. But terture renders the vi6tim infamous, and therefore cannot take infamy away.

Another intention of torture is, to oblige the fuppofed criminal to reconcile the contradictions into which he may have fallen during his examination; as if the dread of punifhment, the uncertainty of his fate, the folemnity of the court, the majefly of the judge, and the ignorance of the acculed, were not abundantly fufficient to account for contradictions, which are fo common to men even in a flate of tranquillity; and which mult neceffarily be multiplied by the perturbation of the mind of a man, entirely engaged in the thought of faving himfelf from imminent danger.

This infamous teft of truth is a remaining monument of that ancent and favage legillation, in which trials by fire, by boiling water, or the unceruncertainty of combats, were called Judgmentr of God; as if the links of that eternal chain, whole beginning is in the breaft of the firft cante of all things, could never be difunited by the influtions of men. The only difference between torture, and trials by fire and boiling water, is, that the event of the firft depends on the will of the accufed; and of the fecond, on a fact entirely phylical and external: but this difference is apparent only, not real. A man on the rack, in the convoltions of torture, has it as little in his power to declare the truth, as, in former times, to prevent without fraud the effect of fire or of boiling water.

Every act of the will is invariably in proportion to the force of the imprefilm on our fenfes. The imprefilm of pain, then, may increafe to fuch a degree, that, occupying the mind entirely, it will comple the fufferer to use the fhorteff method of frecing binnelf from torment. His anfwer, therefore, will be an effect as neceffary as that of fire or boiling water; and he will accufe himfelf of crimes of which he is innocent. So that the very means employed to diffinguith the innocent from the guilty, will most effectually defroy all difference between them.

It would be fuperfluous to confirm thefe reflections by examples of innocent perfons, who from from the agony of torture have confelled themfelves guilty: innumerable inflances may be found in all nations, and in every age. How amazing, that mankind have always neglected to draw the natural conclusion! Lives there a man who, if he have carried his thoughts ever fo little beyond the neceffities of life, when he reflects on fuch cruelty, is not tempted to fly from fociety, and return to his natural flate of independence?

The refult of torture, then, is a matter of calculation, and depends on the confliction, which differs in every individual, and is in proportion to his frength and fenfibility; fo that to differe truth by this method, is a problem which may be better reiolved by a mathematician than a judge, and may be thus flated. The force of the mufcler, and the fenfibility of the nerves of an innescent perfor being given, it is required to find the degree of pain meedfary to make him canfels bimfelf guilty of a given crime.

The examination of the accufed is intended to find out the truth; but if this be difcovered with fo much difficulty, in the air, geffure and countenance of a man at eafe, how can it appear in a countenance difforted by the conrulfions of torture. Every violent action deflroys those those finall alterations in the features, which fometimes disclose the featurents of the heart.

Thefe truths were known to the Roman legiflators, amongst whom, as I have already obferved, flaves, only, who were not confidered as citizens, were tortured. They are known to the English, a nation in which the progress of fcience, inperiority in commerce, riches and power, its natural confequences, together with the numerous examples of virtue and courage, leave no doubt of the excellence of its laws. They have been acknowledged in Sweden, where torture has been abolifhed. They are known to one of the wifeft monarchs in Europe, who, having feated philofophy on the throne, by his beneficent legiflation, has made his fubjects free. though dependent on the laws; the only freedom that reafonable men can defire in the prefent ftate of things. In fhort, torture has not been thought neceffary in the laws of armies. composed chiefly of the dregs of mankind, where its use should feem most necessary. Strange phenomenon ! that a fet of men, hardened by flaughter, and familiar with blood. fhould teach humanity to the fons of peace.

It appears alfo, that thefe truths were known, though imperfectly, even to thole by whom torture has been moft frequently practifed; for a confeilion.

confession made during torture is null, if it be not afterwards confirmed by an oath ; which, if the criminal refuses, he is tortured again. Some civilians, and fome nations, permit this infamous petitio principii to be only three times repeated, and others leave it to the diferetion of the judge; and therefore of two men equally innocent, or equally guilty, the most robust and refolute will be acquitted, and the weakest and most pufillanimous will be condemned, in confequence of the following excellent method of reasoning. I, the judge, must find some one guilty. Thou, who art a Arong fellow, haft been able to refift the force of torment ; therefore I acquit thee. Thou, being weaker, hast yielded to it ; I therefore condemn thee. I am fensible, that the confession, which was extorted from thee, has no weight : but if thou doft not confirm by oath what thou halt already confelled. I will have thee tormented again.

A very frange, but neceffary confequence of the use of torture, is that the cafe of the innocent is work than that of the guilty. With regard to the firft, either he confelles the crime, which he has not committed, and is condemned is or he is acquitted, and has fuffered a punihment he did not deferve. On the contrary, the perfan who is really guilty has the most favourable fide.

fide of the queffion; for if he fupports the torture with firmnefs and refolution, he is acquitted, and has gained, having exchanged a greater punifiment for a lefs.

The law by which torture is authorifed, fays, Men, be infenfible to pain. Nature has indeed given you an irrefolible felf-love, and an unalienable right of felf-prefervation, but I create in you a contrary fentiment, an heroical batted of yourfelves. I command you to accufe your/eloves, and to declare the truth, midft the tearing of your folfs, and the diffication of your bones.

Torture is used to discover, whether the criminal be guilty of other crimes befides those of which he is accufied, which is equivalent to the following reasoning. Thou art guilty of one crime, therefore it is pollible that theu mayl have committed a thoughand others : but the affair being doubtful, I muft try it by my criterion of truth. The laws order thes to be tormented, because thou art guilty, because thou mayl be guilty, and because I chuse thou flowed the guilty.

Forture is used to make the criminal difference his accomplices; but if it has been demonfirated that it is not a proper means of difference for how can it force to difference the accomplices, which is one of the truths required. Will not the man who accuses himfelf, yet more readily accuse accufe others? Befides, is it juft to torment one man for the crime of another? May not the accomplices be found out by the examination of the witneffes, or of the criminal; from the evidence, or from the nature of the crime irielf; in flort, by all the means that have been ufed to prove the guilt of the prifoner? The accomplices commonly fly, when their comrade is taken. The uncertainty of their fate comdemns them to perpetual exile, and frees fociety from the danger of further injury; whilf the punifhment of the criminal, by deterring others, aufwers the purpole for which it was ordained.

CHAP. XVII.

Of pecuniary Punishments.

THERE was a time when all punifiments were pecuniary. The crimes of the fubjects were the inheritance of the prince. An injury done to fociety was a favour to the crown; and the fovereign and magistrates, those guardians of the public fecurity, were interested in the violation. of the laws. Crimes were tried, at that time, in a court of Exchequer, and the caufe became a civil fuit between the perfon accufed and the crown. The magistrate then had other powers than were necessary for the public welfare, and the criminal fuffered other punifhments than the neceffity of example required. The judge was rather a collector for the crown, an agent for the treasury, than a protector and minister of the laws. But, according to this fystem, for a man to confels himfelf guilty, was to acknowledge himfelf a debtor to the crown; which was, and is at prefent (the effects continuing after the caufes have ceafed) the intent of all criminal caufes. Thus, the criminal who refuses to confess his crime, though convicted by the most undoubted proofs, will fuffer a lefs punifhment than if he had confeifed; and he will not be put to the torture to oblige hint to confefs other crimes which he might have committed, as he has not confeffed the principal. But the confefion being once obtained, the judge becomes mafter of his body, and torments him with a fludied formality, in order to fqueeze out of him all the profit polifible. Confeffion, then, is allowed to be a convincing proof, effectially when obtained by the force of torture; a the fame time that an extra-judicial confeffion, when a man is at eafe and under no apprehention, is not fufficient for his condemnation.

All inquiries, which may ferve to clear up the fact, but which may weaken the pretentions of the crown, are excluded. It was not from compaffion to the criminal, or from confiderations of humanity, that torments were fometimes fpared, but out of fear of lofing thole rights which at prefent appear chimerical and inconceivable. The judge becomes an enemy to the accufed, to a wretch, a prey to the horrors of a dungeon, to torture, to death, and an uncertain futurity, more terrible than all 5 he inquires not into the truth of the fact, but the nature of the crime; he lays fnares to make him convict himfelf 5 he fears, left he fhould not fucceed in finding him guilty, guilty, and left that infallibility which every man arrogates to himfelf fhould be called in queftion. It is in the power of the magistrate to determine. what evidence is fufficient to fend a man to prifon; that he may be proved innocent, he must first be supposed guilty. This is what is called an offenfive profecution ; and fuch are all criminal proceedings, in the eighteenth century, in all parts of our polified Europe. The true profecution for information ; that is, an impartial inquiry into the fact, that which reafon prefcribes. which military laws adopt, and which Afiatic defootifm allows in fuits of one fubiect against another, is very little practifed in any courts of justice. What a labyrinth of absurdities ! Abfurdities, which will appear incredible to happier posterity. The philosopher only will be able to read, in the nature of man, the poffibility of there ever having been fuch a fyftem.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Oaths.

THERE is a palpable contradiction between the laws and the natural fentiments of mankind. in the cafe of oaths, which are administered to a criminal to make him fpeak the truth, when the contrary is his greateft intereft. As if a man could think himfelf obliged to contribute to his own destruction ; and as if, when interest speaks, religion was not generally filent; religion, which in all ages hath, of all other things, been most commonly abufed ; and indeed, upon what motive should it be respected by the wicked. when it has been thus violated by those who were efteemed the wifeft of men? The motives which religion oppofes to the fear of impending evil, and the love of life, are too weak, as they are too diftant, to make any impression on the tenfes. The affairs of the other world are regulated by laws entirely different from those by which human affairs are directed; why then thould we endeavour to compromife matters between them ? Why fhould a man be reduced to the terrible alternative, either of offending God, o.

or of contributing to his own immediate.deftruction? The laws which require an oath in fuch a cafe, leave him only the choice of becoming a bad Chriftian or a martyr. For this reafon, oaths become by degrees a mere formality, and all fentiments of religion, perhaps the only motive of honefty in the greatest part of mankind, are deftroyed. Experience proves their utility : I appeal to every judge, whether he has ever known that an oath alone has brought truth from the lips of a criminal; and reafon tells us, it must be fo; for all laws are ufelefs, and, in confequence, deftructive, which contradict the natural feelings of mankind. Such laws are like a dike, opposed directly to the courfe of a torrent; it is either immediately overwhelmed, or, by a whirlpool formed by itfelf, it is gradually undermined and deftroyed ...

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Advantage of immediate Punifbment.

THE more immediately, after the commiffion of a crime, a punifhment is inflicted, the more just and useful it will be. It will be more juft, becaufe it fpares the criminal the cruel and fuperfluous torment of uncertainty, which increafes in proportion to the ftrength of his imagination and the fenfe of his weaknefs ; and becaufe the privation of liberty, being a punifhment, ought to be inflicted before condemnation, but for as thort a time as possible. Imprisonments, I fay, being only the means of fecuring the perfon of the accused, until he be tried, condemned, or acquitted, ought not only to be of as fhort duration, but attended with as little feverity as poffible. The time fhould be determined by the necessary preparation for the trial, and the right of priority in the oldest prifoners. The confinement ought not to be closer than is requifite to prevent his flight, or his concealing the proofs of the crime; and the trial fhould be conducted with all poffible expedition. Can there be a more cruel contrast than that be-reven the indolence of a judge, and the painful anxiety of the accufed; the comforts and pleafures of an infentible magifirate, and the filth and mifery of the prifoner? In general, as I have before obferved, The degree of the panifhment, and the confoquences of a crime, sught to be fo contrived, as to have the greated? peffible offed on others, with the leafs peffible pain to the delinquent. If there be any fociety in which this is not a fundamental principle, it is an unlawful fociety; for mankind, by their union, originally intended to fubject themfelves to the leaft evils poffible.

An immediate punifhment is more ufeful; becaufe the finaller the interval of time between the punifhment and the crime, the ftronger and more lafting will be the affociation of the two ideas of Crime and Punifoment : fo that they may be confidered, one as the caufe, and the other as the unavoidable and necessary effect. It is demonstrated, that the affociation of ideas is the cement which unites the fabric of the human intellect; without which, pleafure and pain would be fimple and ineffectual fenfations. The vulgar, that is, all men who have no general ideas or univerfal principles, act in confequence of the most immediate and familiar affociations : but the more remote and complex only prefent themfelves them/elves to the minds of thofe who are paffionately attached to a fingle object, or to thole of greater underflanding, who have acquired an habit of rapidly comparing together a number of objects, and of forming a conclution; and the refult, that is, the action in confequence, by thefe means, becomes lefs dangerous and uncertain.

It is, then, of the greateft importance, that the punifument fhould fucced the crime as immediately as polfible, if we intend, that, in the rude minds of the multitude, the feducing picture of the advantage arifing from the crime, thould inflandly awake the attendant idea of punifhmear. Delaying the punifhmeat ferves only to feparate thefe two ideas; and thus affects the minds of the fpectators rather as being a terrible fight, than the neceffary confequence of a crime ; the horror of which fhould contribute to heighten the idea of the punifhmeat.

There is another excellent method of firengthening this important connection between the ideas of crime and punithment; that is, to make the punithment as analagous as pofible to the nature of the crime; in order that the punithment may lead the mind to confider the crime in a different point of view, from that in which.

which it was placed by the flattering idea of promifed advantages.

Crimes of lefs importance are commonly punifhed, either in the obfeurity of a prilon, or the criminal is transforted, to give, by his flavery, an example to focieties which he never offended; from the place where the crime was committed. Men do not, in general, commit great crimes deliberately, but rather in a fudden guft of paffion; and they commonly look on the punifhment due to a great crime as remote and improbable. The public punifhment, therefore, of fmall crimes will make a greater imprefion, and, by deterring men from the finaller, will effectually prevent the greater.

CHAP. XX.

Of Acts of Violence.

SOME crimes relate to perfon, others to property. The first ought to be punished corporally. The great and rich should by no means have it in their power to fet a price on the fecurity of the weak and indigent; for then, riches, which, under the protection of the laws, are the reward of industry, would become the aliment of tyranny. Liberty is at an end, whenever the laws permit, that, in certain cafes, a man may cease to be a perfon, and become a thing. Then will the powerful employ their address to felect, from the various combinations of civil fociety, all that is in their own favour. This is that magic art which transforms fubjects into beafts of burden, and which, in the hands of the ftrong, is the chain that binds the weak and incautious. 'Thus it is, that in fome governments, where there is all the appearance of liberty, tyranny lies concealed, and infinuates itfelf into fome neglected corner of the conffitution, where it gathers ftrength infenfibly. Mankind generally oppofe, with refolution, the affaults of barefaced and open tyranny; but difregard the little infect that gnaws through the dike, and opens a fure, though fecret, paffage to inundation.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the Punishment of the Nobles.

WHAT punifhments fhall be ordained for the nobles, whofe privileges make fo great a part of the laws of nations? I do not mean to inquire whether the hereditary diffinction between nobles and commoners be useful in any government, or neceffary in a monarchy; or whether it be true, that they form an intermediate power, of use in moderating the excelles of both extremes; or whether they be not rather flaves to their own body, and to others, confining within a very fmall circle the natural effects and hopes of industry, like those little fruitful spots fcattered here and there in the fandy deferts of Arabia; or whether it be true, that a fubordination of rank and condition is inevitable, or ufeful in fociety; and if fo, whether this fubordination should not rather subfift between individuals than particular bodies; whether it should not rather circulate through the whole body politic, than be confined to one part; and rather than be perpetual, fhould it not be inceffantly produced and deftroyed. Be thefe as they may,

may, I affert that the punifhment of a nobleman should in no wife differ from that of the lowest member of fociety.

Every lawful diffinction, either in honours or riches, fuppofes previous equality, founded on the laws, on which all the members of fociety are confidered as being equally dependent. We fhould fuppofe that men, in renouncing their natural despotism, faid, the wifest and most industrious among us fhall obtain the greatest honours, and his dignity (ball defcend to his posterity. The fortunate and happy may hope for greater honours, but let him not therefore be lefs afraid than others of violating those conditions on which he is exclied. It is true, indeed, that no fuch decrees were ever made in a general diet of mankind, but they exift in the invariable relations of things : nor do they deftroy the advantages which are fuppofed to be produced by the clafs of nobles, but prevent the inconveniences; and they make the laws refpectable by deftroying all hopes of impunity.

It may be objected, that the fame punifument inflicted on a nobleman and a plebeian, becomes really different from the difference of their education, and from the infamy it reflects on an illuftrious family; but I anfwer, that punifhments are to be eltimated, not by the fealibility of the criminal, but by the injury done to fociety, which injury is augmented by the high rank of the offender. The precife cquality of a punifhment can never be more than external, as it is in proportion to the degree of fenfibility, which differs in every individual. The infamy of an innocent family may be eafily obliterated by fome public demonstration of favour from the fovereign; and forms have always more influence than reason on the gazing multitude.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Robberg.

THE punishment of robbery, not accompanied with violence, fhould be pecuniary. He who endeavours to enrich himfelf with the property of another, should be deprived of part of his own. But this crime, alas! is commonly the effect of mifery and despair; the crime of that unhappy part of mankind, to whom the right of exclusive property, a terrible, and perhaps unneceffary right, has left but a bare existence. Befides, as pecuniary punifhment may increase the number of poor, and may deprive an innocent family of fublistence, the most proper punifhment will be that kind of flavery, which alone can be called juft; that is, which makes the fociety, for a time, abfolute mafter of the perfon and labour of the criminal, in order to oblige him to repair, by this dependence, the unjust despotism he asurped over the property of another, and his violation of the focial compact.

When robbery is attended with violence, corporal punifhment fhould be added to flavery. H₂ Many.

Many writers have fhewn the evident diforder which muft arife from not diffinguifning the putifhment due to robbery with itolence, and that due to thefr, or robbery committed with dexterity, ablurdly making a fum of money equivalent to a man's life. But it can never be fuperfluous to repeat, again and again, thofe truths of which mankind have not profited 3 for political machines preferve their motion much longer than others, and receive a new impulfe with more difficulty. Thefe crimes are in their nature abfoluely different; and this axiom is as certain in politics as in mathematics, that between qualitics of different natures there can be no fimilitude.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Infamy, confidered as a Punifoment.

THOSE injuries, which affect the honour, that is, that just portion of effeem which every citizen has a right to expect from others, should be punished with infamy. Infamy is a mark of the public difapprobation, which deprives the object of all confideration in the eyes of his fellow citizens, of the confidence of his country, and of that fraternity which exifts between members of the fame fociety. This is not always in the power of the laws. . It is neceffary that the infamy inflicted by the laws fhould be the fame with that which refults from the relations of things, from universal morality, or from that particular fystem, adopted by the nation and the laws, which governs the opinion of the vulgar. If, on the contrary, one be different from the other, either the laws will no longer be refpected, or the received notions of morality and probity will vanish in fpight of the declamations of moralists, which are weak to refift the force of example. If we declare those actions infamous, which are in themfelves indifferent, we leffen the infamy of those which are really infamous.

The punifhment of infamy fhould not be too frequent, for the power of opinion grows weaker H 3.

by repetition; nor fhould it be inflicted on a number of perfors at the fame time, for the infamy of many refolves itfelf into the infamy of none.

Painful and corporal punifiments finould never be applied to fanaticifint; for being founded on pride, it glories in perfecution. Infamy and ridicule only fhould be employed againft fanaties if the firfd, their pride will be over-balanced by the pride of the peoples, and we may judge of the power of the fecond, if we confider that even truth is obliged to fammon all her force, when attacked by error armed with ridicule. Thus, by oppofing one paffon to another, and opinion to opinion, a wile legilator puts an end to the admiration of the populace, occafioned by a falfe principle, the original abfindity of which is velied by fome well-deduced confequences.

This is the method to avoid confounding the immutable relations of things, or oppofing nature, whole actions not being limited by time, but operating ineeffantly, overturn and deflroy all thofe vain regulations which contradiet her laws. It is not only in the fine arts that the imitation of nature is the fundamental principle; it is the fame in found policy, which is no other than the art of uniting, and directing to the fame end, the natural and immutable featurents of mankind.

Of Idlenefs.

A WISE government will not fuffer, in the midft of labour and induftry, that kind of political idlenefs, which is confounded, by rigid declaimers, with the leifure attending riches acquired by industry, which is of use to an increasing fociety, when confined within proper limits. I call those politically idle, who neither contribute to the good of fociety by their labour nor their riches; who continually accumulate, but never fpend; and are reverenced by the vulgar with flupid admiration, and regarded by the wife with difdain ; who, being victims to a monaftic life, and deprived of all incitement to the activity which is neceffary to preferve or increase its comforts, devote all their vigour to paffions of the ftrongest kind, the passions of opinion. I call not him idle, who enjoys the fruits of the virtues or vices of his anceftors, and in exchange for his pleafures fupports the industrious poor. It is not then the narrow virtue of auftere moralifts, but the laws, that fhould determine what fpecies of idlenefs deferves punifhment.

C H A P. XXV.

Of Banifoment, and Confifcation.

HE who difturbs the public tranquillity, who is does not obey the laws, who violates the conditions on which men mutually fupport and defend each other, ought to be excluded from fociety, that is, banified.

It feems as if banithment flould be the punifhment of thofe, who, being accufed of an atrocious crime, are probably, but not certainly, guilty. For this purpole would be required a law, the leaft arbitrary, and the moft precife poffible; which fhould condemn to banifhment thofe who have reduced the community to the fattal alternative, either of fearing or punifhing them unjuftly; fuil, however, leaving them the facted right of proving their innocence. The reafors ought to be firenger for banifhing a citizen than a firanger, and for the firft accufation than for one who hash bece often accufed.

Should the perfon who is excluded for everfrom fociety be deprived of his property? This queftion may be confidered in different lights. The confilcation of effects, added to baniftment, ment, is a greater punifhment than banifhment alone; there ought then to be fome cafes, in which, according to the crime, either the whole fortune should be confiscated, or part only, or none at all. The whole should be forfeited. when the law, which ordains banifhment, declares, at the fame time, that all connections between the fociety and the criminal are annihilated. In this cafe, the citizen dies, the man only remains; and with respect to a political body, the death of the citizen should have the fame confequences with the death of the man. It feems to follow, then, that in this cafe, the effects of the criminal (hould devolve to his lawful heirs. But it is not on account of this refinement that I difapprove of confifcations. If fome have infifted, that they were a reftraint to vengeance, and the violence of particulars, they have not reflected, that though punishments be productive of good, they are not, on that account, more just; to be just, they must be neceffary. Even an ufeful injuffice can never be allowed by a legiflator, who means to guard against watchful tyranny ; which, under the flattering pretext of momentary advantages, would eftablish permanent principles of destruction, and, to procure the eafe of a few in a high flation, would draw tears from thoulands of the poor.

The law which ordains confilcations, fets as price on the head of the fubject, with the guilty punifhes the innocent, and by reducing them to indigence and defpair, tempts them to become eriminal. Can there be a more melancholy fpectude, than a whole family, overwhelmed with infamy and milery, from the crime of their chief? a crime, which, if it had been poffible, they were refirained from preventing, by thatfubmillion which the laws themfelves have ordained.

And a lot the she when a she the boat min

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Spirit of Family in States.

IT is remarkable, that many fatal afts of injustice have been authorifed and approved, even by the wifeft and most experienced men, in the freeft republics. This has been owing to their having confidered the flate, rather as a fociety of families, than of men. Let us suppose a nation, composed of an hundred thousand men, divided into twenty thousand families of five perfons each, including the head or mafter of the family, its reprefentative. If it be an affociation of families, there will be twenty thousand men, and eighty thousand flaves; if of men, there will be an hundred thousand citizens, and not one flave. In the first cafe, we behold a republic, and twenty thousand little monarchies, of which the heads are the fovereigns; in the fecond, the fpirit of liberty will not only breathe in every public place of the city, and in the affemblies of the nation, but in private houses, where men find the greatest part of their happinels or milery. As laws and cultoms are always the effect of a republic, if the fociety be an affociation affociation of the heads of families, the fpirit of monarchy will gradually make its way into the republic infect, as its effects will only be refrained by the opposite interefls of each, and not by an universal fpirit of liberty and equality. The private fpirit of family is a fpirit of minutenetis, and confined to little concerns. Public fpirit, on the contrary, is influenced by general principles, and from facts deduces general rules of uillty to the greateft number.

In a republic of families, the children remain under the authority of the father, as long as he dives, and are obliged to wait until death for an exiftence dependent on the laws alone. Accufformed to kneel and tremble in their tender years, when their natural fentiments were lefs reftrained by that caution, obtained by experience, which is called moderation, how fhould they refift thole obflacles, which vice always oppofes to virtue, in the languor and decline of age, when the defpair of reaping the fruits is alone fufficient to damp the vigour of their refolutions.

In a republic, where every man is a citizen, family fubordination is not the effect of compulion, but of contract is and the fons, difengaged from the natural dependence, which the weaknefs of infancy and the neceffity of education tion required, become free members of fociety. but remain fubject to the head of the family for their own advantage, as in the great fociety.

In a republic of families, the young people, that is, the most numerous and most useful part of the nation, are at the difcretion of their fathers: in a republic of men, they are attached to their parents by no other obligation, than that facred and inviolable one of mutual affiftance. and of gratitude for the benefits they have received; a fentiment, destroyed not fo much by the wickednefs of the human heart, as by a miltaken fubjection, prefcribed by the laws.

Thefe contradictions between the laws of families, and the fundamental laws of a flate, are the fource of many others between public and private morality, which produce a perpetual conflict in the mind. Domeftic morality infpires fubmiffion and fear: the other, courage and liberty. That inftructs a man to confine his beneficence to a finall number of perfons, not of his own choice ; this, to extend it to all mankind: that commands a continual facrifice of himfelf to a vain idol, called the good of the family, which is often no real good to any one of those who compose it; this teaches him to confider his own advantage without offending the laws, or excites him to facrifice himfelf for the good good of his country, by rewarding him beforehand with the fanaticifin it infpires. Such contradictions are the reasion, that men neglect the purfait of wirtue, which they can hardly diltinguifh midft the obfcurity and confusion of natural and moral objects. How frequently are men, upon a retrospection of their actions, aftonished to find themfelves dithoneft.

In proportion to the increase of fociety, each member becomes a fmaller part of the whole ; and the republican foirit diminishes in the fame proportion, if neglected by the laws. Political focieties, like the human body, have their limits circumfcribed, which they cannot exceed without diffurbing their economy. It feems as if the greatness of a state ought to be inversely as the fenfibility and activity of the individuals; if, on the contrary, population and activity increase in the fame proportion, the laws will with difficulty prevent the crimes arising from the good they have produced. An overgrown republic can only be faved from defpotifm, by fubdividing it into a number of confederate republics. But how is this practicable? By a defpotic dictator, who, with the courage of Sylla, has as much genius for building up, as that Roman had for pulling down. If he be an ambitious man, his reward will be immortal glory; if a philofopher, pher, the bleffings of his fellow-citizens will fufficiently confole him for the lofs of authority, though he fhould not be infentible to their ingratitude.

In proportion as the fentiments, which unite us to the flate, grow weaker, thole which artach us to the objects which more immediately furround us grow flronger; therefore, in the moft defpotic government, friendflips are more durable, and domeflic virtues (which are always of the lowefl clafs) are the moft common, or the only virtues exiling. Hence it appears how confined have been the views of the greateft gamber of legiflators.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of the Mildness of Punishments.

THE courfe of my ideas has carried me away from my fubject, to the elucidation of which I now return. Crimes are more effectually prevented by the certainty, than the feverity of punishment. Hence, in a magistrate, the necessity of vigilance, and, in a judge, of implacability, which, that it may become an uleful virtue, fhould be joined to a mild legiflation. The certainty of a finall punifhment will make a ftronger impression, than the fear of one more fevere, if attended with the hopes of efcaping; for it is the nature of mankind to be terrified at the approach of the finalleft inevitable evil, whilft hope, the best gift of heaven, hath the power of difpelling the apprehension of a greater; efpecially if fupported by examples of impunity, which weakness or avarice too frequently af-

If punifhments be very fevere, men are naturally led to the perpetration of other crimes, to avoid the punifhment due to the firft. The countries and times moft notorious for feverity of

of punifhments, were always thofe in which the moft bloody and inhuman actions and the moft atrocious crimes were committed; i for the hand of the legiflator and the affafin were directed by the fame fpirit of ferocity; which, on the throne, dictated laws of iron to flaves and favages, and in private infligated the fubject to facrifice one tyrant, to make room for another.

In proportion as pusifiments become more cruel, the minds of men, as a fluid rifes to the fame height with that which furrounds it, grow hardened and infenfible; and the force of the paffions fill continuing, in the fpace of an humdred years, the wheel terrifies no more than formerly the prejon. That a punifiment may produce the effect required, it is fufficient that the evil it occafions fhould exceed the good expected from the crime; including in the calculation the certainty of the punifiment, and the privation of the expected advantage. All feverity beyond this is fuperfluous, and therefore tyrannical.

Meu regulate their conduct by the repeated imprefion of evils they know, and not by thofe . with which they are unacquainted. Let us, for • example, fuppole two nations, in one of which the greateft punithment is perpetual flavery, and in the other the wheel. I fay, that both will in-I a fpire fpire the fame degree of terror; and that there can be no reafons for increasing the punithments of the first, which are not equally valid for augmenting thole of the fecond to more lafting and more ingenious modes of tormenting; and fo on to the most exquisite refinements of a feience too well known to tyrants.

There are yet two other confequences of cruel punifhments, which counteract the purpole of their inflitution, which was, to prevent crimes. The first arifes from the impossibility of eftablishing an exact proportion between the crime and punifhment; for though ingenious cruelty hath greatly multiplied the variety of torments, yet the human frame can fuffer only to a certain degree, beyond which it is impoffible to proceed, be the enormity of the crime ever fo great. The fecond confequence is impunity. Human nature is limited no lefs in evil than in rood. Exceffive barbarity can never be more than temporary; it being imposfible that it should be fupported by a permanent fystem of legislat tion: for if the laws be too cruel, they must be litered, or anarchy and impunity will fucceed. Is it poffible, without fhuddering with horror, to read in hiftory of the barbarous and ufcleis forments that were coolly invented and executed by men who were called fages ? Who does not remble at the thoughts of thou[ands of wretches, , whom their mifery, either cauled or tolerated by the laws which favored the few, and outraged the many, had forced in defpair to return to a flate of nature; or accuiled of impoliible crimes, the fabric of ignorance and fuperfittion; or guilty only of having been faithful to their own principles; who, I fay, can, without horror, think of their being torn to pieces with flow and fludied barbairty, by menendowed with the fame paffions and the fame feelings? A delightful (pectacle to a fanatic multitude!

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the Punishment of Death.

THE useless profusion of punishments, whichhas never made men better, induces me to inquire, whether the punifhment of death be really just or useful in a well-governed state? What right, I afk, have men to cut the throats of their fellow-creatures? Certainly not that on which the fovereignty and laws are founded. The laws, as I have faid before, are only the fum of the finalleft portions of the private liberty of each individual, and reprefent the general will, which is the aggregate of that of each individual. Did any one ever give to others the right of taking away his life? . Is it poffible, that in the fmalleft portions of the liberty of each, facrificed to the good of the public, can be contained the greateft of all good, life? If it were fo, how shall it be reconciled to the maxim which tells us, that a man has no right to kill himfelf? Which he certainly must have, if he could give it away to another.

But the punifiment of death is not authorifed by any right; for I have demonstrated that no fuch.

fuch right exits. It is therefore a war of a whole nation againfl a citizen, whole deftruction they confider as necefary, or utfenl to the general good. But if I can further demonftrate, that it is neither neceffary nor utferlul, I thall have gained the caufe of humanity.

The death of a citizen cannot be neceffary, but in one cafe. When, though deprived of his liberty, he has fuch power and connections as may endanger the fecurity of the nation; when his existence may produce a dangerous revolution in the established form of government. But even in this cafe it can only be neceffary, when a nation is on the verge of recovering or lofing its liberty; or in times of abfolute anarchy, when the diforders themfelves hold the place of laws. But in a reign of tranquillity; in a form of government approved by the united wifnes of the nation; in a state fortified from enemies without, and fupported by ftrength within, and opinion, perhaps more efficacious; where all power is lodged in the hands of the true fovereign; where riches can purchafe pleafures and not authority, there can be no neceffity for taking away the life of a fubject.

If the experience of all ages be not fufficient to prove, that the punifhment of death has never prevented determined men from injuring fociety, if the example of the Romans ; if rwenty years reign of Elizabeth, emprefs of Rufia, in which the gave the fathers of their country an example more illuftrious than many conquefts bought with blood, if, I fay, all this be not fufficient to perfunder makind, who always fuped the voice of reafon, and who chufe rather to be led by authority, let us conful human nature in proof of my affertion.

It is not the intenfences of the pain that has the greatest effect on the mind, but its continuance; for our fenfibility is more eafily and more powerfully affected by weak but repeated impreffions, than by a violent but momentary impulfe. The power of habit is univerfal over every fenfible being. As it is by that we learn to fpeak, to walk, and to fatisfy our neceffities. fo the ideas of morality are flamped on our minds by repeated impreffions. The death of a criminal is a terrible but momentary fpectacle. and therefore a lefs efficacious method of deterring others than the continued example of a man deprived of his liberty, condemned as a beaft of burden, to repair, by his labour, the injury he has done to fociety. If I commit fuch a crime, fays the spectator to himself, I shall be reduced to that miferable condition for the rest of my life. A much more powerful preventive than the fear of.

of death, which men always behold in diftant obfcurity.

The terrors of death make fo flight an imprefion, that it has not force enough to withfland the forgetfulnefs natural to mankind, even in the moft effential things; effecially when affifted by the paffions. Violent imprefions furprize us, but their effect is momentary; they are fit to produce thofe revolutions which inflantly transform a common man into a Lacedemonian or a Perfian; but in a free and quiet government they ought to be rather frequent than flrong.

The execution of a criminal is, to the multitude, a fpectacle which in fome excites compatfion mixed with indignation. Thefe fentiments occupy the mind much more than that falutary terror which the laws endeavour to infpire; but in the contemplation of continued fuffering, terror is the only, or, at leafl, the predominant fenfation. The feverity of a puniflument flould be juft fufficient to excite compafion in the fpectators, as it is intended more for them than for the criminal.

A punifiment, to be juff, fhould have only that degree of feverity which is fufficient to deter others. Now there is no man, who, upon the leaft reflection, would put in competition the total total and perpetual lofs of his liberty, with the greateft advantages he could poffibly obtain in confequence of a crime. Perpetual flavery, then. has in it all that is neceffary to deter the most hardened and determined, as much as the punifhment of death. I fay, it has more. There are many who can look upon death with intrepidity and firmnefs; fome through fanaticifm, and others through vanity, which attends us even to the grave; others from a desperate refolution, either to get rid of their mifery, or ceafe to live : but fanaticifm and vanity forfake the criminal in flavery, in chains and fetters, in an iron cage; and defpair feems rather the beginning than the end of their mifery. 'The mind, by collecting itfelf and uniting all its force, can, for a moment, repel affailing grief; but its most vigorous efforts are infufficient to refift perpetual wretchednefs.

In all nations, where death is ufed as punifhment, every example fuppoles a new crime committed. Whereas, in perpetual flavery, every criminal affords a frequent and lafting example; and if it be neceflary that men fhould often be witherfies of the power of the laws, criminals fhould often be put to death; but this fuppoles a frequency of crimes; and from hence this r punifhpunifhment will ceafe to have its effect, fo that it must be useful and useless at the fame time.

I shall be told, that perpetual flavery is as painful a punishment as death, and therefore as cruel. I answer, that if all the miserable moments in the life of a flave were collected into one point, it would be a more cruel punifhment than any other; but thefe are fcattered through his whole life, whilf the pain of death exerts all its force in a moment. There is also another advantage in the punifhment of flavery, which is, that it is more terrible to the fpectator than to the fufferer himfelf; for the fpectator confiders the fum of all his wretched moments, whilft the fufferer, by the milery of the prefent, is prevented from thinking of the future. All evils are increased by the imagination, and the fufferer finds refources and confolations, of which the spectators are ignorant; who judge by their own fenfibility of what paffes in a mind by habit grown callous to misfortune.

Let us, for a moment, attend to the reafoning of a robber or affafin, who is deterred from violating the laws by the gibbet or the wheel. I am fenfible, that to develop the fentiments of one's own heart, is an art which education only can teach; but although a villain may not be able to give a clear account of his principles, K they they neverthelefs influence his conduct. He reafons thus : " What are these laws that I am " bound to refpect, which make fo great a dif-" ference between me and the rich man? He " refuses me the farthing I alk of him, and " excufes himfelf by bidding me have recourfe " to labour, with which he is unacquainted. " Who made thefe laws? The rich and the " great, who never deigned to vifit the miler-" able hut of the poor; who have never feen " him dividing a piece of mouldy bread, amidft " the cries of his familhed children, and the " tears of his wife. Let us break those ties, " fatal to the greatest part of mankind, and " only ufeful to a few indolent tyrants. Let us " attack injuffice at its fource. I will return to " my natural state of independence. I shall live " free and happy on the fruits of my courage and industry. A day of pain and repentance " may come, but it will be fhort; and for " an hour of grief I shall enjoy years of plea-" fure and liberty. King of a fmall number, " as determined as myfelf, I will correct the " miftakes of fortune; and shall fee those ty-" rants grow pale and tremble at the fight of " him, whom, with infulting pride, they would " not fuffer to rank with dogs and horfes."

Religion

Religion then prefents itfelf to the mind of this lawlefs villain, and promifing him almoft a certainty of eternal happinefs upon the eafy terms of repentance, contributes much to leffen the horror of the laft feene of the tragedy.

But he who forefees, that he muft pafs a great number of years, even his whole life, in pain and flavery, a flave to thofe laws by which he was protected; in fight of his fellow citizens, with whom he lives in freedom and fociety; makes an ufeful compariton between thofe evils, the uncertainty of his fuccels, and the flortnefs of the time in which he fhall erjoy the fruits of his transfigreffion. The example of thofe wretches continually before his eyes, makes a much greater imprefion on him than a punithment, which, inflead of correcting, makes him more obdurate.

The punihment of death is pernicious to fociety, from the example of barbarity it affords. If the paffions, or the necefity of war, have taught men to fhed the blood of their fellowcreatures, the laws which are intended to moderate the ferocity of mankind, fhould not increafe it by examples of barbarity, the more horrible, as this punihment is ufually attended with formal pageantry. Is it not abfurd, that the laws, which deteft and punih homicide, K 2 fhould thould, in order to prevent murder, publicly commit murder themfelves ? What are the true and moft ufeful laws? Thole compacts and conditions which all would propose and observe, in those moments when private interest is filent, or combined with that of the public. What are the natural fentiments of every perfon concernaing the punifiment of death? We may read them in the contempt and indignation with which every one looks on the executioner, who is neverthelefs an innocent executor of the public will; a good citizen, who contributes to the advantage of fociety; the inftrument of the general fecurity within, as good foldiers are without. What then is the origin of this contradiction ? Why is this fentiment of mankind indelible to the fcandal of reafon? It is, that in a fecret corner of the mind, in which the original imprefions of nature are fill preferved, mendifcover a fentiment which tells them, that their lives are not lawfully in the power of any one, but of that neceffity only, which with its iron fceptre rules the univerfe.

What muft men think, when they fee wife magilitates and grave minilters of juttice, with indifference and tranquillity, dragging a criminal to death, and whilf a wretch trembles with agony, expecting the fatal flooke, the judge, who who has condemned him, with the coldeft infenfibility, and perhaps with no fmall gratification from the exertion of his authority, quits his tribunal to enjoy the comforts and pleafures of life? They will fay, " Ah! those cruel formali-" ties of justice are a cloak to tyranny, they are " a fecret language, a folemn veil, intended to " conceal the fword by which we are facrificed " to the infatiable idol of defpotifm. Murder, " which they would reprefent to us as an hor-" rible crime, we fee practifed by them without " repugnance or remorfe. Let us follow their " example. A violent death appeared terrible " in their defcriptions, but we fee that it is the " affair of a moment. It will be ftill leis terrible " to him, who, not expecting it, efcapes almost " all the pain." Such is the fatal, though abfurd reafoning of men who are difpofed to commit crimes : on whom the abufe of religion has more influence than religion itfelf.

If it be objected, that almost all nations in all ages have punified certain crimes with death, I answer, that the force of these examples vanifiles, when opposed to truth, against which prefeription is urged in vain. The history of mankind is an immense fea of errors, in which a few obfcure truths may here and there be found.

K. 2

But human factifices have alfo been common in almoft all nations. That fome focieties only, either few in number, or for a very fhort time, abflained from the punifhment of death, is rather favourable to my argument, for fuch is the fate of great truths, that their duration is only as a flash of lightning in the long and dark night of error. The happy time is not yet arrived, when truth, as fulfhood has been hitherto, fhall be the portion of the greateft number.

I am fendible that the voice of one philofopher is too weak to be heard amidft the clamours of a multitude, blindly influenced by cuiton; but there is a fmall number of fages, fcattered on the bottom of their hearns; and if thefe truths fhould haply force their way to the thrones of princes, be it known to them, that they come attended with the fecret wiftees of all mankind; and tell the forcreign, who deigns them a gracious reception, that his fame fhall outfhine the glory of conquerors, and that equitable pofferity will exalt his peaceful trophies above thofe of a Times, an Antoninus, or a Trajan.

How happy were mankind, if laws were now to be firft formed ! now that we fee on the thrones of Europe benevolent monarchs, friends to the virtues of peace, to the arts and fciences, fathers fathers of their people, though crowned yet citizens; the increase of whole authority augments the happinels of their fubjects, by deftroying that intermediate defpoting, which intercepts the prayers of the people to the throne. If thefe humane princes have fuffered the old laws to fubfin, it is doubtelfs becauft they are deterred by the numberlefs obffacels which oppofe the fubverfion of errors eftablished by the fanction of many ages; and therefore every wife citizen will with for the increase of their authority.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Imprifonment.

THAT a magifrate, the executor of the laws, fhould have a power to imprifon a citizen, to deprive the man he hates of his liberty upon fiviolous pretences, and to leave his friend unpunifhed, notwithflanding the ftrongeft proofs of his guilt, is an error as common as it is contrary to the end of fociety, which is perfonai fecurity.

Impriforment is a punithment, which differs from all others in this particular, that it neceffarily precedes conviction; but this difference does not deftroy a circumflance, which is difference ments, viz., that it fhould never be inflicted, but when ordained by the law. The law fhould, therefore, determine the crime, the prefumption, and the evidence fufficient to fubject the accufed to impriforment and examination. Public report, his flight, his extra-judicial confelfion, that of an accomplice, menaces, and his conflant ennity with the perfon injured, the circumflances of the crime, and fuch other. evidence, may may be fufficient to juffify the impriforment of a citizen. But the nature of this evidence flould be determined by the laws, and not by the magiftrates, whole decrees are always contrary to political liberty, when they are not particular applications of a general maxim of the public code. When punithments become leis fevere, and prifons lefs horrible; when compation and humanity fhall penetrate the iron gates of dongeons, and direct the obdurate and inexorable minilters of juffice, the laws may then be fairfield with weaker evidence for impriforment.

A perfon accufed, imprifoned, tried and acquitted, ought not to be branded with any degree of infamy. Among the Romans, we fee that many, accufed of very great crimes, and afterwards declared innocent, were refpected by the people, and honoured with employments in the flate. But why is the fate of an innocent. perfon fo different in this age? It is, becaufe the prefent fystem of penal laws prefents to our minds an idea of power rather than of inffice. It is, because the accused and convicted are thrown indifcriminately into the fame prifon ; becaufe imprifonment is rather a punifhment. than a means of fecuring the perfon of the accufed; and becaufe the interior power, which defends the laws, and the exterior, which defends the throne and kingdom, are feparate when they fhould be united. If the first were (under the common authority of the laws) combined with the right of judging, but not however immediately dependent on the magiftrate, the pomp that attends a military corps, would take off the infamy; which, like all popular opinions, is more attached to the manner and form, than to the thing itfelf; as may be feen in military imprifonment, which, in the common opinion, is not to difgraceful as the civil. But the barbarity and ferocity of our anceftors, the hunters of the north, ftill fubfift among the people, in our cuftoms and our laws, which are always feveral ages behind the actual refinements of a nation.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Profecution and Prefcription.

THE proofs of the crime being obtained, and the certainty of it determined, it is neceffary to allow the criminal the time and means for his julification; but a time fo fhort, as not to diminifit that promptitude of punifiment, which, as we have flawn, is one of the moft powerful means of preventing crimes. A milfaken humanity may object to the flortnefs of the time, but the force of the objection will vanifh, if we confider that the defects of the leightion.

The time for inquiry and for juftification frould be fixed by the laws, add not by the judge, who, in that cafe, would become legiflator. With regard to atrocious crimes, which are long remembered, when they are once proved, if the criminal have fied, no time fhould be allowed; but in lefs confiderable and more obfeure crimes, a time fhould be fixed, after which the delinquent fhould be no longer uncertain of his fate. For in the latter cafe, the length of time, in which the crime is almoft forgrotten, forgotten, prevents the example of impunity, and allows the criminal to amend, and become a better member of fociety.

General principles will here be fufficient, it being impofibile to fix precifely the limits of time for any given legilation, or for any fociety in any particular circumftance. I fhall only add, that in a nation willing to prove the utility of moderate putiliment, laws which, according to the nature of the crime, increafe or diminith the time of inquiry and jufification, confidering the imprifonment or the voluntary exile of the criminal as a part of the punifhment, will form an exify divison of a fmall number of mild punifhments for a great number of crimes.

But, it mult be obferved, the time for inquiry and juffification flould not increase in direct proportion by the trocioudness of crimes; for the probability of exchemises having been committed, is inversely as their atrocioufinels. Therefore the time for inquiring ought, in fome cafes, to be diminified, and that for juffification increased, \mathcal{C} vice ver/a. This may appear to contradict what I have faid above, namely, that equal punifimments may be decreed for unequal crimes, by confidering the time allowed the criminal, or the prifon, as a punifimment.

In

In order to explain this idea, I shall divide crimes into two claffes. The first comprehends homicide, and all greater crimes; the fecond, crimes of an inferior degree. This diffinction is founded in human nature. The prefervation of life is a natural right; the prefervation of property is a right of fociety. The motives that induce men to (hake off the natural fentiment of compassion, which must be destroyed before great crimes can be committed, are much lefs in number than those by which, from the natural defire of being happy, they are infligated to violate a right, which is not founded in the heart of man, but is the work of fociety. The different degrees of probability in thefe two claffes, requires that they fhould be regulated on different principles. In the greateft crimes, as they are lefs frequent, and the probability of the innocence of the accufed being greater, the time allowed him for his justification should be greater, and the time of inquiry lefs. For by haftening the definitive fentence, the flattering hopes of impunity are deftroyed, which are more dangerous, as the crime is more atrocious. On the contrary, in crimes of lefs importance, the probability of the innocence being lefs, the time of inquiry fhould be greater, and that of justification lefs, as impunity is not fo dangerous. L But But this division of crimes into two claffes thould not be admitted, if the confequences of impunity were in proportion to the probability of the crime. It thould be confidered, that a perfon accufed, whofe guilt or innocence is not determined for want of proofs, may be again imprifoned for the fame crime, and be fubject to a new trial, if frelh evidence arifes within the time fixed.

This is, in my opinion, the beft method of providing at the fame time for the fecurity and likerty of the fubject, without favouring one at the expence of the other; which may eafly happen, fince both thefe bleffings, the inalienable and equal patrimony of every citizen, are liable to be invaded, the one by open or difguifed defportifn, and the other by tunultuous and popular anarchy.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of Crimes of difficult Proof.

WITH the foregoing principles in view, it will appear aftonifhing, that reafon hardly ever prefided at the formation of the laws of nations; that the weakeft and molt equivocal evidence, and even conjectures, have been thought fufficient proof for crimes the moft atrocious, (and therefore moft improbable), the moft obfcare and chimerical; as if it were the intercfl of the laws and the judge not to inquire into the truthbut to prove the crime; as if there were not a greater rifk of condemning an innocent perfon, when the probability of his guilt is lefs.

The generality of men want that vigour of mind and refolution, which are as neceflary for great crimes as for great virtues, and which at the fame time produce both the one and the other, in those nations which are fupported by the activity of their government, and a pafilion for the public good. For in those which fubfic by their greatness or power, or by the goodness of their laws, the pafilions being in a weaker degree, feem calculated rather to maintain than to-L 2.

improve the form of government. This naturally leads us to an important conclution, viz. that great crimes do always produce the deflruction of a nation.

There are fome crimes which, though frequent in fociety, are of difficult proof, a circumfrance admitted, as equal to the probability of the innocence of the accused. But as the frequency of these crimes is not owing to their impunity, to much as to other caufes, the danger of their paffing unpunished is of lefs importance, and therefore the time of examination and prefeription may be equally diminished. These principles are different from those commonly received ; for it is in crimes, which are proved with the greateft difficulty, fuch as adultery, and fodomy, that prefumptions, half-proofs, &c. are admitted; as if a man could be half innocent, and half guilty; that is, half punishable and half abfolvable. It is in these cases that torture frould exercise its cruel power on the perfor of the accufed, the witneffes, and even his whole family, as, with unfeeling indifference, fome civilians have taught, who pretend to dictate laws to nations.

Adultery is a crime which, politically confidered, owes its exiftence to two catles, viz. pernicious laws, and the powerful attraction between.

tween the fexes. This attraction is fimilar in many circumflances to gravity, the fpring of motion in the univerfe. Like this, it is diminifhed by diflance; one regulates the motions of the body, the other of the foul. But they differ in one refpect; the force of gravity decreafes in proportion to the obflacles that oppofe it; the other gathers frength and vigour as the obflacles increafe.

If I were fpeaking to nations guided only by the laws of nature, I would tell them, that there is a confiderable difference between adultery and all other crimes. Adultery proceeds from an abufe of that necessity which is constant and universal in human nature; a necessity anterior to the formation of fociety, and indeed the founder of fociety itfelf; whereas, all other crimes tend to the deftruction of fociety, and arife from momentary paffions, and not from a natural neceffity. It is the opinion of those, who have fludied hiftory and mankind, that this neceffity is conftantly in the fame degree in the fame climate. If this be true, ufelefs, or rather pernicious muft all laws and cuftoms be, which tend to diminish the fum total of the effects of this paffion. Such laws would only burden one part of fociety with the additional neceffities of the other, but, on the contrary, wife are the L 3. laws laws which, following the natural courfe of the river, divide the fream into a number of equal branches, preventing thus both flerility and inundation.

Conjugal fidelity is always greater in proportion as marriages are more numerous, and lefs difficult. But when the intereft or pride of familles, or paternal authority, not the inclination of the parties, unite the fexes, gallantry foon breaks the flender ties, in fpite of common moralifts, who exclaim againd the effect, whilf they pardon the caufe. But thefe reflections are ufclefs to thofe, who, living in the true religion, act from fublimer motives, which correct the eternal laws of nature.

The act of adultery is a crime fo inflantaneous, fo myfterious, and fo concealed by the veil which the laws themelives have woven; a veilneceffary indeed, but fo transparent, as to heighten rather than conceal the charms of the object; the opportunities are fo frequent, and the danger of difcovery fo eafily avoided, that it were much eafter for the laws to prevent this crime, than to punifil it when committed.

To every crime, which from its nature muft frequently remain unpunified, the punifiment is an incentive. Such is the nature of the human mind, that difficulties, if not informantable.

able, nor too great for our natural indolence, embellift the object, and fpur us on to the purfuit. They are for many barriers that confine the imagination to the object, and oblige us to confider it in every point of view. In this agitation, the mind naturally inclines and fixes ittelf to the moft agreeable, part, fludioufly avoiding every idea that might create difguft.

The crime of fodomy, fo feverely punished by the laws, and for the proof of which are employed tortures, which often triumph over innocence itfelf, has its fource much lefs in the paffions of man in a free and independent flate, than in fociety and a flave. It is much lefs the effect of a fatiety in pleafures, than of that education, which, in order to make men uffall to others, begins by making them ufelefs to themfelves. In those public feminaries, where ardent youth are carefully excluded from all commerce with the other fex, as the vigour of nature blooms, it is confumed in a manner not only ufelefs to markind, but which accelerates the approach of old age.

The murder of baflard children is, in like manner, the effect of a cruel dile yma, in which a woman finds herfelf who has been feduced through weaknefs, or overcome by force. The alternative is, her own infamy, or the death of a being a being who is incapable of feeling the lofs of life. How can fhe avoid preferring the laft to the inevitable mifery of herfelf and her unhappy infant! The beft method of preventing this crime, would be effectually to protect the weak woman from that tyranny which exaggerates all vices that cannot be concealed under the the cloak of virtue.

I do not pretend to leffen that juft abhorrence which theie crimes deferve, but to difcover the fources from whence they fpring; and I think I may draw the following conclutions: That the punifhment of a crime cannot be juft, (that its, neceffary), if the larus have not enduawared to prevent that crime by the beft means which time; and circumflance; would allow.

CHAP,

CHAP. XXXII.

Of Suicide.

SUICIDE is a crime, which feems not to admit of punifhment, properly speaking; for it cannot be inflicted but on the innocent, or upon an infenfible dead body. In the first cafe, it is unjust and tyrannical, for political liberty fuppofes all punifhments entirely perfonal; in the fecond, it has the fame effect, by way of example, as the fcourging a flatue. Mankind love life too well; the objects that furround them; the feducing phantom of pleafure and hope, that fweeteft error of mortals, which makes men fwallow fuch large draughts of evil, mingled with a very few drops of good, allure them too ftrongly, to apprehend that this crime will ever be common from its unavoidable impunity. The laws are obeyed through fear of punifhment, but death deftroys all fenfibility. What motive then can reftrain the defperate hand of fuicide?

He who kills himfelf does a lefs injury to fociety, than he who quits his country for ever; for the other leaves his property behind him, but this carries with him at leaft a part of his fubflance.

fubfance. Befides, as the firength of a fociety confifts in the number of citizens, he who quits one nation to refide in another, becomes a double lofs. This then is the quefition : whether it be advantageous to fociety, that its members fhould enjoy the unlimited privilege of migration?

Every law that is not armed with force, or which, from circumflances, muft be ineffectual, fhould not be promulgated. Opinion, which reigns over the minds of men, obeys the flow and indirect imprefions of the legiflator, but refifs them when violently and directly applied; and ufelefs laws communicate their infignificance to the moft fahtury, which are regarded more as obfacles to be furmounted, than as fafeguards of the public good. But further, our perceptions being limited, by enforcing the obfervance. of laws which are evidently ufelefs, we deftroy, the influence of the moft fahtury.

From this principle, a wile diffender of public happinels may draw fome ulfend confequences, the explanation of which would carry me too far from my fubjech, which is to prove the inutility of making the nation a prifon. Such a law is vain, becaufe, unleis inacceffible rocks, or impaffable feas, divide the country from all others, how will it be poffible to fecure every point.

point of the circumference, or how will you guard the guards themfelves? Befides, this crime, once committed, cannot be punished; and to punish it before hand, would be to punifh the intention and not the action; the will, which is entirely out of the power of human laws. To punish the absent by confiscating his effects, befides the facility of collution, which would inevitably be the cafe, and which, without tyranny, could not be prevented, would put a ftop to all commerce with other nations. To punish the criminal when he returns, would be to prevent him from repairing the evil he had already done to fociety, by making his abfence perpetual. Befides, any prohibition would increafe the defire of removing, and would infallibly prevent strangers from fettling in the country.

What muft we think of a government which has no means, but fear, to keep its fubjects in their own country; to which, by the first imprefilons of their infancy, they are fo ftrongly attached. The most certain method of keeping men at home, is, to make them happy; and it is the interest of every flate to turn the balance, not only of commerce, but of felicity, in favour of its fubjects. The pleasures of laxury are not the principal fources of this happines's though, by by preventing the too great accumulation of wealth in few hands, they become a neceflary remedy againft the too great inequality of individuals, which always increafes with the progrefs of fociety.

When the populoufnefs of a country does not increafe in proportion to its extent, luxury favours defpotifm, for where men are most difperfed, there is leaft industry, the dependence of the poor upon the luxury of the rich is greateft, and the union of the oppreffed against the oppreffors is least to be feared. In fuch circumstances, rich and powerful men more eafily command diffinction, refpect and fervice, by which they are raifed to a greater height above the poor; for men are more independent the lefs they are obferved, and are least obferved when most numerous. On the contrary, when the number of people is too great in proportion to the extent of a country, luxury is a check to defpotifm ; becaufe it is a four to industry, and becaufe the labour of the poor affords fo many pleafures to the rich, that they difregard the luxury of oftentation, which would remind the people of their dependence. Hence we fee, that in vaft and depopulated ftates, the luxury of oftentation prevails over that of convenience; but, in the countries more populous, the luxury of convenience tends conftantly to diminish the luxury of oftentation.

The

The pleafures of luxury have this inconvenience, that though they employ a great number of hands, yet they are only enjoyed by a few, whilf the reft, who do not partake of them, feel the want more fenfibly, on comparing their flate with that of others. Security and liberty, refrained by the laws, are the bafis of happineis, and when attended by thefe, the pleafures of luxury favour population, without which they be come the infrument of tyranny. As the moft noble and generous animals fly to folitude and inacceffible deferts, and abandon the fertile plans to man, their greateff enemy; fo men reject pleafure itleff, when offered by the hand of tyranny.

But to return. If it be demonsfrated, that the faws which imprison men in their own country are vain and unjuh, it will be equally true of those which punish fuicide, for that can only be punished after death, which is in the power of God alone; but it is no crime, with regard to man, because the punishment falls on an innocent family. If it be objected, that the consideration of fuch a punishment may prevent the crime; I answer, that he who can calmly remounce the pleasure of existence; who is fo weary of life as to brave the idea of eternal milery, will never be influenced by the more distant and lefs powerful colderations of family and children.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of Smuggling.

SMUGGLING is a real offence against the fovereign and the nation; but the punifhment should not brand the offender with infamy, because this crime is not infamous in the public opinion. By inflicting infamous punifhments, for crimes that are not reputed fo, we deftroy that idea where it may be useful. If the fame punishment be decreed for killing a pheafant as for killing a man, or for forgery, all difference between those crimes will shortly vanish. It is thus that moral fentiments are deftroyed in the heart of man; fentiments, the work of many ages and of much bloodshed; fentiments, that are fo flowly, and with fo much difficulty, produced, and for the establishment of which such fublime motives, and fuch an apparatus of ceremonies, were thought neceffary.

This crime is owing to the laws themfelters, for the higher the duties, the greater is the ad, vantage, and, confequently, the temptation ; which temptation is increased by the facility of perpetration, when the circumference that is guarded guarded is of great extent, and the merchandile prohibited is finall in bulk. The feizure and lofs of the goods attempted to be finuggied, together: with those that are found along with them, is just just it would be better to leffen the duty, becaufe men rifque only in proportion to the advantage expected.

This crime being a theft of what belongs to the prince, and confequently to the nation, why is it not attended with infamy? I anfwer, that crimes, which men confider as productive of no bad confequences to themfelves, do not intereft them fufficiently to excite their indignation. The generality of mankind, upon whom remote confequences make no impression, do not fee the evil that may refult from the practice of fmuggling, especially if they reap from it any prefent advantage. They only perceive the lofs fullained by the prince. They are not then interched in refusing their efteem to the finuggler, as to one who has committed a theft or a forgery, or other crimes, by which they themfelves may fuffer; from this evident principle, that a fenfible being only interefts himfelf in those evils with which he is acquainted.

Shall this crime, then, committed by one who has nothing to lofe, go unpunifhed? No. There are certain fpecies of fmuggling, which fo parti-M 2. cularly cularly affect the revenue; a part of government fo effential, and managed with fo much difficulty, that they deferve impriforment, or even flavery; but yet of fuch a nature as to be proportioned to the crime. For example, it would be highly unjuft that a finuggler of tobacco fhould differ the fame punifihment with a robber or affaifin; but it would be molt conformable to the nature of the offence, that the produce of his labour fhould be applied to the ufe of the crown, which he intended to defraud.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Of Bankrupts.

THE necessity of good faith in contracts and the fupport of commerce, oblige the legiflature to fecure, for the creditors, the perfons of bankrupts. It is, however, necessary to diffinguish between the fraudulent and the honeft bankrupt. The fraudulent bankrupt fhould be punished in the fame manner with him who adulterates the coin; for to falfify a piece of coin, which is a pledge of the mutual obligations between citizens, is not a greater crime than to violate the obligations themfelves. But the bankrupt who, after a strict examination, has proved before proper judges, that either the fraud or loffes of others, or misfortunes unavoidable by human prudence, have ftript him of his fubftance; upon what barbarous pretence is he thrown into prifon, and deprived of the only remaining good, the melancholy enjoyment of mere liberty? Why is he ranked with criminals, and in defpair compelled to repent of his honefty? Confcious of his innocence, he lived eafy and happy under the protection of those laws, which, it is true, he violated, but not intentionally. M. 3 Laws.

Laws, dictated by the avarice of the rich, and accepted by the poor, feduced by that univerfal flattering hope which makes men believe, that all unlucky accidents are the lot of others, and the moft fortunate only their flatter. Mankind, when influenced by the firlt imprefinons, love cruel laws, although being fubject to them themfelves, it is the intereft of every perfon that they flouid be as mild as poffible; but the fear of being injured is always more prevalent than the intention of injuring others.

But to return to the honeft bankrupt. Let his debt, if you will, not be confidered as cancelled till the payment of the whole; let him bu refued the liberty of leaving the country without leave of his creditors, or of carrying into another nation that indufty which, under a penalty, he should be obliged to employ for their benefit; but what pretences can juftify the depriving an innocent, though unfortunate man of his liberty, without the leaft utility to his creditors 2

But, fay they, the hardfhips of confinement will induce him to diffcover his fraudulent tranfactions; an event that can hardly be fuppoled, after a rigorous examination of his conduct and affairs. But if they are not diffcovered, he will efcape unpunified. It is, I think, a maxim of govern-government, that the importance of the political inconveniences, arising from the impunity of a crime, are directly as the injury to the public, and inverfely as the difficulty of proof.

It will be neceffary to diffinguifh fraud, attended with aggravating circumfances, from fimple fraud, and that from perfect innocence. For the firft, let there be ordained the fame punithment as for forgery; for the fecond, a lefs punifhment but with the loss of liberty; and if perfectly honeft, let the bankrupt himfelf chufe the method of re-eftablishing himfelf, and of faidsfying his creditors; or if he fhould appear not to have been firfdly honeft, let that be determined by his creditors: but thefe diffunctions fhould be fixed by the laws, which alone are impartial, and not by the arbitrary and dangerous prudence of judges *.

With

• It may be alledged, that the interefl of commerce and property fine ulb factured; but commerce and property are not the end of the focial compact, but the means of obtaining that end; and to oppole all the members of fociety to cred laws, to prairive them from evils, neceffirily occafioned by the infair ic combinations which reful from the adual flage of political focieties, would be to make the end fubferies to the means, a parkaging in all foiences, and particularly in politics. In the former adiabase of this work, I myfelf fell into this arror, when I field that the honefl bankrupt fload be kept in cufledy, as a pledge for his delts, or employed

With what eafe might a fagacious legiflator : prevent the greateft part of fraudulent bankruptcies, and remedy the misfortunes that befal the honeft and industrious! A public register of all contracts, with the liberty of confulting it, allowed to every citizen; a public fund formed by a contribution of the opulent merchants for . the timely affiftance of unfortunate industry, were establishments that could produce no real inconveniences, and many advantages. But unhappily the most fimple, the easiest, yet the wifest laws, that wait only for the nod of the legillator, to diffuse through nations wealth, power, and felicity; laws which would be regarded by future generations with eternal gratitude, are either unknown, or rejected. CHAP. XXXV.

Of Sanctuaries.

ARE fanctuaries juft? Is a convention between nations, mutually to give up their criminals, ufeful.?

In the whole extent of a political flate, there fhould be no place independent of the laws. Their power flould follow every fubject, as the fhadow follows the body. Sanctuaries, and impunity, differ only in degree, and as the effect of punifhments depends more on their certainty, than their greatness, men are more ftrongly invited to crimes by fanctuaries, than they are deterred by punishment. To increase the number of fanctuaries, is to erect fo many little fovereignties: for, when the laws have no power, new bodies will be formed in opposition to the public good, and a fpirit effablished contrary to that of the flate. Hiftory informs us, that from . the use of fanctuaries have arisen the greatest. revolutions in kingdoms, and in opinions.

Some have pretended, that in whatever country a crime, that is, an action contrary to the laws of fociety, be committed, the criminal may be be justly punished for it in any other; as if the character of fubject were indelible, or fynonimous with, or worfe than that of flave; as if a man could live in one country, and be fubiect to the laws of another, or be accountable for his actions to two fovereigns, or two codes of laws, often contradictory. There are also who think, that an act of cruelty committed, for example, at Conftantinople may be punished at Paris: for this abstracted reason, that he who offends humanity, fhould have enemies in all mankind, and be the object of universal execration; as if judges were to be the knights-errant of human nature in general, rather than guardians of particular conventions between men. The place of punifhment can certainly be no. other, than that where the crime was committed; for the necessity of punishing an individual for the general good fubfifts there, and there only. A villain, if he has not broke through the conventions of a fociety of which, by my fupposition, he was not a member, may be feared, and by force banifhed and excluded from that fociety; but ought not to be formally punifhed by the laws, which were only intended to maintain the focial compact, and not to punish the intrinsic malignity of actions.

Whether

Whether it be ufeful that nations (hould mutually deliver up their criminals? Although the certainty of there being no part of the earth where crimes are not punifhed, may be a means of preventing them, I fhall not pretend to determine this quefition, until laws more conformable to the necefities and rights of humanity, and until milder punifhments, and the abolition of the arbitrary power of opinion, fhall afford fecurity to virtue and innocence when oppreffed; and until tyranny fhall be confined to the plains of Afa, and Europe acknowledge the univerfall empire of reafon, by which the intereffs of fovereigns and fubjects are beft united.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of Rewards for apprehending, or killing Criminals.

LET us now inquire, whether it be advantageous to fociety, to fet a price on the head of a criminal, and fo to make of every citizen an executioner. If the offender hath taken refuge in another state, the fovereign encourages his fubjects to commit a crime, and to expose themfelves to a just punishment; he infults that nation, and authorifes the fubiects to commit on their neighbours fimilar usurpations. If the criminal still remain in his own country, to fet a price upon his head, is the ftrongeft proof of the weakness of the government. He who has ftrength to defend himfelf, will not purchase the affiftance of another. Befides, fuch an edict confounds all the ideas of virtue and morality, already too wavering in the mind of man. At one time treachery is punished by the laws, at another encouraged. With one hand the legiflator ftrengthens the ties of kindred and friendship, and with the other rewards the violation of both. Always in contradiction with himfelf.

himfelf, now he invites the fufpefting minds of men to mutual confidence, and now he plants diffurd in every heart. To prevent one crime, he gives birth to a thouſand. Such are the expedients of weak nations, whoſe laws are like temporary repairs to a tottering fabric. On the contrary, as a nation becomes more enlightened, honeſhy and mutual confidence become more necefiary, aad are daily tending to unite with found policy. Artifice, cabal, and obfcure and indireft actions are more eafily difcovered, and the intereft of the whole is better fecured againft the paffions of the individual.

Even the times of ignorance, when private virtue was encouraged by public morality, may afford inftruction and example to more enlightened ages. But laws which reward treafon, excite clandefline war, and mutual diffruft, oppofe that neceffary union of morality and policy, which is the foundation of happinefs, and univerfal peace.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of Attempts, Accomplices, and Pardon.

THE laws do not puaifh the intention i, neverthelefs an attempt, which manifefts the itention of committing a crime, deferves a punifhment, though lefs, perhaps, than if the crime were aftually perpetrated. The importance of preventing even attempts to commit a crime fufficiently authorifes a pualithment; but as there may be an interval of time between the attempt and the execution, it is proper to referve the greater punifhment for the aftual commificion, that even after the attempt there may be a motive for defifting.

In like manner, with regard to the accomplices, they ought not to fuffer fo fevere a punifument as the immediate perpetrator of the crime. But this for a different reafon. When a number of men unite, and run a common rifk, the greater the danger, the more they endeavour to diffribute it equally. Now, if the principals be punifued more feverely than the accellaries, it will prevent the danger from being equally divided, and will increafe the difficulty of finding a perfon to execute the crime, as his danger is greater greater by the difference of the punishment. There can be but one exception to this rule; and that is, when the principal receives a reward from the accomplices. In that cafe, as the difference of the danger is compenfated, the punifhment fhould be equal. Thefe reflections may appear too refined to those who do not confider, that it is of great importance, that the laws (hould leave the affociates as few means as poffible of agreeing among themfelves.

In fome tribunals, a pardon is offered to an accomplice in a great crime, if he difcover his affociates. This expedient has its advantages. The difadvantages are, that the law authorites treachery, which is detefted even by the villains themfelves; and introduces crimes of cowardice. which are much more pernicious to a nation than crimes of courage. Courage is not common, and only wants a benevolent power to direct it to the public good. Cowardice, on the contrary, is a frequent, felf-interested, and contagious evil, which can never be improved into a virtue. Befides, the tribunal, which has recourse to this method, betrays its fallibility, and the laws their weaknefs, by imploring the affistance of those by whom they are violated.

The advantages are, that it prevents great crimes, the effects of which being public, and the N 2.

perpetrators ,

perpetrators concealed, terrify the people. If alfo contributes to prove, that he who violates the laws, which are public conventions, will alfo violate private compacts. It appears to me, that a general law, promifing a reward to every accomplice who difcovers his affociates, would be better than a fpecial declaration in every particular cafe; becaufe it would prevent the union of those villains, as it would infpire a mutual diffruft, and each would be afraid of expofing himfelf alone to danger. The accomplice, however, should be pardoned, on condition of transportation. But it is in vain, that I torment myfelf with endeavouring to extinguish the remorfe I feel in attempting to induce the facred laws, the monument of public confidence, the foundation of human morality, to authorife diffimulation and perfidy. But what an example does it offer to a nation, to fee the interpreters of the laws break their promife of pardon, and on the ftrength of learned fubtleties, and to the feandal of public faith, drag him to punishment who hath accepted of their invitation ! Such examples are not uncommon, and this is the reafon, that political fociety is regarded as a complex machine, the fprings of which are moved at pleafure by the most dexterous or most powerful.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of Suggestive Interrogations.

THE laws forbid fuggestive interrogations ; that is, according to the civilians, queflions which, with regard to the circumstances of the crime, are special when they should be general ; or, in other words, those queftions which, having an immediate reference to the crime, fuggeft to the criminal an immediate anfwer. . Interrogations. according to the law, ought to lead to the fact indirectly and obliquely, but never directly or immediately. . The intent of this injunction is, either that they fhould not fuggeft to the accufed an immediate anfwer that might acquit him, or that they think it contrary to nature that a man should accuse himfelf. But, whatever be the motive, the laws have fallen into a palpable contradiction, in condemning fuggeftive interrogations, whilft they authorife torture. . Can there be an interrogation more fuggeftive than pain? Torture will fuggeft to a robuft villain an obfinate filence, that he may exchange a greater punifhment for a lefs; and to a feeble man confeffion, to relieve him from the prefent pain, N.3 which which affects him more than the apprehension of the future. If a special interrogation be contrary to the right of nature, as it to bliges a man to accuse himself, torture will certainly do it more effectually. But men are influenced more by the names than the nature of things.

He who obfinately refufes to anfwer the interrogatories, deferves a punifitment, which thould be fixed by the laws, and that of the fevereft kind; that criminals fhould not, by their filence, evade the example which they owe the public. But this punifitment is not neceffary when the guilt of the criminal is indifputable, becaufe in that cafe interrogation is uffelefs, as is likewife his confeffion, when there are, without it, proofs fufficient. This laft cafe is molt common, for experience fhews, that in the greateft' number of criminal profecutions, the culprit pleads not quilty.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of. a particular Kind of Crimes.

THE reader will perceive that I have omitted fpeaking of a certain class of crimes, which, has covered Europe with blood, and raifed up those horrid piles, from whence, midft clouds of whirling fmoke, the groans of human victims, the crackling of their bones, and the frying of their still panting bowels, were a pleasing spectacle and agreeable harmony to the fanatic multitude. But men of understanding will perceive, that the age and country in which I live will not permit me to inquire into the nature of this crime. It were too tedious, and foreign to my. fubject, to prove the necessity of a perfect uniformity of opinions in a state, contrary to the examples of many nations; to prove that opinions, which differ from one another only in fome fubtile and obfcure diffinctions, beyond the reach of human capacity, may neverthelefs difturb the public tranquillity, unless one only . religion be established by authority; and that fome opiaions, by being contrafted and oppofed to each other, in their collision frike out the truth ; truth ; whilft others, feeble in themfelves, require the fupport of power and authority. It would, I fay, carry me too far, were I to prove, that, how odious foever is the empire of force over the opinions of mankind, from whom it only obtains diffimulation followed by contempt; and although it may feem contrary to the fpirit of humanity and brotherly love, commanded us by reafon, and authority, which we more refpect, it is neverthelefs necessary and indifpenfible. We are to believe, that all these paradoxes are refoved beyond a doubt, and are conform-able to the true interest of mankind, if practifed by a lawful authority. I write only of crimes which violate the laws of nature and the focial contract, and not of fins, even the temporal punifhments of which must be determined from . other principles than those of a limited human philofophy.

CHAP.

CHAP. XL.

Of falle Ideas of Utility,

A PRINCIPAL fource of errors and injuftice, are faile ideas of utility. For example; that legilator has falle ideas of utility, who confiders particular more than general conveniences; who had rather command the featuments of mankind than excite them, and dares fay to reafon, " Be thou a flave;" who would facrifice a thoufand real advantages to the fear of an imaginary or trifling inconvenience; who would deprive men of the ule of fire for fear of being burnt, and of water for fear of their being drowned; and who know of no mean of preventing evil bur by defitroying it.

The laws of this nature, are thole which forbid to wear arms, difaming thole only who arenot difpolde to commit the crime which the laws, mean to prevent. Can it be imposed, that thole who have the courage to violate the moft facred, laws of humanity, and the moft important of the code, will respect the lefs confiderable and arbitrary injunctions, the violation of which is fo cafy, and of to little comparative importance? Does

Does not the execution of this law deprive the fubject of that perfonal liberty, fo dear to mankind and to the wife legiflator; and does it not fubject the innocent to all the difagreeable circumifances that flould only fall on the guilty 7 It certainly makes the fituation of the affaulted worfe, and the affailants better, and rather encourages than prevents murder, as it requires lefs courage to attack armed than unarmed perfons.

It is a falfe idea of utility, that would give to a multitude of fenfible beings that fymmetry and order, which inanimate matter is alone capable. of receiving; to negleft the prefent, which are the only motives that aft with force and conflancy on the multitude, for the more diflant, whole imprefions are weak and transitory, unlefs increafed by that fitragith of imagination fo very uncommon among maxiknd. Finally, that is a falfe idea of utility, which, facrificing things to names, feparates the public good from that of individuals.

There is this difference between a flate of fociety and a flate of nature, that a favage does no more mifchief to another than is neceffary to procure fome benefit to himfelf , but a man in fociety is fometimes tempted, from a fault in the laws, to injure another, without any profect of advantage. The tyrant infpires his valifals with fear and fervillty, which rebound upon him with double force, and are the caule of his torment. Fear, the more private and domelic it is, the lefs dangerous is it to him who makes it the infrument of his happinefs; but the more it is public, and the greater number of people it affects, the greater is the probability that fome mad, deperate, or definding expectations; and this will be the more eafily accomplified, as the danger of the enterprize will be divided amongit a greater number, becaufe the value the unhappy fet upon their exiltence is lefs, as their mifery is greater.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Means of preventing Crimes.

IT is better to prevent crimes, than to punifh them. This is the fundamental principle of good legiflation, which is the art of conducting men to the maximum of happinefs, and to the minimum of milery, if we may apply this mathematical expression to the good and evil of life. But the means hitherto employed for that purpole, are generally inadequate, or contrary to the end proposed. It is imposfible to reduce the tumultuous activity of mankind to abfolute regularity; for, midft the various and oppofite attractions of pleafure and pain, human laws are not fufficient entirely to prevent diforders in fociety. Such, however, is the chimera of weak men, when invefted with authority. To prohibit a number of indifferent actions, is not to prevent the crimes which they may produce, but to create new ones; it is to change at will the ideas of virtue and vice, which, at other times, we are told, are eternal and immutable. To what a fituation fhould we be reduced, if every thing were to be forbidden that might poffibly lead to a crime ?

a crime? We must be deprived of the use of our fenfes. For one motive that induces a man to commit a real crime, there are a thousand which excite him to those indifferent actions. which are called crimes by bad laws. If then, the probability that a crime will be committed be in proportion to the number of motives, to extend the iphere of crimes will be to increase that probability. The generality of laws are only exclusive privileges; the tribute of all to the advantage of a few.

Would you prevent crimes? Let the laws be clear and fimple ; let the entire force of the nation be united in their defence; let them be intended rather to favour every individual, than any particular claffes of men; let the laws be feared, and the laws only. The fear of the laws is falutary, but the fear of men is a fruitful and fatal fource of crimes. Men enflaved are more voluptuous, more debauched, and more cruel than those who are in a state of freedom. Thefe fludy the fciences, the intereft of nations, have great objects before their eyes, and imitate them; but those, whose views are confined to the prefent moment, endeavour, midft the difraction of riot and debauchery, to forget their fituation; accuftomed to the uncertainty of all events, for the laws determine none, the confequence fequence of their crimes become problematical, which gives an additional force to the ftrength of their paffions.

In a nation, indolent from the nature of the climate, the uncertainty of the laws confirms and increafes men's indolence and flupidity. In a voluptuous but active nation, this uncertainty occafions a multiplicity of cabals and intrigues, which fpread diffruft and diffidence through the hearts of all, and diffimulation and treachery are the foundation of their prudence. In a brave and powerful nation, this uncertainty of the laws is at laft deftroyed, after many ofcillations from liberty to flavery, and from flavery to liberty again.

CHAP. XLII.

Of the Sciences.

WOULD you prevent crimes? Let liberty be attended with knowledge. As knowledge extends, the difadvantages which attend it diminifh, and the advantages increase. A daring impostor, who is always a man of fome genius, is adored by the ignorant populace, and defpiled by men of understanding. Knowledge facilitates the comparison of objects, by thewing them in different points of view. When the clouds of ignorance are difpelled by the radiance of knowledge, authority trembles, but the force of the laws remains immoveable. Men of enlightened understanding must necessarily approve those useful conventions, which are the foundation of public fafety; they compare, with the higheft fatisfaction, the inconfiderable portion of liberty of which they are deprived, with the fum total facrificed by others for their fecurity; obferving that they have only given up the pernicious liberty of injuring their fellow-creatures, they blefs the throne, and the laws upon which it is eftablifhed.

It is falle that the fedences have always been prejudicial to mankind. When they were fo, the vil was inevitable. The multiplication of the human fpecies on the face of the earth introduced war, the rudiments of arts, and the firfl laws, which were temporary compacts arifing from neceflity, and perithing with it. This was the firfl philofophy, and its few elements were juft, as indolence and want of fagacity, in the early inhabitants of the world, preferved them from error.

But neceffities increasing with the number of mankind, ftronger and more lafting impreffions were neceffary to prevent their frequent relapfes into a flate of barbarity, which became every day more fatal. The first religious errors, which peopled the earth with falle divinities, and created a world of invisible beings to govern the vifible creation, were of the utmost fervice to mankind. The greatest benefactors to humanity were those who dared to deceive, and led pliant ignorance to the foot of the altar. By prefenting to the minds of the vulgar things out of the reach of their fenfes, which fled as they purfued, and always eluded their grafp; which, as they never comprehended, they never defpifed, their different paffions were united, and attached to a fingle object. This was the first transition of all nations nations from their favage flate. Such was the neceffary, and perhaps the only bond of all focieties at their first formation. I fpeak not of the chofen people of God, to whom the most extraordinary miracles, and the most fignal favours, fupplied the place of human policy. But as it is the nature of error to fubdivide itfelf ad infinitum, fo the pretended knowledge which fprung from it transformed mankind into a blind fanatic multitude, jarring and deftroying each other in the labyrinth in which they were inclosed : hence it is not wonderful, that fome fenfible and philofophic minds fhould regret the ancient ftate of barbarity. This was the first epocha in which knowledge, or rather opinions, were fatal.

The fecond may be found in the difficult and terrible passage from error to truth, from darknefs to light. The violent flock between a mafs of errors, useful to the few and powerful, and the truths fo important to the many and the weak, with the fermentation of paffions excited on that occasion, were productive of infinite evils to unhappy mortals. In the fludy of hiftory, whofe principal periods, after certain intervals, much refemble each other, we frequently . find, in the neceffary paffage from the obfcurity of ignorance to the light of philosophy, and from tyranny to liberty, its natural confequence, one gene-generation facrificed to the happine(s of the next. But when this flame is extinguilhed, and the world delivered from its evils, truth, after a very flow progrefs, fits down with monarchs on the throne, and is worthipped in the alfemblies of nations. Shall we then believe, that light diffufed among the people is more defructive than darknefs, and that the knowledge of the relations of things can ever be fatal to mankind?

Ignorance may indeed be lefs fatal than a fmall degree of knowledge, becaufe this adds, to the evils of ignorance, the inevitable errors of a confined view of things on this fide the bounds of truth; but a man of enlightened understanding, appointed guardian of the laws, is the greatest bleffing that a fovereign can bestow on a nation. Such a man is accuftomed to behold truth, and not to fear it; unacquainted with the greatest part of those imaginary and infatiable neceffities, which fo often put virtue to the proof, and accuftomed to contemplate mankind from the most elevated point of view, he confiders the nation as his family, and his fellow citizens as brothers; the diftance between the great and the vulgar appears to him the lefs, as the number of mankind he has in view is greater.

The philo(opher has necefities and interefts unknown to the vulgar, and the chief of thefe is not to belie in public the principles he taught in oblcurity, and the habit of loving virtue for its own fake. A few fach philo(ophers would conflutte the happinefs of a nation, which however would be but of fhort duration, unlefs by good laws the number were fo increafed as to leften the probability of an improper choice.

CHAP. XLIII.

Of Magistrates.

ANOTHER method of preventing crimesis, to make the obfervance of the laws, and not their violation, the intereft of the magifrate.

The greater the number of thofe who conflitute the tribunal, the lefs is the danger of corruption ; becaufe the attempt will be more difficult, and the power and temptation of each individual will be proportionably lefs. If the fovereign, by pomp and the auflerity of edicts, and by refufing to hear the complaints of the oppreffed, accuftom his fubjects to refpect the magiftrates more than the laws, the magiftrates will gain indeed, but it will be at the expence of public and private fecurity.

CHAP:

CHAP. XLIV.

Of Rewards.

Y E T another method of preventing crimes is, to reward virtue. Upon this fubject the laws of all nations are filent. If the rewards, propoled by academies for the difcovery of ufeful truths, have fncreafed our knowledge, and multiplied good books, is it not probable that rewards, diftributed by the beneficent hand of a fovereign, would alfo multiply virtuous actions? The coin of honour is inexhauftible, and is abundantly fruitful in the hands of a prince who diftributes it wifely.

CHAP. XLV.

Of Education.

FINALLY, the moft certain method of preventing crimes, is to perfect the fyftem of education. But this is an object too vaft, and exceeds my plan; an object, if I may venture to declare it, which is fo intimately connected with the nature of government, that it will always remain a barren fpot, cultivated only by a few wife men.

A great man, who is perfecuted by that world he hath enlightened, and to whom we are indebted for many important truths, hath moft amply detailed the principal maxims of uleful education. This chiefly confifts in preferining to the mind a fmall number of fieles objects; in fubfituting the originals for the copies, both of phyfical and moral phenomena; in leading the pupil to virtue by the eafy road of featiment, and in withholding him from evil by che infallible power of neceflary inconveniesces, rather than by command, which only obtains counterfeit and momentary obelience.

CHAP.

CHAP. XLVI. Of Pardons.

AS punifhments become more mild, clemency and pardon are lefs neceffary. Happy the nation in which they will be confidered as dangerous! Clemency, which has often been deemed a fufficient fubflitute for every other virtue in fovereigns, should be excluded in a perfect legiflation, where punifhments are mild, and the proceedings in criminal cafes regular and expeditious. This truth will feem cruel to those who live in countries, where, from the abfurdity of the laws, and the feverity of punifhments, pardons, and the clemency of the prince, are neceffary. It is indeed one of the nobleft prerogatives of the throne, but, at the fame time, a tacit disapprobation of the laws. Clemency is a virtue which belongs to the legiflator, and not to the executor of the laws; a virtue which ought to fhine in the code, and not in private judgment. To fhew mankind, that crimes are fometimes pardoned, and that punifhment is not . the neceffary confequence, is to nourifh the flattering hope of impunity, and is the caufe of their confidering every punifiment inflicted as an act of injustice and oppression. The prince, in pardoning, gives up the public fecurity in fayour of an individual, and, by his ill-judged benevolence, proclaims a public act of impunity. Let, then, the executors of the laws be inexorable, but let the legiflator be tender, indulgent and humane. He is a wife architect, who erects his edifice on the foundation of felf-love, and contrives, that the intereft of the public shall be the interest of each individual; who is not obliged by particular laws, and irregular proceedings, to feparate the public good from that of individuals, and erect the image of public felicity on the bafis of fear and diffruft; but, like a wife philosopher, he will permit his brethren to enjoy, in quiet, that fmall portion of happinefs, which the immenfe fystem, established by the first cause, permits them to taste on this earth, which is but a point in the univerfe.

an

A fmall crime is fometimes pardoned, if the perfon offended chufes to forgive the offender. This may be an act of good-nature and humanity, but it is contrary to the good of the public. 'The right of punishing belongs not to any individual in particular, but to fociety in general, or the fovereign. He may renounce his own portion of this right, but cannot give up that of others.

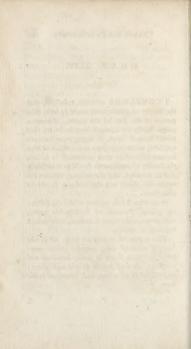

CHAP. XLVII.

Conclusion.

I CONCLUDE with this reflection, that the feverity of punifhments ought to be in proportion to the flate of the nation. Among a people hardly yet emerged from barbarity, they fhould be moft fevere, as flrong imprefilions are required; but in proportion as the minds of men become forkened by their intercourfe in fociety, the feverity of punifhments thould be diminifhed, if it be intended, that the neceffary relation between the object and the fendation thould be maintained.

From what I have written refults the following general theorem, of confiderable utility, though not conformable to cuftom, the common legiflator of nations.

That a punifhment may not be an all of violence, of one or of many, againft a private member of fociery, it bould be public, immediate and neceffary; the leaft poffible in the cafe given; proportioned to the crime, and determined by the lavas.

COMMENTARY

ON THE BOOK OF

CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

CHAP. I.

The Occasion of this Commentary.

AVING read, with infinite fatisfaction, the little book on Crimes and Punithments, which in morality, as in medicine, may be compared to one of thofe few remedies, capable of alleviating our fufferings; I flattered myfelf that it would be a means of fofferning the remains of barbarifm in the laws of many nations; I hoped for fome reformation in mankind, when I was informed, that, within a few miles of my abode, they had juft hanged a girl of eighteen, beautiful, well made, accomplihed,• and of a very reputable family.

She was culpable of having fuffered herfelf to be got with child, and alfo, of having aban-P. 2. doned doned her infant. This unfortunate girl, fying from her father's houfe, is taken in labour, and, without affildance, is delivered of her burden by the fide of a wood. Shame, which in the fex is a powerful paffion, gave her ftrength to return home, and to conceal her futuation. She left her child expofed; it is found the next morning; the mother is diffeovered, condemned and executed.

The firft fault of this unhappy viGim ought to have been concealed by the family, or rather chains the protection of the laws, becaufe it was incumbent on her feducer to repair the injury he had done; becaufe weaknels hath a right to indialgence; becaufe weaknels her pregnancy may endanger her life; becaufe declaring her condition deftroys her reputation, and becaufe the difficulty of providing for her infant is a great additional misfortune.

Her fecond fault is more criminal. She abandons the fruit of her weaknefs, and expofes it to perifh.

But becaufe a child is dead, is it abfolutely neceffary to kill the mother? She did not kill the child. She fattered herielf, that fome paffenger would have compafilion on the innocent babe. It is even pofible that fhe might intend to return and provide for it; a fentiment fo natural in the breaft of a mother, that it ought to be prefumed. The law in the country of which I am focaking, is, indeed, politively againft her. But is it not an unjuft, inhuman, and pernicious law? Unjuft, becanfe it makes no difinction between her who murders, and her who abandons her infart; inhuman, becaufe it punithes with death a too great defire of concealing a weaknefs; pernicious, becaufe it deprives the flate of a fruitful fubject, in a country that wants inhabitants.

Charity hath not yet efhablished, in that nation, houfes of reception for exposed infants. Where charity is wanting, the law is always cruel. It were much better to prevent, than to think only of punifhing thefe frequent misfortunes. The proper object of jurifyrudence is, to hinder the commission of crimes, rather than condemn to death a weak woman, when it is evident that her transgrefilon was unattended with malice, and that file hath already been feverely punifhed by the pages of her own heart.

Infure, as far as poffible, a refource to those who shall be tempted to do evil, and you will. have less to punish.

CHAP. II.

Of Punifbments ...

THIS misfortune, and this very hard law; with which I was fo fenfibly affected, prompted me to caft my eyes on the criminal code of nations. The humane author of the Effay on Crimes and Punithments, had but too much caufe to complain, that the latter frequently exceed the former, and are fometimes detrimental to the flate they were intended to ferve.

Those ingenious punifhments, the ne plus ultra of the human mind, endeavouring to render death horrible, feem rather the invenuons of tyranny than of juffice.

The panifhment of the wheel was firft introduced in Germany in the times of anarchy, when those who ufurped the regal power refolved to terrify, with unheard-of torments, those who fhould difput their authority. In England they ripped open the belly of a man guilty of hightreadyn, tore out his heart, dathed it in his face, and then threw it into the fire. And wherein, did this high-treadyn frequently confift? In having been, during a civil war, faithful to an unforunfortunate king; or in having fpoken freely on the doubtful right of the conqueror. At length, their manners were foftened; they contuned to tear out the heart, but not ill after the death of the offender. The apparatus is dreadful, but the death is mild, if death canwere he mild.

176 A COMMENTARY ON

CHAP. III.

On the Puniforment of Heretics.

THE denunciation of death to those who, in certain dogmas, differed from the established church, was peculiarly the act of tyranny. No Chriftian emperor, before the tyrant Maximus, ever thought of condemning a man to punishment merely for points of controverfy. It is true, indeed, that two Spanish bishops purfued to death the Prifcilianifts under Maximus; but it is alfo true, that this tyrant was willing to gratify the reigning party with the blood of heretics. Barbarity and justice were to him indifferent. Jealous of Theodofius, a Spaniard like himfelf, he endeavoured to deprive him of the empire of the East, as he had already obtained that of the Welt. Theodofius was hated for his cruelties; but he had found the means of gaining to his party the heads of the church. Maximus was willing to difplay the fame zeal, and to attach the Spanish bishops to his faction. He flattered both the old and the new religion; he was as treacherous as inhuman, as indeed were all those who at that time either pretended to, or obtained empire.

empire. That vaft part of the world was thengoverned like Algiers at prefent. Emperors were created and dethroned by the military power, and were often cholen from among nations that were reputed barbarous. Theodofus oppolédto his competitor other barbarians from Scythia. He filled the army with Goths, and furprifed Alaric the conqueror of Rome. In this horrible confusion, each endeavoured to ftrengthen his party by every means in his power.

Maximus having caufed the Emperor Gratian; the colleague of Theodofius, to be affaffinated at Lyons, meditated the destruction of Valenti-. nian the fecond, who, during his infancy, had been named fucceffor to Gratian. He affembled at Treves a powerful army, composed of Gauls. and Germans. He caufed troops to be levied in Spain, when two Spanish bishops, Idacio and Ithacus, or Itacius, both men of credit, came and demanded of him the blood of Prifcilian, and all his adherents, who were of opinion, that fouls were emanations from God; that the Trinity. did not contain three hypoftafes; and moreover, they carried their facrilege fo far as to fast on. Sundays. Maximus, half Pagan, and half . Chriftian, foon perceived the enormity of thefe crimes. The holy bishops, Idacio and Itacius, obtained leave to torture Prifcilian and his accomplices complices before they were put to death. They were both prefent, that things might be done according to order, and they returned bleffing God, and numbering Maximus, the defender of the faith, among the faints. But Maximus being afterward defeated by Theodofus, and affaffinated at the feet of his conqueror, had not the good fortune to be canonized.

It is proper to obferve, that Saint Martin, bithop of Tours, who was really a good man, folicited the pardon of Prifcilian, but being, himfelf accufed of herefy by the bithops, he returned to Tours, for fear of the torture at Treves.

As to Prifcilian, he had the confolation, after he was hanged, of being honoured by his feft as a martyr. His feaft was celebrated, and would be celebrated ftill, if there were any Prifcilianit's remaining.

This example made the intire church tremble; but it was foon after imitated and furpaffed. Prifcilianifis had been put to death by the fword, the halter, and by lapidation. A young lady of quality, fulpected to have fafted on a Sunday, was at Bourdeaux only floned to death. Thefe punithments appeared too mild; it was proved that God required that heretics fhould be roafted alive. The peremptory argument, in fupport of

of this opinion was, that God punifhes them in that manner in the next world, and that every prince, or his reprefentative, even down to a petty conftable, is the image of God in this fublunary world.

On this principle it was, that all over Europe they burnt witches and forcerers, who were manifeftly under the empire of the devil; and alfo heterodox Chriftians, which were deemed fill more criminal and dangerous.

It is not certainly known, what was the crime of thole priefls who were burnt at Orleans in the prefence of king Robert and his wife Conflantia, in the year 1022. How indeed fhould it be known? there being, at that time, but a fmall number of clerks and monks that could write. All we certainly know is, that Robert and his wife feafled their eyes with this abominable fpectacle. One of the fectaries had been confelior to her majelfy, who thought the could not better repair the misfortune of having confelied to a heretic, than by feeing him devoured by the flames.

Cuftom becomes law; from that period to the prefent time, a fpace of more than feven • hundred years, the church hath continued to burn thofe that are guilty, or fuppofed guilty, of an error in opinion.

CHAP. IV.

On the Extirpation of Herefy.

IT feems neceffary to diffinguish an herefy of opinion from faction. From the first ages of Chriftianity opinions have been different. The Chriftians of Alexandria were, in many points, of a different opinion from those of Antioch. The Achaians differed from the Afiatics. This diverfity of opinion exifted from the beginning. and probably will continue for ever. Jefus Chrift, who could have united all the faithful in the fame fentiments, did it not; and therefore we may conclude that it was not his defign ; but that he chofe rather to exercife all his churches in acts of indulgence and charity, by permitting different fystems, yet all agreeing to acknowledge him their ford and mafter. These feveral fects, fo long as they were tolerated by the emperors, or concealed from their fight, had it not in their power to perfecute each other, being equally fubject to the Roman magistrates ; they could only difpute. If they were perfecuted, they equally claimed the privilege of nature : " Suffer us," they faid, " to adore our God in peace, and do not refuse 66 HS

" us the liberty you grant to the Jews :" Every fect may now urge the fame argument to their oppreffors. They may fay to those who want privileges to the Jews; " Treat us " as you treat the fons of Jacob; let us, like " them, pray to God according to our con-" fcience. Our opinion will no more injure " your state, than Judaism. You tolerate the " enemies of Jefus Chrift, tolerate us who adore " him, and who differ from you only in theo-" logical fubtletics. Do not deprive yourfelves " of uleful fubjects; uleful in your manufac-" tures, your marine, and the cultivation of your " lands. Of what importance is it, that their " creed be fomewhat different from yours? You " want their labour, and not their catechifm."

Faction is quite a different thing. It always happens, that a perfecuted feft degenerates into faction. The opprefict naturally unite and animate each other ; and are generally more induftious in frengthening their party, than their perfecutors in their extermination. They mult either defiroy or be defroyed. So it happened after the perfecution excited in 304, by Galerius, in the two laft years of Dioclefan. The Chriftians, having been favoured by that emperor during eighteen years, were become too numerous and too rich to be exterminated. They joined Chlorus; they fought for his fon Con-Q fantine, ftantine, and a total revolution of the empire was the confequence.

Small events may be compared with great, when they are produced by the fame fpirit. Revolutions of a fimilar kind happened in Holland, in Scotland and in Switzerland. When Ferdinand and Habella drove the Jews out of Spain, where they were eftablished not only before the reigning family, but before the Moors, the Goths, or even the Carthagnians; if the Jews had been as warlike as they were rich, they might eafily, in conjunction with the Arabs, have effected a revolution.

In fhort, no fect ever changed the government, unlefs excited by defpair. Mahomed himielf fucceeded only because he was driven from Mecca, and a reward offered for his head.

Would you prevent a feft from overturning the flate, imitate the prefeat wife conduct of England, of Germany, of Holland; ufetoleration. The only methods, in policy, to be taken with a new feft, are, to put to death the chief and all his adherents, men, women, and children, without fparing one individual; or to tolerate them, when numerous. The first method is that of a monfter; the fecond of a wife man.

Chain your fubjects to the flate by their intereft. Let the Quaker and the Turk find their advantage in living under your laws. Religion is of God to man; the civil law is of you to your people.

CHAP. V.

Of Profanation.

LEWIS IX. king of France, who for his virtues was numbered among the faints, made a law against blasphemers. He condemned them to a new punifhment; their tongues were pierced with a hot iron. It was a kind of retaliation; the finning member fuffering the punishment. But it was fomewhat difficult to determine what was blafphemy. Expressions frequently escape from a man in a paffion, from joy, or even in converfation, which are merely expletives, fuch as the fela and the vab of the Hebrews, the pol and the adepol of the Latins, as also per Deos immortales, an expression frequently used, without the leaft intention of fwearing by the immortal gods.

The words which are called oaths and blafphemy, are commonly vague terms that may be varioufly interpreted. The law by which they are punified, feems to be founded on that of the Jews, which fays, Thou falt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. The best commen- . tators are of opinion, that this commandment relates - relates to perjury; and there is the more reafon to believe them right, as the word flowe, which is translated in voin, properly fignifies perjury. Now, what analogy can there be between perjury and Cabo de Dior, Cadedin, Sangbleu, Ventroblau, Corpo di Dio, ife.²

It was cuftomary with the Jews to fwear by the life of God, as the Lord liveth: the phrafe was common; fo that it was lying in the name of God that was forbidden.

Philip Augufus, in 1181, condemned the nobility who fhould pronounce the words which are fortened in the terms Tatebleu, Ventrebleu, Carbleu, Samgbleu, to pay a fine, and the plebelans to be drowned. The firft part of this law feems purells, the latter abounhable. It was an outrage to nature, to drown one man for a crime for which another paid a few pence of the money of thole times. So that this law, like many other, remained unexecuted, effecially when the king was excommunicated, and his kingdom interdicted by Pope Celefithe III.

Saint Lewis, transported with zeal, ordered indiferiminately, that whofever fhould pronounce thefe indecent words, fhould have his tongue bored, or his upper lip cut off. A citizen of Paris, having fuffered this punifhment, complained to Pope Innocent IV. This pontiff remonfirated.

farated to the king that the punifhment was too great for the crime, which however had no effect upon his majefty. Happy had it been for mankind, if the popes had never affected any other fuperiority over kings.

The ordinance of Lewis XIV. fays, " Thofe " who shall be convicted of having foror by, " or blafphemed the holy name of God, of his " most holy mother, or of his faints, shall, for " the first offence, pay a fine; for the fecond, " third, and fourth, a double, triple, and qua-" druple fine; for the fisth, shall be put in the " shocks; for the fixth, shall fand in the pillo-" ry, and lofe his upper lip; for the feventh, " shall have his tongue cut out."

This law appears to be humane and juft, as it inflifts a cruel punifhment only on a fevenfold repetition, which can hardly be prefumed.

But with regard to more atrocious profanations, which are called Sacrilege, the criminal ordinance mentions only robbing of churches; it takes no notice of public impieties, perhaps becaufe they were not fuppofed to happen, or were too difficult to /pecify. They are left therefore to the differentian of the judge; and yet nothing ought to be left to differentian.

In fuch extraordinary cafes, how is the judge to act ? He should confider the age of the offender, the nature and degree of his offence, and particularly the neceffity of a public example. Pre qualitate perfons, queque rei conditione & temporis & atotis & focus, vel chemenius flatuendum. If the law does not exprefly fay that fund a crime fhall be punifhed with death, what judge fhall think himfelf authorized to pronounce that fenence? If the law be filent; if neverthelefs a punifhment be required, the judge ought certainly, without hefitation, to decree the leaft fevere, becaufe he is a man.

Sacrilegious profanations are never committed except by young debauchees. Would you punifu them as feverely as if they had murdered a brother? Their youth pleads in their favour. They are not fuffered to difpofe of their poffeffions, becaule they are fuppofed to want maturity of judgment, fufficient to forefee the confequences of an imprudent trafaction. Is it not therefore natural to fuppofe, that they are incapable of forefeeing the confequences of their impiety?

Would you treat a wild young man, who, in his phrenzy, had profaned a facred image, without flealing it, with the fame rigour that you punifhed a Brinvilliers, who poifoned his father and his whole family?

There is no law againft the unhappy youth, and you are determined to make one that fhall condemn condemn him to the fevereft punifhment! He deferved chaftifement; but did he deferve fuch exeruciating torture, and the moft horrible death?

But he had offended God ! True, moft grievoufly. Imitate God in your proceedings againft him. If he be penitent, God forgives him. Impofe a penance, and let him be pardoned.

Your illuftrious Montefquieu hath faid: It is our duty to honour the Deity, and not to revenge him. Let us weigh theie words. They do not mean, that we fhould negle? the maintenance of public decorum; but, as the judicious author of the preceding Effay obferves, that it is ablurd for an infe? to pretend to revenge the fupreme Being. A village magiftrate, or the magiftrate of a city, is neither a Mofes nor a Johna.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Indulgence of the Romans in Matters of Religion.

THE amazing contrast between the Roman laws, and the barbarous inflictutions by which they were fucceeded, hath often been the fubject of conversation among the speculative part of mankind.

Doubtless the Roman fenate held the fupreme God in as great veneration as we; and profeffed as much efteem for their fecondary deities as we for our faints. Ab Jove principium was their common formule. Pliny, in his panegyric on the good Trajan, attells, that the Romans never omitted to begin their difcourfe and affairs by invoking the Deiry. Cicero and Livy tell us the fame thing. No people were more religious; but they were too wife, and too great, to defcend to the punishment of idle language or philofophic opinions: they were incapable of inflicting barbarous punifhments on those who, with Cicero, himfelf an augur, had no faith in auguries; or on those who, like Cæfar, afferted in full fenate, that the gods do not punith men after death. In.

It hath often been remarked, that the fenate permitted the chorus in the Troad to fing, There is nathing after death, and death it/alf is nothing. You afk, what becomes of the dead? They are where they wave ere they wave bonn *.

Was ever profanation more flagrant than this? From Ennius to Aufonius all is profanation, notwithflanding the respect for divine worfhip. Why were thefe things diffegarded by the fenate? Becaufe they did not, in any wife, affect the government of the flates, becaufe they diffurbed no inflution, nor religious ceremony. The police of the Romans was neverthelefs excellents they were neverthelefs abfolute mafters of the beft part of the world, till the reign of Theodofius the fecond.

It was a maxim of the Romans, Deerum, effonfer, Diir cure, Offences againft the gods concern the gods only. The fenaie, by the width infitution, being at the head of religion, were under no apprehentions that a convocation of priefs fhould force them to revenge the priefthood under a pretext of revenging heaven. They never faid, let us tear the impious afunder, left we ourfelves be deemed impious ; let us

fhew the priefthood, by our cruelty, that we are no lefs religious than they.

But our religion is more holy than that of the Romans, and confequently impiety is a greater crime. Granted. God will punifih it. The part of man is, to punifih that which is criminal in the public diforder which the impiety hath occafioned. But if in the act of impiety the delinquent hath not even flolen a handkerchief; if the ceremonies of religion have been in no wife diffurbed, fhall we, as I faid before, panifih the impiety as we would punifih particide? The Marfhal d'Ancre had caufed a white cock to be killed when the moon was at full: ought we therefore to burn the Marfhall d'Ancre.

Est modus in rebus, sunt certi denique fines; Nec scutica dignum horribili sectere stagello.

On the Crime of Preaching; and of Anthony.

A CALVINIST teacher, who, in certain provinces, preaches to his flock, if he be detected, is punifhed with death; and those who have given him a fupper, or a bed, are fent to the gallies for life.

In other countries, if a Jefuit be caught preaching, he is hanged. Is it to avenge God that this Calvinift and this Jefuit are put to death? Have both parties built upon the following Evangelical law? If he negled to bear the church, let him be unto thee as an heather man and a publican. But the Evangelift does not order that this heathen and this publican flould be hanged.

Or have they built on this pallage in Deuteronomy *; If among you a prophet arife; and that which he hath faid come to pair; and he fayeth unto you, let us follow firange gods; and if thy brather, or thy fan, or thy unife, or the friend of thy heart, fay unto thee, Come, let us follow firange gods: let them be firaightmays killed, firile thou firs, and all the people after thee.

" Chap. xiii.

But

But neither this Jefuit nor the Calvinist faid unto you, Come, let us follow strange gods.

The counfellor Dubourg, the monk Jchan Chouvin, named Calvin, the Spanifi phyfician Servetus, the Calabrian Gentilis, all worthipped the fame God: and yet the prefident Minard caufed counfellor Dubourg to be burnt; and Dubourg's friends caufed prefident Minard to be affaffinated ; Jehan Calvin caufed the phyfician Servetus to be roaffed; and had likewife the confolation to be a principal means of bringing the Calabrian Gentilis to the block; and the fucceffors of Jehan Calvin burnt Anthony. Was it reafon, or piety, or juffice, that committed theie murdres?

This hiftory of Anthony is one of the moft fingular which the annals of phrenzy hath preferved. I read the following account in a very curious manufcript; it is in part related by Jacob Spon.

Anthony was born at Brieu in Lorrain, of catholic parents, and he was educated by the Jefuits at Pont a Mouffon. The preacher Feri engaged him in the proteflant religion at Metz. Having returned to Nancy he was profecuted as a hcretic, and, had he not been faved by a friend, would certainly have been hanged. He fled for refuge refuge to Sedan, where, being taken for a papift, he narrowly efcaped affaffination.

Seeing by what ftrange fatality his life was not in fafety, either among papifts or protestants, he went to Venice and turned Jew. He was positively perfuaded, even to the laft moments of his life, that the religion of the Jews was the only true religion; for that, if it was once true, it must always be fo. The Jews did not circumcife him, for fear of offending the ftate; but he was no lefs internally a Jew. He now went to Geneva, where, concealing his faith, he became a preacher, was prefident to the college, and finally what is called a minifter.

The perpetual combat in his breaft between the religion of Calvin, which he was obliged to preach, and that of Mofes, which was the only religion he believed, produced a long illnefs. He became melancholy, and at laft quite mad, crying aloud, that he was a Jew. The ministers of the gofpel came to vifit him, and endeavoured to bring him to himfelf; but he anfwered, " that " he adored none but the God of Ifrael; that " it was impossible for God to change; that " God could never have given a law, and in-" fcribed it with his own hand, with an inten-" tion that it should be abolished." He spoke against Christianity, and afterwards retracted all R he had faid, and even wrote his confefion of faith, to efcape punifhment; but the unhappy perfuafion of his heart would not permit him to fign it. The council of the city affembled the clergy, to confult what was to be done with the unfortunate Anthony. The minority of thefe clergy were of opinion, that they fhould have compafiton on him, and rather endeavour to cure his difeafe than punifh him. The majority determined that he fhould be burnt, and he was burnt. This tranfaction is of the year 1632*. A hundred years of reafon and virtue are fearce fufficient to expirate fuch a deed.

The Hiftory of Simon Morin.

THE tragical end of Simon Morin is not lefs horrible than that of poor Anthony. It was midd the feafling, pleafures, and gallantry of a brilliant court; it was even in the times of the greatefl kicentioufnels, that this unfortunate madman was burnt at Paris, in the year 1663. Imagining that he had feen vifions, he carried his folly to far as to believe that he was fart from God, and that he was incorporated with Jelus Chrift.

The Parliament very wifely condemned him to be confined in a mad-houfe. What was very remarkable, there happened to be confided in the fame mad-houfe another fool, who called himfelf God the Father. Simon Morin was fo flruck with the folly of his companion, that he acknowledged his own, and appeared for a time to have recovered his fenfes. He declared his repentance, and, unfortunately for himfelf, ob-y tained his liberty.

Sometime after, he relapfed into his former noufenfe, and began to dogmatize. His unhappy R 2 definy definy brought him acquainted with St. Sorlin Definarets, who for fome months was his friend, but who afterwards, from jealoafy, became his moft cruel perfecutor.

This Definarets was no lefs a visionary than Morin. His first follies indeed were innocent. He printed the Tragi-Comedies of Erizone and Mirame, with a translation of the Pfalms; the Romance of Ariane, and the Poem of Clovis, with the office of the holy Virgin turned into verfe. He likewife published dithyrambic poems, enriched with invectives against Homer and Virgil. From this kind of follies he proceeded to others of a more ferious nature. He attacked Port-Royal, and after confeffing that he had perverted fome women to atheifm, he commenced prophet. He pretended that God had given him, with his own hand, the key to the treasure of the Apocalypfe, that with this key he would reform the whole world, and that he fhould command an army of an hundred and forty thousand men against the Janfenists.

Nothing could have been more reafonable and more juft, than to have confined him in the fame place with Simon Morins; but can it be believed, that he found credit with the Jelüit Annat, the king's confeifor? whom he perfuaded, that this poor Simon Morin would effabilith a fcR a feft almost as dangerous as the Jansenists themfelves. In thort, carrying his infamy to far as to turn informer, he obtained an order to feize the perfon of his rival. Shall I tell it ! Simon Morin was condemned to be burnt alive ?

In conducting him to the ftake, there was found, in one of his flockings, a paper in which he begged forgiveness of God for all his errors. This ought to have faved him; but no: the fentence was confirmed, and he was executed without mercy.

Such deeds are enough to make a man's hair briftle with horror. Yet where is the country that hath not beheld fuch flocking fpectacles? Mankind univerfally forget that they are brothers, and perfecute each other even to death. Let us confole ourfelves with the hope, that fuch dreadful times are paffed, never more to return.

Of Witches.

IN the year 1748, in the bihopric of Wurtfburg, an old woman was convicted of witchcraft and burnt. This was an extraordinary phenomenon in the prefent century. But how incredible it feems, that a people, who boafted fuperfluiton under their feet, and who flattered themfelves that they had brought their reaion to perfection; is it not wondertul, I fay, that fuch a people thould have believed in witchcraft; fh and have bornt old women accufed of this crime, and that above a hundred years after the pretended reformation of their realon?

In the year 1652, a country-woman, named Michelle Chaudron, of the little territory of Geneva, met the Devil in her way from the city. The Devil gave her a kifs, received her homage, and imprinted on her upper lip and on her right brendt, the mark which he is wont to beflow upon his favourites. This feal of the Devil is a little fign upon the fkin, which renders it infenfible.

fible, as we are affured by all the demonographical civilians of those times.

The Devil ordered Michelle Chaudron to bewitch two young girls. She obeyed her mafter punctually. The parents of the two girls accufed her of dealing with the Devil. The girls, being confronted with the criminal, declared, that they felt a continual prickling in fome parts of their bodies, and that they were poffeffed. Phyficians were called, at least men that passed for physicians in those days. They visited the girls. They fought for the feal of the Devil on the body of Michelle, which feal is called, in the verbal procefs, the Satanical mark. Into one of thefe marks they plunged a long needle, which was already no finall torture. Blood iffued from the wound, and Michelle reflified by her cries that the part was not infenfible. The judges not finding fufficient proof that Michelle Chaudron was a witch, ordered her to be tortured, which infallibly produced the proof they wanted. The poor wretch, overcome by torment, confelled at laft every thing they defired.

The phyficians fought again for the Satanical mark, and found it in a little black fjoot on one' of her thighs. Into this they plunged their needle. The poor creature, exhaulted and almoft expiring with the pain of the torture, was was infenfible to the needle, and did not cry out. She was inflandly condemned to be burnt, but the world beginning at this time to be a little more civilized, fhe was previously flrangled.

At this period every tribunal in Europe refounded with fuch judgments, and fire and faggot were univerfally employed againft witcheraft as well as herefy. The Turks were reproached with having amongft them neither forcesres, witches, nor demoniacs; and the want of the latter was confidered as an infallible proof of the falfity of their religion.

A zealous friend to the public welfare, to humanity, and to true religion, in one of humanity, and to true religion, in one of the there have been above a hundred thouland witches condemned to die by Chriftian tribunals. If, to thefe lawful maffacres, we add the much fuperior number of heretics facrificed, our part of the globe will appear one vaft staffold covered with executioners and victims, and furrounded by judges, guards, and ipectators.

On the Punifoment of Death.

IT hath long fince been obferved, that a man after he is hanged is good for nothing, and that punifhments invented for the good of fociety, ought to be useful to fociety. It is evident, that a fcore of ftout robbers, condemned for life to fome public work, would ferve the flate in their punithment, and that hanging them is a benefit to nobody but the executioner. Thieves, in England, are feldom punished with death, but are transported to the colonies. This is also practifed in Ruffia, where not one criminal was executed during the whole reign of the autocratical Elifabeth. Catherine IL who hath fucceeded her, with much more genius, follows her example ; yet crimes are not multiplied by this humanity; and it generally happens that the criminals fent to Siberia in time become honeit people. The fame is observed in the English colonies. We are aftonished at the change, and . yet nothing can be more natural. The condemned are forced to continual labour for a livelihood. 'The opportunities of vice are wanting.

ing. They marry and multiply. Oblige men to work, and you certainly make them honeft. It is well known, that attrocious crimes are not committed in the country, unlefs when there is too much holiday, and confequently too much idlenefs, and confequently too much debauchery.

The Romans never condenned a citizen to death, unleis for crimes which concerned the differy of the flate. Thele our mafters, our firft legiflators, were careful of the blood of their follow-citizens; but we are extravagant with the blood of ours.

The quefiion hath been frequently debated, whether a judge ought to have the power to punifh with death, when the punifhment is undetermined by the law? This quefiion was folemnly agitated in the prefence of the Emperor Henry VII. who decreed that no judge (hould have fuch a power *.

There are fome criminal cafes which are either to new, fo complicated, and fo unaccountable as to have efcaged the provision of the laws, and which, therefore, in fome countries are left to the difference of the judge. But for one cafe is which the laws permit the death of a criminal whom they have not condemned, there are a thousand wherein humanity should fave whom the laws have condemned to suffer.

The fword of juffice is in our hands, but we ought rather to blunt than to flarpen its edge. It remains within its fheath in the prefence of kings, to inform us that it ought feldom to be drawn.

There have been fome judges who were paffonately fond of fpilling human blood; fuch was Jeffreise in England, and fuch in France was the man whom they called Coupe-tete. Nature never intended fuch men for magiftrates, but for executioners.

On Death Warrants.

MUST we go to the end of the world, muft we have recourse to the laws of China, to learnhow frugal we onght to be of human blood? It is now more than four thoufand years that the tribunals of that empire have exifted; and it is alfo more than four thoufand years that the meaneft fubject, at the extremity of the empire, hath not been executed without firft transfiniting his cale to the emperory, who caules it to be thrice examined by one of his tribunals; after which he figns the death warrant, alters the fentence, or entirely acquite.

But it is unneceffary to travel.6 far for examples of this nature; Europe will abundantly fupply us. In England, no criminal is put to death, whofe death warrant is not figned by the king. It is alfo practified in Germany, and in moft parts of the north. Such likewife was formerly the culfom in France, and fuch it ought to be in all polithed nations. A fentence, at a diffance from the throne, may be dicfated by cabal, prejudice, or ignorance. Such little intrigues trigues are unknown to monarchs, who are continually furrounded by great objects. The members of the fupreme council are more enlightened, lefs liable to prejudice, and better qualified than a provincial judge, to determine whether the flate require fevere punifhments. In fhort, when inferior courts have judged according to the letter of the law, which poffibly may be rigorous, the council mitigates the fentence according to the true fpirit of all laws, which teaches, never to facrifice a man, but in evident neceffity.

On Torture.

ALL mankind being exposed to the attempts of violence or perfidy, deteft the crimes of which they may poffibly be the victims: all defire that the principal offender and his accomplices may be punished; neverthelefs, there is a natural compaffion in the human heart, which makes all men deteft the cruelty of torturing the accufed in order to extort confession. The law has not condemned them, and yet, though uncertain of their crime, vou inflict a punifhment more horrible than that which they are to fuffer when their guilt is confirmed. " Poffibly thou mayft be innocent; " but I will torture thee that I may be fatisfied: " not that I intend to make thee any recompence " for the thousand deaths which I have made thee " fuffer, in lieu of that which is preparing for " thee." Who does not fhudder at the idea? St. Augustin opposed fuch cruelty. The Romans tortured their flaves only; and Quintilian, recollecting that they were men, reproved the Romans for fuch want of humanity.

If there were but one nation in the world which had abolished the use of torture; if in that that nation crimes were no more frequent than in others; and if that nation be more enlightened and more flourishing fince the abolition, its example furely were fufficient for the reft of the world. England alone might inftruct all other nations in this particular; but England is not the only nation. Torture hath been abolifhed in other countries, and with fuccefs; the queflion therefore is decided. Shall not a people, whopique themfelves on their politenefs, pride themfelves also on their humanity? Shall they obflinately perfift in their inhumanity, merely becaufe it is an ancient cuftom ? Referve, at leaft, fuch eruelty for the punifhment of those hardened wretches, who fhall have affaffinated the father of a family, or the father of his country; but that a young perfon, who commits a fault which leaves no traces behind it, fhould fuffer equally with a parricide; is not this an ufelefs piece of barbarity ?

I am afhamed of having faid any thing on this fubject, after what hath been already faid by the author of the Effay on Crimes and Punifhments. I ought to have been faisfied with withing, that mankind may read with attention the work of that friend to humanity.

Of certain fanguinary Tribunals.

IS it credible, that there formerly exifted a fupreme tribunal more horrible than the Inquifition, and that this tribunal was effablished by Charlemagne? It was the judgment of Weftphalia, otherwife called the Vhemic Court. The feverity, or rather cruelty, of this court, went fo far as to punish with death, every Saxon who broke his fast during Lent. The fame law was alfo eftablished in Franche-Comte, in the beginning of the feventeenth century. In the archives of a little place called St. Claude, fituated in a remote corner of the most mountainous part of the county of Burgundy, are preferved the particulars of the fentence and verbal process of execution of a poor gentleman named Claude Guillon, who was beheaded on the 28th of July 1629. Being reduced to the utmost poverty, and urged by the most intolerable hunger, he eat, on a fifh day, a morfel of horfe flefh, which had been killed in a neighbouring field. This, was his crime. He was found guilty of facrilege. Had he been a rich man, and had fpent two two hundred crowns in a fupper of fea-fift, fuffering the poor to die of hunger, he would have been confidered as a perfon fulfilling every duty. The following is a copy of his fentence. " Ha-" ving feen all the papers of the procefs, and " heard the opinions of the doctors learned in " the law, we declare the faid Claude Guillon " to be ruly attained and convicted of having " taken away part of the fleft of a horfe, kil-" led in the meadow of that town; of having " caufed the faid flefth to be dreffed, and of " march," &c..

What infamous doctors muft thefe have been, who gave their opinions on this occafion? Was it among the Topinambous, or among the Hottentots, that thefe things happened? The Vhemic court was yet more horrible. Delegates from this court were fectedly foread over all-Germany, taking informations unknown to the accufed, who were condemned without being heard 3 and frequently, in want of an executioner, the youngefl judge performed the office himfelf*. It was requilite, in order to be fafe from the adfalination of this court, to procure letters of exemption from the emperor; and even thele were fometimes ineffectual. This chamber of affafins was not entirely abolithed till the reign of Maximilian I. It ought to have been diffolved in the blood of its members. The Venetian Council of Ten was, in comparifon with this, a court of mercy.

What fhall we think of fuch horrid proceedings? Is it fufficient to bewail humanity? There were fome cafes that cried aloud for vengcance.

CHAP. XIV.

On the Difference between political and natural Larus.

I CALL natural laws, thole which nature dictates in all ages to all men, for the maintenance of that jultice which the (tay what they will of her) hath implanted in our hearts. Theft, violence, homicide, ingratitude to beneficent parents, perjury againft innocence, confpiracies againft once's country, are crimes that are univerfally and julty punithed, though with more or lefs fereity.

I call political laws, those that are made in compliance with prefent necefity, whether it be to give flability to the government, or to prevent misfortnoe. For example, being apprehensive that the enemy may receive intelligence from the inhabitants of the city, you shut the gates, and forbid any one to pass the ramparts on pain of death.

Or, fearful of a new feet of people, who publicly diclaim all obedience to their fovereign, and fecretly confult of means to diveft themfelves of that obedience; who preach, that all men are equal, equal, and that obedience is due to God alones; who, accufing the reigning feft of fuperfition, mean to deftroy that which is conferrated by the flate; you denounce death againft thofe who, in publicly dogmatizing in favour of this feft, may infigate the people to revolt.

Or, two ambitions princes contend for a crown: the fitrongeft gains the prize, and punifhes with death the partizans of the weaker. The judges become the infiruments of vengeance of the new fovereign, and the fupports of his authority.

When Richard the third, the murderer of his two nephews, was acknowledged king of England, the jury found Sir William Collinburn guilty of having written to a friend of the Duke of Richmond, who was at that time raifing an army, and who afterwards reigned by the name of Henry VII. They found two ridiculous lines of Sir William's writing, which were infilient to condemn him to a horrible death. Hiltory abounds with fach examples of juffice.

The right of reprifal is allo a law adopted by nations. For example, your enemy has hanged one of your brave captains, for having defended an old ruined caffle againf a whole army. One of hit captains falls into your hands; he is a. worthy man, and you effeem him; nevertheles you hang him by way of reprifal. You fay it is the law: that is to fay, becaufe your enemy has been guilty of an enormous crime, you muft be guilty of another.

Thefe political fanguinary laws exift but for a time, they are temporary, becaule they are not founded in turth. They refemble the necefity which, in cafes of extreme famine, obliges people to eat each other: they ceafe to ext men as foon as bread is to be had.

CHAP. XV.

On the Crime of High-Treafon. On Titus Oates, and on the Death of Augustin de Thou.

HIGH-TREASON is an offence commitred againft the fecurity of the commonwealth, or of the king its reprefentative. It is confidered as particide, and therefore ought not to be extended to offences which bear no analogy to that crime. In making it high-treafon to commit a theft in any houfe belonging to the fate, or even to fpeak feditions words, you leffen the horror which the crime of high-treafon ought to infpire.

In our ideas of great crimes, there fhould be nothing arbitrary. If a theft from, or imprecation againft, a father be confidered as particide, you break the bond of filial piety; the fon will then regard his parent as a terrible monfter. Every exaggration in a law tends to its defruction.

In common crimes, the laws of England are favourable to the accufed ; but in cafes of hightreafon they are againft him. The Jefuit Titus Oates being legally interrogated in the Houfe of Commons, Commons, and having upon his oath declared, that he had related the whole truth, yet afterwards accurated the webole truth, yet aftertwork, and feveral others, of high-treafon, and his information was admitted. He likewise fovore before the king's council, that he had not feen the fecretary, and afterwards that he had. Norwithfinading thefe illegalities and contradictions, the fecretary was executed.

The fame Titus Oates and another witnefs depoled, that fifty Jeluits had confpired to affaifinate Charles II. and that they had feen commiffions, figned by father Oliva, general of the Jeluits, for the officers that were to command an army of rebels. This evidence was fufficient to authorife the tearing out the hearts of feveral people, and dahing them in their faces. But forioufly, can two witneffes be thought fufficient to convict a man whom they have a mind to defroy? At leaft one would imagine they ought not to be notorious villains ; neither ought that which they depofe to be improbable.

Let us fuppofe that two of the moft upright magifirates in the kingdom were to accufe a man of having confyred with the Muft, to circumcife the whole Council of State, the Parliament, the Archbifhop and the Sorbonne; in vain thefe two magiftrates might fwear, that they had feen the letters letters of the Mufit: it would naturally be fippoled that they were wrong in their heads. It was equally ridiculous to-imagine, that the general of the Jefuits fhould raife an army in England, as that the Mufit intended to circumcile the court of France. But unhappily Titus Oates was believed; that there might remain no fpecies of atrocious folly, which hath not entered into the heart of man.

The laws of England do not confider as guilty of confiracy thofe who are privy to it, and do not inform. They fuppote the informer as infamous as the confpirator is culpable. In France, if any one be privy to a confpiracy, and does not reveal it, he is punithed with death. Lewis XI. againft whom confpiracies were frequent, made this law; a law which a Lewis XII. or a Henry IV. could never have imagined. It not only obliges an honeft man to divulge a crime, which, by his refolution and advice, he mighte to be punifhed as a calumniator, it being eafy for the accufed to manage their affairs in fuch a manner as to clude conviction.

This was exactly the cafe of the truly refpectable Auguftin de Thou, counfellor of flate, and fon of the only good hiftorian of which France can boaft; equal to Guicciardini in point of abilities, abilities, and perhaps fuperior in point of impartiality.

This confpiracy was againft Cardinal de Richelieu, rather than againft Lewis XIII. The defigm was not to berray France to an enemy ; for the king's brother, who was the principal author of the plot, could never intend to berray a kingdom to which he was the prefumptive heir, there being only between him and the crown a dying brother, and two children in the cradle.

De Thou was neither guilty in the fight of God nor man. One of the agents of the king's brother, of the Duke of Bouillon, fovereign prince of Sedan, and of the grand Equery d'Effait St. Mars, had communicated their intention to de Thou, who immediately went to St. Mars, and endeavoured to diffuade him from the enterprite. If he had informed againft him, he had no proof, and muft inevitably have fallen a facrifice to the refertment of the prefumptive heir of a fovereign prince, of the king's favourite, and to public execration. In fhort, he would have been punifhed as a malignant calumniator.

The chancellor Seguier was convinced of this in confronting de Thou with the grand Equerry, when de Thou afked the latter the following queffion: " Do you not remember, Sir, that T " there

"there never paffed a day, in which I did not "endeavour to diffuade you from the attempt?" St. Mars acknowledged it to be true. So that de Thou deferved a recompence, rather than death, from a tribunal of Equity. He certainly deferved to have been faved by cardinal Richelieu; but humanity was not his virtue. There is in this cafe fomething more than fummum jus fumma injuria. In the fentence of this worthy man we read, "f for having had knowledge and participawit tion of the faid configrary." It does not fay for not having revealed. So that his crime was, his having been informed of a crime; and he was punified for having had ears and eyes.

All that we can fay in extenuation of this feverity is, that it was not the act of juffice kerfelf, but of a delegated power. The letter of the law was pofitive; but I appeal not only to the lawyers, but to all mankind, whether the fpirit of the law was not perverted? It is a melanholy abfurdity, that a fmall number of people fhould condemn as criminal, a man judged innocent by a whole nation, and worth their cifteen !

CHAP. XVI.

On religious Confession.

JAURIGNY and Balthazar Gerard, who' affafiliated William L prince of Orange; Clement the Dominican, Chatel, Ravaillae, and all the other particides of thofe times, went to confefion before they committed their crimes. Fanaticifm, in that deplorable age, was carried to fuch excels, that confetiion was an additional aggagement to the perpetration of villainy; an engagement deemed facred, becaufe confetiion is a facrament.

Strada himself fays, that Jaurigny non ante ficinus aggredi fufimuit quam expiatam necis animam apud Dominicanum facerdotem cœlefii pane firmaverit.

It appears in the interrogatory of Ravaillac that coming from the Feuillauts, and going towards the Jeliut college, he addreffed himfelf to the Jeliut d'Aubigny; that after talking to him of feveral apparitions which he had feen, he fneweds him a knife, on the blade of which was engraved a heart and a crofs; and that he faid, this heart fignifies, that the heart of the king flowld be im-T 2.

duced to make war agains? the Huguenots. If this d'Aubigny had informed the king of thefe words, and deferibed the man, the beft of kings might polifibly have efcaped alfafination.

On the 20th of Auguit, 1610, three months after the death of Henry IV, whole wounds were yet bleeding in the hearts of his fubjects, the advocate-general Servin, of illuftrious memory, required that the Jefuits thould be obliged to fign the four following articles.

I. That the Council is fuperior to the Pope.

II. That the Pope cannot deprive the King of any of his rights by excommunication.

III. That the ecclefiaftics are, like other people, entirely fubject to the king.

IV. That a prieft who, by confession, is apprized of a confpiracy against the king or the state, should reveal it to the magistrates.

On the 22.1, the parliament published an arret, forbidding the Jefaits to infruct youth, until they had figned thole four articles. But the court of Rome was at that time for owerful, and that of France for weak, that the arret was diffegurded.

It is worth notice, that this court of Rome, which would not fuffer confetfion to be revealed when the life of a fovereign was concerned, obliged the confetfors to inform the Inquifition in cafe.

cafe any female thould accufe another prieft of having feduced or attempted to feduce her. Paul IV. Pius IV. Clement VIII. and Gregory XV. ordered this revelation. It was a dangerous fnareboth for the confeffor and the penitent. It was converting a factament into a regifter of accufations and facilege; for by the ancient canons, and particularly by the Lateran council, under Ianocent III. every confeffor who reveals confeffion, of whatfoever nature it may be, fhall be interdicted and imprifoned for life.

Thus we fee four different popes, in the fixteenth' and feventeenth centuries, ordering the revelation of a fin of imparity, and forbidding it in cafes of particide. A woman confelles, or fuppofes in her confeffion to a Carmelite, that a Cordelier attempted to feduce her; the Carmelite mult impeach the Cordelier. A fanatical faffing believing that he fhall ferve God-by killing his prince, confutts his confeffor to this cafe of confeience; the confeffor is guilty of facilege if he five the life of his fovereign.

This horrible abfurdity is one of the unhappy confequences of the continual oppofition, which hash fubfilded for fo many ages, between the coclefiaftical and civil law. Mankind have in a thoufuid inflances been fulfpended between the crimes of facrilege and high-treafon, and the dicrimes of facrilege and high-treafon, and the ditreas finitions flinctions of right and wrong have been buried in a chaos, from which they are not yet emerged.

Confeffion of fins hath been authorized in all times and in all nations. The ancients accufed themfelves in the myfleries of Orpheus, of Ifis, of Ceres, of Samothrace. The Jews confeffed their fins on the day of folemn explainton, and full continue the fame pracifice. Each penitent chufes his confeffor, who becomes his penitent in turn, and each receives from his companion thry-nine lafbes whilt he is repeating, three times, the formule of confeffion, which confifts only in thirteen words, and which confequently math be general.

None of these confessions were particular, and confequently could never ferve for a pretence to thole fecret confultations, under the fladdow of which fanatical penitents think to fin with impunity; a pernicious practice, by which a falutary inflution is corrupted. Confession, which was intended as a curb to iniquity, hath frequently, in times of confusion and feducition, become an incentive to wickednets. Probably it was for this reafon, that fo many Chriftian flates have 'abolished a holy influtuion, which appeared to be as dangerous as ufeful.

CHAP. XVII.

Of falle Money.

THE crime of coining falle money is deemed high-treason in the fecond degree, and justly. . To rob all the people is to be a traitor to the ftate. But it is afked, whether a merchant who imports ingots of gold from America, and privately converts them into good money, be guilty of high-treafon, and merit death? which is the punifhment annexed to this crime in almost all countries. Neverthelefs, he has robbed nobody; on the contrary, he has done fervice to the flate by increasing the currency. But he hath defrauded the king of the fmall profit upon the coin. He hath indeed coined good money: but he hath led others into the temptation of coining bad. Yet death is a fevere punifhment. I knew a lawyer who was of opinion, that fuch a criminal should be condemned, as a useful hand, to work in the royal mint, with irons to his legs.

CHAP. XVIII. On domeflic Theft.

IN countries where a trifling domeflic theft, or breach of truth, is punifhed with death, is not the difproportioned punifhment dangerous to fociety? Is it not even an encouragement to larceny? If in this cale a mafter profecutes his fervant, and the unhappy werech fuffer death, the whole neighbourhood hold the mafter in abhorrence: they perceive that the law in contrary to nature, and confequently that it is a hold law.

What is the refult ? Multers, to avoid opprobrium, content themfelves with difcharging the thief, who atterwards fleals from another, and gradually becomes familiar with difhonelly. The punifhment being the fame for a fmall theft as for a greater, he will naturally fleal as much as he can, and at laft will not foruple to turn affafin to prevent detection.

If, on the contrary, the punifiment be proportioned to the crime; if those who are guilty of a breach of truft be condemaed to labour for the public, the mafter will not hefitate to bring the offender to jultice, and the crime will be lefs frequent: for true it is, that rigorous laws are often productive of crimes.

CHAP. XIX.

On Suicide.

THE celebrated Du Verger de Hauranne, Abbè de St. Cytan, one of the founders of Port Royal, in the year 1608, wrote a treatife on fuicide, which is become one of the fearceft books in Europe.

" The Decalogue," fays that author, " for-"bids us to commit murder, in which precept " fcl-murder feems no lefs to be underflood, " than the murder of another : if, therefore, " there be cafes in which it is lawful to kill an-" other, there may be cafes allow herein fuicide " may be allowed. But a man ought not to ar-" tempt his own life, till after having confulted " his reafon. Public authority, which is the re-" prefentative of God, may dipofe of our lives. " The reafon of man may alfo reprefent that " of the Deity, it being a ray of the eternal " light."

St. Cyran extends this argument to a great, length, which after all is a mere fophifm. But when he comes to exemplify, he is not quite fo eafily anfwered. " A man may kill himfelf," fore fays he, " for the good of his prince, for the "good of his country, or for the good of his "parents."

It does not appear, that we could with juffice condemn a Codrus, or a Curtius. What prince would dare to punifit the family of a man who had facrificed himfelf for his fervice? Or rather, is there any prince who would dare not to reward them. St. Thomas, before St. Cyran, faid the fame thing. But there was no need of either of Thomas, of Bonaventure, nor of Hauranne, to inform us, that a man who dies for his country deferves our praife.

St. Cyran concludes, that it is lawful to do for one's own fake, that which is praife-worthy if done for another. The arguments of Plutarch, of Seneca, of Montaigne, and a hundred others, are well known. I do not pretend to apologize for an action which the laws have condemned; but I do not recollect, that either the Old or New Testament forbid a man to relinquish his life, when it is no longer fupportable. By the Roman laws, fuicide was not forbidden; on the contrary, in a law of Mark Antony, which was rever repealed, we find it thus written. 46 18 " your brother or your father, being convicted " of no crime, hath put himfelf to death, either " to avoid pain, or being weary of life, or from " defpair

" defpair or madnefs, his Will shall neverthe-" lefs be valid, or his heirs inherit according " to law."

Notwithstanding this humane law of our ancient mafters, we ordain, that a flake shall be driven through the corps of the offender, and his memory becomes infamous. We do all in our power to difhonour his family. We punish a fon for having loft a father, and a widow becaufe fhe is deprived of her hufband. We even confifcate the effects of the deceafed, and rob the living of that which is juftly their due. This cuftom, with many others, is derived from our canon law, which denies Chriftian burial to those who are guilty of fuicide, concluding thence, that it is not lawful to inherit on earth from one who hath himfelf no inheritance in heaven. The canon law affures us, that Judas committed a greater crime in hanging himfelf, than in betraving Jefus Chrift.

CHAP. XX.

On a certain Species of Mutilation.

WE find, in the Pandect, a law of Adrian, which denounces death to the phyficians who fould make an enunch, either by caftration or by bruifing the tefles. By the fame law, the pollefilions of thole who fuffered caftration were conficated. Origen ought certainly to have been punithed, who fubmitted to this operation, from the rigid interpretation of that paffage in St. Matthew, which fays, There be enunchs, which have made themfelves emuchs for the kingdom of beaven tafenet.

Things changed in the reigns of fucceeding emperors, who adopted the luxury of Afa; efpecially in the lower empire of Conflantinople, where eunuchs became patriarchs and generals of armies.

In thefe our own times, it is the cuftom at Rome to caffrate young children, to render them worthy of being muficians to his Holinefs; fo that Caffrata and Mufice del Papa are fynonimous. It "is not long fince you might have feen at Naples, written in great letters over the doors of certain barbers, Qui fi caffrano maravigliofamente i puti: here boys are caffrated in the beft manner.

CHAP. XXI.

On Confifcation.

IT is a maxim received at the bar, that kewas forfeits bit life forfeit bit effects; a maxim which prevails in those countries where cultom ferves inftead of law. So that, as we have already obferred, the children of one who puts an end to his own life, are condemned to perifh with hunger, equally with those of an alfaffin. Thus, in every cafe, a whole family is punithed for the crime of an individual. Thus when the father of a family is condemned to the gallies for having harboured a preacher, or for hearing his fermion in a cavern or a defert, his wife and chidren are reduced to beg their bread.

That law which confifts in depriving an orphan of fupport, and in giving to one man the offelfions of another, was unknown in the times of the Roman republic. It was firft introduced by Sylla, in his proferiptions, whof? example one would fcarce have thought worthy imitation. Nor indeed was this law adopted by Cefar, by Trajan, or by Antoninus, whole name is ftill pronounced with refpect by all nations; and under Juflinian, confifcation took place only in cafe of high-treafon.

It feems that, in the times of feudal anarchy, princes and lords not being very rich, fought to increafe their revenue by the condemnation of their fubjects. Their laws being arbitrary, and the Roman jurifyrudence unknown, cuftoms either cruel or ridiculous prevailed. But now that the power of princes is founded on immenfe and certain revenues, there can be no need to fwell their treafuries with the inconfiderable wreck of an unfortunate family.

In countries where the Roman law is eftablifued, confifcation is not admitted, except within the jurifdiction of the parliament of Toulouće. It was formerly the law at Calais, but was abolifhed by the Englifu, whild that city was in their poffefino. It is firange, that the inhabitants of the capital fhould be fubject to a feverer law than the people in the country : but laws, like the cottages in a "illage, were generally eftablifhed by accident, and without attention to the regularity of a general plan.

Who would believe that, in the year 1673, in the moft brilliant period of the kingdom of France, the advocate-general, Omer Talon, did in fell parliament exprefs himfelf, on the fubiect ject of a young lady named Canillac, in the following words.

"God fays, in the 13th chapter of Deutero-"nomy, If thou comeft into a city where idolaity regineth, thou fhalt furely finite the inha-"bitant: of that city with the edge of the fword, "deftroying it utterly and all that is therein. "And thou fhalt gather all the fpoil thereof in-"to the midfl of the freet, and fhalt burn with "fire the city, and all the fpoil thereof, for the "Lord thy God; and it fhall be an heap for "ever; and there fhall cleave nought of the "carfed thing to thine hand."

" In like manner, in the crime of high-treafon, " the children were deprived of their inheritance, which became forfield to the king. Naboth " being profecuted quia maledixerat regi, king " Ahab took poffefinon of his effects. David " being informed that Mephibofheth had re-" belled, gave all his poffefinons to Ziba who " brought him the news: tua fint omnia que " fuerunt Mephibofheth."

The queffion in difpute was, who fhould inherit the paternal eftate of Mile. de Canillac, which having been confifcated, was abandoned by the king to a lord of the treafury, and afterwards bequeathed by him to the teftatrix. In this caufe concerning a girl of Auvergne it was, U 2 that an advocate-general referred to Ahab, king of a part of Palefine, who confifcated the vineyard of Naboth, after affaffinating the owner with the fword of juffice : an action fo abominable as to have paffed into a proverb, intended to infijte mankind with detenfation for fuch acts of tyranny. 'There was certainly no analogy between the vineyard of Naboth and the inheritance of Mile, de Canillac; nor hath the murder and confifcation of the poffetions of Mephibofheth, the grandfor of Saul, and fon of Jonathan, the friend and protector of David, the Leaft affinity with the will of this lady.

It was with fuch pedantry, with fuch foolifh quotations foreign to the fubject, with fuch ignorance of the firft principles of human nature, with fuch prejudices ill conceived and ill applied, that laws have been explained and executed, by men who acquired reputation in their fphere. I leave to the reader that, which to tell him were fuperfluous.

CHAP. XXII.

On criminal Procedure, and other Forms.

IF, in France, it fhould ever happen that the laws of humanity foften fome of our rigorous cuftoms, without facilitating the commission of crimes, we may hope for reformation in those legal proceedings, wherein our legiflators feem to have been influenced by too much feverity. Our criminal procedure appears in many inftances to point only at the deftruction of the accufed. It is the only law which is uniform throughout the whole kingdom; a law which ought certainly to be no lefs favourable to the innocent, than terrible to the guilty.

In England a man may recover damages for falle imprisonment. In France, on the contrary, an innocent perfon, who has had the misfortune to be thrown into a dungeon and tortured almost to death, has no confolation, no damages to hope for, no action against any one; and to, add to his misfortune, he has for ever loft his reputation. Why? Becaufe his joints have been diflocated; a circumftance which ought rather to infpire compafiion and refpect. The difcoverv : ry of crimes, fay they, requires feverity: it is awar of human juffice againft iniquity. But there is generofity and compafilon even in war. The brave are ever compafilonate; and shall the law delight in barbarity?

Let us compare the criminal procedure of the Romans with ours. With them, the evidence were heard publicly in prefere of the accuidd, who might anfwer or interrogate them, or employ countel. This procedure was open and noble, it breathed Roman magnanimity.

With us, all is conducted in ferret. A fingle judge, only attended by his clerk, hears each winnes feparately. This curtom, chablithed by Francis I. was confirmed by the committioners who were employed to diged the ordinance of Lewis XIV. In 1670; which confirmation was entirely owing to a miftake. They imagined, in reading the code de Teflibus, that the words teflet intrare judicit fearctum, fignified that the winneffes were examined in private; but fearctum means here the chamber of the judge. Intrare fecetum, if intended to fignify private interrogation, would be falle Latin. This part of our haw therefore is founded on a folcetifn.

The evidence in these cases are commonly the dregs of the people, whom the judge may, in such private examination, make say whatfoever he pleifes. They are examined a fecond time, but full privately; and if, after this re-examination, they retrack from their depolition, or vary in any material circumfance; they are punithed as falle evidence. So that if a fimple honeft fellow, recollecting that he bas faid too much, that he mitimoderflood the judge, or the judge him, revoke his depolition from a principle of juffices, he is punithed as a reprobate. The natural confequence of this is, that men will confirm a falle telfimony rather than expole themfelves, for their honefly, to certain punithment.

The law feems to oblige the magiftrate to be the enemy of the acculed, rather than his judge; it being left in the power of the magiftrate to confront the evidence with the acculed, or not, as he shall think proper. Amazing! that fo neceffary a part of the procedure should be left undetermined.

A man being fuspected of a crime, knowing that he is denied the benchi of countiel, files his country i a Alep to which he is encouraged by every maxim of the law. But he may be condemned in his ablence, whether the crime be proved or not. Strange laws! If a man be charged with owing a fam of money, before he can be condemned to pay the demand, it is required that the debt be proved is but if his life be be in queftion, he may be condemned, by default, without any proof of the crime. Is money then of more importance than life? O ye judges and legiflators! Confult the pious Antoninus, and the good Trajan: they fuffered not the abfent to be condemned.

Do your laws then allow the privilege of counfel to an extortioner, or a fraudulent bankrupt, . and refufe it to one who may pollibly be a very honeft and honourable man? If there ever were an inflance of innocence being juftified by means of counfel, the law, which deprives the accified of that benefit, is evidently unjuft.

The parliament of Touloufe hath a very fingular cultom relative to the validity of evidence. . In other places demi-proofs are admitted, which is a palpable abfurdity, there being no fuch thing as demi-truth; but at Touloufe they admit of quarters and eighths of a proof. For inflance, an hearfay may be confidered as a quarter, and another hearfay, more vague than the former, as an eighth: fo that eight hearfays, which in fact are no other than the echo of a groundlefs report, conflitute a full proof. Upon this prindeple it was, that poor Calas was condemned to : the wabet.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Idea of Reformation.

MAGISTRATES are in themfelves for refpectable, that the inhabitants of the only country in which they are venal, fincerely pray to be delivered from this cuftom: they with that the civilian may by his merit eftablish that juffice, which in his writings he hath fo nobly defended. We may then pofibly hope to fee a regular and uniform fyllem of laws.

Shall the law of the provinces be always at variance with the law in the capital? Shall a man be right in Britanny, and wrong in Languedoc? Nay, there are as many laws as there are towns; and, even in the fame parliamenr, the maxims of one chamber are not the maxims of another.

What aflonifhing contrariety in the laws of one kingdom! In Paris, a man who has been an inhabitant during one year and a day, is reputed a citizen. In Franche-Comte, a freeman who during a year and a day, inhabits a houfe in mortmain, becomes a flave; his collateral heirs are excluded from inheriting his foreign acquifitions, fitions, and even his children are deprived of their inheritance, if they have been a year abfent from the houfe in which the father died. This province is called Franche, but where is their freedom?

238 A COMMENTARY, &c.

Were we to attempt to draw a line between eivil authority and ecclefiaftical cuftoms, what endlefs difputes would enflie? In flort, to what fide foever we turn our eyes, we are prefented with a confufed (cane of contradictions, uncertainty, hardhips, and arbitrary power. In the prefent age, we feem univerfally aiming at perfection ; let us not therefore neglect to perfect the laws, on which our lives and fortunes depend.
