SIR,

I T cannot be denied but that the death of that worthy Gentleman Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey was that which first created so unanimous a belief of the reality of the Plot, but why it should be charged upon the Papists, I could never yet see the least ground of reason for: But to wave that and to come to the Parties executed for the Fact: For the two first, That allegation (though non-sensicall to common reason) of an absolution, seeing at their Execution they professed themselves Romanists; may suffice: But should a sober Enquirer ask, how came Berry the last of them, both to profess himself a Protestant, according to the established Church, and that more then seemingly he was never otherwise? and likewise so positively to deny the Fact, or any knowledge thereof? sure he could not be lull'd into any blinde zeal for promotion (as termed) of the Cause, all mental reservations as well as Indulgences being there out of doors: But it may well be said of this his Confession or Declaration (which you please to call it) as was of the Evidences against Sir George Wakeman, and the rest; That it was sham'd over: Give me leave to note to you the strangeness of a Vote in Parliament, much about that time, viz. that it being a hellish and damnable Plot of the Papists, Should his Majesty miscarry (without exception by what hand) that his Death should be revenged upon the fore-mentioned Parties; This being but a Vote, and that now no Parliament, I think it cannot be over-criminal to mention who were the proposers, and what sort condescended I shall leave you to judge: however I could not but observe in his Majesties late indisposition, how busy the small Agents were, at every end of the Town, buzzing about. his being Poysoned; the end is easily gues'd at; and no doubt; but them styled Masked Papists, would equally have participated of the malice, not for Religion, but Loyalty sake; I shall instance 2 or 3 reasons why (in my opinion) the reall fire ought to be sought for, at another door, then the smoak seems to come forth at: and therefore, to cast an eye towards the merits of the Good old Cause, shall fix a jealousy there: First, the Rebellion in Scotland, which though the Glorious Monmouth no sooner appeared, then defeated, yet had they succeeded, no doubt but would have found (or rather were assured of) a great deal of encouragement from this our Nation; but what they would have done for such a shooing horn devise, as the second Article in the late Covenant was, I know not, (though the fained care of his Majesty and People doth much resemble those times) as also for a General: for I am sure none but a very young one would accept it from their hands especially, and have put confidence in them, for Richard Cromwells sake: Secondly, it may be observed, that few or none (the Lesser men excepted) are the sticklers for a Plot, but what were either actually in the Late Rebellion , or whose Father was: and it were pity to spoil the old Proverb, too be of other opinion then that what was bred in the Bone would not easily out of the flesh : and to add further, there hath scarce been an Election for the New Parliament, where any ancient Royalist was a Competitor , but that some Rascall would brand him, with the Title of masked Papist, or Courtier ; which is now a Character almost as obnoxious to the Rebellious Commonalty as the Former, a resemblance too much of the Late Rebellion ; And lastly, to confirm this my belief, the daily endeavours of your ever-opposite Party to Monarchy, to ingratiate themselves with the Established Church, by their printed Papers, in which they stile themselves only Dissenting Brethren ; And to prevent impartial Eyes from being cast that way, they repeat the expressions of a Reverend Father, when moved in Late Parliament, that they ought to be looked after as well as the Papists ; whose Reply was, that the one might take him by the sleeve, but the other would by the throat : but by the Reverend Lords favour, if not forgot, when took by the sleeve, I think his Cap had a remove too. Its true, we have bare suggestions of the one, but too late experience of the other ; it is likewise worthy observation the Conformity of these Grandees of late in appearing once a moneth at their Parish Churches ; a bare Cloak for their designs for when there in the Morning, you shall not fail of them, at Rebellions, School (I mean the Meeting-houses) in the Afternoon, for fear of giving scandal to a weak brother, and so lose a Vote when in Computation for a Lay Eldership : and no doubt but these sort of Monsters have an itching desire to be examining (that is) into Crown and Church-Lands: but to return to the Hinges of the Plot : give me leave to put you in minde of the Irish Ruffians, heretofore so often mentioned ; which materials being at last found, the devil's in't, after so much consideration, and pains, the Eggs should prove addle : No, for at the meeting of the Parliament you may well expect more of them: (that is) by that time the Birds will not only be fledg'd but likewise have their feathers, so artificially placed, as to set defiance both to winde and weather ; but then should their ambition so decked, make the n so high flyers, as to aim at Eclipsing the Sun ; and by that means cause so great a dislocation in their plumes, as nakedly to reveal themselves, the Workman, if not damn'd impudent, surely must sneak. It is not easy without pre-consideration to judge how far crooked revenge, though lapped in a decrepid carcase, yet annexed to an unlimited Conscience, may extend : but for fear of being too troublesome to you, I shall conclude according to the dictates of my spirit, that is, to pray, that God would grant his Majesty long Life ; and that he may know his real friends from them crept under that Cloak ; as also never want power to controul them, nor a Legitimate Heir to succeed, without tripping over the Right of succession: so if what already allèdged, is not a sufficient excuse for not being vulgarly Credulous, yet I doubt not but will necessitate you to conclude him impartial, that is,

SIR,

Yours,

W. L.
