

C R I T I C A L DISSERTATIONS ON THE

ORIGIN, ANTIQUITIES, LANGUAGE, GOVERNMENT, MANNERS, AND RELIGION,

OF THE

ANTIENT CALEDONIANS, THEIR POSTERITY THE PICTS, AND THE BRITISH AND IRISH SCOTS.

BY JOHN MACPHERSON, D. D. Minister of Slate, in the Isle of Sky.

DUBLIN;

Printed by BOULTER GRIERSON, Printer to the King's most Excellent Majefty.

M DCC LXVIII.

TO THE HONOURABLE

Charles Greville, Efq;

DEAR SIR,

MY Father, who was the Author of the following Differtations, would not, perhaps, have dedicated them to any man alive. He annexed, and with good reason, an idea of fervility to addreffes of this fort, and reckoned them the difgrace of literature. If I could not, from my foul, acquit myfelf of every felfifh view, in prefenting to you the posthumous works of a father I tenderly loved, you would not have heard from me in this public manner. You know, my dear friend, the fincerity of my affection for you : but even that affection should not induce me to dedicate to you, had you already arrived at that eminence, in the ftate, which the abilities and fhining talents a 2 talents of your early youth feem fo largely to promife, left what really is the voice of friendship and efteem, should be mistaken, by the world, for that of flattery and interested defigns. I am on the eve of setting out for a very distant quarter of the world : without asking your permisfion, I leave you this public testimony of my regard for you, not to secure your future favour, but to stand as a small proof of that attachment, with which I am,

DEDICATION.

Dear Sir

Your most affectionate Friend, and most Obedient

Humble Servant,

John Macpherfon.

PREFACE.

rv]

T HE following Differtations are the production of the leifure hours of a clergyman in one of the remoteft of the Scottish isles. Excluded, by the pecufituation of the place of his refidence, from the fociety of the learned, he indulged his fingular paffion for literature among a few good books. Though the natural bent of his genius turned towards the belles-lettres, he fometimes amused himfelf in disquisitions of a more ferious nature. Being mafter of the Celtic, in all its branches, he took pleafure in tracing other languages to that general fource of all the antient and modern tongues of Europe. From inveftigations of this kind many difcoveries in the ancient hiftory of nations arofe. This naturally led to the examination of the mass of fiction, which almost every nation of Europe poffeffes for the history of their remoteft anceftors. The more he looked into these legendary fabrics of antiquity, the less he found them capable of bearing the teft of criticism. He therefore refolved to write fome general differtations on that fubject, which.

a 3

which, if they could not eftablish a new and more rational fystem, would at least expose the abfurdity of the old.

IT was not altogether from a partiality to his own country that Dr. Macpherfon gave the first place to Scotland, in his difquifitions. Though the Scots have as just pretensions to a high antiquity as any nation in Europe, yet their origin is peculiarly involved in darknefs. It was the misfortune of North Britain to have been almost totally deftitute of letters, at a time when monkish learning, and those religious virtues which arofe from afcetic aufterities, greatly flourished in Ireland, and among the Saxons in England. This was the cafe in the feventh and eight centuries, the æra in which the Hibernian fystems of antiquity were formed. The fennachies and fileas of Ireland made then a property of the Scots of Britain, and, fecure of not being contradicted by an illiterate, and I may fay, an irreligious race of men, affumed to themfelves the dignity of being the mother-nation. The partiality of Bede for his holy cotemporaries of Ireland is well known. The good man believed and retailed whatever fictions were dictated to him by the religious of a nation for whom he had the greatest regard for their orthodoxy. THE

vii

any

THE almost continual wars and anomosities which fubfifted between the English and Scots for many ages naturally gave birth to violent national prejudices on both fides. The learned of England could not diveft themfelves of that antipathy to their Northern neighbours which had feized their whole nation. Though at variance with the Irifh in every other point, they agreed with them wonderfully well in extenuating the national antiquities of the Scots. Some of those gentlemen had the cruelty to extirpate the brave nation of antient Caledonians, left the detefted Scots of latter times should derive any honour from the military reputation of a people who once poffeffed their country.

HAPPILY for the prefent times, those prejudices which blinded both nations have, in a great measure, subsided. National aversions are lost in the antiquity of those national injuries from which they first arose. Whatever may tend to do honour to either nation is heard with candor, if not with pleasure, by both. They are, in short, now fo much blended with one another, that whatever throws lustre upon the one, ought to be reckoned an acquisition of reputation to the other.—If to throw a new and strong light on the antiquities of a nation, reflects any honour upon it, the Scots of the prefent age are much indebted to the industry and learning of Dr. Macpherson. He travelled back, it is true, into the regions of antiquity with more advantages than others have done, and therefore his fuccefs was proportionably greater. A few additional obfervations I am to make upon the general fubject of the differtations, arofe, if they have any merit, from the discoveries he had made to my hand.

a 4

Some time before the total dereliction of Britain by the Romans, in the reign of Honorius, we find that the Caledonians were diftinguished into two capital nations, the Deucaledones and Vecturiones. By thefe two branches I understand those, who, a fhort time thereafter, were known by the names of Picts and Scots. It was after the departure of the Romans, that the defenceless state of the degenerated provincials gave the Picts an opportunity of extending themfelves to the Eastern counties to the South of the frith of Edinburgh. From the joint testimony of all writers who examined the fubject, the Picts of the earlieft ages poffeffed only the East and North-east coast of Scotland. From their fituation, with refpect to the Scots of Jar-ghael, their country was was naturally called by the latter An Duachaeldoch, a word compounded of An Dua, or Tua, North, and, Caeldoch, Caledonian country. Some of the South-weft Highlanders of the counties of Perth and Argyle diftinguisthed to this day those of Ross, Sutherland and Caithness, by the name of An Dua-ghael, and their country by the appellation of An Dua-ghaeldoch. This appears so obviously the etymon of Deu-caledones, that nothing but a total ignorance of the Galic language could permit antiquaries to have overlooked it.

THE etymon of Vecturiones is not fo obvious. We learn from the most antient domeffic records in Scotland, that a ridge of mountains, called Drum Albin, was the ancient boundary of the Scottifh territories towards the East. The author of the Differtations has clearly demonstrated that Drum Albin is the chain of mountains which runs from Lochlomond, near Dumbarton, to the frith of Taine, in the county of Rofs. This Dorfum Britanniæ, as it is called by Adamnan, abbot of Iona, runs through the Western end of the districts of Athol and Badenoch. That part of this ridge of hills which extends between these districts, for a length of more than twenty miles.

x

miles, is called Drum Uachtur. This circumftance is well known to many, befides the natives of that country, as the military road through the Highlands paffes that way. If we fhould fuppofe that Uachtur, which is still retained as the name of a part of Drum Albin, was once the general appellation of the whole, the etymon of Vecturiones is at once decyphered. Uachtur, though now taken perhaps in a more confined fenfe than formerly, literally fignifies the upper country. Uachturich is a word of the fame import with Highlanders; and if the harsh Celtic termination is foftned into a Roman one, Vecturiones differs only in a changeable vowel from Uachturich.

WE have reason to believe, from the unfavourable climate, and sterile nature of the foil, in that part of Scotland which lies to the West of Drum Albin, that the anceftors of the Scots lived long in a very uncultivated state; as destitute of great national events as of letters to transmit them to posterity. Though the Scots of Jar-ghael must, in the nature of things, have been very barbarous and unpolissed, as far back as the latter end of the fourth century, yet it is to be hoped they were less fo than the Attacotti, their neighbours, or rather a tribe tribe of the Scots to the South of the Clyde, " In my youth," fays the holy St. Jerome, " I faw in Gaul the Attacotti, a British people feeding on human bodies. When they found in the woods flocks of fheep or hogs, or herds of cattle, they used to cut off the buttocks of the herdfmen, and the breafts of the women, looking upon those parts of the body as the greatest danties*." I have fuch a veneration for whatever has fallen from the holy father, that I cannot entertain a doubt of the truth of this ftory, however incredible it might appear from an uninfpired writer. The Irifh nation, not content to deprive their posterity of Scotland of their antient bishops, abbots, presbyters and historians of any note, have alfo endeavoured to rob them of their barbarous and wild men. O'Connor, a learned differtator on the hiftory of Ireland, has, in the name of his nation, claimed a right to the Attacotti. I with I could give them to the gentleman; for as the infamous label of St. Jerome is tacked to them, they can do little honour to the Scots of the prefent age.

IT was in the fifth century that the incurfions of the Scots, as a feparate nation, ^{*} Hieronym. con. Jovinian. lib. 2.

xii PREFACE.

into the Southern Britain, rendered them objects of attention to the writers of other countries. It does not appear that letters were any part of the booty which they carried home with them from the deferted Roman province. The feminary of monks eftablished by Columba, an Irishman, in the island of Iona, in the fixth age, feem to have been the only perfons, within the territories of the Scots, that could record events. If they kept any registers of transfactions, they were destroyed or loss, in the Norwegian conquest of the Hebrides by Harold Harfager, about the middle of the ninth century.

THE fubverfion of the Picfifh kingdom is the first æra in which it can be supposed the Scots begun to have authentic records of their own. Soon after the conquest of Pictavia, the Saxons found means to extend their government to the frith of Edinburgh. The Picts and Saxons had alternately posfessed for some time before, the counties between the Forth and the Tweed. The most of the inhabitants of those counties were of the Saxon race, and no doubt, in a great measure, they retained the language of their ancestors. It was after the invalions of the Danes had totally broke the power power of the Saxons, that the Scots extended themfelves far to the South. The barbarity of those Northern rovers who inceffantly harrassified England, as they themfelves were heathens, drove certainly a number of pious Saxon eccelesiaftics into Scotland. It was they that introduced the cuftom of recording events in monkish chronicles; and upon the authority of Bede, they all adopted the tystem of the Hibernian extraction of the Scots nation.

THE Scots lament the deftruction of their antient annals by Edward the First of England. Though Edward's policy in this cafe was rude and barbarous, he did very little hurt to the genuine antiquities of the Scots. Many of the domestic transactions of the latter ages were no doubt lost; but what related to the origin of the nation was Bede's tale re-told.—I shall endeavour, in some measure, to account, for that learned writer's mistake.—A mistake I call it, though it is more than probable that the venerable monk of Girwy had some holy reasons for giving easy faith to the fennachies of Ireland.

THERE is reason to believe, with Dr. Macpherson, that the gospel was first preached in Britain by missionaries from the Leffer Asia. The great zeal of Polycarp, bishop xiv PREFACE.

of Smyrna, who fuffered martyrdom in the year 170, it is certain, induced him to fend apoftles to Gaul. His difpute with the fee of Rome, about the very momentous affair of Eafter, is well known, The zealous fchismatic preferred the tradition of the Eastern church to the authority of St. Peter's chair .--- An ardent defire of propagating his doctrine, occafioned his fending miffionaries to the very extremity of the weft, and of course to Britain. The opinion of the Eastern church concerning Easter, which prevailed among the Picts and Scots, is a corroborating argument on this head. The fee of Rome found means to recover the Southern Britons to the Catholic opinion upon this important point; but the barbarians of the North were obftinately tenacious of the faith of their anceftors.

BEDE made many efforts to fave the fouls of his Northern neighbours, by endeavouring to bring them back to the true faith concerning Easter and the Tonfure. Naitan, the great monarch of the Picts, was at last overcome by the arguments of Ceolfrid, and, together with his nation, received into his religion these two articles fo neceffary to falvation.—But the wicked and abandoned barbarians of Jar-ghael would not, it seens, PREFACE. xv be perfuaded out of their error. From their obftinacy, no doubt, arofe thofe prejudices againft them, which are very confpicuous in the writings of the venerable Bede. Ireland at that time was defervedly called the Country of Saints. The Catholic faith prevailed there in all its original purity. The momentous articles of Eafter and the Tonfure were received with that devotion which ought to attend the decifions of St. Peter's chair. — The venerable writer, fo often mentioned, regarded the Irifh with that partiality which good men have for the beft of Chriftians, and gave great faith to their traditions and records.

BEDE was a very extraordinary perfon for the times in which he lived : pious and fervent, but calm in his zeal for religion, his writings throughout breathe the fentiments of humanity and devotion. He certainly had more knowledge than all his cotemporaries joined together. But it appears to me, that he was neither critically inquifitive, or knew much of national antiquities. The good man was much better employed. Miracles, vifions, dreams, martyrologies, Eafter and the Tonfure, and, above all, St. Cuthbert and the fee of Rome, engaged his whole attention, xvi PREFACE.

attention, and diverted his mind from a fludy more amufing than important.

THE few fcraps of antiquity which is contained in the first book of his ecclesiaffical hiftory, the venerable prefbyter borrowed from Gildas, or from his own religious cotemporaries of Ireland. Before I proceed to Gildas, it may not be improper to give one inftance of the great partiality of Bede to the Irifh. Egfrid, King of Northumberland, had been, in the year 685, with the greatest part of his army, cut off by the Picts. This, fays Bede, was a judgment from God, upon Egfrid and his fubjects, for committing the year before this fatal event, unheard of barbarities and ravages among the Hibernians, a nation very barmless and innocent, and of a most friendly disposition towards the English.

BEDE, however, must be blamed for his fervile copying after Gildas, a writer not worthy of fuch attention. Gildas was one of the most passionate, peevish, and querulous of mankind. He not only was immoderately angry with the Scots * and Picts, ^{*} Exin Britannia, fo he calls that part of the island which had been fubject to the Romans, duabus genibus transfmarinis unbernnter favois, Scatorum a Circio, Pildorum ab aquilone, calcabilis multos flupts, gemitque per annes. Gild. cap. 15. Bede explains, that Gildas gave the epithet of transfmarini to the Picts and Scots, becaufe they came from beyond the firths of Forth and Clyde. Bed. Hift. Eccles. lib. 1. cap. 12.

who perhaps deferved very ill at his hands, but even his friends the Britons, and, above all, he was enraged againft the Saxons. From an expreffion in this author, fome Englifh * and many Irifh antiquaries, to their great joy, thought they found an unanfwerable proof that the Scots came originally from Ireland; and that in no earlier period than the fixth century. Gildas, fpeaking of the Scots and Picts, fays, Revertuntur ergo impudentes graffatores Hiberni domus, post non multum temporis reverfuri.

THE epithet impudentes applied to *Hiber*ni is not fufficient to eftablish the justness of this reading, though it might have some weight with men of wit. Bede was far from entertaining such an unfavourable opinion of the inhabitants of the boly isle. In an edition of Gildas, given to the public by Dr. Gale, the passage under consideration, is read in a more grammatical way, and less to the difcredit of Ireland : revertuntur ergo impudentes graffatores Hibernas domus; so that Gildas meant no more than that the Scots returned home for the winter.

To justify this reading, it is to be observed, that the ancient Scots and their posterity gave the name of winter boufes, the fame exactly with the Hibernas domus of Gildas, to those more comfortable habitations to which they retreated when the warmer feafon of the year was over. In the fummer they lived in the mountains and forefts with their cattle, and to enjoy the pleafure and advantage of hunting. The Arabian Bedowins, the ancient Nomades and Scythians, and the prefent Tartars, give into the fame practice. The Bedowins, in particular, gave the appellation of winter boufes to the habitations to which they retreated from the autumnal rains. Bede, a Saxon, was perhaps a stranger to this characteristical practice of the Scots, and not knowing what fenfe to make of Gildas's Hibernas domus, he altered the old reading. This opinion feems decifive, as he had retained the word domus, instead of the more proper word domum.

^{*} Lhoyd and Stillingfleet.

xviii PREFACE.

THE times in which Bede lived, were the golden age of Ireland. That kind of learning which then fubfifted in the world, flourished much in that country. No enemies invaded it from abroad, and there was an unufual tranquillity at home. National prosperity is the source of national pride. Averse to have themselves thought descended from the Scots of Albany, who were far from being a powerful nation at that time, they began to fearch out for themfelves, anceftors of a more dignified character. It is probable that the fchifmatic difposition of the Scots, about Easter and the Tonfure, had its weight in inducing the Irifh to inveftigate their origin among a lefs perverfe people.

THAT the Irifh fystems of antiquity were formed after the holy fcriptures were known in that country, is beyond all doubt. All their fictions on that head are ingrafted upon names in the old testament. This fubject is discussed at large; in the Differtations now given to the public. I only mention it now to afcertain that the fable of the Hibernian extraction of the Scots of Albany was formed at the fame time. The prefent identity of language, and the fimilarity of cuftoms and manners which prevailed among the Albanian and Hibernian Scots of antient times, made it evident that they were originally the fame people; fo it became neceffary to be very particular in the time and manner of their feparation. The Irish fabricators of antiquities furnished Bede with that account he gave of the first settlement of the Scots in Jarghael.

b 2

If

If the British Scots had any national traditions of their own, which contradicted the holy antiquaries of Ireland, Bede, from a pious averfion to heretics, totally rejected them.

FROM what I have faid, it appears, that the Scots have been hitherto, unfortunate in the writers of the ancient hiftory of their country. There has been great expence of erudition on the fubject, both by foreign and domestic antiquaries. But the grand defideratum, in the difquifitions of those learned men, was a thorough knowledge of the old Caledonian language, which goes now under the name of the Galic tongue. Dr. Macpherfon happily joined a critical knowledge, in that language, to his great learning in other refpects. Something therefore, more fatisfactory ought to be expected from him -than from those who have gone before him, and were not poffeffed of the fame advantages.

BEFORE the Doctor had thoroughly examined his fubject, he paid great deference to the opinion of Tacitus, concerning the Germanic extraction of the Caledonians. The colour of hair and fize of body, which diftinguished them from the Britons of the South,

PREFACE.

South, were not conclusive arguments. These circumstances might depend more upon food and the peculiar nature of the foil and climate, than upon a different origin. The manifest difference in those dialects of the Celtic, which the Scots of the mountains and the Welsh speak to this day, seems more to argue their remote feparation from one another. Their living as feparate states, from the earlieft times, could not have effectuated fuch a change : otherwife we cannot account for the identity of the Irifh and Galic tongues, efpecially as the nations who fpeak those languages were in no period of antiquity that can be affigned, fubject to the fame government.

THIS was one of the arguments that muft have influenced the judgment of the author of the Differtations in his first view of the fubject. But this difference of language is easily accounted for. The little progress that navigation muft have made in the North of Europe when Britain was first peopled, is a convincing argument, that the first migrations into this island, was from the nearest continent, which was the Belgic division of Gaul. These migrations certainly happened in the earliest stage of fociety. The fublistence of a colony of fa-

vages

vyi

vages arifes entirely from hunting : it therefore may be supposed that the Gauls found first their way to the Northern extremity of Britain, in pursuit of their game. In proportion as the original colony advanced Northward, other emigrants from Gaul trod on their footsteps. Thus for a course of ages Gaul poured into Britain a fucceffion of colonies. The manners and language of the Gauls, in the mean time, fuffered material changes at home. The arts of civil life gradually arofe among them, and naturally introduced new ideas and new words into their language. It is to this advancing civilization of Gaul that we must ascribe the difference between the Northern and Southern Britons. The latter imported with them the changed manners, and adulterated, though improved, language of the more modern Gauls : the former tenacioufly retained the unpolifhed cuftoms and original language of their anceftors,

It would be as prefumptuous, as it would be idle, to hope for the warm attention of the public to difquifitions of this kind. There are, however, fome who, could they be culled out of the mafs of mankind, have more enlarged ideas; fome that are as impartial with refpect to times, as they are with regard to countries and individuals. For thefe, and thefe only, the author of the Differtations wrote. Difregarding the inattention of the many, could he but fecure the approbation of the judicious few.

as

THESE would be the fentiments of the author, could he fpeak for himfelf: but, I am forry to fay, he is now infenfible of praife or reproof. His death prevented his putting the laft hand to this work. His fon, to whofe care he left it, with a diffidence which ought to be natural to a very young man, chofe rather to give his father's differtations to the world as they ftood, than to attempt any amendments, which perhaps might injure the memory of a parent he tenderly loved.

THE most of the nations of the modern Europe look back with a blush, upon the strange fabrics of fiction they possible for their ancient history. They consider them as, at once, the monuments of the puerile credulity and folly of their ancestors. The Scots of this age faw with unconcern, if not with pleasure, forty of their ancient list of Kings expunged at once by Innes. This furious regicide, endeavoured to make amends to his countrymen, by giving them forty b 4. great Pictish monarchs for the long lift of the petty Princes of Jarghael, of whom he deprived them. The offer was rejected with that foorn it deferved ; and the monarchs of Pictavia, whose existence depended upon the fame, or even worfe, if possible, authority, than that upon which the fiction of the first forty Scottish Kings was built, funk away into their original non-entity.

IRELAND, tenacious as it has been of its ancient annals, begins to regard lefs the indigefted fictions of her fennachies. Men of fenfe fee the impoffibility of transmitting events, through a feries of ages, without the affiftance of letters. They could not poffibly affign an earlier æra for the introduction of letters than the apoftleship of St. Patrick, and confequently, with Ware they depended very little upon the accounts handed down concerning ages prior to the reign of Leogaire.

In this untoward fituation of the Irifh antiquities, flept forth O'Connor to fupport the falling fabric. The zeal of this gentleman can only be equalled by his dogmatifm. He has crouded the bottoms of his pages with the authorities of O Flaherty, Keating, and Buchanan, who had as few lights to guide them through antiquity, as a writer of the prefent time can be fuppofed to poffefs. The two first are only remarkable for their confused manner of compiling the indigested fables of bards and fileas; and the latter has fearcely any thing to recommend him but the elegance of his diction.

IN vain has Mr. O Connor endeavoured to establish an aboriginal knowledge of letters in Ireland. Innes had previoufly deftroyed the credit of that fystem, and Dr. Macpherfon has thrown it down for ever. From an additional differtation published lately by Mr. O Connor, he feems to have been extremely gauled by fome obfervations made by the translator of the works of Offian on the ancient hiftory and poems of Ireland, If a judgment can be formed from O Connor's intemperate rage, he feels very fore on that subject. His personal abuse of Mr. Macpherson feems to have proceeded from a very irafcible difpofition, or was intended to draw an answer from that gentleman, which might give importance to his own work. In this, it is to be feared, he will not fucceed. The translator of the Galic poems is not much in the humour of doing an honour of that kind to adversaries who ufe low fcurrility in the place of argument and dispaffionate disquisition.

DOCTOR

DOCTOR MACPHERSON, in the course of the following Differtations, has fhewn how ill-founded the fenachies of Ireland have been, in their pretensions to the Britifh Scots. Before we proceed to a further difcuffion of that fubject, it may not be improper to examine a new claim, from the fame quarter, on another martial nation, who poffeffed a part of Caledonia .- Marcellinus relates, that the Attacotti, a warlike race of men, in conjunction with the Picts and Scots, laid wafte the Roman province in Britain, in the reign of Valentinian. St. Jerome gives a very extraordinary character of the Attacotti : " In my youth," faith the faint, " I faw in Gaul, the Attacotti, a British people, feeding upon human bodies. When they found in the woods hogs and flocks of sheep, or herds of cattle, they used to cut off the buttocks of the herdfmen and the breafts of the women, looking upon those parts of the body as the greateft danties*."

IT would be perhaps thought uncharitable, if not impious, to call the holy Father's veracity in queftion, effectially as he appeals to occular demonstration: but I muft

[•] Quid loquar de cateris nationibus, cum ipfe adolefcentulus, in Gallia viderim Scotos (Atracottos, Catacottos, varie enim junt lettions) gentem Britannicam, humanis vefci carnibus, & cum per fylvas porcorum greges & armentorum, pecudeanque reperiant, pathorum nates & fommarum papillas folere abfeindere, et has folas ciborum delicias arbitrari. Hieronym. adv. Jovin. Lib. ii. obferve observe, that it is fomewhat strange that the Attacotti, notwithstanding of their barbarity, should have been Canibals, at a time they had hogs, sheep and cattle before them. The policy of the Romans must have been extreamly relaxed in their province of Gaul, when the buttocks of their subjects were for much exposed to the barbarous gluttony of the Attacotti.

PREFACE. xxvii

But leaving this fact on the authority of Jerome, it appears certain that the Attacotti were a British people. Buchanan and Cambden prove, from the Notitia, that some of that nation were among the mercenary troops of the empire in its decline. In what part of Caledonia the Attacotti were settled is difficult to determine. Buchanan, with great probability, places them between the walls; and in that case they must have been a powerful tribe of the Mæatæ of Dion.

STILLINGFLEET observes, that the etymon of Attacotti has not hitherto been understood. The Doctor adds, by way of fneer on the whimfical etymologists of British names from the Punic, that he doubts much whether it ever shall, unless fome learned critic chuse to trace it to the Phœnician language+. A tolerable knowledge of the ancient languages of Britain, will, I think, enable a perfon, unacquainted with the Phœnician, to decypher the meaning of this word. Attacotti literally fignifies The men of the woodst.

[†] Origines Britan. p. 287.

xxviii P R E F A C E.

THE Irish not contented to deprive us, their poor posterity in Caledonia, of our bishops, abbots and historians, of any note, have also endeavoured to rob us of our barbarians and canibals. A late differtator on the hiftory of Ireland claims a right to the Attacotti in the name of his country. I wifh I could give them to this ingenious gentleman; for, under the afperfion of Jerome, they will do very little honour to any country. To use O'Connor's own words, " The Attacotti were originally a Belgian nation, who occupied the Western parts of Ireland. They were a motly aggregate of rebels, who, in conjunction with fome other Septs of the fame race, in the other provinces, were called Abachtuata, for their cruelties. They took up arms against the government about ninety years before Chrift, $[\]ddagger$ In the Welch language, the particle at is a preposition of the fame import with the English at or about. In-the fame dialect of the Celtic, kood fignifies wood; kuit does the fame in the Cornith, coat in the Armorican, and coile in the Galic. Young brufhwood, and the twigs of any wood, are to this day called coid in the Galic. Attacotti may allo be derived from atticb, inhabitants, and cood, of the woods. Those who live in remote woody parts of a country are ftill diftinguished in the Highlands of Scotland, by the appellation of the dwellers of woods.

P R E F A C E. xxix overturned it effectually, and had very nigh buried the whole Scottifh nation, together with its memory, in one common grave*."

How the Irifh were employed, what they acted, and what they fuffered, about a century before the commencement of the Chriftian æra, their own faithful annals can only tell; and few in number are those chosen perfons who have access to these mysterious and secret records. That the Attacotti were upon the point of destroying the whole Scottish name, when the excellent Moran most opportunely interposed, those felect perfons will perhaps only believe.

THE Attacotti, in the fourth age, were a British people. That they came first from Ireland still remains to be proved. The Scots indeed have been long ago faid to have been transplanted into Britain from that quarter; and had those learned Hibernians, from whom Bede and Nennius derive their information, ever heard that the Caledonians, Mæatæ and Attacotti had been once considerable nations in North Britain, it is highly probable they would have given all of them the honour of an Irish original. But their traditions did not extend so high as the fourth century, when those names fell into defuetude. The ^{*} Differt, on the ant. hift. of Irel. Introduction.

Picks, it is true, were permitted to be of a different extraction : but the Picts, it feems, were vaffals of Ireland, and unworthy of being defcended from their Heremonian Lords.

USHER, no doubt with fome degree of pleafure, found that, in the printed copies of Jerome, the British canibals of the holy Father were the Scots+. The Primate remarks, at the fame time, that fome manufcripts called them Attifcotti, Catitti, Cattacotti, and Attagotti : but Cambden conjectures, with reason, that those names ought to be read Attacotti, according to the orthography followed by Marcellinus. Should we give the preference to the reading which Ufher found in print, there arifes a proof that the Scots, contrary to his own position, were fettled in Britain in the fourth age. If we adopt the opinion of Cambden, the Irifh cannot poffibly have any right to the Attacotti.-That the Attacotti possessed the county of Galloway, is highly probable : from a paffage in Marcellinus, we may naturally infer, that they were more connected with the Scots than with the Picks; confequently, that they possefied a part of the western coast, rather than that of the German ocean[‡].

[†] Brit. Ecclef. ant. p. 307, 308. † Picli, Saxonefque, et Scotti & Attacotti Britannos ærumnis vexavere centinuis. Ammian. Marcell. l. 26.

CONTENTS.

· Page DISSERT. I. THE remote antiquities of nations either entirely fabulous, or full of uncertainty, DISSERT. II. General observations on the first migrations of Afiatic colonies into Europe .---The Gauls the progenitors of the ancient Britifh .- Of the Caledonians .- The etymon of their 18 name, DISSERT. III. Of the Picts .- That they were the posterity of the Caledonians, 27 DISSERT. IV. Of the Pictifh monarchy, 34 DISSERT. V. Of the Pictifh language, DISSERT. VI. Of the Scots, 45 56 DISSERT. VII. The Irith antiquities peculiarly dark and fabulous, 60 DISSERT. VIII. Of the original inhabitants of Ireland .- That they went from Caledonia .--Why the Irifh and Britifh Scots were called Gaels. 82 DISSERT. IX. Why the genuine posterity of the ancient Caledonians were called Picts and Scots, 93 DISSERT. X. The Highlanders ftrangers to the national name of the Scots -- Call themfelves Albanich, or ancient Britons-Gael, or Celtæ ---Obfervations on the Irifh, Galic and Welch Languages, 104 DISSERT. XI. Of the genius, manners and cuftoms of the Caledonians, Picts and Scots, 117 DISSERT. XII. A tradition preferved by Bede confidered.-A parallel between the manners and cuftoms of the Caledonians and ancient Germane Page Germans.—General reflections on the fubject, 137

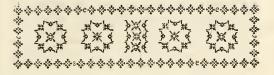

DISSERT, XIII. Of the degrees and titles of honour among the Scots of the middle ages. Of obfolete law terms in Regiam Majeftatem. Of the Merchetæ Mulierum, 158

DISSERT. XIV. Of the Bards,

- DISSERT. XV. Of the Weftern Iflands of Scotland.—Accounts given of them by the Writers of Rome.—Of their ancient names, Ebudes, Hebrides, and Inchegaul. Subject to, and poffeffed very early by the Scots of Jar-ghael, 206
- DISSERT. XVI. The hiftory of the Norwegian Principality of the Ifles, commonly called the Kingdom of Man, 225
- DISSERT. XVII. Of fome monuments of antiquity in the Weftern Islands of Scotland. Occafional obfervations upon the genius, manners, and cuftoms of the Hebridian Scots of the midages, 285
- DISSERT. XVIII. Of the Scottifh and Pictifh dominions, before they were united under one Sovereign, 304
- DISSERT. XIX. Of the Religion of the ancient Caledonians, 311
- DISSERT. XX. Of the time in which Chriftianity was introduced into North Britain. That the first churches of Britain were planted by Oriental Missionaries, 320
- DISSERT. XXI. Of the conversion of the Southern Picts by St. Ninian. Of the mission of Palladius to the Scots. Of St. Columba, 338

DISSER-

[1]

DISSERTATION I.

The remote Antiquities of Nations either entirely fabulous, or full of Uncertainty.

N an age to accurate as the prefent, it affords matter of fome curiofity to obferve those marvellous fabrics of fiction, which bards and antiquaries have erected as monuments of the antiquity and illustrious origin of their nations.

Livy has observed, that this credulous vanity of ancient times merits our indulgence rather than censure. The degree in which this indulgence is beftowed, and the readiness with which belief is given, depend on the various opinions, and different fituations of mankind.

IN rude times, before the love of property takes fuch abfolute dominion of the heart, that all its romantic and generous views are excluded, the moft exaggerated tales, which reflect honour on the antiquity and illuftrious defcent of a nation, are attended to with rapture, and regarded as genuine hiftory.

A

HOWEVER

HOWEVER abfurd the credulity and romance of antiquity may appear to us, it is both ungenerous and unfair to turn them to fevere ridicule, without firft attending to our own weakneffes : on a comparifon of both, it may be difficult to determine who is the greateft object of contempt; the brave Barbarian, intoxicated with the bloody atchievements, and ideal antiquity of his nation, or the civilized fceptic, refined into a difbelief of every truth, and equally removed from the partialities and fuperior virtues of the heart.

NATIONAL pride, an attachment to the marvellous, and eafinefs of affent, are the ftrong characteriftics of mankind in their illiterate ftate. Hence it is, that, in their earlier periods, almoft all the nations of the earth have ardently vied with each other, in the invention and belief of the moft pompous and incredible tales, with regard to their origin and antiquity. A fhort furvey of the antiquities of the moft confiderable nations of antient and later times, will cftablifh the truth of this obfervation.

To begin with the Romans, a people whom national dignity and fuperiority have defervedly placed at the head of mankind.—Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, and what is more furprifing, Saluft, Livy, Dionyfius Halicarnaffus, and almoft all the fucceeding hiftorians, hold forth with one voice that the Romans were defeended from Æneas : but the connection between that people and the Phrygian demi-god was no more than a perfect chimera. Homer's authority, together with the convincing arguments of a writer of great erudition [a], have fet this matter in the cleareft light.

[a] See Bochart's Letter to Segrois.

Antiquities of Nations.

Homer gives us a prediction of Neptune, in which we are plainly told, that as Priam's whole family were hated by Jove, Æneas himfelf and his lateft pofterity fhould reign over the Trojans [b]. "This teftimony of Neptune, fays Mr. Pope, "ought to be confidered as an authentic act, the "fidelity and verity of which cannot be queftion-"ed."—Notwithftanding the prophecy of the earth-fhaking God, and in direct oppofition to probability and true hiftory, the Roman poets made their court to princes, fenators, and a powerful nation, by drawing out their Phrygian defcent in all the beautiful colours of their arr. Even thofe writers, in whom it was unpardonable to give a hearing to the moft plaufible romance, could not but patronize a tale, which, as hiftorians, they ihould have defpifed; but which, as Romans, they fondly believed.

I F we go from Italy into Greece, we shall find that the learned and polite nations of that country, had a confiderable share of the same vanity. According to the earliest accounts of time with them, their great Princes and heroes were fons or grandsons of some one divinity or other. An original fo noble, became at length too estimable a bleffing to remain the property of a few. It was fit that whole communities should partake of its benefits; therefore the Arcadians gave fcope to their ambition, and feriously afferted that their predeceffors were older than Jupiter, or what it feems they thought still more honourable, older than the moon herfelf. The Athenians feeing no good reason why any part of creation should take precedency of them in point of antiquity, affirmed that their progenitors were co-eval with the fun. Thefe two nations were the Aborigines of Greece, and the latter affumed the name of Autochthones, a name which ftrongly characterizes their pride and ignorance.

[b] Hom. Iliad. xx. ver. 306.

A 2

ON thifting the fcene to the other divisions of the old world, the fame ambitious folly, and the fame anility of belief prefent themfelves to our view.

EGYPT was reputed the mother of wifdom, and the kingdom of fcience and knowledge : but whatever degree of wifdom and learning the Egyptians had, they had allo weaknefs enough to entertain the moft extravagant notions concerning their own antiquity. They carried up the age of their empire to an immenfe height, and reckoned it their peculiar honour and felicity to have been governed by gods, for ages immemorial. Thefe gods, through time, became indolent, and fo cloyed with power, that they thought proper to refign the administration of Egyptian affairs into the hands of mortal kings. The mortality of kings was fupplied by the regularity and perpetuity of fucceflion. Accordingly, we are told that between the commencement of their government and the reign of the laft prieft of Vulcan who fat on the Egyptian throne, a feries of no lefs than three hundred and forty-one generations had paffed away. This period of mortal monarchs was fo intimately known to the literati of Egypt, that they fpoke with confidence of every trivial occurrence that happened, and could afcertain the exact duration of every particular reign. The courfe of things had very happily adapted this laft branch of the hiftory to their remembrance; for it was demonstrable that the number of their monarchs corresponded corresponded precitely with the number of genera-tions in which they reigned. A circumftance of this furprifing uniformity, though fo opposite to the common inequalities of the natural course of reigns, must have afforded the highest gratifica-tion to the puerile and superstitious fancy of an Egyptian.

5

HERODOTUS relates this curious hiftory very circumstantially, and feems to have been no less convinced of its verity than he was imprefied with its awfulnefs and grandeur. The priefts of Mem-phis gave him the ftrongeft affurances that, agreeable to this faithful and exact calculation, the Egyptian empire had lafted eleven thoufand three hundred and forty years; and how was it poffible for a hiftorian of his character to difbelieve a relation, however miraculous, which was folemnly attefted by fuch unexceptionable men. The in-fallible fervants of Jupiter had conducted him into a large hall, where he faw with his own eyes the ftatues of all the Vulcanian high priefts, who had been enumerated to him. Every one of thefe facred perfonages was introduced to him in the very order in which they had filled the chair; and, what is a little remarkable, every one of them was the fon of his immediate predeceffor in the pontificate.

THESE were the fentiments which the Egyptians entertained and profeffed concerning their remote antiquities. The extravagance of this paffion, inftead of fubfiding through a feries of ages, was constantly rapidly increasing, until the unfortunate reign of Pfammetichus. That wife monarch, and his equally wife fubjects, found themfelves under a neceflity of acknowledging, that the Phrygians had exifted before all other nations, and, of con-A 3 fequence.

On the Remote fequence, had a right to take place of them. Herodotus relates this flory in all its flriking circumflances. The profound gravity with which he carries on the relation, and his ferious appeal to the priefts of Vulcan at Memphis, ferve only to eftablifh the confiftency of this hiftorian's character *.

TROGUS POMPEIOS, another famous hiftorian, informs us, that the Scythians were thoroughly fatisfied that they themfelves had much jufter pretenfions to antiquity than either the Egyptians or Phrygians. The philofophical arguments with which thefe barbarians fupported their claim to fo ineftimable a dignity, appear to have had confiderable influence over the faith of Trogus; and to do them juftice, they were neither lefs convincive nor more frivolous than thofe on which Pfammeticbus and Herodotus had relied fo much, in the difpute againft the Phrygians +.

HOWEVER ridiculous the Egyptian and Phrygian fyftems of antiquities may appear, it must be allowed that none of them was more pregnant with absurdity than that of the Babylonians. Berofus, a celebrated Chaldæan prieft, faw the propriety of putting the antiquity of his own nation on a fure and respectable footing. Accordingly, he applied himfelf to accurate and unwearied enq iry. The refult of his labours was fuitable to his most fanguine expectations; for he found that the Babylonians had made astronomical obfervations for a hundred and feventy thousand years before Alexander the Great made himfelf master of Afia. Of confequence, the Chaldæan nation muft have exifted for a fpace of time equal at leaft to that number of years; and what reafonable perfon could think of refifting the power of fuch a demonstration *?

^{*} In Euterpe, c. 2.

¹ See Juftin's Abridg. of Trog. Pomp.

It may not be improper to return now into Europe, and inquire how far the Celtic nations were blinded by the pleafing delufions of fable, and overpowered with national prepofferfion. Those Celtes, of whom the most confiderable nations of modern Europe are fprung, were originally fo unconnected with the other parts of the world in which the use of letters prevailed, that their hiftory, and in a manner their being, is later in proportion. It was only after their intermixture with the polished part of mankind, that their manners became fettled, and their notions of antiquity diffinct. Formerly they, like all men in a bar-barous flate, affociated in detached tribes, and wandered over the common field as chance or choice directed. In fuch uncultivated and uncertain fituations, a tale might amuse for a season, and the bard might occafionally fing; but the varieties of a migrating life could never allow the one to form into a tradition, nor permit the other to take any lafting hold of the memory. It is even a confiderable time after a nation is formed that they think of looking back into antiquity by determinate fteps. Ages and centuries are never the meafures of time for the barbarian. He may be of opinion that his tribe is as old as any other, or may have originally defcended from the fun +, or fprung fpontaneoufly out of the ground, like the wood in which he purfues his game *; but without the aid of records, he can never trace back the origin of his diftant predeceffor, nor, were he in the humour of fiction, can he have any idea of framing a legendary one. On these accounts it is fruitles, and indeed fuperfluous, to fearch after the ideas or fystems which the old Celtic nations formed with regard to their remote origin and history.

A 4

^{*} Diod. Sicul. lib. ii.

⁺ Charlevoix's Hift. of Indians.

THESE natural obstructions to the refearches of a barbarous people, after a splendid origin, did not at all discourage the nations of Europe. Spain, in particular, claimed to herfelf an extraordinary proparticular, claimed to hericit an extraordinary pro-portion of antiquity and genealogical honour. Strabo informs us, that the Turdetonians, a nation of that country, could produce written monu-ments to fupport their claim, together with many celebrated poems and laws couched in verfe, all of fix thousand years standing. Our author observes, that these Turdetonians were the most learned people in Spain; and we may very fafely add, that they were beyond comparison the most antient people on earth, if Strabo's account of them be just : but that judicious writer acknowledges that the high antiquity of the Turdetonians, and the genuineness of their records, reft entirely on the credit of their own testimony. It is a pity that these historical records, poems, and versified laws, should, after to long and fuccessful a struggle with time, have in the end perifhed fo prematurely, that not the fmalleft veftige of them could be dif-covered for these fifteen hundred years past.

* Tacit. de'Mor. Germ. cap. 1.

Тноисн

Antiquities of Nations.

THOUGH the Turdetonian archives have funk in oblivion, time out of mind, yet the antiquities of Spain have been preferved in the works of authors truly antient, and have been p is if ed form thefe by a new Berofus. This faith of and mult enlightened hiftorian found, by what he unqueftionable evidence, that Jubal, the format Japhet, and grandfon of Noah, ought to be placed at the head of the Spanish royal line. He also afferts, that the right of this grandfon of the patriarch, to the empire of Celtiberia, was four ded on a donation of his grandfather, when he divided the world among his pofterity.

It is idle to take any further notice of the many curious anecdotes which this hiftorian, if he deferves that name, has extracted from fictitious records. But one cannot help being furprized how Mariana, one of the beft hiftorians of modern times, fhould have given into the abfurdity of this ill informed and credulous author. The very firft fentence of Mariana's hiftory acquaints us, that Jubal was undoubtedly the perfon who introduced its firft inhabitants into Spain. In the next fentence we are told, that all men of great learning and extensive enquiry, were of this opinion. He proceeds then to inform us, that Jubal, after having fettled many colonies, and built populous cities, applied himfelf to the arts of government, and ruled over his extensive empire with great moderation and juffice *.

FRANCIO, an imaginary Trojan prince, the fon of the celebrated Hector, was once thought the founder of the French empire. An origin derived from fo illuftrious a fource, could not fail to elevate an airy and fantaftic people into the utmoft intemperance of national pride. But the French of later times feem little inclined to believe their Pbrygian pedigree, nor are they fo injudicious as to avail themfelves of a paffage in Ammianus Marcellinus, which might favour a pretention of this kind.

^{*} Mariana, Lib. 1.

THE old Germans had bards eftablished among them as far back as our authentic accounts of them reach. These bards, upon the authority of rhimes, venerable on account of their antiquity, affirmed, that they had the honour of being descended from a God. The name of that God was Tuisco, and so universal was the reverence paid to his memory, that every distinct nation of Germany adored him as their progenitor *.

Long after letters and chriftianity had been introduced among the Germans, the fame genealogical enthufiafm remained, though under a different form. No fooner had the deformities of the old fyftem begun to appear, than the Saxons, Brieflanders, and Brunfwickers, had the good fortune to difcover that they were originally fprung from three renowned generals who ferved under Alexander the Great. It was thought abfolutely inconfistent with probability, that the Pruffians, fo celebrated for bravery, fhould be the offspring of Celtic or Teutonic barbarians; accordingly an able antiquary refeued their reputation, by tracing them up to Pruffias, king of Bythynia. Bur of all the inhabitants of the North of

BUT of all the inhabitants of the North of Europe, the Danes were certainly the most romantic in their pretensions to a remote origin and authentic records. Denmark was first inhabited by giants, fays the eloquent Saxo Grammaticus. Thefe giants were of matchlefs ftrength of body and vigour of mind. There were local demonstrations of the one, and traditional proofs of the other. Dan was the father of the Danish nations, and Argul, his brother, gave being to the English. Thefe two great personages flourished an innumerable feries of ages before the birth of Christ.

ΤĒ

IF any one fhould afk, how the hiftory of Dan, and of his immediate pofterity were preferved, Saxo will fatisfy his curiofity on that head. Denmark, according to him, produced a fucceffion of excellent bards; whofe bufinefs as well as amufement it was to record the actions of its kings and heroes, in all the fublimity of heroic composition: but as the productions of bards, however happy, may be deftroyed or effaced by time, our author affures us, that the works of the Danifh poets were liable to no fuch inconvenience, as they were engraved upon folid rocks and obelifks of the most durable nature. He even affirms, that he himfelf extracted those numerous hiltorical rhimes, which crowd his work, from those permanent monuments of antiquity.

A LEARNED archbishop has traced the kings of Sweden all the way up to Magog, a perfon whole close connection with Noah fitted him highly for fo eminent a station.

THE English were once enthusiaftically fond of an ideal predeceffor, and of an imaginary superiority derived from him. Brutus, the ion of Silvius, the grandfon of Ascanius, and great grandfon of Æneas, was, to their great happines, reputed the parent and founder of their nation. Brutus, happily for England, had the missfortune to kill his father; fo that he found it necessfary to leave Italy, and make his way into Gaul. There he performed many fignal exploits ; but did not think it convenient to pursue his fortune long in that country, as he was directed by the oracle of Diana to vifit this ifland. Here he met with a monftrous race of giants, who gave him a very hoftile reception : but their enormous ftrength of body, and the greatness of their numbers, ferved only as a field for Brutus to difplay his great military talents; for though a few battles were at first fought with various fuccefs, yet in the end Brutus not only overcame, but exterminated this gigantic race. After acting fo long in a military and victorious capaci-ty, Brutus refigned himfelf to the lefs laborious, but equally important occupation of a ruler and fovereign. The greatnefs of his abilities was then no lefs difplayed in the arts of peace than in his former conduct in the field. He reigned long over the extensive empire of Britain, and at length clofed a glorious administration, by dividing his territories between his three fons. Thefe were Lo-crinus, Camber, and Albanacius. England devolved on Locrinus, being his eldeft fon; Wales was the patrimony of Camber, and Scotland fell to the share of Albanactus.

6

and

EVEN this tale had the good fortune to pleafe an once credulous people. The Englifh of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries embraced it with an enthufiafm peculiar to the romantic fpirit of those times. Edward the first claimed a fuperiority over Scotland, on account of his more direct connection with Brutus. Accordingly, in the heat of those disputes which ensued on the death of Alexander the third of Scotland, Edward's agents urged firenuously before the Pope, that in confequence of the division which Brutus made made of his dominions, Scotland was from the beginning, and of confequence fhould remain, a fief of England.

THE ftory of Brutus was far from wanting learned authority to fupport its credit. Geoffrey of Monmouth gave it all the aid which profound erudition and the warmeft zeal could beftow. He affirms, that he found it fully demonstrated, by the joint teftimony of old British annals; and it cannot be denied but an effential part of the flory is found in Nennius, who wrote his Eulogium Britanniæ in the ninth century, about three hundred years before Geoffrey's time.

SELDEN has made fome attempts to defend the tale of Brutus; and Cambden owns ingenuoufly that he himfelf had frequently firained his invention to the utmoft, in order to juftify the moft fufpicious parts, and reconcile the contradictions of this flory : after all, he could not perfuade himfelf to believe it; and it may be juftly prefumed, that all the Englifh antiquaries of the prefent and of fucceeding times will explode it for ever.

It is now high time to examine the pretenfions which the Scots have to a remote antiquity: and after the foolifh appearance which the ancient legends of the greateft nations of the world have made, it cannot, without a miracle, be expected, that they alone fhould be well informed of their genuine origin, or free of national credulity. They had no doubt an equal claim with other nations to a renowned anceftry, and as remote an origin. A mountainous country, like Scotland, bids indeed the faireft for inhabitants of great antiquity. A plain and fertile country is always fubject to the inroads of their neighbours, bours, and therefore often change their mafters. The fterility of rocks, forefts, and defarts, are far from being inviting to an enemy; at the fame time that their inacceffiblenefs enables the natives eafily to repel invafions - The Scots therefore had no caule to yield, in point of antiquity, to any other nation. If tradition had failed in handing down the particular æra and manner of their first fettlement, they were ingenious to invent, and partial enough to give credit to a noble and fictitious origin. Accordingly, the procurators fent by the states of Scotland, to plead their cause against King Edward, before the court of Rome, contended ftrenuoufly, that the Scots were defcended from Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt .-- That this Scota came into Scotland, together with her fon Erc, whom fhe had by Gathelus. That Argadia, or rather *Jar-ghael, derived its name from the progeny of that fon and father. In fine, That the old name of *Alba*nia was changed into that of Scotta, as foon as the Scots were fettled in that ifland; and the Scots did ever fince that period retain their name and independence, while the Britons of the fouthern division changed their name and mafters frequently. This is in fubstance the genealogical account of their nation, which the ftates of Scotland tranfmitted by their agents to Pope Boniface the eighth, in the end of the thirteenth age.

ALMOST all the records and hiftorical monuments of the Scots hiftory have been deftroyed ^{*} Jar-ghael is that division of the Weftern Highlands which is partly comprehended within the county of Argvle. It plainfy fignifies the Weftern Caledonians, in contradifinction to the Picts or Caledonians who possfelled the East coast of Scotland-Jar, Weft-Gael or Gael, Celter.

Antiquities of Nations.

through the barbarous policy of Edward Ift, of England of the Norman race, and the intemperate zeal of the Reformers. A few detached pieces, which have efcaped those revolutions, fatal to the antiquities of the nation, have been preferved by the induftrious Father Innes *. They throw little light on the genuine antiquities of Scotland, and ferve only to reconcile us more to the deftruction of those annals of which they are thought to be a part. The principal thing in which they agree, is, that Fergus, the fon of Erc, was the first King of Scotland. One of thefe pieces, called the Chronicle, in rhime, fays, that the Scots came from Egypt into Spain, in the time of Moles; that of him fprung Milo King of Spain, whole fon Simon Bree fettled in Ireland.—That fome of the pofterity of this Simon transmigrated from Ireland into Ergadia, about 443 years before Chrift; and that the Scots lived there, in a most uncultivated state, till Fergus, the fon of Erc, brought thither the fatal marble chair from Ireland, and begun his glorious reign. Another of those pieces fays, that the Scots came into Ireland, from Scythia, in the fourth age of the world ; that they and the Picts had one common origin; and that those two nations were descended from the Albanians +.

THE Irifh, if we believe their antiquaries, are not inferior to either the Egyptians or Turdetonians, in the prefervation of the moft antient and minute events in their country, or in their claim to remote antiquity. The antient hiftoryof Ireland is indeed fo characteriftical of the romantic extravagance of dark ages, and at the fame time for connected with our fubject, that the pretended antiquities of that nation muft be indulged with a feparate difcuffion.

vagance

^{*} See his Appendix to his Critical Effay on the Scottifh Aptiquities.

⁺ Critical Effay, p. 774-

AFTER the furvey which we have already made, it muft be fairly acknowledged, that the very remote hiftory of all nations is totally diffigured with fable, and gives but little encouragement to diftant inquiry. At the fame time, it is to be regretted, how much of the early hiftory and antiquities of nations are loft, and how indiftinctly fociety is feen in its rudeft form. The tranfactions of mankind, in the firft ages of fociety, rife from the affections of the heart; of confequence, a knowlege of them would be highly interefting, and afford amufement, and even inftruction, in thefe polifhed times.

THOUGH no nation in Europe has excelled the Britifh in other branches of literature, yet we muft acknowlege their deficiency in writing of hiftory. Our antient hiftorians, from the unfavourable times in which they lived, were ignorant, and full of prejudice. The few men of abilities who wrote of late years, haftening to thofe great events which croud the latter part of our annals, have left our antient hiftory in the fame obfcurity in which they found it : looking with too much contempt on the origin of focieties, they have either without examination, adopted the traditional tales of their predeceffors,, or altogether exploded them, without any difquifition. A writer of the greateft merit, who has lately favoured the world with an interefting part of the Scots hiftory, has likewife fallen into this error. He, with great gravity, begins his work with the migration of the Scots from from Ireland : a fiction in itfelf improbable, however venerable on account of its antiquity.

Antiquities of Nations.

It were much to be wished, a writer of his abilities, both for elegance of diction and ftrength of judgment, had not been an absolute ftranger to the original language of his country; which would at least have prevented him from giving his authority to so idle a romance. The discuffion of this popular error, which I am to give in the sequel of these differtations, will justify these ftrictures on so eminent a historian as Dr. Robertson.

DISSER

DISSERTATION II.

General Obfervations on the first Migrations of Afiatic Colonies into Europe.--The Gauls the Progenitors of the ancient British.--Of the Caledonians.--The Etymon of their Name.

T was the opinion of the ancient poets and philofophers, that mankind and other animals fprung, like vegetables, out of the earth. Abfurd as a fiction of this kind may now appear, it was believed by writers, who, on other occafions, difplayed an uncommon ftrength of underftanding. Tacitus fuppofes that the first inhabitants of Britain * and Germany + were produced in this extraordinary way. The total ignorance of their own origin, which prevailed among them in the time of this celebrated hiftorian, made him draw a conclusion, which requires no other refutation than exposing it to public view.

Be this as it will, we learn, from the concurrent teftimony of facred and profane hiftory, that Afia was the first division of the world that was peopled : of courfe all the national migrations that have come to our knowledge move progreffively from East to West. The northern parts of Europe, which of old went under the general name of Scandinavia, appear to me to have been as foon at leaft poffeffed by an Afiatic colony, as an-, cient Gaul, Italy, or Spain. Man, in a ftate of nature, was not capable to transport himself even across the narrow firth of the Hellespont. But as hunting has always been found to be the amufement, as well as fupport of barbarous life, we may conclude that the first colonies of Scandinavia came gradually from the northern Afia in purfuit of their game. In the winter feafon, when the froft renders all the great rivers and fwamps of Ruffia and Poland paffable, those migrations might eafily have happened.

* Tacit. in vita Agric. c. 11. + De Mor. Germ. c. 1.

peopled :

19

NAVIGATION, though a very early invention, is long before it arrives at that degree of maturity which is neceffary to give confidence to mankind to crofs an arm of the fea. We may therefore conclude that Scandinavia was in fome meafure peopled before those countries which border upon the Mediterranean. It is from this confideration we must deduce the great difference we find between the Celtes of Gaul and the northern nations. Their manners and their language were in fome manner fimilar, and makes room for a conjecture that they were originally defcended from the fame flock, though perhaps feparate nations before they left Afia.

THE first race of Asiatics, in the progress of their migrations, were naturally separated by the Caspian Sea; some directing their course to Tar-tary, and others to Asia Minor. Of the Tartar race are defeended the Scandinavians, under which B 2 name name I comprehend the Danes, Swedes, weftern Ruffians, and Poles: the Celtes of Gaul, Italy, and Spain, were a colony from the leffer Afia. The Celtes extending themfelves to the North, and the Scandinavians moving towards the South, after, perhaps, a feries of ages, met on the confines of the modern Germany. The great diffance of time from their feparation in Afia, effected fuch a change in their manners, language and cuftoms, that their common origin was totally obliterated from their memory, and continual wars and animofities fubfifted between them. This naturally occafioned encroachments upon one another's territories, and that unavoidable mixture of people, which generally happens upon the frontiers of warlike nations, whole boundaries are often changed by the vicifitudes of war. From this circumftance proceed the mixed manners and language, and perhaps the very name of the Germans*.

20

THE Celtes of Gaul were, without doubt, the progenitors of the first inhabitants of Britain. The vicinity of the two countries, in a cafe of this kind, is a conclusive argument. At this distance it is impossible to form any conjecture concerning the time in which the first migration of the Gauls into Britain happened. It is equally impossible to find out by what national appellation they went at their first fettlement in this island. Whether the first inhabitants of the northern division of Britain were defeended of the Gaulifb colony of the South, or came from the North of Germany, will fall to be discuffed hereafter. I shail in this differtation confine myfelf to the Caledonians as we find them in Britain, when their wars with the Romans made them objects of attention to the writers of Rome.

^{*} Allemans, the ancient name of the Germans, obvioufly fignifies a composition of different nations.

THE Caledonians were the most powerful, and, to fpeak with Galgacus, the most noble of all the nations that were of old fettled in that division of Britain, which has fince obtained the name of Scotland. By the joint confent of all the writers who give us any account of them, the Caledonians were reckoned the Aborigines of that country. Lucan * is the first writer that mentions them, but he had but a very imperfect idea of what part of Britain they poffeffed. He places them in the neighbourhood of the Rutupian shore, near Sandwich, or fome other part of the coaft of Kent. Even Pliny and Florus, whofe intelligence concerning the feats of the Caledonians, ought to be more precife, than any poetical defcription given by Lucan, are far from being diftinct on that head. Tacitus is the first of the historians of Rome that has afligned its proper place to Caledonia.

FROM the united testimonies of Tacitus +. Dio and Solinus t, we find, that the ancient Caledonia comprehended all that country to the north of the firths of Forth and Clyde. The Maata I, whom fome have reckoned a branch of the Caledonians, poffeffed all that tract of land which t Solin. Polyph. c. 35. Meate is probably derived from two Galic words Moi, plain, and aitich, inhabitants ; or as an ingenious friend of mine observed, from mæan, middle, and aitich, inhabitants ; alluding to their fituation between the conquered Britons and the independant Caledonians.

^{*} Luc. Phar. l. iii. v. 67, 68. † Tacit. Vita Agric. c. 25.

intervened between Adrian's wall and the frontiers of Caledonia, properly fo called. It is not now my bufinefs to enter into what has come to our knowledge of the military hiftory of the Caledonians. The Roman writers who have given us an account of them are in the hands of every body. I fhall confine myfelf entirely to fome critical remarks on the etymon of their name, as this differtation is only intended to clear the ground for an hypothefis, which I flatter myfelf fhall be eftablifhed in the fequel of this work.

ANTIQUARIES are much divided about the etymology of Caledonia. Buchanan *, though a native of the Highlands, and of courfe converfant with the Galic language, is not happy in his conjectures on that fubject. Calden, according to him, fignifies a hazel tree. From thence proceeds the famous Caledonian foreft, and the name of Caledonia. It is amazing to obferve how a man of his learning, and great abilities, could give in to fuch a puerile conceit. But had Buchanan confidered properly his native tongue, he would have found that Caultin, and not Calden, fignifies a hazel tree; and that there is no fuch a word as Calden to be met with in the Galic language.

DR. LLOYD, bifhop of St. Afaph, derives Caledonia from Cilydion, a Britifh word, fignifying borderers. The Caledonians, fays that learned prelate, bordered on the Roman province in Britain, and therefore were with great propriety called borderers. The bifhop did not confider that the boundaries of the province were often changed. If we fuppofe the wall conftructed by Adrian, marked out the limits of the Roman empire in Britain, then the Brigantes, Ottadini and Mæatæ, had a much better title to the name of borderers than the Caledonians. If the wall built by Antoninus Pius is to be looked upon as the boundary of the province, then it naturally fhould follow, that the Caledonians did not acquire the name of Cilydion, or borderers, till after the conftruction of that wall. But the paffage mentioned from Lucan proves, that the name of Caledonians made fome noife in the world as early as the reign of Nero. Thus the bifhop's etymon of Caledonia falls to the ground.

marked

^{*} Buch. Hift. 1. 2.

CAMDEN, one of the beft antiquaries that the world ever produced, has endeavoured to give the etymon of Caledonia. Kaled, obferves that learned writer, is a Britifh word, which fignifies bard. In the plural number it makes Kaledion, and hence proceeds Caledonii, that is, a people, bardy, rougb, uncivilized, as northern nations generally are : a people fierce in their temper, from the extreme coldnefs of their climate; a people bold, forward, and intrepid, from the abundance of their blood.

THE feverity of this obfervation on the national character of the Caledonians does not at all favour the etymon produced by Camden. If the name of Kaledion was firft framed by the Britons of the fouth, it may be juftly queftioned, whether they themfelves, before the reign of Nero, were lefs hard, rougb, and uncivilized, than their neighbours of the north, or of courfe lefs intiled to that name. But as every thing that falls from fo juftly celebrated a writer, makes a great imprefion : I confefs this etymon had fuch weight with me, that I long confidered the word Kaled as the root of Caledonii, This led me further into the fubject; and I fubmit to the world, with great deference to the great merit of Camden, the additional obfervations I have made.

B 4.

28

K A L E D +, in both the antient Britifh and Galic languages, fignifies bard. In both thefe languages in, or yn, fignifies a country. From the monofyllable in comes the diminutive innis, which in the Welth and Galic is of the fame import with the Englifh word ifland. By joining Kaled and in together, we have Caledin, a rough and mountainous country; which is exactly the fignification of Alba *, the only name by which the Highlanders diffinguifh Scotland to this day.—This etymon of Caledonia is at leaft plaufible : but I muft confefs that the derivation given by Mr. Macpherfon, the tranflator of the poems of Offian, is more fimple and natural.

THE Highlanders, as he juftly obferves, call themfelves Cael. That division of Scotland which they possible they universally call Caeldoch, that is to fay, the country of the Cael or Celtes. The Romans, by a transposition of the letter l, in Cael, and changing the harsh cb of doch, into an har-

* That this is the proper fignification of Alba, shall be fhewn in the fequel of thefe differtations. If the etymon given here of Caledonia fhould appear a juft one, I fhall make no difficulty in fuppofing that the Calydonia of Greece is derived from the fame Celtic fource. Ætolia, of which the Gracian Calydonia was a part, was a very mountainous country. Three mountains in particular there, Taphiofus, Chalcis, and Corax, were, according to Strabo, immenfely high. The face of the country was very rugged, and the inhabitants hardy. Homer gives the characteritical epithet of recky to Calydon, the capital of that country. Hom. Iliad. xi. ver. 640.

monious

t See Bullet's Memoires fur la lang. Celt. under the word Kaled.

monious termination, formed the name of Caledonia. From this etymon arifes an obfervation, of which we shall make use in the sequel of these differtations.

DURING the invalions of the Romans, we find many other tribes, befides the Caledonians and Mæatæ, in the north of Britain; though probably they were no more than fubdivifions of those two illuftrious nations. Every one of those tribes were governed by an independent chief, or petty King. In Cæsar's time there were no lefs than four fuch chieftains in Kent, and each of them vested with regal authority. The political government of Caledonia was, in Domitian's reign, much the fame with that of Kent during Cæsar's proconfulfhip.

WHEN the tribes of North Britain were attacked by the Romans, they entered into affociations, that by uniting their firength, they might be the more able to repel the common enemy. The particular name of that tribe, which either its fuperior power or military reputation placed at the head of the affociation, was the general name given by the Romans to all the confederates.

HENCE it is, that the Mæatæ and Caledonians have ingroffed all the glory which belonged in common, though in an inferior degree, to all the other nations fettled of old in North Britain. It was for the fame reafon that the name of Mæatæ, was entirely forgotten by foreign writers after the third century, and that of the Caledonians themfelves but feldom mentioned after the fourth.

THE Mæatæ, we have already obferved, were one of those tribes who were fettled to the fouth of the Clyd and the Forth. Ptolemy places the Gadeni, Salgovæ, Novantes, and Damnii, in the fame division division of the country *. To the north of the Firths the fame writer affigns their respective places to the Caledonii, Epidii, Carini, Cantæ, Logæ, and feveral other small tribes. Without infifting upon the probability that Ptolemy, an Egyptian, was not fo minutely acquainted with the internal state of Britain as he pretends, at a time when the north of Europe was fo little known to men of letters, we shall take it for granted, that all those nations he mentions were of the fame original thock; and to avoid confusion, I shall, for the future, comprehend them all under the general name of Caledonians.

TACITUS divides the inhabitants of Britain into three claffes; the Caledonians, Silures, and thole who inhabited the coaft next to Gaul. He endeavours to trace thole three nations to others on the continent, from whom he fuppoled they had derived their origin. The Caledonians he concludes, from the fize of their bodies, and the colour of their hair, were of a Germanic extraction. 'Though it muft be confelfed that this conclufion is far from being decifive, from thole two circumftances; yet there are many collateral arguments which corroborate the opinion of that great hiftorian. Thefe, in fome future differtation, I may throw together, and leave the whole to the judgment of the public.

 This the author has done, in a differtation, intitled, A parallel between the Caledonians and Ancient Germans, which is printed in this work.

* Ptolem. lib iii. c. 10.

DISSER-

[27]

DISSERTATION III.

Of the Picts.--- That they were the Pofterity of the Caledonians.

I R G I L's obfervation, that Italy often changed its name, is equally applicable to the reft of the kingdoms of Europe. That migrating difpofition which poffeffed mankind in their barbarous ftate, occafioned, of old, fuch revolutions and intermixture of nations, that no appellation of any country was permanent.

BRITAINS, Caledonians, Mæatæ, Barbarians, and unconquered nations, are the names conftantly given to the old inhabitants of North Britain, by Tacitus, Herodian, Dio, Spartian, Vopifcus, and other antient writers. The fucceffors of thefe Britains, Caledonians, Mæats, and Barbarians, are called Picts, Scots, and Attacots, by fome Roman writers of the fourth century. The caufe of this change of names is, at this diffance of time, little underftood. Some Englifh antiquaries affirm, that the old Calédonians were gradually exhaufted in their wars with the Romans : that fome foreign colonies occupied their almoft depopulated country : and that thefe foreigners either affumed or received the name of Picts. If curiofity fhould lead us to inquire from what quarter of the world thefe foreigners. reigners came; Bifhop Stillingfleet has already affirmed, that the Cherfonefus Cimbrica, a part of the modern Denmark, was their original country. He has alfo told us, that they fettled first in Caledonia about the middle, or rather near the end of the third century.

THE queftion now is, whether this fyftem is well founded, or whether we have better reafon to believe that the Picts were the real offspring of the old Caledonians?

BEFORE this queftion can be fairly refolved, it will be proper to review the hiftory of North Britain, from the death of Severus to the reign of Conftantius. Several eminent antiquaries fay, that it was under the reign of this emperor the Picts, Scots, and Attacots, began to make any confiderable figure in this ifland.

Soon after the death of Severus, Antoninus Caracalla, his fon, entered into a negotiation with the Barbarians of Britain, and gave them peace upon receiving hoftages. This, in fubftance, is the account given by Herodian, of the manner in which Antoninus put a period to the Caledonian war. He has not explained the conditions of the peace. But as he fays, that Severus, opprefied with age, cares, and an inveterate diftemper, had not been able to finifh the war, and that his fon, on whom the command of the army employed in North Britain had devolved, was little folicitous about the further profecution or fuccefs of that war, it may be taken for granted, that the Caledonians were far from being exhaufted when the peace was ratified.

IF we chufe to follow Dio's account of this war, we can hardly believe that the Caledonians fuftained any confiderable loffes either before or after the death death of Severus. If it be true that Severus deprived the Caledonians or their allies of their arms, and fome portion of their territories, it is no lefs fo, that the Caledonians and Mæats took up arms with one accord, upon receiving the news of the emperor's indifpofition.

AFTER his death, Caracalla and Geta, his two fons, agreed in giving them peace upon very honourable and advantageous terms. This peace was ignominious to the empire in every article, excepting that relating to the hoftages. For the two brothers refigned to the Barbarians all the advantages for which Severus and his predeceffors had been fo eagerly contending.

THE affairs of North Britain were totally neglected for a long time after Antoninus and Geta had quitted this illand. The empire was torn in pieces by tyrants; and those who affumed the purple wanted leifure, inclination, or spirit, to make any new attempts on Caledonia. The ablest men among them, Aurelian, Probus, and Diocletian, were too much employed elsewhere to execute such a defign.

It is true, Caraufus ufurped the fovereignty of South Britain in that period: but it may be doubted whether he repaired the old Roman wall which flood between Clyde and the Forth; whether he fortified that wall with feven caftles; whether he built that ancient edifice vulgarly called Arthur's oven, on the bank of the river Carron; or whether he erected a triumphal arch in the neighbourhood of that river, to perpetuate the memory of a fignal victory which he had obtained over the Barbarians of North Britain. All thefe notable actions, together with the etymon given of Carron \dagger , 30

Carron +, reft entirely on the authority of the fabulous Nennius; or upon the credit of his equally fabulous interpolator.

AFTER Caraufius and Allectus, his fucceffor in the ufurpation, were flain, Conftantius Chlorus, on whom Britain, together with the other Weftern provinces of the empire, had devolved, upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, came into this ifland. This Emperor formed a refolution of fubduing the Caledonians, though he had other affairs of much greater importance to mind; but he died at York before he had time to carry his defign into execution.

CONSTANTINE, who commonly goes under the name of Great, fucceeded his father Conftantius in the imperial dignity, and affumed the purple in Britain. But being, as it is natural to fuppole, impatient to take poffeffion of the capital, it is certain that he loft no time to acquire either new territories or laurels in Caledonia. The idle panegyrics of Ecclefiaftics are the only authorities we have for fuppofing that he did either the one or the other in the beginning of his reign; nor did he ever, after putting a period to the civil war, return into Britain.

THE province of Britain fell, upon the death of Chlorus, to his fon Conftantine; and it is certain that the Caledonians were neither exhaufted nor even molefted by Roman legions under his fhort reign. His ambition infpired him with very different views. He made war on his brother Conftans, at no great diftance from the feat of the Roman empire, and was flain by his generals in battle near Aquileia *. This event fubjected Britain to Conftans; and it is allowed that he, accompanied by his brother Conftantius, came in perfon to vifit his new territories. But it does not appear that either of the brothers did penetrate as far as Caledonia. Two declamatory writers of that age, who fpeak of this expedition in a very high tone †, feem to refolve the glory of it into the victory obtained by Conftans and Conftantius over the Britifh ocean, during the winter feafon : a feat which, according to the opinion of one of thefe authors, was never performed before, nor ever to be performed afterwards.

† To fuppofe that Carron comes from Caraufius is a very puerile conceit, though probably the only foundation of the curious anecdotes related by Nennins. The name of that river is a Galie one; which fignifies a veinding river. Accordingly we find feveral Carrons in North Britain; and one of them in the Weltern diffrict of Rolisshire, where Caraufius confeffedly never was.

CONSTANS was murdered in Spain, after a reign of feventeen years, by the party of Magnentius, who affumed the purple in Gaul, and drew over Britain to his fide. It is not probable that ever this ufurper had any difputes with the Caledonians. Conftantius made war upon him without any intermifilon, during the whole courfe of his fhort reign, and brought him at laft, after the lofs of feveral battles, to the necefity of laying violent hands upon himfelf. Upon the death of Magnentius, Britain, together with all the other rebellious provinces of the empire, fubmitted to Conftantius.

FROM this review of the hiftory of Rome, in fo far as it is connected with that of North Britain, from the death of Severus to Conftantius, feveral queftions will naturally refult. In what Emperor's reign were the Caledonians fo exhaufted or degenerated to fuch a degree as to yield up their country, their freedom, and their reputation, to a colony, or even an army of Scandinavian rovers? In what period of time happened those devaftations by which they were exhaufted? Were they either annihilated or reduced to a ftate of incurable debility by Severus, or by his fons Caracalla and Geta? Did Macrinus, Heliogabalus, Alexander, or Maximinus, did any of the fucceeding Emperors or thirty tyrants overcome them?

^{*} Eutrop. l. x.

⁺ Livan. in Bas. Julius Firm. de error. profan. &c.

The Picts-the Posterity

As therefore there is no ground for fuppoling that the Caledonians were annihilated or even much weakened by the legions, generals and Emperors of Rome, it is far from being credible that an army fufficient to overcome or extirpate them, could be transported from the Cimbrica Cherfonefus, in the third century. Every body knows what little progrefs navigation had made at that time in the North of Europe. A few long boats, which were the only craft the Scandinavians could be fuppoled to have, were very inadequate for the purpole of carrying armies acrofs the German ocean.

THE improbability of a great migration of this kind, at that period, is ftrengthened by the filence of antient writers of credit on that head. It is therefore too precipitate in any modern antiquary, to give his authority to a fiction, fo contrary to all the ideas we can form of the flate of the North of Europe, in those times. The opinion of Camden, the most learned as well as most candid of the antiquaries of England, is decilive on this fubject. After mature confideration of this new fystem of Humphrey Lhud, he was far from believing that the the Picts were an upftart nation, or a colony of foreigners first fettled in Britain in the course of the third century. Cambden's opinion was, that the Caledonians, fo far from being extirpated by the Romans, or any other enemy, had multiplied to fuch a degree, that their own country became too narrow for them : and it is to this cause he attributes, chiefly, the frequent incursions they made into the Roman province *.

* Cambden's Brit.

DISSER-

DISSERTATION IV.

Of the Pictish Monarchy.

THE countries, of which the greateft monarchies in Europe are now compoled, were antiently divided into feveral fmall dynafties and petty republics. Men, whole fuperior ftrength of body or mind raifed them, on fignal occalions, to the head of the community, were first dignified with the pompous title of royalty. Their authority and power were originally, however, confined within limits extremely circumfcribed. Abfolute government is never eftablished in the first ftages of fociety. It is after a feries of ages that the paffions of the human mind are fufficiently mellowed down to fubmit calmly to the dictates of defpotifm, and to wait with patience the tedious operations of an extensive government.

MANKIND, in their uncultivated flate, though averfe to that tyranny which fometimes attends monarchy, were incapable of any other form of government. A republican fyftem is too philofophical for the favage to comprehend it properly. I might have faid, though the obfervation is far from being favourable to the dignity of human nature, that it is too noble for even civilized communities long to preferve it among them. I fhall not

Of the Pittish Monarchy.

not therefore hefitate to pronounce, that monarchy is the moft natural government for mankind.— We accordingly learn, from the moft antient accounts we have of every nation, in their earlieft ftate, that monarchy was univerfally eftablished among them.

WE find, from Homer, that antient Greece was divided into an immenfe number of petty dynafties. The fame kind of government prevailed of old, in Gaul, Italy, Spain, and Germany. Britain, at the time of Cælar's invafion, was governed by a number of little independent Princes, and from the accounts given of Caledonia by Tacitus, Dio, and Ptolemy, we may conclude with certainty, that it was composed of many finall ftates, unconnected with one another, and without any one bond of union, excepting that which arofe from their common danger.

GALGACUS and Argetecoxus are the only Caledonian Princes expressly mentioned in history. The first was no more than the Generalistimo of a powerful confederacy, though superior in birth and renown to the other Caledonian Princes who fought against Agricola. The fecond was little more than a petty King or Chieftain *; for the spirited reply made by his wife to the Empress Julia feems to be the only thing that has preferved his memory from oblivion.

To afcertain that all the inhabitants or territories of Caledonia were governed by one monarch, in any one period of time before the beginning of the ninth century, is extremely difficult, if not abfolutely impofible. And if it were true that the Picts were a great people before the Scots were fettled in Britain, it is far from being certain that thofe Picts were governed by general monarchs in any early period.

^{*} Xiphil. in Severo.

ADAMNAN, abbot of Iona, is the first that mentions any Pictish King, and the oldest author after him is Bede. We are told by these two writers, that St. Columba converted Brudius, King of the Picts, to the Christian faith; and we learn further from Bede, that Brudius was a most powerful prince, and that Columba came into Britain in the year of the vulgar æra five hundred and fixty-five. If there were any Pictish Kings before that period, Pictish Kings posses of extensive dominions, or monarchs of Caledonia, we have no genuine record to afcertain their very names.

But the lofs arifing from the filence of antient writers is perhaps more than fully compenfated by the accounts given of the Pictifh Kings, and the antiquity of the Pictifh monarchy, by the Sennachies or hiftorians of Ireland. We are told by them, that the Pictifh monarchy began at the fame time with that of their own country, that is to fay, thirteen, or at leaft eleven whole centuries before the birth of Chrift *. They affure us further, that the Picts had a fucceflion of feventy Kings, from Calbluan, who was cotemporary with Heremon the firft Irifh monarch, to Conftantine, who reigned about the end of the eighth century.

THOUGH the Scots hiftorians took care not to do too much honour to the Pictifh nation, yet it feems they found themfelves under a neceflity of granting that the Picts were fettled early in Britain;

^{*} Keat. Gen Hift. of Ireland, p. 120, &c. Flaherty Ogyg. p. 190.

Of the Piclish Monarchy.

tain ; and that they had a fucceflion of fifty-eight, or at leaft fifty-two Kings *.

THE Pictith nation was totally fubdued by the Scots in the ninth century, and their name has been fwallowed up by that of the conquerors with whom they were incorporated. Did any confiderable body of that people exift now, it is more than probable that fome of them would lay claim to the honour of remote antiquity, and boaft of a very long feries of monarchs, like the Scots, Irifh, and every other European nation. But though the Picts have been extinct for many ages back, they have found in Father Innes, the author of the Critical Effay, not only a moft zealous friend, but as able an advocate to plead their caufe, as perhaps any one their nation could have produced.

IT is well known that Innes has been at great pains, though born a Scothnan, to annihilate no lefs than forty Scottifh Kings. He was fenfible that many of the abettors of the high antiquities of Scotland would be difpleafed with the wanton attempt he made to rob them of their antient monarchs, to whom they had, at leaft, an old preferiptive right. But he found out a method of making ample amends for this injury : inflead of forty or thirty-nine ideal monarchs, and thefe no more than petty Kings, had they actually exifted, he has given his country an indifputable right to forty powerful fovereigns of the truly antient Pictifh line; and he has been at no little trouble to demonstrate, that the Scots of modern times are as much interefted in thefe Pictifh monarchs, as they could be in the antient Kings of their own nation, who are placed between the first and fecond Fergus.

^{*} See Innes's Crit. Eff. p. 108.

INNES could not poffibly believe that the antiquaries of Scotland were to blind as to be caught in a fnare to very vifible, or idle enough to be put off with a compliment to vain and illutory. That writer could not have imagined, without a manifeft felf-contradiction, that the very names of to many crowned heads, from Catbluan, the founder of the Pictifh monarchy, to Dreft, in whofe time the gofpel was preached by St. Ninian to the Picts, could have been preferved without the knowledge of letters, preferved in the rhimes of bards, and the traditionary ftories of fennachies.

HE could not have ferioufly entertained fuch an opinion, and at the fame time fee very good reafons for deftroying fo many Scottish and Irish Kings promiscuoully, and without any mercy, whole existence depended on a fimilar authority.

But why were the Scottifh Kings deftroyed, and the Pictifh monarchs fpared ? Why, becaufe the annalifts, hiftorians, fennachies and antiquaries of Ireland are univerfally agreed that the Pictifh monarchy is coeval with their own; and Irifh writers cannot be fulpected of difhonefty or ignorance in a matter of this kind. "They had no private motives of their own, to invent this flory of the antiquity of the Pictifh fettlement and monarchy, They would not, without a necefity, put a foreign people upon a level with their own, in the two advantages upon which they chiefly valued themfelves: and hence it follows, that the Irifh writers muft have had good information in this affair *."

* Inn. Crit. Eff. p. 140.

Of the Pittifb Monarchy.

It is amazing how Innes could have prevailed with himfelf to follow Irifh guides through the impenetrable darkness of the Pictifh antiquities. He himfelf has been at extraordinary pains to prove that these guides are, of all others, the blindeft and most faithless : if so, how can they who adopt their doctrine hinder themselves from fuspecting both their honesty and intelligence? There is no small difficulty in explaining the motives by which the inventors of historical fable, in the several ages and countries of the world, are led to frame and publish their fictions.

But the writers of Ireland had it feems a private view, though a formewhat remarkable one, for carrying up the antiquity of the Pictifh monarchy to fo great a height. Keating affirms, that it was from Ireland the Picts got their wives when they went to fettle in Britain *. Other Hibernian hiftorians inform us, that Cathluan was married to one of thole wives; that the firft monarch of the Pictifh line, and all his Pictifh fubjects, fwore, in the moft folemn manner, to devolve the government of the country they were to fubdue upon the iffue of thole Hibernian women, and to continue it with them for ever. Why an oath became neceffary in a cafe where the Picts muft, in the nature of things, leave their territories to their progeny by the Irifh ladies, as they had no other women, I thall leave to the Milefian fennachies to determine.

INNES endeavours to perfuade us, that tradition, without the help of letters, might have preferved the names of the feventy Pictifh Kings. Why then could not tradition preferve at leaft the names of the Kings who governed the weftern parts of Caledonia before Fergus the fecond? And what could hinder the Irifh from preferving, by means of the fame oral chronicle, the names of all the monarchs or provincial Kings who reigned in their island before the time of Leogaire and St. Patric ? All these depend upon the fame degree of authority, and must stand or fall together.

names

^{*} Gen. Hift. of Irel. p. 62.

IT is to be observed, that the account given by the Irifh fennachies and annalists of the Pictifh nation and Pictifh Kings, differs effentially from that taken by Innes from his Pictifh Chronicle, and the Register of the Priory of St. Andrews . According to the Pfalter Cafbel, quoted by Keating 1, and according to the books of Lecan, quoted by O Flaherty II, Cathluan the fon of Gud must be placed at the head of the Pictifh royal line. But according to the catalogue published by Innes, Cruithne the fon of Cinge was the founder of the Pictifh monarchy. The Pfalter Cashel and the book of Lecan are the two most valuable monuments of literary antiquity of which the Irifh nation can boaft; and if any ftress can be laid on the authority of these, Gud the father of Cathluan, and generalifimo of the Picts, after killing his mafter Policornus, came all the way from Thrace into Ireland, where he and his people were very kindly received by Criomthan King of Leinster, and by Heremon monarch of the whole island. But Innes contends, that the Picts were of a British, and confequently of a Gaulish extraction : nor was he credulous enough to admit on the authority of ^{} Keat. Gen. Hift. of Irel. p 60, 61, 62.

[‡] Crit. Effay, p. 134, &c. 798. || Flaherty Ogygia Dom. p. 190.

Irifh records, that Gud or Cathluan, Cinge or Cruithne, had been regicides, or come from Thrace.

OF the Pictifh monarchs, whole names are enumerated in the catalogues exhibited by Innes, we have no lefs than five, every one of whom wore the crown of Caledonia longer by twenty years than the famous Arganthonius reigned over Tarteffus. Each of thefe Pictifh monarchs held the fcepter a whole century; and one of them had the honour of equalling a very celebrated Irifh * King in prowefs. He tought one hundred battles, or rather put a happy period to a hundred wars. His name was Druft. He reigned in the beginning of the fifth age, and in his time the gofpel was first preached to the Picts by St. Ninian. The Kings who filled the throne of Caledonia before this Druft, had, for the most part, the good fortune to have reigned longer, by very great odds, than any other race of princes that ever existed fince the days of the fabulous Egyptian monarchy.

THE oldeft domeftic record that can pretend to throw any light on the hiftory of Caledonia, is a fmall treatile published by Innes, in the Appendix to his Critical Eflay t. This treatife must have been written about two hundred years before Fordun's Scotichronicon. The author had his materials from Andrew bishop of Caithnes, who was cotemporary with King David the faint, and was a prelate of a very great reputation for fanctity, and historical knowledge. The treatife fays, upon the bishop's authority, that the Picts reigned over all Albany, throughout a feries of one thoufand three hundred and fixty years, or at leaft one thoufand and feventy. But the learned prelate told the author of this treatife, that Albany was of old divided into feven kingdoms, each of which had a fovereign of its own; and that every one of thele fovereigns had a petty King under him. The moft antient of those fovereigns was called Ennegus, if the bifhop deferves any credit.

^{*} The famous Con Ceud-chathach of the Irifh fennachies, ‡ The title of this little treatife is. De fitu Albaniæ, &c. &c. See the Appendix to the Crit. Effay, Numb. I.

IN thort, the hiftory of those Pictish monarchs who reigned over Caledonia before St. Ninian's time, is no lefs dubious than that of those forty Scottish Kings whom Innes has been at fo much pains to eraze from the lift of Scots Kings. We may therefore venture to affirm, that it is impoffible to prove, from any probable hiftory, that the Picts were governed by any general Kings before the time of Fergus the fon of Erc, fuppoling that time to be the true æra of the commencement of the Scottish monarchy. If the Scots of modern times will, at all events, have fpurious or nominal Kings in the lift of their monarchs, Fergus the fon of Ferchard, and his thirty-nine immediate fucceffors, will answer their purpose much better than Cbruidne and his ideal defcendants.

THE generality of the Scots hiftorians place the beginning of the Scottifh monarchy in the age of Alexander the Great. Every impartial judge will allow, that Innes has totally deftroyed that part of their fyftem *. But had Innes been confiftent with himfelf, or had he purfued those principles from which he argued fo fuccefsfully againft the antiquity of the Scottifh monarchy, it feems plain, that he would have likewife demolifhed that of the Pictifh nation. The authority of the Pfalter Cathel, the book of conquefts, the book with the fnowy cover, and other Irifh chronicles, either imaginary or invifible, would have gone for nothing with him : and had those Pictifh chronicles mentioned by Andrew bifhop of Caithnefs been extant in his time, we have great reason to believe that he would have found himfelf under the neceffity of admitting that they contained little more than ill-digefted legends.

^{*} See the Crit. Effay, p. 102, 103, 104.

Of the Pittifb Monarchy.

BRUDIUS, a prince cotemporary with St. Columba, is the first Pictish King expressly mentioned by any writer of credit. It is impoffible to ascertain what figure his ancestors made in Caledonia, and who were his predeceffors in the throne of Pictavia. We know little concerning those Pictifh Kings who fucceeded Brudius. Bede informs us, that during the reign of one of them, the Picts killed Egfred King of Northumberland in battle, and deftroyed the greateft part of his army. The venerable hiftorian paffes over in filence the name of the Pictifh monarch in whofe time this great event happened. The continuator of Nennius calls him Brudius, and adds further, that he commanded the Picts in that glorious and decifive battle. Bede speaks of another Pictish King, for whom he had a particular regard, though for a very indifferent reason. The name of that favorite monarch was Naitan. It was to him that Ceolfrid, abbot of Wiremouth, wrote his famous letter concerning Eafter and the Tonfure; a letter in which Bede himfelf had very probably a principal hand. Roger Hoveden and Si-meon of Durham mention two other Pictifh Kings, under the disfigured names of Onnust and Kinoth * .

Of the Pistifh Monarchy.

Kinotb * : and the fum total of their hiftory, as far as it has been recorded by thefe writers, is, that Onnust died in the year 761, and that Kinoth gave a kind reception to Alfred of Northumberland, who had been expelled his Kingdom about the year 774. The accounts given by the Scots historians of several other Pictish Kings cannot much be depended on. Some of them were mifinformed or led aftray by inveterate prejudices, or too ready to believe legendary tales; while others, poffeffed indeed of a great fhare of learning, chofe to embellifh their hiftories with fictions of their own, or to make room for the fables which had been invented by their predeceffors. The ftories told by the British historians, Geoffrey of Mon-mouth, and the author of the Eulogium, concerning Roderic a Pictifh King, concerning Fulgenius, another prince of the fame nation, and concerning the three Pictifh colonies eftablished in North Britain, deferve not the least attention. The curious in ill-contrived legends of this kind may be amply fatisfied on that head, in archbishop Ufher's antiquities t.

‡ Chap. xv. p. 300, &c.

44

DISSER-

^{*} Their true names feem to be Hungus, Angus or Innis, and Cineach or Kenneth.

DISSERTATION. V.

Of the Pictifh Language.

W E are told by Bede, that the inhabitants of Britain in his time, both fludied and preached the golpel in the lauguages of five different nations, agreeably to the number of thole books in which the law of God was written. These languages were the Saxon, British, Scottish, Pictish, and Roman *.

FROM this paffage of that venerable author, fome have concluded, and with fome appearance of juffice, that the languages of the Britons, Scots and Picts, were effentially different. Bede lived in the neighbourhood of the Pictifh nation. The monaftery of Girwy, to which he belonged †; flood near the mouth of the Tine. He could not have been a ftranger to the Britifh tongue, however much the Britons and Angles difagreed. He was perfonally well acquainted with many of the Irifh Scots, and had a friendly partiality for their country. Befides, he has given us fome fpecimens of his ikill in the Britifh, Scottifh, and Pictifh languages;

^{*} Bed. Hift. Ecclef. lib. 1. cap. 1.

[†] Now Jarrow.

languages; fo that his authority fhould, according to the judgment of fome very learned writers, weigh down all the arguments that have been brought to prove that the British tongue was the fame with the Pictish *, or that the Scotch and Pictish languages were effentially the fame †.

CAMBDEN feems to have had a profound veneration for Bede, and accordingly calls him "the "ornament of the old Englifh nation." But he took the liberty to differ from him in the affair now under confideration, and was at no finall trouble to prove, that the Britifh and Pictifh were the fame identical language.

It appears from that paffage in Bede, on which fo much ftrefs is laid, in the prefent queftion, and likewife from another part of his hiftory, that the good man had great fatisfaction in finding that the number of languages fpoken in this ifland corresponded exactly with the number of books in which the Mofaical law was written. Whether a pious inclination to juftify this very edifying parallel may not have in fome degree influenced him to believe too haftily that the Britifh, Pictifh, and Scottifh languages were fpecifically different, we fhall leave undetermined.

THE fpecimens which Bede has given of his fkill in the Scottifh or Galic tongue will do him very little honour. His explanation of the local name Alcluith or Dumbarton, and his etymon of Dalreudini, argue too ftrongly that his knowledge of that language was extremely circumfcribed t.

ledge

^{*} Cambden.

[†] Buchanan.

It is unneceffary to difpute with vehemence this pious writer's account of the languages which in his time prevailed in Britain. If an author of modern times fhould affert, that the gofpel is now preached in Britain in five different languages, in the Welfh, in Galic, in French, in the Englifh of Middlefex, and in the Scotch of Buchan, it may be prefumed that no reafonable objections could be raifed againft the propriety of fuch an affertion; however true it may be that the two languages laft mentioned are in fubftance the fame, and underflood more than tolerably well by the Englifh and Scots reciprocally.

It is univerfally known that the Irifh language, and the Galic of Scotland were originally the fame. But the pronunciation is fo different, that a public declamation in the Irifh of Connaught would be as little underftood by a Highland audience, as a difcourfe in the Doric of Syracufe would be by the Ionians of the leffer Afia,

IF we allow that the language of the Picts and Scots, of antient times, were as different from one another as the Doric and Ionic dialects of the Greek, we will do all reafonable juftice to Bede, and fave the credit of his teftimony. To grant more, would be too much indulgence, as fhall appear in the courfe of this differtation.

Alcluith, according to him, fignifies the rock above Clyde, and Dalreudimi the portion of Reuda. But in the Galic neither Alcluith fignifies a rock, nor Dalreudini a part or portion, though the learned author of the Archæologia Britannica fays otherwife, upon the faith of Bede's authority.

Īτ

It is evident, that the names of moft of the places in the Eaftern division of Scotland, which was of old the country of the Picts, have manifeftly a Galic origin. This is fo well known that examples are altogether needlefs. Almost every village, river, hill and dale there, will furnish a decisive proof on this head *.

IF any one fhould beg the queftion, he may contend, that all these Galic names were framed by the Scots, after the extinction of the Pictish monarchy. And indeed the authority of Boece and Buchanan favour this opinion. These historians maintain that Kenneth, the son of Alpin, who subverted the monarchy of Pictavia, divided that district, which went once under the name of Horeftia, between two brothers Æneas and Mernus. From the first, fay they, the district which now is called Angus, derived its name; and the county of Mearns was so called from the latter.

BUT an author + much older than them, and even prior to Fordun himfelf, informs us, that Ennegus, the Æneia of Boece, and the Angus of our time, received its name from Ennegus, the first Pictish King : and were it true that the names of villages, rivers, and mountains, in the Eastern

* See Dairymple's Collect. p. 122.

^{*} We learn from a very old regifter of the priory of St. Andrews *, that Kilrymont, which was the ancient name of St. Andrews, was in the days of Hungus, the laft Piclifh King of that name, called Mukrofi, and the town now called Queensferry, Ardchinnechain. But thefe two Piclifh words are undoubtedly Galic; the firlt of them fignifying, in that tongue, the wood, heath, or promontory of Swine; and the fecond, the penifula of little Kenneth.

[†] Andrew, bifhop of Caithnefs.

Of the Pictifb Language.

parts of Scotland were altered by Kenneth Macalpin, and his fucceffors, we beg leave to afk, How it came to pafs that the names of many Pictifh Kings were exactly the fame with others that were common among the ancient Scots, and continue to be fo among the Highlanders to this day? Were thefe names too created after the extinction of the Pictifh monarchy? Or did the conquerors give unheard of appellations to the Kings of the conquered nation, as well as new denominations to the feveral parts of their land?

ANY one who chufes to inveftigate this matter, may confult the two catalogues of the Pictifh Kings, publifhed by Innes; and upon comparing their names with the true Galic names of the Scottifh monarchs, as exhibited by the fame author, he fhall immediately difcover a perfect identity in feveral inftances *.

IT is impoffible to prove, from any faithful record, that Kenneth M'Alpin introduced a new language among his new fubjects, after he had united the Pictifh kingdom with that of the Scots. He was too wife a Prince to exterminate the brave and numerous people whom he had conquered, though fome Scottifh historians have been injudi-

* Cincodo or Kenneth, Oengus Ennegus, Angus or Hungus, E'pin or Alpin, Ujfen Engen, Ewen or Eugenius, Urghais or Fergus, Canaul or Conal, Caftantine or Conflantine, Dombnail or Dovenald. All thefe names were the proper appellations of PiGlih Kings: and the very fame names are found in the catalogues of the Scottilh monarchs, every one of them excepting Hungus, which is unquefionably a Galic one, and very common among the Scots Highlanders, of thefe and former times. It is proper to obferve, that all the PiGlih names now mentioned belong wholly to thofe PiGlih Kings who reigned after Drudius, St. Columba's convert.

cious

-49

cious enough to believe fo improbable a fiction. Kenneth was too ambitious to confine his views to North Britain. He endeavoured to extend his empire farther; and for that purpole invaded England fix different times *. For a Prince of fuch a difpolition, it would have been extremely impolitic to extirpate a nation he had fubdued, or to extinguish their language, had it differed from that of his own nation.

WITHOUT endeavouring to produce examples from remote ages, we may conclude, from the prefent flate of the European tongues, that the inhabitants of mountainous countries are remarkably tenacious of the language of their anceftors. The Spaniards near the bay of Bifcay, the French of Bretagne, the old Britons of North Wales, the wild Irifh of Connaught, and many Highlanders near the heart of Scotland, ftill retain the languages of their remoteft anceftors. Neither ridicule, contempt, or the power of fashion, which fubdues every thing, have been able to extinguish those languages. From this obftinacy of all nations in retaining their respective tongues we may reasonably suppose, that if the Pictish language had differed much from the Galic, it would, like the Bifcayan, Armorican, and old Scottish, have still preferved its being in some corner or other of those countries which belonged to the Pictish nation.

HENRY, archdeacon of Huntingdon, expresses his aftonishment to find that the Pictish tongue was in his time totally extinguished, infomuch that the accounts given of it by writers of former ages had the appearance of downright fiction.

^{*} See Innes, Crit. Effay, p. 782.

Of the Pictifs Language.

tion. Henry wrote his hiftory within lefs than four hundred years after the Piclifh nation was incorporated with the Scots. It is therefore matter of great furprize, that no veftige of the Piclifh tongue remained in his time, if it differed at all from the Galic of the Scots. The arguments which may be drawn from the archdeacon's teftimony is not more unfavourable to Buchanan's hypothefis than it is to that of the learned Cambden.

JOHN, prior of Hogulfted, another English his-torian, who had better opportunities of knowing the flate of North Britain than the archdeacon of Huntingdon, relates * that the Picts made a very confiderable figure in the army of David the Saint, during his difputes with Stephen, King of Eng-land. The battle of Clitherbow, in which David obtained the victory, was fought, according to the prior +, by the Englifh on one fide, and by the Scots affifted by the Picts on the other. Before the battle of the ftandard was fought, the Picts infifted with great vehemence on their hereditary right of leading the van of the Scots army, and were gratified in their request by the King t. It cannot be imagined that these Picts who held the poft of honour in the Scottish armies had been perfecuted out of the use of their native language, nor can we suppose that they themselves held it in fuch contempt, as to abandon it voluntarily. BUT fhould it be granted without any necef-

But fhould it be granted without any neceffity, that the Southern Picts had entirely forgot

^{*} Hen. Hunt. Hift. lib. 1.

[†] Joan prior Hogulf. ad annum, 1138.

[‡] Rich. prior Hogulitad : ad annum, 1136.

Of the Pittish Language.

or loft the language of their anceftors, through the intercourfe they had for fome ages with the Walenfes of Cumberland, the Saxons of Bernicia, and the Scots of Jarghael, it may be prefumed that the Picts of the North, the Picts of Murray particularly, would have preferved their native language long after the time of Henry of Huntingdon. The Picts of Murray, the Moravienfes of our old hiftorians, had frequent difputes with the pofterity of Malcolm Canemore, in vindication of the rights and privileges enjoyed by their, Pictifh anceftors; and it may be taken for granted, that they would have likewife fought with great fpirit for their language, if invaded or perfecuted : nor was it an ealy matter to root that language from among them, though totally reduced to obedience in the thirteenth century, as the interior part of their country was full of mountains and inacceflible faftneffes.

It is certain that the Picts were in a refpectable condition after the Duke of Normandy's acceffion to the throne of England. The great charter granted by that conqueror to his English subjects affords an unquestionable proof of this fact. It is not therefore credible that either the Pictish nation or Pictish tongue could have been entirely extinguished in the time of the archdeacon of Huntingdon

INNES, as well as Cambden, is of opinion that the Picts fpoke the Britifh language. Thefe two eminent antiquaries agreed in believing that the Picts or Caledonians had originally migrated from South Britain, and that the Scots were of Irifh extraction. To eftablifh those fystems, it became neceffary for them to prove that the Britifh was the

Of the Piclish Language.

the language of Scotland, and effentially different from the Gallic. But the arguments which they produce are far from being conclusive.

CAMBDEN observes, and after him Innes, that Aber, a word denoting the mouth of a river, or. the confluence of two rivers, was frequently pre-fixed to local names, in those parts of Britain which the Picts poffeffed, and that the fame word is very common in Wales to this day. This cannot be denied. But the fame word Aber is found in fome parts of North Britain to which the Pictifh empire did never extend. Lochaber is the name of a diffrict in the Western Highlands, which had always belonged to the Scots.

SHOULD we fuppofe with Cambden, that the Irifh went originally from South Britain, and alfo agree with him and Innes, that the Scots of Britain are of Irifh extraction, what could have hindered either of those nations from using the word Aber like the Picts or Caledonians? The Irifh might have very naturally borrowed that word and thoufands more from their British ancestors, and the Scots from their Irifh progenitors. But if the Irifh, and of courfe the Scots, muft be brought from Spain, a notion which Innes inclined to believe, the Cantabri and Artabri of Spain might have furnished the Irish, and confequently Scots, with the word Aber, a word in which the two former nations, and therefore the two latter, were peculiarly interefted.

STRATH is another word which Cambden has gleaned up from among the remains of the Pictilh tongue. It fignifies, as he juftly obferves, a valley through which runs a river or brook. But among all the local names in those Western D 3 High-

54

Highlands and ifles in which the Picts were never fettled, there is hardly any one fo common as thefe which have the word Strath prefixed to them. Nor is there any difficulty in finding the fame initial part of a local name in Ireland *.

THE only specious argument urged by the two antiquaries in defence of their opinion, is founded on a discovery which Bede has made for them. We are told by that writer, that penuabel fignifies, in the Pictisch language, the head of the wall, and very fortunately that word bears the fame meaning in the Britisch. But it is to be observed, that both Cambden and Innes were of opinion that Bede committed a missake, when he affirmcd that the Britisch and Pictisch we may infer from them, arose from Bede's want of critical knowledge in the Britisch tongue, might have led him to think that penuabel was a Pictisch word, when in reality it is Britisch.

THE author of the Eulogium Britanniæ informs us, that the fame extremity of the Roman wall, which the Anglo-Saxon calles penuahel, went under the name of cenuahil in the Scottifh tongue. Suppofing then that Bede did not through miftake give us the Britifh name of the wall's end, inftead of the Pictifh, the argument drawn by Cambden from pennahael proves with its full ftrength no more than this, that the Pictifh and Scottifh tongues differed in the initial letters of one word. And fhall we infer from that immaterial difference that they were two diffinct languages ? We might as well conclude that the Doric and Ionic dialects of the Greek had no great relation to one another. We muft likewife maintain that the Latin authors who wrote Caius Cæfar, and Cneius Pompeius, ufed a language different from those who wrote Gaius Cæfar and Gneius Pompeius.

* Strathbane and Strabrane, and a hundred others.

Of the Pitlish Language.

THOUGH I contend for the identity of the Pictifh and Scottifh tongues, I would be underflood to mean no more than that these languages were reciprocally intelligible to the respective nations by whom they were spoken. The Irish of Ulster differs in a considerable number of words from that of Connaught, as does the Galic of the western iss from that of Sutherland or Aberdeen fhire. But the immaterial variations in these feveral idioms will never hinder one from affirming that the people of Connaught and Ulster speak the fame Irish, and all the Highlanders of Scotland the fame Galic.

By the Pictifh tongue I mean, in the whole course of this differtation, the language of the old Caledonians. If in the sequel it shall appear, that the Scots as well as Picts were the genuine descendants of the Caledonians, there will be no difficulty in supposing that they spoke the same language.

DISSER-

DISSERTATION VI.

Of the Scots.

THOUGH it is well known that the modern French and Germans are defeended of the antient Franks and Allemans, it is impossible to affign the period of time in which they made the first great figure in their respective countries. B fore the middle of the third century, their very names were unknown to the writers of Greece and Rome. It is therefore no matter of furprize, that the Picts and Scots, who possible but a corner of a remote island, should remain equally unknown to historians till that period

EUMENIUS, the panegyrift, is the oldeft writer who fpeaks of the Picts, and Porphyrius, the philofopher, is the firft who makes any mention of the Scots. It is well known that Porphyrius was an implacable enemy to the Mofaic and Chriftian inftitutions, and that he wrote with peculiar acrimony againft both. In one of his objections againft the former, he took occalion to fpeak of the Scottifh nations. The words of that objection have been preferved by St. Jerome, who tranflated them into Latin, from the original Greek, and they run in Englifh thus: "Neither has Britain "a province fertile in tyrants, nor have the "Scottifh " Scottifh tribes, nor has any one of the barba-" rous nations, all around to the very ocean, " heard of Mofes or the Prophets *."

CAMBDEN, Usher, and several other eminent critics, have quoted this paffage, as the language of the pagan philosopher, without ever fulpecting its authenticity. But Innes is politive that it is Jerome's own invention. He fays, " That this paffage is not Porphyrius's, but Jerome's own, this the epithet he gives to Britannia, of fertilis 66 " provincia tyrannorum, feems to demonstrate. For when Porphyrius, about A. D. 267. wrote " the book against the Christian religion to which " St. Jerome alludes in that paffage, there had fcarce " till then appeared from Britain any confiderable " tyrant, or ulurper against the empire : whereas, " betwixt that year 267 and the year 412, when " St. Jerome wrote his letter to Ctefiphont, there " had rifen in Britain no lefs than feven tyrants or " ufurpers." After Innes had enumerated thefe tyrants, and obferved that four of them were cotemporary with St. Jerome, he concludes, that Porphyrius had no real concern with the paffage now under confideration.

It will appear hereafter, that Innes had particular reafons of his own for afcribing this paffage to Jerome. Had he acknowledged with other critics, that it belongs undoubtedly to Porphyrius, he would have pulled down his fyftem with his own hands. But whatever his motive may have been for giving the words in question to the holy father, we fhall in the mean time do full juffice to his argument.

^{*} Neque enim Britannia, fertilis provincia tyrannorum, et Scoticz gentes, omnefque ufque ad oceanum per circuitum barbaræ nationes, Noyten Prophetafque cognoverant. Hieronym. Epift. ad Ctefiphont.

58

THE ancient writer, whoever he was, calls Britain, a province fertile in tyrants. If Porphyrius was the real writer, it is certain that he wrote in Greek; and if he meant to fay no more than that Britain was full of Kings, he furely wrote proper Greek in calling those Kings $T_{UPATROL}$, or tyrants; nor would he have given us a false account, had he affirmed that Britain was divided between many Princes. This was certainly the case, before the Romans fubdued the beft part of this island; and the very character that an ancient author gives of Britain is, "It abounds in nations, " and Kings of nations *."

BUT waving this confideration, Innes had no authority for maintaining that our author fpeaks of confiderable tyrants or ulurpers in the empire. There is not a fyllable in the paffage before us concerning tyrants from Britain who ulurped the imperial dignity.

SOME of the thirty tyrants who tore the Roman empire into pieces, after Gallienus had abandoned himfelf entirely to floth and fenfuality, had, it is true, been governors of Britain, and had affumed the purple there. Among thefe tyrants were Lollianus, Victorinus, Pofthumus, Tetricus, and Maximus, whofe coins were, in Cambden's time, feen more frequently in England than any where elfe. From that circumftance, that excellent antiquary concluded, with great appearance of reafon, that thefe ufurpers had been proprætors of Britain. He adds another to the number of tyrants now mentioned, that is, Cornelius Lælianus, a pretended Emperor, whofe coins are found in Britain only *.

^{*} Mela de Situ Orb. Lib. iii.

I τ cannot be afcertained that Porphyrius wrote his book againft the Chriftian religion in the year 267. His mafter and friend Longinus, the critic, was put to death by Aurelian the Emperor, who died about nine years after that period; and Porphyrius may have written the treatife, out of which Jerome quotes the paffage in difpute, fome little time before the death of Aurelian, or the year 275. But fuppofing the date of the philofopher's book to be precifely what Innes makes it, the learned infidel had a good deal of reafon to fay of Britain, that it had been fertile in Kings in former ages, or fertile in tyrants in his own time \dagger .

HAVING thus eftablished the authority of that passing, in which the Scots are mentioned for the first time, we are to inquire next, where that nation, or the tribes who went under that name, were fettled.

IT muft be allowed that Porphyrius has not fufficiently cleared up this point. But archbifhop Ufher was furely too hafty in affirming that the philofopher places the Scottifh nation without Britain, that is to fay, formewhere elfe rather than in that ifland t. The Scots were without Britain, in one fenfe, and within it, in another, at the very time when Porphyrius wrote againft Chriftianity. The very learned primate could not have been ignorant that the generality of Greek and Latin authors have appropriated the name Britannia to that part of the ifland which had been fubdued by ^{*} Camden's Brit. Rom.

⁺ See Tribellius Pollio's little book on the thirty Tyrants.

[‡] Usher. Antiquit. lib. xv. p. 380.

Of the Scots.

the Romans. Tacitus obferves, in the very beginning of his hiftory, that Britain had been loft to the empire, and was foon recovered. Claudian introduces Britannia to Stilicho, with a moft humble and grateful addrefs in her mouth, for the effential fervices done to her by that able general, who drove away the Picts and Scots from her territories : and Bede has frequently confined the name Britanni to the provincials, in contradiffinction to the Picts and their allies. All this is undeniably true ; and therefore the Scottifh nations mentioned by the philofopher may have been within the ifland of Great Britain, though difcriminated from the provincial Britons.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS is the next author who mentions the Scots : his account of them is, that " In the tenth confulfhip of Conftantius, and in the third of Julian, the incurfions of the Scots and Picts, two wild nations who had broken the treaty of peace, laid wafte those parts of Britain which lay near their confines : fo that the provincials, oppreffed with a feries of devastations, began to entertain the most frightful apprehensions. Cæfar was paffing the winter at Paris, when the Britons informed him of their diftressful fituation. He was quite at a lofs how to behave in a conjuncture every way dangerous. He could not prevail with himfelf to leave Gaul, as the Alemans at that very time breathed out cruelty and war against him; nor did he at all think it prudent to crofs the fea, in order to relieve his British fubjects, as the Emperor Conftans * had done on a fimilar occafion. He therefore judged it most convenient to fend Lupicinus, an able general, into Britain, to re-establish the peace there, either by force or treaty *."

^{*} The British expedition of Constans happened in the year 343.

As a learned English prelate has given his opinion that all those Scots who invaded the Roman Britain were Irishmen, he found himself under the neceffity of construing and expounding a part of this passing of Ammianus in a different sense. To fatisfy the curious on this head, I have thrown at the bottom of the page the bishop of St. Asaph's construction of this paragraph.

WHATEVER fuccefs Lupicinus had in his war or negotiations with the Picts and Scots, it is cer-

* Lhoyd, bifhop of St. Afaph, far from allowing that the Romans had entered into a treaty with the Scots and Picts, would have us believe that those two barbarous nations had previously agreed among themfelves to invade the Roman frontiers, in fome certain places which they had marked out, as most fit for their purpole; and these places, according to him, are the condicta loca of Ammianus ; condiza being joined in the conftruction to loca, and not to rupta quiete, according to our translation. But how came the hiftorian to learn that the Scots and Picts had made an agreement concerning these certain places, and followed with great exactness that plan of operations which they had concerted before the commencement of that war ! Supposing that Ammianus was privy to all their plans and compacts, what could he mean by informing us. that the Picts and Scots diffurbed the tranquility of the province, when they laid it wafte ? Devaltations of that kind are never teen or felt, without a previous breach of the public tranquility. Gentium ferarum excurfus, rupta quiete, condicta loca limitibus vicina, vaslabant. So Lhoyd would have the words of the text pointed and conftrued. But in this difpofition they look very much like a folecifm in grammar and fenfe; while in the other, for which we contend, they are perfectly confistent with both. Livy has condicere inducias : and the fame great hiftorian oppofes quies to bellum. Vid. Ammian. lib. xx.

tain that they, as alfo the Saxons and Attacots, harraffed the provincial Britons inceffantly, during the fhort reigns of Julian and Jovian *. In the reign of Valentinian, thofe barbarous nations reduced the provincial Britons to extreme mifery, having killed Tullofaudes their general, and Nettar ridus the warden of the maritime coaft. In a word, they carried all before them, till, in the year 368, Theodofius, the greateft general of that age, marched againft them, at the head of a numerous army, defeated their plundering bands in every place, recovered all the Roman territories which they had feized, and erected thofe territories into a new province, to which he gave the name of Valentia. Having performed thefe exploits, he returned in triumph to court, no lefs eminent for his military virtues, fays the hiftorian, than Furius Camillus and Papirius Curfor had been in diftant ages t.

Theodofius, however victorious upon this occafion, was either not able, or too much in hafte, to tame the wild nations of Britain, fo far as to hinder them from renewing their incurfions and ravages. The mighty feats he performed in the Orkneys, Thule, and the Hyperborean ocean, are the poetical creation of Claudian, who flattered the grandfon of that general. The barbarous nations of the north were pouring in whole inundations of very formidable troops into the moft fertile and important provinces of the empire; of confequence, the prefence of Theodofius near the throne and principal fcenes of action, became indifpenfibly neceflary. We have therefore reafon to believe, that he contented himfelf with regaining those territories which the Scots, Picts and Attacots, had wrested from the provincial; and it was undoubtedly in these territories that he erected the new province of Valentia; though Gildas, Bede, and after them a great number of modern writers, were of another opinion.

have

^{*} Ammian, lib. xxvi.

[†] Ammian. lib. xxvii.

WHATEVER the extent or boundaries of Valentia may have been, it is certain that neither the Furius Camillus of the fourth century, nor Maximus the Spaniard, nor Stilcho's legions, nor walls either new or repaired, obftructed or intimidated the barbarians of North Britain, or confined them within their native hills. Impatient of controul, greedy of plunder, and thirfting for fame, they refumed their former fpirit of conqueft and devaftation. They frequently invaded the fouthern divifion of the ifland, recovered the diftrict of Valentia, and continued their hoftilities, till Honorius refigned all his pretenfions to Britain, and left the provincials to fhift for themfelves. It was between the 420 and 435 of the Chriftian æra thatthis inglorions, though involuntary, dereliction of Britain happened.

EVERY one must acknowledge, that the Scots and Picts were by much too powerful for the Britons, after they were abandoned by the Romans. The letter written by the degenerate provincials to Ætius the conful, exhibits a most lively picture of their diftreffes. The following paffage of it has been preferved by Gildas: "The barbarians drive us back to the fea : the fea drives us back to the barbarians : inevitable deftruction must be our fate, in either of these ways : we are either killed or drowned."

Some learned men, whofe prejudices have led them far in extenuating the national antiquity of the British Scots, have found themselves under a neceflity of allowing that the people who went under that name had fettlements of their own in this ifland, within lefs than a century after it was abandoned by the Romans. But no Greek or Roman writer has informed them that the Scots had no fettlements in Britain before the end or middle of the fifth century. Ammianus Marcellinus has not even furnished them with a dark hint, that the Scots who invaded the Roman province in the reign of Conftans, Conftantius, Julian, Jovian, and Valentinian, were Irifh. This is fo far from being the cafe, that he fays, in plain terms, " That he had, in that part of his hiftory which related to the Emperor Conftans, given the exacteft account of Britain, whether we regard its fituation or inhabitants ;---that it was therefore unneceffary to repeat that account in the hiftory of Valentinian ;and that, of courfe, it was fufficient for him to fay, that, in the reign of that Emperor, the Picts, who were divided into two nations, the Deucaledonians and Vecturiones, likewife the Attacots, a warlike race of men, and the Scots, roamed about through different parts of the province, and committed many depredations *."

BUT, from the latter part of this very paffage, fome antiquaries of note have concluded, that the Scots of Valentinian's time were no more than vagabonds in this ifland, and confequently unpoffeffed of any fettlements. The hiftorian, after mentioning the Scots, adds immediately, per di-

versa

^{*} Ammian. lib. xxvii.

versa vagantes, " a people without any fixed habitations."

BEFORE this criticism is admitted, we must take the liberty to afk, whether the Picts and Attacots had any fettlements in Britain at this time ? They certainly had. Yet fo it is that the expreffion from which the conclusion is drawn, relates equally to them. The fequel of the flory proves this, beyond any poffibility of contradiction. "The Saxons and Franks ravaged those parts of " Britain which lay nearest to Gaul. The Picts, " Attacots and Scots overran, plundered and laid " wafte feveral other parts. Theodofius the Ro-" man general formed a refolution of applying the " most efficacious remedy to all these calamities. "Accordingly he divided his army, which was "numerous, and confcious of its own ftrength, "into feveral different bodies. This done, he " took the field against all the hostile nations at " once, and attacked their plundering bands with " fuccefs, in the feveral places which they ra-" vaged t." Here is a decifive proof that the Scots were vagabonds only in the fame fenfe in which the other hoftile nations were fo. Not one of the five nations had a fettlement in South Britain. But can it be reafonably inferred from this, that neither the Scots, nor any of the reft, posleffed a foot of ground in the northern division of the ifland ?

AMMIANUS has faid, that the Franks, and their neighbours the Saxons plundered the Gallican or Southern parts of the British province, fome-times by fea, and fometimes by land. But he has not fo much as infinuated that the Scots were fea rovers; neither has he favoured a certain tribe of antiquaries with a fingle hint, from which they could venture to infer, that the Scots were either mercenary troops or auxiliaries, muftered up by the Picts in Ireland. This was fo far from his meaning, that he makes the Scots principals in the war against the Britons, under the reign of Conftantius.

t Divifis plurifariam globis adortus est hostium vastatorias manus. Ammian, lib xxvii.

In fhort, Ammianus, who holds a refpectable place among the hiftorians of Rome, found the Scots in Britain in the year 360, and left them there. He found them likewife in the fame country about the year 343. They had concluded either a truce or peace with the Emperor Conftans, in that year, and broke it in his brother's reign.— He found them a formidable people in Britain, and as well eftablifhed there as the Picks or Attacots, fifty years at leaft before any other author of tolerable credit has found the Scottifh name in Ireland.

But thefe Scots, according to fome, might have been adventurers from Ireland. This has been confidently affirmed by many able writers; and it has been the general belief of many nations, that the Scots of Britain have derived their origin from the Irifh. But as the bare authority of a thou fand learned men is not equal to the force of one folid argument, nor the belief of feveral great nations more, in many inftances, than a popular error, it is far from being impofible that thefe writers and whole nations may have been miftaken in the prefent cafe. That they were actually fo, it is no crime to fulpect, nor an unpardonable prefumption fumption to affirm, when it can be evinced that their belief is ill founded.

67

WERE it certain, or even highly probable, that the British Scots owe their name and existence to the ancient Irifh, it is difficult to fay why they should be ashamed of their origin. The Germans, South Britons and Caledonians were, before the birth of Chrift, nations of much the fame character with the old Hibernians, equally illiterate, equally unpolifhed, and equally barbarous in every refpect. About the latter end of the first century, the difference between the Hibernians and the people of this ifland must have been inconfiderable. In the fecond, third and fourth centuries, the Caledonians, Picts and Attacots, were undoubtedly wild nations, and no lefs fo than the Irifh. In the fifth, fixth and feventh, religion and learning flourished in Ireland to fuch a degree, that it was commonly stiled the mother country of faints, and reputed the kingdom of arts and sciences. The Saxons and Angles fent thither many of their Princes and Princeffes, to have the benefit of a pious and liberal education. It ought likewife to be acknowleged, that fome of the most eminent teachers of North Britain received their inftruction at the Irifly feminaries of literature and religion.

IF the Irish of the middle ages became a degenerate race of men, we ought to confider that all nations have their dark and fhining periods .---The domeftic confusions of their government, and the cruel oppressions of the Danes, very much contributed to their national depravity. Even the English conquest, for some ages, rather sufpended than introduced government among them. These misfortunes have, however, been for fome time E a back back removed, and we find that Ireland has gradually emerged from that cloud of national ignorance which involved it, and produced men who would do honor to any nation in Europe.

Of the Scots.

But notwithftanding all the national honor that might accrue to the Scots, from an Irifh defcent, yet that partiality I may be fuppofed to have for my countrymen will never induce me either to believe or fupport the venerable fiction of their Hibernian extraction. That my unbelief on this head is not ill founded, will beft appear from a concife difcuffion of the antiquities of Ireland.

DISSER-

The Irish Antiquities, &c.

DISSERTATION. VII.

The Irifh Antiquities peculiarly dark and fabulous.

T O those who confider the ancient flate of Ireland, which, from its fituation, was little known to foreign writers, and was itfelf totally deflitute of the use of letters, till the introduction of christianity by St. Patrick, it will be little the matter of furprize, that very few of the domeftic transactions of that country have been handed down, with accuracy, to the prefent times. But Ireland has been peculiarly happy in its domeftic means of preferving its internal history, Every thing material in its history, from the very first day of its population till it was conquered in part by the Norwegians, and in whole by the English, has been preferved in the most faithful records. Should any one ask what these records were ; the great historiographer of Ireland furnished a lift of them taken from books of indifputable authority which were to be feen in his own time*: nor has the fame writer made any difficulty of affirming that the Irish anals are of

a

^{*} Keat. pref. to his Hift. of Ireland.

a fuperior fidelity to any other annals in the world

As the antiquities of Ireland have an infeparable connection with those of North Britain, it is hardly possible to do justice to the latter without examining the former. We are therefore under a necessfity of reviewing the Irish antiquities with a particular attention : but the utmoss care will be taken to give no more unfair representation of them than what is to be found in the writings of those who have pleaded the cause of the Irish nation with the greatest zeal and learning.

IRELAND, fays one of these zealous writers, lay uninhabited for the fpace of three hundred years after the flood. At the end of that period Partholanus, the fon of Scara, arrived there with a thousand foldiers and fome women. He had killed his father and mother in Greece, his native country, and that was the reafon why he undertook this voyage into Ireland. If one is curious to know in what year of the world this adventurer took poffession of that island, in what part of it he landed, and as fome people are minutely inquifitive, about every thing in which great perfonages are interested, in what month, and in what day of the month, the annals of Ireland will give him entire satisfaction. Partholanus landed at Tubbersceine, in Munfter, on the fourteenth day of May precifely, and in the year of the world one thouland nine hundred and feventy-eight.

THE fame annals furnish us with a most circumftantial account of the lakes which broke out in Ireland during the reign of Partholanus, of the rivers which he found there, of his favourite greyhound, of his confort's most scandalous behaviour, of

Dark and Fabulous.

of his own death, and of that all-confurning plague which fwept away in one week's time, all his pofterity, and all their fubjects; fo that not a fingle man or woman remained alive in the whole kingdom. This extraordinary event happened about three hundred years after Partholanus had poffeffed himfelf of Ireland; and this total excifion of his pofterity and fubjects, was a judgment inflicted upon that wicked man for the double particide he had committed in Greece.

AFTER the extinction of this firft Hibernian colony, Nemedius, another Prince of Magog's race, and the eleventh in defcent from Noah*, repeopled the ifland, which had been a perfect wildernefs for thirty years. Nemedius began his voyage in the Euxine Sea, and after a long and very ftrange navigation, arrived at length in Ireland. His fleet confifted of four and thirty transports, and every one of them was manned with thirty heroes.

THE great improvements made by this new fovereign in Ireland, the lakes which broke out there under his reign, the battles he fought againft fome African pirates, the grievous misfortune which broke his heart, the moft cruel opprefilons which his pofterity and people fuffered after his death; thefe and many other curious occurrences are fet down at large in those annals to which we have already referred.

THE Nemedians were fo unmercifully used by the victorious Africans, that after feveral ineffectual efforts to recover their liberty, they found them-

felves

^{*} Partholanus was the eighth.

felves under a neceflity of quitting Ireland. They equipped a fleet confifting of eleven hundred and thirty transports, and put to fea under the command of three leaders. The first of these was the famous Simon Breac, who fleered his course for Greece; the fecond was To Chath, another grandfon of Nemedius, who failed with his fquadron to the Northern parts of Europe; the third was Briatan Maol, who landed in the North of Scotland. From this illustrious leader Britain derives its name, and the Welch their origin.

ABOUT two hundred and fixteen years after the death of Nemedius, the defcerdants of Simon Breac, and of his followers, returned from Greece into Ireland. They were conducted thither by five Princes or Chieftains of a very high reputation; and as a fifth part of the men who compoled this new colony fell to the fhare of each of the faid Princes, it was agreed that the ifland fhould be divided into five almost equal parts, and that one of these divisions fhould be allotted to each of the five Princes. The Irifh historians have taken care to preferve the names of these old provincial Kirgs, and their fubjects are the men whom they flile Firbolgs.

IF any one inclines to learn how thefe Firbolgs were driven out of he'and, or totally enflaved after the lots of a hundred thouland men in one battle, the Irifh biftoriars will inform him very particularly. They will let him know likewife that the Tuath de Dannas, by whom thefe Firbolgs were deftroyed, or brought under the yoke, were a generation of Necromancers who came from Attica, Bœotia, and Achaia into Denmark, from Denmark into Scotland, and from Scotland into Ireland.

Dark and Fabulous.

THERE are two very remarkable circumftances in the hiftory of these Tuath de Dannans, which we cannot pafs over in filence : the first is, that they underflood magic to fuch a degree of per-fection, that they could reflore life to those who had been flain in battle, and bring them into the field the next day : but in fpite of their enchantments, the Affyrians were too many for them, and accordingly drove them out of Greece. The fecond circumftance that deferves our attention is this: from the four cities which the Tuath de Dannans poffeffed in Dermark, they carried away fome noble reliques, a fpear, a fword, a cauldron, and a ftone. The laft of these curiofities was called lia fail, and was that fatal marble chair on which the monarchs of Ireland firft, and afterwards the Kings of Scotland were crowned. Lia fail was possessed of a very extraordinary virtue till after the birth of Chrift. Whenever an Irith monarch was crowned, it made a ftrange noife, and appeared in a furprizing agitation.

But neither the wonder working forceries of the Tuath de Dannans, nor the amazing virtues of their Danish reliques were able to deliver them out of the hands of the Gadelians, when they invaded Ireland. These Gadelians were the descendants of the celebrated Gathelus, and from him they derived their name.

GATHELUS or Gathelglas was a great perfonage who lived in Egypt, and contracted a friendfhip with Mofes the legiflator of the Jews. His mother was Scota, the daughter of Pharaoh Cingris, and his father was Niul, a Prince of extraordinary learning and rare accomplifhments. Niul was the fon of the illuftrious Feniufa Forfa, a Scythian Scythian monarch, cotemporary with Nimrod, and the fame monarch that, by the affiftance of two excellent fcholars, invented the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Irifh alphabets.

THE precife time in which the pofterity of Gathelus came into Spain, after a long feries of ftrange peregrinations by fea and land, the manner in which they poffeffed themfelves afterwards of Ireland, and the means by which they at laft conquered a great part of North Britain, are related fully and minutely by that Irifh hiftorian from whom I have borrowed every thing told in this fection concerning the Partholanians, Nemedians, Firbolgs, and Tuath de Dannans *.

ACCORDING to the fame writer, the Gadelians or Scots conquered Ireland about the year of the world two thousand feven hundred and thirty-fix, or about thirteen hundred years before the birth of Chrift. The chief leaders under whose conduct the Gadelians made that conqueft, were Heber and Heremon, two fons of Milelius, King of Spain, who was married to a fecond Scota, the daughter of another Pharoah, quite different from him already mentioned. From either of these two Scota's, the Gadelians have been called Scots; and it is because all the Kings of Ireland, from the Spanish to the English conquest of that island, were descended from Heber and Heremon, the fons of Miles, that the Irish historians call them the Princes of the Milesian race.

A N ingenious author who lately published fome differtations concerning the ancient history of Ireland, makes no difficulty of affirming that all the

* Keating.

antiquaries

Dark and Fabulous.

antiquaries of that country are unanimoufly agreed in fixing the epoch of the Milefian colony's arrival in Ireland about a thouland years before Chrift*; but that gentleman could not have been ignorant that Keating, Kennedy and others had placed the fettlement of that colony in Ireland much earlier.

DONALD O NEIL, King of Ulfter, informs Pope John XXII. that the three fons of Milefius had come into Hibernia from Cantabria, more than three thoufand and five hundred years before that in which he wrote his letter to his Holinefs, which was in the year 1317. This hiftorical curiofity has been preferved by John de Fordun, and it may be prefumed that the King of Ulfter, and those other Princes who joined him in his epiftolary correspondence with the Pope, would have

* Mr. O Connor's Differt. on the ancient Hift. of Ireland, p. 110 - This O Connor, fince Dr. Macpherson's death, has publified another edition of his work, and has given an additional differtation to the world, with remarks upon Mr. Macpherson, the translator of Offian's poems. He feems to have been fo galled with what that gentleman has faid concerning the antiquities of Ireland, in his prefatory differtations to, and notes upon, the works of Offian, that he has totally laid afide good fense and argument, for fcurility and perfonal abufe. It is however to be hoped Mr. Macpherfon will not honour with a reply fuch an illiberal attack, which is as impotent as it is low and ungentlemanny. When a man appears extreamly angry upon a fubject, which can only be supported by cool and temperate difquifition, it is a conclusive argument that he is fenfible of the weaknefs of his caufe, or extreamly diffident of his own abilities to defend it. But as the character of modely is not very confpicuous in Mr. O Connor's works, it would feem to me that his intemperate rage had its rife from a narrow and irrafcible fpirit, thrown into confusion by the discovery made, by Mr. Macpherson, of the fabulousnefs of the Milesian fystem, which he himtelf had been at much pains to adorn. Hinc ille lacbrymæ !

confulted

confulted the ableft fennachies, and moft authentic records of the country, before they could venture to write fo confidently on a matter of fuch importance to the common father of all Chriftendom.

BUT were it undeniably true, that all the antiquaries, hiftorians, and bards of Ireland, have fixed the epoch of the Milefian colony's arrival there in the very time affigned by Mr. O Connor, the queftion is, whether we can fafely depend either on his, or upon their authority, in a matter of fuch antiquity ? How did it appear to him, or how can it be made clear to others, that a Spanish colony did actually fettle in Ireland about a thoufund years before the birth of Chrift ? Is it probable in any degree that one of the remoteft countries in Europe could have found out the art of preferving the memory of fuch diftant events be-fore letters were known to any of those Celtic nations who inhabited the fame division of the world ? And is there any one of those Celtic nations that can, with reafon, pretend to give a credible account of their anceftors or their actions, at the diftance of two thousand and eight hundred years back ?

IT may be afked alfo, whether we have any better evidence for believing the ftory of the Milefian colony than for believing that of the Partholanians, Nemedians, Firbolgs, and Tuath de Dannans. If the Irifh will give us leave to reject the ftory of thefe more ancient colonies, how can they fave the credit of the famous Pfalter Cafbel, Pfalter nan-traun, the Bosk of conquefts, the Bosk of the fnowy back, and that of all their other immortal manufcripts and traditions.

Dark and Fabulous.

ANOTHER natural queftion is, how it came to pafs that the Irifh antiquaries and fennachies found out the connexion of Partholanus, Nemedius, Gathelus and Milefius, with Magog, Japhet, and Noah, when no Celtic nation in the world became acquainted with these patriarchal names before the promulgation of Chriftianity? Did the Scots of Porphyrius's time know Mofes or the Prophets? And how came Moles himfelf to forget his excellent friend Gathelus*, or Cingris his implacable enemy ? The plain truth is this : That exact conformity which we find in the genealogies given by Mofes and the Irifh annalists, from the beginning of the antediluvian world, down to the third generation after Noah, affords a clear demonstration that the Irifh annals and genealogies were framed fome time after the books of Mofes were known in Ireland.

But we are told positively, "That the use of letters was known in Ireland from a very early period. The Milefian colony imported the arts and fciences into that country from Spain. The long intercourse which the Spaniards had with the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Persians, and Grecians, had humanized them and their posterity to a very high degree. The Iberian or Spanish Scots who came into Ireland, under the conduct of Heber and Heremon, were, like their ancestors, wife, brave, humane, and polite. Their genius was ftrongly turned to literature as well as to arms. As they had feweral academics for martial exercifes, fo they had feminaries of learning eftablished among them, and these richly endowed. In these feminaries they employed able professions of poetry.

* See Keat. Gen. Hift. of Ireland, p 35 & 36.

eloquence.

eloquence, philofophy and hiftory. The philological parts of learning were in great requeft among them. Philofophy was patronized by their Kings, recommended by Fileas, and became the ftudy of their great men, as without it no dignities could be obtained in the ftate. The Irifh bards and fennachies had hereditary fees fettled upon their families; and as they were obliged, by the ftanding laws of the kingdom, to confine themfelves to the proper bufinefs of their profediion, it muft be prefumed that they made an extraordinary proficiency.

"Bur the Irifh hiftoriographers appointed by authority must have been peculiarly industrious and faithful. Their falaries were great; and their compositions were to undergo a very first and impartial examination, in the public affemblics of the flates of the kingdom. The Irifh held triennial parliaments at Tara. A committee of every parliament was appointed to revise the work of every historiographer, before it could be published: and as it was prudently confidered that the fpirit of party might prevail in one of these committees and parliaments, it was ordained, that the fame work should be re-examined by a new committee of a subsequent parliament." ALL that has been advanced here concerning the

ALL that has been advanced here concerning the ufe of letters in Ireland, from the arrival of the Milefian colony, and concerning the flourifhing flate of learning there, has been copied from Mr. O Connor's Differtations. O Flaherty had likewife been at great pains to juftify the pretentions of his countrymen to an early knowledge of the fciences : But O Connor has equalled him in zeal, and exceeded him in dogmatical affertions. It is needlefs to make any anfwer to the account of the learning of Ireland given by this writer, fimply on his own authority. The ingenious father Innes * has long ago convinced the candid and impartial, that the Irifh were wholly unacquainted with letters, till St. Patric brought them into their country, about the Year 432.

ONE of his arguments, and a very plaufible one, is, that the very words in the Irifh tongue which express what in English we call books, pens, paper, reading, writing, and letters, are manifettly Latin ones Hibernized.

INNES has totally deftroyed all the proofs which O Flaherty had piled up in fupport of this abfurd doctrine, and evinced, in the moft fatisfactory manner, that the Betbluis nion of the modern Irith is no more than the invention of a late age. All the Irith letters may be feen in Latin manufcripts written in foreign countries, which had not the leaft Intercourfe with Ireland.

THOSE who defire to be more fully fatisfied in this matter, may confult Mr. Innes \dagger ; and to his arguments I fhall beg leave to add one or two more, with a particular view to the doctrine promulgated by O Connor.

WERE it true that Ireland had been the feat of learning, and the mother of the fciences, long before the commencement of the Christian æra, it is abfolutely incredible that the old Hibernians should have been fo unfavourably characterized by Strabo, Mela, and Solinus. It is impossible to believe that no accounts of their extraordinary genius and paffion for literature, their unexampled proficiency in philosophical knowledge, their most laudable munificence to the profession of e-loquence, poetry, and theology, could have trans-pired, especially as the sea-ports of Ireland were better known than those of Britain, and more frequented by foreigners.—By what ftrange fata-lity has it happened, that the inhabitants of a country, fo wonderfully well civilized, fo early improved by their intercourfe with Phœnicians, Car-thaginians, Perfians, and Egyptians, and fo un-conquerably tenacious of those excellent inftitutions which their anceftors transmitted to them, could have been reprefented by Strabo as favages more wild and unpolifhed than the Britons? Or could they have been defcribed by Mela, as the most uncultivated of all nations ?- The character which Solinus has drawn of them is equally un-favourable : he calls them a *nation void of hu*manity, unbospitable, and every way barbarous and atheistical. These characters were certainly too fevere : the vices and ignorance of the old Irifh muft have been cruelly exaggerated, and the writers now mentioned must not have been properly informed. But had the people of Ireland been that humane, generous, polite and literary people whom O Connor has defcribed them, it is impossible to imagine that the world could have been fo unjust to them, or that the writers now mentioned could have been fo grofsly miftaken.

^{*} Mir. Innes's 2d part of his Critical Effay.

[†] Mr. Innes's 2d part of his Critical Effiy, chap. 1. art. 2, 3, 4.

The Irifb Antiquities

Scots were fettled in North Britain ; that the Picts maintained a conftant intercourfe with the inhabitants of Hibernia, from the commencement of their respective monarchies; and that they frequently intermarried with their beft families :---If all this be true, how was it possible that the old Caledonians and Picts could have been totally unacquainted with letters, and could have remained in their uncultivated flate till the third or fourth century ?

IF it is true, that Anglefey, on account of its vicinity to Ireland, then the country of literature and science, was the great British university for. Druidical knowledge; if it is certain that there was the metropolitan's feat, and that the philofophers of Gaul came thither to finish their education *; how could South Britain have been deftitute of hiftories, books and letters, till it was conquered and polished by the Romans?

SIR James Ware, one of the most diligent; and undoubtedly one of the most learned antiquaries that Ireland ever produced, has, in feveral paffages of his works, given the fanction of his authority to the fyftem which we have been now defending. That learned gentleman, though very willing to do all poffible honour to his country, confessingenuoufly, that all the knowledge now remaining of what paffed in Ireland before the light of the gospel began to dawn there, is extremely little t. And for that very good reafon he has

^{*} O Connor fays, that the reafon why learning flourished fo

early in Anglesey, was on account of its vicinity to Ireland. † Perexiguam superessent in Hibernia gestarum ante exortam ibi evangelii auroram liquido conftat. Warius de Ant. Hib. in præfatione. F

The Irifb Antiquities

82

ipoken of those matters with diffidence and caution. He begins his account of the Irifh Kings no higher than Leogaire, who was cotemporary with St. Patrick, and makes no scruple to acknowledge, that almost all that is related concerning that King's predeceffors, is either mere fiction, or totally difguifed with fable. He defends Bolandus in his opinion that the famous Apostle of the Irifh was the perfon who introduced letters among them, and owns at the fame time, that after the ftricteft enquiry, he was not able to difcover any one tolerable writer of the history or antiquities of his own country more ancient than the Pfalter Cafbel, which was wrote in the tenth or eleventh age.

THIS fyftem of the aboriginal literature of the Irifh nation being fubverted and ruined, the pretended accounts of their ancient colonies muft together with it fall to the ground. In the differtation which immediately follows this, I fhall endeavour to inveftigate the genuine origin of the firft inhabitants of Ireland.

DISSER-

The Irifb a Colony

DISSERTATION VIII.

Of the original Inhabitants of Ireland .----That they went from Caledonia .--- Why the Irifh and British. Scots were called Gaels

THE unprejudiced part of mankind will al-low, with Sir James Ware, that the do-meflic hiftory of Ireland, prior to the time of Se. Patrick, which is the earlieft æra that can be affixed for the introduction of letters, is irretrievably loft. Tradition might for a time have preferved a confused shadow of great events. The compositions of bards and fileas may have transmitted through a few generations, fome occafional atchievements of their heroes; but nothing is more abfurd than to depend on either for the regular and continued hiftory of any nation.

THE glow of poetry which animates fome of the compositions of the bards, the harmony of numbers, and the elegance of thought and expreffion, have, in fome cafes, taken fuch hold of the human mind, that they have undoubtedly been handed down through fome generations without the aid of letters. The poems of Offian lately given to the public, may convince the world Fo af of the truth of this obfervation, which, at firft fight, may appear paradoxical. But a number of circumflances have concurred in the prefervation of thofe monuments of genius. When the mind is imprefied by the boldnefs of poetical figures and metaphors the memory feldom fails. Thofe figures cannot be introduced into a hiftorical narration. The mind flags at the dull jingle of hiftory in rhime ; and therefore no argument can be drawn to ftrengthen the hiftorical traditions of fennachies and fileas from the prefervation of the poems of Offian.—The period, moreover, to which Offian is fixed, is not fo much beyond the introduction of letters into the North, but their affiftance might have very early been received to perpetuate his compositions. We have among us many ancient manufcripts of detached pieces of his works, and thefe may have been copied from manufcripts ftill more ancient.

The Irifh a Colony

84

But the transfinifion of merely hiftorical events, by the rhimes of a fucceffion of bards, cannot deferve the fame degree of faith. We know, in the Highlands of Scotland, how little our bards can be depended on in matters of fact, fince we had it in our power to examine them by the criterion of true hiftory. I therefore have rejected their idle tales concerning the antiquity of our nation, preferring the finall, but more certain light we have from the writers of Greece and Rome, to all their incoherent and indigefted fables. But as the Irifh nation have not hitherto rejected the legends of their bards and fileas, we are not to wonder at the ftrange maß of abfurdity which they poffefs for their early hiftory. As it cannot be faid that the Irifh had the ufeof letters before the introduction of Chriftianity, fo it is impossible to prove that they had any other infallible method of perpetuating the memory of events. The art of drawing hieroglyphics on pillars or rocks, notwithstanding their pretended intercourfe with Egypt, it is certain they had not. Their wildest antiquaries do not even pretend it; and Keating abfolutely difclaims it in the name of his whole nation.

FROM the accounts which that writer, and others who have adopted the fame fyftem, have given of the firft inhabitants of Ireland, and its oldeft colonies, it may be fairly concluded that the origin of that nation muft be inveftigated any where rather than in its own annals.

CAMBDEN, whole conjectures are plaufible as his learning was immenfe, feems to have been perfuaded that the firft inhabitants of Ireland muft have gone from Britain. But afraid or averfe to provoke a whole nation, at that time defperately in love with their traditionary genealogies, he fpeaks too faintly and with too much brevity on that fubject.

THE arguments brought by that great antiquary to fupport his hypothefis, are in fubftance thefe *: "The vaft number of British words found in the Irish tongue; the fimilarity of old proper names in the two islands; that conformity of nature and customs which point out the connection of the two nations with each other; the denomination of a British isle given by fome ancient writers to Hibernia, and of Britains to its inhabitants; and laft of all, the fhortness of the passage from Britain into Ireland."

^{*} See Cambd. Hibernia, cap. 1. F 3

86'

HAD Cambden told us in plain language, that by that part of Britain from which the first and earlieft colonies went over to Ireland, he meant the Northern division of it, his arguments with regard to the origin of the Irifh nation, would have been more if not perfectly convincing. The vicinity of the countries is a proof which pleads much more flrongly for the Caledonians and Mæatæ of North Britain, than for the Silures or Devices or Brigantes of the South. The frequent vifits of the Hibernian Scots in the Northern part of the ifland, and their long alliance with the Picts, furnish strong enough prefumptions that these two nations were united by the ties of confanguinity, or fprung at first from the fame stock. The two promontorics now called the Mull of Galloway, and the Mull of Cantyre, lie more contiguous to Ireland than any part of England or Wales. The languages of the Caledonians and Scots were the fame, and from the fame principles it may be proven that the Pictifh and Irifh tongues were to likewife. All these confiderations taken together will induce any one to believe that the oldeft inhabitants of Ireland were colonies from the Western parts of the modern Scotland.

TACITUS underftood, by converting with Agricola, that the Hibernians cotemporary with that great man differed not much in their genius, manners, and cuftoms, from the Britains.

THE bulk of the Irifh nation were a very different race of men from those on the Western coaft of South Britain. Their languages, though plainly related to one another, are far from being reciprocally from Caledonia.

reciprocally intelligible in both the countries : and till the Normans conquered fome parts of Ireland, the people of that country had rather better opportunities than the Welfh to retain the language of their anceftors in its purity. Therefore as the Irifh differs fo effentially from the antient and modern Welfh, and is fo nearly allied to the Galic or antient Scotch, it feems decifive that the Irifh muft have derived their language, and confequently their original from North Britain.

I SHALL endeavour in the fequel of theie differtations to fhew that the Scots of Britain are the genuine pofterity of the Caledonian Britains. If that attempt fhall fucceed, it will be readily granted that the Scots of Ireland went originally from Scotland. For it may be proved that a perfect fimilarity of genius, language, arms, drefs, manners and cuftoms, has fublified between the two nations from the earlieft accounts of time.

THERE is one argument more which may be confidered of fome force, though of the grammatical kind.

THE Welfh to this day call the Irifh and Scots *Guidbill. The Irifh and Highlanders of this kingdom give themfelves this name reciprocally. We are told by a very able judge in fuch matters, that the Picts were called Guidbill by his countrymen of old. On the other hand, the Englifh, Welfh, and all who fpeak Englifh only, are diftinguifhed by the Highlanders and genuine Irifh, with the appellation of Gaul.

* In the word Guidbill, the letters db are quiefcent, fo that it is pronounced almost in the fame manner with Gael or Gael, the name which the Irish and Highlanders of Scotland give themselves to this day.

NATIONAL

The Irifb a Colony

NATIONAL prejudices and antipathies run much too high every where. From that fource national reflections will flow very naturally : formerly an unfavourable idea was annexed to the name of Highlander, and the people of that country, in return, gave the name Gaul to every foreigner or enemy of their nation, and fixed to it the ideas communicated by the words, ftranger, ignoble, cowardly, penurious, and unbo/pitable. But the true original meaning of the name is, a man from Gaul. The ancient inhabitants of Scotland thought themfelves of a different race from the people of South Britain, a people who came at a later period from Gaul, and were of courfe ftrangers to them. It became therefore at laft cuftomary with them to call every foreigner Gaul, and every perfon who had his education in a remote country, or who affected to imitate the manners and fashions of other nations, Gauldi.

FROM the appellation of Guidhil or Gael given indiferimately to the Ficts, Scots, and Irifh, by the antient inhabitants of South Britain, we may reafonably infer, that the latter were perfuaded that thefe three nations had the fame common original, and fomewhat different from themfelves. The Welfh, who are reckoned the genuine remains of thefe ancient South Britains, call themfelves Kymre in their own language; and had they been of opinion that the old Hibernians derived their blood from their own predeceffors, it is probable that they would have confounded them with the Picts and Scots by giving the fame national denomination to all ?

To firengthen the argument drawn from the appellation now before us, it may be observed, that from Caledonia.

that the Saxons who came from Germany into England, gave the name Gaul, with a fmall difference in the orthography, and lefs in the pronunciation, to those Britains of the South to whom they bore the greatest hatred. They called the Britains Weales in their own language, and Gauli in the Monkith Latin of the times. The reafon why they affixed this mark of diffinction to thefe Britains was, that they were in their opinion defcended from the Gauls on the continent : a nation againft whom the old Germans, like their modern pofterity, had entertained ftrong national prejudices *.

As it will be asked why the genuine Scots call themselves Gael or Cael, their country Caeldocht, and every thing that looks like them and their country Gaeltich, I thall take the liberty to offer a conjecture which may tend to illustrate the fubject under confideration.

MEN of letters will allow that the Germans, as well as the people of Gaul, were called Celtes by the Greeks +. It is likewife true, that the power of the letter G was in a vaft number of words much the fame with that of K among the Greeks, and C among the Latins t. Thefe two

^{*} The initial W of the Teutonic is commonly equivalent to the Gu and fimple G of the British, Irish, French, and Italian languages. Thus the Weales of the Anglo-Saxons is by the French pronounced and written Galles, as it is by the Irifh and ancient Scots Gaullive : it is unneceffary to produce more infrances. See Lhoyd's Com. Etymol. under the letter G. + Suidas in his Dictionary.

[‡] Thus the Romans wrote Carthaco and Carthago, pugna and pucha, vigetimus and vicetimus, and the Greeks inftead of the Latin Caius wrote Favos, &c.

The Irifb a Colony

observations being admitted, one may venture to fay that Gaelti, in the language of the ancient Scots and Irish, is the same with the Cellæ of the Latins.

IF we examine the changes made by the Greeks and Romans in the perfonal and local names of the Celtic language, the etymon now propoled can hardly be thought overftrained: at the worft it cannot be fo abfurd as that which deduces the name Gael from the Gallæci of Spain, with whom the Scots have perhaps lefs connection than with the Galatians of Afia and the Galatæ of Europe.

THE etymon of Gael or Cael being thus eftablifhed, we have plainly the derivation of the Caledonia of the Romans. I have above observed that the Highlands of Scotland is known, to this day, by no other name among the natives, than by Cael-dochd, a word compounded of Cael, i. e. Celts, and Do-ich Country. This observation was first suggested by the translator of Oslian's poems: and it is so obviously the original of Caledonia, that it is matter of fome furprize it never was obferved before. The inhabitants of the Highlands of Scotland call themfelves emphatically Na Cael, i. e. the Celts. To the Irifh they give the name of Cael Eirinach, i. e. the Irifh Celts. Whether an argument could be drawn from this circumstance, that of old it was not the popular belief, that the Scots came originally from Ireland, I leave to others to determine.

IF any one fhould incline to think that the ancient Irith and Scots had their denomination of Gael from their imaginary founder Gathelus, the fon or hufband of Scota, he may, while he pleafes, enjoy an opinion once popular and ftill harmlefs. But

- from Caledonia.

But it is fearcely lefs credible that Gathelus ever had any real exiftence, than that he was miraculoufly cured by Mofes near the Red Sea. That young Prince had it feems the misfortune to be bit in the neck by a ferpent, and the whole mais of his blood was immediately corrupted : but at the requeft of his father, Mofes interpoled very feafonably, and upon laying his wonder-working rod on the wound reftored the youth to a perfect flate of health, mean time there remained a green fpot on that part of his body where the ferpent had fixed her teeth. From this green fpot he was ever after called Gaidbil Glass, that is the green, or rather the grey : and Keating has inferted in his history a dozen of verfes extracted from the faithful records of Tara, to prove that this illustrious Prince derived his right to the epithet Gla/s from the impression made on his body by the teeth of this monftrous fnake.

UPON the whole, it appears evident, that Ireland was first peopled from Caledonia. The abettors of the high antiquities of Ireland have in fome measure owned the existence of a British colony ; but they were too much wedded to the indigefted fictions of a Spanish extraction, to be convinced that all their anceftors went from this island. It would be no difficult matter to investigate the origin of the legendary fictions of the Irish nation, and to shew that they had not their rife in a very remote age. But a difcuffion of this fort is too unimportant in an age in which all but bigots to an abfurd antiquity, ought, in the judgment of fober reafon, to reject the Milefian fables; which bear about them the marks of their being invented fome time after Chriftianity was introduced into Ireland.

IN

The Irifb a Colony, &c.

IN the courfe of my reading on the fubject of these differtations, I had an opportunity of examining all the Irifh hiftories that have any pretenfions to antiquity : I would have myfelf under-flood of those that have been given to the public : for though Ireland, as its annalists affirm, is croud-ed with ancient records, yet as they have been invifible to all but themfelves, we may conclude, if they really exift, they throw very little advanta-geous light on the hiftory of that country. The remarks I made I intend on fome future occasion to throw together; though, as I above obferved, the fubject is unimportant, on account of the fmall degree of faith now given to the ancient domeftic accounts of the Irifh nation. But as in every age and country there are fome enthuliafts that fondly believe the most extravagant fictions concerning the antiquity of their respective nations, so there are people that are ready to fupport that abfurd enthuliafm. I may therefore, by fome drawcanfir of this fort, be called forth to fupport, with further arguments, the opinion I have advanced con-cerning the antiquities of Ireland; and it was from forefeeing that a circumftance of this kind might happen, that I made notes upon the fubject *.

* These notes are now in the possession of Mr. Macpherson, of Strathmashy, in the county of Inverness; a very ingenious, and learned gentleman, who has made the antiquities of Ireland his particular fludy.

DISSER-

DISSERTATION IX.

Why the genuine Posterity of the ancient Caledonians were called Picts and Scots.

R A T H E R Innes, fo often mentioned, and fome other antiquaries of note, fay, that "the occafion and rife of the name of Scots af-"ford a very probable conjecture that the own-"ers of it came, at first, either from Scandia or "Spain *". These are Innes's own words. According to him, the Scythæ and Scoti are names of a fimilar import and pronounciation; therefore it is natural to believe that the latter is derived from the former, and that the original Scots of North Britain were a Scythian colony.

SHOULD we reafon from principles to vague, we might infift on the close connection between the name Scotus on the one hand, and Scotufa of Theffaly on the other. And would any one, poffeffed of common fenfe, infer from this refemblance or even identity of founds, that the pretended conquerors of Ireland came from Theffaly, and were perhaps the fame with the myrmidons of Achilles?

^{*} Critical Effay, p. 536.

INNES and other writers add further, that the argument is founded, not fo much on the analogy of the names, as upon that conformity of manners and cuftoms by which the Scots and Scythians were difficult from all other nations.— It is difficult to thew wherein the conformity confitted : if it lay in their barbarity and peculiar wildnefs of manners, the Scotufe of Thrace might have fuited the comparison as well as the moft unpolified parts of Scythia.

SHOULD a man of learning and abilities, even through humour, affert that the Scots came from Thrace, or the places adjacent, to the river Strymon, he might fupport his abfurd hypothelis with many plaufible obfervations. The Thracians have been very often called Scythians—Scotufa is nearly related to Scotus—the Geloni are not unlike the Gael in found; the Geloni painted themfelves— The Geloni and the Bifaltæ, near Scotufa, drank the blood of horfes and milk curdled together of the Scots of Ireland have frequently eat of the fame composition, if common fame has not belied them. A writer of great reputation fhews that the Geloni and Bifaltæ, and confequently the inhabitants of Scotufa, gave into this practice *.

Not to infift on the conjectures of those who give a Scythian origin to the name of Scots, it is evident that at belt it is no more than an idle fancy to bring the Scots from either Scaudinavia or Spain, till the learned are able to difcover the

* Bifaltæ quo more folent acerque Gelonus, Cum fugit in Rhodopen, atque in deferta Getarum, Et lac concretum cum fanguine potat equino.

VIRG. Geor. iii.

Scots

were called Scots and Piels.

Scots among the old inhabitants of those diffant countries. The geographers and historians of ancient times condemn those two fystems, by their total filence on that head; and a hypothesis of this kind can never fland on so feeble a foundation as the diffortion of the word Scythæ*.

AFTER all, it muft be confeffed, that it is extremely difficult to give any fatisfactory etymology of the name of Scots. It has puzzled the moft eminent antiquaries that Britain has produced; and therefore I think it no diffonour to me to fail in a point where men of much greater abilities have not fucceeded

VARRO and Dionyfius Halicarnaffenfis difagree in their opinions concerning the etymon of Italia: nor are the derivations given of Gallia, Hifpania,

* It was on the fame falfe principles that the Irifh fhewed their, connection with Spain ; but the affinity between the names Hibernia and Iberia is no more than the fhadow of a proot for fupporting their ideal genealogy. The Greek and Latin namesof the illand are to be derived from its weftern futuation, from the wintry temperament of its air and climate .- It may be likewife observed, that the first syllable of the Latin word Hiberpia is always long in the Latin profody, and the first fyllable of Iberia fhort. From this circumlance it may, with fome fhow ofprobability, be inferred, that the poets were ftrangers to the relation between the Spaniards and the Irifh. To fuppofe that the Greek name of Ireland, that is lerne or louerna, comes from, the Greek word which fignifies Hely, is furely no more than a groundlefs fancy, though embraced by a learned gentleman. Had it come from that epithet, it must have been written with an alpiration, like Hiera, one of the Agates, and Hiera, one of the OEolian illands. One of the rivers in Spain is called Ierna by Mela. Ireland, like that river, was called lerna, from the Celtic word lar; that is Weft; and the name of Erin, by which it has been always known by the Irifh and Highlanders of Scatland, is manifeftly a compound of Jar, West, and In, Island.

or Græcia, more certain. What fhall we make of Europá, Afia and Africa ? Cambden, with all his erudition and indefatigable induftry, was greatly embarraffed by the names Coritani, Silures, and many more nations, who made a very confiderable figure in the country, which he illuftrated with vaft pains and equal fuccefs. Scaliger and Voffius, Grotius, Bochart, and Menage, have been very often unfuccefsful in their endeavours to folve difficulties of this kind.

THERE is no reason why the Scots should be assumed to acknowledge that the origin of their name is involved in darkness; while that of Rome, the Queen of nations, remains utterly inexplicable. Plutarch found and left it so. Solinus gives no lefs than four different etymons, all equally unfatisfactory. Why the capitals of Britain, France and Portugal, have been of old called Londinum, Lutetia and Olysippo, are questions which have not hitherto been fufficiently cleared up, and probably never shall.

ALL we know with certainty concerning the appellation of Scot amounts to this, that it muft have been at firft a term of reproach, and confequently framed by enemies, rather than affumed by the nation afterwards diffinguifhed by that name. The Highlanders, the genuine pofterity of the ancient Scots, are abfolute firangers to the name, and have been fo from the beginning of time. All those who speak the Galic language call themselves Albanicb, and their country Alba.

CONTUMELIOUS appellations have been given in all ages not only to individuals, but to whole bodies of people, through fpite, or a fatirical pleafantry natural to the human race. The Paones ones of Macedonia were a quarrelfome race of men, and therefore were called Paones. The Proteftants of France and the Low Countries were nick-named Hugenots and Gueux, becaufe their adverfaries ftudied to make them ridiculous and contemptible. It is needlefs to multiply inftances. The fame ill-natured humour has been hitherto general, and will always continue fo.

THE Pićts, who poffeffed originally the northern and eaftern, and in a later period, alfo the more fouthern divifions of North Britain, were at firft more powerful than the Caledonians of the weft. It is therefore eafy to fuppofe that the Pićts, from a principle of malevolence and pride, were ready enough to traduce and ridicule their weaker neighbours of Argyle. Thefe two nations fpoke the fame language. In the Galic tongue Scode fignifies a corner, or finall divifion of a country. A corner of North Britain is the very name which Gyraldus Cambrenfis gave the little kingdom which the fix fons of Muredus King of Ulfter were faid to have erected in Scotland *.

SCOT, in Galic, is much the fame with little or contemptible in Englifh; and Scottan, literally fpeaking, fignifies a fmall flock; metaphorically it ftands for a fmall body of men. For fome one of the reafons couched under these difparaging epithets, their malicious or fneering neighbours may have given the opprobrious appellation of Scot to the ancestors of the Scots nation.

THE Allemans of Germany were at first an ignoble multitude, or a motley composition of many different tribes and nations. For that very reafon, the reproachful name of Allemans * was framed by thole who hated and defpifed them. But the deformity of that defignation was afterwards covered with laurels, like the blemifu which gave Cæfar fo much pain; and the whole Germanic body is now proud of a title, thought at firft difhonourable. In the fame way it may be naturally fuppofed, that the people of Albany were, after a courfe of ages, reconciled to the once difparaging name of Scots, upon finding that all other nations agreed in diffinguifhing them by it.

^{*} The kingdom of Argy'e, according to his information.

Why the Caledonians

It is generally believed that the Picts derived their appellation from their characteriftical cuftom of painting their bodies. This opinion feems to be fupported by an expression of Claudian +; who fhews, in another place, that the Picts continued the old practice of drawing the figures of animals on their limbs, after it had been abolifhed in South Britain t. But when the fashion of painting in the fame way was universal in Britain, it may be asked, Why were not all the inhabitants called Picts by the Romans? Why were the Caledonians of the East diffinguished by a name to which those of the West had the fame right; for it is certain they used the Glassum of Pliny, and the Vitrum of Mela, in common? Picti is no more than an epithet : and as Virgil would have been guilty of an impropriety, had he called ei-

* Allemans, q. All mans, a composition of nations. + Ille leves Mauros, nec falso nomine Pictos, Edomit.

Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras.

CLAUDIAN.

ther

ther the Geloni or Agathyrfi, Picti, without spethat epithet, fo the Romans in Britain would have been guilty of the fame folecitm, had they called the Eaftern inhabitants of Caledonia Pitti, without annexing a noun fubftantive to the adjective.

UPON weighing these difficulties, I am apt to believe that the name, out of which the Romans framed the defignation of $Pi \partial i$, was originally a British one, and of a very different fignification from the Latin word, which is equivalent to Painted in English. The name was very probably framed by the Scots to the Weft, or the Maata to the South : and as it may have been imposed after the expedition of Severus, it is no matter of wonder that it was unknown to all the Roman writers till the very end of the third century. AFTER the reign of Caracalla, the defign of conquering North Britain feems to have been totally laid afide by the Romans. The frequent competitions of rival Emperors, the public diffractions unavoidably attending fuch contefts, and a long fucceffion of Princes, foolifh, wicked and in-active, muft have diverted their attention to other objects. The barbarians of Caledonia had fenfe enough to avail themfelves of the advantages which an administration, so feeble and uncertain, must have afforded them. They made frequent incurfions into the Roman provinces, and met with little opposition. Not long after, Constantius Chlorus came from the Continent into Britain, with an intention to make war upon them; but he died at York, before this defign could be executed. It was probably much about that time that that the Romans difcovered that the moft confiderable nation among the unconquered Britons was called Pialich, a word corresponding in found with the Piali in Latin : accordingly we find that Eumenius, the panegyrift, is the first Roman author who mentioned that people under this new name.

In philological inveftigations of this kind, it is much eafier to difapprove of the conjectures of others, than to offer a more rational one to the public. But as new opinions, which turn only on verbal criticifm, are very innocent, though perhaps they may be ill founded, I shall venture to give a new etymon of the name of Piai.

THE Highlanders, who fpeak the ancient lan-guage of Caledonia, express the name of that once famous nation, who were at last fubdued by the Scots, by the word Piclich. They could not have borrowed this epithet from the Romans; for the illiterate part of the Highlanders have no idea that the Romans were in this Ifland, or ever exifted : yet the name now under confideration is very familiar to their ears. One of the ideas affixed to the word PiEldich, or PiElich, is that odious one which the English express by the word Plunderer, or rather Thief. Therefore it is not improbable that their neighbours may have given that title to a people fond of depredation : and Dion gives us to understand, that the barbarians of North Britain took a peculiar pleasure in rob-beries; nor was this character, in these days of violence and ignorance, attended with much in-famy : if the robber had the address to form, and the fpirit to execute his unjust fchemes, he' was rather proud than ashamed of his conduct : all the were called Scots and Piers.

the honefty required at his hands, was not to encroach on the property of a friend or ally *. AMONG the Princes and chieftains whom Vir-

AMONG the Princes and chieftains whom Virgil has brought to the affiftance of Turnus, we find fome who bear a perfect refemblance to the plundering heroes of Pictavia. The picture which the poet has drawn of Ufens and his people may, without any impropriety, be applied to the ancient Caledonian tribe now under confideration.

Et te montofæ milere in prælia Nerfæ, Ufens, infignem fama et felicibus armis: Horrida præcipue cui gens, affuetaque multo Venatu nemorum, duris Æquicula glebis Armati terram exercent, femperque recentis Convectare juvat prædas, et vivere rapio. VIRG. Æn. 7.

THE Brigantes of South Britain, the Brigantes of Ireland, the Brigantii near the Alps, and the inhabitants of Brigantium in Spain, derived their names from Brigand +, a Celtic word, which fignifics a robber. The French have retained the original word in their language; and the Englith have the word Brigantine, which properly fignifies a veffel ufed by pyrates.

SEXTUS POMPEIUS obferves, that thieves were, in the language of Gaul, called Cimbri; and according to Plutarch, robbers went under the fame name in Germany. The Cimbri had a ftrong

* Those who may imagine that robbery was effected more honourable among the ancient Picts than among the other rude nations of mankind, may confult Thucydides, p. 3. b. i.

† See Bullet. Dict. Celt. Fol. 2d, p. 211.

ioi

Why the Caledonians

102

propenfity to robberies of a private nature, as well as to that fpecies of depredation which goes under the name of war and public conquest. But if the Cimbri of Germany, and the Brigantes of South Britain, have borrowed their respective names from their defire of booty, or their fuccefs in plundering, it is far from being incredible that a Caledonian people might have been called PiEldich by their neighbours, for their uncommon dexterity in the fame way.

ÉVERY one knows, that the Borderers of Eng-land and Scotland diftinguifhed themfelves for many ages, by pillaging, plundering, and laying whole countries wafte. In time of war thefe ravages may have been in fome meafure excufable.---But even after truces and pacifications had been folemnly ratified, the fame barbarous practices were too fathionable on both fides to be defifted from; especially as they were attended with ho-nour and encomium, rather than punishment or difgrace. It is hardly neceffary to add, that this practice, though manifeftly incompatible with the laws of all civilized nations, was tolerated, and perhaps encouraged, till the acceffion of James to the throne of England *. THE explications I have ventured to give of the names of Picts and Scots may be defective; but they can hardly be more fo than those etymo-

* I am tempted to think that the ancient Selgovæ of Scotland, who lay North of the English Brigantes, were so called from the word Sealg, which, if literally taken, fignifies Hunting, and metaphorically Theft. The Gadini, who were at no great di-flance from the Selgovæ, feem to be nothing elfe than Gadichin in Galic, that is to fay, robbers or thieves.

logies

were called Scots and Piels.

logies which have been infifted on by men who may be juftly called the oracles of erudition in matters of this kind. It may be likewife faid that I have dwelt much longer on this fubject than its importance deferves. In the mean time, I leave it to the judgment of common fenfe to determine, whether it is not more probable that the Picts derive their name from a British word, than from a Latin epithet *.

* Strabo, though a very judicious critic, hiftorian, and geographer, imagined, very inconfiderately, that the Germans received their name from their being as like their neighbours of Gaul as if they had been their Brothers-German. Bede, though a Saxon himfelf, and the molt eminent fcholar of his time, entertained a fancy that the name Anglus fhould be traced up to the Latin word Angulus, or a Corner. This conceit was little better than the puns of Pope Gregory at Rome, upon the words Angli and Angeli, Deiri and De ira, Aella and Alleluja +. And can it be matter of wonder that Claudian fhould have found the etymon of the Picitifh name in the Latin tongue, effecially as thefe Caledonians were painted, and as the analogy between the Britifh word Picitich and the Roman Picifi was fo very clofe ?

+ Bed. Hift. Ecclef. lib. 2. cap. 1.

DISSER

103

G 4

104

DISSERTATION X.

The Highlanders Strangers to the National Name of Scots.---Call themfelves Albanicb, or ancient Britons-----Gael, or Celtæ.---Obfervations on the Irifh, Galic and Welch Languages.

F ROM what has been faid in the preceding differtation, it appears, that the names of Picts and Scots were imposed on the two nations into which the Caledonians were divided, fome time before the Romans deferted Britain, by the malevolence of their neighbours to the South, or rofe from the animofities which fubfifted between themfelves. The indigenal name of the Caledonians is the only one hitherto known among their genuine defeendants, the Highlanders of Scotland.—They call themfelves Albanicb to this day. All the illiterate Highlanders are as perfect firangers to the national name of Scot, as they are to that of Parthian or Arabian. If a common Highlander is afked, of what country he is, he immediately answers, that he is an Albanicb, or Gael. It is unneceffary to produce authorities to fhew that the ifland, which now goes under the name of Britain, was in early ages called Albion. To fearch for a Hebrew or Phœnician etymon of Albion has been the folly of fome learned writers. In vain have fome attempted to derive it from the white cliffs near Dover, or from a Greek word which fignifies a certain fpecies of grain, or from a gigantic fon of Neptune.

IN the Celtic language, of which fo many different dialects were diffueed over all the European nations of the Weft and North, and let me add, the Scythians of Alia, the vocable Alp, or Alba, fignifies Higb. Of the Alpes Grajæ, Alpes Pæninæ, or Penninæ, and the Alpes Baftarnicæ, every man of letters has read.

IN the ancient language of Scotland, Alpes fignifies, invariably, an eminence. The Albani near the Cafpian fea, the Albani of Macedon, the Albani of Italy, and the Albanicb of Britain, had all the fame right to a name founded on the fame characteriftical reafon, the heighth or roughness of their respective countries. The fame thing may be faid of the Gaulish Albici near Massilia.

THE Celtic was undoubtedly the language of the Belgic Gaul. For this we have the authority of Strabo. That from the Belgic division of Gaul the first colony must have transmigrated into South Britain, must be readily allowed. The vicinity of the two countries, and the shortness of the passes, is an argument in this case equal to a demonstration. It was natural enough for men, who had been once fettled in the low plains of Belgium; to give the name of Alba, or Albin, to Britain, on comparing the face or appearance of it to that of their former country. Men who had come from the Netherlands would most probably have called this new world, Albin in an oblique cafe, and Alba in the nominative. And it is to be observed, that almost all the local names of the Celtic tongue are energetical, and descriptive of the peculiar properties or appearance of places.

to

THE Greeks became in fome degree acquainted with Britain, and its original name, long before the Romans had any opportunity of knowing either. Agreeably to the genius of their language, the former naturally gave a new termination to Albin; and their Albion muft have, in procefs of time, paffed to the Romans. But the true Celtic name of the ifland having travelled gradually into the remoter parts of it, was there retained, by a race of plain, uncivilized men, who having no intercourfe with the Greeks, and very little with the Romans, adhered invariably to their mother tongue, and particularly to the local names which had been tranfmitted to them by their anceftors.

THAT all the territories once poffeffed by the old Caledonians were formerly called Alba in Galic, and Albania in the Latin of latter ages, is certain, beyond contradiction. In the little ancient Chronicles of Scotland, published by Innes at the end of his Critical Effay, they go frequently under that name *; and Kenneth, the fon of Alpin, who was the first Monarch of Caledonia, is called the first King of Albany, in fome old Latin rhimes often quoted +. But had the Scots of Britain come originally

^{*} Innes's Crit. Effay, in his Appendix, Num. 1, &c.

[†] Primus in Albania fertur regnasse Kenethus, Filius Alpini, prælia multa gerens.

in the Galic language.

originally from Ireland, their Latin name would have been very probably Hiberni, and their Galic one undoubtedly remain Erinicb.

AFTER the Germans had conquered the fouthern division of Britain, to those who remained of the old inhabitants they gave the name of Weales and Gauls, in their own tongue, and of Britonnes, in the Latin of the times; while they themselves thought it more honourable to retain their hereditary appellations of Saxons, Angles, and Jutes.

Among the most illustrious nations of antiquity, few have been equal, and fcarce any fuperior, to the Gauls, in military glory. Sallust makes no difficulty of acknowledging, that in this respect they were before the Romans*. Be that as it will, it is certain they had great merit in that way. Yet the Franks had too high a regard for their own genuine fame, and too profound a veneration for their anceftors, to affume the name of the Gauls, after they had poffeffed themselves of their country.

T o ftrengthen the observation I am to make, it is almost needless to mention the Ionians of Alia, the Phocæans of Gaul, the Boii of Germany, the Longobardi of Italy, the Belgæ and Atrebates of South Britain. All these, and other innumerable colonies, who left their native countries, and planted themselves in foreign regions, made a point of retaining the proper names of those nations from which they were originally fprung.

HAD the Scots of Britain been a colony from Ireland, in fpite of all the hard things faid by Strabo, Mela, Solinus and others, to the prejudice of the old Hibernians; nay, if the univerfal confent of mankind, inftead of three or four ancient writers, had agreed in calling the Irith favages, cannibals, atheifts, and ftrangers to every virtue under heaven, the Scots, notwithftanding, would have admired their anceftors fuperfitioufly, and retained their name, rather than degrade themfelves into Albanicb. But no Britifh Scot has ever yet called himfelf an Hibernian in a learned language, nor Erinicb in his own mother tongue. Every Scot who underftands the Galic calls himfelf, as I obferved before, either Gael, that is, one of the Celtæ, or Albanicb, in other words, a genuine Briton.

^{*} Salluft. in Catilina, cap. liii,

The Scots called Albanich

Not all the fenfible and quaint observations of civilized times will eradicate from the minds of the bulk of a people the high opinion they entertain of themselves, for their connexion with renowned national ancestors; and in every country national ancestors have a great deal of traditional fame. It is true, the merit of remote progenitors is fometimes very small, frequently dubious, and always exaggerated by the partial fistions of their posterity.

THE founders of Rome were a very flagitious race: the vagabonds that affociated with them an ignoble and abandoned rabble. Thieves, ruffians, defperadoes, bankrupts, cow-keepers, fhepherds, flaves, ravifhers of women, murderers of men, oppreffors and ufurpers, were the anceftors of men, lords of the world* Yet the Romans were extra-

 Majorum primus quilquis fuit ille tuorum, Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

JUVEN. Satyr. viii. ad finem. vagantly

in the Galic language.

vagantly vain and proud of their origin. All other nations were in fome degree influenced by the fame puerile weaknefs.

B u T in the annals of mankind it is perhaps impofible to find a nation more vain in this reipect than the old Irifh. To fay nothing of the antediluvian inhabitants of Ireland, and not to mention the Partholanians, Nemedians and others, the ideal connection they had with Scythian kings, Egyptian princeffes, and Iberian heroes, infpired them with a very high idea of their own dignity, and perhaps with a proportionable contempt for almoft every other people. Had the Scots of Britain been the real pofterity of a people fo extravagantly fond of their ideal national anceftors, is it reafonable to believe that they would have rejected the name of Hibernians or Erinich with fcorn, and preferred that of Albanich, a name which the Picts and old Caledonians muft have carried in common with them ?

FROM the appellation Kymri, Cumri or Cumeri, invariably retained by the Welfh, it has been concluded, and with reafon, that, inftead of being defcended from the Romans, Saxons, Danes, Normans, or other interlopers into Britain, they are the genuine offspring of the ancient Gomerians or Cimbri. What therefore fhould hinder antiquaries from concluding likewife, the argument being exactly the fame, that the Scots of Britain, who without interruption retained through all ages the name of Albanicb, are fprung from the ancient inhabitants of Albany, and confequently were genuine Caledonians? The Welfh have preferved their original Celtic name. The Highlanders Highlanders of North Britain retained the first appellation given to the inhabitants of the whole island. It will be asked perhaps, why the Welsh have not retained the appellation of Albanicb. I shall offer a few remarks to clear up that difficulty.

It is certain that the languages fpoken by the people of North Wales, by the Highlanders of Scotland, and by thole commonly called the wild Irifh, are the moft genuine remains of the ancient Celtic tongue now extant. The Cornifh, Armorican, and Bifcayan dialects, muft yield the preference to the former three, however certain it is that in these dialects fome true Celtic words have been preferved hitherto, which the Welfh, Highlanders, and Irifh, have totally loft. By the fuffrage of reason, and from the expe-

By the fuffrage of reafon, and from the expefrence of nations and ages, we find that the language of a people out of the way of foreign invalions, and unacquainted with the arts of commerce and civil life, has the beft chance of continuing the fame, or at leaft of undergoing the feweft alterations. Remote ifles, fecured by tempeftuous feas, and mountainous tracts of land, environed with rocks, woods, and moraffes, defended by a warlike race of men, and fterile enough to difcourage the avarice or ambition of ftrangers, are the beft means to fix and perpetuate a language.

It is true, no fituation of country can fecure a language altogether from the injuries of time, from the arbitrary power of fashion, and from the common fate of every fublunary thing. Some words must be imported by strangers, fome created by whim. Some will rife out of new discoveries, and in the Galic language.

and others muft be framed to express new ideas conveyed by new objects. Language, in short, even independent of the mixture of nations, muft be in a state of fluctuation. But after all that can be faid to prove the natural and accidental inflability of language, rocks, feas and defarts, ignorance, sterility, and want of commerce, are its best prefervatives, next to valuable books, and permanent records.

WHETHER Wales, Ireland, or the mountainous parts of North Britain, have retained the Celtic the neareft to its original fimplicity, purity, or ftrength, is a queftion which, like all other matters of verbal criticifm, is more amufing than ufeful, and differently refolved by the learned in that way. Of thefe fome have declared for the country firft named, others have determined the controverfy in favour of the fecond, while the third, unfortunate in many refpects, and particularly in its fcarcity of domeftic writers, has been entirely left out of the queftion.

EVERY one knows that the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, had long and bloody contefts with the ancient Kymri. In fpite of all the brave ftruggles they made for liberty, and the honour of their country, it is certain they were enflaved by the first of the nations just mentioned, and brought under total subjection by the last. The intercourse they had with the other two was too inconfiderable not to affect their language in some degree.

THE Norwegians and Danes made ftrong and fuccefsful efforts in Ireland. By them were the principal towns or cities there built. Turgefius and and his army made confiderable acquifitions there, and was cruelly oppreflive. The Eafterlings and Normans could never be totally exterminated out of that country. One of the braveft of the monarchs of Ireland, Brian Boroimbe, loft his life in the famous battle of Cluantarf, fighting againft thefe foreigners. The Hibernian antiquaries are agreed in complaining bitterly that the barbarians of the North made a dreadful havock of their churches, monafteries, feminaries of learning, and books. The wars, commerce, and intermarriages of the Irifh with the Eafterlings, muft have had forme confiderable influence on the language of Ireland.

THE Norwegians and Danes did likewife infeft Scotland for a courfe of ages, made a conqueft of the Weftern Ifles, and erected a principality there, called the Kingdom of Man, as that ifland was the feat of their fmall empire in North Britain. But fome of the Highland diftricts upon the Weftern continent of Scotland were never fubjected to any foreign yoke; nor has the language of thefe diftricts been either exterminated, or till of late corrupted in any confiderable degree, by an intermixture of that tongue which has been prevailing in the more civilized provinces of this kingdom for feven centuries back.

It will be readily granted, that the Irifh and Welfh dialects of the Celtic tongue are more copious than the Galic of thefe diftricts of North Britain which I have juft mentioned. I fhall allow likewife that the two former dialects were better polifhed, and rendered perhaps more harmonious. The countries in which they were fpoken produced many books, and encouraged men of letters. But from from thefe very confiderations, it may perhaps with reafon be inferred, that they receded farther from the fimplicity of the original language than thofe who had neither opportunities nor inclination to refine or enrich it. Is it not certain that one of the academies of France, and the many books publifhed by the members of it, have contributed much to deftroy what they call the old Gaulifh tongue in that country? And is is not equally true, that the modern univerfities of England and Scotland have, together with other caufes; almost totally altered the language brought by the Saxons from Germany, and once common to much the greateft part of the first of thefe kingdoms, and to the most confiderable division of the laft.

Irifb, and Galic languages.

I SHALL not carry the parallel between the Welfh, Irifh, and Galic, much farther. They only who underftand the three languages perfectly have a right to decide in this difpute. Let me only obferve, that the learned author of the Ar-chæologia Britannica, one of the ableft judges the republic of letters has produced, made no feruple to fay, though a Welshman himfelf, that if the Irith, Scotch, and Welfh, are compared with the ancient language of Gaul, the latter will be found to agree lefs with it than the other two. Certain it is that the meaning of many Celtic words which have been preferved by the Roman writers, and particularly names perfonal and local, the fignification of which has confounded the skill of our beft antiquaries, may be eafily difcovered by those who are no more than indifferently converfant in the Galic.

To exemplify the general polition laid down by the author of the Archæologia, the word I/ca, H once

Remarks on the Welch,

114

once fo common in South Britain, Ifca Silurum, Ifca Danmoniorum, Ifca Legi nis Secundæ, and fo on, common, I mean, in time of the Romans, fignifies plainly Water or a River, in the Galic and Irifh. The Welfh have loft the fignification, and almost the use of that word, which is Uifce in the languages just named. and Wyfk in that of the old Kymri. For that reason the learned Cambden was not able to find out the meaning of Ifca, in the names mentioned above. But in all the divisions of Britain were many rivers which had no other names than the general app. Ilatives of Uifk, Avon, Wy and Taw*. In Scotland are many such which are called Efk, though corruptly, to this day. In England are several Avons, and many smaller waters which have wy for their final fyllable, as there is a large navigable one diftinguished by the fame appellative. In the compound

* The largeft tiver in Scotland is called Taw in the Galic, the most noted rivers in Wales are called Taff, and the Thames, the nobleft river in Britain, was undoubtedly called Tamb in the old language of the country. Tamb fignifies the ocean. or great fea, in Galic, and Mor Tauch has the same meaning in the Welfh I am perfuaded that thefe rivers obtained the names now mentioned, becaufe they are ocean like, or feas, if compared to fmaller threams ; just as the Hebrews, and fometimes the Romans, gave the name of a fea to a large collection of fresh water. For the same reason was the Tagus of Lufitania so called; the Taio of the pretent times, a word which comes nearer to the old Celtic name of that river. Here likewife it may be observed that the Durize of the Alpine regions, the Durius of Spain, and the Duranius of Gaul, are ail appellative nouns, derived from the Celtic word Dur or water ; and I add farther, that almost all the targe rivers in Europe have the vocables. Avon. Ifc. or Dur. either in the beginning or end of their names, though much difguited by the inflections of Greek and Roman writers.

Irifb, and Galic languages.

names of South Britain, we often find Ex; for example, Exeter, which answers to E_{jk} of Scotland. In Yorkthire is a rivulet called W_{jke} , and in Monmouthshire is a larger stream which goes under the name of W_{jk} .

CAMBDEN has been at fome pains to prove that the word Braccæ, which was undoubtedly a Celtic one, fignifying a party-coloured garment, is preferved to this day in fome manner by the Welfh, Brati in their language being the fame with foul tattered clothes. The learned antiquary made this remark, together with many more in the grammatical way, to prove that the language of South Britain was of old the fame with that of Gaul. How far he has fucceeded in the comparifon drawn between Braccæ and Brati, I fhall not fay. But in the Galic tongue, the word *Braccan is in common ufe to this day, and the idea affixed to it explains what the Gauls meant by their Braccæ much better than many learned critics had been able to do.

WE are told by Feftus Pompeius, that the father of Roman eloquence, and his anceftors, had the name Tullius from a cataract near the feat of the family. In the Galic, a flood or torrent like that which tumbles down from a cataract, is exprefied by the word Tuille. But I have not been able to difcover that the Welfh have preferved a word of the fame found and import in their language. It is hardly neceffary to observe further that the Gauls were once posselfed of many places in Italy, and must have left many local names behind them, fome of which are extant to this day.

^{*} Braccan is that kind of upper garment used by the Highlanders, which the English call Plaid : it is derived from the adjective Breac, fignifying party-coloured.

To conclude this tedious philological difcuffion : it is certain that many words in ufe to this day in the Highlands of Scotland, were once ufed in common by the Britons of the South, and the ancient Celtæ, though now difcontinued in the language of Wales. From the whole I draw this conclution : that the Welfth may have loft in their language the appellation of Albanich, though once common in their country, in the fame manner that they loft the remarkable vocable Uifc, and many others that could be fpecified.

DISSER-

The Genius, Manners, &c. 117

DISSERTATION. XI.

Of the Genius. Manners and Cuftoms of the Caledonians, Picts and Scots.

THE Caledonians made war their great fludy, and the principal bufinefs of life. Agricul-ture was entirely neglected, or but faintly profecuted, and the commercial arts were hardly known among them. The chace, an exercife manifeftly fubfervient to a military life, was their favorite amufement. A peculiar attachment to the pleafures and advantages arising from fuch a course of life, gave them an uncommon degree of agility, vigour and patience to bear fatigue. Dio fays, that they ran with extraordinary swiftness, and fuftained co'd, hunger, and toil, with an amazing conftancy. Herodian calls the barbarians of North Britain, incomparably brave, and infatiably fond of flaughter. Let hiftory determine, whether they were ever conquered, or whether the Lords of mankind, the Romans, were fo bravely repulfed by by any other nation, except the Parthians of the Eaft, and the Germans of the Weft. *.

 H_{2}

The Genius, Manners, &c.

IT must be allowed, that the particular fituation of the Caledonian territories gave great difadvantages to any enemy that invaded them; and it is alfo certain, that the very fame circumftance inured the inhabitants to all the hardfhips incident to a military life. The people of Numantia, whole dominions were confined within the narrow limits of a few mountains, gave much more trouble to the Roman arms than Antiochus the Great, and the prodigious hoft which he collected on the fertile plains of Afia. The genius of every foil naturally transfules itfelf into the fouls and bodies of its inhabitants. Caledonia was peculiarly adapted to that kind of life which we call barbarous. Its forefts and mountains produced game in abundance. The feverity of the climate, and the rugged face of the country, tended to ftrengthen the body, and inure the mind to hardfhips. Thefe circumftances, however difagreeable they may appear in this age, were highly favourable to that martial fpirit which fublifted among our anceftors; and what would render Caledonia but a poor acquifition to the Romans, was the only means of its defence against them.

* An author, who has done honour to the age in which he lived, as well to the country which gave him birth, has touched this fubject with the ufual felicity of his poetical genius.

Roma fecuri geris prætendit mænia Scotis. Hic fpe progrefilus pofita Carrontis adundam Terminus Aufonii fignat diverila regni, &c. BUCHANAN in Epithalamio Franc. Valef. & Mar. Scot. Reg.

of the Caledonians, Picts and Scots.

IT is impossible to fay, with certainty, at what time the Caledonians began to cultivate the ground. Under the reign of Severus they were abfolute ftrangers to agriculture. They thought, like their Celto-Scytbian brethren of Germany, * "That he "who acquires, with the continual fweat of his brow, what might be purchafed all at once with a little blood, is defitute of fpirit, genius and feeling.—One could more eafily perfuade them to brave all the perils of war, than to toil at the fpade, or wait for the flow returns of Autumn."

THEIR food was the natural produce of an uncultivated country, the flefh of tame animals, venifon, fifh, milk, and the fpontaneous growth of their fields and woods. We cannot believe, on the authority of Strabo, though a very exact and judicious writer, that fome Britons were barbarous enough not to have known the art of curdling milk : nor is it credible that they had an irreconcileable averfion to fifh, though they had it in fuch plenty in their feas and rivers. Solinus relates, that the inhabitants of the Ebudæ lived on milk and fifh only.

It is hardly neceffary to obferve, that the refinements of luxury were utterly unknown to the ancient inhabitants of Caledonia. One of their methods of preparing the flefh of animals killed in hanting, is very exactly deferibed by Mr. Macpherfon, the translator of Oflian's Poems. The fame method was practifed in Ireland. Nor is that fpecimen of our ancient cookery much un-

* Tacitus de mor. Germ. c. xiv.

like

IIQ

The Genius, Manners, &c. .

120

like that which hitherto prevails among the modern Highlanders, on their hunting parties *.

WE learn from Cælar, that the Britons of the South uled brais plates and rings of iron by way of money : it is probable their neighbours of the North adopted the fame cultom. Herodian writes, that they held the laft of these metals in the fame degree of estimation which other nations placed on gold. Virius Lupus, one of the lieutenants or pro-prætors employed by Severus in Britain, purchafed a peace from them with money. Agricola and his troops had probably taught them the use of coin.

* The Scots of the fourteenth century had not degenerated much from the implicity of their foretarhers in the article of living. In the reign of Robert Bluce, Randolph Earl of Murray, and Sir James Douglas, invaded the North of England, at the head of a felect body of men inuted to battles and fatigues. After these adventurers had penetrated farther than Durham, and committed dreadful ravages in their progress. Edward the Third taw the necessity of appearing against them in perfon. " The two armies came at last very close to each other, being divided only by the river Were. They watched each other's motions for leveral days, without coming to a decifive action. 'At length, af er Douglas, with a few men of a proved refolution, had performed an extraordinary feat of prowers, the Scots quitted their camp, and marched off toward their own country. Some of the English, either to gratify curiofity, or in expectation of booty, took a view of the Scottifh camp, and found there three hund ed bags made of raw deer-fkins, with the hair on them, and all thefe full of water and flefh, for the ule of the men. The bags were contrived fo as to answer the defign of kettles. They found likewife a thousand wooden fpits, with meat on them, ready to be roafted. Such was the luxury of the posterity of the ancient Caledonians, at the diflance of little more than four ages back, and fo well was their tafte calculated for a military life. See Euchanan and Abercromby, under the reign of Robert Bruce.

THE

of the Caledonians, Piels and Scots. 121

THE Britons of the South began to underftand the ufe of the mint foon after the Romans came firft among them. There are extant to this day feveral coins belonging to their own native Kings, particularly Cunobiline and Caractacus. The firft of thefe Princes was cotemporary with Auguftus, and the latter with Claudius. If there were any pieces of money coined in North Britain within eight or nine centuries after that period, they are entirely loft or deftroyed.

THE riches of the Caledonians confifted wholly in cattle. The cafe was much the fame in feveral other countries, long after the world had been fufficiently peopled. An ancient author obferves, in his account of Geryon, King of Spain, whom Hercules plundered of his cattle, that in those times herds were accounted the only wealth *. And Varro, the most learned writer of his age, derives pecunia, the Roman word for money, from pecus, which fignifies cattle.

It is after property is long eftablished, and fome degree of commerce introduced, that money becomes the ftandard of wealth among nations. In the beginning of fociety, mankind do not think a piece of metal an equivalent for their flocks and herds. Should I be permitted to give my opinion concerning the origin of coin, I would trace it to that fuperfittion which is inherent in human nature in rude times. The first coin was probably a portable image of a Divinity, which was worthipped by a community. The beauty of the metal, and the facred awe arifing from the figure of a God, first gave value to that kind of medals in the eyes of the favage; and as enthufiafm often gets the better of the love of property, he would not foruple to exchange his horfe, or his ox, for that Icon of the power he adored.

* Juftin. Ep. lib. xliv. cap. 4.

medals

The Genius, Manners, &c.

ty, he would not icruple to exchange his horfe, or his ox, for that Icon of the power he adored. AMBITION has been known, in every flage of fociety, to take advantage of the follies and weakneffes of mankind.—Kings, obferving the reverence paid to thole medals, by degrees fubfituted their own image, inflead of that of the God, and by their authority flampt a value upon what we now call coin. From that time forward money became, as it were, the reprefentative of property; and the great convenience it affords, from the eafe with which it can be carried, made mankind almoft univerfally adopt it as the flandard of wealth. It is probable that the barbarous inhabitants

It is probable that the barbarous inhabitants of North Britain imported the arts of hufbandry from the neighbouring Roman province. The advantages arifing from fo great an improvement would have foon convinced them of their former ignorance: but among men inured to idlenefs, rapine and war, an art, cumberfome at first, and afterwards flow in rewarding the labourer's toil, would have made no very rapid progrefs. WHATEVER may be faid with regard to the

WHATEVER may be faid with regard to the rife and improvement of agriculture in North Britain, it is certain that the inhabitants were numerous, robuft, high-fpirited, and martial, and confequently well fed. They muft have had therefore fome means of fubfiftence, with which we are not thoroughly acquainted *. It has been already obferved, that no country could be better adapted for an uncultivated life than the hills, vallies, rivers, woods and lakes of Caledonia. The inhabitants had no appetites of their own creation to gratify : happy in their ignorance of refinements, and by nature philosophers enough to reft fatisfied with a competency. If their fare was at fome times fcanty, that difadvantage was rendered eafy to them, by parfimony and patience, or was fufficiently compenfated by the absence of luxury in all feasons. Want and toil could never enfecble their bodies, or fhorten their lives, fo much as the exceffes arising from affluence have done elfewhere. All the accounts of antiquity allow, that they were among the ftrongeft, and healthieft, and braveft men in the world.

^{*} See Sir Robert Sibbald's Mifcellanea eruditæ antiquitatis-De Radice Chora.

of the Caledonians, Picts and Scots. 123

In whatever degree the ancient inhabitants of Scotland poffeffed the neceffaries of life, it is certain that they were remarkably hofpitable. Hofpitality is one of thole virtues, which, if not peculiar to, is most commonly met with in a flate of barbarity. It is after property has taken abfolute poffeffion of the mind, that the door is flut againft the ftranger. The Highlanders of our own = time are beyond comparison more hofpitable to ftrangers, and more ready to receive them into their houses, than their more civilized countrymen. Their manner of flewing this generous difpolition may carry along with it, in the eyes of the polite part of mankind, a degree of rudenefs; but it is an honeft rudenefs, and expressive of that primeval fimplicity and goodnefs of heart which they derive from their anceftors the old Caledonians.

"No people in the world, fays Tacitus, indulge themfelves more in the pleafure of giving a kind

The Genius, Manners, &c.

124

kind reception to friends, neighbours and ftrangers, than the old Germans. To drive away the ftranger from one's door, is accounted a groß impiety. Every one entertains according to his wealth; and after the hoft has acted his part generoufly, he directs his gueft to the neareft good family, and attends him thither, without any previous invitation. This intrufion is fo far from giving offence, that they are both received with the greateft franknefs and civility. There is no diffinction made between the acquaintance and ftranger, as far as the laws of hofpitality are concerned *."

ANY one acquainted with the manners and cuftoms of the inhabitants of the Highlands, would be tempted to think the celebrated writer drew this good-natured picture from them. It was once univerfally a cuftom among them, nor is it yet totally difcontinued, to accompany their guefts to their next neighbour's houfe, and there, as it were, to refign them to his care and protection.

So far were the old Highlanders from denying any man the benefit of their roofs and fire-fides, as they express themselves, that many of them made a point of keeping their doors open by night as well as by day. They thought it inconfistent with the rules of honour and hospitality to ask the ftranger abruptly, from what quarter of the world he came, or what his business was. This question could not be decently put till the year's end, if the family in which he fojourned was opulent, and the guest chose to ftay fo long.

^{*} Tacit. De mor. Germ. cap. xxi.

of the Caledonians, Pifls and Scots. 125

IF it is an error to beflow too much praife on the good qualities of our anceftors, it is alfo unjuft to deny them every virtue, becaufe we have taken it in our head to call them barbarous. Some people connect the vices and virtues of mankind with the periods of fociety in which they live, without confidering that what we call the barbarous and polifhed ftages of fociety, equally afford a field for the exertion of the good or bad principles of the human heart.—The only difference feems to be this : Among barbarians the facultics of the foul are more vigorous than in polifhed times; and of confequence, their virtues and vices are more ftrongly marked, than those of a civilized people.

THE old Caledonians were much addicted to robbery and plunder. Their posterity inherited the fame vice through a long feries of ages. Another high crime, of which the Caledonians and their posterity of remote times stood impeached, was, that they had their women, and brought up their children in common. The first of these vices was countenanced by neceffity, the opinion of the times, and the fituation of those who were plundered. Property must be perfectly established, before the loss of it can be hurtful, or an incroachment on its laws is followed by difgrace. Befides, as depredations took place only between different tribes and nations, they may be confidered as a species of war.

WITH regard to the other species of immorality, with which Dion and Jerom * have impeach-

ed

[·] Dion and St. Jerom.

ed the old Caledonians, it is enough to fay, that it is a vice to which the civilized are more addicted than barbarians. It is only when luxury prevails, that irregularities of this kind tranfcend the bounds prefcribed by nature. Chaftity is one of the great virtues of rude life : when the foul is active, it feldom finks into fhameful enormities. Horace has given a very lively picture of thofe impurities which prevailed in his own time, and takes occafion to remark, that fuch criminal gallantries were very far from being fafhionable among thofe Romans who defeated Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and Antiochus the Great.

THE Caledonians and Scots, like the ancient Germans, were remarkable for the virtue of conjugal fidelity: "The men of that nation contented themfelves with one wife each, excepting fome few of their great ones; * nor were the laws of wedlock obferved with greater reverence and ftrictnefs among any people. The nuptial bed was defended on the females fide by an unconquerable modefty, which neither public affemblies, nor private entertainments, nor love epiftles, had any opportunities of corrupting. Among the men, no one made a jeft of vice; nor were matrimonial infidelities called the way of the world +."

THE prejudice of Dion and Jerom against the Caledonians or ancient Scots, concerning their

* Severa illic matrimonia : nec ullam morum partem magis laudaveris. Nam prope foli barbarorum fingulis uxoribus contenti funt, exceptis admodum paucis.

Tac. De mor. Germ.

+ Nemo illic vitia reddet : nec corrumpere et corrumpi feculum vocatur.

Idem ibidem, cap. 19. having of the Caledonians, Pitts and Scots. 127 having their wives in common, has fome plaufible foundation. In those times of remote antiquity, it is very natural to suppose that the Caledonians were not very well lodged. The whole people of the family, with their occasional guests, lay on ruthes, on the same floor, and in the same apartment. This custom, till of late, prevailed amongst the most universal over Britain. If we may judge of the ancient inhabitants of North Britain, by the prefeat rudest part of the Highlanders, this circumstance of sheeping in the same apartment was not preductive of that conjugal infidelity mentioned by Dion and the holy father.

The inhabitants of South Britain were, in Cæfar's time, equally unpolifhed, their domeftic œccnomy much the fame, and their habitations juft as mean as those of the rudest Highlanders. It was natural for a stranger, of any delicacy, who faw the whole family lying together promiscuously, upon one continued bed of rushes, fern, or leaves, to imagine that the wives and children belonged to the males in common. Hence it was, that Cæsar entertained that false opinion of the South Britons: and hence Dion and Jerom's opinion with regard to those of the North. But nothing could have been more rash than the conclusions which they drew from these appearances. The people of Germany lay almost indifcriminately together in the very fame manner *: and we have been already told, by a very intelligent writer, that there was not any country which produced fewer inftances of incontinence.

^{*} In omni domo nudi ac fordidi in hos artus in hæc cerpora quæ miramur excretcunt. Inter eadem pecora in eadem humo, degunt, &c. Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 20.

IT is difficult to fay how far the Caledonians may have employed themfelves in cultivating the powers of the mind. The Druids *, those great teachers of all the other Celtic nations, were fettled among them ; and it may be prefumed that they reafoned like their brethren elfewhere concerning the nature and extent of the universe, the mag-nitude of the celestial bodies, the power of the Gods, and the nature of the human foul.

IT does not appear from hiftory that the Caledonians had any public games, or fchools of war; but it is certain that their defcendants ufed exercifes perfectly fimilar to those of the Greek *Pen-*tatbla. These were leaping, running, throwing the flone, as they express it in the Galic, darting the launce, and wrestling. All these diversions were peculiarly fubfervient to a martial life. And if to these exercises we add that of hunting, it is plain, that though they wanted academies, their military talents were cultivated to very good pur-pofe; and muft have been confiderably improved, before they had any opportunities of engaging an enemy.

IN the Highlands and Islands, where the old cuftoms of the Scots maintained their ground after they had been long abolished in the reformed parts of the kingdom, the most of those exercises were, till of late, held in high repute. They

* The author wrote a differtation on the Druids, and the rites of their religion, which he gave to the late ingenious and learned Sir James M.Donald, Baronet, and was unfortunately loft or miflaid among Sir James's papers.

reckoned

of the Caledonians, Pitts and Scots. 129

teckoned fwiftnefs of foot one of the moft confiderable accomplifhments. Nor was that manner of thinking peculiar to them : Homer feldom forgets to mark out this characteriftical quality of his here: and another eminent poet, in his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, gives a peculiar praife to thofe Princes, on account of their fwiftnefs. In Homer and Virgil, we fee the champions of Greece; Phrygia and Italy, fometimes deciding their fingle combats, and the fate of battles, by throwing of rocky fragments. THE old Britons had recotirfe to the fame ex-

THE old Britons had recourfe to the fame expedient on many occasions. To fit them for this method of fighting, a large round ftone was placed near the gate of every chieftain's house. The ftranger who happened to lodge there, or, if a man of rank, the ftrongest man of his retinue, were regularly invited by the host to try the power of their skill and ftrength on that fort of quoit.

LEAPING was another exercife in great effeem among the Scots of former days. Every chief, who had fpirit enough to fupport the digrity of his name and fortune, kept a band of young and active warriors continually about his perfon, one of whofe qualifications it was neceffary fhould be agility in this kind of exercife. Thefe warriors, or Cathern, were conftantly employed in manly exercifes and recreations in time of peace, and ferved the chief as a kind of body guards. Wreftling was their great and favourite exercife. Boys were inured to it early, and ftimulated to it by prizes fuited to their tafte and paffions. When one chieftain paid a vifit to another, after the firft civilities were over, the wreftlers retained by each came 130 The Genius, Manners, &c.

first to a trial of skill, and sometimes even to blows, unless their masters interposed.

THERE were declared combatants of this profeffion, who went about in queft of adventures, like Amycus, Caftor and Pollux : they no fooner arrived at a hamlet, than they challenged all the inhabitants, demanding a tribute to be immediately paid, or a fair battle, without any favour, as they always exprefied themfelves. There are fome men now living in the Highlands, who have feen thefe knights-errant; and we are told, that one of the moft confiderable chieftains in the Iflands, at the diftance of a few ages back, loft his life in fighting a champion of this order. The wreftler had affronted his whole clan : to vindicate the honour of his name, the chief encountered and overcame him; but by too violent an exertion of his ftrength, he broke a blood veffel, and inftantly expired.

It is well known that the Caledonians, and their defeendants, had a particular dexterity in managing darts of every kind. The Scottifh fpearmen were famous, like the archers of England. The battles fought by thefe two nations, while in a ftate of mutual hoftility, were often decided either by the fuperior fkill of a body of fpearmen of the former, or that of the archers of the latter. Their dexterity in handling thofe weapons muft have defeended to both nations from their remoteft anceftors.

WE are told by Herodian and Dion, that the inhabitants of North Britain ufed the fpear more than any other weapon. The latter adds a circumftance, omitted by every other ancient author: he fays, that there was a piece of brafs, in form of the Caledonians, Piets and Scots. 131 form of an apple, fixed to one end of their fpears, which they fhook, to terrify the enemy with its noife. I have converfed with old Highlanders, who have feen fpears of that conftruction. The name they gave them was Triniframma. The critics are at a lois to find out what the Framea of the Germans may have been *. Tacitus shews that it was a fpear; and it is highly probable that it was contrived like those used by the ancient Caledonians. The Galic name juftifies this opinion. Dion's Brazen Apple was called Cnap-Starra in the language of the ancient Scots, that is, a Bofs; like that on the middle of a fhield; ftudded with nails of brafs +.

* Lipfius, in his notes on Tacitus de mor. Germ. cap. 6.

+ Among the ancient Scots, the common foldiers were called Catherni, or fighting bands. The Kerns of the English, the Kaitrine of the Scots Lowlanders, and the Caterva of the Romans, are all derived from this Celtic word. The Gauls had a word of much the fame found and meaning. We learn from tradition, that these Catherni were generally armed with darts and skians, or durks. These were the weapons which the Caledonians used in Dion's time: The helmet and coat of mail were reckoned incumbrances by that people, according to Herodian; nor can I find out that they were in falhion among their pofterity, till the Danes and Norvegians began to infeft the coafts of Britain and Ireland. It was by these Northern invaders that this heavy fort of armout was introduced into Scotland, together with the weapons commonly called Lochaber axes. Thefe weapons were well fleeled, and extremely fharp, and deftructive in the hands of ftrong men. Those who were armed with fuch axes, and with helmets, coats of mail, and fwords, went under the name of Galloglaich, (by the English called Galloglaffes.) They were generally men of diffinguished firength, and commonly drawn up against the enemies cavalry. The defignation of these foldiers proves, that the Scots and Irish borrowed these weapons from foreignets.

The Genius, Manners, &c.

FROM the obfervations made on the military cuftoms and manly exercises of the Caledonians, and their pofterity, in the more early ages, it may be concluded, were hiftory filent, that they muft have been extremely well trained for war. They were certainly ftrangers to all the polifh of fine life : commerce, its fruits and advantages, were abfolutely unknown to them; nor was a knowledge of thefe arts at all to neceffary for them, as the virtues which they poffeffed are for men in a civilized ftate. When a ftate is invaded, and is in danger of falling a prey to an enemy;—when the freedom and very exiftence of a people are at ftake; the warrior, and not the merchant, is the ufeful and valuable man. Great as the bleffings of induftry and commerce are, they become fatal, when they overwhelm the martial genius of a nation.

The people of North Britain were in a ftate of war and military exertion for a thoufand years after they became known in hiftory. During all that time they had their freedom and fettlements to defend from enemies, foreign or domeftic. The fpirit of the times, a principle of juft revenge, or the laws of necefity, taught them to be warlike, and perhaps barbarous. Romans, provincial Britons, Saxons, Danes, Normans, and Englifh foes, made frequent attempts on their liberty and country. When the Picts and Scots began to difpute for the empire of Albany, there was little room for the arts of peace; nor was it poffible to cultivate them with any degree of fuccefs. After the Picts had been fubdued, the numerous pirates of Scandinavia, for a courfe of three hundred years, difcouraged the Scots from minding the bufinefs.

of the Caledonians, Piets and Scots. 133

bufinefs of agriculture or civil life. Upon the death of Alexander the Third, under whole reign the Norvegians obliged themfelves, by a formal treaty, to abftain from all future hoftilities againft the dominions of Scotland, the kingdom became a fcene of unparalleled miferies. Two fucceflive competitions for its crown, and the cruel ambition of two Englifh Monarchs, every way formidable, converted it into a field of blood and defolation. The felfifh views of two regents, during the long captivity of James the Firft, the long minorities of his fucceflors, their conftant difputes with powerful Barons or Lords, too great to be loyal fubjects; all thefe, and many more unfavourable circumftances, co-operated ftrongly in difcouraging induftry, and in encouraging violence and bloodfhed.

FROM thefe confiderations it follows, that the principal virtues of the nation were of the military kind. High-fpirited, enterprizing, and fearlefs of danger, they were almost continually in the field, carrying fire, fword, and defolation into the territories of the enemy, defending their own against foreign invaders, or fighting the battles of their Kings, Lords and Chieftains, against rebels and competitors.

THOSE among the Scots of former generations who poffeffed the wealth of the times, maintained dignity of character, without pageantry. Their houfes were acceffible to the ftranger and the diftreffed. Though void of fuperb decorations and a dazzling fplendor, they were adorned with numerous bands of bold warriors, who paffed their time in those amufements and exercises I have fo particularly defcribed. £34

THE tables of the o'd Scottifh Lords and Chieftains, however ill fupplied with exotic delicacies, abounded with the true pleafure of entertainment. The real generofity and unaffected complaifance of the open-h-arted hoft appeared configuration every circumftance, and gave the higheft featon-ing to the repart. Next to the glory arifing from martial exploits, the reputation acquired by acts of hofpitality was, in thole ages, effeemed the higheft honour. The bards difplayed the whole power of their poetical abilities in celebrating the hero and beneficent man; and they, in meriting the praifes beftowed by those heralds of fame. The great men emuloufly ftrove to outvie one another in the manly virtues. A portion of the fame noble ambition fell to the fhare of every indj-vidual, according to his rank in life. That is poffibly the happieft period of a nation, when the practice of the generous and martial virtues be-come the amufement and object of every member of a community, in proportion to their refpective fituations *.

It must however be confessed, that the national vices of those times were far from being few, nor can it be denied, that the Scots of our present times have greatly the advantage of their ancestors in many respects. Property is now under the protection of the law; and the civil magistrate possess authority. Agriculture, the most useful of all arts, is studied, and has made great

^{*} In the old Galic there is but one word for a brave and good man, and but one for a land-holder and an hofpitable man; which fufficiently demonstrates the ideas the ancient Caledonians entertained concerning bravery and hofpitality.

of the Caledonians, Piels and Scots. 135

progrefs. Commerce is underftood, and its advantages purfued. The mechanic and manufacturer furnifh their country with feveral commodities, either ufeful or ornamental. Arts and feiences are patronized by fome, efteemed by all, and with ardor purfued by many. Murders, robberies, and all the outrages and barbarities, are unfrequent, and individuals enjoy that liberty which has diffufed itfelf over the whole nation.

Bur notwithfanding all thefe great and effential advantages, a doubt may be raifed. Whether the virtues of our prefent times are more numerous, more fublime, more generous and difinterefted, than those of our anceftors, in the dark ages of barbarism, poverty and confusion? If that question must be refolved in the affirmative, another will immediately rife out of the comparison; and that is, Whether our vices are fewer, or less unnatural?

No reafonable man will deny that commerce naturally produces an infatiable love of gain, and together with that boundlefs paffion, all the arts of circumvention, perjuries, unmanly deceits, and grofs frauds. Avarice and luxury are infeparable companions of riches : nor is it an eafy matter to keep haughtinefs, infolence and impiety at a due diftance from an affluent fortune. The fame ingenious arts which improve the tafte, and polifh the manners, have a tendency to effeminate the foul, fo as to prepare it for flavery. The refinements of good-breeding and infincenity go too frequently hand in hand. Falfe learning may be worfe than grofs ignorance. That philofophy which tends neither to ftrengthen the mind, or improve the happy feelings of the heart, is worfe I 4 The Genius, Manners, &c.

136

than the inftinctive feelings of the foul of the favage.

Upon the whole, it is difficult to prove, that opulent kingdoms poffefs a greater degree of virtue, and confequently of happinefs, than the petty flates from which they rofe. The queftion is of a complex nature, and would require a longer difcuftion than would fuit with a work of this kind. The beft writers of antiquity have declared in favour of what we, with great impropriety perhaps, call barbarous times. Xenophon, towards the end of his Cyropedia, has difcuffed the point with great ability.

DISSER-

A Parallel between the, &c. 137

DISSERTATION XII.

A Tradition preferved by Bede confidered. A Parallel between the Manners and Cuftoms of the Caledonians and ancient Germans.----General Reflections on the Subject.

T was an eftablished tradition a thousand years ago, that the Picts were the original inhabitants of the Northern division of Britain. Bede * fays, in his ecclefiastical history, that they came to Caledonia from Scythia, the European part of which, according to Pliny +, comprehended Germany. The authority of the venerable writer was never questioned on this head; and a belief has ever fince obtained that the Picts were a different race from the Gauls, who possed the Southern parts of Britain. Though the hypothesis of deducing the origin of the Caledonians from the old Germans is improbable, on account of the distance of the two countries from one another, and the fmall progress that navigation must have made in to early a period, yet the opinion of Tacitus * on that fubject, weighed fo much with me, that I examined this fyftem with a good deal of attention.

^{*} Bede, Hift. Ecclef.

[†] Pliny, Nat. Hift. lib. ii, c. 13.

amined this fyftem with a good deal of attention. THE refult was, a parallel which I drew be-tween the manners and cuftoms of the old Caledonians, and those of Germany, as described by Tacitus. I am very fenfible, that all nations in their primæval state are very fimilar in their genius, cuftoms, and manners. Similar fituations will, no doubt, create an identity of ideas. Hunting and war feem to be the fole bufinefs of nations in rude times, and it is no matter of furprize, that there fhould arife, from thefe occupations, a great affinity not only of fome characteriftical cul-toms but even of language. It is not therefore with a defign of ftrengthening the tradition preferved by Bede, that I give this parallel to the public, being perfuaded that a fimiliarity of a few ftriking cuftoms is too feeble an argument for de-ducing the Caledonians from the old Germans, when common reafon declares against a migration of this fort in fuch early times.

THE military character of the Caledonians and Germans were very fimilar. As they fought with the fame fpirit, to they ufed the fame kind of weapons; the fword, dart, and fhield. The fwords of Germany were long and unwieldy +. Thofe of Caledonia were equally enormous. It was this very circumftance that gave a fatal difadvantage to her braveft fons in the battle they fought againft Agricola near the Grampian mountains t.

^{*} Tacit. Vita Agric. c. 26.

[†] Plut. in Mario. ‡ Tacit. in Vita Agric. c. 26.

Caledonians and Germans.

WE are told by Tacitus, that the German fpear was immoderately lorg *; and every one conversant in the history of Scotland must know that the spear used of old in that country was remarkable in point of length.

VIRGIL fpeaks of a weapon properly Teutoric, which he calls Cateia +. All the commentators, down from old Servius, and together with them all the compilers of dictionaries, have miftaken the meaning of that word. Cateia is undoubtedly of a Celtic original, and in the Galic dialect of that tongue, fignifies a fiery dart t. We learn from Cæfar that fuch darts were used by the Perfians, a Belgic nation of German extract ||.

THE compositions of their ancient bards were the only records known to the old Caledonians. In one of these compositions, Cuchullin, the same hero that is so much celebrated in Ossian's poems, is said to have killed his friend Ferda in a mistake, with a dart kindled into a devouring flame by the strength of wind **.

THE Caledonian fhield was flort and narrow ++. That of Germany was contrived in much the fame manner ::. The authority of that excellent

- t Eullet Dictionnaire Celt vol. ii. p. 608.
- Tacit. de moribus Germ.

 That is, by a blackfinith's bellows. The words in the Galic original, are Gathbulig and Craofach-dhearg, words of the fame import with Cxfar's jaculum fervefadum, and Virgil's Cateia or Ga-tie, i. e Gath or Cath, a dart, and tei, of fire. The only difference is, that the Galic words are more poetically turned.

++ Herod. 1 iii. 47.

11 Tacit. An. lib. iii. p 47. Vit. Ag. c. 36.

writer,

^{*} Ann. l. ii. p. 49. Ed Lips.

⁺ Teutonico ritu Soliti torquere Cateias, Æn. vii. v. 740.

140 A Parallel between the ancient writer *, who feems to have fludied the real character of the two nations better than any other, has decided this point.

THE Germans painted their fhields with beautiful colours +. The old Britons adopted that cuftom. The rhimes of our ancient bards speak frequently of fbields ftained with red.

Dio relates that the Caledonians upon whom Severus made war were armed with that fort of dagger, which the Englifh call Durk, and the Welfh, Irifh, and Scots, Bidog. This appears likewife from an antique ftone dug out of the remains of Antonine's wall, and preferved among the curiofities belonging to the univerfity of Glafgow. On that ftone are exhibited two Caledonian captives, and each with a Durk hanging down before him.

I CANNOT fay whether all the Germanic nations ufed this kind of dagger; but the Saxons certainly did, if we may credit Windichindus, an author born of Saxon parents \ddagger ; and it deferves notice, that the picture of a Saxon foldier, as it is drawn by that author, is in every one of its lines like that of a Highlander of the laft age, or genuine Caledonian.

HERODIAN, in his defeription of thefe barbarous nations of Britain, who fought againft Severus, takes occafion to obferve, that they reckoned helmets and coats of mail abfolute incumbrances. The country they inhabited was full of lakes, moraffes, and inacceffible faftneffes, and that was the reafon, according to him, why they ufed no fuch inftruments of defence* But the true reafon feems to have been either a brave contempt for fuch unmanly impediments, or a natural attachment to the cuftoms of their forefathers. The Germanic Nations, in Trajan's time, had very few coats of mail, and fcarce any helmets +. If we go back beyond that period, it may be prefumed they had none at all.

1 See Cambd. Brit. Art. Saxons.

^{*} Tacitus. + Seneca, in Apoiolocynthoifi.

Caledonians and Germans.

UPON a comparison of the weapons used by the Gauls with those of the Germans, it will be eafily found that the difference was very confiderable : and hence fome might infer, that the Caledonians borrowed the fashion of their arms from the latter rather than from the former.

THE fhields of the Gauls were long, and their darts (hort. To prove this affertion feveral paffages might be quoted from ancient authors. But one authority is fufficient; that paffage in the Æneid, where, among a great variety of very beautiful figures, the picture of a Gaulish foldier is fo finely drawn by Virgil \ddagger .

THE armies of the old Germans were made up of feparate tribes. Their battalions confifted of men who had a natural connection with each other, men who had the fame common interest in view, were engaged in the fame pursuits of glory, and strongly cemented by an inviolable attachment to the fame chieftain. Tacitus, who probably

‡ Galli per dumos aderant

Duo quisque alpini coruscant

Gzía manu, scutis protecti corpora longis.

Æneid viii. v. 660, &c.

underfood

^{*} Herod. lib. iii. v. 47.

⁺ Tacit. de mor. Germ. p. 437. Ed. Lips.

A Parallel between the ancient

142

underftood the art of war, as he undoubtedly did the art of thinking juftly, feems to give his hearty approbation to this part of the German difcipline*. "IN a day of battle, fays, that author, the Chieftain thinks it highly difhonourable to yield."

" IN a day of battle, fays, that author, the Chieftain thinks it highly difhonourable to yield. His warriors follow his path in the field with the moft undaunted emulation and vigour. To die for him is their utmoft ambition. But to furvive his death, and to leave him dead in the field, are actions of everlafting infamy and difgrace: The Chieftain fights for victory, the warriors for the Chieftain +."

THE Caledonians of Agricola's time were made up of feveral different tribes, and thefe headed by independent Chieftains or Kings. Galgacus was no more than one of these petty fovereigns. An univerfal monarchy was u known in North Britain till the ninth century; and after that form of government was established there, every diftinct tribe or fmall nation fought, in a day of battle, under its own Chieftain or Lord. These Lords and Chieftains were accounted the common fathers of the nations or communities at the head of which their birth and merit had placed them. They were the great protectors of all, the hope and dread of every individual; and the common center of union, being equally dear to their kinfmen, their vaffals, and their clients. It is natural to believe, without having recourse to hiftory, that their friends and dependents would have rifqued their lives in the fervice of their Chieftains with greater zeal and alacrity than any hireling † Tacit. ib. cap. 14.

foldier

^{*} Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 7.

Caledonians and Germans.

foldier will be apt to do for a Prince who happens to wear an imperial Crown.

AMONG the Germans there was a powerful nation diftinguifhed by the name of Arians, of whom we have the following account. " The Arians are peculiarly fierce, and they fludy to heighten their natural ferocity by the help of art, and favourable opportunities. Their thields are black, their bodies are painted, and they make choice of the darkeft nights for fighting their battles. The confequence is, that by the horrible appearance they make, and by the dreary afpect of their death-like armies, their enemies muft be greatly terrified : nor can any of these fland out againft such new, and one may fay, infernal objects; for the eyes of men are first of all overcome in battles *."

It is needless to fay that the Caledonians painted their bodies like the Arians, and with the fame defign: nor will it be denied that the Britons of the South were once addicted to the fame cuftom. Were we to admit the German extraction of the Picts, we might also fuppose that this cuftom travelled Southward from Caledonia.

It is an opinion generally received, that the firft inhabitants of South Britain came thither from Gaul. The vicinity of the two countries, and that clofe fimilarity which the Romans found in the religion, language and character of the refpective inhabitants of the two countries, are the arguments with which Tacitus endeavours to eftablifh this opinion; and thefe arguments are more than plaufible. But whether the ancient inhabitants of South

^{*} Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 43,

A Parallel between the ancient

144

Britain came in general from the Belgic, Celtic, or Aquitanic division of Gaul, is a point which neither hiftorians nor antiquaries have determined. That they came from the Belgic Gaul is undoubtedly the most probable hypothesis. But should it be fupposed and allowed, that the three several divifions of Gaul fent their feveral colonies into this ifland, it will be difficult to prove that any of these colonies could have imported the fashion of painting their bodies. Their mother country was an absolute ftranger to a cuftom so barbarous when they became first known to the Romans. It is therefore not improbable that the cuftom of painting faces and limbs, to ftrike the enemy with terror, arole first from the superior barbarism of the Caledonians, and travelled Southward to the Britons, who had come in a later and more civilized period from Gaul.

THE inhabitants of the Southern and Northern divisions of Britain must have had fome intercourfe, either in a hoftile or a friendly way. And should it be supposed that the Brigantes of South Britain were more than once intimidated by the horrible figures imprinted on the bodies of their Northern enemies, and of course vanquished in several battles, it was natural enough for them to affume the fame artificial ferocity which had given their enemies for manifest an advantage. The fashion of painting, being thus introduced into South Britain, was probably diffused in a course of ages, over all that part of the island, and the soner fo that it had been- practifed with success by the Brigantes, a people remarkably brave, numerous and powerful. Caledonians and Germans.

SHOULD the fuppolition now made be thought not abfurd, it will be asked in the next place, how this barbarous custom of painting was introduced into Caledonia? It is difficult to fay, unlefs it arofe, as I have faid, from the fuperior barbarity of a people living in a mountainous country. The abettors of the Germanic extraction of the Caledonians might draw a plaufible argument from fo characteristical a cuftom. The Arians of Germany, and the Caledonians of Britain, were men of much the fame character. Each of these nations was wild and ferocious. Each of them took care to heighten their innate ferocity by the help of art. Both nations exerted their whole ftrength of ingenuity, in giving themfelves the most dreadful aspect possible; and to attack their enemy in the night time was one of those military arts which they practifed in common *. It would therefore be a more rational fystem, to derive the original of the Caledonian Britons from the German Arians, than to draw their defcent from the Agathyrfi, according to the opinion of Stillingfleet and Boece t.

* Tacit. ut supra, et in Vita Agric.

⁺ The Agathyfi were fettled in a division of Sarmatia, at no fmall dittance from the fea *. The Geloni, another nation who uted paint in Sarmatia, lay to the Eaft of the Boryfthenes. It is not therefore easy to tuppole that either the Agathyft or Geloni could transmit their cultom of painting, or transport themfelves into Britain. The feas that lay neareft to them, were the Palus Mæotis, the Euxine, and the Baltic: neither can it be reafonably fuppoled that they had any tolerable knowledge of navigation; and if the practice they made of painting was a good foundation for the fitting conjecture made by Boece, a fimilar practice that prevailed among those Ethiopians in the army of Xerxes $\frac{1}{2}$ will furnith any one elfe with another genealogical account of the Caledonians equally authentic.

* Vide Celt. Not. Orb. Ant. in Sarmatia. + Herod, lib. vii. c. 69.

CÆSAR

 $C \pounds SAR$ has drawn a parallel between the Gauls and Germans. Upon comparing the manners and cuftoms of those two great nations with those of the Caledonians, one may easily perceive that the cuftoms of the latter bear a much nearer refemblance to the old Germans than to the Gauls.

"THE Germans, fays Cælar, differ greatly in their manners from the Gauls. They neither have Druids to prefide in religious affairs, nor do they mind facrifices. Their whole lives are employed either in hunting or in cultivating the arts of a military life. They inure themfelves early to toil and hardfhips. They are clad with fkins or fhort mantles made of fur, fo that a great part of their bodies is naked. To agriculture they give little or no attention. Their food confifts principally of milk, cheefe, and fleft. The only perfons among them who have a property in land, are their magiftrates and Princes. Thefe give annually to the tribes and families who affociate together under their protection, as much ground as they think proper, and where they fee moft convenient. In the enfuing year thefe great men oblige their dependents to thift their fettlements."

"WHEN a German nation is engaged in a war, either defensive or offensive, they invest the general to whom they commit the management of it, with a power of life and death. In time of peace they have no public magistrate: the Chiefs of the feveral districts and Clans distribute justice and decide controversies among those under their jurifdiction. Robbery is attended with no degree of infamy, if committed without the territories of the nation to which the robber belongs: nor do these men foruple to affirm before the world, that in order to exercife the youth, and to put a ftop to the growth of effeminacy, that practice muft be not only indulged, but encouraged. In their public affemblies when any of their Chieftains undertakes to go at the head of fuch an expedition, those who give their approbation to his defign rife up before the affembly, enlift themfelves in the fervice, and are app'auded by the multitude. They who break their engagements are reckoned traitors * and deferters : nor do they ever after recover their former honour +."

in

' Caledonians and Germans.

"THE Britons of the North, fays Dio, till no ground, but live upon prey, hunting, and the fruits of the wood. They dwell in tents, naked and without fhoes. They take peculiar pleafure in committing depredations. They endure hunger, cold, and every kind of hardfhip with wonderful patience t."

THE principal lines of this picture are extremely like those of the original we have been just now viewing; and the more we compare the accounts which ancient authors have given of the respective nations, the more we are struck with their fimilarity in genius and manners. Dio has indeed observed that the Caledonians went naked; but it may be prefumed, that he meant no more than that they were poorly clad. This is all that Eumenius, the panegyrift, has faid concerning the

* One would think that $C \approx far$, in this paffage, copied the manners of an American tribe of Indians upon a like occasion. This is the very method ufed by them in their affemblies, when they refolve on a war. There is a wonderful fimilarity between all nations in the first ftage of fociety.

+ Cæs de Bel. Gal. lib. vi. cap. 21, 22, 23.

† Dio, lib. lxxii.

habits

148 A Parallel between the ancient

habits of those Picts who fought against the Britons of the South, before Cæsar invaded this island: and Cæsar himself has told us that those who inhabited the inland parts of Britain in his time were cloathed with skins*. Whatever the opinion of Dio may have been on this fubject, it is certain, that the Caledonians could hardly fecure their lives against the natural severity of their climate, without some fort of cloathing, notwithstanding all their constitutional vigour and acquired hardines.

IT muft be acknowledged that Herodian likewife feems to make the inhabitants of North Britain a naked people. His words are, "Thefe barbarians are ftrangers to the ufe of cloaths, but they trim their bellies and necks with iron trappings, being poffeffed with a belief that iron is ornamental and a fign of opulence, in the fame manner that gold is efteemed by other nations. They mark their bodies with a variety of figures refembling many different animals. For this reafon they take care not to cover their bodies, for fear of concealing thefe figures t.

BUT this author has told us in the paffage immediately preceding that now quoted, that these barbarians were far from being totally naked, the greatest part only of their bodies being fo; and that must in all probability have been true.

THE Greeks and Romans knew very little concerning the habits of the Caledonians, excepting those they wore in a day of battle. Upon such occasions they were indeed very slightly clad, if

cloathed

^{*} Cæfar de Bel. Gal. lib. v. cap. 14.

[†] Herod, lib. iii. cap. 47.

Caledonians and Germans.

cloathed at all. Before the engagement begau they threw away their upper garments, and marched up to the enemy having only a piece of thin ftuff wrapped about their middle. The Highlanders of Scotland inherited the fame cuftom fo late as the battle of Killicranky, in which they fought in their fhirts, having laid by their plaids and fhort coats before the action began. The old Germans behaved in the very fame manner upon fimilar occafions.

THOSE who are very meanly or thinly clad are in common conversation called naked. Agreeable to this usual form of speech, Virgil advises the Italian farmer whether in ploughing or sowing his ground to work naked; that is to fay, without that part of his garb that was no more than a real incumbrance to him *.

BESIDES the fkins of beafts worn by the Caledonians, like the more barbarous inhabitants of Britain and Germany, there is reafon to believe that they imitated the latter in another part of their habit. The Germans wore woollen mantles, and thefe fometimes party coloured, though generally otherwife. A mantle of the latter kind was by the Romans called Sagum, and a party-coloured one either Sagum or Braccæ promifcuoufly. The only garment of an ordinary German was, according to Tacitus, a mantle tacked together with a Fibula, or if that fhould be wanting they ufed a pin t. The Fibula was a buckle or ring made

* Nudus ara fere nudus.

VIRG.

[†] Tegumen omnibus fagum, fibula aut fi defit fpina confertom. Cætera intečti, &c. Locupletiffimi vefte diftinguuntur. Strifta et fingulos artus exprimente ξ of a thin plate of filver, brafs, or iron, with a heedle running through the middle and joined to the buckle at one end. But if the perfon who wore the mantle was too poor to afford the fibula, a fkewer made either of wood or bone was formed to anfwer its ufe. The buckle or fkewer kept the two upper corners of the mantle together.

^{*} Tacit. de mor. Germ. n. 442.

IT must be allowed that the writers of ancient hiftory are filent as to the garb worn by the Caledonians, Picts, and Scots: but in a matter of this kind, we may fafely depend on the faith of tradition, efpecially when fupported by immemorial cuftom, and we are informed by both, that the most ancient inhabitants of North Britain were clad with a Sagum tacked together about the neck with either a pin or buckle. If the Sagum was of one colour, it was called, in the language of the country, Plaide: if party-coloured or ftreaked with different dyes, it was called Breaccan.

VARRO observed that the word Sagum is of Celtic extract. The word Braccæ is so likewise. In the Galic tongue, which is perhaps the most genuine branch of the old Celtic, Saic fignifies a skin or hide. The Germans, like many other uncivilized nations, covered themselves with skins before they began to manufacture woollen stuffs; and as Saic was the name of their original garb, it is highly probable, that after the woollen mantle was introduced in its place, they gave it the well known name of their former covering. This conjecture is so much the more plausible that the form of their mantle was in a great degree similar to that of their old covering.

IF we confult either lexicographers, or the writers of notes critical and explanatory, we fhall find fome fome difficulty in fettling the precife meaning of the word Bracca. But every Highlander in Britain knows that the Bracca was an upper garment of diverfe colours. The very word is to this day preferved in the Galic language, with the addition of only a fingle letter, and, in the fame language, any thing that is party-coloured is conftantly diftinguished by the epithet Breac.

Caledonians and Germans

BLUE was the favourite colour among the Caledonians *, or at least the most prevalent. That their women of quality used blue mantles may be concluded from a passage of Claudian +, as well as from tradition.

THE only or principal difference between the drefs of the males and females was, that the mantle of the latter flowed down to their ankles, as it did among the women of Germany. The use of the Fibula was common both to the men and the women of Caledonia *.

K 4

* Solin. cap. xxxv.

+ Inde Caledonico velata Britannia monfiro Ferro Piĉta genas, cujus veſtigia verrit Cærulus, oceanique æſtum mentitur amictus.

Claud Imprim. Con. Stil.

In this paflage Britain is perfonified by the poet, and is painted in the checks, and clad with a blue mantle in the Piclifh manner. It is hardly poffible to make fenfe of the words without taking them in this view.

I have it from very good authority, that a large filver buckle, once worn by Robert Bruce, King of Scotland, was till of late in the poffettion of Macdougal, of Dunolly, a gentleman in Argylethire. Bruce, after the fatal battle of Methven, found himtelf under the neceffity of flying to the Highlands, attended by only a fmall band of trufty friends. Macdougal, of Lorn, one of the anceftors of the gentleman now mentioned, being in the Englith intereft, attacked that illuftrious Prince in his flight, and overpowered

Ιт

152

A Parallel between the ancient

IT would be no difficult matter to carry the parallel between the Germans and Caledonians much further. Those who have enquired with care into the primæval state of North Britain, will see the comparison in a much ftronger light, upon perusing, with attention, that admirable treatife of Tacitus concerning Germany and its inhabitants. There is certainly a ftrong uniformity between all nations in a barbarous state. The fimilarity must be much more apparent between nations originally fprung from the fame fource. But it evidently appears to any one acquainted with the early hiftory of the Germans and Caledonians, that the conformity between them, in point of cuftoms and national manners, is much more flrikirg than between the Caledonians and Britons *. This feems greatly to favour the opinion of Tacitus, and the tradition preferved by Bede. But it must be confessed, that nothing decisive can be faid on this head, though I intend to do all juftice to the fyftem of the fuppofed Germanic extraction of the Caledonians.

THE great objection against the fystem is, that as in that early period wherein North Britain was peopled, the art of building and navigating veffels must have been either totally unknown, or very imperfectly understood in Germany, it is much overpowered him with fuperior numbers. Bruce performed prodigies of valour, in a narrow pafs where he posted himfelf fingly till all his friends were out of danger; but 'he was forced at length to give way, and in his retreat loft his upper garment, or at least the buckle with which it was fallened. This fouffle in which Bruce was thus worfied, is fung by Barbour, an old Scottifh bard.

* Sir William Temple.

Caledonians and Germans.

more probable that the first inhabitants of Caledonia came rather from the Southern division of the island, than from any part of the Northern continent, at the distance of feveral days failing from any part of Britain *.

THIS indeed is a very plaufible argument, and difficult to be obviated; at the fame time it is not eafy to afcerrain the period of time in which the Germans could first venture to commit themselves, with fafety, to the ocean.

WE know from good authority, that the Suiones of Germany had very confiderable fleets, either in the Baltic or in the Northern ocean, in Trajan's time +; of confequence it may be prefumed, that they knew the art of building and navigating fhips much earlier. The Teutones, who fought against Caius Marius, must have had fome tolerable veffels to transport themselves and their families to Germany from the Northern parts of Scandinavia, when they went upon their celebrated expedition towards the South of Europe. This being the cafe, there is but little abfurdity in fuppoling that the anceftors of the fame Teutones, or of the Suiones, or of fome other maritime nation in the Western part of Germany, might have ventured upon a voyage to North Britain, five or fix hundred years, at leaft, before the Suiones made fuch a confiderable figure at fea in the reign of Trajan. It does not appear that the Gauls underftood fea affairs much fooner than the Germans. If the Phenicians made early voyages to the coast of Gaul, the fame love of gain that carried them thither would have led them likewife to the maritime parts

^{*} Innes, Crit. Effay, p. 71. + Tacit. Lips. p. 450.

parts of Germany; and nothing could hinder the Allemans, any more than the Gauls, from learning the more timple branches of thip building and navigation.

It may indeed be faid that the Gauls might have eafily learned the art of building fhips from the Phocceans of Mailia, who were fettled among them, and confequently might have underftood fea affairs much earlier than the Germans. But South Britain muft have been peopled, if we can judge from appearances, before the Phocceans pofreffed themfelves of the Maililian diffrict of Gaul, an event which happened about five hundred years before the birth of Chrift *.

WITHOUT admitting an early knowledge of pavigation, it is difficult to account how the Belgic Gauls transported themselves into Britain. They certainly could not flow themfelves, their wives, children, and cattle, in Currachs. They muft, in fhort, have veffels of a larger and better conftruction. Should this be allowed, what could hinder the anceftors of those Saxons, Friefians, Normans, and Oftmans, who harraffed the Southern parts of Europe in after ages, from having veffels equally good with those of Gaul, or from making voyages into a country at the diftance of a few days failing ? The Saxons infefted the coaft of Britain under the reign of Diocletian; and if we can give credit to Saxo Grammaticus, the Danes invaded Britain feveral ages before the Roman enfigas were difplayed there. But be that as it will, it is certain that the maritime nations of Germany and Scandia were very bold adventurers at fea, before the Roman empire began to decline, and they may have been fo much fooner, though the Greek and Roman hiftories are filent upon that head.

^{*} Juft. lib. xliii. c. 3.

IF it should be faid, that the first Belgic colonies made their way into Britain in Curachs or boats made of wicker and ox hides, it may be answered, that these Curachs must then have been confiderably larger than those used for many ages by feveral barbarous nations upon rivers and narrow founds. The Belgic colonies who transmigrated into Britain, had originally cattle to carry along with them in their transports : and there is no reason to believe that the ancient inhabitants of Britanny, Normandy, or Picardy, had more skill to build veffels fit for a national migration, or more courage to use them than the ancient inhabitants of Holland, Friefland, Weftphalia, Saxony, or Denmark. It is true, the latter lay at a greater diftance from Britain : But if the Britons of Lucan's time ventured out into the ocean in Curachs *, the old Germans might have likewife done fo. Should they even be too timid or unskilful to make at once a cross voyage to Caledonia, it was always in their power, after coaft-ing the Belgic Gaul and South Britain, to arrive at laft in the Northern division of this island.

FROM the parallel drawn between the Germans and Caledonians, and the obfervations I have made on the fuppofed ftate of navigation in those times, it must be owned that there is fome additional ftrength given to Bede's tradition, and the remark of Tacitus. But after all, the Gaulish defcent of the Caledonians is the moft natural and the leaft liable to objections. In the obfcurity which involves fo early a period, probability muft take place of all arguments drawn from the fimilarity of manners and cuftoms which invariably fubfifts among all barbarous nations; at the fame time, I am actually of opinion, that the Caledonians and Germans defcended originally from the fame Gaulih ftock.

the

^{*} Lucani Pharf. lib. iv. ver. 130, et feq.

THE Gauls who first possessed themselves of Britain, might eafily, at the fame time, fend colonies beyond the Rhine. In a courfe of ages the inhabitants of Gaul, as they poffeffed a fine climate and foil, naturally formed themfelves into regular governments and communities, and made a more rapid progrefs towards civilization than the Celto-Germanic colonies they fent beyond the Rhine, and which, from the nature of the country they possential possible p lonies to Britain. The first colonists, from the preffure of those new comers, gradually migrated to the North, till at laft they polleffed themfelves of the inacceffible mountains of Caledonia. There they not only found fecurity to themfelves but to their original cuftoms and language, which, from the fimplicity of a life fpent in hunting, fuffered very few innovations. The northern Germans, certainly, from fimilar circumftances, gradually had moved towards the Baltic, and had the fame opportunities of preferving the ancient cuftoms and language once common to the great Celtic flock. Thus the refemblance between the old Germans and Caledonians is better accounted for, than from a deduction of the latter from the former in an after age.

a

Caledonians and Germans.

As the Gauls, as I have above faid, made a quicker progrefs towards civilization than their colonies in Britain, and beyond the Rhine, fo their language and manners fuffered a more rapid change. The arts of civil life introduce among mankind a new form of ideas, and of courfe new words and new manners. To this, and this alone, muft be aferibed the difference between the Caledonians, and the Gauls and Britons of the South, in point of the conftruction of their language, and the diverfity of a few national cuftoms.

DISSER-

DISSERTATION XIII.

Of the Degrees and Titles of Honour among the Scots of the Middle Ages. Of obfolete Law Terms in Regiam Majeftatem. Of the Merchetæ Mulierum.

THE Galic dialect of the old Celtic was the common language of the greateft part of Scotland, from time immemorial, down to the eleventh century. The Scots who lay to the South of Clyde and the Forth had, for feveral ages before the æra now affigned, a good deal of intercourfe with the Saxons of Bernicia and Deira. That divifion of Scotland was, at intervals, fubject to a Saxon government *. Some of the Scots Kings were Lords of Cumberland, before their acceffion to the throne, and kept their little courts in that part of England. From thefe circumftances we may conclude, that the Saxon tongue prevailed in the Southern divifion of North Britain for a confiderable time before it croffed the Firth of Edinburgh, in its progrefs to the North.

· Bede.

TOGETHER

Among the ancient Scots.

159

TOGETHER with the language, cuftoms and laws of the Saxons, Malcolm Canemore introduced Saxon or French titles of magittracy and honour, unknown till then in Scotland.

BEFORE that time North Britain, like other unpolifhed countries, may be supposed to have been very defective in its laws. Hector Boece, and fome other Scottish historians, have given the wor'd an abstract of some excellent laws made by Kenneth the Second and Macbeth ; but their authority on this head is extreamly queftionable. There is another body of laws which are commonly attributed to Malcolm, the fecond of that name, who in the year 1004 mounted the throne of Scotland ; but our ableft antiquaries have been much divided on this fubject. The learned Sir John Skene, and Sir James Dalrymple, are politive that these laws ought to be afcribed to Malcolm; but Dr. Nicolfon, Bifhop of Carlifle, Dr. Hickes, and before them, Sir Henry Spelman, contended for fixing them to a later period. I have thrown at the bottom of the page Spelman's own words *. MAL-

* " Skene begins the laws of Scotland with thole of Malcolm the Second. But it is far from being clear that the laws which go ender that King's name are fo ancient. They contain many words and terms which belong to a more modern age: befides, they refer to cuftoms, and names of offices, which belong to a later period. Skene likewife attributes to David the firft thole four books which are initiled, Regiam Majeflatem Scotize. This Monarch, according to his calculation, began to reign in the year of Chrift 1124, or about the twenty-fourth of Henry the Firft. But Randolph de Glanville did not write his treatife concerning the laws and cuftoms of England, till after the twenty-fixth of Henry the Second's reign, that is, not till the year 1180; and they who compare this book of Glanville's, and the Regiam Majeflatem tem of Scotland, will readily find fuch an agreement and fimilitude in them, that they muft conclude one of the two was copied after the other. But I allow others to determine whether we have imported our fyltem of laws from Scotland."

160 Degrees and Titles of Honour

MALCOLM MACKENNETH, or the fecond King of Scotland of that name, was cotemporary with Canute. He was long at war with the Danes and Englifh; and it is not likely that he borrowed thefe titles of honour from either of thofe nations. It is much more probable that his great grandfon Malcolm Canemore imported them from England. In the MacAlpine or MacKenneth laws mention is frequently made of earls *, among the barons. Sir James Dalrymple infers from this circumftance, that we had that degree of honour in Scotland during Malcolm the fecond's reign t.

" If it is impoffible to prove that the feudal law was eftablished in England before the Norman conquest, it is therefore far from being probable that the fame feudal law was known in Scotland about fixty years before that epoch. However ancient the league between the French and the Scots may have been, it may be doubted whether Malcolm the Second had intercourfe enough with that, or any other Continental nation, to learn the conftitution of their government, or to know even their titles of dignity and honour, fo as to transfer them into his own kingdom. It is hardly credible that he could have been the author of those laws which give exact defcriptions of the offices of chancellor, jufticiary chamberlain, fteward of the houfhold, conftable, marifchal, fheriff, provoft, baillies of burghs, together with the privileges and jurifdiction of barons. " The Britons, fays Cambden, difown the name of barons : nor is there any thing faid with regard to it in the Saxon laws. The first mention of this title that I have met with, is in a fragment of the laws made by Canute the Great+" See Spelman's Gloffary, under the words Lex Scotorum.

+ Britannia, under the article, Degrees of all England.

- * Collections, p. 146.
- + Comites.

But

But the argument is not conclusive, till it is admitted that that Monarch was the author of the MacAlpine laws; and if the ancient copy to which the learned knight appeals; be a fufficient authority to ascribe these laws to Malcolm MacKenneth, the old tradition which attributes them to Mac-Alpin, is an argument equally good for making them much more ancient.

EARL is originally a Danifh word, which answers to Conful, Comes and Dux, of the Latin used in the middle ages *. Dalrymple infers, from two or three conclusive authorities, that we had Comites and Vice-comites in Scotland before the reign of Malcolm the Second \dagger . But he allows that this title of dignity was not hereditarily annexed to families, till the time of Malcolm Canemore. The Scots historians accordingly tell us, that MacDuff, Thane of Fife, was the first that obtained the hereditary title of Earl to his family.

BUCHANAN t fays, that there was no title of honour in Scotland fuperior to that of Knight, excepting those of the Thanes and Jufticiaries, before the reign of Malcolm the fecond. But it is not even certain that there were gentlemen of the equestrian order in Scotland fo early # Cambden and Spelden fuppose, that the origin of this dignity must be investigated among the ancient Germans. They quote the following passage from

- * Spelm. Gloff. under the word Eorla.
- + Collect. p. 146.

|| We find no great mention of this order till Malcolm the Third's time. Henry Fits-Emprefs was fent from England to receive the honour of knighthood from David the fon of that Prince.

Tacitus :

[#] Rer, Scot. lib. 6. cap. 52.

Tacitus: "Among the Germans, it is never cuftomary for any man to carry arms till the community have first given their approbation. That done, one of the principal nobility, or the young man's father or relation, adorns him with a shield or javelin, before a public assembly. This ceremony confers the fame dignity among them that the gown does among the Romans. Before their youth receive this houour, they are reckoned only a pair of a private family; but from that day forth they are confidered as members of the commonwealth *"

BEFORE the titles of Barons, Earls, Dukes, Marquiffes and Vifcounts were imported from foreign countries, all the degrees of honour known in Scotland were, as far as I can learn, the King, the Lord, the Tanift, and the Tofhich; together with those belonging to offices, civil and ecclefiaftical. Barons came in with the feudal law. The word Earl is of a Danifh extract; and the language of the Dancs was unknown here till after the middle of the ninth century. Robert the Third created our first Dukes, and James the Sixth our Marquifes, Vifcounts and Baronets.

T_{HE} ancient Scots or Highlanders call the fovereign Ri; the old Britons or Welfh Rbuy; the modern French Roy; the Italians Re; and the Spaniards Rey. From this fimilarity of founds, and identity of fenfe, we may reafonably infer, that the Rex of the Latin is derived from the Celtic, and had originally the fame idea affixed to it which is conveyed by the correspondent names in the feveral dialects of that language.

* Tacitus de mor. Germ. cap. 13.

among the antient Scots.

THE meaning of Ri is a ruler; and among the ancients the idea of defpotifm was not annexed to regal government. This opinion only obtained in the Eaft. The Celtic nations limited the regal authority to very narrow bounds. The old Monarchs of North Britain and Ireland were too weak, either to controul the pride and infolence of the great, or to reftrain the licentioufnefs of the populace. Many of thofe Princes, if we credit hiftory, were dethoned, and fome of them even put to death by their (ubjects; which is a demonftration that their power was extremely circumfcribed. They were not in poffeffion of treafures, to keep flanding armies, or to corrupt thofe whofe avarice might induce them to be inftruments of tyranny.

NEXT to the King were those great landholders who are called Lords in English, Lairds in Scotch, and Tierna in the ancient Galic. It it very probable that the Galic Tierna, or the Welch Teyrn, was the first title of supreme dignity among the Celtic nations *.

THE Highlanders and Irifh frequently addrefs the Supreme being under this name, and hence it may be concluded, that their anceftors had no conception of power fuperior to that of the Tierna. From the fame confideration we may likewife infer, that originally every one called Tierna was an independent Prince. It was only after many fuch Lords had become the vaffals of mightier ^{*} Tictna is derived very probably from Ti, The one, by way of eminence, and Ferran, Land. Ferran, in the oblique cafe, produces Eran. So that Tierna is the fame with Tieran, A man of land, or a great proprietor of land.

Degrees and Titles of Honour

164

Princes, that this name was given to perfons in a ftate of fubordination. As the Romans formed their Rex out of the Celtic word Ri, fo the Greeks derived their Tepenos from Tierna. The word Tyrant was originally no more odious, in the language of that nation, than King is in that of England. It were an eafy matter to flow that fome excellent Princes were ftiled Tyrants in Greece, and agreeable to that mode of expression in ancient times, Æneas gives the very fame title to the good old Latinus.

The third name of dignity among the Scots of ancient times was Tanift, or Taniftear. This word has been confounded with Thane, which occurs frequently in the hiftory of Scotland. Buchanan fays, that before the reign of Malcolm the Second, Thane was the higheft title immediately after that of King His explication of the word is, the Governor of a country, or the King's Lieutenant in a certain division of his dominions *. Every one conversion in the hiftory of Scotland has read of Banquho, Thane of Lochaber, MacDuff, Thane of Fife, and Somerled, Thane of Argyle. THE appellation of Thane was known in Eng-

THE appellation of Thane was known in England, and common there for feveral ages: nor was it difcontinued till after the Norman conqueft. In the Saxon tongue, Thane, Theger, and Tain, fignified a Servant or Minifter †.

THE Irifh had their Tanift; and in their language the meaning of that word is, the fecond perfon, or fecond thing t. It is not probable that they ^{*} Præter Thanos hoc est præfestos Regionum. Buchan. in Milcolm.

+ See Lhoy i's hifh Dictionary.

⁺ Spelman's Gloffary, under thefe words.

among the ancient Scots.

they borrowed the title from the Englifh, as, notwithftanding of Bede's allegation concerning the friendly difpolition of the Irifh towards the Saxons of the fixth and feventh centuries, they had a mortal averfion to the Englifh; and before the conqueft of Ireland by Henry the Second, the title of Tanift became obfolete : it may therefore be prefumed that Tanift is an ancient Galic word.

IN the fettlement of fucceffion, the law of Taniftry prevailed in Ireland from the earlieft accounts of time. " According to that law, fays Sir James Ware *, the hereditary right of fucceffion was not maintained among the Princes or the Rulers of countries; but the ftrongeft, or he who Kulers of countries; but the throngett, of he who had moft followers, very often the eldeft and moft worthy of the deceafed King's blood and name, fucceeded him. This perfon, by the common fuffrage of the people, and in the lifetime of his predeceffor, was appointed to fucceed, and was called Tanift, that is to fay, the fecond in dignity. Whoever received this dignity, maintained him-felf and followers, partly out of certain lands fet apart for that purpole, but chiefly out of tributary impositions, which he exacted in an arbitrary manner; impositions, from which the lands of the church only, and those of perfons vefted with particular immunities, were exempted." THE fame cuftom was a fundamental law in

THE fame cuftom was a fundamental law in Scotland for many ages. Upon the death of a King, the throne was not generally filled by his fon, or daughter failing of male iffue, but by his brother, uncle, coufin-german, or near relation of the fame blood. The perfonal merit of the fuc-ceffor,

^{*} Antiq. and Hift, of Ireland, chap. 8.

ceffor, the regard paid to the memory of his immediate anceftors, or his addrefs in gaining a majority of the leading men, frequently advanced him to the crown, notwithftanding the precautions taken by his predeceffor.

THE hiftory of the Saxon heptarchy, or that of the English monarchy, down to the time of the conqueft, fhews, that the law of Taniftry was very often the rule obferved in the fucceflion of Sovereigns. No great regard was paid to hereditary right: the King's brother was frequently preferred to his fon; a baftard Prince fometimes took place of a legitimate one; and the will of the laft reigning Sovereign had more than once excluded the lineal heir.

It is plain that the law of Taniftry had a natural tendency to embroil families, countries and kingdoms. In all the places where it prevailed, domeftic feuds, provincial infurrections, and national wars, muft have been unavoidably frequent. But as the Scots and Irifh, and almoft every other Celtic nation, made arms the great occupation of life, they thought it highly inexpedient to intruft the direction of the ftate to infants, minors, or unexperienced youths. With them it was the moft effential confideration to have a brave and difinterefted Prince, who had been inured to war, and who could lead them into the field, infpire them with fpirit, and fupport them with conduct. They confidered the King at once as the fubject and leader of the community.

with conduct. They confidered the King at once as the fubject and leader of the community. IN Ireland the law of Taniftry not only determined the regal fucceffion, but likewife extended to every great effate poffeffed by a fubject. The Lord of every country, and the Chief of every

Seps

among the ancient Scots.

Sept was fucceeded, not by his fon or next heir, but by the Tanift, who was elective, and who frequently procured his election by force of arms*. In Scotland the cafe was much the fame, till the eftablifhment of the feudal law, and in fome places long after that period

In the Highlands and Weftern Ifles the Tierna's next brother claimed a third + part of the eftate during life, by virtue of a right founded on an immemorial cuftom. It is not above two hundred years back fince the Taniftry regulation, and the diffutes confequent upon it, prevailed in the Highlands. There have been fome inflances of it much later.

TOSHICH was another title of honour which obtained among the Scots of the middle ages. Spelman imagined that this dignity was the fame with that of the Thane \ddagger . But the Highlanders, among whole predeceffors the word was once common, diftinguish carefully in their language the Tofbicb from the Tanifair, or the Tierna. When they enumerate the different claffes of their great men, agreeable to the language of former times, they make use of there titles, in the fame fentence, with a disjunctive adverb between them.

IN Galic, Tus, Tos, and To/kich, fignify the beginning, or the fir/t part of any thing, and fometimes the front of an army or battle \parallel . Hence the Name To/bich \P ; that is to fay, the General,

The Moguls or Calmachs give the name of Taifba to their heads of tribes, and that of Contaifba to their Great Chan.

167

Can

^{*} Sir John Davis's Hiftor. Relations of Ireland.

⁺ Trian Tiernis.

t Spelm Gloff under the word Thane.

^{||} See Lhoyd's Irifh Dictionary.

168 Degrees and Titles of Honour

or Leader of the van. The interpretation now given of the word Tofhich is confirmed by the name of a confiderable family in the Highlands of Scotland—the clan of M'Intofh, who fay, that they derive their pedigree from the illustrious Mac Duff, once Thane, and afterwards Earl of Fife. MacDuff, in confideration of his fervices to Mal-

Can itfelf is the fame with the Caen of the Galic, fignifying Head, and metaphorically the head of a family ; fo that Cantailha, or grand Chan, would be expressed by a Highlander Cantoilbich. Here it is worthy to remark the connection between the old Mogul or Tartar language and the Celtic. This connection offers fome kind of pretumption that they fprung from the fame oti-ginal flock. The great river Oxus, called by the Tartars Am, which, rifing in mount Imaus, once difcharged itfelf in the Cafpian fea, but now, having changed its courfe, falls into the lake of Aral, naturally divides Afia into almost two equal parts. The Tartars, and fome other Eaftern nations, called that divifion which lies to the South-weft Iran, that to the North-eaft Turan, which are plainly Celtic words. Iran is compounded of Iar, South-west, and ran, division ; and Turan, in the fame manner, is composed of the two words Tua and ran, which fignify the Northern country or division. See Abul Ghazi's Hift. of Tartary, vol. ii. p. 541.

It were easy to pursue the finilarity between the Tartar and Celtic languages much farther. I shall give one other instance. The great Zingis Chan, first Emperor of the Moguls, being one day hunting, and perceiving a folitary tree, exceeding tall and beautiful, he ordered his fons to inter him under it, after his death; which they accordingly executed with all the requisite ceremony. There grew, in time, fuch beauti ul trees about the tomb, and in such numbers, that an arrow, shot from a bow, could hardly find a passing through them. From that circumftance, they have given to that place the name of Barchan Calin; and all the Princes of the posterity of Zingis Chan who fince then died in those provinces, have been interred in the fame place. Barchen Caltin is perfectly understood by every Scots Highlander: it fignifies a beautiful thicket of birch and hazel trees.—Hist. of Tartary, vol. ii. p. 145.

çolm

among the ancient Scots.

colm Canemore, obtained a grant, which gave him and his heirs a right of leading the van of the royal army on every important occasion. The Chieftain of the clan that is descended from this great Earl is stiled Mac in Tofbicb in Galic, that is to fay, the Son of the General.

OCHIERN, or Ogetharius, is another title of honour mentioned in the ancient laws of Scotland. Spelman, copying after Skene, fays, that the Ofchiern is a perfon of the fame dignity with a Thane's fon; becaufe, in the laws of Regiam Majeftatem, the marcheta of a Thane's daughter is equal to the marcheta of an Ochiern's daughter *, as the Cro of a Thane was the fame with that of an Ochiern. The word is undoubtedly a Galic one, contracted from Oge-Thierna, that is, the young Lord, or heir apparent of a landed gentleman. It is likewife not improbable that the Thane of our Regiam Majeftatem is the Tanift, or the perfon who poffeffed the third part of a great Lord's effate +.

THE Brebon or Brithibh, may be ranked, without any impropriety, among the old Scottifh titles of honour. The Brehons were, in North Britain and Ireland, the Judges appointed by authority to determine, on flated times, all the controverfies which happened within their refpective diffricts. Their courts were ufually held on the fide of a hill, where they were feated on green banks of earth. Thefe hills were called mute hills. It may be prefumed that the Brehons were far from being deeply fkilled in the intricate fcience of the law, which they profeffed. By converfing with the ecclefiaftics in their neighbourhood, they learned fome fcraps of the canon law, but knew little or nothing of the civil. The cuftoms which prevailed in the land wherein they lived, and the opinion of the times, were generally their rules of decifion. The office belonged to certain families, and was tranfmitted, like every other inheritance, from father to fon. Their ftated falaries were farms of confiderable value.

^{*} Two kids, or twelve pennies.

⁺ Ogetharius is derived from Oig-thear, that is, a young gentleman.

By the Brehon law even the most atrocious offenders were not punished with death, imprisonment, or exile, but were obliged to pay a fine, called Eric. The eleventh or twelfth part of this fine fell to the Judge's share: the remainder belonged partly to the King, or Superior of the land, and partly to the person injured; or if killed, to his relations.

WE learn from Tacitus, that the fame cuftom prevailed among the ancient Germans. After he had obferved that they hanged traitors and deferters on trees, and that perfons, either cowardly or infamous for impurity, were drowned in miry lakes, he adds, " Men guilty of crimes lefs fcandalous, were, upon conviction, fined in a number of cattle. A part of this fine was paid to the King or common-wealth, and another portion of it was given to the perfon injured, or to his neareft friends."

IN Scotland the fame cuftom prevailed, till within three or four hundred years ago, and in fome divisions of it much later. In our laws of Regiam Majeftatem, we find it enacted, That one who, riding through a town, rides over and kills

among the ancient Scots.

any of the inhabitants, is to pay a proper ranfom, no leis than if he had wilfully deftroyed him *. The name given to the ranfom in the law is Cro and Galmes. The Cro of every man is afcertained, in the fame inftitutes, according to his quali-ty or birth. The Cro of an Earl is one hundred and forty cows. The Cro of an Earl's for, or Thane is an hundred cows. The Cro of a plebeian, or villain, is fixteen. The Cro, Galmes and Enach of all other ranks and orders of men are particularly defined in those laws

SPELMAN has judicioufly remarked, that thefe three barbarous words are of Irith extraction. But he did not recollect that the Galic of Scotland was much the fame with the language of Ireland, and that the words were originally British. They certainly had once a place in the law of Scotland, though their true meaning has not been yet fettled. The wealth of the ancient Scots, especially towards the North, confifted folely in cattle. In the language fpoken there, Cro fignifies Cows, and Croo a fheepfold or Cow-pen. Agreeable to this explication of thefe two terms, a murderer is ordered by our old laws to pay the Cro of the perfon whom he had killed, that is, to pay the stated equivalent for his life, in cattle taken out of the flayer's pen or fold.

GALMES is a Galic word, and means a Pledge, or Compensation for any thing that is carried away or deftroyed +. In the fame language, Enach ftands fometimes for the English word Bounty, and fometimes for an Estimate or Ransom.

Regiam Majeft. lib. 4. cap 24.
 † Gial, in the Galic, is a Pledge, and Meas an Effimate.

172 Degrees and Titles of Honour

CRO, Galmes and Enach are perhaps fynonimous terms, according to the common language of the Scottifh law, which is full of fuch tautological expressions. If there is any real difference between these words in the case before us, they fignify three diffinct fines; one payable to the King, or Superior of the perfon flain; another to his children; and a third to his Cinea, or the tribe to which he belonged. Agreeable to this diffinction of fines, the old Saxons of England obliged murderers to pay three different ranfoms, the Fredum to the King, the Wergelt to his family, and the Linebate to his kinfmen *.

KELCHYN is another term in the old Scottifh law, to exprefs a mulct due by one guilty of manflaughter. In our Regiam Majeftatem +, the Kelchyn of an Earl is fixty-fix cows and two thirds; the Kelchyn of an Earl's fon, or of a Thane, is forty-four cows, twenty-one pence, and two thirds of an obulus or bodle; the Kelchyn of a Thane's fon is by a fourth part lefs than that of his father; and the law adds, that a fwain, or perfon of low degree, is to have no fhare of the Kelchyn.

THE learned Sir John Skene obferves, that in the ancient language of Scotland, Gailchen fignifies a pecuniary mulct, to which one is made liable, for a fault or crime. Spelman differs from him only fo far as to think the word an Irifh one. Skene's conjecture is partly juft, and partly otherwife. The Kelchyn was a mulct, but not always a pecuniary one, not payable for every fault or crime. We fee the Kelchyn of an Earl is fixtyfix cows, and two thirds of a cow. This fine belonged to the kinfmen of the perfon killed *, but to those only of principal note among them.

^{*} See Spelman, under thefe words.

[†] Reg. Majeft. lib. 4. cap. 38.

In the old Scottifh law, with regard to the fine paid by the murderer of an Earl, this Croo is declared to be one hundred and forty cows, and every cow priced at three Oræ. In a law of Canute the Great, quoted by Spelman +, fifteen Oræ, or Horæ, are made equal to a pound : and fuppofing the Englifh pound of those days to have been twelve times as much as the Scottifh one, and the Oræ of both nations the fame, the pecuniary value of one cow would have been about five fhillings fterling. But fhould one fuppofe that the Ora of North Britain was to that of the Southern division, what the pounds, fhillings and pence of the former are to those of the latter, the price of a cow in Scotland was, at the time of compiling the Regiam Majeftatem, proportionably low.

It is certain that money was extremely fearce in Scotland during the reign of King David the Firft. But as we cannot well imagine that a full grown cow was fold for the fmall trifle of fivepence in that period, and as it is not in any degree probable that the price of it could have rifen to five fhillings fterling, we have here one proof, together with many more, from which it may be evinced, that the laws of Regiam Majeftatem were framed in the time of David the Second, and not in the days of the firft Scottifh King of that name.

* Kelchyn fignifies, paid to one's kinimen, and is derived from Gial and Cinnea.

+ In voc. Ora.

In that part of Regiam Majeftatem which afcertains the different Merchetæ Mulierum, the Vacca, or large Cow, is valued at fix folidi, or fhillings. The real amount of that folidus cannot well be determined. If an Englith one, the price of a cow is confiderably greater than the effimate already given : if a Scottifh, it finks down to a finall matter.

As I have entered upon the explication of law terms, it is proper to give fome folution of one of them, which, as it is now underflood, leaves a reproach upon our anceftors. The meaning of Mercheta Mulierum is, according to fome, founded upon a cuftom which did great dithonour to the ancient civil government of Scotland.

Some of our buft hiftorians give the following account of the introduction of the Merchetæ Mulierum among the ancient Scots. Evenus the Third, a King of Scotland, cotemporary with Augustus, made a law, by which he and his fuccessfors in the throne were authorized to lie with every bride, if a woman of quality, before her hufband could approach her : and in confequence of this law, the great men of the nation had a power of the fame kind over the brides of their vaffals and fervants. We are told further by the fame grave and learned hiftorians, that this law was ftrictly observed throughout the kingdom ; nor was it difcontinued or repealed, till after a revolution of more than ten whole centuries. It was near the end of the eleventh age, that the importunities of St. Margaret prevailed with her hufband, Malcolm Cane-more, to abolith this unjuftifiable cuftom. From that time forward, inftead of the fcandalous liberty given to every Superior by virtue of Evenus's law law, the valial or fervant was impowered to redeem the first night of his bride by paying a tax in money *. This tax was called Merchetæ Mulierum.

Of the Merchetæ Mulierum.

I KNOW not whether any one has been hitherto fceptical enough to call the truth of this tale in queftion, though it wears the face of abfurdity and fable: Twenty moral demonstrations conspire in rendering it absolutely incredible.

EVENUS, the fuppofed author of the law, is no more than an imaginary being. Boece and Buchanan, with all their hiftorical knowledge and induftry, knew juft as little concerning the Princes of Caledonia, coeval with Auguftus, and of the laws established by them, as the other learned men of Europe knew with regard to the Emperors of Mexico before the time of Fernando Cortez.

It is impofible to prove that any confiderable division of Caledonia was governed by a fingle Monarch in the Augustan age. But were it true that the cafe was otherwife, and alfo certain that Evenus reigned in the Western parts of North Britain in that very epoch, it is not credible that the Scots of that age would have granted fo very extravagant a prerogative to their King, or fo very uncommon a privilege to their nobility. In those early times men were too fierce and intractable to crouch under a burden fo infupportable. To a people of spirit, a total extinction of freedom and property, in every other instance, would have been a much easier yoke than the flavery, oppref-fion and difgrace attending fo very fhocking a profitution of their wives, daughters and kinfwomen. But had even the lower people of Scotland been the moft abject of all flaves, and uncommon patterns of paffive obedience, it cannot be fuppofed that all the nobility, from age to age, would have practifed the doctrine of non-refiftance, in fuch an amazing degree of perfection, as to permit their Sovereign to violate their honour in fo heinous a manner. We know that many Princes, befides Tarquin, were dethroned, banifhed, and cut to pieces, for attempting the chaftity of women. And we may fafely affirm, that the moft defpotic King or Sultan in the Eaft would fall a facrifice, fhould he endeavour to effablifh the law of Evenus in that country, which has always been the fcene of the fevereft exertion of arbitrary power.

^{*} Boece fays a merk of filver, Buchanan half a merk.

176

Some may fay, that the manners and opinions of men are greatly changed. But human nature was always, and will ever continue the fame, in the matter now under confideration. In vain will it be faid, that the Scots, through a long habit, became reconciled to this ignominious cuftom. The Scots certainly were not more pative than the other brave nations of the world : and the hiftory of mankind does not exhibit a fingle inftance of fuch brutal infenfibility in any nation.

THE fatyrical Gildas, who had entertained the most violent prejudices against the Scots, would not have omitted fuch an opportunity of declaiming against them, with his usual acrimony. Bede himself, though a writer of much greater humanity and moderation, would not have overlooked fo remarkable a part of their character, especially as he impeaches them, more than once, of other immoralities. It would have been more to his honour to have animadverted feverely on fo flagitious a practice, than to arraign them fo frequently of heterodoxy, for a pretended error in the trivial affair of Eafter.

ally

If we confider the jealoufy natural to women, it is highly improbable that the queen of Malcolm Canemore was the firft royal confort in Scotland that would have folicited her hufband for a repeal of this infamous law. In the courfe of more than a thoufand years, which intervened between the pretended Evenus and Malcolm, there were no doubt many Queens whofe influence with their hufbands might have abrogated this lafcivious inflitution. — The flory altogether wears fuch a face of improbability, that it is aftonifhing how it ever became the fubject of tradition itfelf, and much more that it has received the fanction of hiftorians.

It is however certain that the Merchetæ Mulierum were once paid in Scotland, and authorized by law. But this imposition was not peculiar to that kingdom. The Merchetæ Mulierum were, properly speaking, pecuniary fines, paid by the vasial and fervant to his lord and mafter, upon the marriage of his daughter, or paid by a widow upon a reiteration of nuptials: and this custom obtained in every part of Britain, though with fome variation.

I CANNOT determine whether the brides of England or Wales were liable to this tax before the conqueft; but in the reign of William the Norman they certainly were. "A woman faith. Domefday book in what ever way the came by M a hufband, gave twenty fhillings to the King, if a widow; but if a maid, ten only "." That the grievance arifing from this hard law was univerfal, or at leaft very general, may be juftly concluded from different articles of the charter granted by Henry the first, and from the famous Magna Charta of King John.

In the lourth article of Henry's charter are the following words : " If any one of the Barons, or of the other vaffals that hold immediately of me, fhall incline to give his daughter, fifter, niece or kinfwoman in marriage, let him fpeak to me on that fubject : but neither fhall I take or receive any thing from him for a marriage licence, nor shall I hinder him from disposing of the woman as he pleafes, unlefs he beftow her on my ene-my †."

FROM the immunity given in thefe words, and from the preamble of the charter, one may naturally infer, that the law of the Merchetæ had formerly prevailed in every part of England, ex-cepting the fingle county of Kent. After King John had given the great charter of liberties to the Barons, and after that ineftimable right had been confirmed by his fon, grandfon, and great grandion, we find, that not only villians, or the loweft clafs of people in England, were obliged to pay this fine, but those too who held their lands in free foccage t. The fine was called Merchetum or Maritagium there, as it went under the name of Mercheta in Scotland.

Iτ

^{*} Spelman in voc. Maritag.

[†] Matth. Paris, p. 55.
‡ Spelman in voc. Soke manerio.

Of the Merchetæ Mulierum.

179

It can fearcely be doubted that the feudal inflitutions of Scotland came originally from England. The general iprit of feudal laws, and the manner in which they are expressed, afford almost a demonstration on that head. Malcolm Canemore had lived long in England, and owed very great obligations to that country. His Queen was a Saxon Princes, and English exiles were the great favourites of both. Malcolm's chi dren had an English education; and after that period of time, the English language, the English system of = ligion, the English drefs, and the English law, became fathionable in Scotland. Hence it may be inferred, that the old Scots stood obliged to their neighbours for the Merchetæ Mulierum, and not to Evenus, their ideal King.

WE have no caufe to believe, whatever our hiftorians affirm on that head, that Queen Margaret eafed the Scots from this opprefive tax. In Regiam Majeftatem, the Merchetæ payable by an earl's daughter is no lefs than twelve cows, and was a perquilite which belonged to the Queen. The Merchetæ due by a Thane's daughter fell to the fuperior, and was no more than a fingle cow, and twelve pence, which fell to the collector's fhare. The Merchetæ of every woman, whether virgin or widow, is determined by our oldeft inflitutes, and the fine payable to the Queen was by far the moft confiderable.

It is very evident that Boece and Buchanan miltook the origin and true meaning of the Merchetæ. According to the former, a Mark of filver was the compensation demanded by Malcolm Canemore for the first night of the bride; a privilege to which he and his nobles had an equal M 2 right. right. But according to Buchanan, the very half of that pecuniary tax was all that could be required, or was given. It is ftrange enough that thefe two authors could have differed fo widely in this matter; and it is equally fo, that they imagined the fame fum precifely was exacted from every woman, whether of high or low rank, and whether a maid or a widow. From this circumftance it may be juftly concluded, that neither of thefe hiftorians examined the old laws of their country*.

* With regard to the etymon of the word Mercheta, or Merchetum, none could be more improper than that offered by our learned countryman Skene. It carries indeed too much immodefty in it to be laid before any delicate reader. It is very probable that the tax under confideration was paid in England before it was impoled in Scotland. We should therefore look out for the true etymon of the Mercheta in England. The Merchetum was furely a pecuniary fine, and amounted at first to a Mark, Thofe who have fludied the history of ancient coins know very well that Marks of filver and gold bore very different values in different countries, ages and nations \uparrow . The English Mark confisted of thirteen shillings and four pence flerling. The Mark of Scotland was no more than a twelfth part of that fum. The Burgundian ounce was the eighth part of a Mark; and a Scottifh Mark was juft an ounce. The Danish Mark feems to have been equivalent to two denarii, or two pence; and in some countries the Mark was equal to eight ounces. In fhort, whatever the original amout of the Merchetum may have been, in all probability its etymon muft be Marca, Marcba, or Marcbata, three words of the very fame meaning.

† See Spelman, under the word Marca.

DISSER-

DISSERTATION XIV.

Of the Bards.

A MODERN writer of fome eminence has attempted to prove that religion was the true fource of poetry. According to him, it was very natural for a perfon who poffeffed a warm imagination and a good heart, after contemplating the marvellous works of that Great Being who is the Creator and Sovereign Lord of the univerfe, to feel the ftrongeft emotions of admiration, gratitude and love. Filled with the idea of this grand object, he would foon endeavour to express the awful impression he felt in language. Words falling thort of his conceptions, he would ftrive to fupply that want with the tuneful founds of fome mufical inftrument. Delighted with the harmony of agreeable founds, he would exert his whole ftrength in adding to his vocal praifes the fame numbers, measure and cadence, which had been expressed by the action of his hands, in playing on the inftrument*.

M 3

We

^{*} Rollin, Bell. Let. Vol. I book ii. art. 1.

WE are told by the moft ancient of all hiftorians, that the harp and organ were known in a very early period, and it is natural to think that there had been fome poetical compositions before Tubal invented those inftruments. Vocal mulic was certainly prior to the invention of inftruments of mulic. There is no reason therefore to fuppose but the numbers, measures and cadence of verse, were known before words were adapted to the tone of an inftrument.

THE moft ancient fpecimens of poetry now remaining were dedicated to the honour of the divinity. The two fongs of Mofes, and that of Debora, are entirely in that ftrain. The praifes beftowed on men and women in the latter are introduced epifodically, and have a manifeft reference to the main fubject. The lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan is in a different ftile. Religion has little or no concern in it. The heroic exploits and untimely fate of thefe two great Princes make the whole burthen of that fong.

WE may take it for granted, that the art of of verfification was known and much practifed before Mofes wrote his triumphal ode. But whether the first poetical effay was employed in the fervice of God or in honour of fome great man or wonderful natural object, it is impossible to fay. Poetry is the triumphant voice of joy or the broken fighs of forrow and melancholy. The extreams of those passions are moss violent in the earlieft stage of fociety before the faculties of the human mind are regulated by advanced civilization, the feelings of the heart are fitrong : and ftrong feelings always produce that sublimity of expression which which we call poetry. The variety of the life of the favage affords him opportunities of viewing natural objects in their moft awful and ftriking form; therefore even his common converfations are expretilive of the deep imprefilions of his mind, and his language is metaphorical and ftrong. In advanced fociety, the cultivated ftate of the mind gives rife to abftracted ideas, which are too jejune and ill underflood to conflitute that fublimity of exprefilion which is fo remarkable in the poetical compositions of early ages.

THE poets of the Celtic nations were univerfally called bards by antient writers. The bards celebrated in verfe the great actions of heroes, and men of high dignity and renown. Without encroaching on the province of another order of men, they could not employ their genius on religious fubjects.

A PASSAGE of Ammianus Marcellinus deferves our attention. "After the inhabitants of "Gaul, fays he, had been gradually polifhed out "of their original barbarity, the ftudy of fome "valuable branches of learning made a confide-"rable progrefs among them. The Bards, Eu-"bates, and Druids, gave birth to that ftudy.

" Ir was the buinefs of the bards to fing the brave actions of illuftrious men in heroic fong, and their poems on thefe fubjects were accompanied by the fiveet modulations of the lyre. The Eubates made deep refearches into the nobleft and moft fublime properties of nature : and they endeavoured to express their fpeculations on that fubject in verfe. But the Druids, men of a more elevated genius, and formed into focieties agreeable to the rules laid down by Pythagoras, M 4 " acquire " acquire the higheft pitch of honour by their " enquiries into things fublime and unknown, and, " defpifing all that belongs to the human race in " this lower world, they made no difficulty of " affirming that fouls are immortal *."

MANY learned writers among the moderns have been of opinion that the Druids, Eubates and Bards, were three different orders of priefts. But it requires a clearer proof than ancient hiftory can furnifh, to fhew that the Bards took any greater concern in fpiritual affairs than the laity of their country.

It is plain from Strabo's teftimony \uparrow , that the Eubates were priefts and much employed in phifiological difquifitions. But unlefs we fuppofe that they published poetical compositions on religious fubjects, it is difficult to know how to diffinguish them from the Druids in the preceding passage of Ammianus. The Druids composed in verse, but never published any of their compositions.

I have taken the liberty of translating our author's pandere, to express in verse. Pandere is a poetical word, and though fometimes found in profe writers, is never used in a profaic tille. In the fense of that word now under confideration it almost always conveys the idea of a pomp of diction, and a harmony of numbers.

+ Lib. iv. p. 302

Oudreis,

^{*} Per hæc loca hominibus paulatim excultis, viguere ftudia laudabilum doßtrinarum, inchoata per Bardos et Euhages et Druidas: et Bardi quidem fortia virorum illußrium faCa, heroicis composita vetsibus, cum dulcibus lyræ modulis cantiarunt : Eulages vero ferutantes fumma et fublimia naturæ pandere conabantur. Inter hos Druidæ ingeniis celsiores, ut auctoritas Pythagoræ decrevit, fodalitis a&ricti confortiis quættionibus occultanım rerum altarumque crecti funt; et defpanctantes humana pronuntiarunt, animas immortales. Ammian. lib. xv. circa inem.

Oudress, Vates, Eubates, Eubages, and Eubages, are words of exactly the fame meaning, and diverfified only in the orthography by the vicious pronunciation of original authors, or the blunders of tranferibers. Those to whom the name belonged were a Celtic order of priefts, philosophers, and poets, thought to have been prophetically infpired. Though the office is no more, the title has been hitherto preferved in the name of an Irish tribe, and in that of a Scottish clan, once confiderable, and not yet extinct *.

LUCAN has indentified the Vates and the Bard +: but he is the only claffical writer who has confounded thefe two names together. Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid, and others, fpeak of the Vates with great refpect, and have given that title to themfelves, as well as to the moft eminent poets of Greece; but not one of them has thought of doing the fame honour to the more ignoble race of Bards.

* Among the old Irifh families of note in the county of Mayo, Cambden reckons that of MacVadus t, and in the Weftern Illes of Scotland are fome called MacFaid. In the Galic and Irifa Ianguages, Faid fignified a Prophet ||.

As the Hibernian and Hebridian Scots had clans among them who drew their origin and appellation from fome eminent Faids or prophetical poets, fo they had others who derived their pedigree from Bards famous in their day. Every one belonging to the clans defeended from thele, was, after his poetical anceftor, denominated Mac-i-Bhaird, that is to fay, the fon of the Bard; and according to the genius of the Saxon language, which generally fublitutes the German W in place of the Celtic Bh, the Mac-i Bhairds go under the name of Ward, in the South of Scotland, and fome parts of England, the Mac being rejected.

† Lib. i. ver. 247, &c.

1 Hib. Com. Maio. Lhoyd's Irifh and Englifh Dictionary.

THE

THE poet and prophet are congenial fouls. Their professions are nearly allied. The claim to fupernatural infpiration is common to both: and certainly without a large portion of enthusiafim, taking that word in its original fense, neither of them could fucceed fo well as they have done. The conceptions of both rife to the grand, marvellous, and pathetic; their language is ftrong, animated, magnificent, full of tropes, and every way removed from profaic diction. As it is the prophet's business to utter predictions, fo the poet affumes the fame character occasionally, and atierts that he speaks the language of the Gods. It was for this reason that the Romans gave

IT was for this reason that the Romans gave the name of Vates indifcriminately to prophets and poets. This emphatical word, like many more, they borrowed from the old Celtic. The Vates of Gaul certainly exercised the facerdotal function. Strabo fays to expressly in the place to which I have already referred. Ammianus informs us, that the Vates was a poet of fuperior dignity to the Bard. This opinion of Ammianus is ftrengthened by the authority of Virgil. QUINTILIAN remarks, that Virgil was peculiarly fond of old words, when proper and expreffive. This admirable poet was born and educated in the Citabine Gaul. He therefore much have QUINTILIAN remarks, that Virgil was peculiarly fond of old words, when proper and expreffive. This admirable poet was born and educated in the Citalpine Gaul. He therefore muft have been much better acquainted with the Celtic language than any writer of his time. But be that as it will, it is plain that he makes a diffinction between the Bard and the Vates. In his ninth eclogue, Lycidas confeffes, or rather boafts a little, that he himfelf was a poet, and a poet not of his own making, but one formed by the mufes, at the fame time he had too much modefty to imagine imagine that he had a right to the name of Vates, though the fhepherds were pleafed to honour him with that title.

- " Incipe fi quid habes : et me fecere poetam
- " Pierides, funt et mihi carmina : me quoque dicunt.
- " Vatem paftores, fed non ego credulus illis :
- " Nam neque adhuc Varo videor nec dicere Cinna
- " Digna, fed argutos interftrepere anfer olores *."

SERVIUS, and fome other commentators of great reputation, have done a manifeft injury to this paffage. Dr. Martin, after having given a long and learned note on it, concludes that the proper fignification of Vates is, a poet of the firft rank, a mafter of the art, and one that is really infpired. He had faid before that Vates feems to be an appellation of greater dignity than Poeta, and to anfwer to the Bard of the Englift. In this laft opinion he has been followed by another learned tranflator.

IF I underftand the Englifh language, Bard is not a title of greater dignity than poet; notwithftanding two eminent Englifh writers are of that opinion. The title of Bard, no doubt, is fometimes given to men defervedly celebrated for their poetical genius; but the prefent mode of expression feems to have affixed an idea of contempt to that name. But in whatever degree of effeem the name of Bard is or may have been held, it is certain that Vates never loft its original dignity.

Some Celtic Bards treated, it is true, of theological fubjects in their compositions. We are told

Virg. Eclog. ix. ver. 32, &c.

told by Tacitus *, that " the Germans celebrated " Tuifto, an earth born God, and his fon Man-" nus, in poems of great antiquity." He adds, a little after, that the tame nation had poems of a very different ftrain ; poems calculated folely for infpiring their warriors with courage in action. Thofe martial fongs were of the composition of the Bards, as appears from the name of Barditus, which was given to that species of poetry. This name was borrowed from the Germans themfelves. Tacitus does not fay that the religious poems of the Germans were the productions of the Bards. The contrary is rather infinuated. These theological pieces were the work of a more venerable race of men, of the Eubates of Marcellinus, who investigated the most mysterious arcana of nature.

THE Eubates or the Vates of Strabo were the difciples of the Druids; and it is not improbable that the Vates composed the numerous poems which those great teachers of all the Celtic nations communicated to their followers +.

THE translator of the poems of Offian has in a great measure explained the reason that there are no traces of religion to be found in the works of that illustrious Bard. To the arguments produced by that ingenious gentleman I beg leave to add one more, which rifes naturally from the observations I have just made on the fubject. Though all the Celtic nations were in a manner full of Gods and superfition, their Bards could not employ their genius in the fervice of any divinity without going

^{*} Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 2.

[†] Cæfar de Bell. Gall. lib. vi. cap. 14.

going out of their own proper fphere. Heavenly themes belonged to the Vates, another order of men, of a more dignified and facred character. THOUGH religion is an univerfal concern, yet in every age and country there were perfons fet apart whofe more peculiar bulinefs it was to praife and addrefs the divinity. According to the Chrif-tian fyftem, every one is under an obligation to celebrate their creator, though there is an order of men whofe more immediate employ it is to deal in matters of religion. The old Celtic nations did in matters of religion. The old Celtic nations did not fo much take the bufinefs off the hands of the prieft as we do : the Faids or Vates had no competitors in the province of theology. The Bard fung merely mortal subjects : hymns and anthems belonged folely to the more dignified race of Faids. Oflian, therefore, though one of the first men of the ftate, could not, fuch were the prejudices of those times, interfere with religious subjects, without a manifest breach on the peculiar privileges of that branch of the Druids called the Vates. It is to this caufe, and not to the extinction of the Druids, I attribute the total filence concerning religion in the poems of Oflian. Religious enthu-fiafm, of whatever kind it is, takes too much hold of the human mind ever to be eradicated; and it may be fafely affirmed, that it is a prejudice im-pollible to be removed, even by the feverest exertions of power +.

Īτ

^{*} The learned differtator might have added, that nothing is capable of removing one religious enthuliafm, but the fuperior ablutcity of another fyftem of the fame kind, or an immediate revelation from heaven. The feeble ray of reaton can never difpel that hazinefs which fuperflition has naturally thrown over rhe

It is idle to attempt to inveftigate the etymon of Bard. Nothing can be more trivial than the opinion of those who derive it from Bardus, an imaginary King, who, according to Berosus, reigned over the Gauls and Britains, and was the inventor of poetry. Bard is undoubtedly Celtic; and being a monofyllable it is vain to hope to trace it to any root.

the human mind. Accultomed to look through this grofs atmofphere, our ideas of fupernatural things are ftrangely magnified and confufed, and our diftempered dreams, on that fubject, make deeper and more permanent imprefions than any material objects can do. If in an age when we can bring the wifdom of former times to the aid of reaton and philotophy, we are almoft incapable of divefting true religion of the trappings of fuperflition, it is much more improbable, that, in a barbarous period, the human mind could extricate itfelf from the chains of fuperflitious fanaticifm. Dr. Macpherfon, therefore, has accounted better for the filence concerning religion in the poems of Offian, than the tranflator has done, by the fuppofed extinction of the Druids.

It is certain, that feveral tribes of American Indians have apparently no figns of religious fuperflition among them. This' neither proceeds from grofs ignorance nor from the refinements of philosophy; for the first has been always known to create more fystems of enthusiafm than the scepticitm of the latter has been ever able to deftroy. It must be afcribed to the ferenity and unchangeableness of the climate of the more inland and Southern parts of North America, which preferves an equal difpolition of mind among the natives, not fubject to the fudden reverfes of joy and melancholy, fo common under a more variable fky. Superfitition delights to dwell in the fogs of iflands, the mift of mountains, and the groß vapors of a fenny country. These circumstances throw a melancholy over the mind that is very productive of vain and fupernatural fears and pannics. It was from this caufe, perhaps, that Britain was anciently the principal feat of Druidical superfititions; and on the fame account, though from other circumftances, it now poffeffes true religion in its purity, it will, in a courfe, of ages, revert to that gloomy enthulialm fo fuitable to its moift air and variable climate. A CERTAIN

A CERTAIN modern hiftorian is of opinion, that it was from the ignorance of the old Celtic nations, and their contempt of letters, originally role the Bardifh compositions of Europe. It is certain that poetry had a great reputation among the Celtic nations, long before they knew the ufe of letters. It is even probable that poetry was known to the Celtes before their transfinigration from Afia into Europe. We are to look for the from Afia into Europe. We are to look for the origin of poely much farther back than that igno-rance and contempt of letters which prevailed among the European Celtes, after they became great nations, and objects of attention to Greece and Rome.

In Gaul the Bards were held in great efteem. They had contributed greatly to polifh that nation out of its primæval barbarity. The Spaniards alfo, and more efpecially the Celtiberians, had the fame high refpect for that order of men : nor is it improbable that those old poetical compositions, of which the Turdetans boafted fo much, were the works of their Bards *. Ancient Germany had the greateft veneration for her Bards. Poetical re-cords were the only annals known in that extensive country, and in them only the actions of great men were transmitted from generation to generati-on. Those oral chronicles prevailed over all that country through many ages. Charles the Great found barbarous poems of very high antiquity among his German fubjects, and ordered copies of them to be made †. The German Saxons of a later age could not be perfectly reconciled to Chriftianity till the Holy Scriptures were rendered into verfe, fuch a permanent hold had their prejudice in favour of the Bards taken of their minds,

^{*} Strabo, lib. iii, p. 204. Edit. Amflet. † Barbara et antiquiffima carmina, quibus veterum regum actus et bella canebantur foripfit, memoriæque mandavit. He later

THE Northern Europe had the fame profound refpect for its Scalds, fo poets were called in Scandinavia. The fealds were the fole recorders of great events. The Danes and Norwegians have no records older than the twelfth century, and the Swedes fall even fhort of the Danes in the antiquity of their writers of hiftory t. Saxo Grammaticus, who flourifhed in that age, has frequent recourfe to the authority of the Scalds who preceeded that æra; and Joannes Magnus, archbifhop of Upfal, appeals to them continually in his hiftory of the Goths.

TORFÆUS relates that the Scalds were accounted perfons of very confiderable importance in Norway, Denmark, and Sweden. They were retained by monarchs, were invefted with extraordinary privileges, and highly careffed. In the court of that great Norwegian monarch, Harald Harfager, they had the honour of fitting next to the King himfelf, every one of the order according to his dignity. If we can depend on the authority of Saxo, Harnius gained the crown of Denmark by the ftrength of his poetical abilities : an illuftrious perfon of this profefion was in the fame country exalted to a matrimonial alliance with one of it's Princes \dagger .

calls them Barbara, becaufe they were written in a language which he did not underftand. Eginhatd, in Vita Car. Mag. c. 29.

† Idem, ibidem.

[†] Torfæus, in Orcad præfat.

THE Kymri of Britain were remarkably fond of Bards. Every one of their Princes had his laureate; nor could any man of quality fupport the dignity of his rank, without having one of that faculty near his perfor. From the vaft number of poetical manufcripts written in their native tongue, which the Welfth have hitherto preferved, it may be concluded that poetry was in very high eftimation among their anceftors +.

AMONG the ancient Cambro-Britannic Bards, Taliefin and Lhyvarch held the first place for the felicity of their poetical genius. They flourished in the fixth century, and a confiderable part of their productions is to this day extant. Taliefin was cotemporary with the great Maglocunnus, and was highly favoured by that Prince. He was dignified by his countrymen with the title of Ben-Bairdbe, or the chief of the Bards.

It is needlefs to prove that the Irifh had the greateft value for poetry. Never did any nation encourage or indulge the profefilion of Bards with a more friendly partiality. Their nobility and gentry, their Kings, both provincial and fupreme, patronized, carefield, and revered them. The Bards of a diffinguifhed character had eftates in land fettled on themfelves and their pofterity. Even amidft all the ravages and exceffes of war, thefe lands were not to be touched, the poet's own perfon was facred, and his houfe was efteemed a fanctuary.

EVERY principal Bard was in the Irifh tongue called Filea or Allamb Redan, that is to fay, a Dottor in Poetry. Each of the great Fileas or

+ Tit. vii. p. 239.

Graduates

194

Graduates had thirty Bards of inferior note conftantly about his perfon, and every Bard of the fecond clafs was attended by a retinue of fifteen poetical difciples.

IF any faith can be given to Keating, many other extraordinary advantages and immunities were annexed to the office of Bard, befides thole which arole from the extravagant munificence of private perfons. It was ordained by law that all Bards fhould live at the public expence for fix months in the year. By the authority of this law they quartered themfelves upon the people throughout the ifland from Allhallow tide till May *. This heavy annual tribute was of a very old ftanding, and for that reafon the Bards who were authorized to exact it, were in the language of the country called Clear-hen-chaine, that is, the fongfters of the ancient tax.

THE very ample privileges conferred on the Bards, and the blind refpect paid to their perfons, made them at laft intolerably infolent Their avarice alfo kept pace with their pride. Their haughty behaviour and endlefs exactions became an infupportable grievance to the nation. The numbers of those ftrollers increased daily. Such as inclined to fpend their time in idleness and luxury joined themfelves to the fraternity, and passed under the character of Bards. In the reign of Hugh ain Mearach, tays Keating, that is, in the latter end of the fixth age, a third part of the people of Ireland went under that title, and claimed the privileges annexed to the order.

^{*} Keat. Gen. Hift. of Ireland, Part ii. pages 25, 26.

It is a juft obfervation of Claudian, that every one who performs actions worthy of being celebrated by the mufe, is always finitten with the love of fong. The fame of the hero will foon die, unlefs preferved by the hiftorian, or immortalized by the productions of the poet. Barbarous times have produced very few tolerable hiftorians; but all ages indiferiminately, and all countries where military merit fublified with a confpicuous luftre, have produced Bards famous in their generation.

THE ancient inhabitants of Caledonia were very warlike, and of course fond of fame. Such as had remarkably fignalized themfelves in the defence of their country, were, no doubt, proud of patronizing the beft Bards of the times in which they lived. Cambden's immenfe erudition has difecvered that Galgacus was celebrated by the poets of South Britain *; and therefore it is likely he was highly extolled by the Bards of his own country. We are told by Tacitus that Arminius, the great deliverer of Germany, was in his own time fung by the Bards +. Every Celtic nation took care to perpetuate the memory of all their patriot heroes in their poetical annals. The laureates, if I may call them fo, of every community were obliged by their office to pay a just tribute of fame to the benefactors of the public; even crowned heads and warlike Chieftains thought it no disparagement to their high rank to exercise their talents in the poetical eulogiums fo common in those times.

THE princes of Scandinavia valued themfelves much on their poetical genius. Four Norwegian † Tacit. Annal. lib. ii. cap. ult.

N 2.

monarchs,

^{*} See his Britannia, under the article Caledonia.

monarchs, and a Danifh King, diffinguifhed themfelves remarkably in that way. Thefe were Harald Haufager, Olaus Trygvinus, Olaus the faint, Harald the imperious, and Ragnar Lodbrach *. The great men who held of thofe monarchs, emulated their mafters in difplaying the fire and vigour of their genius in a ftudy fo fathionable in thofe romantic ages.

THE Caledonian Princes of ancient times were animated by the fame fpirit. We know that James the Firft was an admirable poet for the age in which he lived. Some Galic rhimes compofed by his coufin german, Alexander, the famous Earl of Mar, have been hitherto preferved. The Highland Chieftains contended frequently in alternate verfe: nor have all thofe poetical dialogues perifhed. The apoftle of the Pictifh nation, and the old Scottifh miflionaries were remarkably fond of the mufes, and frequently couched their facred leifons in fong.

THE public has lately received the works of Offian, the fon of Fingal. The impartial and men of tafte have read them with admiration, and fenfibly felt the true language of natural and fublime genius. Those who affected to defpife the compositions of ancient times have been confounded and mortified by the impartial voice of Europe in the praife of those poems. The candid part of the nation, though fome of them perhaps were at first prejudiced against the genuineness of the work, have been agreeably furprized to find that their fusions were abfolutely groundles.

Īт

* Torfæus, in Orcad. præfat. ad Lect.

It has been a queftion with fome whether Offian was a Caledonian or Irifh Bard. Afia and Europe, in a remote age, contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer. It is therefore no matter of wonder that North Britain and Ireland fhould emuloufly claim a particular right to the great poetical fun of their dark ages. They have formerly contended for much fmaller prizes. The queftions whether Sidulius, the poet, whether Cataldus, the bifhop of Tarentum, whether St. Aidan, St. Finan, St. Adamnan, and many more wrongheaded monks, belonged more properly to the facred ifland than to the wilds of Caledonia, have been agitated with all the keennefs and zeal incident to national difputes of that kind.

The editor of Offian's works is very able to defend his own fyftem. When objections worthy his notice are raifed, he will certainly pay them all due regard. If he will fit down gravely to confute the groundlefs and ill connected objections which have been raifed by fome people in the caufe of Ireland *, it is defeending too far from that dignity of character which he has already acquired. For the poetical errors of his author, if he has committed any flagrant ones, the translator is no ways accountable. But if Offian's compositions do honour to that dialect of the Celtic language, in which they have been wrote, to that Celtic nation which produced the Bard, and to human genius itfelf; the editor has an indifputable title to great praife, for bringing to light fuch a monument of the poetical merit of the ancient Bards.

^{*} See Mr. O Connor and Dr. Warner on this fubject.

AMONG the feveral arguments from which it may be concluded that the author of Fingal was a Caledonian, the language he uses is a decifive one. The genuine Irifh poems which are to be found in books, and the little Irifh fongs which are brought into the Highlands by ftrolling harpers from Ireland, are in every other stanza unintelligible to a Highlander.-But the language of Offian's compositions is easily understood by every one who has a competent knowledge of the Galic tongue .----If fome few of the words are uncommon, or become obfolete, it is no more than what must have been naturally expected in a work fo ancient. It is aftonifhing what a purity and fimplicity of language prevails over all the works of this poetical hero, while the Galic compositions of the last century are dark, affected and confuled *.

WHETHER Offian flourifhed in the third, in the fourth, or in the fifth age, is a point difficult to difcufs. His poems are undoubtedly more ancient than any extant in the Celtic tongue, and the genius of the diction, of the arrangement and fentiment, gives a ftrong internal proof of their genuinenefs and high antiquity †.

BESIDE the Bards appointed by authority in Caledonia, the Princes, great Lords, and petty Chieftains, afpired much after the reputation arifing from a poetical genius. It was impossible that all the numerous effays produced, could be deftitute of merit. Every clime, however diffant from the fun, is capable of producing men of true genius. The thick fogs of Bccotia, and the cold mountains of Thrace, have given birth to illuftrious poets, while the fcorching fands of Africa have remained languid and filent.

^{*} See Lhoyd's Irifh preface to his Irifh Dictionary.

[†] Dr. Blair's Critical Differtation on the Poems of Offian. mountains

THERE is great reason to doubt the doctrine advanced by Martial, that there will be no want of poets equal to Maro, if there should be patrons as munificent as Mecænas: at the fame time it is certain, that when the love of poetry in a nation confers upon those who have a genius that way, rewards of honour, profit, and reputation, their compositions will be numerous, and fome of them worthy of public attention. The old Caledonians were as bountiful to their poets as their posterity the lriss were appropriated to the eminent Bards, and became hereditary in their family. Many districts in the Highlands still retain the name of the Bard's territory *.

ABOUT a century back one of the Highland Chieftains retained two principal Bards, each of whom had feveral difciples who were his infeparable attendants. The Chieftains of former times, if led by choice, or forced by neceflity, to appear at court, or to join those of their own rank, on any public occasion, were attended by a numerous retinue of vaffals, and by their most eminent poets and ablest musicians. Hence it was that in the spacious hall of an old Celtic King, a hundred Bards fometimes joined in concert. Keating informs us that there was no lefs than a thousand principal poets in Ireland during the reign of one monarch.

^{*} The fecond title of the noble family of Athol is taken from lands appropriated to a Bard. Tullybardin is compounded of Julloch, a hillock, and bardin, bards.

WE of modern times may perhaps condemn this ftrange tafte of our barbarous anceftors. We may blame them for retaining and loading with wealth and honours fuch numerous bands of rhimers, a race of ufelefs, infolent, and flattering men. A flur of this kind is unjuftly thrown on our progenitors, till we remove a prevalent folly of the fame kind from among ourfelves. Our great men, to their honour be it faid, give but little encouragement to poets, or that flattery which is natural to the mufe. But our courts are full of worthlefs fycophants, the halls of our Lords with pimps and parafites. Flattery feeds on the folly of the great without the merit of being cloathed in the ftrength of fentiment, or in the harmony of numbers.

of numbers. Bur to return back to the regions of antiquity : the martial exploits of great men were fung by the Bards in epic poems, and transmitted from one generation to another. They exerted the whole force of their genius in perpetuating the memory of departed heroes, in exciting the nobles to walk in the fame paths of activity and glory, and in rousing up their nation to support its dignity and to cultivate the generous and manly virtues. Praife throws around virtue attractive charms. Nothing tends more to raife fentiments of magnanimity in the heart than the nervous and glowing exhortation of the poet. It follows, therefore, that the Bard was the great and fuccetsful instructor of the barbarian, and had in some measure a right to be held facred.

HISTORY informs us, that men of that character have done the moft important fervices to flates overpowered by a victorious enemy, or enflaved flaved by Tyrants. Tyrtæus, though a very defpicable perfor in his appearance, faved Lacedæmon from utter ruin, and by the ftrength of his poetical abilities *; and Alcæus, by employing the fame talent, refcued his country from the hands of cruel ufurpers +.

WE are told by Quintilian t, that Alcæns was rewarded with a golden plectrum for his great fervices. Horace, for the fame reafon, afigns him a place of diftinguifhed honour in the Elyfian fields: and to give us a juft idea of this patriot poet's merit, he throws around him a numerous crowd of ghofts, attentively hearing those fpirited war fongs which contributed fo much to expel the enemies of liberty out of Lefbos.

PLATO, who was a declared enemy to the order in general, gives the title of a moft divine poet to Tyrtæus, and pronounces him at the fame time a wife and good man, becaufe he had in a very excellent manner celebrated the praifes of thofe who excelled in war \parallel . There is fomething in the character of Tyrtæus which feems to refemble that of a Celtic Bard. He was a poet and mufician at once. The inftruments on which he played were the harp and that kind of martial pipe which the Lacedemonians ufed inftead of the trumpet of other nations.

THE chief Bards of North Britain, like those of other Celtic nations, followed their patrons into the field, and were frequently of fignal fervice. It was their bufiness and custom, upon the eve of a battle,

^{*} Juftin. lib. iii. cap. 5.

⁺ Horat. Carmin. lib. 2. od. 13.

¹ Inftitut. lib. x. cap. 1.

De Repub. lib. 1.

battle, to harangue the army in a war fong com-posed in the field. This species of a fong was called Brofnuba Catb, that is to fay, an in/pira-tion to war. The poet addressed a part of this perfuasive to every diffinct tribe, shewing them the rewards of a glorious death, and reminding them of the great actions performed by their anceftors. He began with a warm exhortation to the whole army, and ended with the fame words. The ex-hortation turned principally on the love of fame, liberty, and their Prince. "The Germans, fays Tacitus, have poems which are rehearfed in the field, and kindle the foul into a flame. The fpirit with which thefe fongs are fung predicts the fortune of the approaching fight, nor is their man-ner of finging on thefe occasions fo much a concert of voices as of courage. In the composition they fludy a roughness of found and a certain broken murmur. They lift their shields to their mouths that the voice, being rendered full and deep, may fwell by repercussion *.

THE fate of battles depended not a little on the encomiums and invectives of the Bards. To be declared incapable of ferving the fovereign in any military flation is now deemed an indelible reproach. To incur the fatire of the Bard, by a cowardly behaviour, was reckoned in former times the laft degree of infamy and misfortune. WE are told by a Norwegian hiftorian +, that in time of fea engagements, if near the coaft, the Scalds of Norway were fometimes landed in a fecure and convenient place, and ordered to mark

every

^{*} Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 3.

⁺ Torfæus, in Hift. Rerum. Orcad. vid. præfat.

every event diffinctly, fo as to be afterwards able to relate them in verfe. The fame author informs us, that Olaus, the Saint, had in a day of action appointed ftrong guards for his three principal poets, after giving them inftructions of the fame kind.

WHEN a great and decifive battle was fought, the Bards were employed in doing honour to the memory of those gallant men who had facrificed their lives in defence of their country, and in extolling the heroes who had furvived the flaughter of the day *.

A JUDICIOUS Roman poet observes that many brave men who lived before Agamemnon were buried in oblivion, unlamented and unknown, because they had the misfortune of wanting a poet to celebrate their memory t. This observation is in some measure just. But it may be doubt-

* In the year 1314, Edward the Second, of England, invaded Scotland at the head of a very great army, having, ac-cording to all human appearance, reason to expect an abiolute conqueit of that kingdom Full of this imagination, he ordered the prior of Scarfborough, a celebrated Latin rhimer, according to the tafte of those times, to follow his troops all the way to Bannockburn. He intended to employ this eminent poet in immortalizing his victory; but fortune declared for the enemy, and the prior was found among that immenfe number of prifoners which the Scots had made : the ranfom demanded for his life was, a poem on the great fubject he had before him. He gave a specimen of his skill, but it was invita Minerva, though he fucceeded wonderfully well in the judgment of times not remarkable for delicacy of tafte. Another learned monk was appointed by the Scots to eternize their victory in verfe ; and though Apollo was as niggardly in his aid to him as he had been to the English Carmelite, we have reason, to believe that his composition was much admired.

+ Horat. Carmin. lib. 4. od. 9.

ed

ed whether heroifm is more ancient than poetry, and whether any illustrious perfonage of the re-moteft ages of the world wanted his Bard. It is certain that the works of many eminent poets have perished altogether, and with them the renown and even the names of those mighty chiefs whom they endeavoured to eternize. At the fame time it is evident, that of all the monuments which ambition is able to raife, or the gratitude of mankind willing to beftow, that reared by the muse of a genuine poet is the most expreflive, the most durable, and confequently the most to be defired. The works of Phidias and Praxiteles, once thought everlafting, are now no more. The faintest traces of the magnificent Babylon cannot now be investigated. The famous Egyptian pyramids, though ftill extant, have not been able to preferve the name of the vain monarchs by whom they were conftructed. But the structures which Homer has built, and the monuments which Virgil has raifed to the memory of illustrious men, to Gallus, to Mecænas, and Auguftus, will perifh only together with the world.

THOUGH the beft of Roman poets had a contempt for Ennius, yet the elder Scipio, with all his learning and tafte, had a greater refpect for him than Augustus had for Virgil himself. The old Calabrian Bard was constantly near that thunderbolt of war, and we are told by Cicero, that a marble statue was erected for him in the burial place of the Scipio's *. It therefore is no matter of wonder that Celtic Kings and Celtic Lords should have patronized the poets of their own times; a race of men whole compositions, however rough or unpolified, kindled the foul of the warrior to attempt great actions, and promifed the hero a perpetuity of fame.

[·] Oratio pro Archia Poeta,

 \dot{T} HE more ancient Bards were greatly fuperior to those of later ages, yet mere antiquity was not the real cause of that fuperiority. In times more remote, true merit was the Bard's only title to favour. In after days the office became hereditary, and an indefeasible right was the circumstance which rendered his perfon and character facred. It was only after the feudal law took place, that the proper reward of genius and great actions became the birthright of unworthy perfons.

No people, however barbarous, could have imagined that the lineal heir of an eminent poet fhould inherit the natural enthuliafm or acquired talents of his predeceffor. But the general cuftom of en tailing almost every office in certain families, and perhaps an extraordinary regard paid to the memory of some excellent poet, fecured the possification of the grant of land to the possificity of those bards whole merit had acquired them that lucrative difunction from their superiors.

DISSER-

206

DISSERTATION XV.

Of the Weftern Islands of Scotland.---Accounts given of them by the Writers of Rome.---Of their ancient Names, Ebudes, Hebrides, and Inchegaul. Subject to, and poffeffed very early by the Scots of Jar-ghael.

THE difquifitions of antiquaries are incapable of thole ornaments which, in the opinion of the world, conftitute fine writing. To trace the origin of a nation through that darknels which involves the firft ages of fociety, is a laborious tafk, and the reputation attending the fuccels of a very inferior degree. The antiquary is no more than a kind of pioneer, who goes before, to clear the ground, for the conftruction of the beautiful fabric of the hiftorian. In this differtation I enter into the diffection of words, the inveftigation of etymons, and into an inquiry into the ancient fate of iflands now very unimportant in the Britifh empire. Should this trivial fubject difcourage any reader, let him turn to another fection.

Тне

THE geography, as well as internal hiftory of the Northern Europe, was little known to the writers of Greece and Rome. The uncultivated and barbarous flate of the Celtic nations difcouraged travellers from going among them. The Romans met often, on their frontiers, hoftile nations, to whofe very name, as well as country, they were abfolute flrangers.—Involved in a cloud of barbarifin at home, the inhabitants of the North were only feen when they carried war and defolation into the provinces of the empire; and confequently the accounts given of them by the hiftorians of Rome are vague and uncertain.

THIS ignorance of the true flate of the Northern division of Europe afforded an ample field for fiction, and encouraged pretended travellers who had a talent for fable, to impose upon the world the most absurd tales, with regard to the fituation, hiftory and inhabitants of the barbarous regions beyond the pale of Roman empire. Strabo complains frequently that Pythias the Mafilian, and other travellers, could not be credited, in the account they gave of their voyages, which looked more like a poetical fiction, than a faithful narration of facts. Pythias, though a man in the most indigent circumstances, had the vanity to fay, that he had travelled over all the Northern division of Europe, to the very extremities of the world : " A ftory, not to be credited," faith Strabo *, " though Mercury himfelf had told it." He pretended to have vifited Britain in the courfe of his peregrinations, and with great gravity gives a very circumftantial defeription of that illand.

He

^{*} Lib. ii. p. 163.

He alfo fays, that he made a voyage to Thule, the remoteft island belonging to Britain, at the diftance of fix days failing from it, in the fkirts of the frozen ocean. He is candid enough to own that he was obliged to others for the hiftory which he gives of that place; but he does not helitate to affirm that he himfelf had feen it. It was a place, according to him, which was neither earth, fea nor air, but fomething like a composition of all of them, fomething refembling, to use his own expression, the lungs of the fea, fomething, in fhort, totally inacceffible to the human fpecies. Such is the ridiculous account which the Malfilian traveller gives of Thule, and from which the idle tales of fucceeding authors concerning that island feem to have been taken.

SOLINUS deferibes Thule as an extensive tract of land, inhabited by a race of men, who, in the beginning of the vernal feason, fed, like their cattle, upon graßs or ftraw, lived upon milk in fummer, and laid up the fruits of their trees in flore for their winter provision *. But his authority will not be greatly respected by those who know what he has faid of men and women, whose feet were contrived like those of horses, and whose ears were long enough to cover their whole bodies.

STRABO owns that those who had feen the British lerna had nothing to fay concerning Thule, though they gave fome account of other small islands on the coasts of the Northern Britain. We learn from Tacitus, that Domitian's fleet, after the reduction of the Orkney isles, deforied Thule; a place which till then, faith he, lay concealed under fnow and an everlafting winter *. The truth of this fact refts upon the veracity of the perfon from whom Tacitus received his information.

^{*} Solin. Polyhif. cop. 35.

PTOLEMY is fo particular in his account of Thule, as to inform us, that it lies in fixty-three degrees N. Lat. and that the longeft day there confifts of twenty-four hours t. There is no place near the Britith ifles to which this, or any other defeription given of it, can agree better than to Shetland. But after all that has been faid upon the fubject, with a confiderable expence of erudition, by Sir Robert Sibbald and others, there is reafon to conclude, with Strabo, the moft judicious of all ancient geographers, and one of the beft hiftorians and critics of remote times, that the hiftory of Thule is dark, dubious and unauthentic 1, and that every thing told by Pythias concerning it is a fiction.

THE illes of North Britain have been divided by fome ancient geographers into two claffes, and by others into three. The first of thefe claffes confists of the Ebudes and Orcades. The fecond comprehends the Hemodes, OEmodes, or AEmodes, together with the two just mentioned. An exact defcription of places then fo little known, cannot be expected from thefe writers; but their voluntary errors admit of no excuse.

PLUTARCH relates, upon the authority of one Demetrius, who feems to have been employed by the Emperor Adrian to make geographical obfer-

‡ Strabo, lib. iv. p. 308.

^{*} Difpecta eft et Thule, quam hactenus nix et hyems abdebat- Vita Agric. c. 10.

⁺ Lib viii. c. 2.

vations and difcoveries, that fome of the British isles were confectated to Demi-gods.—That Saturn, bound with chains of fleep, is confined in one of them, where the custody of Briareus, and that feveral inferior divinities are his constant attendants.

SOLINUS writes with great gravity and feeming precifion concerning the inhabitants of the Ebudes, their manner of living; and their form of government. "They know not," fays he *, " what corn is : they live on fifh and milk only. " The isles of the Hebudes are separated from one " another by narrow founds, and by reafon of " their contiguity are governed by one King. " This Monarch has no property.—He is fup-" ported at the expence of the public .- He is " bound by eftablished laws to rule according to " the principles of equity. Left he should be " tempted by avarice to commit any acts of op-" prefilon, poverty confines him within the rules " of juffice.-He has no perfonal intereft to pro-" mote.-He has no wife, that can with any pro-" priety be called his own : any woman for whom " he conceives a paflion muft be at his fervice .---" Hence it is, that he has neither hopes nor de-" fires with regard to children, to whom he can-" not claim a peculiar right."

MANY ancient writers of hiftory and geography have taken a boundlefs liberty of inventing marvellous flories, in their defcriptions of the manners and cuftoms of diftant nations; and Solinus feems, in his defcription of Thule and the other British isles, to have indulged his fancy in that

refpect

^{*} ofi., Polyhistor. cap. 35.

refpect with much freedom. Some eminent critics have obferved, that this author copies, in a fervile manner, after Pliny the elder; but he has rejected his authority with regard to the number of the Ebudes and of the Orkney ifles. According to Pliny*, the Orcades amount to forty, and the Hebrides to thirty; but Solinus reduced the number of the Hebrides to five, and of the Orcades to three wretched ifles, overgrown with rufhes, or made up of horrible rocks or naked fands, and totally defitute of inhabitants.

I F Solinus flourifhed, as is commonly fuppofed, after Tacitus had publifhed the life of Agricola, or the hiftory of his own times, it is furprizing that he could have been a ftranger to the works of that excellent writer, and totally unacquainted with the ftory of the voyage performed by Domitian's fleet round Britain, and the conqueft made of the Orcades during that voyage. Solinus is one of thofe ancient geographers who divided the ifles of North Britain into two claffes only—the Hebudæ and the Orcades.—Ptolemy follows very nearly the fame divifion. But Pomponius Mela, after informing us that there are thirty Orcades, placed at fmall diffances from one another, obferves that there are feven OEmodæ lying over againft Germany t, which are probably the iffes of Shetland.

SALMASIUS and other critics believe that the Ebudæ of Ptolemy and Solinus are the OEmodæ of Mela. The great fimilarity of the names, and the filence of the laft of these writers with respect to

0 2

Nat. Hift. lib. iv. cap. 16.

⁺ Mela de fitu Orb. lib. iii. cap. 6.

to the Ebudæ, and of the other two with regard to the OEmodæ, feem to juftify this opinion. But Pliny's authority is against it. That author diftinguishes the OEmodæ from the Hebudes, with the greatest clearness and precision *; and he could not have been misled by either of the other two geographers. He wrote before Ptolemy, and after Mela

IT is matter of fome wonder that the ancient writers of geography, who flourished before the reign of Domitian, could have known more concerning the Orcades, than Solinus, who flourished after Tacitus wrote his hiftory. Pomponius Mela was cotemporary either with Julius Cæfar, or rather with Claudius. This we have reafon to conclude from a paffage in that part of his work where he attempts to give an account of Britain^{*}. But fuppoing Mela to have been cotemporary with the last of these Emperors, rather than with the first, one will be still at a loss to find out how he could have learned that there were iflands to the North of Britain, which were called Orcades, and which were feparated from one another by narrow friths, and were thirty in number. We learn from Tacitus, that before Agricola's time it was a problematical queftion, whether Britain was an island or part of a continent; and it is not probable that any foreign fhips had failed to the Northern extremity of it before the period he mentions. The Carthaginians are the only people who can be fuppofed to have made fuch a voyage; and it was not confiftent with their maxims of policy and commerce to have made public their difcoveries. It is plain, however, that Mela and Pliny had received diffinct information concerning the name and number of thefe iffes. Thefe authors differ indeed as to the precife number of the Orcades: one of them makes them thirty, and the other forty. But this difference is not material, if we confider that there are no lefs than forty Orcades, including the Holmes, and not more than thirty, if we enumerate thofe only which are or may be conveniently inhabited.

 ⁺ Nat. Hift. lib iv. cap 16.
 * Britannia qualis fit, qualefque progeneret mox certiora et magis explorata dicentur: quippe tam diu claufam aperit ecce principum maximus, &c. Mela de fitu Orb. lib. iii. cap. 7.

213

BUCHANAN was totally at a lofs with regard to the origin and meaning of the word Orcades. Cambden attempted to explain it very ingenioufly: he quotes an old manuscript, which was afterwards published by Father Innes, where it is derived from Argat; that is to fay, according to the author of that little tract, above the Getes: but he rejects this etymon, with good reason, and conjectures that the name in question is derived from "Argat, or above Catb, a country of Scotland, "which, from a noted promontory there, is called "Catbnefs."

THE juffnels of this etymon is founded on a fuppolition that the modern Caitbnels was called Catb, before Mela's time at leaft. But were that fuppolition well grounded, and were it certain that inftead of Carini in Ptolemy, we should read Catini, which Cambden suppoles, in order to help out his conjecture, I am still apt to think that the Word Orcades should be derived from another fource. The old Scottish bards call Orkney IncePorch, that is to fay, the Islands of webales, O 3 One

214

One of two things muft have been the foundation of the name: either whales of an enormous fize were frequently feen around the Orkneys, which indeed is ftill the cafe, or those old Caledonians who faw thefe ifles at a diftance, compared them to thefe monftrous fea-animals. Agreeable to the laft of thefe fuppofitions, the Highlanders of Scotland call the Orkneys Arc-bave, that is to fay, the Swine or Whales of the ocean*.

I SHALL now endeavour to throw fome light on that part of the ancient hiftory of Britain wherein the Hebrides are more particularly concerned; a fubject hitherto almost entirely neglected, though not abfolutely unworthy the attention of the curious.

PTOLEMY and Solinus comprehend five ifles under the general name of Ebudæ or Hebrides. They are enumerated by the former; and the names he gives them are Ricina, Maleos, Epidium, the Weftern and the Eaftern Ebudæ. In Cambden's opinion Ricina is Richrine, an ifle which lies much nearer the coaft of Ireland than that of North Britain, and belongs to the county of Antrim. But as Richrine was too inconfiderable an ifle to have deferved Ptolemy's particular notice, amidft fuch a vaft number of other iflands omitted by him, and as Cambden's opinion is founded folely on remote affinity of names, there is, I think, more reason to believe, that the Ricina of the Egyptian geographer, and the Riduna of Antonine's itinerary, is rather the Arrin of Scotland : fo they who speak the Galic call an extensive siland near the mouth of the Clyde, which is the property of the family of Hamilton.

^{*} In the Galic language Orc, Arc, and Urc, fignify a Sow. Tore likewife fignifies a Sow. The old Scots called the whale commonly Muc.Mhata, i. e. the fow of the ocean.

For a full and diffinft account of the Orkney ifles the reader may confult the works of Torfæus, a Norvegian hiftorian, and Mr. Wallace, a learned Minifter of Kirkwall.

Of the Western Islands.

CAMBDEN thinks that the ancient Epidium is the fame with Ila; Maleo:, Mull; the Western Ebuda, Lewis; and the Eastern Ebuda, Sky. But if Ricina is the fame with Arran, it is far from being improbable that Epidium is the island of Bute, which lies near it; Ey Bboid, that is, the isle of Bute, in the Galic language, being much more nearly related to Epidium in its found than Ila. I have no objection to Cambden's opinion with regard to Maleos and the larger Ebudæ.

PLINY is the oldeft author who has made very particular mention of the Ebudes; and if we confider their number only, he fpeaks of them with much greater accuracy than any of the ancients. According to him, there are no lefs than thirty ifles of that denomination. If all the iflands in the Deucaledonian ocean, and all the bolms adjoining to them, fhould be comprehended under the general name of Ebudæ, there are certainly more than three hundred of that class: but a vast number of the bolms are too inconfiderable to deferve a writer's notice; and fixty at leaft of the ifles which are of fome confequence, may be juftly reckoned appendages to the principal ones. - We cannot therefore blame Pliny for want of exactness in that part of his British topography which relates to the Ebudes. Some writers of the middle ages, who had occasion to understand the subject perfectly, inform us, that thefe ifles were thirty two 04 in in number, and the old natives call them twenty four to this day.

1

WE can hardly guess what commodities could have been exported from Ireland in an early pe-riod, excepting live cattle, hides, and flaves. However, Tacitus informs us, that merchants frequently vifited that island, which, for that reafon, was better known to the Romans of his time than Britain. There must have been a confiderable intercourfe between the Irifh and the inhabitants of the Ebudæ in those times. They were undoubtedly at that time the fame nation, in point of language, manners and cuftoms. Pli-ny learned from fome merchant of his own country, very particularly, the length and breadth of Ireland. The fame perfon, or any other employ-ed in the trade to Ireland, might have had a pretty exact account of the Ebudæ from the Irifh, or even fome of the natives of those islands, as no doubt they ventured often to Ireland in their Curachs. Agricola had not difplayed the Roman Eagles in the Northern division of Britain when Pliny loft his life; and we are told by himfelf, in the very chapter where he fpeaks of the Ebudes, that the arms of the empire had not penetrated further than the Caledonian foreft. It may therefore be concluded, that he received the account he gives of thefe illes as I have above supposed.

It is difficult to inveftigate the meaning or etymon of the name Ebudes, as the prefent inhabitants have no fuch term of diffinction in their language. Camd n's fuppolition was, that it ought to be derived from the fterility of the foil, or the total want of corn in those islands; Eb-eid, in the old British language, fignifying a place void of corn. To fupport fupport this conjecture, he quotes Solinus, who informs us, in a paffage already mentioned, that the inhabitants of the Ebudes knew not the ufe of corn.

THIS etymon, however plaufible, is far from being fatisfactory. The Caledonians of the third century were, according to Dion, abfolute ftrangers to tillage, as much as the inhabitants of the Ebudes, cotemporary with Solinus, could have been. Even the inland Britons of the South knew not agriculture in Cæfar's time. It may be therefore alked, with great propriety, why the ifles on the weftern coaft of Caledonia, and no other part of Britain, fhould be characterized by a want that was common to Britain in general ?

Some of the Ebudes, it is true, are very barren; but many of the Weftern illands were formerly among the most fertile and plentiful tracts of land in North Britain. It would therefore be equally proper, with Cambden's etymon, to call them Ey-budb in the British, or Ey-biod in the Galic, that is, the Islands of corn, or metaphorically the Islas of food. The truth is, neither Camden or I can give any fatisfactory etymon of the Ebudes.

THE old appellation of Ebudes has, by writers of latter ages, been changed into Hebrides; a name utterly unknown to the more ancient writers of monkifh ages, as well as to the old Greeks and Romans. The following conjecture may account in fome meafure for this change*.

^{*} The name of Hebrides may probable have originally proceeded from an error in fome transcriber, who millook the u in Hebudes for ri.

218 Of the Western Islands.

OF all St. Patric's difciples, excepting perhaps Columba, Bridget had the good fortune of acquiring the higheft reputation. Her miracles and pe-regriniations, her immaculate chaftity, conftant devotion, and high quality in point of birth, made her very famous in Britain and Ireland. The teveral divisions of Britain concurred very zealoufly with Ireland, the country that gave her birth, in treating her character with a most superstitious respect. Through a course of ages she was thought a perfon of too much influence in heaven, and confequently of too much importance upon earth, to be tamely relinquished to the inhabitants of Kildare, who piqued themfelves upon the peculiar honor of having her body interred in their ground. The Irish of Ulster challenged that honour to them. felves. But the people of Britain would never cede a property fo invaluable : the Picts were politive that her remains lay buired at Abernetby, the capital of their dominions; which Netlan the Great, one of the most illustrious of their King's, had confecrated and made over to her by a royal and irrevocable donation*.

THE Scots, after having annexed the Pictifh territories to their own, paid a moft extravagant homage to the relics of Bridget in Abernethy +. But the inhabitants of the Weftern ifles exceeded all the admirers of this female faint, excepting perhaps the nuns of Kildare, in expressing their veneration for her. To Bridget the greatest number of their churches were dedicated : from Bridget they had oracular refponfes: by the divinity of Bridget they fwore one of their moft folemn oaths: to Bridget they devoted the firft day of February; and in the evening of this feftival, performed many ftrange ceremonies of a Druidical and moft fuperfitious kind.

^{*} See Innes in his Crit. Effay, Append. Num. 11.

⁺ Boeth. Scot. Hift. lib. 9. Lefl. in Rege 47.

Of the Western Islands. 219

FROM these confiderations we have reason to fuspect, that the Western isles of Scotland were, in fome one period or other during the reign of popery, put under the particular protection of St. Bridget, and perhaps in a great measure appropriated to her; as a very confiderable part of England was to St. Cuthbert. The name of this virgin-faint is, in Galic, Bride; and Hebrides, or Ey-Brides, is, literally translated, the Islands of Bridget.

THE reafon why the Ebudes of ancient times were in latter ages called Inchegaul, is more obvious. We have had occafion to obferve that the old Scots of Britain and Ireland gave the name of Gauls to all foreigners indiferiminately. They affixed to that name the fame idea which hoftis exprefied in the language of the more ancient Romans. Hoflis at firft fignified a ftranger, afterwards an enemy, either public or private, and confequently a perfon to be detefted and abhorred.

DERMIT, the provincial King of Leinfter, betrayed Ireland, his native country, into the hands of the Englifh; and therefore the old Irifh, in order to brand his name with an everlafting mark of infamy, called him Dermit na ngaul, that is, Dermit of the firangers, or the friend of a foreign nation, and confequently his country's enemy. The ancient Scots of Britain ufed the word Gaul Gaul in the fame acceptation, and their pofterity continue it to this day.

THE Englifh were not the only foreigners of whom the Irifh and Scots of former times had reafon to complain. The Normans and Easterlings often molefted them: they came from a remote country in a hoftile manner, and therefore had the opprobrious appellation of Gauls affixed to them. The wars of the Irifh againft the Scandinavians are, by an Hibernian hiftorian, who wrote on that fubject, called the wars of the Gadelians againft the Gauls^{*}.

THE Weftern isles of Scotland were long fubject to the Norwegians. The Scots of the Continent, who had a mortal aversion to those foreign interlopers, gave the name of Inche Gaul, or the Islands of ftrangers, to the Ebudes.

W E have already examined Solinus's account of the Ebudes, and his romantic defeription of their inhabitants. All the other old geographers who have made particular mention of thefe ifles, have faid nothing concerning the inhabitants: nor am I able to recollect that any Greek or Roman hiftorian, who has written concerning the affairs of Britain, hath touched that fubject. What the Scottifh hiftorians have told us concerning the firft colonies fettled in thefe ifles, concerning the country from which they emigrated, the manners and cuftoms of the inhabitants, and that flate of anarchy in which they lived, till bleffed with a monarch of the Milefian race; all this, I fay, refts entirely on the veracity of Irifh fennachies, or the ill-founded fuppofitions of hiftorians.

^{*} Keat. Gen. Hift. Part. II. pag. 50.

Of the Western Islands.

 W_{E} have reafon to believe that the Ebudes, as they were diftant from one another, and feparated by dangerous founds, were for a long time poffeffed by different tribes, and governed by different chiefs. It does not appear from authentic hiftory, that these chiefs depended on the Kings of Albany, whether Pictish or Scottish, if any such King's existed, till after the Romans left this island.

But whether we date the origin of the Scottish monarchy from Bede's Reuda, or from Fergus the fon of Ferchard, or from Fergus the fon of Eirc, which is indeed the most probable hypothesis, it may very reasonably be prefumed, that foon after the establishment of that monarchy, the Ebudes were annexed to the continental territories of the Scots. A cluster of islands, thinly inhabited, diffitute of ftrong-holds, altogether unprovided for defence, and incapable of atiliting one another, must have fallen an easy prey to any powerful invader. The Ebudes, however inconfiderable they may be thought now a-days, would be a very confiderable addition to the petty monarchy of the Scots of Albany, and could not fail to be an object worthy their acquiring.

At whatever period the ifles may have been annexed to the Scottifh kingdom, the inhabitants perhaps would be inclined to embrace a proper opportunity to fhake off their voke, and to diffurb the government of their new Lords. The hiftory of thefe iflanders in latter ages, and the vindictive fpirit of every conquered people, render this opinion probable. But there cannot be any foundation for the circumftantial account which Boece and Buchanan have been pleated to give us of grand rebellions rebellions in the Ebudes, during the reigns of Caractacus, Corbredus, Ethodius, and other ideal Scottifh Kings. It is certain, notwithftanding all the pains taken by Abercromby to prove the contrary, that Caractacus never reigned in North Britain, and that Corbredus, Ethodius, and other royal perfons of the fame imaginary exiftence, have fought their battles againft the chiefs of the Ebudues only in the fabulous annals of our hiftorians. The accounts they give of a Donald of the ifles, fo old as the times of the Romans, bear about them the apparent mark of a modern invention.

DONALD was a name very common a-mong the Islanders; and two of that name, who were both of the great family whole power was once more than equal to that of the King, over all the Ebudes, were extremely famous. Thefe were Donald earl of Rofs, who fought a battle, fatal to Scotland, againft an army railed by Robert duke of Albany, during the captivity of James the firft in England, and Donald Balach, who obtained a fignal victory over the earls of Mar and Caithnefs, wounded the first of these noblemen, killed the other, and made a great flaughter of the King's army under their command. The public calamities produced by these battles, and the devastations committed by the two Donalds, feem to have led our hiftorians, who were very ill informed concerning the affairs of the Ebudes, into a notion that all the lords of the ifles went, from the earlieft ages, under the fame deteftable name.

WHEN the Kings of Scotland poffeffed no other territories than those upon the Western coast of Albany, Albany, we may take it for granted that they frequently vifited their dominions in the Ebudes. Being involved in perpetual wars, either with the Britons, Saxons, or Picts, it was neceffary for them to fecure the leading men of the ifles to their intereft. Without a fuppofition of this kind, it is difficult to comprehend how the Scots could have fubdued the Picts, or defend themfelves againft the Saxons. When Aedan King of Scots, invaded Northumberland, at the head of a numerous and gallant army, he received no affiftance from the Picts, and had no Irifh auxiliaries to fupport him in that expedition. We muft therefore conclude that the Iflanders, among whom Adamnan informs us Aedan had been inaugurated, made a confiderable part of that numerous army which he led into England.

ALL the Scots hiftorians affirm, that the Weftern Ifles made a part of the Scottifh dominions, from the earlieft accounts of time, to the death of Malcolm Canemore in the year 1093. On the demife of that prince, fay thefe hiftorians, his brother. Donald Bane formed a defign of mounting the throne; and to fupport, by foreign aid, his title, which was far from being juft, as the old law of Tanifry had been abolifhed, he implored for this purpofe the affiftance of Magnus the Barefooted, King of Norway, and obtained it, upon ceding all the Northern and Weftern Ifles of Scotland to that Monarch. Magnus took immediate poffefion of thofe ifles, and the fucceflors of Donald Bane in the throne of Scotland did not for a long time recover them. Orkney and Shetland remained in the poffefion of the Norvegians to the year 1468, when James the third of Scotland married the daughter daughter of Christian the first of Denmark, and got possession of those islands, until the portion of the Queen should be paid. Even the Ebudes likewife were subject to the Norvegians, till Alexander the third, King of Scotland, after having given a signal defeat to the Norvegian army at Air, in the year 1263, re-annexed them to his dominions.

Of the Western Islands.

224

In this manner, and in thefe different periods, if the unanimous confent of Scottifh writers could be depended on, did the crown of Norway acquire and lofe the weftern ifles. But the Norvegian hiftorians give a very different account of the matter in almoft every material circumftance. Shetland, Orkney, and the Hebrides, were according to them, fubdued by their nation in a more early period than that affigned; and the Scots owed the reftitution of thofe iflands more to the negotiations of a treaty, and a fum of money, than to the force of their arms.—A difcuffion of this point will naturally comprehend the hiftory of that Norvegian dynafty which went under the name of the kingdom of Man; which I fhall briefly give, in the fucceeding differtation.

DISSER-

History of the Norwegian, &c.

DISSERTATION. XVI.

The Hiftory of the Norwegian Principality of the ifles, commonly called the Kingdom of Man.

IN the close of the preceding differtation, I promifed to give a brief hiftory of the Hebridian principality of the Norwegians, commonly known by the name of the kingdom of Man. In the account I am to give, I shall follow more the digressive manner of the antiquary, than the regular narration of the historian. If I shall be able to throw a new and stronger light upon the subject, I shall attain my purpose, and leave the palm of fine writing to men of greater abilities.

ABOUT the year 875, according to the annals of Norway, written by hiftorians appointed by authority *, Harold Harfager, or the Fairbaired, one of the greateft heroes of Scandinavia, obtained a decifive victory over many independent Princes who difputed his title to the throne, and was declared King of Norway. Some of these Princes, who had been defpoiled of their dominions, took refuge in the Scottish isles, and uniting their forces there, made feveral defcents upon the dominions of Harfager. Harold, exafperated by thefe frequent incurfions, refolved to carry his arms to the retreats of the invaders. His progrefs through the ifles was irrefiftible; and while he purfued his enemies from place to place, he made a total conqueft of Man, the Ebudes, Shetland and Orkney. From that time forward, all the Islands became fubject to the crown of Norway, and continued fo, with little interruption, for many ages. The writer from whom I have taken this account, informs us further, that Harold often invaded the Continent of Scotland, and fought feveral battles there with great Succefs : and to corroborate the teftimony of the old Islandic historian from whom he had this relation, he appeals to the rhimes of two ancient poets of Scandinavia, who celebrated that monarch's actions in Scotland in heroic fongs.

^{*} Torfæus in Orcadibus, p. 10 & 11.

It is certain that a powerful army of Scandinavian pirates infefted the Eaftern coaft of Scotland about the time now affigned, and committed the most cruel devastations, under the conduct of two famous brothers, Hinguar and Hubba. Conftantine the Second, King of Scots, marched against them in perfon, and twice gave them battle. In the first action he obtained the victory, but in the fecond he was defeated, taken prifoner, and beheaded. This event happened, according to the Scottish historians*, in the 879; and as Harold Harfager reigned at that time, the authority of the bards, to whom Torfæus appeals, feems to ^{*}Fordun, Boece, and Buchan. in vita Conftant. II.

Principality of the Ifles.

deferve credit. It is true, the enemies by whom Conftantine was killed are by our hiftorians called Danes : but that is an objection of no force : the pirates who infefted the different kingdoms of Europe in the ninth century are, by different writers, ftiled Norvegians, Danes, Getes, Goths, Jutes, Dacians, Swedes, Vandals, Livonians, and Frieflanders ; their armies being compofed of all thofe nations. As the countries from which thefe inundations of plunderers came, lay either to the Eaft or North of the European kingdoms which they infefted and harraffed, they went under the more general denominations of Eafterlings, Oftmans, or Normans.

It appears evidently from the annals quoted by Sir James Ware *, that in the year 735, the Normans laid wafte a great part of Ireland, and the ifland of Richrine, which is reckoned by fome one of the Ebudes. Three years after this devaftation they infefted Ulfter and the Hebrides; and it is not probable that Orkney, which lay in their way, could have refifted their fury. In the year 307, continues Ware, the Danes and Norwegians, landing in the province of Connaught, deftroyed Rofcommon with fire and fword. At the fame time Cellach, abbot of I-collumcille, fled into Ireland for fafety, after the enemy had murdered a confiderable number of his people. He did not return to Scotland for feven years : and from that circumftance we may take it for granted that thefe favages made themfelves mafters of Iona, at leaft, and probably of all the other Weftern ifles.

* Antiquit. of Ireland, page 57. P 2

ABOUT the year 818, Turgefius, by fome called a Dane, and by others a Norwegian, invaded Ireland. This famous adventurer, after a long feries of piratical defcents and flying battles, u-furped at laft the fovereignty of the whole ifland, ruled the miferable inhabitants with a rod of iron, made dreadful maffacres of all the ecclefiaftics he could feize, and committed their books to the flames.

THE Irifh were revenged of this cruel tyrant, but had not ftrength enough to thake off the yoke of flavery under which they groaned. New fupplies of hoftile Troops came yearly from Scandinavia, which, with the adherents of Turgefus, maintained the war with fuccefs againft the divided natives. About the year 850, they poffeffed themfelves of Dublin, and the parts of Leinfter adjacent to that capital *, from whence the Irifh were never able to drive them.

THE greateft Monarch that ever held the fcepter in Ireland, prevailed, in the year 1014, with the greateft part of the provincial Kings to join their forces to his own, and to attempt a total expulsion of the common enemy. Sitricus, who was at that time King of the Dublinian Eafterlings and Normans, ufed every possible precaution to make head against this powerful confederacy. He entered into a league with the King of Leinster, procured a body of auxiliaries from him, and received a great accession of strengh from the Danes of Man and Inchegaul. After vast preparations had been made on both fides, the contending nations met at last near Dublin, and fought the obstinate and bloody battle of Cluain-tarf. In that fatal conflict the Irifh loft the illuftrious Brian Bore, their fovereign, together with his fon and grandfon, betides fome provincial Kings, a vaft number of the nobility, and many thousands of the common people *.

bloody

^{*} Ware's Antiq. of Icel. p. 58.

Principality of the Isles.

SITRICUS retired, and maintained his poft in Dublin, with the fhattered remains of his army. The preparations made by that prince before the battle, and the fupplies he received from Man and Inchegaul, afford a clear demonstration that the Scandinavians were possible of these is before the æra affigned by the Scottish historians; and the Irish annals, from which Ware has taken the account he gives us of these things, are more to be depended upon, with regard to the time at least in which the Ebudes became fubject to the crown of Norway, than the accounts followed by Buchanan, Boece and Fordun.

WE know that the Normans made confiderable acquifitions in France, and the Danes in England, about the fame time that Turgefius became fo formidable in Ireland. We learn from Fordun, that the Danes infefted the Eaftern coaft of Scotland before the end of the ninth century. It is not probable, therefore, that the Hebrides, which lay in their way, could have been entirely overlooked by thefe free-booters, in the courfe of their ravages. Thefe ifles, difcontiguous, and thinly inhabited, incapable of affifting each other with powerful fuccours, and lying at a great diffance from the feat of the Scottifh kingdom, could make little refiftance to a torrent which at that time carried almoft all Europe before it. The Monarchs of Scotland could not have relieved their Hebridian fubjects, nor repoffefs themfelves of their conquered iflands: they had fufficient employment elfewhere; the Eaftern provinces of their kingdom muft be defended from the frequent invalions of the fame barbarous enemy, or from the infurrections of the lately conquered Picts.

^{*} Ware's Ant. &c. p. 63. Keating's Gen. Hift. of Irel. Part 2. page 64.

THE moft authentic hiftory of the revolutions which happened in the Weftern ifles, is contained in the Chronicle of Man, as far as it goes. This fmall piece has been preferved by Cambden, in his Britannia. It was written by the monks of Ruffin, an abbey in Man, and is probably older, by a whole century, than Fordun's Scotichronicon. Thofe who examine the tranfactions of thofe times with attention, will difcover fome chronological errors in the Chronicle of Man; but thefe errors are owing to the negligence of tranfcribers, as they are manifeftly inconfiftent with the truth of facts related, and with the æras affigned in other parts of the Chronicle.

THIS ancient record begins thus: "In the year 1065, died Edward, King of England, of bleffed memory. He was fucceeded in the throne by Harold, the fon of Godwin; to whom Harold Harfager, King of Norway, gave battle at Stainford-bridge, The victory fell to the Englifh, and the Norwegians fled. Among the fugitives was Godred, firnamed Chrovan, the fon of Harold the Black from Iceland. This Godred coming to the court of Godred, the fon of Syrric, who reigned in Man at that time, was entertained by him in an honourable way. The fame year William the Baftard Baftard conquered England; and Godred, the fon of Syrric, dying, was fucceeded by his fon Fingal."

Principality of the Isles.

THE King of England who died in the year with which the Chronicle begins, was Edward the Confeffor, a prince highly extolled by monks, who derived extraordinary advantages from his pious liberality. It is well known that Edward affifted Malcolm Canemore in recovering the throne of his anceftors, which had been usurped by Macbeth, and that Malcolm, for years, carried on a war againft the Norman conqueror and William Rufus, his immediate fucceffor. Malcolm died in the year 1093, about thirty years before Godred, the fon of Syrric, left the kingdom of the ifles to his fon Fingal, and confequently thirty years before Donald Bane made the pretended donation of the Ebudes to Magnus of Norway. This donation never existed; for it manifestly appears from the Chronicle of Man *, and other concurring re-cords, that the Norwegians had occupied the Weftern ifles long before Donald Bane mounted the throne of Scotland, and before Godred Chrovan took poffession of the dynasty of the isles.

GODRED was a powerful prince. He fubdued a great part of Leinfter, annexed Dublin to his empire, and reduced the Scots, according to the Chronicle, to fuch a ftate of dependency, that he would not permit them to drive more than three nails into any boat or veffel they built. Ware quotes a letter of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, wherein that prelate called Godred King of Ireland *. He died, after a reign of fixteen years, at Yle, or Ifla, and was fucceeded by his fon Lagman.

* The authors of this chronicle, and after them other writers, were mittaken in calling the Norwegian King flain in the battle of Stainford-bridge, Harold Harfager. We learn from Torfæus and others, that the true name of that prince was Harold the imperious. Harfager lived in a much earlier period. The fame Chronicle writers, or their copyilt, muth have committed a blunder likewife in making the year to 66 the year of Godred Chrovan's accefilon to the throne of Man.

P 4.

TORFÆUS, following the annalists of his country, labours hard to prove that Magnus the Bare-footed dethroned Godred, bound his fon Lagman with iron fetters, made an abfolute conquest of the Weftern ifles, and beftowed them on his fon, Sigurd, with the title of King +. But the Chron-icle of Man places the expedition of Magnus into the Weftern parts of Scotland, and into England and Wales, in the year 1098, twenty years after the death of Godred, and eleven after the death of his fon and fucceffor, Lagman. Simon Dunel-menfis agrees with the chronicle in the æra here affigned; and if any regard is to be paid to the Scottish historians, the acquisition made of the Weftern Ifles by King Magnus, must have happened foon after the death of Malcolm Canemore.

TORFÆUS, after a long discussion of the chronological difficulties arifing out of these contradictory accounts, rejects the authority of the chronicle, confutes Buchanan, finds fault with fome of the writers of his own country, and prefers at last the testimony of Ordericus Vitalis to all others. But if we follow that author's fyftem, the first expedition of Magnus into the Western feas of ^{*} Antiq. of Irel. p. 65. + Orcades, p. 71, 72.

Britain

Principality of the Ifles.

Britain took place in the fifth year of William Rufus, that is, in the year 1092. According to this calculation, the Norwegian monarch muft have feized on the Ebudes before the death of *Mal*colm Canemore, and confequently Donald Bane could not have been guilty of the infamous cetfion which has hitherto done fo much injury to his memory.

MAGNUS the Barefooted, might have fufficient provocation to invade the Ebudes in a hoftile manner, though fubject to the crown of Norway before his time. Many of the piratical Eafterlings and Normans, who infefted the Britifh ifles, after the time of Harold Harfager, were originally independent of the Norwegian crown, or rendered themfelves fo. Turgefus, and his fucceflors in Ireland, were fovereign Princes. The Earls of Orkney, though much nearer the feat of that empire to which they were vaffals, made reiterated attempts to fhake off all marks of fubjection : and that the Kings of Man endeavoured frequently to render themfelves independent, will appear in the fequel.

WE learn from the chronicle *, that one Ingemunde was fent by Magnus to take poffefion of the Hebudes, in quality of King. But the chiefs of the ifles, finding that this man abandoned himfelf wholly to the moft fcandalous exceffes, to luft, avarice, and cruelty, confpired againft him, and, without regarding either his perfonal dignity or the authority of his conflituents, fet fire to the houfe where he was lodged, and deftroyed him, together with his whole retinue. It was probably with a defign of revenging this infult, that Magnus undertook the expedition already related. But whatever may be in this conjecture, it is plain, from the commiflion with which Ingemunde was invefted, that the Kings of Man had afferted their independence, or had refused to pay the ancient tribute.

* Chronicon. Manniæ, ad an. 1097.

AFTER the death of Lagman, the fon of Godred, who had taken the crois and died in the holy land, Murchard O Brien, King of Ireland, fent, at the defire of the nobility of Man, one of his friends who was a perfon of royal extraction, to act as Regent in that ifland, during the minority of Olave, the brother of their late fovereign +. Here we have another clear proof that the Princes and great men of the Weftern Ifles had withdrawn their allegiance from their old mafters, the Kings of Norway.

MAGNUS the Barefooted, only recovered the territories which one of his remote forefathers had acquired, and which one of his more immediate anceftors had loft. He fubdued all the Scottifh ifles from Shetland to Man, and according to fome hiftorians, added the fruitful peninfula of Kintire to thefe conquefts : he carried his victorious arms into South Britain, and made himfelf mafter of Anglefey, in fpite of the united efforts of the two brave Earls who led a numerous army againft him. He was unqueftionably one of the moft powerful Princes of his time, and prefcribed what laws he pleafed to all thofe whofe fituation made them obnoxious to his intemperate rage, or to the luft of his boundlefs ambition. The Welfh felt the dreadful effects of his barbarous power, and therefore courted his friendship with a multitude of prefents. He obliged the Scots of Galloway to fur-nish him with timber, at their own expense, for the use of his bulwarks. He sent his shoes to Murcard, King of Ireland, and commanded him in the most peremptory manner, under the pain of his difpleafure, to carry them on his fhoulders, in the prefence of his ambafladors, on the anniverlary of Chrift's nativity. The Irifh nobility received this infolent meffage with becoming fentiments of difdain and indignation : but Murcard was too wife to provoke the refentment of a conqueror whofe power was equal to his pride, and told his friends that he would eat the floes of the Norwegian monarch, rather than fee any one province in Ireland deftroyed. Accordingly he paid homage in the difhonourable way prefcribed by the haughty Magnus, entertained his ambaffadors with a royal magnificence, and difmiffed them with the higheft expressions of respect for their master.

dreadful

[†] Chron. of Man.

Principality of the Isles.

It does not appear from any authentic record, that Magnus came near the Eaftern coaft of Britain in either of its divisions. His troops could not therefore have been of great use to Donald Bane, had any one of his nephews disputed the crown of Scotland with him : and indeed it appears to me more probable that Donald, upon the demife of his brother, possed that for the throne by virtue of the old Tanishry right, or that, according to fome English historians, he was elected king, than that he owed his crown to the aid of a foreign ally. History of the Norwegian

236

DONALD's immediate predeceffor in the throne, though a great Prince, had difobliged the nation by many unpopular actions. He had introduced the English language, drefs, manners, and religion, in a country at that time full of the most violent prejudices against every thing which came from a quarter to hottile. His obstinate attachment to the interest of his brother in law, Edgar Atheling, involved the nation in a feries of wars more expenfive and calamitous than profitable or glorious. The large eftates which he had fettled on fome noble exiles who followed the fortune of that weak Prince, muft have greatly exafperated the Scottifh nobility, and alienated their affections from his family. He had been overmatched by the conqueror of England, and grofly infulted by his fucceflor, William Rufus. His heir apparent, Prince Edward, had perished unfortunately with Malcolm at Alnwick. The reft of his children by Queen Margaret were under age, and that Princefs, already worn out by the autherities of a fuperfittious life, overwhelmed with grief, furvived her hufband and fon but a few days.

ALL these circumftances confpiring together must have made it easy for Donald Bane to possible himself of the throne vacant by the death of his brother, without purchasing the aid of a Scandinavian potentate, for much at the expence of his country and his own reputation. His pretensions to the crown were opposed only by a law neither ancient nor ever much regarded; and the diffractions at court in confequence of for many unhappy events, afforded him the most favourable opportunity of afferting his claim. The conclusion I would Principality of the Isles.

would draw from what has been faid on this fubject, appears to me to be perfectly juft : that our hiftorians were ill informed with regard to the manner how, and the time when the Weftern Ifles fell under the dominion of Norway.

AFTER Magnus the Barefooted had, through his temerity, loft his life in Ireland, Olave, the fon of Godred, recovered his paternal dominions, and reigned over the ifles forty years. Olave was a Prince of a peaceable difpolition, diffinguifhed greatly by the religious virtues of the times, and extremely liberal to ecclefiaftics. He was educated in the court of Henry I. and was on good terms with the monarchs of England throughout his life. He lived in amity with Ireland; and it does not appear that thofe Kings of Scotland, who were his cotemporaries, difputed his title either to Man or the Ifles.

SELDEN complained that Olaus and Aulave, Amlaff and Anlapbus, are names which breed great confusion in the English history; but these names feemingly different appear to me to be the fame. The fennachies of the isles call the Olave, of whom we are now speaking, Aula or Ambla, in Latin, Amlavus, Anlapbus, or Olaus; and they diffinguish him from other Princes of the fame name by the title of Ambla Dearg mac Ri Lochlin, that is to fay, Red Olave, the King of Lochlin's Son. Godred, the famer of Olave, was from Scandinavia, which is called Lochlin by the inhabitants of the Highla 4s and Isles.

It is the opinion of fome that Locblin and Denmark are words of the fame import : but it appears to me rather that Locblin and Scandinavia are fynonimous terms. Harold Harfager, and Magnus, the Barefooted, were Norwegian Princes, and the islanders give no other appellation to those great conquerors, nor to other Normans, who held their anceftors under subjection for many ages, than that of Lochlinich.

th

238

In the Galic language, Loch fignifies a great collection of water, whether falt or freth, and land full. Lun is the name of a certain bird remarkably voracious. The Baltic might have been very properly called Lochlan, if it neither ebbs nor flows; and many different countries, particularly Scotland and Ireland, experienced that from this fea fwarmed an immenfe number of pirates, who by an eafy and just metaphor might have been compared to birds of prey and of passage. But whatever the etymon of the word Lochlin may be, it is certain that all the adventurers who came from the Baltic, or from the Northern feas, and the countries bordering upon them, whether Norwegians, Swedes, Finlanders, Ruffians, Livonians, Poles, Pomeranians, Danes, Frieflanders, or Icelanders, were by the Irifh and Hebridian Scots called Lochlinich.

IT has been thought a matter of wonder that Scandinavia, fo barren in every other refpect, fhould have been fo very fertile of men, as to pour forth whole inundations of rovers almost every year from the latter end of the feventh century, at least, till the thirteenth.

Some ingenious writers have endeavoured to account for this extraordinary phænomenon by refolving it into the effects of polygamy. A plurality of women were, by the laws or cuftoms of Scandinavia, confined to the bed of one man, if we believe thefe writers; and hence it was that the inhabitants Principality of the Ifles.

inhabitants multiplied almost beyond belief. A country in this fituation, which did not abound with the neceffaries of life, could not but fend numerous colonies abroad in queft of either plunder or fettlements: and fuch colonies, confifting of adventurers hardy, enterprifing, lawlefs, poor, and determined to make their fortune or perifh in the attempt, must have carried defolation far and wide

But it is by no means certain that polygamy was eftablished either by law or custom among the ancient Scandinavians. The Germania Magna of the old geographers comprehended at least the Southern coalt of the Baltic, together with its ifles. Mela and Tacitus feem to extend it much farther *; and Cluverius is politive that Norway, Sweden, and every region lying to the North of the Baltic, made a part of that immense tract of land. The Suiones of Tacitus are undoubtedly either the Norwegians or the Swedes, or perhaps both: and the Æftii of the fame author are by Archbishop Usher +, and other eminent critics, called the progenitors of those pirates, afterwards filed Easterlings and Oftmans.

TACITUS, who feems to have made the manners and cuftoms of the Germans his particular ftudy, informs us, that every one of that nation, excepting only a fmall number of the chiefs or leading men, contented himfelf with one wife, and that of all the barbarians in the world, they were the ftricteft obfervers of the matrimonial ^{*} Mela, lib. iil. cap. 3. Tacit. de mor. Germ. cap. 45. † See Ware's Antiquiues of Ireland, chap. 24.

History of the Norwegian

laws t. We have therefore reafon to believe, that the Suiones, Æftii, Cimbri, Teutones, and other nations, of whom the Normans and Eafterlings of after-ages must have been defcended, had not a plurality of wives in his time; and it does not appear from good authority that polygamy became fashionable among the posterity of these nations, in the period intervening between the time of Tacitus and the introduction of christianity.

But even allowing, without any neceflity, that polygamy was common in Scandinavia, ftill it is doubtful, from the hiftory of nations who give into that cuftom, whether a plurality of wives increafe population or not. As the males of Scandinavia were always engaged in war at fea, there is indeed reafon to believe that the accidents from enemies, and those arifing from a rude navigation, carried off a greater proportion of them than of the males of any other nation; and therefore it may be fuppofed that a greater number of women fell to the iurvivors. But, when we confider that the women of the North always attended their hufbands and friends in their expeditions, we muft allow that they were fubject to the fame accidents with the males. In this way therefore it is impofible to account how the Northern Europe could cover the Southern divisions of it with fuch deluges of barbarous adventurers.

THE old Norwegians and Swedes, before their conversion to Christianity, were addicted to piracy, and effeemed it a glorious occupation. The wild tribes who lived near the gulphs of Bothnia, Finland, and Livonia, followed the fame practice. The maritime nations inhabiting the Southern coaft of the Baltic were led by the example and fuccels of those rovers to try their fortune in the more wealthy divisions of the South of Europe. If to these numerous nations of p'underers we add those of Denmark, Holstein, Saxony, and Friefland, all the way to the mouth of the Rhine, we do not make the country of those Northern rovers, who have done fo much mischief in former ages, more extensive than hiftory affirms. It is also extreamly probable that those who dwelt in the more inland diffricts of the kingdoms of the North joined the freebooting inhabitants of the fea coafts in their expeditions. In a division of Europe fo extensive, it could have been no difficult matter to mufter up fwarms of adventurers, fome thirfting after glory, others rendered defperate by po-verty, and all of them animated by the fuccess of their neighbours or predeceffors in emigrations of the fame kind.

¹ Severa illic' matrimonia, nec ullam morum partem magis laudaveris: nam prope toli barbarorum fingulis uxoribus contenti funt, exceptis admodum paucis. Tacit. de mor. Germ.

Principality of the Isles.

IT may alfo be fufpected that the piratical Eafterlings and Normans, who committed fuch devaftations in the lower Germany, France, Britain, Ireland, and other places, were not fo very numerous as they have been reprefented. Inftead of making war in a regular manner, they generally invaded one particular divition of a country near the coaft, in flying partics, gathered all the fpoils they could carry away, and deftroyed every thing elfe. They were composed of feveral bodies independent of one another, and no fooner was one band gone than another came. By this means the countries exposed to their ravages had fearce any refpite from their incurfions: this circumflance muft have greatly fwelled the idea of their numbers in the minds of thofe who were fo cruelly haraffed by them; and as they made a conqueft of fome countries, the writers in the intereft of the old natives, to fave their credit in fome measure, would perhaps have afcribed thofe conquefts to the numbers of the enemy, rather than to their fuperior bravery.

To leave this digrefiion, for the hiftory of the dynafty of Man. Olave, King of the ifles, after a long and peaceable reign, was treacheroufly flain by his own nephews : he was fucceeded by his fon, Godred, whom he had by the daughter of Fergus, Earl of Galloway, the most powerful fubject in Scotland at that time.

G O D R E D had failed to Norway before his father's death, and did homage to King Hinge. In his abfence the three fons of his uncle Harold feized on his dominions, and divided them among themfelves. But the ufurping affaffins foon met with the fate their crimes deferved. Godred returning from Norway, afferted his title to the kingdom of Man, caufed one of the fons of Harold to be executed, and agreeably to the inhuman cuftom of thofe barbarous times, put out the eyes of the other two *.

Soon after Godred had recovered the inheritance of his anceftors, the Eafterlings of Dublin invited him over into Ireland, and made him their King. Elated beyond measure by this great acceffion of power, he began to rule tyrannically in his own dominions, and regardless of juffice and the laws, deprived the nobles of their effates. The moft powerful among them, Thorfin, the fon of Oler, to gratify his revenge, entered into a league with Somerled, the famous thane of Argyle, and after wrefting many of the ifles out of Godred's hands, by the affiftance of that powerful chief, erected them into a f. parate kingdom for Dugal, the fon of his new patron.

^{*} Chron Man ad ann. 1143.

Principality of the Ifles.

The Chronicle of Man calls Somerled Prince of Heregaidel, and informs us further, that he had married a natural daughter of King Olave, and confequently Godred's fifter. By that lady he had four fons: Dugal, of whom came the MacDongals of Lorn; Reginald, the progenitor of all the Mac Donalds of Scotland and Ireland; Angus, an ambitious lord, whofe great power and numerous offspring became extinct in a flort time; and Olave, of whofe actions or iffue neither hiftory nor tradition have recorded any thing memorable.

THE King of Man, upon receiving intelligence that Thorfin and Somerled had feized on a part of his dominions, equipped a confiderable fleet, and putting to fea went in queft of his enemies *. Somerled met him with a fleet confifting of eighty fail : after an obfinate fight, attended with great flaughter on both fides, they patched up a peace, having agreed to divide the kingdom of the iffes among them. From that day, faith the chronicle, may be dated the downfal and ruin of the kingdom of Man.

EITHER Somerled's ambition was very high, or Godred's perfidy provoked him foon to recommence hoftilities; for he invaded Man with a new ^{*} Ad. ann. 1156.

History of the Norwegian

244

fleet about two years after the partition treaty had been concluded. Godred, unable to maintain his ground, abandoned the ifland, fled to Norway, and laid his grievances before the fovereign of whom he held his dominions by a feudal right. He remained in Norway for fix years before his reprefentations had any effect. At length he ob-tained a confiderable fupply of forces, and return-ing to Man, defeated his brother Reginald, who had taken poffettion of the itland in his abfence, and re-eftablished himself in his kingdom +.

SOMERLED was killed before this revolution happened. Intoxicated by repeated victories, and his vaft acquifitions, he had formed a defign, if we believe the Chronicle of Man, to conquer all Scotland. Having, in confequence of that extra-vagant project, equipped a fleet of one hundred and fixty fail, he landed a numerous army near Renfrew in Clydefdale. Here, faith the chronicle, he was, through the just vengeance of God, vanquished by a small number, and he himself, together with his fon and a vaft multitude of his people, flain *.

THE Highland fennachies give a very different account of Somerled's death and character. According to them, this powerful thane had received many infufferable provocations from the minifters of King Malcolm IV. a Prince weak, unexperienced, and entirely under the direction of his fervants. The vaft extent of Somerled's eftate on the continent, to fay nothing of the acquifition he had made in the illes, filled thefe minifters with a poli-

[†] Chron. Man. ad ann. 1164. * Chron. Man. ubi fup.

Principality of the Ifles.

245

a political jealoufy, and tempted their avarice at the fame time. Refolved to humble fo formidable a fubject, and to divide his lands among them-felves, they compelled him, by a long feries of attrocious injuries, to take arms in his own de-fence. The King's counfellors attainted him and Gildbrift, Earl of Angus, the ableft general of that age in Scot'and, was fent with a great military force to render that unjuft fentence effectual, but Somerled fought the Earl, though with an infe-nior army, and the victory remained dubious. This happened during the minority of Malcolm. AFTER that Prince had taken the reins of government into his own hands, his minifters, enraged by a difappointed ambition, made it their chief bufinefs to convince him that it was neceffary to annihilate the overgrown power of Somer-led, or at leaft to reduce him to a ftate of mediocrity. The force of an argument fo fpecious, concurring with the facility of his own temper, prevailed eafily with the King to favour their de-fign. But to have fomething of a plaufible pre-tence for commencing hoftilities, it was agreed in council, that a perfon invefted with a public character should be fent immediately to propose to the Thane, that in order to procure a remiffion of his crimes from the King, he fhould renounce his right to the lands held of him on the continent, and fatisfy himfelf with his poffeffions in the ifles.

SOMERLED was too confcious of his own ftrength, and too tender of his undoubted right, to ac-quiefce in a propofal no lefs injurious to his cha-racter than prejudicial to his intereft. Incapable of difguifing his fentiments, and fired with a juft indignation, he drew his fword, and told the meffenger ferger that "He would fooner terminate the dif-" pute with that weapon, than tamely furrender " any part of his property." After returning fuch an antwer to a metlage ant by his fovereign, he had reafon to believe that a violent form would immediately gather, and built upon him : he therefore armed his numerous vaffals in Argylefhire and the ifles, procured a confiderable body of auxiliaries from Ireland, and determined to carry the war into the country of his unprovoked enemies. He larded with an army of fifteen thousand men in the Bay of St. Laurence, now Greenock, and matched directly to Paifley, where the King's troops were encamped. But before he could bring them to an action, he was most basely affaffinated by Maurice Mac Neil, one of his nephews, whom the King's generals found means to bribe. This is in fubftance the account given by the Highland fennachies of Somerled's difpute with his fovereign, and of the unhappy end of his life, which was the confequence of it. His followers, fay the fennachies, betook themfelves to their gallies, upon receiving the news of their leader's fate, and returned home without fuffering any confiderable lofs.

Q.3

Hiftory of the Norwegian

The account given by the Scottifh hiftorians of this matter, agrees reither with the Chronicle of Man, nor with the relation now given. According to them, Somerled's ambition knew no bourds, and his luft of power was infatiable. Led by the dictates of those pufilons, he formed an audacious defign of extending the limits of the principality he had by very indifferent means acquired, at the expence of his fovereign. Malcolm IV. a minor, had mounted the throne of Scotland upon the death Principality of the Isles.

death of his grandfather, David the Saint; and Somerled taking advantage of the minority, rebelled in the very beginning of this reign. He put himfelf at the head of a numerous army, confifting partly of his own vaffals, and partly of lawlefs perfons, whom the love of plunder or a confcioufnefs of guilt had driven from all quarters to his ftandard, and laid wafte thofe divinfons of the kingdom which lay next his own principalities. But the celebrated *Gilcbrift, Earl of Angus, being fent with an army to oppofe him, gave him a total defeat, and obliged him to fly for refuge into Ireland.

MALCOLM's reign was full of troubles. Henry II. of England, taking advantage of his pacific difpolition and mean genius, forced him to furrender the towns and countries which his anceftors had poffeffed in South Britain. A ceffion fo inglorious provoked the refentment of the Scottifh nation, and became the foundation of a dangerous infurrection. To pacify the malecontents, Malcolm was under the difagreeable neceffity of declaring war againft England. But he carried on and concluded that war in a way which gave little fatiffaction to his people. The alienation he made of Northumberland, and a fcandalous pufillanimity which appeared in every part of his conduct, rendered his perfon and authority contemptible.

THE inhabitants of Galloway, defpifing this feeble administration, revolted openly, and those of Murray followed their example. In the midst of fo many commotions and civil wars, which had

deftroyed

^{*} There was no Earl of Angus called Gilchrift in that age. See Dalrymple's Collect. p 392.

History of the Norwegian

248

deftroyed the braveft foldiers in the nation, Somerled's genius was too enterprizing to remain unactive. He had returned from Ireland, whither the unfuccefsful battle already mentioned had driven him, and harraffed for fome time the coafts of Scotland with piratical depredations. In a conjuncture fo full of turnult and public confusion, he foon collected a large body of men, with whom he made a descent upon the left fide of the river Clyde, and penetrated as far as Renfrew : but being too intent upon plunder, and too little folicitous about his own fafety, he was furprized and his followers cut to pieces. Some writers relate that he himfelf was taken prifoner, brought before the King, and executed like a common malefactor; others will have it that he and his fon fell in battle. Buchanan places these events about the year 1163.

I THINK there is reaton to believe that both the Scottifh hiftorians and Highland fennachies have committed a number of errors in their contradictory account of this powerful chief. Had his birth been obfcure, and his original fortune low, as thefe hiftorians pretend, it is difficult to comprehend how he could have raifed himfelf to the thanedom of Argyle, or why the public fhould have recognifed his title. The Chronicle of Man calls him *Prince of Heregaidbel, at the time of his marriage with the daughter of King Olave. It does not appear that this marriage gave him a right to any part of the ifles, though Abercromby ‡ concurs with the Highland genealogifts in an opinion of this kind. Olave was fucceeded by his fon Godred, and the pofterity of Godred inherited the greateft part of Olave's dominions, for a whole century after Somerled had been killed near Renfrew.

^{*} A corruption of Jar-ghael, that is to fay, the country of the Weftern Caledonians.

⁺ Mart. Atch of the Scots nation, vol. ii. p. 440.

Principality of the Ifles. 249

IT is hard to determine whether Somerled gave the first provocation to his fovereign, or received it from the minifters of that prince. It is not improbable, that after he had acquired fo vaft an addition of power in the ifles, he afpired to be independant towards the latter part of his life. If his whole army, as is alledged, a very fmall number excepted, was cut off near the river Clyde by an inconfiderable body of royalifts, it is fuprifing that his family should have subfisted, after his death, without any dimunition of its vaft power. No advantage appears to have been obtained by a battle fo decifive. The eftates of the rebel were neither annexed to the demenses of the crown. nor parcelled out among court favourites. His fon Dugal was left in the undiflurbed poffession of Argyle and Lorn: Reginald, another of his fons, was 1 ord of the Ifles and Kintyre: Angus their brother, was powerful enough to fight bat-tles by fea and land againft Reginald : and Somer-led the Second, the fourth fon of Somerled the first, and an hereditary traitor, fay our Scottish historians, was able to raife a new rebellion in the reign of Alexander the Second.

 \overline{I} s U S P E C T indeed that this Somerled the Second never exifted, notwithftanding what hath been faid about him by fennachies and hiftorians. The Chronicle of Man makes no mention of him; and the time at which we are told he revolted, looks like a demonstration that the whole ftory is a mere fiction. Somerled the first was killed in the year 1164. The younger Someiled rebelled againft Alexander the Second in the year 1248*. He muft of courfe have been eighty-four years of age, when he engaged in a war againft his fovereign, fuppoling he had been born on the very day in which his father was flain.

the

250 History of the Norwegian.

ANOTHER argument from which it may be concluded, with great probability, that the real Somerled's party fuftained no confiderable lofs at Renfrew, is, that the division of the isles which had fallen to the share of that mighty Thane, after his first fea-fight with the King of Man, remained after his death in the poffethon of his fon Reginald, and of his pofterity for three centuries. If Somerled's army had been totally deftroyed at Renfrew, it may be very reafonably prefumed that Godred, King of Man, who had been violently dispossefied of these isles about eight years before that event, would have laid hold of fo favourable an opportunity to re-annex them to his dominions, before the fons of Somerled could have recovered themfelves from the lofs they fuftained in the battle which was fatal to their father.

It is true indeed the Chronicle of Melrofs, another old hiltorical regifter, agrees exactly with the account which we have in the Chronicle of Man, of the total overthrow given to Somerled's army. From it we learn, that "Sumerled, the petty King of Eragaitbel, had carried on an impious rebellion againft his natural lord, Malcolm King of Scotland, during the fpace of twelve years: that this rebel, after having collected a numerous army in Ireland and other places, was, through the vengeance of God, killed at Renfrew, together with his fon, and a multitude of his vafials: and that a handful of men belonging to the fame province, the inhabitants of Clydefdal probably, had the fole merit of delivering the nation from this rebel*."

^{*} See Buchan. & Abercrom. in Alexander II.

Six James Dalrymple quotes a charter belonging to the family of Innes, from which it appears that Malcolm and Somerled once concluded a peace, and of courfe that Somerled's rebellion could not have been of fuch a long duration as the Chronicle pretends. King Malcolm reigned twelve years only, and the Thane of Argyle died before him t.

Ir is more than probable that the true hiftory of Somerled's birth and character — of his diffutes with the Kings of Scotland and Man—of his laft great armament and death, was this :—His anceftors were perfons of confiderable influence, though greatly inferior to him. He foon began to extend his power—he wrefted half of the illes out of the hands of Godred, King of Man—he made war on Malcolm, King of Scotland—a battle was fought, but the controverfy was not decided.—Malcolm, directed by his natural clemency, or more probably by reafons of ftate, adjufted all his differences with

Somerled

^{*} Sumerledus, Regulus Eregeithel, jam per annos duodecim contra Regem Scotiæ Malcolmum, dominum fuum naturalem, impie rebellans, tam copiofum de Hibernia et diverfis locis exercitum contrahens apud Renfrim applicu'ffet, tandem ultione divina cum filio & innumerabili populo, a paucis cumprovincialibus ibidem occifus eft. Chron. Meltos ad ann. 1164. † The charter was dated, apud Pert. natali domini proximo

⁺ The charter was dated, apud Pert. natali domini proximo fost concordiam Regis & Sumerled. Dalrymple's Collections, P 425.

Somerled in an amicable way. After this agreement, the ambitious thane taking advantage of his brother-in-law's unpopular administration, and the interfine commotions confequent upon it, feized on many of those ifles which made a part of the Norwegian dynasty of the ifles. Two fuccessful fea-fights eftab.isted the right which the ftrength of his arms and political intrigues had given him to that acquifition. An increase of power to great muft have made him the object of public jealoufy more than ever. A wife miniftry faw the necessity of humbling a perfon already too powerful to be a good fubject; and no doubt fome of the nobles of Scotland were willing to facrifice him to their avarice. Somerled faw the danger with which he was threatned, and took every precaution to defeat the machinations of his enemies. He formed the bold defign of rendering himfelf totally independent of the crown. He had no reason to dread much from the magnanimity or address of Malcolm; and accordingly having collected a great body of men, not only in Argyle and the ifles, but likewife in Ireland, where he had connections, he made a defcent on Clydefdale. The King's generals took the fhortest and most effectual, though an ignominious way of ending the difpute. They bribed a perfon from whom Somerled could have no fears, and by his means got him affaffinated. The rebels difperfed immediately; but the loyalifts were too weak to purfue their fuccefs. They permitted the Highlanders to retire unmolefted, and the fons of Somerled to divide his overgrown eftate among themfelves.

GODRED, King of the ifles, was obliged to yield a confiderable division of his hereditary territories, ritories, as related above, and was likewife ftript in a fhort time of the dominions he had acquired in Ireland. We learn from the annals of that kingdom, that Dermit nan gaul and his fon-in-law, the famous Earl of Pembroke, took Dublin, the capital of the dominions of the Eafterlings, in the year 1170^{*}, and that the troops fent from Man to recover it, next year, were totally defeated, and their leaders flain.

GODRED died in the year 1187, during the winter feafon, and his body was in the following fummer conveyed to I-colm-cille +. It has been obferved already, that this King muft very probably be one of thefe Norwegian Kings, who according to the Scottifh hiftorians, he buried in Iona.

OLAVE, furnamed the Black, the only legitimate fon left by Godred, had been declared heir by his father, and by the pope's legate: but as he was too young to affume the reins of government, the people of Man made his natural brother Reginald King in his flead. We are told by the hiftorians of Norway, that Reginald was the moft famous warrior in the Weftern parts of Europe, during his time t. It had been the practice of fome famous pirates among the old Normans to live for three years without entering under the roof of a houfe which emmitted any fmoke. Reginald had conformed himfelf to that cuftom, and became of courfe capable of furfairing hardfhips of every kind. He prudently lived upon good

- + Chron. Nian. ad ann. 1187.
- Torfai Orcades, p. 146.

terms

^{*} Ware's Ant. of Irel chap. 24.

254

terms with the King's of England, and fludied to oblige thole of Scotland. At the requeft of William the Lion be undertook to recover Caithnefs out of the hands of Harold, Earl of Orkney, and effected it I. After apprehending his brother Olave, and committing him to prifon, for prefuming to ask a more comfortable maintenance than the mountainous and fterile ifland of Lewis could afford him, he delivered him into the hands of William, to prevent a civil war, and the innocent prince was kept in prifon during the life of that Monarch*.

REGINALD faw very good reafons for courting the honour of being a vallal to the fee of Rome. The Popes of the twelfth and thitteenth ages prefcribed laws to fome of the greateft fovereigns of Europe, and fecured the intereft of thofe who committed their perfons and effates to their protection. Reginald thought the tribute payable by his kingdom to the crown of Norway too high, and the Lord of his allegiance was at too great a diffance to defend him, if oppreffed by one of his more powerful neighbours. He therefore, like two Englith Monarchs, his cotemporaries, fubjected his kingdom to the pope, who demanded only an annual tribute of twelve merks †.

REGINALD, though illegitimate, filed himfelf King of Man, by bereditary fucceffion. In those days illegitimacy did not incapacitate any perfon in the Northern parts of Europe from fucceeding his father in the poffellion of an effate or kingdom;

and

V Torfæi Orcades, p. 164.

^{*} Chron. Manniæ.

⁺ Fædera Angliæ, tom 1. p. 234-and the cafe was much the fame towards the South.

AFTER Reginald had reigned near thirty years, his bother Olave found means to re-effablith his own authority in the Northern Ebudes; and having equipped a confiderable fleet there by the affiftance of his friends, invaded Man, and furprized Reginald: but he entered into a treaty with him, and left him in pofferfion of Man, with the regal title.

IN a little time after the conclusion of this treaty, Reginald entered into a confederacy with Allan, Earl of Galloway, the most powerful subject of Scotland; and accompanied by that Lord, made an expedition into the Northern Ebudes, with a defign of re-taking those territories which he had refigned to Olave by treaty. But the con-federates found themfelves under the neceffity of returning home without effecting any thing; the people of Man having too great a partiality for Olave, and too much regard for the Islanders in his intereft, to fight them t. Soon after this unfuccefsful expedition, Reginald pretended a journey to the court of England; and to defray the expence of it, obtained from the people of Man a pecuniary aid, which was thought very confidera-ble at that time; but he went only to Galloway, in order to facilitate the execution of his former defign, and to marry his daughter to the fon of his ally. His fubjects, difobliged by this grofs misapplication of the aid they had granted, fent for Olave, and made him King I. Reginald made two unfuccelsful attempts to difpoffels his brother, and loft his life in the laft of them.

[‡] Chron. Man. ad ann 1225.

[#] Ibid. ad ann. 1226.

THE competition being ended by the death of Reginald, and a perfect tranquility enfuing, Olave went to Norway, with a defign of paying homage to his fovereign, and getting his right confirmed; but before his arrival, Haco, the Norwegian Monarch, had made a certain nobleman called Husbee King of the Sodorian ifles*. This nobleman, who, according

* The meaning of the word Sodor, which has been very much mifunderftood by many learned men, may contribute to throw light on fome parts of the Hebridian biflory, hitherto involved in darknefs, and apparent contradictions .--- We are told by Buchanan, lib. 1. cap. 24. that the age before that in which he lived, gave the name of Sodor to a town in the Ifle of Man. Bishop Brown, the author of a new description of that island, which Dr. Gibson has annexed to the old one given by Cambden in his Britannia, fuppofes that the Infulæ Sodorenfes thirtytwo in number, were to called from the bifhopric of Sodor, erected in the ifle of Iona, which was one of them. These Infulæ Sodorenses were united to Man, if we believe him, about the beginning of the eleventh century, and the bifhops of these united fees were fliled bifhops of Sodor and Man. But after the Ifle of Man, continues Dr. Brown, had been annexed to the crown of England, the two fees were disjoined, and Man had bifhops of its own, who ftiled themfelves varioufly, fometimes bishops of Man only, fometimes Solor et Man, and fometimes Sodor de Man; giving the name of Sodor to a little ifland, called by the Norwegians Holm, and by the natives Peel, in which the cathedral flood.—(See Cambd. Brit. Giblon's edit. page 1449.) To juftify this explication of the word, Dr. Brown appeals to a charter granted by Thomas, Earl of Derby, to one of the bishops of Man, in the year 1505.

I fhall not infift on the difficulty of proving that a bifhopric was erected in the weftern illes of Scotland before the tweften century, or perhaps before the thirteenth, nor on fome other remarks which might be made on the hiftorical relation now given; but it is certain, that after Man had fallen into the hands of the Englifh, the bifhopric of the illes was tranflated by the Score according to the Chronicle of Man, was the fon of Owmund, but according to Torfæus, the fon of Dugal, Scots into Iona, and that the bifloops who filled that fee from that period, till the final abolition of the epi(copacy after the revolution, went under the title of Epi/copi Sodorenfes: whether they or those of Man had the best right to it we shall not now inquire.

If Solor was a town in Man, in the beginning of the fixteenth century, or in the fifteenth, which was Buchanan's opinion; or if, from that town or Holm, the bifhops of Man and the Ifles derived their retpective titles, agreeably to Dr. Brown's opinion; it is difficult to comprehend, why, in charters, regitters, hiftories, and common convertation, Sodor fhould be preferred to Man, of which it was no more than a finall part. When we take the word Sodor in 6 confined a fignification, there feems to be the fame impropriety in filling a perfon Bilbop of Solor and Man, as in filling another of the fame order Bilhop of Derry and Ireland, Bilhop of Bangor and Wales, or Bilhop of Dumblane and Scotland.

The paffage quoted from the Earl of Derby's grant feems to me to be milreprefented, and by no means to imply that Pele, Holm, or that fmall idland to the Weft of Man, was the true $\frac{1}{2karo}$ of ancient times.

When the Norwegians conquered the Weftern ifles, they fometimes changed the old Galic names of places, and gave them new ones, abundantly descriptive. Thus to the Eastern OEbudæ of the ancients they gave the name of Ealand Skianach, or the Cloudy Island; Sky in the Norse language fignifying a Cloud ; and to the Weftern OEbuda, that of Logus, or Lodbus, i. e. a Marfhy Country, more fit for pasturage than tillage : and when they divided these isles into two parts, agreeably to their fituation, and appointed a diffinct governor to each, they gave the name of Sudereys to that division of the illes which law to the South, and of Nordures to that in the opposite quarter a Ey or Ay, in the Norwegian language, fignifying an ifland, and Suder and Norder fignifying Southern and Northern, when they poffeffed the ancient Cathanefia, they gave the new name of Suderland to a county in the Northern division of Scotland, now well known by the fame appellation.

258

Dugal, and grand-fon of Somerled, was killed, in the first year of his reign, at the fiege of a castle

It appears from the hiftory of the Orkneys, compiled by an old Iflandic writer, and tranflated, with large additions, by Torfæus, that the explication now given of the two vocables Nordureys and Sudreys, is perfectly juft.

The promontory in Argylefhire, which is called the Point of Archamaticiban, was the boundary which feparated the Sudercys and Nordareys of former times from each other. To the South of that promontory lies Man, Arran, Bute, Cunna, Avon, Gid, Ila, Colenst, Juna, Scarba, Mull, Iona, Tiree, Coll, Ulva, and many other files of inferior note. To the North of Ardnamurchan are Muck, Egg, Rum, Canna, Sky, Rafay, Barta, South Uift, Benbicula, North Uift, and the Lewis, including Harris, together with a vaft number of fmall ifles. All thete when joined together, and fubject to the fame prince, made up the whole kingdon of Man and the Ifles.

The Southein division of the Ebudes was reckoned more confiderable than the Northern. The feat of empire was fixed in the former : the Kings kept their courts in the life of Man, and tent deputies into the Nordureys, who refided either in Sky or in the Lewis. When the kingdom of Man and the Ifles was divided between Godred, the fon of Olave, and Somerled, Thane of Argyle, Ila, one of the beft ifles in the Southern division of the Ebudes, fell to the fhate of Someiled, and became in tome measure the capital of a tecond Hebridian kingdom : for these reasons the Infulæ Sodorenses, or Southern Isles, became much more famous than the Nordureys, and are therefore more frequently mentioned in hittory. When the Norwegian writers make no diffinction between the Sudereys and Nordureys, the latter are always comprehended under the name of the former; and hence it was that the bifhops of the ifles were filed bifhops of Sodor, though their diocete included all the ifles to the North of Ardnamurchan, as well as those to the South. But when the Nordureys are particularly mentioned by thefe writers, the Southern Ebudes are totally excluded: thus we are told by Torfæus, that Magnus the Barefoored, fome time before he had made a defcent on the Southern Ifles pertaining, to the King of Man, made a pritoner of Lagman, the ion of Godred Chrovan, whom his father had made governor of the Nordureys. Torfz. Hift. Orcad. p. 71.

in Bute, and his body translated into Iona. Immediately after his death, Olave reaffumed the government of his paternal dominions, and his title to the kingdom was in a little time recognized by Haco. He died in the ifle of Man, after a reign of eleven years, and was buried at Ruffin; the monks of that abby having found means to recommend themielves to his favour more powerfully than those of Iona.

OLAVE the Black, was fucceeded by his fon Harold: this young Prince confiding in the alliance he had contracted with the King of England, refuled to pay homage to Haco, King of Norway. But that monarch, to punifh the difloyalty of his vaffal, fent Gofpatric, one of his favourites, in quality of viceroy, into the ifles, at the head of a great fleet. Gofpatric drove Harold out of all his dominions; but dying foon thereafter, Haco was reconciled to Harold, and reftored him to his paternal dominions, confirming to him and his heirs, under the royal feal, a right to all the ifles enjoyed by his predeceffors.

It appears evident, from this part of the hiftory of Harold, and of his father Olave, that the Kings of Man held their dominions of the crown of Norway; and we learn from Matthew Paris *, that a tribute of ten merks of gold + was paid by the R 2 vafial

* Hift. Norm. p. 1000.

+ Spelman, in Voce Marca, quotes an author who makes a merk of gold equivalent to fifty of filver. According to other writers to whom the fame learned antiquary refers, the mctk of gold was fometimes of no greater value than ten merks of filver, and fometimes equal to nine only. But if the tibute due by the Kings of Man to their fuperior Lords of Norway, was no more than vaffal Princes to their fovereigns, at the time of their inveftiture; and that this tribute became due whenever a new monarch happened to obtain the fcepter of Norway. It is likewife clear that the more ancient bifhops of Sodor were under the metropolitical jurildiction of the archbishops of Drontheim; for though in the treaty concluded between Alexander III. of Scotland, and Magnus IV. of Norway, the patronage of the Sodorian bishopric was vefted in the Scottifh monarchs, yet the former jurifdiction of Drontheim over it, was by a special article referved to the archbishops of that see, Accordingly we find that King Alexander sent Marcus, the Gallovidian, who had been elected bishop of Man, in the year 1275, to be confecrated or confirmed in his right by his metropolitan in Norway ‡.

260

HAROLD was a Prince of diffinguished abilities and many shining virtues. He was highly carefied by the Kings of England, and lived in a good understanding with his neighbours of Scotland. Haco courted his friendship much, and after bestowing his daughter on him in the Orkneys, celebrated his nuptials with a royal magnificence at Bergen in than ten times ten merks of filver, and that tribute payable only four or five times in a century, King Magnus IV. of Norway, certainly made a profitable bargain when he ceded the Weftern Ifles to Alexander III. of Scotland, for a confiderable fum of money paid in four years, together with a yearly tribute or rent, commonly called the Annual of Norway.

[‡] After the life of Man had been fubdued by the Englifh, the bifhopric of Sodor was divided into two. That which was erected in the principal ifland, and confined to it, fell under the juritdiction of the archbifhop of York. The other, which comprehended all the Ebudes of Scotland, and was eftablifhed at Jona, became fubject to the archbifhop of Glafgow.

Norway *.

Norway *. But while Harold was returning into his own dominions with the Princess his spoule, accompanied by many persons of eminent rank and fortune, he was overtaken by a violent hurricane near Shetland, and perished, together with his whole retinue. This unfortunate event happened in the year 1248, according to Torfæus; but in the year following, if we believe the Chronicle of Man.

Some time before the death of Harold +, Alex-ander II. King of Scotland, a Prince of great abi-lities, who defired above all things to extend the limits of his empire, fent two bithops to the court of Norway to reclaim the Sodureys, and the ifles to the Weft of Scotland. This is the language of the Islandic annals, of which Torfæus has given a Latin verfion. From that paffage, as well as from many more in the fame annals, we learn diffinctly that the Sodureys were no more than a part of the illes called Ebudes by the ancients. The Scottifh ambaffadors executed their commission with great fidelity and zeal, but were difinisfed with a cate-gorical refusal. Haco, the fon of the Haco for-merly mentioned, told them that all his anceftors, down from Harold Harfager, had an hereditary right to the Weftern Ifles of Scotland, and that he was unalterably determined to maintain it. The two bilhops, upon receiving this anfwer, had re-courfe to another expedient. After reprefenting the danger attending a rupture with their mafter, they took it upon them to fuggeft to the Norwe-gian monarch, that Alexander, though a Prince of great magnanimity and power, was of too pacific a difpolition not to redeem the Ebudes with a fum of money. But Haco replied immediately that he was in no dread from any foreign quarter; that he was at prefent fufficiently provided with money; in fine, that no offer or temptation of any kind could prevail with him to difmember a province from his empire.

^{*} Torfæus Hift. Orcad. p. 164.

⁺ Torfæ. Hift. Orcad. p. 163.

IT does not appear that any Scottifh King, prior to Alexander II. demanded a reftitution of the Western Isles. During the piratical incursions of the Norwegians through the Deucaledonian and Irifh Seas, it would have been no eafy matter to recover those ifles, or to keep them if recovered, The revenues arifing from them in that early period could not have been confiderable, and the attention of the Kings of Scotland was almost conftantly employed by inteftine commotions, or by uninterrupted wars with foreign enemies. But Alexander, an opulent, wife, and magnanimous Prince, being married to a daughter of England, and in the beft underftanding with its monarch, formed a refolution of recovering these isles. After negociations and pacific overtures had failed, he equipped a fleet with an intention of conquering the territories in dispute. But a violent distemper feizing him while engaged in the expedition, he died without having made any progress in the execution of his defign. The untimely death of this excellent King happened in the year 1249 *. It is furprifing that the Scottish historians shou'd have been strangers to a circumstance to remarkable as the vaft preparations made by King Alexander

* Chron Man. Torfie. Hilt. Orcad. p. 64.

IĮ,

II. to wreft the Ebudes out of the hands of foreign utirpers. They have related at great length the diffutes of that Prince with John, King of England; the fervices done by him to the Barons who fought againft that unhappy monarch; the fubfequent differences he had with the court of Rome, and with Henry III. together with the manner in which he quelled two or three dangerous rebellions at home: but one of the nobleft projects he had ever formed, a project which undoubtedly he would have executed, had heaven prolonged his days for any time, has by thefe writers been buried in oblivion.

"ALEXANDER, King of Scots, faith the Chronicle of Man, prepared a mighty fleet about this time \dagger , with a view of conquering the ifles; but a fever feized him in the ifle of Kerwaray t, of which he died.

THE old filandic hiftorian, translated by Torfæus, gives a more particular account of this grand defign. "Alexander, of Scotland, faith that writer, actuated by a firong paffion of extending his dominions, raifed forces throughout all his territories, and boafted that he would not lay down his arms till he had reannexed the Ebudes to the kingdom already in his poffefion. He alfo held forth that he would fubdue Orkney and Shetland. To fucceed the better in this undertaking, he began to tamper with one of the Hebridian Kings, Jon or John, the fon of Dugal of Lorn, and grandfon of Somerled, Thane of Argyle. Haco had committed

- + That is in the year 1249.
- ‡ On the coaft of Lorn.

264

committed the impregnable fort of Kiarnaburgh *, and two or three other caftles of great importance, to this John. Alexander offered him much larger poffeffions than those he had obtained from the King of Norway, provided he would deliver up the fort and caftles. But the Hebridian chief, in fpite of the importunities of his friends, and all the ample promifes made to him, continued faithful to his mafter. Alexander, not discouraged by this repulse, profecuted his defign, and invaded the ifles. But while he lay in the bay of Rialarfund +, faith Torfæus, after his author, he had a very extraordine y vision and foon after died t.

ABOUT the time of Alexander's death, Harold, the fon of Godred the Brown, and grandfon of that

* The true name of the fort is Kiamaburgh ; it lay in a fmall rocky ifle near the coaft of Mull.

⁺ The Rialarfund of the Iflandic hiftorian, is the ifland Kiararey near the Sound of Muil, where Alexander died, as we learn from the epitaph inforibed on his tomb, in the abby church of Melrofs. See Abercromby's Life of Alexander II.

1 Three men approached Alexander when afleep in his bed. These phantoms were St. Olaus, King of Norway, St. Magnus, Earl of Orkney, and St. Columba, abbot of Iona. The firth of thefe being a perfon of great stature, with a red coloured face, and clad with a royal apparel, looked him full with a ftern and terrible look The fecond was in his appearance younger, wonderfully handfome and very richly dreffed. The third, who was taller than the reft, and very violent in his manner, afked the King, in a most wrathful tone, whether he really intended to invade the Ebudes? Alexander answering in the affirmative, the phantom advised him, at his peril, to drop that defign and return home. After the King had related this awful dream to those about him, the wifest of his council diffuaded him very earneftly from the profecution of his defign : but perfiting in his former refolution, he was attacked by a violent diftemper which foon made an end of his life and rafh project togethei, Vide Torfæ. Hilt. Orcad. p. 163, 164.

Reginald

Reginald who had formerly reigned in Man, atfurmed the title of King of the Ifles. But his reign was tyrannical and fhort. Summoned by his patermount Lord to appear before him, he found himfelf under the neceffity of repairing to Norway, and was imprifoned there for his ufurpation and cruelties t.

HACO, upon receiving intelligence that his daughter and fon-in-law, Harold, the fon of Olave the Black, had unfortunately perifhed, committed the administration of all public affairs in the E-budes to John, the fon of Dugal, and grandson of Somerled, till some one of the blood royal could be conveniently fent into that province +. But John arriving in Man, affumed the regal title, without regarding either his mafter's inftructions or the inclinations of the people. But the people highly provoked by this indignity, and firmly at-tached, at the fame time, to their lawful Prince, drove the ulurper out of the island, and having foon after concerted matters with their neighbours, declared Magnus, the fon of Olave, their King *; and Haco recognized his title. John, difappointed in his ambitious views by the exaltation of a rival, began to hearken to the advantageous offer of the Scottish monarch. Alexander II, had in vain employed the ftrongeft folicitations and ampleft promifes to corrupt him II; but the conjuncture was now more favourable; and Alexander III. had all the fuccefs he could defire in feducing John from his allegiance to his fovereign.

The

[‡] Chron Man. ad ann. 1249.

[†] Torfæ. Hift. Orcad. p. 164.

^{*} Chron. Man ad ann. 1250.

H Torfæ. Hift Orcad. p. 164,

THE Scottish and Norwegian historians give contradictory accounts of the manner in which the Weftern lifes were reunited to the dominions belonging to the crown, in the reign of Alexander III. Buchanan's account is as follows:

" In the year 1263, Acho, King of Norway, having approached the coaft of Kyle with a fleet of one hundred and fixty fhips, landed twenty thoufand men near a town of that diffrict called Air. His pretext for making war upon the Scots was, that fome of the ifles which had been promifed to his anceftors by Donald Bane, had not been given uÐ. Thefe were Bute, Arran, and the two Cumras, places which had never been reckoned in the number of the Ebudes. But to one who wanted only fome colour of reafon for making war, it was enough that these places were islands. Acho reduced the two largest of them before any opposition could have been made to the purpole. Elated by this fuccefs, he made a defcent upon Cunningbam, and engaging in battle with the Scots, in a place called Larges, was overpowered by their fuperior numbers, and reduced to the finameful neceflity of flying with the greatest precipitation to his ships. But the loss of that battle was not his only misfortune. A violent tempeft deftroyed the greateft part of his fleet, immediately after the action was over; and it was with no fmall difficulty that he made his efcape into the Orkneys with a few thips that remained after that calamity. The Norwegians left fixteen thousand men in the field of battle, and the Scots five.

" Асно, overwhelmed with grief upon the lofs of his army, and the death of a favourite youth, diffinguished by his valour, died foon after. His fon, Magnus, who had lately come over from Norway, feeing things in a much more defperate fituation than he expected, and as he could not get any new fupplies from home before the fpring teafon, was willing to terminate the quarrel by a definitive treaty of peace. There were feveral reafons which confirmed him in this difpofition. The Hlanders were difaffected, and those on the continent of Scotland, on whose affiftance his father had laid no fmall ftrefs, had entirely abandoned his intereft. Man had been already reduced by the eveny, and it was very probable that the other ifles were foon to follow the fame fate.

fon,

" MAGNUS was eafily determined by fo many weighty confiderations to offer a peace : but Alexander would not hearken to any propositions made by the Norwegian ambaffadors, till it fhould be previoufly agreed that the Ebudes fhould be ceded to him, and annexed to his crown for ever. This preliminary article having been at last admitted, a final pacification was concluded on the following terms : That the King of Scots fhould immediately pay four thousand merks of filver to his brother of Norway, as an equivalent for the Ebudes, of which the latter made a total renunciation, and together with that fum, an annual tax of an hundred merks of filver, was to be paid by Alexander, and his fucceffors, to Magnus, and his. It was further ftipulated, that Margaret, the daughter of the former, should marry Hungonan, the fon of the latter, as foon as their ages fhould permit *."

IN this manner were the Weftern Ifles recovered by Alexander III. of Scotland, and upon thefe

* Buchan. Rer. Scot. Hift. lib. vii. cap. 62, 63.

terms

268

terms c:ded by Magnus of Norway, if we are to give faith implicitly to the Scottifh hiftorians.

BUT the account given by Torfæus of the matter, after the authors of his country, and the public records kept there, is in fubftance this.

" In the year 1263, the petty Kings of the Sodorian ifles acquainted their fovereign Haco of Norway, that Kiarnach, Earl of Rofs, had committed the moft cruel devaftations in their territories, that he had deftroyed many of their towns, villages, monafteries and churches, and that he had in the moft barbarous manner killed all the people that fell in his way, without any diffinction of age or fex. They notified further, that the King of Scots had declared he would never defift till all the Ebudes poffeffed by the Norwegians fhould be reunited to his dominions t.

"HACO, a Prince of uncommon abilities, and of a military genius, heard all this with a becoming indignation; and having without lofs of time fitted out a vaft fleet, fet fail for Scotland, on the 11th of July 1263. He arrived in Shetland on the 13th, and flaid there for two weeks; and after having fettled his affairs in Orkneys and Caithnefs, fleered his courfe first for the Lewis, and afterwards for Sky. Here he was joined by Magnus, King of Man, and by Dugal, one of thofe great Lords in the ifles, who had affumed the regal title. Haco was piloted by this vaffal King to the Sound of Mull, and from Mull to Kiarary. He had ordered all his fhips of war to rendezvous in this ifle, and here he received a confiderable acceffion of ftrength by the junction of a fleet which the Islanders had brought to his aid.

‡ Torfx. Hift. Orcad. p. 165.

"WHILE Haco was fettling his plan of operations at Kiarary, he detached a fquadron of fifty fhips to the ifthmus of Kintyre, and another confifting of fifteen to the ifle of Bute. The firft was commanded by Magnus, King of Man, and Dugal, the Sodorian Prince already mentioned. Three or four Norwegian Captains, and one of the Ebudenfian Chieftains commanded the other. Thefe two fquadrons had all the fuccefs that could be defired. The conqueft of Kintyre was finithed in a fhort time. Two Lords who bore the greateft fway in that province delivered it up to the Norwegians, fivore fealty to Haco, and brought in a thoufand bullocks for the ufe of his army. The caftle of Bute furrendered, and the whole ifland was fubdued, and a confiderable body of troops fent from it did no fmall damage on the continent of Scotland.

"WHILE Haco lay before the ifle of Arran, after having reduced all the other Ebudes *, the King of Scots fent ambaffadors to him with propofitions of peace. The Norwegian monarch, after receiving feveral different meifages in the fame flile, began to liften to the overtures made, and fent two bifhops and three laics of diffinguifhed talents, invefted with a public character to fettle all differences. Alexander was in appearance fond of an accommodation, but infifted peremptorily that Arran, Bute, and Camray, flouid be reftored to the crown of Scotland. Haco, unwilling to grant fuch advantageous terms, and perceiving that he had been too long amufed with the infidious promifes of an enemy, who had been fpinning out the time with affected delays, till he could draw a more numerous army together, broke off the treaty, and recommenced hoftilities. He had in vain made a new propofal, that he and the King of Scotland fhould meet in a certain place, at the head of their respective forces, and either fettle a lafting peace, or terminate their differences in a pitched battle.

^{*} Torfæ, Hift. Orcad. p. 166.

270

"Haco finding that his enemy had only made an equivocal declaration, in antwer to this generous propofal, fent Magnus and Dugal of the Itles, together with fome more of his general officers, at the head of a fleet, confifting of fixty fail, and a numerous body of land forces, into the bay of Skipaftord *. Thefe generals having landed their troops, penetrated into the country—deftroyed all the villages around Loknlovie—laid wafte a country from which one of the Scottifh earls derived his title, and carried back all the plunder they could find to their fhips."

* Skipaford is a Norwegian word, which fignifics, according to Torfarus, the Bay of fbips. In the confines of the fhies of Argyle and Dumbarton there is a bay which is now called Lach laung, a Galic word, of the fame import with the Skipafurd of the Norfe. Unlefs this Lach laung be the bay meant by Torfarus, and the writer whom he tranflates, it mult be the bay of Greenack. Each of thefe bays lies at a fmall diftance only from Lakn-love, i.e. Lach-lowond, a large frefh-water lake, that abounds with iflands, agreeably to the account given of it by the Norwegian writers. The tract of land which, according to the fame writers, gave his tile to a Scottifh earl, mult be the county of Lennox, or fome part of it : it cannot be either Lorn or Lochaber, as Torfarus imagined.

WHILE the fquadron commanded by Magnus lay in the bay of Skipafiord, a terrible tempet deftroyed a great part of it—the grand fleet lying at the fame time before an illand, in the mouth of the Clyde it may be prefumed, five transports were driven from their anchors, and wrecked on the coaft of Scotland. It was with extreme difficulty " that Haco's own galley was faved. The Scots feeing fo many of the Norwegian veffels ftranded, came down to the fhore in great numbers, and attacked them; but the Norwegians, fupported by a reinforcement fent from the fleet, defended themfelves with extraordinary valour, and maintained a defperate fight throughout all the night; till the Scots found it convenient to retire."

On the following day, Haco, notwithftanding the manifeft difadvantages of every kind to which his people were exposed, formed a refolution of landing, either to fhare the fame fate with his diffrefied forces on flore, or to relieve them out of fuch imminent danger. But the chief man of his council and army perfuaded him to keep the fea, and fend new fupplies of men to the party afhore. As the florm continued to rage without any intermiflion, it was not in his power to land more than eight hundred men, who had ten times their number to encounter. They fought, however, with undaunted refolution and vigour for a whole day. The enemy gave way in the evening, and withdrew to a place of fafety. The Norwegians purfued them, and after having diflodged them, retired to their fhips, and joined their companions.

"THE day after this engagement, Haco took up the bodies of the Norwegians who had been flain, and buried them in holy ground.—The winter winter now approaching, he left the ifle before which his fleet lay, and fleered his courfe for the North. In the courfe of his voyage through the Ebudes, he difinified Magnus, Dugal, and feveral other Sodorian lords, and appointed governors over the ifles and forts, of which he had made himfelf mafter. He arrived fafe in the Orkneys, and died foon after at Kirkwall *."

A NORWEGIAN hiftorian animadverts with fome degree of feverity on the Chronicle of Man, as well as upon the Scottifh writers, for aflerting that Haco effected nothing in this expedition; and I incline to think he had great reafon. It is hardly possible to believe that the battle of Larges, if ever fuch a battle was fought, was fo very fatal to the Norwegians as is reprefented by the Scottifh hiftorians. Their lofs amounted to fixteen thousand men, according to Buchanan, but twenty-five thousand, according to Boece; and neither of these writers could determine whether the Scottifh army was commanded on that occasion by Alexander the Third in perfon, or by Alexander Stewart, the great grandfather of King Robert the Second. From that and other circumftances it may be fairly concluded, that the records, or rather perhaps traditionary reports, from which they drew their account of Haco's misfortunes, must have been very imperfect.

IF the Norwegian fleet had been almost totally deftroyed by a tempest, if the greatest part of Haco's land forces had been cut off in the battle of Larges; if the Isle of Man had been reduced by King Alexander the Third of Scotland; and if a

* Torfr. Hift, Orcad. p. 165, 167, &c.

fpirit

fpirit of diffatisfaction generally prevailed in the other Ebudes; all which is alledged by our Scottifh hiftorians, it is ftrange that Magnus, the fon and fucceffor of Haco, with thefe and feveral other manifest difadvantages on his fide, could have been able to procure a peace, in every refpect more honourable to him than to the other contracting power. In vain has it been objected by Abercromby *, that Magnus would never have given up the acquifitions supposed to have been made of Bute, Arran and the Comras, together with Man and the other liles, if his father had effected any thing confiderable .--- Magnus was young, a ftranger to the art of war, and of a pacific disposition. The Ebudes lay at a great diftance from the feat of his empire. The revenue fent from thefe ifles into his exchequer amounted only to ten merks of gold, and that was paid only at the acceflion of a new monarch. The expence to which his crown had been put in the late King's time, for fecuring thefe remote and unprofitable territories, would have probably overbalanced all the duties collected there fince the days of Harold Harfager. Belides all this, we learn from a Norwegian Chronicle, cited by Torfæus, that in the year immediately after Haco's death, the King of Scotland fent fome friars to treat with Magnus concerning the líles; a circumstance hardly credible, had his father's army and fleet received fo heavy a blow,

A PEACE at length was concluded at Pertb, in the year 1266; Alexander the Third of Scotland being prefent, together with his clergy and nobles, while the chancellor of Norway and one of his

* Mart. Atch. vol i. p. 323.

barons

barons represented King Magnus. The principal articles of the treaty were, That the Kings of Norway should lay no further claim to Man, or to the Sodorian Ifles :-- That thefe fhould for ever be-long to the Kings of Scotland, with all the fuperi-orities, homages, rents, fervices, and other rights pertaining to them, together with the patronage of the bishopric of Man; faving at the same time to the church of Drontheim her metropolitical jurif-diction over that fee :- That the inhabitants of the ifles ceded to the crown of Scotland fhould enjoy all the heritages and privileges formerly granted to them by the Kings of Norway, without being brought to account for any thing they had done before that time in favour of their old mafters :---And that the faid inhabitants fhould be governed for the future by the Kings of Scotland, and fub-ject to its laws, unlefs any of them fhould incline to refide elfewhere; in which cafe, they were to have full liberty to remove unmolefted with their effects.

On the other hand, King Alexander obliged himfelf and his fucceffors to pay, as an equivalent for the renunciation made by his brother Magnus, four thousand merks fterling, within four years, from the date of the treaty—together with an annual pension of one hundred merks sterling, to be paid in the church of St. Magnus in the Orkneys, by Alexander and his fucceffors, to the King of Norway and his fucceffors for ever.

WE are told by the Scottifh hiftorians, that to eftablifh this peace upon the moft folid foundation, another article was inferted in the treaty, by which the contracting parties obliged themfelves reciprocally to marry Hungonan, the fon of Magnus, to Margaret,

Margaret, the eldeft daughter of Alexander. But the ion of Magnus who married the Lady Margaret of Scotland, was not called Hungonan, but Eric; and he was not born till the year 1270, that is, four years after the peace had been concluded at Perth *. So very ill informed were the Scottifh writers with regard to almost all the disputes and transactions between Alexander, Haco, and Magnus 4.

THEY give us a long account of the mighty feats performed in Man by Alexander, lord high fteward of Scotland, and John Cummin, earl of Badenoch, who had been fent thither by Alexan-

* See the contract of marriage between Eric and Margaret, inter Fædera Anglix, tom. xi. p. 1079.

+ It is not improper to obferve that Abercromby, the first of our hiftorians who gave, and perhaps could have given, the Norwegian account of these diffricts and transactions, is far from being exact in the relation of them, which he drew out of Torfæus. He was either in too great hurry, or too much under the influence of national prejudice, while translating that author. His complaint, that the names of the ifles through which he made his progrefs, are very different, in the Norwegian Journal, from those now given them by the Scots, is not altogether just; and were it more io, the objection would fignify little. To those who know the fituation of the ifles through which Haco paffed, and have at the fame time any notion of the Galic and Norfe, the Journal is abundantly intelligible, and worthy of credit. The author of it feems to have affifted in the expedition. and to have been a spectator of every place and action. He may indeed have extenuated the loffes juftained by his countrymen upon that occasion : but furely an objection of greater force may be made upon the fame head, against the veracity of those writers who have appeared on the other fide of the queftion.

I add further from Torfæus, that Sturles, an eminent poet, cotemporary with Haco, gave a full defcription of the expedition in hercic verte, and that the greateft part of his composition was extant in that author's time: if fo, the Norwegian annals feem in this matter to be preferable to thole of Scotland.

276

der the Third; and of the vigorous refiftance made by Magnus, then King of Man and the Ifles, in defence of his people and crown. But the author of the Chronicle of Man, who lived in that very period, makes no mention of thefe things. After relating that Magnus, the fon of Olave, King of Man and the Ifles, died at his caftle of Ruffin in the year 1265, he adds, in the very next fentance, that the kingdom of the Ifles was tranflated in the following year to Alexander, King of Scots .- Whence we may conclude, that the Scottish hiftorians must have been milled in their relation of these matters, as well as in the account they give us at the fame time of the conqueft of all the Weftern Ifles by the lord high fleward of Scotland, the earls of Athol, March and Carnock, together with the thanes of Argyle and Lennox. If this conquett had been made before the treaty of Perth, it is matter of no finall wonder that the King of Scots thould have granted fuch extraordinary conditions on that occasion to his adverfary of Norway. If after it, one can hardly believe that the petty Kings, lords and chieftains of the Ifles, men whofe territories lay at confiderable diftances from one another, men diffracted in their councils, all too feeble to contend with a powerful Monarch in their neighbourhood, if clofely united, and all perfectly fenfible that Magnus had abandoned them for ever, could have thought of making any refiftance against their new master, especially as their late fovereign had fecured their eftates, privileges and rights of every kind, in the ftrongeft manner. This and Buchanan's filence confidered, I am apt to fulpect, that this conqueft received all the existence it ever had from the invention of Boece, Boece, who has, in too many inflances, forgotten or neglected the first rule which an historian should have in view.

WE learn indeed from the little Chronicle fo often quoted, that the people of Man, four years after all the Ebudes had been ceded by Magnus of Norway, to Alexander, King of Scots, fought with great fpirit, though unfuccefsfully, againft an army fent by that Monarch to reduce them *. From that time, till the crown of Scotland, with all the dominions pertaining to it, was extorted from the unhappy John Baliol, by Edward the Firft of England, the He of Man continued in the performed the Scotter of Man continued in the poffeifion of the Scots. But about the latter end of King Edward's reign, one of the family of Montacute, who was of the blood royal of Man, faith Cambden +, having raifed a body of Englith adventurers, afferted his right to the ifland by force of arms, and drove the Scots out of it : but having plunged himfelf into a vaft debt by the expence attending this conqueft, he mortgaged the ifland to the famous Anthony Bee, bifhop of Durham, and patriarch of Jerusalem. Some time after the death of this bishop, Edward the Second made over the kingdom of Man to his favourite Peter de Gaveston; and when that minion could no longer enjoy the grant, gave it to Henry de Beaumont, with all the demefnes and royal jurifdiction thereunto belonging 1.

In the year 1313, Robert Bruce, King of Scots, after having belieged the caftle of Ruflin, which ‡ Cambden, ibidem.

was

^{*} Chron. Mann. ad ann. 1270.

⁺ Cambden, in his Continuation of the hiftory of Man.

278

was bravely defended by the English, took it at laft, reduced the whole island of Man, and made his nephew, Randolph earl of Murray, lord of it.—-Randolph, upon receiving this title, assumed the arms of the later Kings of that island. The arms of the older Kings of Man, I mean those of the Norwegian race, were, a ship with its fails furled, and the title in their feals was, Rex Mannia & Infularum *- The arms of the later Kings were three human legs linked together.

In the unfortunate reign of David Bruce, William Montacute, earl of Salifbury, recovered Man out of the hands of the Randolph family, and in a little time fold it, together with the crown thereof, to William Scrope. Upon the confifcation of Scrope's eftate, Henry the IV. of England beflowed the island and lordinip of Man upon Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland. But Piercy having been attainted, in about four years after this grant, the Isle devolved, by the King's favour, upon the Stanley family. It is almost needlefs to add, that the earls of Derby, of that family, enjoyed the title of Kings and Lords of Man, for many ages, till the fovereignty of it fell, by female fuccession, to the family of Athol.

THE vaft Continental effate of Sumerled, thane of Argyle, and the large acquisitions he had made in the Isles, at the expence of his brotherin-law, devolved wholly, some time after his death, on his two sons, Dugal and Reginald. The lordship of Argyle, fell to the share of the former, together with the entensive island of Mull,

* Cambdea, in his Continuation of the hiftory of Man.

and

279

and fome others of inferior note. The latter had Kintyre, Ila, and feveral more of the finaller Ebudes. The fucceffors of thefe two brothers, while the kingdom of Man and the Ifles remained while the kingdom of Man and the liles remained in the hands of Norwegian Princes, like thefe their allies, neighbours, and fometimes mafters, affumed the higheft titles, and made an extraordinary fi-gure for many ages. We have already feen that John, the fon of Dugal, the fame who had revolt-ed over to Alexander the Third, was dignified with the name of King. The pofterity of Regi-nald had pretenfions equally good to that appella-tion, and were more than equally able to fupport them. They accordingly bore the regal title for a long time. While the more immediate defcen-dants of Sumerled poffeffed the Sodorian Ifles, with a kind of royal jurifdiction, the Nordureys, or the illes to the North of Ardnamurchan, were go-verned by the viceroys fent thither by the Kings verned by the viceroys fent thither by the Kings of Man. Thefe viceroys or governors were gene-rally the fons, or brothers, or kinfmen of the reigning Princes. Of one of thofe lieutenants are defeended the MacLeods; a family once very pow-erful in the Northern division of the Ebudes. Their descent from the Kings of Man appears not only from tradition, and the genealogical tables of the fennachies, but likewife from the arms of the family; one branch of the two into which it has been divided, above five centuries back, retaining the three united legs, and the other a fhip with its fails furled.

BESIDES the petty Kings and powerful chief-tains fprung from Sumerled and the Nordureian governors, there were, in the two feveral divisions of the Weftern Ifles, many confiderable families; fome tome of a Scottifh extraction, and others originally Norwegians. At the head of each of thefe families was a perfon of high dignity and importance among his own people. His ordinary title was Tierna, or Armin, two words of much the fame fignification; the firft of them belonging to the Galic tongue, the fecond to the Teutonic. We learn from Torfæus and the Highland fennachies, as well as from many paffages in the Chronicle of Man, that thefe Tierns or Armins, called frequently the great men of the Ifles in that Chronicle, were much employed in the administration of public affairs, and of the utmost confequence at the time of electing Kings and governors. It appears from an express article of the pacification of Perth, above inferted, that Magnus took care to fecure the eftates, privileges and rights of all the great men in the Ifles, whether petty Kings, Chieftains, or Armins. It was provided in the fame article, that thefe great men, and all the other inhabitants of the illes, fhould be fubject to the Kings of Scotland, and governed by the laws and cuftoms of that realm for ever. But to me there feems to be no great temerity in affirming, that the Ifles were almost entirely independent of the Scottifh empire, and totally unreftrained by its laws for about two centuries after that transaction. The lords and great chieftains were absolute monarchs within their little principalities : all the laws known among their people were, the arbitrary will and pleature of their mafters, the decifions of ignorant brehons, the canons made by their priefts, abbots and bifhops, forme ftrange cuftoms defeended to them from their anceftors the Caledonians, and fome feudal inflitutions left among them by the Norwegians.

S A.

280

IT

281

IT does not appear that the great men of the Illes paid any pecuniary taxes to the government of Scotland during the period I have mentioned, or joined their arms with their fovereign against his enemies, till after the middle of the fifteenth century. The deftructive wars, foreign and do-meftic, in which the whole nation was miferably involved during that time, put a flop to almoft all legal proceedings in the heart of the kingdom, and much more in remote corners. Amidft thefe distractions, and the disrepect to laws necessarily attending them, it could not have been expected that Islanders, who enjoyed a fort of regal authority at home, and had nothing to fear from abroad, would have fpontaneoufly burdened themfelves, or their people, with any public duties. Upon the whole, it is hard to fay how far King Alexander III. eftablished his authority in the Isles; and after the death of that excellent Prince, and while the fatal difputes confequent upon it did remain, the Sodorian and Nordureian lords had the best opportunities they could defire of enlarging their power, and rendering themselves independent.

ANGUS, Lord of the Ifles, was led by political reafors, as well as by motives of a more laudable kind, to engage in the caufe of Robert Bruce. When that illuftrious Prince, after the unhappy battle of Methven, had fled into the Weftern Highlands, purfued by the force of an English Monarch, extremely formidable, and unable to fecure a fafe retreat in any other part of his own dominions, Angus received him into his caftle of Saddle, protected him there for fome time, and furnished him with boats, to transport himfelf. himfelf, and his finall party of trufty friends, into an objcure ifle on the coaft of Ireland.

WHEN fortune began to finile a little on the royal adventurer, Angus affifted him with the utmoft alacrity in recovering his paternal effate of Carrick; and when every thing was at flake for the laft time, the honour and life of his fovereign, the freedom and independency of his country, the exiftence of his friends and fellow patriots, all in the moft imminent danger of being fivallowed up by a prodigious army of foreigners, he joined him at Bannockburn with five thoufand men, fay the Highland fennachies, and did him a moft fubitantial fervice upon that occafion.

AFTER Robert had fully eftablished his authority in every part of his dominions, he gave to Angus feveral marks of an extraordinary regard. However sensible the King might have been that it was highly impolitic to increase the power of a lord of the Isles, he bestowed on his old friend, perhaps from a principle of gratitude, a confiderable part of the eftates formerly belonging to the Cummins of Lochaber and MacDougals of ' orn, two families that had deferved very ill of him, and had for that reason been forfeited.

THE grandfon of this Angus, John, lord of the Ifles, adopting a very different fyftem, abandoned the intereft of David Bruce, and efpoufed the caufe of Edward Baliol. Having obtained from that Prince, while acting the part of a Scottifh King, a right to all or moft of the Ebudes, after vindicating that right by the fuperiority of his ftrength, he began to afpire after a regal authority at home, and in purfuance of that defign, entered into a formal alliance with that powerful Prince, Prince, Edward the Third of England. But returning afterwards to his allegiance to his natural fovereign, Robert the Second of Scotland confirmed all the rights of his family, whether old or recent, and gave him his daughter in marriage.—Donald his for of that marriage was the famous Lord of the Ifles, who added the earldom of Rofs to the vaft polfeflions left by his anceftors, fought the battle of Harlaw, to defend that acquifition, againft the duke of Albany's army, and maintained his title, in fpite of all the efforts made by thofe in the adminification of that time,

THE two immediate fucceffors of Donald were either too powerful to be loyal fubjects, or too much the objects of public jealoufy and private refentment to be left in the undiffurbed poffession of their overgrown eftates. John, the laft of thefe great lords, provoked by injuries received from the court of Scotland, either really or in imagination, deluded at the fame time out of his duty by the Douglaffes, and bribed withal by Edward the Fourth of England, who took care to feed his immoderate ambition with the ampleft promifes, exerted his whole ftrength in fubverting the efta-blifhed government of his country, and in the end proved the ruin of his own family's greatnefs. He loft the earldom of Rofs, together with many other confiderable tracts of land which he had poffeffed in different parts of the Continent, and was of course reduced to a mediocrity of fortune, which difabled him effectually from being any longer formidable. The other chieftains and great men of the Ifles, who had been long the obfequious vallals, or at beft the impotent neighbours of Sumerled's posterity, embraced to favourable an

an opportunity of afferting their liberties, procured new rights to their effates from the crown, and became from that time forth uleful fubjects.

THIS vaft diminution of that almost unbounded power, of which the lords of the Isles had been posses of the second second second second second second James the Third, and after the middle of the fifteenth century.

DISSER-

Monuments of Antiquity, &c. 285

DISSERTATION XVII.

Of fome Monuments of Antiquity in the Weftern Iflands of Scotland. Occafional Obfervations upon the Genius, Manners, and Cuftoms, of the Hebridian Scots of the Middle Ages.

T HE counties of Dumbarton and Argyle, were the theatre of the first campaign of Julius Agricola in Caledonia. It is therefore probable, that confiderable detachments of the Roman army passed over from the continent into fome of the Southern Ebudes. It may likewise be taken for granted, that Agricola's fleet, in its return to South Britain, through the Deucaledonian Sea, was more than once under a neceflity of refitting in fome of the many excellent harbours of the Northern Ebudes. But whether the Romans took any long ftay in those places or not, it is certain that they have not left any monuments of antiquity there. The Norwegians and Druids are the only people who have left the least vestige of themselves behind them in those islands,

THE

Monuments of Antiquity

286

THE circles of ftones fo often mentioned by Offian, and fo frequent in the northern Ebudes; were the works of the Pictifh Druids, and though fimple in their conftruction, are not unworthy of the attention of the curious. They were the temples in which the old heathenifh priefts, employed by our anceftors in the fervice of their idols, performed the moft folemn offices of their fuperfition. There are many of thefe temples to be met with in the Eaftern Ebuda of Ptolomy, now called the Ifle of Sky. In the language of the country they are generally called Druidical houfes; and though the inhabitants have but a very confueed idea of Druidifm, ftill they agree in calling the circles holy places, and fometimes give them the name of temples *.

THAT the Caledonians, as well as other Celtic nations, worthipped the fun under the name of Grannius, admits of no doubt. An infeription, not many years fince dug out of the ruins of the Roman prætenture between the friths of Forth and Clyde, is a demonstration that the fun was one of the deities of Caledonia. Grannius is

* About half a century back, a farmer in the ifle of Sky imagined he had very good reafons for removing his houfes from that part of his farm where they formerly flood, to another part which he found had been once occupied by the Duids, and was confequently more aufpicious. The farmer was remarkably induftrious, and had of courfe more than ordinary fuccefs in his bufinefs. The confequence of his fuccefs was, that almost all his neighbours removed their houfes to the corfectated hillocks and circles which tradition had named, after the Druids, nor would they permit the leaft flone in thefe temples to be touched for fear of difobliging the genius of the place z fo unconquerable are the remains of a once prevalent fuperflition.

manifeftly

in the Scottifb Ifles.

manifeltly derived from Grian*, the Galic word for the fun. That those circles of ftone I have mentioned were constructed for the worship of the fun feems to me evident, from a circumstance communicated to me by a learned friend in the county of Inverness.

IN the confines between two diffricts of that county, called Badenoch and Strathfpey, is a very extensive and barren heath, through which the river Spey runs. On this heath are still to be feen entire, many of those Druidical circles of ftone. The name of the heath is Slia-ghrannas, which, literally translated, is the beath of Grannius. No perfon in that country underftood the etymon of Slia-ghrannas, till my friend paffed that way. The country round about this place was called of old, and by fome of the vulgar to this day, Gbriantochd, or the country of Grannius. Some people imagined that Gbriantochd had its name from a Highland clan called Grants, who poffers that country. To me it appears much more probable that the Grants, in Galic called Griantich, had their name from the country, and not from a pretended Legrand, as the genealogists of that tribe affirm

In fome parts of the continent of Scotland, the Druidical holy places confift of two or three circles which have the fame common center, and ^{*} Grian feems to me to be derived from Gre or Gne, fignifying the nature, and thein, the oblique cafe of tein, fire. In the Galic language, a confonant before an h or afpiration is always quiefcent, fo that Gre thein muft be pronounced Gre-ein, i.e. The efferce or natural fource of fire. Should this etymon appear unjult, the editor, and not the author of the Differtations, is to be blamed for it.

Monuments of Antiquity

greatly refemble, though in miniature, the famous Stonehenge in Salifbury plains. I have not feen any fuch double or triple circumvallations in the iflands, but have more than once observed one ftone broader than any one of those which form the circle, ftand detached from it at a certain diftance, This broad ftone is placed towards the Eaft, with a cavity in the top, and a fiffure either natural or artifical in one of its fides: these hollows were perhaps intended for receiving the libations offered to their Gods. The largest stones in the circumference of the Druidical circles, which I had occafion to fee in the Western illands are about three feet and a half above the ground, and near three feet broad. The diameter of the greatest area is about thirty feet. There is fomething agreeably romantic in the fituations chofen for thefe temples. The fcene is frequently melancholy and wild, the profpect is extensive but not diverfified. A fountain and the noife of a diftant river were always effeemed as requifite neighbours for those feats of dark and enthuliaftic religion.

THOSE large heaps of ftones which are called Cairns in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, are very numerous in the Ebudes. There are no lefs than feven fuch piles within the confines of a little village in the ifle of Sky. All cairns are not of a fimilar conftruction. Thofe which depart moft from the common form are called Barpinin, in the language of the country; thele refemble the barrows of England. The word Barp or Barrow is originally Norwegian. Cairn is a British word, which fignifies a heap of stones, either lying together in the greatest confusion, or piled up in fome fort of order. I have feen fome of these heaps that are three hundred feet in circumference at the base, and about 20 feet perpendicular in heighth. They are formed conically, and confist of stones of almost all fizes, as chance or the materials of the place directed. They lie generally near fmall arms of the fea which run into the land and receive rivers. They are always placed near the common road, and upon rifing grounds. The motives which induced the builders to rear up these piles in fuch places, were the advantage of the ftones, and a defire of exciting the traveller's admiration and devotion. Various have been the opinions of the learned concerning the intention of those Cairns, and concerning the people by whom they were collected. Some will have them to have been made by way of trophies, or with a view of perpetuating the memory of heroes flain in battle. Some conjecture that they were monuments erected by wayfaring men in honour of Mercury, the protector of travellers. Others fancy that they were feats of judicature for the old Brehons : and others are of opinion that they were the eminences on which our old Kings flood after their election; fo as to exhibit themfelves to the multitude. One or two critics have imagined that they were no more than boundaries which divided the effate of one great Lord from that of another : and many have thought that they were intended only for burial places.

in the Scottifb Ifles.

280

THE last of these opinions is undoubtedly the justeft. The fepulchral urns always found in every Cairn that has been hitherto examined, are fufficient to demonstrate the truth of it. These urns are deposited in large stone cossis, which lie in the center of the barrow. The cossin consists of fix rude flat ftones; one in the bottom, two in the T fides.

Monuments of Antiquity

290

fides, two more in the ends, aud another larger one above. There is fometimes a kind of obelitk which overtops the barrow, and ftands at the head of the coffin. The coffins are generally more than fix feet long, and the urns which they contain are half full of afhes and bones. The workmanfhip of their veffels is rather coarfe than otherwife *.

It is a queftion whether the Cairns were reared by the Norwegians or old Britains of Caledonia : there are Cairns in the different parts of the continent of Scotland, particularly in the Highland diffricts of the counties of Aberdeen and Invernefs, into which neither the Norwegians nor Danes ever penetrated. Befides, the mountains of Carnarvonthire have many monuments of the fame kind. It is therefore evident, that the old Britains erected fome of thefe fabrics; nor can it be affirmed that

* It is not above fifty years fince the Islanders underflood that the barrows were the repositories of the dead. Much about that time a gentleman in one of the ifles having occafion for flones to build a houfe, broke down one of thefe old tabrics. and coming to the bottom of it, near the center, lighted on the large flat itone which formed the cover of the coffin. Upon comparing a current tradition with the contrivance of the ftones, and the yound emitted from them, he immediately concluded that here was a itone cheft which contained a quantity of hidden treasure : full of this agreeable fancy, and dreading much at the tame time that a perfon of much greater authority in the country would infallibly deprive him of the treafure, if the tecret fhould once transpire, he obliged the workmen, by the interpolition of a most folemn oath, to conceal the happy difcovery. After this point was fettled, and a reasonable dividend promifed to every one of the workmen, the coffin was opened with due care : but the treasure found in it gave very little farisfaction, being no more than a small quantity of aftees contained in a yellow-coloured earthen verfel. the Norwegians were ftrangers to the fame art. We are told by Pomponius Mela, that the Druids burned and interred the bodies of their departed friends *. And Sir James Ware quotes a paffage from an ancient book of cannons, from which it appears that the old Irifh buried their dead in the fame manner.

WE learn from the epitaph of the robber, Balift1, and from feveral paffages in other ancient authors, that malefactors were fometimes buried under heaps of ftones. It is certain that the barrows in the ifles were intended for illustrious perfons, or those of the highest dignity among the people. The expence of time and labour, to which these huge piles must have fubjected the builders, together with the coffins and urns found within them, leave no room for a doubt in this matter. In one of these barrows which I faw broke open, there were found four different coffins placed at fome diftance from a larger one in the centre. Each of these contained an urn with ashes and some half burnt bones. The coffin or cheft in the middle was certainly the repolitory of a great Chieftain or King, and thole around belonged to perfons who were either his near relations, or heroes of a lefs exalted character.

THERE is a proverbial expression common in the Highlands and islands to this day, from which we may form a conjecture of the manner of erecting these piles, and the use for which they were intended. The expression is, I shall add a stone to your Cairn \uparrow ; that is to fay, I shall do your memory all the honour in my power, when you are no more. I fhall contribute to raife your monument. This is the language of petitioners, when fenfible the favours they afk cannot in all probability be fufficiently acknowledged till after the benefactor's death. The religious belief of thefe times obliged every pious traveller to add a ftone to the pile of the dead. The larger the ftone the more to the honour of the departed fpirit which was thought to hover around his heap, and to rejoice over the piety of the traveller. If the Cairn belonged to a man of diftinguithed merit, who died in the caufe of his tribe, or was reared in memory of a famous bard, the whole community came on appointed days to increafe the pile, and fend it down with luftre to pofterity. Hence we may account for the bulk of thofe little hills, tho' reared in times when carriages and mechanical engines of all kinds were little known.

memory

^{*} De Situ O b lib. iii. cap. 2.

⁺ Curli mi clocher do charge.

AMONG all the monuments of antiquity found in the Weftern Iflands, the ruinous forts, fo frequent there, deferve the firft notice. The irregular and uncommon conftruction, the fimilarity of their magnificent fituations, and the almost unintelligible peculiarities of their workmanship, feem to render them very curious objects for antiquaries. THESE forts are, in the language of the isles, called Duns, in that of the Norwegians, Burgbs, and in the Irish, Raths. The first of these names

THESE forts are, in the language of the ifles, called Duns, in that of the Norwegians, Burgbs, and in the Irifh, Ratbs. The firft of thefe names is a Celtic word, which fignifies a hill or eminence in almost all languages *. It was customary among the ancient nations to build their castles or places of defence upon high grounds, in order to difcover the enemy before he approached, and to repel his affaults with greater facility. When the inconveniences of fuch fituations appeared, the places of defence were built in low grounds; but they ftill retained the old names of Duns, Raths, Burgs or Bergs *.

^{*} See Bull. Dict. Celt. vol. i. p. 2.

IT will be no eafy matter to prove that the Caledonians, Picts, or ancient Scots of Britain, had ftone edifices of any kind. The cafe was the fame with the Irifh, till after the Normans were fettled among them: and before Alfred's time there was fcarce a royal palace, or a houfe for divine worfhip in England, built of any other materials than timber \pm .

SOME perhaps will be furprized to hear that the piratical nations of Scandinavia fhould have underftood any one of the arts of polifhed life better than our anceftors. It is unqueftionably certain, that the oldeft forts on the Weftern and Northern coafts of Scotland were erected by the barbarians of the Northern Europe. Tradition has hitherto preferved the names of feveral Norwegian chiefs, who built the moft confiderable forts in the Ebudes 1.

ALL the Norwegian towers in the Ebudes were of a circular form. The old fquare caftles there are of a much later date. Those Norwegians who built these towers must have understood the art of

* Cafaubon, in his notes upon 'trabo, obferves that the Πb_{F705} of the Greeks, the Burg of the Germans, and the Brica of the Spaniards, all fignify a Hill, in their original fignifications; fo Arx, in Latin fignified the top of a hill, as well as a caftle.

+ Afferius.

I Kynninburg, Kernburg, Bosewick.

quarrying

Monuments of Antiquity

294

quarrying, forming, and laying flones, in great perfection, and have used mechanical powers of which the islanders of late ages have no conception. The expence of working and carrying the flones to the very fummit of a high hill, or to the edge of a dreadful precipice, through almost impassible paths, must have been very confiderable, and indeed superior to what can well be imagined. One of the forts which J had occassion to view, flands on the edge of a rock which hangs over the ocean, and is of an amazing height. The other fide of the rock against which you approach the fort, is a fleep ascent of more than half a mile, and all the flones which composed the fort must have been carried up that hill. This fort is in the Southern extremity of the island of Barra.

MANY of thefe ftructures are ftill pretty intire, and almoft every one of them is fituated upon a hill, commanding a very extensive prospect, or upon a fmall ifland of difficult accets, or upon a precipice every way hideous. As they were deflined for watch towers, as well as for places of ftrength, they are built and connected through irregular diffances, every one of them is in fight of another, and they follow the windings of the fea coaft and valleys. The Norwegians being foreigners, and confequently under continual apprehensions either from the natives, or from the Scots of the continent, took care to contrive thefe fortreffes, fo as that the alarm in cafe of an invafion might run immediately from one division of the country to another. On fuch occasions they raifed great pillars of fmoke in the day time, by fetting fire to a great quantity of combuftible matter. matter, and at night made fignals of diffrefs by burning whole barrels of pitch.

THE most curious fabric of the Norwegian kind that is to be feen in any part of the Highlands or iflands is in Glenelg, within two miles of the firth which divides that part of the continent from the isle of Sky. This fabric is of a circular form, about thirty four feet high, and includes an area thirty feet in diameter. The wall is double : the inner one ftands perpendicular, and that without falls in gently till it unites with the other near the top of what may be called the first flory. The opening between the two walls is four feet broad at the bottom, and each of the walls is four feet in thicknefs; fo that both, including the aperture between them, are twelve feet thick at the foundation. The ftones are large and better chofen and more judiciously laid than can be well conceived. There is neither lime nor any other kind of cement in the walls, and the ftones are indeed placed with fo much art, and fo beautifully inferted into one another, that none was neceffary.

BETWEEN the two walls there are laid in a polition nearly horizontal, different rows of large thick flat flones which were at firft near as clofe to one another as the deal-boards of a floor. Thefe united flones go all the way round the edifice, and form for many different flories of uneqal heights, from fix to four feet; the one flory rifing above the other to the part where the two walls meet. A gentleman * of that country, to whofe knowledge and induftry I am indebted on this fubject, informed me that fome of the old men in the country who faw this Dun intire, were of opinion that the rows of flat flones afcended in a fpiral line round the building, and fupplied a communication within the walls from the foundation to the top.

^{*} The reverend Mr. Donald MacLeod.

WHERE the two walls join, there is a regular row of large flat ftones four inches thick, which project horizontally towards the area, from the face of the inner wall. There was another row of fimilar ftones which projected in the fame manner, about eight feet above the lower tire. But the barbarity of a military man employed by the government in that country, has deftroyed this curious monument of antiquity. In this whole building nothing is more curious than the rows of windows, or window-like-apertures in the inner wall. They rife in a direct line above each other, from the bottom to the fummit of the ftructure : two of them are detached from the reft, and begin at the diftance of about thirteen feet from the foundation. It appears that there have been fix rows of the windows first mentioned, all of the fame breadth, that is a foot and a half, but unequal in the heights, fome of them being but two, and others three feet high. There is no ap-pearance of a window in the outer wall, nor of any other opening excepting the door, which communicates with a little circular flone fabric called the Houfe of the Druids.

It muft be confeffed that there are fome things in the conftruction of this and the other old towers in the iflands which cannot eafily be underftood. It is likely that the feveral wide fpaces which lay between the two walls were defigned for ftorehoufes, beds, and places of arms; but it in the Scottifb Isles.

it is difficult to fay what might have been the intention of the windows or openings in the inner fide of the walls, and of the circle of flat ftones which projects from the top towards the area. We cannot learn by tradition, or otherwife, that thefe buildings were ever covered above. The men had fmall buts within the areas, and the governor had a kind of hall for his particular ufe. The walls had battlements of one kind or other, to which there was an afcent either by ladders or through the paffages in the middle. In times of war a centinel flood conftantly on the battlements in a kind of centry box; his bufinefs vas to cry aloud at certain intervals, fo as to con-vince the enemy without, that the fort was not to be taken by furprize. The Norwegians called this centinel Gok-man. He was obliged, by the rules of his office, to deliver all he had to communicate in extemporary rhymes. A large horn full of fpirituous liquor ftood always befide him to ftrengthen his voice and keep up his fpirits. It is little more than half a century fince this Norwegian cuftom was last observed in an old tower belonging to a Chieftain whole effate lay in one of the remoteft of the Weftern Islands Torfæus fays *, that the great men of Norway employed fuch Gok-men, not only for giving the alarm in cafe of danger, but likewife to inform the generous lord of the caftle if they spied a vessel in diftress at sea.

THE boats which were used by the ancient inhabitants of the Ebudæ, ought not to be forgot in deferibing their ancient curiofities. We are told

^{*} Rer. Orcad. Hiftor. p. 8.

Monuments of Antiquity

298

told by Solinus, that the Britons and Irifh committed themfelves to the mercy of a tempeftuous fea in wicker hulls covered with cow hides *. It is not above thirty years fince one of thole South Britifh boats or curachs was ufed in the ifle of Sky: and though the Norwegians had taught the Iflanders the ule of building boats with wood in a very early period, yet thefe curachs were the only kind which they employed on ordinary occafions, till within a century back.

Some of the ancient curachs muft have been much larger than those feen in late ages. Marianus Scotus speaks of three devout Irishmen, who, upon having formed a resolution of leading a life of pilgrimage, left their country with great fecrefy, and taking with them provisions for a week, came in a boat made of skins, without fails or oars, after a navigation of seven days, into Cornwall. We are informed by Adamnan, that St. Cormack, another wrong-headed monk, who went from Iona to the Orkneys in queft of a proper hermitage, was with all his entuisafim wife enough to keep oars in his curach; by this precaution he got fafely through the ocean. These curachs mult have been of a tolerable fize, otherwise the romantic passeness.

THE curach in which St. Columba came from Ireland into Iona, muft have been little lefs than forty feet long, if the tradition hitherto preferved in that Ifland deferves credit. And we are told by Sidonius Appolinaris †, that it was no more than in the Scottifh Ifles.

* Vimineis Alveis. + Carm vii.

matter of amufement with the Saxon pirates of his time, to crofs the Britifh tea in fuch leathern veffels. Boats made of the fame materials, were very commonly ufed by other ancient nations, particularly by the Spaniards * and the Veneti near the Po \pm . It was in fuch transports that Cæfar wafted his men over the river Sicoris, before he attacked Pompey's lieutenants near Ilerda \pm .

BESIDES thefe wicker pinnaces, the ancient inhabitants of Caledonia had a kind of canoe in which they fifhed on rivers and freth water lakes. This kind of canoe was hollowed out of a large tree, either with fire or tools of iron. In the Galic of Scotland, a boat of that make was called Ammir or trough, and Cotti in the language , of Ireland. A few of thefe canoes are ftill to be feen in the Wettern Highlands : and Virgil was not perhaps far miftaken, when he imagined that the first experiments in navigation were made in fuch bottoms ||. It cannot be afferted that the filanders had galleys, or what they called long thips, till the Norwegians were fettled among them. After that period they furely had fuch veffels, and in imitation of their mafters, rowed about in them in queft of plunder from fea to fea through almost all the feasons of the year **.

THE hiftories of Scotland are full of the depredations committed by the Islanders of the middle

^{*} Strabo. + Georg, lib iii. + Lucan Phar. I iv.

^{||} Alnos primum fluvii fenfere cavatas. Georg. 1.

^{} The fame practice took place among the ancient inhabitants of the Grecian iflands, foon after they knew how to conftruct galleys. Thucid. lib, 1, dle and lower ages. The annals of Ireland complain loudly and frequently of the Hebridian Red Sbanks. The petty Kings of Ireland were continually at war with enemies, either foreign or domeftic, and had conftant recourfe to the affiftance of the Hebridian Scots. Mercenary foldiers have been always remarkably rapacious, and by all accounts thele Scots were not inferior in cruelty and barbarity to any foreign allies. Whenever they met with a repulfe in Ireland, they fled home in their fhips, and plundered the South Weft coafts of Caledonia in their way : fuch was the conduct and art which they imbibed from their Norwegian conquerors.

WHEN the Hebridian chiefs and captains returned home after a fuccefsful expedition, they fummoned their friends and clients to a grand entertainment. Bards and fennachies flocked in from every quarter; pipers and harpers had an undifputed right to appear on fuch public occasions. These entertainments were wild and chearful, nor were they unattended with the pleafures of the fentiments and unrefined tafte of the times. The bards tung, and the young women danced. The old warrior related the gallant actions of his youth, and ftruck the young men with ambition and fire. The whole tribe filled the Chieftain's hall. The trunks of trees covered with mofs were laid in the order of a table from one end of the hall to the other. Whole deer and beeves were roafted and laid before them on rough boards or hurdles of rods wove together. Their pipers played while they fat at table, and filence was obferved by all. After the feaft was over, they had ludicrous entertainments, of which fome are still acted in the Highlands.

in the Scottifb Isles.

Highlands. Then the females retired, and the old and young warriors fat down in order from the Chieftain, according to their proximity in blood to him. The harp was then touched, the fong was raifed, and the Sliga-Crechin, or the drinking thell, went round.

IT is a great queftion with the prefent Highlanders, what liquors were drunk at the feafts of their predeceffors. They find them frequently mentioned in their old fongs under various names; but it is univerfally allowed that they were of an intoxicating kind. We are told by Diofcorides, that the ancient Britons drank a ftrong liquor made of barley, which they called Curmi. This furely was the drink ufed by the Albanian Britons, and old Hebridian Scots; for in their language, to this day, every great feaft is called Curme, as in their apprehension drink is the very life of fuch entertainment. Some have imagined that the Ufke-bai, the favourite liquor of the modern Highlanders, is the fame with the Curmi of their forefathers; and there can be no ftrong objection to this opinion. The Gauls used their Cervifia *; the Germans their Humor ex Hurdeo; and all these liquors are evidently of the fame origin, and made of perhaps the fame materials. But however that may have been, it is certain that the Islanders were furnished with ftrong drink in a very early period ; nor were they sparing of it at their publick entertainments, whether of a feftal or funereal kind. Whenever the gueft was placed in his feat, he was obliged, by the fashion of the land, to drink off a draught of their Water of Life, out of a large family cup or fhell. This draught was in their language called a Drink of Ufkebai : and the gueft had no fooner finished that potion than he was prefented with a crooked horn, containing about an Eng ifh quart, of ale. If he was able to drink all that off at a time, he was rather highly extolled, than condemned in the least for intemperance.

* Plin. Nat. Hift. lib. xxii. cap. 35.

Monuments of Antiquity

THE births of their great men were attended with no rejoicings or feaffing by the old Hebridians. But their funerals were celebrated with great pomp, and followed with magnificent entertainments : all the Chieftains of the neighbouring tribes attended on fuch occafions, and came accompanied with a numerous retinue of their firft men, and all well armed. After inviting people of fuch rank from their refpective habitations to perhaps a diftant ifland, it was incumbent on thofe principally interefted in the folemnity, to difplay the utmoft magnificence of expence. Ar the funeral proceflion, the men belonging to

Ar the funeral procefion, the men belonging to the different Chieftains were regularly drawn up, taking their places according to the dignity of their leaders. They marched forward with a flow pace, and obferved great decorum. A band of pipers followed the body, and in their turns played tunes, either made for that occafion or fuitable to it. Great multitudes of female mourners kept as near the coffin as pollible, and made the moft lamentable howlings, tearing their hair and beating their breafts. Some of theie, after the paroxyfms of their zeal or affected grief, had in fome meafure fubfided, fung the praifes of the deceafed in extemporary rhimes. The male relations and dependents thought it unmanly to fhed tears, or at leaft

in the Scottifb Isles.

303

leaft indecent to betray their want of fortitude in public *.

IF there were any characteriftical diverfities in genius, Manners, and cuftoms, of the Iflanders, when compared to their neighbours on the continent, they muft have borrowed them from the Norwegians, who had been long their fuperiors, and who of confequence muft have introduced their own tafte, fafhions, and laws, among them. Hence we may account for that difpolition and attachment which the inhabitants of the Ebudes difcovered to piracy and poetry, in a fuperior degree to any other tribe of the Albanian Scots.

DISSER-

^{*} Fæminis lugere honeftum eft, viris meminisse. Tacitus de mor. Germ.

304

DISSERTATION XVIII.

Of the Scottifh and Pictifh Dominions, before they were united under one Sovereign.

A VING fhewn, in the courfe of the preceding differtations, that the Picts and Scots were the genuine pofterity of the Caledonians, though divided into feparate kingdoms, it is neceffary I fhould throw fome light on the extent of their refpective dominions. — That want of records which has involved their ancient hiftory in obfcurity, has alfo left us in the dark with regard to the real boundaries of their territories.

ACCORDING to two ancient fragments of Scots hiftory, publifhed in the appendix to Innes's Critical Effay, Fergus, the fon of Erc, reigned over Albany, from Drumalbin to the fea of Ireland and Inchegall*. The fea of Ireland is a boundary well underftood. The Weftern iflands of Scotland, formerly the Ebudes of the Romans, are called

Inche

^{*} De fitu Albaniæ, quæ in Ye figuram hominis habet,

Of the ancient Scots and Picts.

Inche Galle to this day. In the eighth century thofe iflands fell into the hands of the Norwegians, who, like all other foreigners, were called Gauls by the Highlanders of the Continent. Inche is an abbrevation of Innis, which in the Galic fignifies an Ifland; fo that Inchegalle, literally translated, is the Ifles of firangers. How far Drumalbin, the other boundary mentioned in the fragment, extends, is not yet determined by antiquarians.

The word Drumalbin, literally translated, fignifies the Ridge of Albany. Agreeable to this interpretation, it is called by Adamnan, the writer of Columba's life, Dorfum Britaniæ, or a Chain of hills, according to the genius of the Latin tongue. Thefe hills have been confined to a principal branch of the Grampian mountains, which extends from the Eaftern to the Weftern Sea. But the true meaning of the name implies that this Ridge of bills muft have run from South to North, rather than from Eaft to Weft.

THE anonymous author of another finall piece concerning the ancient hilfory of Scotland, was, according to his own testimony, informed by Andrew bishop of Caithness, who flourished in the twelfth century, that Albany was of old divided into seven kingdoms. All these petty ringdoms are described, and their boundaries settled pretty exactly. The two last of those dynasties mentioned in that fragment are the kingdom of Murray, including Ross, and the kingdom of Arragatheil*. According to Cambden and Usher, the territories of the more ancient Scots were confined within ^{*} Sextum regnum fuit Murray et Rofs. Septimum regnum fuit Arregaithel.

The extent of the Dominions

306

Cantyre, Knapdale, Argyle, Braidalbain, and fome of the Weftern Iflands. Cambden believed too precipitately, that Iona was made over to Columba by Brudius, King of the Picts.

ADAMNAN, who wrote the hiftory of the life of Columba, and was himfelf abbot of Iona, relates, that the faint was courteoufly received by Cona¹, King of the Scots. As Adamnan has been very minute in his hiftory, it is far from being probable that he would forget Brudius, had he given fuch a benefaction to Columba.

THE author of the Critical Effay is more liberal to the Scots than Cambden and Ufher, and extends their ancient territorics to a branch of the Grampian mountain which runs all the way from Athol to the fea coaft of Knodort*. But as he had very juftly exposed the miftake of Bede with regard to Iona, and as it does not appear from any other author, that either Brudius or any other Pictifh King poffeffed a foot of ground from the Glotta to the Tarvifium of the ancients, he might have given all the North-weft coaft, from Clyde to Dunfbyhead, as alfo the Cathanefia of his anonymous author, to the kingdom of Arreghael.

THE Galic name Arreghael, or rather Jarghael +, was, in the Latin of later ages, changed into Ergadia : and it appears from a charter granted by the Earl of Roís, and confirmed by Robert the Second of Scotland, that Garloch, a diftrict which lies at a confiderable diftance from Knodort, to the North, was a part of Ergadia t. It is like-

^{*} Near the Isle of Sky in Inverness-fhire.

⁺ See a note on the word Jar-ghael, page 16.

[‡] Confirmatio donationis Comitis Rollia: Paullo Mactyre de terra de Gerloch, anno fecundo Roberti II.

Of the ancient Scots and Piels.

wife apparent, from the charters given by King Robert Bruce, to Thomas Randulph, Earl of Murray, that all the Weftern Continent, from Lochaber to Eaft Rofs, was comprehended within the Ergadia of the antients.

WE learn from Bede t, that in the year 603, Ædan, King of the Britifh Scots, came againft Ordilfred, King of the Northumbrians, at the head of a very numerous and gallant army \parallel . In the genealogical feries of the Scottifh Kings given by Innes, from his authentic Chronicles, Ædan, or Aidan, is the great grandfon of Fergus Mac-Eirc. It is difficult to underftand how this King of Scots could have muftered up fuch a vaft army againft the Saul of the Englifh nation *, if his territories were pent up within the fmall principality of Cambden's Arregbael, or even the Ergadia of Innes. So far were the Picts from lending any aliftance to the Scots, that they were engaged in a clofe confederacy with the Saxons of that time.

THE Britons, it is true, were allies to Aidan, but they deferted him in the very crifis of this war. He certainly could not have any auxiliaries from Ireland, as Bede politively fays that the Irifh never committed any acts of hoftility againft the Englifh; on the contrary, that they always cultivated an inviolable friendfhip with them. We therefore have reafon to believe that Aidan's numerous army muft have entirely confifted of his own fubjects; and confequently that his dominions

‡ Hift. Ecclef. cap. 34.

|| Cum immenfo et forti exercitu.

* Adamn. Vita Columbæ. lib. 2.

com-

comprehended at least all the Western coast of Scotland, together with the bishops Cartbanefia.

BRUDIUS, the Pictifh King, who was converted to the Chriftian faith by Columba, had a kind of royal feat at Invernefs. This appears from the accounts given by Adamnan, in the life of that faint. From the fituation of this royal refidence we may conclude, that Murray, and very probably Rofs, which was of old annexed to that divifion of Albany, made a part of the Pictifh kingdom.

COLUMBA, in his journey to the palace of King Brudius, travelled over Drumalbin, or Adamnan's Dorfum Britaniæ. It is impossible to tell whether the faint went directly from Iona, or from a more Northerly part of those Western districts which were under his jurifdiction. But as there is a ridge of high hills all the way from Glengary, where Loch Ness terminates*, to the Frith of Taine, it is far from being improbable that Drumalbin extended that far, and that the kingdoms of the Scots and Picts were sparated by the frith and hills just mentioned.

ALL our historians have agreed that the inhabitants of Murray were a feditious and difloyal race of men, for feveral ages after the Scots had reduced Pictavia. They rebelled frequently against the posterity of Malcolm Canemore. One of those Princes found himself under the necessfity of transplanting that turbulent people into different parts of his kingdom. But it may be inferred, from the impatience with which they lived under the yoke of a new government, that they were of the Pictifh nation, and confequently that the dominions of that people extended much farther towards the North than fome of the Scottifh hiftorians are willing to allow.

the

^{*} Brudius had his feat at the end of this lake.

THE Picts and Saxons were alternately mafters of Laudonia, or those more Easterly countries which lie between the frith of Edinburgh and the river Tweed. We learn from Bede, that Ofwin, brother to St. Ofwald, and the seventh King of the Northumbrians, subdued the Pictish nation in a great measure, and made them tributary \pm . This Prince began his reign in the year 64.2. His fon Egfrid having formed a resolution to carry his conquests beyond the Forth, invaded the Pictish territories, and was cut off, with the greatest part of his army, in the year 685. A victory fo decisive produced great confequences, The Picts of that age recovered what their predecess had loft. The Eastern counties, or Laudonia, fell immediately into their hands.

It appears from Bede, that the Saxons continued mafters of Galloway, when he finifhed his Ecclefiaftical Hiftory. He gives an account of Candida Cafa, or whitehorn, where a bifhop of the Saxon nation was inftalled in his time. After Bede's death, the Picts recovered Galloway likewife, or made a conqueft of it; fo that before the extinction of their monarchy, all the territories, bounded on the one fide by the Forth and Clyde, and on the other by the Tweed and Solway, fell into their hands.

+ Bed. Hift. Ecclef. lib. 2. cap. 5. U 3

310 The extent of the Dominions, &c.

UPON the whole, it feems evident, that the antient Scots, fome time before the conqueft of Pictavia, poffeffed all that fide of Caledonia which lies along the North and Weffern ocean, from the frith of Clyde to the Orkneys. Towards the Eaft, their dominions were divided, in all appearance. from the Pictifh dominions, by thofe high mountains which run all the way from Lochlomond, near Dumbarton, to the frith of Taine, which feparates the county of Sutherland from a part of Rofs, and thofe high hills which pafs through the middle of Rofs, are very probably a part of the antient Drumalbin.

DISSER-

Of the Religion of the, &c. 311

DISSERTATION XIX.

Of the Religion of the antient Caledonians.

S O M E ingenious writers have been of opinion that Druidifm was never eftablifhed in Caledonia. It is difficult to fay, why affertions fo ill-founded were obtruded upon the world, if it was not to deduce the honour of the prefent prevalent fyftem of free-thinking from our remoteft anceftors. Irreligion is never one of the virtues of favage life : we muft defcend to polifhed times for that fcepticifm which arifes from the pride and vanity natural to the cultivated flate of the human mind. It is not now my bufinefs to enter into a controverfy with the who affirm that religion is no more than an engine of policy, and that the gods of all nations fprung from the timidity of the multitude in the firft ftages of fociety.

HAD the inhabitants of Britain role originally like vegetables out of the earth, according to the opinion of Cæfar and Tacitus, there might have been fome foundation for fuppoling that the Druidical fystem of religion was never known in Cale-U 4. donia. But as it is generally allowed that the inhabitants of both the divisions of Britain deduced their origin from nations on the Continent, it is reafonable to think that they carried along with them the gods of their anceftors, in their transmigration to this island.

THAT the Caledonians, in the time of Julius, Agricola, were not totally diffitute of religion, appears from a paffage in the fpeech which Tacitus puts into the mouth of Galgacus; in which that chieftain mentions both gods and a providence. The celebrated writer also observes, that after the Caledonians were worfted in the first action with the Romans, far from being intimidated, or cured of their own felf-fufficiency, they formed a refolution to renew the war with greater vigour. For this purpofe, fays Tacitus, they armed their young men, placed their wives and children in places of fafety, fummoned their feveral communities together, held public affemblies, entered into confederacies, and confirmed their engagements with facrifices and the blood of victims *.

DRUIDISM was certainly the original religion of all the branches of the Celtic nation : yet Cæfar obferves, that the Germans, who undoubtedly were principally defeended from the great Celtic ftock, had no druids among them. We have reafon to differ in opinion from that great man. Cæfar was too much ingroffed with his own vaft projects, to enter minutely into the theological infitutions of the Germans. Tacitus, who made the cuftoms and manners of Germany his particular ftudy, informs us that priefts poffeffed great influence in that country.

* Cœtibus et facrificiis conspirationem civitatem fancire.

forms

D R U I D, or rather Druthin, is originally a Teutonic word. Its meaning is, the fervant of God, or the fervant of Truth: Dru or Tru fignify God or Truth indifcriminately. It is certain that every German prieft was called Dry, and the Saxons of England brought that word from Germany into Britain.—The Englifth Saxons, before their conversion to Christianity, worthipped, it is apparent, the ancient Gods of Gaul, and nearly under the fame names. The Tuifco, or Tuifto of Germany, to whom the Saxons dedicated Tuefday, was the fame with the Teutates of Gaul; and the Thor of the Saxons was the Taranis of the ancient Gauls.

The meaning of Teutates is GOD THE FATHER OF ALL BEINGS: Dyu, in the ancient Britifh, which was undoubtedly the fame with the language of Gaul, fignifies God; and Tad, or Tat, in the Armorican dialect, is, to this day, the word for Father. The Thor of the Celto-Scythians of Germany was, as I obferved before, the Taranis of their neighbours to the South. In the ancient language of the Scots, both the names of this divinity are retained to this day, with a finall variation of the final fyllables. Torran, among the Highlanders, is the lower muttering of that awful noife.

^{*} Tarninach is probably a corruption of Nd'air-neambnach, or Tarnearnach, as it is pronounced, literally fignifying Heawenly Father; thunder being thought the voice of the fupreme Divinity. Or perhaps it may be derived from Torneonach literally an uncommon and wonderful noife: or from Nd'air-neonach, the Wrathful Father.

Of the Religion of the

THIS identity of religion which prevailed among the ancient Germans and Gauls, is a proof that tribes of the latter were the prevalent colonies of Germany. The Tectofages, a people of Gallia Norbonenfis, polleffed themfelves, according to Cæfar, of the moft fertile regions of Germany. The Boii and Helvetii, nations fprung from the Gaulifh flock, made very confiderable acquifitions near the Hercynian foreft. The Suevi were the moft powerful nation in Germany. Of the feveral tribes into which the Suevi were divided, the Senones pretended to be the moft noble and the moft ancient. Their pretenfions to antiquity Tacitus fupports with an argument arifing from the genius of their religion.

"AT a ftated time," faith the excellent hifto-"rian, all those who have derived their blood "from the Senones meet, in the perfons of their "reprefentatives or ambaffadors. This affembly "is held in a wood, confecrated by the auguries "of their predeceffors, and the fuperflitious fears of former ages. In this wood, after having "publickly facrificed fome unhappy man, they commemorate the horrible beginnings of their "barbarous idolatry." In this paffage every one may fee the ftrongeft features of Druidifm, painted in the moft lively colours, and placed in the cleareft point of light. It is unneceffary to obferve, that the Senones, who fent colonies into Italy and Germany, were originally a people of Gaul, and fettled near the Seine.

DURING the reign of Tarquinius Prifcus, that is, five hundred years before Cæfar was born, Ambigatus, King of the Celtic Gaul, finding that his territories were greatly overftocked with inhabitants.

ancient Caledonians.

tants, fent his two nephews, Bellovefus and Sigovefus, at the head of two powerful armies, in queft of fettlements in foreign countries. The province allotted by the Augurs to Bellovefus was Italy, and that to Sigovefus was the Hercynian foreft.—Livy has preferved this piece of hiftory; and according to Cæfar himfelf, the great univerfity and metrepolitical feat of Druidifm lay in the country of the Carnates; the fame Carnates whom Livy places among the fubjects of Ambigatus. WE have no reafon to believe, notwithftanding Cæfar's authority to the contrary, that there was any effential difference between the religion of Gaul and that of Germany. The victorious Boii, the Helvetii, the Tectofages and Senones, the Celtic nations of Sigovefus, and more effectially

WE have no reafon to believe, notwithftanding Cæfar's authority to the contrary, that there was any effential difference between the religion of Gaul and that of Germany. The victorious Boii, the Helvetii, the Tectofages and Senones, the Celtic nations of Sigovefus, and more efpecially his Carnates, could not have either forgot or defpifed their own religion, upon fettling themfelves in a foreign country. They certainly would not have difmiffed the Gods under whole aufpices they had been fo fuccefsful. The conquerors muft rather be naturally fuppofed to have eftablifhed their own fpiritual infitutions upon the ruins of thole which had done fo little fervice to the conquered.

It is univerfally agreed that Druidifm was eftablifhed in South Britain. The fuperintendant of the whole order, it has been faid, refided there : and we learn from Cæfar, that thofe who ftudied to underftand the deepeft myfteries of that fuperftition, travelled into Britain. Whether the moft learned profeffors of Druidifm taught in Anglefey, or elfewhere, it is impofible to determine. From the excifion of the groves of Mona, by Suetonius Paullinus, nothing can be concluded in favour of that Of the religion of the that little ifland. To make the Weftern Ebudæ the feat of thefe colleges, is as perfect a chimera as that Druidifm was not at all known in Caledonia.

The ecclefiaftical polity of North Britain was certainly the fame with that which took place among all the Celtic nations. We have the clearest veftiges of the Druidical fuperfitition in many parts of Scotland to this day. The appellation of its priefts, Dru and Drutbinicb, is ftill preferved. Their holy places are pointed out, and are called the houfes of the Druids by the vulgar. In the lifles, and throughout the Continent of Scotland, are many of those circular fabrics of large rude flones, within which they performed the mysterious rites of their religion.

THOSE circular piles of ftone are by iome called the Houfes of the Picts. This miftake arofe very probably from the fimilarity of found between the two Galic words which express the Picts and Druids. The Picts are fometimes called Crwitbnicb, in the language of the Highlands and Druids always Druitbnicb or Drui.—The injudicious vulgar think that Firgal and his heroes, who are thought to have been giants placed enormous kettles upon those circles of ftone, in order to boil their venifon. Both these circumstances ftand as proofs of the uncertainty of oral tradition in every country.

The Romans, though feldem governed by the fpirit of perfecution, were very zealous in deftroying the Druidifm of South Britain. Claudius Cæfar endeavoured to abolifh it. The groves confecrated to that cruel fuperfluiton in Mona, were cut down by Suetonius Paulinus in the reign of Nero. It is reafonable to believe that other governors and emperors, directed by the fame prin.

ancient Caledonians.

principle of humanity, declared war againft the abominable rites of a fect who offered human victims to their idols. After Chriftianity became the eftablithed religion of South Britain, in the reign of Conftantine, the empire of Taranis and Teutates muft have been totally ruined, or confined within very narrow limits.—But the Pagan Saxons, who, in appearance, had good reaton to boaft of the ftrength of their Gods, undoubtedly re-eftablithed the worfhip of thofe divinities.

I HAVE already observed, that those victorious infidels brought the word Dry from Germany. Together with the name they certainly introduced the office, being fuperflitioufly devoted to Tuiflo, Woden, and Thor. The hiftory of King Edwin's conversion, in Bede, and the great revolution brought about in the kingdom of Northumberland at that time, in spiritual matters, is a sufficient demonstration of this polition. One circumstance is fufficient for my purpole to mention concerning the conversion of Edwin. After Paulinus had exhorted Edwin to embrace the Chriftian faith, agreeably to the inftructions he had formerly received from a perfon fent from the invifible world, the King fummoned his friends and great council to have their advice and approbation. One of the councellors or Princes was the Pagan High-prieft, or Primus Pontificum. The name, or rather title of this High-prieft or Pontifex Maximus was Coifi, or Coefi .- I know not whether any one has attempted to explain the meaning of this word. It was, in my opinion, the common title of every Druidical fuper-intendant of spiritual affairs. The Highland tale makers talk frequently concerning Caiffie, or Coiffie Dry ;- and by thefe two words they they mean a perfon of extraordinary fenfe, fkill and cunning. Dry undoubtedly fignifies a Druid, a wife man, a prophet, a philofopher, and fometimes a magician, in the Galic:—Couffie Dry, Bede's Coiffi or Primus Pontificum, ftands for the principal Druid, or what fuch a perfon ought to be, a man fupremely wife and learned.

It is needlefs to enlarge any farther on the Druidifm of Caledonia. That point has been handled at great length in another Effay*. Germany and Gaul, South Britain and Ireland, were full of that idolatrous fuperflition: and how could the inhabitants of Caledonia be ignorant of the religion of their anceftors and brethren defcended from the fame great Celtic fource ?

It is, in fhort, very unreafonable to think that a nation, in any of its ftages, fhould be totally defitute of religion: it is both unnatural and contrary to experience to fuppofe it. Religion, whether it arifes from the original preffure of the divinity on the human mind, or fprings from a timidity inherent in man, is certainly more prevalent than atheifm : and indeed it is doubtful with me whether atheifm ever exifted in a mind that is not perfectly infane. It is a boaft of the fceptic; which cannot be believed : and it is equally incredible that the favage, however much his mind is obfeured, could entertain fuch an irrational idea.

THAT the Caledonians had fome ideas of religion and a providence, is certain : that they were more pure in their fpiritual inflitutions than other Celtic nations, their barbarifm in other respects

fufficiently

^{*} The author alludes to the Differtation on the Druids, loft among Sir James MacDonala's papers.

ancient Caledonians.

fufficiently contradicts.—With the Teutates and Taranis of their Gaulith anceftors, they probably worfhipped fome local divinities of their own creation. That univerfal God of the heathen world, the fun, was certainly worfhipped with great devotion in Caledonia. The inftance I have given, towards the beginning of the preceding differtation, is demonstrable of the honour paid to that great luminary, under the name of Grannius. The fires lighted on eminences by the common Highlanders, on the firft day of May, till of late years, is one of the remains of that fuperfition.

DISSER-

320 Of the time in which Christianity

DISSERTATION XX.

Of the Time in which Chriftianity was introduced into North Britain. That the first Churches of Britain were planted by Oriental Missionaries.

A FTER fpending fo much time in the inveftigation of the fecular antiquities of the Scots nation, it may be naturally expected that I have made fome inquiry into their ancient ecclefiaftical hiftory. My obfervations on that fubject are comprehended in this and the fubfequent differtation.

THE Chriftian religion became known in the principal divifions of Britain before the middle of the third century; yet it is impoffible to determine the particular time in which the firft dawn of the golpel role on Caledonia. Tertullian, a writer cotemporary with the Emperor Severus, and confeffedly a very learned man, affirms pofitively, that the Chriftian religion had, in his own time, penetrated further into Britain than the Roman arms had done. Let us examine, therefore, the teftimony of Tertullian, and inveftigate what parts of Britain he had in his eye.

Iт

was first planted in Caledonia.

It is certain, from the feveral different paffages which Tertullian has quoted from Tacitus, that he had read the writings of that great hiftorian; and from them he certainly muft have underflood that South Britain had been entirely reduced into the form of a Roman province, before the end of the first century:

To fay nothing of the fuccefsful campaign Claudius Cæfar had made there in perfon, the Prætor Aulus Plantius had vanquifhed fome Britifh Kings, taken many garrifons, and conquered feveral whole nations. Offorius Scapula, who fucceeded Plantius, fought and defeated the Iceni, Cangi, Silures, and Brigantes. Suetonius Paulinus, Petilius Cerealis, and Julius Frontinus, three great generals, carried their victorious arms much farther than Offorius had done : and the famous Agricola had finifhed the conqueft of the country now called England, before he invaded Caledonia, near twenty years before the end of the firft century.

Í τ is paft all doubt that Ágricola performed great things in North Britain. He ravaged or fubdued those districts of that country which front Ireland. He defeated the Caledonian army on the Eastern coast. His fleet reduced the Orkney illes. His land and sea forces had spread either desolation or terror over all the maritime places of Caledonia, but still there were many corners of the country, and even whole districts, which the disficulties arising from their fituation, and his want of time, hindered that illustriots general from pervading. These districts may be reasonably thought to have been the places meant by Tertullian *.

* Et Britannorum inacceffa Romanis loca, Chrido vero fubdita. Tertu'. lib. contra judzo- cap 7.

IF

IF any one, to invalidate the force of this teftimony, thould object, that Tertullian was hafty and dogmatical, frequently led aftray by an intemperate zeal, and too apt, like many of his profeffion, to obtrude pious frauds on the world, his objection wou'd have been too vague and unjuft to deferve a confutation that would unavoidably lead us into a long difcuffion of particulars.

BUT were it certain that this ancient writer's character is enough to defiroy the credibility of every fact that refts upon his bare teftimony, ftill we have caufe to believe that fome of the remote parts of North Britain were converted to the Chriftian faith, in the reign of Severus. It is impoffible to prove from hiftory, that no fuch convertion happened in that period; and if it be true that the gofpel had made its way into the Southern division of this ifland long before that time, it is probable that the fame change took place in fome parts of Caledonia, before the middle of the third century.

CHRISTIANITY had made a progrefs amazingly rapid over all the provinces of the Roman empire before the end of the first age, nor were the doctrines taught by that new religion confined within the pale of the empire. It was one of the first principles of the primitive Christians to communicate their doctrine to all nations. Animated by the warmeft zeal, they were aclive in propagating their tenets; and their fuccefs was proportionable to their pious industry on that head. We are told by Tacitus that there was a vaft multitude of Christians at Rome*, when Nero, or fome was first planted in Caledonia.

^{*} Igitur primo correpti qui fatebantur, deinde indicio eorum multitudo ingens, &c. Tacit. Annal. lib. 15.

fatal accident, laid that imperial city in afhes. Pliny the younger, informs the Emperor Trajan*, that great numbers of all ages, of all degrees, and of both fexes, had embraced the religion of thofe men: nor was this fuperfittious contagion, to fpeak with that author, confined to the cities only, it had fpread itfelf likewife through the villages and country. He adds farther, that the temples of the province committed to his care, had been almoft deferted, that the facred rites of the eftablifhed worfhip had been a long time neglected, and that the victims had very few purchafers till he had applied the cure of fome wholefome feverities for remedying fo great an evil.

TRAJAN invefted Pliny with a confular power over Bithynia, Pontus, and the republic of By-zantium, about the beginning of the fecond cen-tury, and the reign of Severus comes down farther than the commencement of the third. After what has been extracted from one of his epiftles, it is needlefs to afk, whether Pliny was prepoffeffed in favour of Christianity, or in the humour of framing holy fictions to fupport its credit ? So far indeed was he from having taken fuch a biafs, that, though otherwife a reafonable and goodnatured man, he gives the hardeft of all names to the professors of Christianity. He calls the Christian religion a fort of madnefs, and a filly and extravagant superstition. It is idle to fearch into the political motives which led Pliny to fpeak with fuch feverity against Christianity. His words shew plainly that the Chriftians were greatly multiplied in fome provinces of the Roman empire, about a whole century before the latter end of Severus's reign. Here then is a fact which refts upon the teftimony of unexceptionable evidence, and what can hinder us from believing, upon the faith of the primitive divine, that the gofpel began to flourifh in Britain about the beginning of the third century ?

whole

^{*} Epist. xevii. lib. 10.

324

ALL the Scottish historians are agreed that Christianity was established in their country about the beginning of the third century, in the reign of King Donald. The objections raifed by fome eminent antiquaries against the truth of this doctrine, are of little importance. The flory of King Donald is at least as well founded as those of King Lucius, and King Arviagrus, which fome antiquaries endeavoured to support at a vass but useless expense of learning *.

THE Scots of former ages have, like their neighbours, carried their pretenfions to fpiritual antiquity extravagantly high. Any one who perufes the famous letter of the Scottifh nobility and barons to John, bifhop of Rome, in the reign of Robert Bruce, will fee a clear demonstration of this vanity. In that letter, after the greatest men of the Scots nation had confidently afferted that "the King of Kings had favoured their ancef-"tors, though planted in the uttermost parts of "the earth, with perhaps the earlieft call to his "holy faith," they affure his Holinefs, that Chrift had given another extraordinary testimony of his particular regard to their people. The words, rendered into English, are, "Neither would our was first planted in Caledonia.

^{*} It is more than probable that what is told concerning the three Monarchs is an abfolute fiction.

"Lord have the Scots of old confirmed in the "faid faith by any other perion than the apoftle "first called by himfelf the most worthy brother-"german of the bleffed St. Peter, that is St. An-"drew, who was fet apart to be their everlasting "patron. Such was the will of Chrift*."

As the Scots were in a perilous fituation when this letter was written to the Pope, it was undoubtedly convenient for them to draw fome polidoubtedly convenient for them to thaw to ne poli-tical advantages from the fraternal relation of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and confequently from their fpiritual confanguinity with Rome. They took care, therefore, to remind the fovereign pontiff, "that those most holy fathers who were his pre-"deceffors, had with many favours and privi-"therefore, the provide their kingdom and people as " leges ftrengthened their kingdom and people, as " thefe had been the peculiar care and portion of " St. Peter's brother." Nor did they forget to draw from fuch ftrong premifes a very important conclusion. They most earneftly entreated the Pope to remember those ftrong bonds of friend-fhip. They conjured him to interpose his good offices, to as to mediate a peace between them and the English; and they gave him to understand at the same time, with great spirit and freedom, " that if he should persist in his partiality, and " continue to give faith to the milrepresentation of " their foes, the Moft High would lay to his " charge all the effufion of Chriftian blood, and " all the lofs of immortal fouls that flould enfue " upon the difputes between them and their un-" reafonable adverfaries."

^{*} See Dr. Mackenzie in the Life of John Barbour.

326 Of the time in which Christianity

W E may take it for granted, that the Scottifh nobility and leffer barons had the ftory of their relation to St. Andrew, and confequently to his most worthy brother-German, from the learned ecclefiaftics of those and former times. But churches, like nations, have frequently valued themfelves upon an imaginary connexion with fome illustrious founder. That of Rome, every one knows, began early enough to claim a peculiar right to the Prince of the apoftolic college. Antioch had pretenfions of the fame kind, and perhaps a better title to the prerogative founded on it. Alexandria, though the feat of a great patriarch, was modeft enough to content herfelf with an inferior dignity. She had only the honour of having St. Mark for her fpiritual patron, a perfon who had no higher commission than that of an evangelist. The first bishop of Jerusalem could not with any decency be any thing less than the brother of Christ.

Some time ago, it would have been deemed a herctical and a most dangerous doctrine in Spain to deny that the churches there were founded by James the Greater. Two centuries back, it was an article of every Frenchman's creed, that St. Dennis, to fay nothing of Lazarus and Mary Magdalene, preached with great fuccefs in his country. Dennis was a member of the Areopagus of Athens ; and Joseph of Arimathea was one of the great Jewish Sanhedrim. Rather than yield the post of honour to a rival nation, England thought proper in former days to afcribe the merit of her conversion to the honourable counfellor just mentioned, the fame excellent perfon who had buried our Saviour in his own tomb *.

* Though the editor has all due refpect for the judgment of the English, in points of national honour, he is far from thinking was first planted in Caledonia.

THE churches of the two first ages, constantly diftracted by the fears of perfecution, or always employed in affairs of much greater importance, never thought of drawing out of ecc'efiaftical anna's or registers, containing the hiltory or order of their pastors. Eusebius acknowledges that it was extreamly difficult, for this reason, to investigate the names of those who governed the churches founded by the apoftles*.

THE ableft ecclesiaftical critics have exhaufted the whole ftrength of their erudition and fancy in fettling the order in which Peter was fucceeded. Clemens is one time the first, at another the fecond, but generally the third in the papal lift. Cletus and Anacleius are in the chronological fyftems of fome learned annalists, one time identified, and at another divided into two pontiffs. Linus is by many called the fecond Pope of Rome, and by not a few the fourth. Nothing, in fhort, can be more full of uncertainty or more favourable to hiftorical scepticism, than what ancient and modern writers have faid on this subject +.

HEGESSIPPUS was the first, who, about the year one hundred and fixty of the vulgar æra, began to draw up catalogues of the bifhops of

ХA

* Ecclef. Hift. lib. iii. cap. 4. † See Bafnage, Hift. de L'Eglife, liv. vii. cap. 4.

Rome.

ing a member of the Sanhedrim equal in dignity to one of the Athenian Areopagus. The Jews, though a chofen people, were by no means to be compared to the illustrious inhabitants of Attica; it were therefore to be wifhed our anceftors had taken a man of fome higher rank than Joseph for their fpiritual patron ; fo our rivals, the French, would have been deprived of that pre-eminence which Dennis has given them, in this very material controverfy.

Rome, Corinth, and other principal fees*. He was another Papias, equally wrongheaded, credulous, and vifionary.

Ir is undoubtedly a tafk that exceeds the power of any one who extends his refearches to Chriftian antiquities, to give authentic lifts of the old bifhops of Rome, Jerufalem, and Antioch, to afcertain the time at which the once famous churches of Carthage, and other African diocefes, were founded, and to difcover their holy patrons. If this is the cafe, why fhould we make any difficulty of acknowledging that the origin of our Britifh churches, and the fucceffion of our oldeft paffors, are totally loft in oblivion, or greatly embarraffed with inextricable abfurdities.

In fpite of that fond partiality which men will natura'ly entertain for those who seem to have done honour to their country, it is hardly in our power to believe, upon the authority of some ancient writers, that the British is were visited by the apostles, by either one or more of that facred body. To prove this supposed fact, Usher and Stillingfleet have quoted the plainess testimonies from Eusebus, Theodoret, Jerome, and Chrysoftom. It will be readily objected, that these authors, though very learned, were bad authorities. They lived at too great a distance from the time at which the event could have happened. To obviate this difficulty, Stillingsteet urges the testimony of Clemens Romanus, a father of the highest antiquity, one who was cotemporary with the apostles themselves, and one whose name was written in the Book of

* Eufeb. Hift. Ecclef. lib. iv. cap. 27.

Life *.

was first planted in Caledonia.

Life *. In one of his letters to the Corinthians. Clemens fays exprefly, that St. Paul preached righteoufnets throughout the whole earth, and in to doing went to the very extremity of the Weft. But these words are too hyperbolical to be literally true, and too undeterminate to be decifive in the prefent queftion. We know that Catullus, in his lampcon on Mamurra and Cæfar, calls Britain the remotest island of the West. Horace too calls the inhabitants of our ifland the most diffant men on the face of the earth +. But Virgil gave the fame cpithet to the Morini of Gaul, though he knew that the Britons were beyond them, and, to fpeak in his own language, divided entirely from the whole world. And Horace, in another paffage, calls Spain the laft of the Weftern countries t. A noted cape there goes full under the name of Finifterre, or the extremity of the earth.

ALL this confidered, it is probable that Clemens meant no more than fome diftant land, by the extremity of the Weft. It is certain that Paul intended to make a journey into Spain : fo we are told by himfelf, in his letter to the Romans. Theodoret affirms that he went thither after his liberation at Rome. The expression in the epistle of Clemens may be applied with the ftricteft propriety to that country. If we extend its meaning as far as the power of words can go, we have a kind of demonstration that the apostle preached in Ireland, and preached alfo in Thule. So a Chriftian poet,

Stilling. Orig. Brit, p. 38.
† Carm. Lib. I. Ode 35.
Serves iturum Cæfarem in ultimos orbis Britannos.

‡ Carm. Lib. 1. Ode 36. Hesperia fospes ab ultima.

Venantius

330 Of the time in which Christianity

Venantius Fortunatus, has affirmed, without any fcruple, though with no more juftice than Virgil had on his fide, when he promited the conqueft of the ultima Thule to Auguftus Cæfar. Poets and orators have a right to fpeak at large. The Chriftian panegyrifts, who have celebrated the praifes of apoftles and faints, have affumed the fame liberty; nor do they deferve any fevere cenfure for fpeaking agreeable to the rules of their art: the whole blame ought to fall on thofe reafoners who draw ferious conclutions from principles which are no more than the high flights and hyperbolical bombaft of rhetoric.

BUT were it certain, that the teftimonies of holy fathers, ancient Chriftian orators, and ecclefiaftical hiftorians, are arguments folid enough to convince the most unprejudiced that the apostles visited the British isles, it is no-easy matter to comprehend why their ministerial labours should be confined to the countries now called England and Ireland. Archbifhop Ufher had a ftrong inclination to convince the learned world that Ireland had her share of that mighty advantage *, He has quoted, in the chapter of his Antiquities which relates immediately to his own country, a very clear testimony of Eulebius, from which it appears, as far as the authority of that writer can go, that the apoftles preached in the British Isles : and who could deny that Ireland was of old reckoned one of that number ?

STILLINGFLEET had no great partiality for the kingdom of faints, and none at all for Scotland. He therefore exerted his whole ftrength in proving, was first planted in Caledonia. 33 1

^{*} Brit. Ecclef. Ant. cap. xvi. p. 386.

that the Southern and better part of Britain was the happy land where one of the apoftles had exercifed his function. To effablish that favourite point, he availed himfelf of the testimonies which the learned primate had collected to his hand; taking particular care at the fame time not to drop a kind hint that North Britain and Ireland enjoyed the fame advantage.

THE most actient churches of Britain were founded, in all probability, by Afiatic mislionaries. The conformity of their belief and practice in the affair of Easter, to that which prevailed among the Christians of the East, ftrengthens this opinion.

It is well known that the celebration of Eafter was one of the earlieft cuftoms which prevailed among the primitive Chriftians. The precife time at which that feftival ought to be kept, was almoft univerfally reckoned an affair of the laft importance; and the queftion, what that time was, however frivolous in itfelf, produced high difputes, fchifmatical divisions, and the most difagreeable effects.

THE churches of the Leffer Afia folemnized their Eafter, agreeably to the Mofaical inflitution with regard to the Jewifh paffover, on the fourteenth day of the moon, in the firft month. The churches of the Weft, and of many other countries, took care to celebrate that feaft on the Lord's day thereafter. This diverfity of opinion created an infinite deal of animofity among the Chriftians of thofe times. Polycarp, bifhop of Smyrna, came to Rome, all the way from Afia, to confer with the then poffeffor of St. Peter's chair, about eftablifhing the peace of the church. Polycarp himfelf was was one of these who were branded with the frightful names of Teffares kai decatitæ and Quarto decimans. The two pacific bishops communicated with each other: but Polycarp, after returning home, was so far from giving up the point, in complaisance to the Pope, that he confirmed the churches of Afia in the belief of their old tradition. The quartel was renewed under the pontificate of Victor, and became very violent, through the foolish management of that haughty prelate.

WE have no great concern in the fequel of this dispute. The controversy, though it arole from a trifle, was kept alive for a long time. In fpite of papal decifions, and many fynodical decrees, the Afiatic churches maintained their old tradition and cuftom, till the first general council of Niece, or rather the authority of Constantine the Great, filenced them. But the canons made by that and other councils, though fupported by imperial edicts, had no manner of weight in Britain. The churches there followed the ritual of the Eaftern Chriftians, fome of them till after the beginning of the eighth century, and fome longer. It was in the year 710, that the Pictifh Christians renounced their error with regard to the canonical time of folemnizing the patchal feftival. So Bede has told us; and it coft him and the abbot Ceolfrid the trouble of a very long and elaborately learned epiftle, addreffed to King Naitan, to reform them and their fovereign out of that capital error *.

NOTHING is more improbable than that the light of the gospel shined long in the Southern division of this island, before the first faint rays of it had penetrated into the Northern. The vicinity of the former to the Continent, and its conftant intercourfe with the world, would have foon made it acquainted with the new religion. In Nero's time there was a vaft number of Christians at Rome; and it is well known that after the burning of that great city, they were most barbaroufly perfecuted, as the perpetrators of the horrible crime, which many laid to the Emperor's own charge. We may take it for granted, that the news of that extraordinary event, and of the unparalleled feverities confequent upon it, would take no long time in travelling to South Britain. The Romans had colonies and fubjects there. Human nature will always fympathize with the diftreffed. Every good heart will feel deeply for the innocent, when doomed, like the unhappy victims at Rome +, to the horrors and torments of the most ignominious and painful deaths. On these accounts, the history of the dreadful perfe-cution which Nero raifed against the Christians must have come foon into Britain, and brought along with it fome accounts of the religion that had afforded a pretext for committing fuch barbarities. As that religion promifed to make its votaries wifer and happier men than those unacquainted with it, that confideration likewife would have foon waked the curiofity of many. Some of the Chriftians who furvived that cruel maffacre at ⁺ Tacit Annal, lib, xiv. Et pereuntibus addita ludibila, ut feratum tergis concettis laniatu canum interitent, aut crucibus affixi, aut flammandi, atque ubi defectifict dies, in ufum nocturni luminis urerentur.

^{*} Bed. Ecclef. Hift. lib. v. cap. 21.

by Afiatic missionaries.

334

Rome, and many of those elsewhere who had caule to dread the repetition of the fame excesses, would have undoubtedly taken refuge in places of greatest fecurity, and of confequence have fled into Britain. The blood of martyrs has been in one fense just'y called the feed of the church; and the first general perfecution is very probably the æra from which we ought to date the first establishment of the Christian faith in the country now called England.

It is far from being evident that the new religion made any confiderable progrefs in Britain before the reign of Domitian. In that reign Agricola introduced the liberal arts and fciences among the Britons of the South. This circumftance, however prejudicial it may have been to the liberties of that people, was a very favourable one to Chriftianity.

In all the countries where the feiences are cultivated, a fpirit of inquiry will naturally prevail. The belief of former ages will no longer be the rule of faith, in matters of any importance. Eftablifhed fyftems, whether of philofophy or religion, will be canvaffed with an ingenious freedom. Men, who are made for fpeculation and the fervice of virtue, will indulge themfelves in the moft rational and exalted of all pleafures, that of difcovering thofe truths which are of the utmoft confequence to mankind. They will moft chearfully communicate their difcoveries to the world, unlefs cruelly reftrained by penal laws, or courts of inquifition; and even the fury and vengeance of thefe will hardly be able totally to filence them. In the height of perfecution they will mutter out their fenfe

by Afiatic missionaries.

fenfe of things in a corner, or open their fentiments freely among their friends. The hiftory of ages and nations, efpecially in matters of religion, juftifies their obfervations. It is therefore evident, that the introduction of the fciences and fine arts would contribute much to the advancement of Chriftianity in South Britain.

AMONG the liberal fciences which Agricola introduced into South Britain, the art of fpeaking elegantly held one of the first places. The humour of cultivating that branch of learning prevailed to fuch a degree, that the inhabitants of Thule began to talk of hiring rhetoricians, if we can believe a cotemporary writer *. All indeed that we can infer from the Satires is, that a taste for eloquence was greatly diffused over Britain : and where the art of fpeaking was fo much fludied, it is more than probable that the art of thinking was not neglected. In fhort, from the fuccefsful attempt made by Agricola, to humanize the people of his province, we may juftly conclude, that knowledge, philosophy, and confequently a fpirit of inquiry, began to prevail in the Roman part of Britain in a very early period.

WE learn from Eufebius and others, that Polycarp, the famous bithop of Smyrna, mentioned above, had been St. John's difciple. He had adopted the fyftem of the Quartodecimans; nor could the authority of a Pope alienate him from that party. No man, after the expiration of the apoftolic age, was more zealous than this excellent

* Gallia caufidicos docuit facunda Britannos, De conducendo lequitur jam rhetore Thule.

Juvenal, Sat. xv. ver. 111, 112.

The British churches planted

336

prelate in propagating the Christian faith. He fealed this belief with his blood; and the only crime of which perfecutors impeached him, was his fleady attachment to the intereft of Chriftianity, and the important fervices he had done it. It was for that reason his murderers called him the Father of Atheilm, the Father of Christians, and the Teacher of Afia. But his paftoral care was not confined to that division of the world. His zeal carried him much farther. He fent miffionaries into the very heart of Gaul, and founded the church of Lyons. Nicetius and Bothinus, the first teachers there, had been his disciples +. And what shall hinder us from thinking that this truly apostolical man, and great lover of mankind, may have contributed every thing in his power to make Britain a province of the Chriftian empire ?

ŤHIS, I confefs, is no more than fuppofition and conjecture; but the darknefs of the fubject admits of no certainty: and when it is confidered that the moft ancient Britifh Chriftians of whom we have any tolerably juft accounts, adopted Polycarp's fythem with regard to Eafter, that like him they refufed to conform to the cuftom of the Weftern church, and that, in their difputes with Italian millionaries, they always appealed to the authority of St. John, and the other Eaftern divines, the conjecture is, at leaft, fpecious. Polycarp, who to all appearance has the beft right to be called the founder of the Britifh churches,

* See Basnage-Hift. de l'Eglife, lib. v. chap 3.

fuffered

by Afiatic missionaries.

fuffered death in the 170th year of the vulgar æra. It is not probable that the gofpel had taken any deep root in Britain before that time; and if the teftimony of Tertullian can at all be depended upon, it begun to flourist greatly in this island foon after that period.

Ŷ

DISSER-

DISSERTATION XX.

Of the Convertion of the Southern Picts by St. Ninian. Of the Miffion of Palladius to the Scots. Of St. Columba.

THE only guides we have to lead us through those dark regions of ecclesiaftical antiquity, which are now to fall in our way, are Adamnan, abbot of Iona, and Bede, the prefbyter of Girwy. Any impartial perfon who peruses the life of Columba written by Adamnan, and the history of the Saxon churches compiled by the Anglo-Saxon, must be of opinion that these two writers posses a much greater degree of zeal, piety, and learning, than of found judgment. I do not wish to be understood, from this observation, that I put Adamnan on any footing of equality with Bede.

AFTER Bede had told that Columba came from Ireland in the year of Chrift 565, with a refolution of preaching the word of God to the Northern Picts t, he observes that those in the South had long before that time abandoned the errors of idolatry. The happy inftrument by which these Southern Picts had been converted to the faith was converted by St. Ninian.

Ninian,

[‡] Bede lib. iii. cap. 4.

Ninian, a faint and bishop, who, to use Bede's language, had been regularly formed at Rome. It is faid further, that this worthy prelate built a church, which he took care to dedicate to St. Martin. That church flood in a place which was called Candida Cafa, and the reafon why the place obtained that name, was, that it was built of ftone; a species of architecture which the Britons had never known till introduced by Ninian.

BEDE has not mentioned the pontificate during . which Ninian had been inftructed at Rome, nor has he afcertained the time of his preaching among the Picts. Modern writers have fupplied that defect. Smith, the lateft editor of that author's ecclefiaftical hiftory, relates +, that the founder of Candida Cafa vifited that fee in the time of Pope Damascus, about the year 370, that he was ordained a bifhop for the propagation of Chriftianity among his countrymen, by Siricius, in the year 394; and that in his way to Britain he took the opportunity of waiting on the celebrated St. Martin, in Gaul.

INNES with great acuteness has found out the Pictish King in whose reign Ninian acted the part of an evangelift among the heathens of Pictavia * : the name of that monarch was Druft, the fon of Irb, whole reign commenced in the year 406.

ON proper examination it will appear, that the ftory of Ninian's fpiritual legation to the Southern Picts, and of his having dedicated a magnificent church to St. Martin, is attended with too many improbabilities not to feem at least dubious. His having

Y 2

^{*} Smith, in a note on the chapter of Bede now referred to. * Innes, Crit Effay, p. 136.

The fouthern Pists, &c.

$40

having been regularly inftructed in the faith of Rome, though a Britifh Chriftian, is a circumflance that renders it ftill more fufpicious. If Niuian preached the doctrine he had learned at Rome, with regard to Eafter, he made few profelytes, and left no orthodox difciples among his countrymen ; for when Auguftine, tl e monk, was fent into Britain by Pope Gregory, all the Chriftians there were quartodeciman fchiffmatics or heretics. All that we know further, with regard to the hiftory of this religious man, is, that he died much about the time in which Palladius was fent by Celefline, bifhop of Rome, to exercife the epifcopal office among the Scots. PALLADIUS is faid to have been the firft bifhop

 $P_{ALLADIUS}$ is faid to have been the first bishop who was fent among the believing Scots; and the æra of his mission is affigned to the year 430 *. The Irish claim the honour of being those Scots to whom this great reformer was fent; but there was no confiderable number of Christians in Ireland before St. Patrick appeared in quality of apostle there: fo that their title to the character of believing Scots cannot be well founded.

THE British Scots, from the earlieft accounts of time, have been poffeffed with a belief that Palladius was employed in their country; and it is univerfally agreed, that he died in North Britain. It appears likewite that Pope Celeftine departed this life in the year $432 \dagger$; fo that if Palladius had been but one year employed among the Irish Scots, as they themfelves relate, it is absolutely improbable that the Pope could have received the news of his great want of fuccess before the time of his own death, in order to ordain St. Patrick to fucceed him in his office.

+ Ufher's Ant. p. 424-

bable

Anno CCCCXXX, Palladius ad Scotos in Chrislum credentes a Celestino papa primus mittitur episcopus.

OF all the Scottifh faints who have been celebrated by panegyrifts, canonized by prieftcraft, and adored by fuperflition, Columba was undoubt-edly the moft illuftrious. It it generally agreed that Columba was an Irifhman, and defcended of anceftors who had made a confiderable figure in that island. Adamnan has told us, that his father, Fedlimid, and his mother, Orthnea, were ranked among the nobility t. Keating quotes the rhimes of an old Hibernian bard, from which we learn that Fergus, his grandfather, was a Prince renowned in war *. Some have confounded that Prince with Fergus MacErc, the fuppofed founder of the Scottifh monarchy: but the Irifh manufcripts to which Ufher ¶ appeals, inform us, that the Fergus from whom Columba derived his defcent, was the fon of that celebrated hero, Conal Gulbin, and the grandfon of that famous Hibernian monarch, Neil of the nine hoftages.

Mr. O Connor afferts, that Columba rejected the imperial crown of Ireland. We know, indeed, that fome Princes have preferred the monkifh cowl to the regal diadem. We read of feveral Kings who abdicated their thrones and received the tonfure. England has furnithed us with two of that character, and Scotland with a third ; but we cannot readily believe that Columba either had a crown in his offer, or had the fame extreme contempt for the higheft pitch of human grandeur. MANY different Irifh writers relate that Columba

‡ Sanctus Columba ex nobilibus fuit oriendus geniralibus patrem habuit Feidlimyd, filium Fergus, matrem Orthneam nomine.

^{*} Gen. Hift. of Ireland, part ii. p. 32.

^{- ¶} Ant. p. 360.

MANY different Irifh writers relate that Columba was dedicated very early to the fludy and fervice of Divinity: and nothing is more probable than that he mortified his appetites by a fevere courfe of abftinence. Aufterities of every kind, and macerations particularly were the cardinal virtues of those fuperflitious ages Our faint is faid to have overacted the part of a religious felf-tormentor to fuch a degree that his body was emaciated away into a hideous skeleton. This ftory however cannot be reconciled to probability. Columba underwent many fatigues, and fome give accounts of his extraordinary vigour and healthiness of conftitution. An old Bard quoted by Keating, affures us * that while Columba was celebrating the mysteries, or finging pfalms, his voice might be heard at the diffance of a mile and a half, which is a kind of proof that he was not fo ill fed as is generally supposed.

It is univerfally agreed that this faint employed the greateft part of his life in cultivating the devout faculties of the foul. He certainly was poffeffed with the moft ardent and unconfined zeal for religion. His unwearied and fuccefsful labours in propagating the gofpel among the Irifh, Scots, Picts, and Britons, afford a convincing proof of the enthuliafm, if not of the fincerity of his mind.

THEY who commonly pass under the amiable name of good natured men, are feldom found qualified for the execution of arduous undertakings. That pertinacity which is neceffary to compleat difficult defigns, is often the fruit of an irafcible and choleric difpolition of the mind. Hence it may be inferred that Columba's pailions were keen and violent, though perhaps not fo peculiarly vindictive and hot, as bards and annalitts have reprefented.

* Keating, book ii. p. 35.

Of St. Columba.

KEATING relates, on the faith of Irifh manuferipts, that Columba, to gratify his private revenge, frequently embroiled the whole kingdom of Ireland. His rage produced three long civil wars, fo often and fo fuccelsfully did the irafeible faint blow the trumpet of fedition. If it be true that the firft of thefe wars was occafioned by the refentment of Columba, for lofing a copy of the New Teftament, which he claimed, and which the Irifh monarch adjudged to another faint, the old tutelar demi-god of our country was certainly a moft unreafonable man.

The fecond war was founded on fome kind of affront which Columba had received from a provincial King; and the third was carried on at his infligation, without any tolerable pretext at all. If these flories are authentic, the heathen may indeed ask, can fucb violent transports of passion dwell in celefial minds^{*}? But it cannot well be suppofed that any confiderable number of the Irish, however monk ridden, would have fought battles in compliance with the humour of a man so impotently wrathful; much lefs can we believe that heaven interposed, on all these different occasions, in his favour. Yet those very authors on whose testimony the truth of the whole ftory refts, will have it that compleat victories were granted by the God of Battles to Columba, in confequence of his prayers. Columba is faid to have been at last made fensible of his guilt by a holy perfor called Molaife. This man of God obliged the finner to abandon his native country, by way of penance. He enjoined him likewife, under the highest penalties, never more to cast his eyes on Irith ground. The felf-condemned criminal obeyed the fpiritual father with a filial fubmission; and fo religiously obsequious was he to the disciplinarian's commands, that he covered his eyes with a veil while he ftayed in the island. Keating fupports this tale with the authority of a canonized bard.

* Tantæne animis celeftibus iræ. Virg. Æd. i. v. 11.

Of St. Columba.

344

BEDE gives the following relation of the faint's arrival in Britain, and of his miniftry among the Picts. " In the year of Chrift five hundred and fixty five, while Juftin the Leffer held the reins of the Roman empire, Columba, a prefbyter and abbot, whom his manners have rendered defervedly famous, came from Ireland into Britain. His defign in coming thither, was to preach the word of God in the provinces of the Northern Picts, the Southern people of that denomination having been converted to the faith by Ninian, a long time before that period. He arrived in Britain while Brudius, a very powerful prince reigned over the Picts and the power of the holy man's doctrine, and the influence of his example, converted that nation to the faith*.

ADAMNAN calls this Pictifh King Bradeus, and informs us, that he ordered the gates of his palace to be thut againft the apoftle. But Columba, if we take Adamnan's word for it, removed this obftruction without any difficulty. The fign of the crofs, and fome other efficacious ceremonies, made the paffage foon open to the faint. The King, uponfeeing this miracle, received him courteoully, and heard his advices with a refpectful attention. It is true, fome of his favourites configured with the minifters of the old fuperfittion in oppofing the new teachers; but the man of God, fays the writer of his life, overcame all oppofition : and by the help of fome fignal miracles, which gave an irrefiftible fanction to his doctrine, finifhed at laft the great work he had undertaken.

^{*} Bed Hig. Ecclef. lib. iii. cap. 4-

SOON after Columba's arrival in Britain, he fettled at Iona, and founded the celebrated abbey of that place.

BEFORE Columba had fixed the feat of his little fpiritual empire at Iona, his character had rifen to a great height. The fanctity of his manners, the mighty power of his eloquence, the fpirit of that doctrine which he preached, the warmth and activity of his zeal, together with the benevolence of his intentions, had recommended him ftrongly to the higheft attention and refpect.

SHOULD one collect all the miracles and ftrange tales that legends have vouched and tradition transmitted from age to age, with regard to this remarkable perfon, he might very eafily compile a huge volume: But a judicious reader would think himfelf little indebted to the compiler's induftry.

ONE of these traditional fictions, though fomewhat impious, is ludicrous. Oran, from whom the Cæmitery in the island of Iona was called Rælic-

Of St. Columba.

Rælic-Oran, was a fellow foldier of Columba in the warfare of the gofpel. Columba, underftanding in a fupernatural way, that the facred buildings he was about to erect in Iona, could never anfwer his purpofe, unlefs fome perfon of confequence undertook voluntarily to be buried alive in the ground which was marked out for thofe ftructures: Oran with great fpirit undertook this dreadful tafk. He was interred accordingly. At the end of three days the grave was opened before a number of fpectators. No fooner was the brave martyr's face uncovered, than he opened his mouth and cried aloud in the Galic language, Death is no great affair, bell is a mere joke. Columba, who affifted at the ceremony, was greatly fhocked at the dangerous heterodoxy of this doctrine, and with great prefence of mind cried out, Earth on the bead of Oran, and prevent bis prailing. Thus poor Oran was actually buried, for pretending to difclofe the fecrets of the other world.

OUR hiftorians are generally agreed that whole kingdoms paid Columba the utmoft deference, and were determined by his advice in matters of high confequence. He became a councellor of ftate to many different fovereigns, and frequently decided the controverfies of contending powers. Aidan, King of Scots, upon receiving fome provocation from Brudius, the Pictifh King, declared war againft him. The armies of the two monarchs met near Dunkold, and fought a battle which produced a great effufion of Chriftian blood. After the action was over, Columba came to the field and interpofed his good offices, but all in vain. Aidan remained inflexible. The faint, fired with a pious indignation, reproved the Scottifh King very very fharply, and turned his back on him with great wrath. Aidan, fenfible of his error, caught the garment of the retiring faint, and acknowledging his rathnefs, begged to know of him how the injury done could be expiated. Columba replied haftily, that the lofs furtained was irreparable. This drew tears from the penitent monarch. Columba was foftned, wept bitterly, and after he had been filent for fome time, advifed Aidan to a peace. The King complied, Brudius acquiecfed in the propofals made, and a pacification immediately enfued.

IN Columba's time, the hereditary, indefeafible right of Kings was a doctrine hardly known in any part of Britain or Ireland, in Scotland, the fucceflion of the lineal heir feldom took place, till Kenneth the Third found means to effablifh it by law. Columba was a perfon of the greateft influence in those difputes which generally enfued on the throne's becoming vacant. This will appear from the following flory.

pear from the following ftory. GABHRAN, King of Scots, had left two fons, Aidan and logenanus. Columba had conceived a peculiar affection for the latter, and though the younger brother, inclined ftrongly to procure the crown for him. But a very ftrange adventure difconcerted his intention. Adamnan relates it thus. "While the holy man was in the ifland Kimbria *, he fell on a certain night into a fupernatural dream, and faw an angel of the Lord holding in his hand a transparent book which contained directions for the ordination of Kings⁺. The angel prefented the book to him; upon perufing it, he found himfelf commanded to ordain Aidan King. But his attachment to the younger brother made him decline the office. Upon this the angel ftretched forth his hand and gave him a ftroke on the cheek, which made an impression that remained perfectly visible during his life. Columba was then ordered in a very threatning manner, and under the penalty of a much heavier punifhment, to comply immediately with the pleafure of Almighty God. He had the fame vision, faw the fame book, and received the fame orders, three nights fucceflively. At last the obstinate faint obeyed, and went to the island of Iona, where he found Aidan, and laying his hand on his head, he ordained him King *." It may be inferred from this marvellous ftory, that Columba was a perfon of great fway in ftate as well as religious affairs; and that he was artful enough to make the proper use of the influence his fanctity gave him among a fuperfitious people. HE was frequently confulted in the perplexities

^{*} Cimbrei.

⁺ Vitreus ordinationis regum liber.

Of St. Columba.

HE was frequently confulted in the perplexities of Government not only at home but abroad. His authority had particular weight in his native country. Aodb or Hugh, one of the Irifh monarchs, fummoned his Princes, nobility, and dignified ecclefiaftics, to meet in parliament at Dromceat. The principal reafon which induced him to call this great council proceeded from a very curious caufe.

THE Infh nation had been for fome time moft grievoufly oppreffed by a numerous rabble of Bards, a race of men, idle, avaricious, and in-

* Adamn. Vita Colum. lib. iii. cap. 5.

fupportably

Of St. Columba.

iupportably petulant. One of the many ample privileges which thefe formidable fatyrifts had acquired, was, an indifputable right to any been they were pleafed to afk. This high prerogative joined to the advantage of a facred character, made the Bards fo intolerably audacious, that in King Aodb's, time they had the infolence to demand the moft valuable jewel belonging to the crown. The jewel thefe mifcreants fought, was the golden bodkin which faftened their fovereign's royal robes under his neck. An outrage fo provoking incenfed Hugh or Aodh to fuch a degree, that he formed a defign of expelling the whole order out of the ifland : but as the authority of Irifh Kings was circumferibed within narrow bounds, he was under the neceffity of calling the reprefentatives of the nation together, and of having Columba's affent before his will could have the force of a law.

COLUMBA, at the earneft requeft of the King and the Irifh nation, repaired to Dromceat. His retinue confifted of twenty bifhops, forty priefts, fifty deacons, thirty fludents in divinity, and if we believe Keating, he was accompanied by Aidan King of Scotland. The faint was received by the affembly with fingular refpect: but fome of the Scottifh clergy, by whom he was accompanied, were treated with contempt and infolence. Columba had ample revenge of thofe who infulted his clergy, and we are firmly affured that the hand of God was vifible in the punifhment inflicted on the offenders. Struck by a judgment fo fignal, the King accommodated the affair of the Bards according to Columba's pleafure. THERE is no neceffity for entering into any detail of the particulars of this faint's life, as they are related at large, though incorrectly, by his biographer. Upon the whole, we may allow that Columba, notwithftanding of his faults, was a man of refpectable talents, and could use well the afcendancy which his religious reputation gave him over a fuperfitious age.

THE boundlefs influence he had over two fucceffive Princes who filled the throne of Scotland; the friendfhip he had contracted with King Rodoric of Cumberland; the afcendant he had over the great Pictifh Monarch and his whole fubjects, together with the fhare he took occafionally in the administration of public affairs in Ireland, feem to furnish convincing proofs of his genius, fpirit and addrefs. He was born a man of high quality, and clofely allied to Princes but preferred the apparent humility of a religious life to the highest fecular honours. Whether this aufterity was the effect of a defire of power, under a fanctity of character, or from real enthuliasim, is now difficult to fay, though very poffibly it arole from both.

MANY learned authors have told us positively, that Columba wore the epifcopal mitre; but he was no more than a Prefbyter. Had he been fond of a fuperior rank in the hierarchy, he might have very eafily gratified his ambition: but though he was confined within the more narrow limits of the priefty office, his authority extended much farther than that of the most exalted dignitaries of his time.

COLUMBA is faid to have been a poet and hiftorian. That he poffeffed a talent for rhime, and exercifed it frequently, is very agreeable to the reported reported ftrength and vivacity of his imagination, the prevailing humour of the time, and that friendly partiality which the Scottish and Irish bards have entertained for his memory.

WE are informed by Mr. Lhoyd *, that there is ftill in the Bodleian library at Oxford an Irifh manufcript, intituled, The works of Columbcille, in verfe, containing fome account of the author's life, together with his prophecies and exhortations to Princes.

THE fame industrious writer observes, that there is in the library of Trinity College at Dublin, fome other most curious and wonderfully ancient manufcript, containing the four gospels, and a variety of other matters. The manufcript is called, The Book of Columb-cille, and thought to have been written by Columba's own hand.-Flann, King of Ireland, ordered a very coftly cover to be given this book. On a filver crofs, which makes a part of that cover, is still to be feen an Irish infcription, of which the literal meaning is, The prayer and bleffing of Columb-cille to Flann, the fon of Mailsheachnail, King of Ireland, who made this cover : and should the manufcript be of no greater antiquity than the reign of that Prince, it must be about nine hundred years old t. This ftory, however, carries with it a great degree of improbability-and it is more than probable that this book of Columb-cille arole from the pious fraud of a much later age.

THE END.

^{*} Catalog. of Irifh Manufcripts.

^{*} Lhoyd's Archzol. p. 432.

