

By T. B E C K E T, Corner of the Adelphi Buildings in the STRAND,

Bookseller to their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Bishop of Osnaburgh,

FABLES DE LA FONTAINE,

Printed at PARIS, in Four Volumes Folio.

This very magnificent Work is proposed to the Publick at only Eight Guineas in Sheets, being but Half the original Price.

This Edition, which cost the Artists near twenty Years Labour, and the Proprietors upwards of Fourteen thousand Pounds Sterling, is undoubtedly one of the most superb Monuments ever erected to the Memory of an Author.

It is printed with a new Letter, on a fine Paper, manufactured expressly for the Work; every Fable being ornamented by a Head and Tail-piece, defigned in a new Taste, by M. BACHELIER, and executed by M. T. PAPILLON and LE SUEUR.

To the Beauty this Work derives from the Printing-press, is also added the capital Embellishment of no less than Two Hundred and Seventy-Six Copper-plates; the Designs applicable to the Subjects, drawn after Nature, by Oudry, one of the most celebrated Painters France ever produced for delineating the Animal Creation. The Engravings by the most expert Artists in their several Departments, under the Direction of the celebrated M. Cochin; who revised and superintended the Whole.

LA FONTAINE'S Life is prefixed, containing many Anecdotes of that exquisite Fabulist, not to be met with elsewhere.

^{} Such Ladies and Gentlemen who are defirous of being poffessed of this magnificent Work, are requested to favour the Proprietors with their Commands.

The following BOOKS are published by T. BECKET:

1. THE Iliad of Homer. Translated by James Macpherson, Esq. in 2 Vols. Royal Paper. 4to. Second Edition, revised throughout, and carefully corrected. Price One Guinea and a Half in Boards.

2. An Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland. The Third Edition, revised and greatly enlarged. In one Volume 4to.

Price 15 s. in Boards.

3. Memoirs of Russia, from the Year 1727 to the Year 1744. Tranflated from the Original Manuscript of the Baron de MANSTEIN. Illustrated with Maps and Plans, and with the Life of the Author. The Second Edition, carefully corrected throughout, and greatly improved. In one Volume 4to. Price 18 s. in Boards.

4. The History of the British Dominions in North America; from the first Discovery of that vast Continent by Sebastian Cabot, in 1497, to its glorious Establishment, as confirmed by the late Treaty of Peace in 1763. In 14 Books. Illustrated with a new and accurate Map, coloured. In one Volume 4to. Price 18 s. in Boards.

5. A Journal of the Swedish Ambassy, in the Years 1653 and 1654, from the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Written by the Ambassador the Lord Commissioner White-LOCKE. With an APPENDIX of Original Papers. 2 Vols. 4to.

Il. IIs. 6 d. Boards.

* This very curious and valuable Work is printed from the Author's own Manuscript (which is deposited in the British Museum for public Inspection) and at the Request of his Grandson Carleton Whitelocke, of Prior's Wood, near Dublin, Efg; of Lord Chancellor Bowes, late of the Kingdom of Ireland; of Archbishop Secker, late Primate of all England; and of Arthur Onflow, Efq; late Speaker of the House of Commons.

6. Dr. Goldsmith's History of England, to the Accession of his prefent Majesty. Illustrated with the Heads of all the Kings and Queens. 4 Vols. 8vo. 11. 4s. bound.

7. Atkyn's Antiquities of Glocestershire. With a great Number of fine Plates. Folio. Large Paper. 31. 3 s.

8. The fame Book. Small Paper. 21. 10 s.

9. Harrington's Works. New Edition. Royal Quarto. 11. 15. 10. Ludlow's Memoirs. New Edition. Royal Quarto. 11. 1s.

11. The Works of Algernon Sidney. New Edition. Royal Quarto. 11. 7 S.

12. Addison's Works. Beautifully printed by Baskerville. 4 Vols. Royal Quarto. 41. 4s.

13. Pope's Works. New Edition. 6 Vols. 12mo. 18 s. 14. — Homer. New Edition. 9 Vols. 12mo. 11. 7 s.

5. - Ditto. New Edition. 9 Vols. Small Syo. 11. 115. 6d.

THE

POEMS

O F

OSSIAN.

VOL. II.

P O E M S

OF

OSSIAN.

TRANSLATED

By JAMES MACPHERSON, Efq:

VOL. II.

A NEW EDITION,

Carefully corrected, and greatly improved.

LONDON:

Printed for W. Strahan; and T. Becket; in the Strand, Bookfeller to their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and Bishop of Osnabruch.

MDCCLXXJ

CONTENTS

OF THE

SECOND VOLUME.

TEMORA, Book I Page	. 1
Book II. — —	29
Book III. — —	53
Book IV. — —	75
Book V. — —	97
Book VI. — —	117
Book VII. — —	139
Book VIII. — —	157
CONLATH AND CUTHONA, -	181
BERRATHON, — — —	191
A DISSERTATION CONCERNING THE
ÆRA OF OSSIAN, — —	211
A DISSERTATION CONCERNING THE	E
POEMS OF OSSIAN, -	233
A CRITICAL DISSERTATION ON THE	Ξ.
POEMS OF OSSIAN, -	281

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK. I.

ARGUMENT to Book I.

Cairbar, the son of Borbar-duthul, lord of Atha in Connaught the most potent chief of the race of the Firbolg, having murdered, at Temora the royal palace, Cormac the son of Artho, the young king of Ireland, usurped the throne. Cormac was lineally descended from Conar the son of Trenmor, the great grandfather of Fingal, king of those Caledonians who inhabited the western coast of Scotland. Fingal refented the behaviour of Cairbar, and resolved to pass over into Ireland, with an army, to re-establish the royal family on the Irish throne. Early intelligence of his designs coming to Cairbar, he assembled some of his tribes in Usster, and at the same time ordered his brother Cathmor to follow him speedily with an army, from Temora. Such was the situation of affairs when the Caledonian invaders appeared on the coast of Usster.

The poem opens in the morning. Cairbar is represented as retired from the rest of the army, when one of his scouts brought him news of the landing of Fingal. He affembles a council of his chiefs. Foldath the chief of Moma haughtily despises the enemy; and is reprimanded warmly by Malthos. Cairbar, after hearing their debate, orders a feast to be prepared, to which, by his bard Olla, he invites Ofcar the fon of Offian; refolving to pick a quarrel with that hero, and fo have fome pretext for killing him. Ofcar came to the feast; the guarrel happened; the followers of both fought, and Cairbar and Ofcar fell by mutual wounds. The noise of the battle reached Fingal's army. The king came on, to the relief of Ofcar, and the Irish fell back to the army of Cathmor, who was advanced to the banks of the river Lubar, on the heath of Moilena. Fingal, after mourning over his grandfon, ordered. Ullin the chief of his bards to carry his body to Morven, to be there interred. Night coming on, Althan, the fon of Conachar, relates to the king the particulars of the murder of Cormac. Fillan, the fon of Fingal, is fent to observe the motions of Cathmar by night, which concludes the action of the first day. The scene of this book is a plain, near the hill of Mora. which ro e on the borders of the heath of Moilena, in Ulster.

TEMORA:

A N

EPICPOEM.

BOOK I.

HE blue waves of Erin roll in light. The mountains are covered with day. Trees shake their dusky heads, in the breeze. Grey torrents pour their noify streams. Two green hills, with aged oaks, furround a narrow plain. The blue course of a stream is there. On its banks stood Cairbar * of Atha. His spear supports the king: the red eye of his fear is sad. Cormac rises in his soul, with all his ghastly wounds.

B 2

The

^{*} Cairbar, the son of Borbar duthul, was descended lineally from Lathon the chief of the Firbolg, the first colony who settled in the south of Ireland. The Cael were in possession of the northern coast of that kingdom, and the first monarchs of Ireland were of their race. Hence arose those differences between the two nations, which terminated, at last, in the murder of Cormac, and the usurpation of Cairbar, lord of Atha, who is mentioned in this place.

The grey form of the youth appears in darknefs. Blood pours from his airy fide. Cairbar thrice threw his fpear on earth. Thrice he ftroaked his beard. His fleps are fhort. He often flops. He toffes his finewy arms. He is like a cloud in the defart, varying its form to every blaft. The valleys are fad around, and fear, by turns, the fhower! The king, at length, refumed his foul. He took his pointed fpear. He turned his eye to Moi-lena. The fcouts of blue ocean came. They came with fleps of fear, and often looked behind. Cairbar knew that the mighty were near! He called his gloomy chiefs.

THE founding steps of his warriors came. They drew, at once, their swords. There Morlath * stood with darkened face. Hidalla's long hair sighs in wind. Red-haired Cormar bends on his spear, and rolls his side-long-looking eyes. Wild is the look of Malthos from beneath too ^{*} Mór-lath, great in the day of battle. Hidalla', mildly looking hero. Cor-mar, expert at sea. Malth-os, slow to speak. Foldath, generous.

Foldath, who is here strongly marked, makes a great figure in the fequel of the poem. His sterce, uncomplying character is sustained throughout. He seems, from a passage in the second book, to have been Cairbar's greatest consident, and to have had a principal hand in the conspiracy against Cormae king of Ireland. His tribe was one of the most considerable of the race of the Fir-bolg.

shaggy brows. Foldath stands, like an oozy rock, that covers its dark sides with foam. His spear is like Slimora's fir, that meets the wind of heaven. His shield is marked with the strokes of battle. His red eye despites danger. These and a thousand other chiefs surrounded the king of Erin, when the scout of ocean came, Morannal*, from streamy Moi-lena. His eyes hang forward from his face. His lips are trembling, pale!

"Do the chiefs of Erin stand," he said, "filent as the grove of evening? Stand they, like a silent wood, and Fingal on the coast? Fingal, who is terrible in battle, the king of streamy Morven! "Hast thou seen the warrior?" said Cairbar with a sigh. "Are his heroes many on the coast? Lifts he the spear of battle? Or comes the king in peace?" In peace he comes not, king of Erin. I have seen his forward spear. It is a meteor of death. The blood of thousands is on its fleel. He came first to the shore, strong in the grey hair of age. Full rofe his finewy limbs, as he strode in his might. That fword is by his fide, which gives no fecond * wound. His thield is terrible, like the bloody moon, afcending through a fform. Then came Offian king of fongs. Then Morni's fon, the first of men. Connal leaps forward on his fpear. Dermid spreads his dark-brown locks. Fillan bends his bow, the young hunter of streamy Moruth. But who is that before them, like the terrible course of a stream! It is the fon of Ossian, bright between his locks! His long hair falls on his back. His dark brows are half-inclosed in steel. His fword hangs loofe on his fide. His fpear glitters as he moves. I fled from his terrible eyes, king of high Temora!"

^{*} Mór-annal, frong-breath; a very proper name for a fcout. † Mor-annal here alludes to the particular appearance of Fingal's spear. If a man, upon his first landing in a strange country, kept the point of his spear forward, it denoted in those days that he came in a hostile manner, and accordingly he was treated as an enemy; if he kept the point behind him, it was a token of friendship, and he was immediately invited to the feast, according to the hospitality of the times.

"THEN fly, thou feeble man," faid Foldath's gloomy wrath. "Fly to the grey ftreams of thy land, fon of the little foul! Have not I feen that Ofcar? I beheld the chief in war. He is of the mighty in danger: but there are others who lift the fpear. Erin has many fons as brave, king of Temora of Groves! Let Foldath meet him in his strength. Let me stop this mighty stream. My spear is covered with blood. My shield is like the wall of Tura!"

^{*} This was the famous (word of Fingal, made by Luno, a fmith of Lochlin, and after him poetically called the fon of Luno: it is faid of this (word, that it killed a man at every stroke; and that Fingal never used it but in times of the greatest danger.

"Shall Foldath * alone meet the foe?" replied the dark-browed Malthos. "Are they not on our coast, like the waters of many streams? Are not these the chiefs, who vanquished Swaran, when the sons of green Erin sted? Shall Foldath meet their bravest hero? Foldath of the heart of pride! take the strength of the people! and let Malthos come. My sword is red with slaughter, but who has heard my words †?"

"Sons of green Erin," faid Hidalla ‡, "let not Fingal hear your words. The foe might rejoice, and his arm be firong in the land. Ye are brave, O warriors! Ye are tempefts in war. Ye are, like florms, which meet the rocks without fear, and overturn the woods. But let us move

^{*} The opposite characters of Foldath and Malthos are firongly marked in subsequent parts of the poem. They appear always in opposition. The seuds between their families, which were the source of their hatred to one another, are mentioned in other poems.

[†] That is, who has heard my vaunting? He intended the expression as a rebuke to the self-praise of Foldath.

[‡] Hidalla was the chief of Clonra, a small district on the banks of the lake of Lego. The beauty of his person, his eloquence and genius for poetry are afterwards mentioned.

in our firength, flow as a gathered cloud! Then shall the mighty tremble; the spear shall fall from the hand of the valiant. We see the cloud of death, they will say, while shadows say over their face. Fingal will mourn in his age. He shall behold his slying same. The steps of his chiefs will cease in Morven. The moss of years shall grow in Selma."

CAIRBAR heard their words, in filence, like the cloud of a shower: it stands dark on Cromla, till the lightning bursts its side. The valley gleams with heaven's stame; the spirits of the storm rejoice. So stood the silent king of Temora; at length his words broke forth. "Spread the feast on Moi-lena. Let my hundred bards attend. Thou, red-hair'd Olla, take the harp of the king. Go to Oscar chief of swords. Bid Oscar to our joy. To-day we feast and hear the song: to-morrow break the spears! Tell him that I have raised the tomb of Cathol*; that bards gave his friend to the winds. Tell him that Cairbar has heard of his same, at the ^{*} Cathol the fon of Maronnan, or Moran, was murdered by Cairbar, for his attachment to the family of Cormac. He had attended Ofcar to the war of Inis-thona, where they contracted a great friendship for one another. Ofcar, immediately after the death of Cathol, had fent a formal challenge to Cairbar, which he prudently declined, but conceived a ferret hatred against Ofcar, and had beforehand contrived to kill him at the feast, to which he here invites him.

ftream of refounding 'Carun †. Cathmor ‡ my brother is not here. He is not here with his thousands, and our arms are weak. Cathmor is a foe to ftrife at the feast! His foul is bright as that fun! But Cairbar must fight with Oscar, chiefs of woody Temora! His words for Cathol were many: the wrath of Cairbar burns. He shall fall on Moi-lena. My same shall rife in blood."

THEIR faces brightened round with joy. They spread over Moilena. The feast of shells is prepared. The fongs of bards arise. The

+ He alludes to the battle of Oscar against Caros, king of fips; who is supposed to be the same with Carausius the usurper.

‡ Cathmor, great in battle, the fon of Borbar-duthul, and brother of Cairbar king of Ireland, had, before the infurrection of the Firbolg, paffed over into Inis-huna, supposed to be a part of South-Britain, to assist Commor king of that place against his enemies. Cathmor was successful in the war, but, in the course of it, Commor was either killed, or died a natural death. Cairbar, upon intelligence of the designs of Fingal to dethrone him, had dispatched a messenger for Cathmor, who returned into Ireland a few days before the opening of the poem.

Cairbar here takes advantage of his brother's absence, to perpetrate his ungenerous designs against Oscar; for the noble spirit of Cathmor, had he been present, would not have permitted the laws of that hospitality, for which he was so renowned himself, to be violated. The brothers form a contrast: we do not detest the mean soul of Cairbar more, than we admire the disinterested and generous mind of Cathmor.

chiefs of Selma heard their joy *. We thought that mighty Cathmor came. Cathmor the friend of strangers! the brother of red-haired Cairbar. Their souls were not the same. The light of heaven was in the bosom of Cathmor. His towers rose on the banks of Atha: seven paths led to his halls. Seven chiefs stood on the

* Fingal's army heard the joy that was in Cairbar's camp. The character given of Cathmor is agreeable to the times. Some, through oftentation, were hospitable; and others fell naturally into a custom handed down from their ancestors. But what marks strongly the character of Cathmor, is his aversion to praise; for he is represented to dwell in a wood to avoid the thanks of his guest; which is still a higher degree of generosity than that of Axylus in Homer: for the poet does not say, but the good man might, at the head of his owa table, have heard with pleasure the praise bestowed on him by the people he entertained.

No nation in the world carried hospitality to a greater length than the ancient Scots It was even infamous, for many ages, in a man of condition, to have the door of his house shut at all. LEST, as the bards express it. THE STRAN-GER SHOULD COME AND BEHOLD HIS CONTRACTED SOUL. some of the chiefs were possessed of this hospitable disposition to an extravagant degree; and the bards, perhaps upon a private account, never failed to recommend it, in their euloriums. Cean uia' na dai', or the point to which all the roads of the strangers lead, was an invariable epithet given by them to the chiefs; on the contrary, they distinguished the inhofpitable by the title of the cloud which the Arangers foun, This last however was so uncommon, that in all the old poems I have ever met with, I found but one man branded with this ignominious appellation; and that, perhaps, only founded upon a private quarrel, which subsisted between him and the patron of the bard, who wrote the poem.

paths, and called the ftranger to the feaft! But Cathmor dwelt in the wood, to thun the voice of praise!

OLLA came with his fongs. Ofcar went to Cairbar's feaft. Three hundred warriors ftrode, along Moi-lena of the ftreams. The grey dogs bounded on the heath: Their howling reached afar. Fingal faw the departing hero. The foul of the king was fad. He dreaded Cairbar's gloomy thoughts, amid the feaft of shells. My fon raifed high the spear of Cormac. An hundred bards met him with songs. Cairbar concealed with smiles the death, that was dark in his foul. The feaft is spread. The shells refound. Joy brightens the face of the host. But it was like the parting beam of the sun, when he is to hide his red head, in a storm!

CAIRBAR rifes in his arms. Darkness gathers on his brow. The hundred harps cease at once. The clang * of shields is heard. Far distant on the heath Olla raised a song of woe. My son knew the sign of death; and rising seized his spear. "Oscar," said the dark-red

^{*} When a chief was determined to kill a person already in his power, it was usual to signify, that his death was intended, by the sound of a shield struck with the blunt end of a spear; at the same time that a bard at a distance raised the death song.

Cairbar, "I behold the fpear † of Erin. The fpear of Temora * glitters in thy hand, fon of woody Morven! It was the pride of an hundred ‡ kings. The death of heroes of old. Yield it, fon of Ossian, yield it to car-borne Cairbar!"

"SHALL I yield," Ofcar replied, "the gift of Erin's injured king: the gift of fair-haired Cormac, when Ofcar fcattered his foes? I came to Cormac's halls of joy, when Swaran fled from Fingal. Gladness rose in the face of youth. He gave the spear of Temora. Nor did he give it to the seeble: neither to the weak in soul. The darkness of thy face is no storm to me: nor are thine eyes the slame of death. Do I fear thy clanging shield? Tremble I at Olla's song? No: Cairbar, frighten the seeble: Oscar is a rock!"

[†] Cormac, the fon of Arth, had given the fpear, which is here the foundation of the quarrel, to Ofcar when he came to congratulate him, upon Swaran's being expelled from Ireland.

[•] Ti' mor. i', the house of the great king, the name of the royal palace of the supreme kings of Ireland.

[†] Hundred here is an indefinite number, and is only intended to express a great many. It was probably the hyperbolical phrases of bards, that gave the first hint to the Irish Senachies to place the origin of their monarchy in so remote a period as they have done.

"WILT thou not yield the fpear?" replied the rifing pride of Cairbar. "Are thy words fo mighty, because Fingal is near? Fingal with aged locks, from Morven's hundred groves! He has fought with little men. But he must vanish before Cairbar, like a thin pillar of mist before the winds of Atha*!" "Were he who fought with little men, near Atha's haughty chief: Atha's chief would yield green Erin to avoid his rage! Speak not of the mighty, O Cairbar! Turn thy sword on me. Our strength is equal: but Fingal is renowned! the first of mortal men!"

THEIR people faw the darkening chiefs. Their crowding steps are heard around. Their eyes roll in fire. A thousand swords are half unsheathed. Red-haired Olla raised the song of battle. The trembling joy of Oscar's soul arose: the wonted joy of his soul when Fingal's horn was heard. Dark as the swelling wave of ocean before the rising winds, when it bends its head near the coast, came on the host of Cairbar!

DAUGHTER of Toscar ‡! why that tear? He is not fallen yet. Many were the deaths of his arm before my hero fell!

^{*} Atha, fballow river: the name of Cairbar's feat in Connaught.

[†] Malvina, the daughter of Toscar, to whom is addressed that part of the poem which related to the death of Oscar her lover.

Behold they fall before my fon, like groves in the defart; when an angry ghost rushes through night, and takes their green heads in his hand! Morlath falls. Maronnan dies. Conachar trembles in his blood! Cairbar shrinks before Oscar's sword! He creeps in darkness behind a stone. He lifts the spear in secret; he pierces my Oscar's side! He falls forward on his shield: his knee sustains the chief. But still his spear is in his hand. See gloomy Cairbar falls! The steel pierced his forehead, and divided

† The Irish historians place the death of Cairbar, in the latter end of the third century: they say, he was killed in battle against Oscar the son of Ossian, but deny that he fell by his hand.

It is, however, certain, that the Irish bards disguise, in some measure, this part of their history. An Irish poem on this subject, which, undoubtedly, was the source of their information, concerning the battle of Gabhra, where Cairbar fell, is just now in my hands. As a translation of the poem (which, tho' evidently no very ancient composition, does not want poetical merit) would extend this note to too great a length, I shall only give the story of it in brief, with some extracts from the original lrish.

Ofcar, fays the Irish bard, was invited to a feast, at Temora, by Cairbar king of Ireland. A dispute arose between the two heroes, concerning the exchange of spears, which was usually made, between the guests and their host, upon such occasions. In the course of their altercation, Cairbar said, in a boastful manner, that he would hunt on the hills of Albion, and carry the spoils of it into Ireland, in spite of all the efforts of its inhabitants. The original words are;

vided his red hair behind. He lay, like a fhattered rock, which Cromla shakes from its shaggy side; when the green-valled Erin shakes its mountains, from sea to sea!

But never more shall Ofcar rise! He leans on his bossy shield. His spear is in his terrible hand. Erin's sons stand distant and dark. Their shouts arise, like crouded streams. Moi-lena ecchoes wide. Fingal heard the sound. He took the spear of Selma. His steps are before us on the heath. He spoke the words of woe.

Briathar buan fin; Briathar buan A bheireadh an Cairbre rua', Gu tuga' fe fealg, agus creach A h'Albin an la'r na mhaireach.

Ofcar replied, that, the next day, he himself would carry into Albion the spoils of the five provinces of Ireland; in spite of the opposition of Cairbar.

> Briathar eile an aghai' fin A bheirea' an t' Oscar, og, calma Gu'n tugadh se sealg agus creach Do dh' Albin an la'r na mhaireach, &c.

Oscar, in consequence of his threats, began to lay waste Ireland; but as he returned with the spoil into Ulster, thro' the narrow pass of Gabhra (Caoil ghlen Ghabhra) he was met, by Cairbar, and a battle ensued, in which both the heroes sell by mutual wounds. The bard gives a very curious list of the followers of Oscar, as they marched to battle. They appear to have been five hundred in number, commanded, as the poet expresses it, by five heroes of the blood of kings. This poem mentions Fingal, as arriving from Scotland. before Oscar died of his wounds.

"I hear the noise of war. Young Oscar is alone. Rise, sons of Morven: join the hero's sword!"

Ossian rushed along the heath. Fillan bounded over Moi-lena. Fingal strode in his strength. The light of his shield is terrible. The fons of Erin faw it far distant. They trembled in their fouls. They knew that the wrath of the king arose: and they foresaw their death. We first arrived. We fought. Erin's chiefs withstood our rage. But when the king came, in the found of his courfe, what heart of steel could stand! Erin sled over Moi-lena. Death purfued their flight. We faw Ofcar on his shield. We faw his blood around. Silence darkened every face. Each turned his back and wept. The king strove to hide his tears. His grey beard whistled in the wind. He bends his head above the chief. His words are mixed with fighs.

"ART thou fallen, O Ofcar, in the midst of thy course? the heart of the aged beats over thee! He sees thy coming wars! The wars which ought to come he sees! They are cut off from thy same! When shall joy dwell at Selma? When shall grief depart from Morven? My sons fall by degrees: Fingal is the last of his race. My same begins to pass away. Mine age will be without friends. I shall fit a grey cloud in my hall. I shall not hear the return of a son, in his sounding arms. Weep, ye heroes of Morven! never more shall Oscar rise!"

AND they did weep, O Fingal! Dear was the hero to their fouls. He went out to battle, and the foes vanished. He returned, in peace, amidst their joy. No father mourned his fon slain in youth: no brother his brother of love. They fell, without tears, for the chief of the people is low! Bran* is howling at his feet: gloomy Luäth is fad, for he had often led them to the chace; to the bounding roe of the desart!

When Ofcar faw his friends around, his heaving breast arose. "The groans," he said, "of aged chiefs: The howling of my dogs: The sudden bursts of the song of grief, have melted Oscar's soul. My soul, that never melted before. It was like the steel of my sword. Ossian, carry me to my hills! Raise the stones of my renown. Place the horn of a deer: place my sword by my side. The torrent hereaster may raise the earth: the hunter may find the steel and say, "This has been Oscar's sword, the pride of other years!" "Fallest thou, son of my same! Shall I never see thee, Oscar! When others hear of their fone; fhall I not hear of thee? The moss is on thy four grey stones. The mournful wind is there. The battle shall be fought without thee. Thou shalt not pursue the dark-brown hinds. When the warrior returns from battles, and tells of other lands; "I have seen a tomb," he will say, "by the roaring stream, the dark dwelling of a chief. He fell by car-borne Oscar, the first of mortal men," I, perhaps, shall hear his voice. A beam of joy will rise in my foul."

Vol. II. C others

^{*} Bran was one of Fingal's dogs. Bran fignifies a mountain-stream.

NIGHT would have descended in sorrow, and morning returned in the shadow of grief. Our chiefs would have stood, like cold dropping rocks on Moi-lena, and have forgot the war; did not the king disperse his grief, and raise his mighty voice. The chiefs, as new-wakened from dreams, lift up their heads around.

"How long on Moi-lena shall we weep How long pour in Erin our tears? The mighty will not return. Ofcar shall not rife in his strength. The valiant must fall in their day, and be no more known on their hills. Where are our fathers, O warriors! the chiefs of the times of old? They have set like stars that have shone. We only hear the sound of their praise. But they were renowned in their years: the terror of other times. Thus shall we pass away, in the day of our fall. Then let us be renowned when we may; and leave our fame behind us, like the last beams of the fun, when he hides his red head in the west. The traveller mourns his absence, thinking of the flame of his beams. Ullin my aged bard! take thou the ship of the king. Carry Ofcar to Selma of harps. Let the daughters of Morven weep. We must fight in Erin, for the race of fallen Cormac. The days of my years begin to fail. I feel the weakness of my arm. My fathers bend from their clouds, to receive their grey-hair'd fon. But, before I go hence, one beam of fame thall rife. My days thall end, as my years begun, in fame. My life shall be one stream of light to bards of other times!"

ULLIN rais'd his white fails. The wind of the fouth came forth. He bounded on the waves toward Selma. I remained in my grief, but my words were not heard. The feaft is spread on Moi-lena. An hundred heroes reared the tomb of Cairbar. No song is raised over the chief. His soul had been dark and bloody. The bards remembered the fall of Cormac! what could they say in Cairbar's praise?

NIGHT came rolling down. The light of an hundred oaks arose. Fingal sat beneath a tree.

Old Althan* flood in the midft. He told the tale of fallen Cormac. Althan the fon of Conachar, the friend of car-borne Cuthullin. He dwelt with Cormac in windy Temora, when Semo's fon fell at Lego's ftream. The tale of Althan was mournful. The tear was in his eye, when he fpoke.

† "The fetting fon was yellow on Dora ‡. Grey evening began to descend. Temora's woods shook with the blast of the unconstant wind. A cloud gathered in the west. A red star looked from behind its edge. I stood in the wood alone. I saw a ghost on the darkening air! His stride extended from hill to hill. His shield was dim on his side. It was the son of Semo. I knew the warrior's sace. But he passed away in his blast; and all was dark around! My soul was sad. I went to the hall of shells. A thousand lights arose. The hundred bards had strung the harp. Cormac stood in [•] Althan, the fon of Conachar, was the chief bard of Arth king of Ireland. After the death of Arth, Althan attended his fon Cormac, and was present at his death. He had made his escape from Cairbar, by the means of Cathmor, and coming to Fingal, related, as here, the death of his master Cormac.

⁺ Althan speaks.

[†] Doira, the awordy fide of a mountain; it is here a hill in the neighbourhood of Temora, the midft, like the morning flar, when it rejoices on the eaftern hill, and its young beams are bathed in showers. Bright and filent is its progress aloft, but the cloud, that shall hide it, is near! The sword of Artho* was in the hand of the king. He looked with joy on its polished studs: thrice he attempted to draw it, and thrice he failed; his yellow locks are spread on his shoulders: his cheeks of youth are red. I mourned over the beam of youth, for he was soon to set!"

"ALTHAN!" he faid, with a fmile, "didft thou behold my father? Heavy is the fword of the king; furely his arm was strong. O that I were like him in battle, when the rage of his wrath arose! then would I have met, with Cuthullin, the car-borne son of Cantéla! But years may come on, O Althan! and my arm be strong. Hast thou heard of Semo's son, the ruler of high Temora? He might have returned with his same. He promised to return to-night. My bards wait him with songs. My feast is spread in the hall of kings."

I HEARD Cormac in filence. My tears began to flow. I hid them with my aged locks. The king perceived my grief. "Son of Conachar!"

^{*} Arth, or Artho, the father of Cormac king of Ireland.

he faid, "is the fon of Semo † low? Why bursts the figh in secret? Why descends the tear? Comes the car-borne Torlath? Comes the found of red-haired Cairbar? They come! for I behold thy grief. Mosfy Tura's chief is low! Shall I not rush to battle? But I cannot lift the spear! O had mine arm the strength of Cuthullin, soon would Cairbar fly; the same of my fathers would be renewed; and the deeds of other times!"

He took his bow. The tears flow down, from both his sparkling eyes. Grief saddens round. The bards bend forward, from their hundred harps. The lone blast touched their trembling strings. The found is sad and low! A voice is heard at a distance, as of one in grief. It was Carril of other times, who came from dark Slimora ‡. He told of the sall of Cuthullin. He told of his mighty deeds. The people were scattered round his tomb. Their arms lay on [†] Cuthullin is called the king of Tura from a caftle of that name on the coast of Ulster, where he dwelt, before he undertook the management of the affairs of Ireland, in the minority of Cormac.

^{*} That prophetic found, mentioned in other poems, which the harps of the bards emitted before the death of a person worthy and renowned. It is here an omen of the death of Cormac, which, soon after, followed.

[‡] Slimora, a hill in Connaught, near which Cuthullin was killed.

the ground. They had forgot the war, for he, their fire, was feen no more!

- "Bur who," faid the foft-voiced Carril, "who come like bounding roes? Their flature is like young trees in the valley, growing in a flower! Soft and ruddy are their cheeks! Fearless fouls look forth from their eyes! Who but the fons of Usnoth*, chief of streamy Etha? The people rife on every side, like the strength of an half-extinguished fire, when the winds come, sudden, from the desart, on their russling wings. Sudden glows the dark brow of the hill; the passing mariner lags, on his winds. The found of Caithbat's † thield was heard.
- * Usnoth chief of Etha, a district on the western coast of Scotland, had three sons, Nathos, Althos, and Ardan, by Slissama the sister of Cuthullin. The three brothers, when very young, were sent over to Ireland by their father, to learn the use of arms under their uncle, whose military same was very great in that kingdom. They had just arrived in Usser when the news of Cuthullin's death arrived. Nathos, the eldest of the three brothers, took the command of Cuthullin's army, and made head against Cairbar the chief of Atha. Cairbar having, at last, murdered young king Cormac, at Temora, the army of Nathos shifted sides, and the brothers were obliged to return into Usser, in order to pass over into Scotland. The sequel of their mournful slory is related, at large, in the poem of Dar-thula.
- + Caithbait was grandfather to Cuthullin; and his shield was made use of to alarm his posterity to the battles of the family.

The warriors faw Cuthullin * in Nathos. So rolled his fparkling eyes! his fteps were fuch on heath! Battles are fought at Lego. The fword of Nathos prevails. Soon fhalt thou behold him im thy halls, king of Temora of groves!"

"Soon may I behold the chief!" replied the blue-cyed king. "But my foul is fad for Cuthullin. His voice was pleafant in mine ear. Often have we moved, on Dora, to the chace of the darkbrown hinds. His bow was unerring on the hills. He fpoke of mighty men. He told of the deeds of my fathers. I felt my rifing joy. But fit thou at the feaft, O Carril, I have often heard thy voice. Sing in praife of Cuthullin. Sing of Nathos of Etha*!

DAY rose on Temora, with all the beams of the east. Crathin came to the hall, the son of old Gelláma †. "I behold," he said, "a cloud in the desart, king of Erin! a cloud it seemed at first, but now a croud of men! One strides before them in his strength. His red hair slies in wind. His shield glitters to the beam of the east. His spear is in his hand." "Call him to the feast of Temora," replied the brightening king. "My hall is the house of strangers, son of generous Gelláma! It is perhaps the chief of Etha, coming in all his renown. Hail, mighty * stranger! art thou of the friends of Cormac? But Carril, he is dark, and unlovely. He draws his sword. Is that the son of Usnoth, bard of the times of old?"

^{*} That is, they faw a manifest likeness between the person of Nathos and Cuthullin

⁺ Nathos the fon of Usnoth.

¹ Geal lamha, white-handed.

"It is not the fon of Ufnoth!" faid Carril.

"It is Cairbar thy foe. Why comeft thou in thy arms to Temora? chief of the gloomy brow. Let not thy fword rife against Cormac! Whither dost thou turn thy speed?" He passed on in darkness. He feized the hand of the king. Cormac foresaw his death; the rage of his eyes arose. "Retire, thou chief of Atha! Nathos comes with war. Thou art bold in Cormac's hall, for his arm is weak." The sword entered the side of the king. He fell in the halls of his fathers. His fair hair is in the dust. His blood is smoaking round.

ART thou fallen in thy halls †?" faid Carril.
"O fon of noble Artho. The shield of Cuthullin was not near. Nor the spear of thy father.
Mournful are the mountains of Erin, for the chief of the people is low! Bleft be thy foul, O Cormac! Thou art darkened in thy youth."

^{*} From this expression, we understand, that Cairbar had entered the palace of Temora, in the midst of Cormac's speech.

† Althan speaks.

His words came to the ears of Cairbar. He closed*us in the midst of darkness. He feared to stretch his sword to the bards‡, though his soul was dark. Long we pined alone! At length, the noble Cathmor † came. He heard our voice from the cave. He turned the eye of his wrath on Cairbar.

"BROTHER of Cathmor," he faid, "how long wilt thou pain my foul? Thy heart is a rock. Thy thoughts are dark and bloody! But thou art the brother of Cathmor; and Cathmor shall shine in thy war. But my foul is not like thine: thou seeble hand in fight! The light of my bosom is stained with thy deeds. Bards will not sing of my renown: They may say, "Cathmor was brave, but he sought for gloomy Cairbar." They will pass over my tomb in silence. My same shall not be heard. Cairbar! loose

^{*} That is, himself and Carril, as it afterwards appears.

[†] The persons of the bards were so facred, that even he, who had just murdered his sovereign, seared to kill them.

[†] Cathmor appears the same disinterested hero upon every occasion. His humanity and generosity were unparallelled: in short, he had no fault, but too much attachment to so bad a brother as Cairbar. His family connection with Cairbar prevails, as he expresses it, over every other consideration, and makes him engage in a war, of which he does not approve.

the bards. They are the fons of future times. Their voice shall be heard in other years; after the kings of Temora have failed." We came forth at the words of the chief. We saw him in his strength. He was like thy youth, O Fingal, when thou first didst list the spear. His sace was like the plain of the sun, when it is bright. No darkness travelled over his brow. But he came with his thousands to aid the red-haired Cairbar. Now he comes to revenge his death, O king of woody Morven."

"LET Cathmor come," replied the king. "I love a foe fo great. His foul is bright. His arm is strong. His battles are full of fame. But the little foul is a vapour that hovers round the marshy lake. It never rises on the green hill, left the winds should meet it there. Its dwelling is in the cave, it fends forth the dart of death! Our young heroes, O warriors, are like the renown of our fathers. They fight in youth. They fall. Their names are in fong. Fingal is amid his darkening years. He must not fall, as an aged oak, across a secret stream. Near it are the steps of the hunter, as it lies beneath the wind. " How has that tree fallen?" he fays, and, whistling, strides along. Raise the song of joy, ye bards of Morven. Let our fouls forget the past. The red stars look on us from clouds. clouds, and filently defcend. Soon shall the grey beam of the morning rife, and shew us the foes of Cormac. Fillan! my fon, take thou the spear of the king. Go to Mora's dark-brown side. Let thine eyes travel over the heath. Observe the foes of Fingal: Observe the course of generous Cathmor. I hear a distant sound, like salling rocks in the defart. But strike thou thy shield, at times, that they may not come thro' night, and the same of Morven cease. I begin to be alone, my fon. I dread the fall of my renown!"

THE voice of bards arofe. The king leaned on the shield of Trenmor. Sleep descended on his eyes. His suture battles arose in his dreams. The host are sleeping around. Dark-haired Fillan observes the soe. His steps are on a distant hill. We hear, at times, his clanging shield.

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK II.

ARGUMENT to BOOK IL.

This book opens, we may suppose, about midnight, with a soliloguy of Offian, who had retired, from the rest of the army. to mourn for his fon Ofcar. Upon hearing the noise of Cathmor's army approaching, he went to find out his brother Fillan, who kept the watch, on the hill of Mora, in the front of Fingal's army. In the conversation of the brothers, the epifode of Conar, the fon of Trenmor, who was the first king of Ireland, is introduced, which lays open the origin of the contests between the Cael and Firbolg, the two nations who first possessed themselves of that island. Ossian kindles a fire on Mora; upon which Cathmor defifted from the design he had formed of surprising the army of the Caledonians. He calls a council of his chiefs; reprimands Foldath for advising a night-attack, as the Irish army were fo much superior in number to the enemy. The bard Fonar introduces the story of Crothar, the ancestor of the king, which throws further light on the history of Ireland, and the original pretenfions of the family of Atha, to the throne of that kingdom. The Irith chiefs lie down to rest, and Cathmor himself undertakes the watch. In his circuit, round the army, he is met by Offian. The interview of the two heroes is described. Cathmor obtains a promise from Oshan, to order a funeral elegy to be fung over the grave of Cairbar; it being the opinion of the times, that the fouls of the dead could not be happy, till their elegies were fung by a bard. Morning comes. Cathmor and Offian part; and the latter, cafually meeting with Carril the fon of Kinfena, fends that bard, with a funeral fong, to the tomb of Cairbar.

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK II.

*FATHER of heroes! O Trenmor! High dweller of eddying winds! where the dark-red thunder marks the troubled clouds! Open thou thy flormy halls. Let the bards of old be near. Let them draw near, with fongs and their half-viewlefs harps. No dweller of mifty valley comes! No hunter unknown at his ftreams! It is the carborne Ofcar, from the fields of war.

Sudden

^{*} Though this book has little action, it is not the least important part of Temora. The poet, in several episodes, runs up the cause of the war to the very source. The first population of Ireland, the wars between the two nations who originally possessed that island, its first race of kings, and the revolutions of its government, are important sacts, and are delivered by the poet, with so little mixture of the fabulous, that one cannot help preferring his accounts to the improbable scitions of the Scotch and Irish historians. The Milesian fables bear about them the marks of a late invention. To trace their legends to their source would be no difficult talk; but a disquisition of this fort would extend this note too far.

Sudden is thy change, my fon, from what thou wert on dark Moilena! The blaft folds thee in its skirt, and rustles through the sky! Dost thou not behold thy father, at the stream of night? The chiefs of Morven sleep far-distant. They have lost no son: But ye have lost a hero, chiefs of resounding Morven! Who could equal his strength, when battle rolled against his side, like the darkness of crowded waters? Why this cloud on Ossian's soul? It ought to burn in danger. Erin is near with her host. The king of Selma is alone. Alone thou shalt not be, my father, while I can lift the spear!

I ROSE, in all my arms. I rose and listened to the wind. The shield of Fillan * is

^{*} We understand, from the preceding book, that Cathmor was near with an army. When Cairbar was killed, the tribes who attended him fell back to Cathmor; who, as it afterwards appears, had taken a resolution to surprize Fingal by night. Fillan was dispatched to the hill of Mora, which was in the front of the Caledonians, to observe the motions of Cathmor. In this fituation were affairs when Offian, upon hearing the noise of the approaching enemy, went to find out his brother. Their conversation naturally introduces the episode, concerning Conar the fon of Trenmor, the first Irish monarch, which is fo necessary to the understanding the foundation of the rebellion and usurpation of Cairbar and Cathmor. Fillan was the youngest of the fons of Fingal, then living. He and Bosmina, mentioned in the battle of Lora, were the only children of the king, by Clatho the daughter of Cathulla king of Inis-tore, whom he had taken to wife, after the death of Ros-crana, the daughter of Cormac Mac-Conar king of Ireland.

not heard. I tremble for the fon of Fingal. "Why should the foe come by night? Why should the dark-haired warrior fail?" Distant, fullen murmurs rise: like the noise of the lake of Lego, when its waters shrink, in the days of frost, and all its bursting ice resounds. The people of Lara look to heaven, and foresee the storm! My steps are forward on the heath. The spear of Oscar in my hand! Red stars looked from high. I gleamed, along the night.

I saw Fillan filent before me, bending forward from Mora's rock. He heard the shout of the foe. The joy of his foul arose. He heard my founding tread, and turned his listed spear. "Comest thou, son of night, in peace? Or dost thou meet my wrath? The foes of Fingal are mine. Speak, or fear my steel. I stand not, in vain, the shield of Morven's race." "Never mayst thou stand in vain, son of blue eyed Clatho! Fingal begins to be alone. Darkness gathers on the last of his days. Yet he has two * fons who ought to shine in war. Who ought

^{*} That is, two fons in Ireland. Fergus, the fecond fon of Fingal, was, at that time, on an expedition, which is mentioned in one of the leffer poems. He, according to fome traditions, was the ancestor of Fergus, the son of Erc or Arcath, commonly called Fergus the fecond in the Scotch histories. The beginning of the reign of Fergus, over the Scots, is placed, by the most approved annals of scotland, in the fourth year of the Vol. II.

ought to be two beams of light, near the fleps of his departure."

"Son of Fingal," replied the youth, "it is not long fince I raifed the fpear. Few are the marks of my fword in war. But Fillan's foul is fire! The chiefs of Bolga *crowd around the shield of generous Cathmor. Their gathering is on that heath. Shall my steps approach their host? I yielded to Ofcar alone, in the strife of the race, on Cona!"

"FILLAN, thou shalt not approach their host; nor fall before thy same is known. My name is heard in song: when needful I advance. From the skirts of night I shall view them over all their gleaming tribes. Why, Fillan, didst thou speak of Oscar! Why awake my sigh? I must forget † the warrior, till the storm is rolled away.

fifth age: a full century after the death of Offian. The genealogy of his family is recorded thus by the Highland Senachies; Fergus Mac-Arcath Mac Chongael, Mac-Fergus, Mac-Fien-gä-l na buai'; i. e. Fergus the fon of Arcath, the fon of Congal, the fon of Fergus, the fon of Fingal the villorious. This subject is treated more at large, in the differtation annexed to the poem.

* The fouthern parts of Ireland went, for some time, under the name of Bolga, from the Fir-bolg or Belgæ of Britain, who fettled a colony there. Bolg signifies a quiver, from which proceeds Fir-bolg e bow-men; so called from their using bows, more than any of the neighbouring nations.

† After this passage, Oscar is not mentioned in all Temora.

The situations of the characters who act in the poem are so interesting, away. Sadness ought not to dwell in danger, nor the tear in the eye of war. Our fathers forgot their fallen fons, till the noise of arms was past. Then forrow returned to the tomb, and the fong of bards arose." The memory of those, who fell, quickly followed the departure of war: When the tumult of battle is past, the foul, in filence, melts away, for the dead.

CONAR * was the brother of Trathal, first of mortal men. His battles were on every coast. A thousand streams rolled down the blood of his foes. His fame filled green Erin, like a pleasant gale.

teresting, that others, foreign to the subject, could not be introduced with any lustre. Though the episode, which follows, may seem to slow naturally enough from the conversation of the brothers, yet I have shewn, in a preceding note, and, more at large, in the differtation annexed to this collection, that the poet had a farther design in view.

* Conar, the first king of Ireland, was the son of Trenmor, the great-grand-father of Fingal. It was on account of this family-connection, that Fingal was engaged in so many wars in the cause of the race of Conar. Tho' sew of the actions of Trenmor are mentioned, he was the most renowned name of antiquity. The most probable opinion concerning him is, that he was the first, who united the tribes of the Caledonians, and commanded them, in chief, against the incursions of the Romans. The genealogists of the North have traced his family far back, and given a list of his ancestors to Cuan-mór nan lan, or Conmor of the swords, who, according to them, was the first who crossed the great sea, to Caledonia, from which circumstance his name proceeded, which signifies Great ocean. Genealogies of so ancient a date, however, are little to be depended upon.

The nations gathered in Ullin, and they bleffed the king; the king of the race of their fathers, from the land of Selma.

THE chiefs * of the fouth were gathered, in the darkness of their pride. In the horrid cave of Muma, they mixed their secret words. Thither often, they said, the spirits of their fathers came; shewing their pale forms from the chinky rocks: reminding them of the honor of Bolga. "Why should Conar reign," they said, "the fon of resounding Morven?"

THEY came forth, like the ftreams of the defart, with the roar of their hundred tribes. Conar was a rock before them: broken they rolled on every fide. But often they returned, and the fons of Selma fell. The king ftood, among the tombs of his warriors. He darkly bent his mournful face. His foul was rolled into itfelf; and he had marked the place, where he was to fall; when Trathal came, in his ftrength, his brother from cloudy Morven. Nor did he come

^{*} The chiefs of the Fir-bolg who possessed themselves of the south of Ireland, prior, perhaps, to the settlement of the Cail of Caledonia, and the Hebrides, in Ulster. From the sequel, it appears that the Fir-bolg were, by much, the most powerful nation; and it is probable that the Cail must have submitted to them, had they not received succours from their mother-country, under the command of Conar.

alone. Colgar * was at his fide; Colgar the fon of the king and of white-bofomed Solin-corma.

As Trenmor, cloathed with meteors, defcends from the halls of thunder, pouring the dark from before him over the troubled fea: fo Colgar defcended to battle, and wasted the ecchoing field. His father rejoiced over the hero: but an arrow came! His tomb was raised, without a tear. The king was to revenge his fon. He lightened forward in battle, till Bolga yielded at her streams!

When peace returned to the land: When his blue waves bore the king to Morven: then he remembered his fon, and poured the filent tear. Thrice did the bards, at the cave of Furmono, call the foul of Colgar. They called him to the hills of his land. He heard them in his mist. Trathal placed his sword in the cave, that the spirit of his son might rejoice.

^{*} Colg-er, fiercely-looking warrier. Sulin-corma, blue eyes. Colgar was the eldest of the sons of Trathal: Comhal, who was the father of Fingal, was very young when the present expedition to Ireland happened. It is remarkable, that, of all the ancestors of Fingal, tradition makes the least mention of Comhal; which, probably, proceeded from the unfortunate life and untimely death of that hero. From some passages, concerning him, we learn, indeed, that he was brave, but he wanted condust.

"COLGAR*, fon of Trathal!" faid Fillan,
"thou wert renowned in youth! But the king hath not marked my fword, bright-freaming on the field. I go forth with the crowd. I return, without my fame. But the foe approaches, Offian! I hear their murmur on the heath. The found of their fleps is like thunder, in the bofom of the ground, when the rocking hills shake their groves, and not a blast pours from the darkened sky!"

OSSIAN turned fudden on his fpear. He raifed the flame of an oak on high. I fpread it large, on Mora's wind. Cathmor flopt in his courfe. Gleaming he flood, like a rock, on whose fides are the wandering of blasts; which feize its ecchoing streams and clothe them over with ice. So stood the friend † of strangers! The winds lift his heavy locks. Thou art the tallest of the race of Erin, king of streamy Atha!

^{*} The poem begins here to mark firongly the character of Fillan, who is to make so great a figure in the sequel. He has the impatience, the ambition and fire which are peculiar to a young hero. Kindled with the same of Colgar, he forgets his untimely fall. From Fillan's expressions in this passage, it would seem, that he was neglected by Fingal, on account of his youth.

⁺ Cathmor is diffinguished, by this honourable title, on account of his generosity to strangers, which was so great as to be remarkable even in those days of hospitality.

"First of bards," faid Cathmor, "Fonar*, call the chiefs of Erin. Call red-hair'd Cormar: dark-browed Malthos: the fide-long-looking gloom of Maronan. Let the pride of Foldath appear. The red-rolling eye of Turlotho. Nor let Hidalla be forgot; his voice, in danger, is the found of a shower, when it falls in the blasted vale, near Atha's falling stream." Pleasant is its found, on the plain, whilst broken thunder travels over the sky!"

They came, in their clanging arms. They bent forward to his voice, as if a fpirit of their fathers fpoke from a cloud of night. Dreadful shone they to the light; like the fall of the stream of Brumo; when the meteor lights it, before the nightly stranger. Shuddering, he stops in his journey, and looks up for the beam of the morn!

^{*} Fónar, the man of fong. Before the introduction of Christianity a name was not imposed upon any person, till he had distinguished himself by some remarkable action, from which his name should be derived.

[†] Brumo was a place of worship (Fing. b. 6.) in Craca, which is supposed to be one of the isles of Shetland. It was thought, that the spirits of the deceased haunted it, by night, which adds more terror to the description introduced here. The borrid circle of Brumo, subere often, they said, the ghosts of the dead howled round the slone of fear.

"WHY * delights Foldath," faid the king, "to pour the blood of foes, by night? Fails his arm in battle, in the beams of day? Few are the foes before us, why should we clothe us in shades? The valiant delight to shine, in the battles of their land! Thy counsel was in vain, chief of Moma! The eyes of Morven do not sleep. They are watchful, as eagles, on their mostly rocks. Let each collect, beneath his cloud, the strength of his roaring tribe. To-morrow I move, in light, to meet the foes of Bolga? Mighty † was he, that is low, the race of Borbar-Duthul!"

"Nor unmarked!" faid Foldath, "were my steps before thy race. In light, I met the foes of Cairbar. The warrior praised my deeds. But his stone was raised without a tear? No bard sung to over Erin's king. Shall his foes rejoice along their mossly hills? No: they must not rejoice! He was the friend of Foldath! Our words were mixed, in secret, in Moma's filent cave; whilst thou, a boy in the field, purfuedft the thiftle's beard. With Moma's fons I shall rush abroad, and find the foe, on his dusky hills. Fingal shall lie, without his fong, the grey-haired king of Selma."

^{*} From this paffage, it appears, that it was Foldath who had advifed the night-attack. The gloomy character of Foldath is properly contrafted to the generous, the open Cathmor.

⁺ By this exclamation Cathmor intimates that he intends to revenge the death of his brother Cairbar.

[†] To have no funeral elegy fung over his tomb, was, among the Celtæ, reckoned the greatest missfortune that could befal a man; as his soul could not otherwise be admitted to the airy ball of his fathers.

"Dost thou think, thou feeble man," replied Cathmor, half-enraged: "Dost thou think Fingal can fall, without his fame, in Erin? Could the bards be filent, at the tomb of Selma's king? The fong would burst in secret! the spirit of the king would rejoice! It is when thou shalt fall, that the bard shall forget the song. Thou art dark, chief of Moma, though thine arm is a tempest in war. Do I forget the king of Erin, in his narrow house? My soul is not lost to Cairbar, the brother of my love! I marked the bright beams of joy, which travelled over his cloudy mind, when I returned, with same, to Atha of the streams."

TALL they removed, beneath the words of the king. Each to his own dark tribe; where, humming, they rolled on the heath, faint-glittering to the stars: like waves, in a rocky bay, before the nightly wind. Beneath an oak, lay the chief of Atha. His shield, a dusky round, hung high. Near him, against a rock, leaned the fair flranger * of Inis-huna: that beam of light, with wandering locks, from Lumon of the roes. At diffance rose the voice of Fonar, with the deeds of the days of old. The fong fails, at times, in Lubar's growing roar!

"CROTHAR†," begun the bard, "first dwelt at Atha's mostly stream! A thousand ‡ oaks, from the mountains, formed his ecchoing hall. The gathering of the people was there, around the feast of the blue-eyed king. But who, among his chiefs, was like the stately Crothar? Warriors kindled in his presence. The young figh

† From this circumflance we may learn that the art of building with from was not known in Ireland fo early as the days of Crothar. When the colony were long fettled in the country, the arts of civil life began to increase among them, for

^{*} By the stranger of Inis huna, is meant Sulmalla, the daughter of Conmor king of Inis-huna, the ancient name of that part of South-Britain, which is next to the Irish coast. She had followed Cathmor in disguise. Her story is related at large in the fourth book.

[†] Crothar was the ancestor of Cathmor, and the first of his family, who had settled in Atha. It was, in his time, that the first wars were kindled between the Fir-bolg and Caël. The propriety of the episode is evident; as the contest which originally rose between Crothar and Conar, subsisted afterwards between their posterity, and was the foundation of the story of the poem.

figh of the virgins rofe. In Alnecma * was -the warrior honoured: the first of the race of Bolga."

"He purfued the chace in Ullin: on the moss covered top of Drumardo. From the wood looked the daughter of Cathmin, the blue-rolling eye of Con-lama. Her figh rose in secret. She bent her head, midst her wandering locks. The moon looked in, at night, and saw the white-tossing of her arms; for she thought of the mighty Crothar, in the season of dreams."

we find mention made of the towers of Atha in the time of Cathmor, which could not well be applied to wooden buildings. In Caledonia they begun very early to build with stone. None of the houses of Fingal, excepting Ti-foirmal, were of wood. Ti-foirmal was the great hall where the bards met to repeat their compositions annually, before they submitted them to the judgment of the king in Selma. By some accident or other, this wooden house happened to be burnt, and an ancient bard, in the character of Oslan, has left us a curious catalogue of the furniture which it contained. The poem is not just now in my hands, otherwise I would lay here a translation of it before the reader. It has little poetical merit, and evidently bears the marks of a later period.

* Alnecma, or Alnecmacht, was the ancient name of Connaught. Ullin is still the Irish name of the province of Usser. To avoid the multiplying of notes, I shall here give the signification of the names in this emission. Drumardo, bigh ridge. Cathmin, calm in battle Con-lamha, fost hand. Turloch, man of the quiver. Cormul, blue eye.

"THREE days feafted Crothar with Cathmin. On the fourth they awaked the hinds. Con-lama moved to the chace, with all her lovely steps. She met Crothar in the narrow path. The bow fell, at once, from her hand. She turned her face away, and half-hid it with her locks. The love of Crothar rose. He brought the white-bosomed maid to Atha. Bards raised the fong in her presence. Joy dwelt round the daughter of Cathmin."

"The pride of Turloch rose, a youth who loved the white-handed Con-láma. He came, with battle, to Alnecma; to Atha of the roes. Cormul went forth to the strife, the brother of car-borne Crothar. He went forth, but he fell. The sigh of his people rose. Silent and tall, across the stream, came the darkening strength of Crothar: he rolled the soe from Alnecma. He returned, midst the joy of Con-láma."

"BATTLE on battle comes. Blood is poured on blood. The tombs of the valiant rife. Erin's clouds are hung round with ghofts. The chiefs of the fouth gathered round the ecchoing thield of Crothar. He came, with death, to the paths of the foe. The virgins wept, by the ftreams of Ullin. They looked to the mist of the hill: No hunter descended from its folds. Silence

darkened

darkened in the land. Blafts fighed lonely on graffy tombs."

"Descending like the eagle of heaven, with all his rufiling wings, when he forfakes the blaft, with joy, the fon of Trenmor came; Conar, arm of death, from Morven of the groves. He poured his might along green Erin. Death dimly strode behind his sword. The sons of Bolga sled, from his course, as from a stream, that bursting from the stormy defart, rolls the sields together, with all their ecchoing woods. Crothar met him in battle: but Alnecma's warriors sled. The king of Atha slowly retired, in the grief of his soul. He, asterwards, shone in the fouth; but dim as the sun of Autumn; when he visits, in his robes of mist, Lara of dark fireams. The withered grafs is covered with dew: the field, tho' bright, is fad!"

^{*} The delicacy here, with regard to Crothar, is proper. As he was the ancestor of Cathmor, to whom the episode is addressed, the bard sostens his deseat, by only mentioning that his people sted. Cathmor took the song of Fonar in an unsavourable light. The bards, being of the order of the Druids, who pretended to a foreknowlege of events, were supposed to have some supernatural prescience of suturity. The king thought, that the choice of Fonar's song proceeded, from his foreseeing the unfortunate issue of the war; and that his own sate was shadowed out, in that of his ancestor Crothar. The attitude of the bard, after the reprimand of his patron, is picturesque and affecting. We admire the speech of Cathmor, but lament the effect it has on the feeling soul of the good old poet.

"Why wakes the bard before me," faid Cathmor, "the memory of those who fled? Has some ghost, from his dusky cloud, bent forward to thine ear; to frighten Cathmor from the field, with the tales of old? Dwellers of the skirts of night, your voice is but a blast to me; which takes the grey thistle's head, and strews its beard on streams. Within my bosom is a voice. Others hear it not. His soul forbids the king of Erin to thrink back from war."

ABASHED the bard finks back in night: retired he bends above a ftream. His thoughts are on the days of Atha, when Cathmor heard his fong with joy. His tears come rolling down. The winds are in his beard. ERIN fleeps around. No fleep comes down on Cathmor's eyes. Dark, in his foul, he faw the fpirit of low-laid Cairbar. He faw him, without his fong, rolled in a blaft of night. He rofe. His fleeps were round the hoft. He flruck, at times, his ecchoing shield. The found reached Offian's ear, on Mora's mostly brow.

"FILLAN," I faid, "the foes advance. I hear the shield of war. Stand thou in the narrow path. Offian shall mark their course. If over my fall the hoft should pour; then be thy buckler heard. Awake the king on his heath, left his fame should fly away." I strode in all my rattling arms; wide-bounding over a stream that darkly-winded, in the field, before the king of Atha. Green Atha's king, with lifted spear, came forward on my course. Now would we have mixed in horrid fray, like two contending ghosts, that bending forward, from two clouds, fend forth the roaring winds; did not Ossian behold, on high, the helmet of Erin's kings. The Eagle's wing spread above it, russling in the breeze. A red star looked thro' the plumes. I stopt the lifted spear.

"The helmet of kings is before me! Who art thou fon of night? Shall Offian's fpear be renowned, when thou art lowly-laid?" At once he dropt the gleaming lance. Growing before me feemed the form. He ftretched his hand in night. He spoke the words of kings.

"FRIEND of the spirits of heroes, do I meet thee thus in shades? I have wished for thy stately steps in Atha, in the days of joy. Why should my spear now arise? The sun must behold us, Ossian; when we bend, gleaming, in the strife. Future warriors shall mark the place: and, shuddering, think of other years. They shall mark it, like the haunt of ghosts, pleasant and dreadful to the foul."

" SHALL it then be forgot," I faid, " where we meet in peace? Is the remembrance of battles always pleafant to the foul? Do not we behold, with joy, the place where our fathers feasted? But our eyes are full of tears, on the fields of their war. This stone shall rife, with all its moss, and speak to other years. " Here Cathmor and Offian met! the warriors met in peace!" When thou, O stone, shalt fail. When Lubar's stream shall roll away! then shall the traveller come, and bend here, perhaps, in rest. When the darkened moon is rolled over his head, our shadowy forms may come, and, mixing with his dreams, remind him of this place. But why turnest thou so dark away, son of Borbar-duthul * ?"

"Not forgot, fon of Fingal, shall we afcend these winds. Our deeds are streams of light, before the eyes of bards. But darkness is rolled on Atha: the king is low, without his ^{*} Borbar-duthul, the furly warrior of the dark brown eyes. That his name fuited well with his character, we may cafily conceive, from the flory delivered concerning him, by Malthos, toward the end of the fixth book. He was the brother of that Colculla, who is mentioned in the epifode which begins the fourth book.

fong: still there was a beam towards Cathmor from his stormy foul; like the moon, in a cloud, amidst the dark-red course of thunder."

"Son of Erin," I replied, "my wrath dwells not, in his earth *. My hatred flies, on eaglewing, from the foe that is low. He shall hear the fong of bards. Cairbar shall rejoice on his winds."

CATHMOR'S fwelling foul arofe. He took the dagger from his fide; and placed it gleaming in my hand. He placed it, in my hand, with fighs, and, filent, firode away. Mine eyes followed his departure. He dimly gleamed, like the form of a ghoft, which meets a traveller, by night, on the dark-skirted heath. His words are dark like songs of old: with morning strides the unfinished shade away!

† Who comes from Lubar's vale? From the skirts of the morning mist? The drops of heaven

^{*} This reply abounds with the fentiments of a noble mind. Tho', of all men living, he was the most injured by Cairbar, yet he lays aside his rage as the foe was low. How different is this from the behaviour of the heroes of other ancient poems? Cynthius aurem wellit.

[†] The morning of the second day, from the opening of the peem comes on. After the death of Cuthullin, Carril, the son of Kinsena, his bard, retired to the cave of Tura, which was in the neighbourhood of Moi-lena, the seen of the poem of Temora. His casual appearance here enables Offian to Vol. II.

ven are on his head. His steps are in the paths of the sad. It is Carril of other times. He comes from Tura's silent cave. I behold it dark in the rock, thro' the thin folds of mist. There, perhaps, Cuthullin sits, on the blast which bends its trees. Pleasant is the song of the morning from the bard of Erin!

"The waves crowd away," faid Carril.
"They crowd away for fear. They hear the found of thy coming forth, O fun! Terrible is thy beauty, fon of heaven, when death is defeending on thy locks: when thou rolless thy vapors before thee, over the blasted host. But pleasant is thy beam to the hunter, sitting by the rock in a storm, when thou shewest thyself from the parted cloud, and brighteness this dewy locks: he looks down on the streamy vale, and beholds the descent of roes! How long shalt thou rise on war, and roll, a bloody shield, thro' heaven? I see the deaths of heroes, dark-wandering over thy face!"

"Why wander the words of Carril?" I faid.

Does the fon of heaven mourn? He is unflained in his course, ever rejoicing in his fire.

fulfil immediately the promise he had made to Cathmor, of causing the funeral song to be pronounced over the tomb of Cairbar. This book takes up only the space of a few hours.

Roll on, thou careless light. Thou too, perhaps, must fall. Thy darkening hour may feize thee, flruggling, as thou rollest through thy sky. But pleasant is the voice of the bard: pleafant to Offian's foul! It is like the shower of the morning, when it comes through the ruftling vale, on which the fun looks thro' mift, just rising from his rocks. But this is no time, O bard, to fit down, at the strife of fong. Fingal is in arms on the vale. Thou feeft the flaming shield of the king. His face darkens between his locks. He beholds the wide rolling of Erin. Does not Carril behold that tomb. befide the roaring stream? Three stones lift their grey heads, beneath a bending oak. A king is lowly laid! Give thou his foul to the wind. He is the brother of Cathmor! Open his airy hall! Let thy fong be a stream of joy to Cairbar's darkened ghoft."

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK III.

ARGUMENT to BOOK III.

Morning coming on, Fingal, after a speech to his people, devolves the command on Gaul, the fon of Morni: it being the custom of the times, that the king should not engage, till the necessity of affairs required his superior valour and conduct. The king and Offian retire to the rock of Cormul, which overlooked the field of battle. The bards fing the war-fong. The general conflict is described. Gaul, the fon of Morni, distinguishes himself; kills Tur-lathon, chief of Moruth, and other chiefs of lesser name. On the other hand, Foldath, who commanded the !rish army (for Cathmor, after the example of Fingal, kept himself from battle) fights gallantly: kills Connal, chief of Dun-lora, and advances to engage Gaul himself. Gaul, in the mean time, being wounded in the hand, by a random arrow, is covered by Fillan, the fon of Fingal, who performs prodigies of valour. Night comes on. The horn of Fingal recalls his army. The bards meet them, with a congratulatory fong, in which the praises of Gaul and Fillan are particularly celebrated. The chiefs fit down at a feaft; Fingal misses Connal. The episode of Connal and Duthcaron is introduced: which throws further light on the ancient history of Ireland. Carril is dispatched to raise the tomb of Connal. The action of this book takes up the fecond day, from the opening of the poem.

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK III.

Who, by the bending hill of roes? Tall, he leans on an oak torn from high, by nightly winds. Who but Comhal's fon, brightening in the last of his fields? His grey hair is on the breeze. He half untheaths the sword of Luno. His eyes are turned to Moi-lena, to the dark moving of foes. Dost thou hear the voice of the king? It is like the bursting of a stream, in the desart, when it comes, between its ecchoing rocks, to the blasted field of the sun!

"WIDE-SKIRTED comes down the foe! Sons of woody Selma, arife. Be ye like the rocks of our land, on whose brown sides are the rolling of streams. A beam of joy comes on my soul. I see the foe mighty before me. It is when HE is feeble, that the fighs of Fingal are heard: left death should come, without renown, and darkness dwell on his tomb. Who shall lead the war, against the host of Alnecma? It is, only when danger grows, that my sword shall shine. Such was the custom, heretofore, of Trenmor the ruler of winds! and thus descended to battle the blue-shielded Trathal!"

E 4 when

56

The chiefs bend toward the king. Each darkly feems to claim the war. They tell, by halves, their mighty deeds. They turn their eyes on Erin. But far before the rest the son of Morni stands. Silent he stands, for who had not heard of the battles of Gaul? They rose within his soul. His hand, in secret, seized the sword. The sword which he brought from Strumon, when the strength of Morni sailed *.

^{*} Strumon, fiream of the bill, the name of the feat of the family of Gaul, in the neighbourhood of Selma. During Gaul's expedition to Tromathon, mentioned in the poem of Oithona, Morni his father died. Morni ordered the fivers of Strumon, (which had been preferved, in the family, as a relique, from the days of Colgach, the most renowned of his ancestors) to be laid by his side, in the tomb: at the same time, leaving it in charge to his son, not to take it from thence, till he was reduced to the last extremity. Not long after, two of his brothers being ssain, in battle, by Coldaronnan, chief of Clutha, Gaul went to his sather's tomb to take the sword. His address to the spirit of the deceased hero, is the subject of the following short poem.

On his fpear leans Fillan of Selma*, in the wandering of his locks. Thrice he raifes his eyes

to

GAUL.

"Breaker of ecchoing shields, whose head is deep in shades; hear me from the darkness of Clora, O son of colgach, hear!

No ruftling, like the eagle's wing, comes over the course of my streams. Deep bosomed in the midst of the desart, O king of Strumon, hear!

Dwellest thou in the shadowy breeze, that pours its dark wave over the grass? Cease to strew the beard of the thistle; O chief of Clora, hear!

Or ridest thou on a beam, amidst the dark trouble of clouds? Pourest thou the loud wind on seas, to roll their blue waves over isses? hear me, father of Gaul; amidst thy terrors, hear!

The ruflling of eagles is heard, the murmuring oaks shake their heads on the hills: dreadful and pleasant is thy approach, friend of the dwelling of heroes,

MORNI.

Who awakes me, in the midst of my cloud, where my locks of mist spread on the winds? Mixed with the noise of streams, why rises the voice of Gaul?

GAUL.

My foes are around me, Morni: their dark ships descend from their waves. Give the sword of Strumon, that beam which thou hidest in thy night.

MORNI.

Take the sword of resounding Strumon; I look on thy war, my son; I look, a dim meteor, from my cloud: blue shielded Gaul, destroy.'

* Clatho was the daughter of Cathulla, king of Inistore. Fingal, in one of his expeditions to that island, fell in love with to Fingal: his voice thrice fails him, as he speaks. My brother could not boast of battles: at once he strides away. Bent over a distant stream he stands: the tear hangs in his eye. He strikes, at times, the thistle's head, with his inverted spear. Nor is he unseen of Fingal. Sidelong he beholds his son. He beholds him, with bursting joy; and turns, amid his crowded soul. In silence turns the king toward Mora of woods. He hides the big tear with his locks. At length his voice is heard.

"FIRST of the fons of Morni! Thou rock that defieft the florm! Lead thou my battle, for the race of low-laid Cormac. No boy's flaff is thy fpear: no harmless beam of light thy sword. Son of Morni of steeds, behold the foe! Destroy! Fillan, observe the chief! He is not calm in strife: nor burns he, heedless, in battle. My son, observe the chief! He is strong as Lubar's stream, but never foams and roars. High on cloudy Mora, Fingal shall behold the war. Stand, Ossian*, near thy father, by the falling with Clatho, and took her to wife, after the death of Roscrána, the daughter of Cormac, king of Ireland.

Clatho was the mother of Ryno, Fillan, and Bosmina, mentioned in the battle of Lora. Fillan is often called the son of Clatho, to distinguish him from those sons which Fingal had by Ros-crana.

^{*} Ullin being fent to Morven with the body of Ofcar, Offian attends his father, in quality of chief bard, ftream. Raife the voice, O bards! Selma, move beneath the found. It is my latter field. Clothe it over with light."

As the fudden rifing of winds; or diffant rolling of troubled feas, when fome dark ghost, in wrath, heaves the billows over an isle: an isle, the feat of mist, on the deep, for many dark-brown years! So terrible is the found of the host, wide-moving over the field. Gaul is tall before them. The streams glitter within his strides. The bards raise the song by his side. He strikes his shield between. On the skirts of the blast, the tuneful voices rise.

"On Crona," faid the bards, "there bursts a stream by night. It swells in its own dark course, till morning's early beam. Then comes it white from the hill, with the rocks and their hundred groves. Far be my steps from Crona. Death is tumbling there. Be ye a stream from Mora, sons of cloudy Morven!"

"Who rifes, from his car, on Clutha? The hills are troubled before the king! The dark woods eccho round, and lighten at his fteel. See him, amidst the foe, like Colgach's * sportful ghost;

^{*}There are some traditions, but, I believe, of late invention, that this Colgach was the same with the Galgacus of Tacitus. He was the ancestor of Gaul, the son of Morni, and appears, from some, really ancient, traditions, to have been king.

ghost; when he featters the clouds, and rides the eddying winds! It is Morni * of bounding fleeds! Be like thy father, O Gaul!"

"Selma is opened wide. Bards take the trembling harps. Ten youths bear the oak of the feaft. A diffant fun-beam marks the hill. The dufky waves of the blaft fly over the fields of grafs. Why art thou filent, O Selma? The king returns with all his fame. Did not the battle roar; yet peaceful is his brow? It roared, and Fingal overcame. Be like thy father, O Fillan!"

THEY move beneath the fong. High wave their arms, as rushy fields, beneath autumnal king, or Vergobret, of the Caledonians; and hence proceeded the pretentions of the family of Morni to the throne, which created a good deal of disturbance, both to Comhal and his fon Fingal. The first was killed in battle by that tribe; and it was after Fingal was grown up, that they were reduced to obedience. Colgach fignifies fiercely-looking; which is a very proper name for a warrior, and is probably the origin of Galgacus; though I believe it a matter of mere conjecture, that the Colgach here mentioned was the fame with that hero. I cannot help observing, that the fong of the bards is conducted with propriety. Gaul, whose experience might have rendered his conduct cautious in war, has the example of his father, just rushing to battle, set before his eyes. Fillan, on the other hand, whose youth might make him impetuous and unguarded in action, is put in mind of the sedate and serene behaviour of Fingal upon like occasions.

winds.

The expedition of Moral to Clutha, alluded to here, is handed down in tradition.

winds. On Mora stands the king in arms. Mist slies round his buckler abroad; as, alost, it hung on a bough, on Cormul's mosty rock. In silence I stood by Fingal, and turned my eyes on Cromla's * wood: lest I should behold the host, and rush amid my swelling soul. My foot is forward on the heath. I glittered, tall, in steel: like the falling stream of Tromo, which nightly winds bind over with ice. The boy sees it, on high, gleaming to the early beam: toward it he turns his ear, and wonders why it is so filent!

Nor bent over a stream is Cathmor, like a youth in a peaceful field. Wide he drew forward the war, a dark and troubled wave. But when he beheld Fingal on Mora; his generous pride arose, "Shall the chief of Atha fight, and no king in the field? Foldath lead my people forth. Thou art a beam of fire."

FORTH-ISSUES Foldath of Moma, like a cloud, the robe of ghosts. He drew his sword, a slame, from his side. He bade the battle move. The tribes, like ridgy waves, dark pour their strength around. Haughty is his stride before them. His red eye rolls in wrath. He calls Cormul chief of Dunratho*; and his words were heard.

The mountain Cromla was in the neighbourhood of the fcene of this poem; which was nearly the fame with that of Fingal.

"CORMUL, thou beholdest that path. It winds green behind the foe. Place thy people there; lest Schma should escape from my sword. Bards of green-valleyed Erin, let no voice of yours arise. The sons of Morven must fall without song. They are the foes of Cairbar. Hereaster shall the traveller meet their dark, thick mist on Lena, where it wanders, with their ghosts, beside the reedy lake. Never shall they rise, without song, to the dwelling of winds."

CORMUL darkened, as he went. Behind him rushed his tribe. They sunk beyond the rock. Gaul spoke to Fillan of Selma; as his eye pursued the course of the dark-eyed chief of Dunratho. "Thou beholdest the steps of Cormul! Let thine arm be strong! When he is low, so of Fingal, remember Gaul in war. Here I fall forward into battle, amid the ridge of shields."

^{*} Dun-ratho, a hill, with a plain on its top: Corm-uil, blue eye. Foldath dispatches here, Cormul to lie in ambush behind the army of the Caledonians. This speech suits with the character of Foldath, which is, throughout, haughty and presumptuous. Towards the latter end of this speech, we find the opinion of the times, concerning the unhappiness of the souls of those who were buried without the suneral song. This doctrine was inculcated by the bards, to make their order respectable and necessary.

THE fign of death afcends: the dreadful found of Morni's shield. Gaul pours his voice between. Fingal rises on Mora. He saw them, from wing to wing, bending at once in strife. Gleaming, on his own dark hill, stood Cathmor of streamy Atha. The kings were like two spirits of heaven, standing each on his gloomy cloud; when they pour abroad the winds, and lift the roaring seas. The blue-tumbling of waves is before them, marked with the paths of whales. They themselves are calm and bright. The gale lists slowly their locks of mist!

What beam of light hangs high in air! What beam, but Morni's dreadful fword! Death is strewed on thy paths, O Gaul! Thou foldest them together in thy rage. Like a young oak falls Tur-lathon ‡, with his branches round him. His high-bosomed spouse stretches her white arms, in dreams, to the returning chief, as she sleeps by gurgling Moruth, in her disordered locks. It is his ghost, Oichoma. The chief is lowly laid. Hearken not to the winds for Turlathon's ecchoing shield. It is pierced, by his streams. Its sound is past away.

[†] Tur-lathon, broad-trunk of a tree. Moruth, great stream. Oichaoma, mild maid. Dun-lora, the bill of the noify stream. Duth-caron, dark-brown man.

Not peaceful is the hand of Foldath. He winds his course in blood. Connal met him in fight. They mixed their clanging steel. Why should mine eyes behold them! Connal, thy locks are grey! Thou wert the friend of strangers, at the moss-covered rock of Dun-lora. When the skies were rolled together: then thy feast was spread. The stranger heard the winds without; and rejoiced at thy burning oak. Why, son of Duth-caron, art thou laid in blood! The blasted tree bends above thee. Thy shield lies broken near. Thy blood mixes with the stream; thou breaker of the shields!

Ossian took the spear, in his wrath. But Gaul rushed forward on Foldath. The feeble pass by his side: his rage is turned on Moma's chief. Now they had raised their deathful spears: unseen an arrow came. It pierced the hand of Gaul. His steel fell sounding to earth. Young Fillan came †, with Cormul's shield! He ⁺ Fillan had been dispatched by Gaul to oppose Cormal, who had been fent by Foldath to lie in ambush behind the Caledonian army. It appears that Fillan had killed Cormul, otherwise, he could not be supposed to have possessed himself of the shield of that chief.

firetched it large before the chief. Foldath fent his shouts abroad, and kindled all the field: as a blast that lifts the wide-winged flame, over Lumon's ecchoing groves*.

"Son of blue-eyed Clatho," faid Gaul, "O Fillan, thou art a beam from heaven; that, coming on the troubled deep, binds up the tempest's wing. Cormul is fallen before thee. Early art thou in the fame of thy fathers. Rush not too far, my hero. I cannot lift the spear to aid. I stand harmless in battle: but my voice shall be poured abroad. The sons of Selma shall hear, and remember my former deeds."

His terrible voice rose on the wind. The host bends forward in fight. Often had they heard him, at Strumon, when he called them to the chace of the hinds. He stands tall, amid the war, as an oak in the skirts of a storm, which now is clothed on high, in mist: then shews its broad, waving head. The musing hunter lists his eye, from his own rushy field!

My foul purfues thee, O Fillan, through the path of thy fame. Thou rolledst the foe before thee. Now Foldath, perhaps, may fly: but night comes down with its clouds. Cathmor's horn is heard on high. The fons of Selma hear the voice of Fingal, from Mora's gathered mist. The bards pour their fong, like dew, on the returning war.

^{*} Lumon, bending bill; a mountain in Inis huna, or that part of South-Britain which is over-against the Irish coast.

"Who comes from Strumon," they faid, "amid her wandering locks? She is mournful in her steps, and lifts her blue eyes toward Erin. Why art thou fad, Evir-choma*? Who is like thy chief in renown? He descended dreadful to battle; he returns, like a light from a cloud. He raised the sword in wrath: they shrunk before blue-shielded Gaul!"

"Joy, like the rustling gale, comes on the foul of the king. He remembers the battles of old; the days, wherein his fathers fought. The days of old return on Fingal's mind, as he beholds the renown of his fon. As the fun rejoices, from his cloud, over the tree his beams have raised, as it shakes its lonely head on the heath; so joyful is the king over Fillan!"

"As the rolling of thunder on hills, when Lara's fields are ftill and dark, fuch are the fteps of Selma pleafant and dreadful to the ear. They return with their found, like eagles to their darkbrowed rock, after the prey is torn on the field, the dun fons of the bounding hind, Your fathers rejoice from their clouds, fons of streamy Selma!"

^{*} Evir-choama, mild and flately maid, the wife of Gaul. She was the daughter of Casdu-conglass, chief of I-dronlo, one of the Hebrides.

Such was the nightly voice of bards, on Mora of the hinds. A flame rose, from an hundred oaks, which winds had torn from Cormul's steep. The feast is spread in the midst: around sat the gleaming chiefs. Fingal is there in his strength. The eagle-wing * of his helmet sounds. The rustling blasts of the west, unequal rush through night. Long looks the king in silence round: at length, his words are heard.

"My foul feels a want in our joy. I behold a breach among my friends. The head of one tree is low. The fqually wind pours in on Selma. Where is the chief of Dun-lora? Ought Connal to be forgot at the feaft? When did he forget the stranger, in the midst of his ecchoing hall? Ye are silent in my presence! Connal is then no more. Joy meet thee, O warrior, like a stream of light. Swift be thy course to thy fathers, along the roaring winds. Offian, thy soul is sire: kindle the memory of the king. Awake the battles of Connal, when first he shone in war. The locks of Connal were grey. His days of youth * were mixed with mine. In one day Duthcaron first strung our bows, against the roes of Dun-lora,"

[•] The kings of Caledonia and Ireland had a plume of eagle's feathers, by way of ornament, in their helmets. It was from this diftinguished mark that Offian knew Cathmor, in the second book.

"MANY," I faid, " are our paths to battle, in green vallied Erin. Often did our fails arife, over the blue-tumbling waves; when we came, in other days, to aid the race of Conar. The strife roared once in Alnecma, at the foamcovered streams of Duth-úla +. With Cormac defcended to battle Duthcaron from cloudy Selma. Nor descended Duthcaron alone, his son was by his fide, the long-haired youth of Connal lifting the first of his spears. Thou didst command them, O Fingal, to aid the king of Erin."

"LIKE the burfling flrength of ocean, the fons of Bolga rushed to war. Colc-ulla 1 was before

^{*} After the death of Comhal, and during the usurpation of the tribe of Morni, Fingal was educated in private by Duthcaron. It was then he contracted that intimacy with Connal. the fon of Duthcaron, which occasions his regretting so much his fall. When Fingal was grown up, he foon reduced the tribe of Morni; and, as it appears from the subsequent epifode, fent Duthcaron and his fon Connal to the aid of Cormac, the fon of Conar, king of Ireland, who was driven to the last extremity, by the insurrections of the Firbolg. This episode throws farther light on the contests between the Cael and Firbolg.

⁺ Duth ala, a river in Connaught; it fignifies, dark-rushing

I Colc-ulla, firm look in readiness; he was the brother of Borbar-duthul, the father of Cairbar and Cathmor, who after the death of Cormac, the fon of Artho, successively mounted the Irifa throne.

them, the chief of blue-streaming Atha. The battle was mixed on the plain. Cormac * shone in his own strife, bright as the forms of his fathers. But, far before the rest, Duthcaron hewed down the foe. Nor slept the arm of Connal, by his father's side. Cole-ulla prevailed on the plain: like scattered mist, sled the people of Cormac †."

"THEN rose the sword of Duthcaron, and the steel of broad-shielded Connal. They shaded

* Cormac, the fon of Conar, the second king of Ireland, of the race of the Caledonians. This infurrection of the Firbolg happened towards the latter end of the long reign of Cormac. He never possessed the Irish throne peaceably. The party of the family of Atha had made feveral attempts to overturn the fuccession in the race of Conar, before they effected it, in the minority of Cormac, the fon of Artho. Ireland, from the most ancient accounts concerning it, feems to have been always fo disturbed by domestic commotions, that it is difficult to fay, whether it ever was, for any length of time, subject to one monarch. It is certain, that every province, if not every fmall district, had its own king. One of these petty princes assumed, at times, the title of king of Ireland, and, on account of his superior force, or in cases of public danger, was acknowledged by the rest as such; but the succession, from father to fon, does not appear to have been established. It was the divisions amongst themselves, arising from the bad constitution of their government, that, at last, subjected the Irish to a foreign yoke.

† The inhabitants of Ullin or Ulfter, who were of the race of the Caledonians, feem, alone, to have been the firm friends to the fuccession in the family of Conar. The Firbolg were only subject to them by constraint, and embraced every opportunity to throw off their yoke.

their flying friends, like two rocks with their heads of pine. Night-came down on Duth-ula: filent firode the chiefs over the field. A mountain-stream roared across the path, nor could Duthcaron bound over its course. Why stands my father? faid Connal. I hear the rushing foe."

"FLY, Connal," he faid. "Thy father's firength begins to fail. I come wounded from battle. Here let me rest in night. "But thou shalt not remain alone," said Connal's bursting sigh. "My shield is an eagle's wing to cover the king of Dun-lora." He bends dark above his father. The mighty Duthcaron dies."

DAY rose, and night returned. No lonely bard appeared, deep-musing on the heath: and could Connal leave the tomb of his father, till he should receive his same? He bent the bow against the rose of Duth-ula. He spread the lonely feast. Seven nights he laid his head on the tomb, and saw his father in his dreams. He saw him rolled, dark, in a blast, like the vapor of reedy Lego. At length the steps of Colgan * came, the bard of high Temora. Duthcaron received ^{*} Colgan, the fon of Cathmul, was the principal bard of Cormac, king of Ireland. The following dialogue, on the loves of Fingal and Ros-crana, may be afcribed to him.

received his fame, and brightened, as he rose on the wind."

Ros-CRANA.

By night, came a dream to Ros crána! I feel my beating foul. No vision of the forms of the dead, came to the blue eyes of Erin. But, rifing from the wave of the north, I beheld him bright in his locks. I beheld the fon of the king. My beating foul is high. I laid my head down in night; again ascended the form. Why delayest thou thy coming, young rider of stormy waves!

But, there, far-distant, he comes; where seas roll their green ridges in mist! Young dweller of my soul; why dost thou delay—

FINGAL.

It was the foft voice of Moi-lena! the pleafant breeze of the valley of roes! But why dost thou hide thee in shades? Young love of heroes rife. Are not thy steps covered with light? In thy groves thou appearest, Ros-crana, like the sun in the gathering of clouds. Why dost thou hide thee in shades? Young love of heroes rife.

Ros-CRANA.

My fluttering foul is high! Let me turn from the steps of the king. He has heard my secret voice, and shall my blue eyes roll, in his presence? Roe of the hill of mos, toward thy dwelling I move. Meet me, ye breezes of Mora, as I move through the valley of winds. But why should he ascend his ocean? Son of heroes, my soul is thine! My steps shall not move to the desart: the light of Ros-crana is here.

·FINGAL.

It was the light tread of a ghost, the fair dweller of eddying winds. Why deceivest thou me, with thy voice? Here let me rest in shades. Shouldst thou stretch thy white arm, from thy grove, thou sun-beam of Cormac of Erin!

Ros-CRANA.

He is gone! and my blue-eyes are dim; faint-rolling, in all my tears. But, there, I behold him, alone; king of Selma, my foul is thine. Ah me! what clanging of armour! Colc-ulla of Atha is near!

" PLEASANT to the ear," faid Fingal, " is the praise of the kings of men; when their bows are strong in battle; when they foften at the fight of the fad. Thus let my name be renowned, when bards shall lighten my rifing foul. Carril, fon of Kinfena! take the bards and raise a tomb. Tonight let Connal dwell, within his narrow house. Let not the foul of the valiant wander on the winds. Faint glimmers the moon on Moi-lena, through the broad-headed groves of the hill! Raife stones, beneath its beam, to all the fallen in war. Though no chiefs were they, yet their hands were firong in fight. They were my rock in danger. The mountain from which I fpread my eagle-wings. Thence am I renowned. Carril forget not the low !"

Loud, at once, from the hundred bards, rose the fong of the tomb. Carril strode before them, they are the murmur of streams behind his steps. Silence dwells in the vales of Moi-lena, where each, with its own dark rill, is winding between the hills. I heard the voice of the bards, leffening, as they moved along. I leaned forward from my shield; and felt the kindling of my foul. Half-formed the words of my fong, burft forth upon the wind. So hears a tree, on the vale, the voice of spring around. It pours its green leaves to the fun. It shakes its lonely head.

4

head. The hum of the mountain bee is near it; the hunter fees it, with joy, from the blafted heath.

Young Fillan, at a distance stood. His helmet lay glittering on the ground. His dark hair is loose to the blast. A beam of light is Clatho's son! He heard the words of the king, with joy. He leaned forward on his spear.

"My fon," faid car-borne Fingal; "I faw thy deeds, and my foul was glad. The fame of our fathers, I faid, burfts from its gathering cloud. Thou art brave, fon of Clatho: but headlong in the ftrife. So did not Fingal advance, though he never feared a foc. Let thy people be a ridge behind. They are thy ftrength in the field. Then shalt thou be long renowned, and behold the tombs of the old. The memory of the past returns, my deeds in other years: when first I descended from ocean on the green-valleyed isle."

WE bend towards the voice of the king. The moon looks abroad from her cloud. The grey-skirted mist is near: the dwelling of the ghosts!

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK IV.

ARGUMENT to BOOK IV.

THE fecond night continues. Fingal relates, at the feaft, his own first expedition into Ireland, and his marriage with Ros-crána, the daughter of Cormac, king of that island. The Irish chiefs convene in the presence of Cathmor. The fituation of the king described. The story of Sul-mala, the daughter of Conmor, king of Inis-huna, who, in the difguise of a young warrior, had followed Cathmor to the war. The fullen behaviour of Foldath, who had commanded in the battle of the preceding day, renews the difference between him and Malthos; but Cathmor, interposing, ends it. The chiefs feast, and hear the song of Fonar the bard. Cathmor returns to rest, at a distance from the army. The ghost of his brother Cairbar appears to him in a dream; and obscurely foretels the iffue of the war. The foliloguy of the king. He discovers Sul-malla. Morning comes. Her foliloguy closes the book.

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK IV.

* "BENEATH an oak," faid the king, when Connal rose, from the sea, with the broken spear of Duth-caron. Far-distant stood the youth. He turned away his eyes. He remembered the steps of his father, on his own green hills. I darkened in my place. Dusky thoughts flew over my soul. The kings of Erin rose before me. I half-unsheathed the fword. Slowly approached the chiefs. They lifted up their filent eyes. Like a ridge of clouds, they wait for the bursting forth of my voice. My voice was, to them, a wind from heaven to roll the mist away."

[•] This epifode has an immediate connection with the flory of Connal and Duth-caron, in the latter end of the third book. Fingal, fitting beneath an oak, near the palace of Selma, difcovers Connal just landing from Ireland. The danger which threatened Cormac king of Ireland induces him to fail immediately to that island. The flory is introduced, by the king, as a pattern for the future behaviour of Fillan, whose rashness in the preceding battle is reprimanded.

" I BADE my white fails to rife, before the roar of Cona's wind. Three hundred youths looked, from their waves, on Fingal's boffy shield. High on the mast it hung, and marked the dark-blue fea. But when night came down, I struck, at times, the warning boss: I struck, and looked on high, for fiery-haired Ul-erin *. Nor absent was the star of heaven. It travelled red between the clouds. I purfued the lovely beam, on the faint-gleaming deep. With morning, Erin rose in mist. We came into the bay of Moi-lena, where its blue waters tumbled, in the bosom of ecchoing woods. Here Cormac, in his fecret hall, avoids the firength of Colc-ulla. Nor he alone avoids the foe. The blue eye of Ros-crana is there: Ros-crana t, white-handed maid, the daughter of the king!"

" GREY,

Ul-erin, the guide to Ireland, a ftar known by that name in the days of Fingal, and very useful to those who failed, by night, from the Hebrides, or Caledonia, to the coast of Ulster.

⁺ Ros-crána, the beam of the rifing fun; she was the mother of Ossian. The Irish bards relate strange sictions concerning

"GREY, on his pointless spear, came forth the aged steps of Cormac. He smiled, from his waving locks, but grief was in his foul. He faw us few before him, and his figh arofe. " I fee the arms of Trenmor, he faid; and these are the steps of the king! Fingal! thou art a beam of light to Cormac's darkened foul. Early is thy fame, my fon: but strong are the foes of Erin. They are like the roar of streams in the land, fon of car-borne Comhal!" " Yet they may be rolled * away," I faid in my rifing foul. "We are not of the race of the feeble. king of blue-shielded hosts! Why should fear come amongst us, like a ghost of night? The foul of the valiant grows, when foes increase in the field. Roll no darkness, king of Erin, on the young in war!"

"The burfling tears of the king came down. He feized my hand in filence. "Race of the daring Trenmor!" at length he faid, "I roll no cloud before thee. Thou burness in the fire this princes. Their flories, however, concerning Fingal, if they mean him by Fion Mac-Comnal, are so inconsistent and notoriously fabulous, that they do not deserve to be mentioned; for they evidently bear, along with them, the marks of late invention.

^{*} Cormac had faid that the foes were like the roar of fireams, and Fingal continues the metaphor. The speech of the young hero is spirited, and consistent with that sedate intrepidity, which eminently distinguishes his character throughout.

of thy fathers. I behold thy fame. It marks thy course in battle, like a stream of light. But wait the coming of Cairbar *, my fon must join thy sword. He calls the sons of Erin, from all their distant streams."

"We came to the hall of the king, where it rose in the midst of rocks, on whose dark sides, were the marks of streams of old. Broad oaks bend around with their moss. The thick birch is waving near. Half-hid, in her shady grove, Ros-crana raises the song. Her white hands move on the harp. I beheld her blue-rolling eyes. She was like a spirit † of heaven half-folded in the skirt of a cloud!"

" THREE

- * Cairbar, the fon of Cormac, was afterwards king of Ireland. His reign was short. He was succeeded by his son Artho, the father of that Cormac who was murdered by Cairbar the son of Borbar-duthul. Cairbar, the son of Cormac, long after his son Artho was grown to man's estate, had, by his wise Beltanno, another son, whose name was Perad-artho. He was the only one remaining of the race of Conar the first king of Ireland, when Fingal's expedition against Cairbar the son of Borbar-duthul happened. See more of Ferad artho in the eighth book.
- † The attitude of Ros-crana is illustrated by this fimile; for the ideas of those times, concerning the spirits of the deceased, were not so gloomy and disagreeable, as those of succeeding ages. The spirits of women, it was supposed, retained that beauty, which they possessed while living, and transported themselves, from place to place, with that gliding motion, which Homer ascribes to the gods. The descriptions which "THREE days we feaft at Moi-lena. She rifes bright in my troubled foul. Cormac beheld me dark. He gave the white-bosomed maid. She comes with bending eye, amid the wandering of her heavy locks. She came! Straight the battle roared. Colc-ulla appeared: I took my spear. My sword rose, with my people, against the ridgy soe. Alnecma sled. Colc-ulla fell. Fingal returned with same."

" Renowned is he, O Fillan, who fights, in the strength of his host. The bard pursues his which poets, less ancient than Offian, have lest us of those beautiful figures, that appeared sometimes on the hills, are elegant and picturesque. They compare them to the rain-bow on streams; or, the gilding of sun-beams on the hills.

A chief who lived three centuries ago, returning from the war, understood that his wife or mistress was dead. A bard introduces him speaking the following soliloquy, when he came within sight of the place, where he had left her, at his departure.

"My foul darkens in forrow. I behold not the smoak of my hall. No grey dog bounds at my streams. Silence dwells in the valley of trees.

"Is that a rain-bow on Crunath? It flies: and the fky is dark. Again, thou movest, bright, on the heath, thou sunbeam cloathed in a shower! Hah! it is she, my love: her gliding course on the bosom of winds!"

In fucceeding times the beauty of Roscrana passed into a proverb; and the highest compliment, that could be paid to a woman, was to compare her person with the daughter of Cormac.

'S tu fein an Ros crána. Siol Chormaec na n'ioma lan. steps, thro' the land of the foe. But he who fights alone, few are his deeds to other times! He thines, to-day, a mighty light. To-morrow, he is low. ONE fong contains his fame. His name is on ONE dark field. He is forgot; but where his tomb fends forth the tusted grass."

SUCH are the words of Fingal, on Mora of the roes. Three bards, from the rock of Cormul, pour down the pleafing fong. Sleep defeends, in the found, on the broad-skirted host. Carril returned, with the bards, from the tomb of Dun-lora's chief. The voice of morning shall not come, to the dusky bed of Duth-caron. No more shalt thou hear the tread of roes, around thy narrow house!

As roll the troubled clouds, round a meteor of night, when they brighten their fides, with its light, along the heaving fea: fo gathers Erin, around the gleaming form of Cathmor. He, tall in the midft, careless lifts, at times, his spear: as swells or falls the found of Fonar's distant harp. * Near him leaned, against a rock.

^{*} In order to illustrate this passage, I shall give, here, the history on which it is sounded, as I have gathered it from tradition. The nation of the Firbolg who inhabited the south of Ireland, being originally descended from the Belgæ, who possessed the south and south-west coast of Britain, kept up, for many ages, an amicable correspondence with their mother-rock, Sul-malla ‡ of blue eyes, the white-bosomed daughter of Conmor, king of Inishuna. To his aid came blue-shielded Cathmor, and rolled his soes away. Sul-malla beheld him stately in the hall of feasts. Nor careless rolled the eyes of Cathmor on the long-haired maid!

The third day arose, when Fithil * came, from Erin of the streams. He told of the lifting mother-country; and fent aid to the British Belgæ, when they were pressed by the Romans or other new-comers from the continent. Con-mor, king of Inis-huna, (that part of South-Britain which is over-against the Irish coast) being attacked, by what enemy is not mentioned, fent for aid to Cairbar, lord of Atha, the most potent chief of the Firbolg. Cairbar dispatched his brother Cathmor to the affistance of Con-mor. Cathmor, after various vicissitudes of fortune, put an end to the war, by the total defeat of the enemies of Inis-huna, and returned in triumph to the residence of Con-mor. There, at a feast, Sul-malla, the daughter of Con-mor, fell desperately in love with Cathmor, who, before her passion was disclosed, was recalled to Ireland by his brother Cairbar, upon the news of the intended expedition of Fingal, to re-establish the family of Conar on the Irish throne. The wind being contrary, Cathmor remained, for three days, in a neighbouring bay, during which time Sul-malla disguised herself in the habit of a young warrior, and came to offer him her fervice. in the war. Cathmor accepted of the proposal, sailed for Ireland, and arrived in Ultter a few days before the death of Cairbar.

‡ Sul-malla, flowly-roiling eyes. Caon-mór, mild and tall. Inis-huna, green ifland.

^{*} Fithil, an inferior bard. It may either be taken here for the proper name of a man, or in the literal fense, as the bards were the heralds and messengers of those times. Cathmor, it ing up of the shield † in Selma: He told of the danger of Cairbar. Cathmor raised the fail at Cluba: but the winds were in other lands. Three days he remained on the coast, and turned his eyes on Conmor's halls. He remembered the daughter of strangers, and his sigh arose. Now when the winds awaked the wave: from the hill came a youth in arms; to lift the sword with Cathmor, in his ecchoing sields. It was the white-armed Sul-malla. Secret she dwelt is probable, was absent, when the rebellion of his brother Cairbar, and the assassing of Cormac, king of Ireland, happened. Cathmor and his followers had only arrived, from Inis-huna, three days before the death of Cairbar, which sufficiently clears his character from any imputation of being concerned in the conspiracy, with his brother.

+ The ceremony which was used by Fingal, when he prepared for an expedition, is related thus in tradition. A bard, at midnight, went to the hall, where the tribes feasted upon folemn occasions, raised the war-fong, and thrice called the spirits of their deceased ancestors to come, on their clouds, to behold the actions of their children. He then fixed the field of Trenmor, on a tree on the rock of Selma, firiking it, at times, with the blunt end of a spear, and singing the warfong between. Thus he did, for three successive nights, and, in the mean time, messengers were dispatched to call together the tribes; or, to use an ancient expression, to call them from all their areams. This phrase alludes to the situation of the refidences of the clans, which were generally fixed in valleys, where the torrents of the neighbouring mountains were collested into one boir, and became large fireams or rivers. The lifting up of the shield, was the phrase for beginning a war.

beneath her helmet. Her fleps were in the path of the king: on him her blue eyes rolled with joy, when he lay by his roaring flreams! But Cathmor thought, that, on Lumon, fhe ftill purfued the roes. He thought, that fair on a rock, fhe flretched her white hand to the wind; to feel its course from Erin, the green dwelling of her love. He had promised to return, with his white-bosomed sails. The maid is near thee, O Cathmor! leaning on her rock.

THE tall forms of the chiefs stand around; all but dark-browed Foldath †. He leaned against a distant tree, rolled into his haughty soul. His bushy hair whistles in wind. At times, bursts the hum of a song. He struck the tree, at length, in wrath; and rushed before the king! Calm and stately, to the beam of the oak, arose the form of young Hidalla. His hair falls round his blushing cheek, in wreaths of waving light. Soft was his voice in Clon-ra*, in the valley of his fathers. Soft was his voice when he touched the harp, in the hall, near his roaring ftreams!

[†] The furly attitude of Foldath is a proper preamble to his after-behaviour. Chaffed with the disappointment of the victory which he promised himself, he becomes passionate and over-bearing. The quarrel which succeeds between him and Malthos, is introduced, to raise the character of Cathmor, whose superior worth shines forth, in his manly manner of ending the difference between the chiefs.

^{*} Claon-rath, winding field. The th are feldom pronounced audibly in the Galic language.

"KING of Erin," faid Hidalla, "now is the time to feast. Bid the voice of bards arise. Bid them roll the night away. The foul returns, from song, more terrible to war. Darkness settles on Erin. From hill to hill bend the skirted clouds. Far and grey, on the heath, the dreadful strides of ghe sis are seen: the ghosts of those who fell bend forward to their song. Bid, O Cathmor, the harps to rise, to brighten the dead, on their wandering blasts."

"BE all the dead forgot," faid Foldath's bursting wrath. "Did not I fail in the field? Shall I then hear the fong? Yet was not my course harmless in war. Blood was a stream around my steps. But the feeble were behind me. The foe has escaped from my sword. In Clonra's vale touch thou the harp. Let Dura answer to the voice of Hidalla. Let some maid look, from the wood, on thy long, yellow locks. Fly from Lubar's ecchoing plain. This is the field of heroes!"

"KING of Erin*," Malthos faid, "it is THINE to lead in war. Thou art a fire to our eyes, on the dark-brown field. Like a blast

This speech of Malthos is, throughout, a severe reprimand to the blustering behaviour of Foldath.

THOU hast past over hosts. Thou hast laid them low in blood. But who has heard THY words returning from the field? The wrathful delight in death: Their remembrance refts on the wounds of their spear. Strife is folded in THEIR thoughts: THEIR words are ever heard. Thy course, chief of Moma, was like a troubled ftream. The dead were rolled on thy path: but others also lift the spear. WE were not feeble behind thee; but the foe was firong."

CATHMOR beheld the rifing rage, and bending forward of either chief: for, half-untheathed, they held their fwords, and rolled their filent eyes. Now would they have mixed in horrid fray, had not the wrath of Cathmor burned. He drew his fword: it gleamed thro' night, to the high-flaming oak! "Sons of pride," faid the king, " allay your fwelling fouls. Retire in night. Why thould MY rage arife? Should I contend with both in arms? It is no time for ftrife! Retire, ye clouds, at my feaft. Awake my foul no more."

THEY funk from the king on either fide; like * two columns of morning mift, when the fun

^{*} This comparison is favourable to the superiority of Cathmor over his two chiefs. I shall illustrate this passage with another from a fragment of an ancient poem, just now in my hands. " As the fun is above the vapours, which his beams fun rises, between them, on his glittering rocks. Dark is their rolling on either side; each toward its reedy pool!

SILENT fat the chiefs at the feaft. They look, at times, on Atha's king, where he strode, on his rock, amid his fettling foul. The host lie, along the field. Sleep descends on Moi-lena. The voice of Fonar ascends alone, beneath his distant tree. It ascends in the praise of Cathmor, son of Larthon * of Lumon. But Cathmor did not hear his praise. He lay at the roar have raised; so is the soul of the king above the sons of sear. They roll dark below him; he rejoices in the robe of his beams. But when seeble deeds wander on the soul of the king, he is a darkened sun rolled along the sky: the valley is sad below: slowers wither beneath the drops of the night."

* Lear-thon, fea wave, the name of the chief of that colony of the Fir-bolg, which first migrated into Ireland. Larthon's first fettlement in that country is related in the seventh book. He was the ancestor of Cathmor: and is here called Larthon of Lumon, from a high hill of that name in Inis-huna, the ancient feat of the Fir-bolg. The character of Cathmor is preferved. He had mentioned, in the first book, the aversion of that chief to praise, and we find him here lying at the fide of a stream, that the noise of it might drown the voice of Fonar, who, according to the custom of the times, sung his eulogium in his evening fong. Though other chiefs, as well as Cathmor, might be averse to hear their own praise, we find it the univerfal policy of the times, to allow the bards to be as extravagant as they pleafed in their encomiums on the leaders of armies, in the presence of their people. The vulgar, who had no great ability to judge for themselves, received the characters of their princes, entirely upon the faith of their bards.

of a stream. The rustling breeze of night flew over his whistling locks.

His brother came to his dreams, half-feen from his low-hung cloud. Joy rose darkly in his face. He had heard the song of Carril †. A blast sustained his dark-skirted cloud; which he seized in the bosom of night, as he rose, with his same, towards his airy hall. Half-mixed with the noise of the stream, he poured his seeble words.

"Joy meet the foul of Cathmor. His voice was heard on Moi-lena. The bard gave his fong to Cairbar. He travels on the wind. My form is in my father's hall, like the gliding of a terrible light, which darts across the desart, in a stormy night. No bard shall be wanting at thy tomb, when thou art lowly laid. The sons of song love the valiant. Cathmor, thy name is a pleafant gale. The mournful founds arife! On Lubar's field there is a voice! Louder still, ye shadowy ghosts! The dead were full of fame! Shrilly swells the feeble found. The rougher blast alone is heard! Ah, soon is Cathmor low!" Rolled into himself he flew, wide on the bosom of winds. The old oak felt his departure, and shook its whistling head. Cathmor starts from rest. He takes his deathful spear. He lists his eyes around. He sees but dark-skirted night.

[†] Carril, the fon of Kinfena, by the orders of Ossian, sung the funeral elegy at the tomb of Cairbar. See the second book, towards the end. In all these poems, the visits of ghosts, to their living friends, are short, and their language obscure, both which circumstances tend to throw a solemn gloom on these supernatural scenes. Towards the latter end of the speech of the ghost of Cairbar, he foretels the death of Cathmor, by enumerating those signals which, according to the opinion of the times, preceded the death of a person renowned. It was thought that the ghosts of deceased bards sung, for three nights preceding the death (near the place where his tomb was to be raised) round an unsubstantial sigure which represented the body of the person who was to die.

"It * was the voice of the king," he faid.
"But now his form is gone. Unmarked is your path in the air, ye children of the night. Often like a reflected beam, are ye feen in the defart wild: but ye retire in your blafts, before our fleps approach. Go then, ye feeble race! Knowledge with you there is none! Your joys are weak, and like the dreams of our reft, or the light-winged thought, that flies across the foul. Shall Cathmor foon be low? Darkly laid in his narrow house? Where no morning comes, with her half-opened eyes? Away, thou shade!

^{*} The foliloquy of Cathmor fu'ts the magnanimity of his charaller. Though staggered at first with the prediction of Cairbar's ghost, he soon comforts himself with the agreeable prospect of his future renown; and, like Achilles, prefers a short and glorious life, to an obscure length of years in retirement and case.

to fight is mine! All further thought away! I rush forth, on eagle wings, to seize my beam of fame. In the lonely vale of streams, abides the narrow * foul. Years roll on, seasons return, but he is still unknown. In a blast comes cloudy death, and lays his grey head low. His ghost is folded in the vapour of the senny field. Its course is never on hills, nor mostly vales of wind. So shall not Cathmor depart. No boy in the field was he, who only marks the bed of

* An indolent and unwarlike life was held in extreme contempt. Whatever a philosopher may say, in praise of quiet and retirement, I am far from thinking, but they weaken and debase the human mind. When the faculties of the soul are not exerted, they lose their vigour, and low and circumscribed notions take the place of noble and enlarged ideas. Action, on the contrary, and the viciflitudes of fortune which attend it, call forth, by turns, all the powers of the mind. and, by exercifing, strengthen them. Hence it is, that in great and opulent states, when property and indolence are fecured to individuals, we feldom meet with that strength of mind, which is fo common in a nation, not far advanced in civilization. It is a curious, but just observation; that great kingdoms feldom produce great characters, which must be altogether attributed to that indolence and diffipation, which are the inseparable companions of too much property and security. Rome, it is certain, had more real great men within it, when its power was confined within the narrow bounds of Latium. than when its dominion extended over all the known world: and one petty state of the Saxon heptarchy had, perhaps, as much genuine spirit in it, as the two British kingdoms united. As a state, we are much more powerful than our ancestors, but we would lose by comparing individuals with them.

roes, upon the ecchoing hills. My iffuing forth was with kings. My joy in dreadful plains: where broken hofts are rolled away, like feas before the wind."

So fpoke the king of Alnecma, brightening in his rifing foul. Valour, like a pleafant flame, is gleaming within his breaft. Stately is his firide on the heath! The beam of eaft is poured around. He faw his grey hoft on the field, wide-fpreading their ridges in light. He rejoiced, like a fpirit of heaven, whose steps come forth on the seas, when he beholds them peaceful round, and all the winds are laid. But soon he awakes the waves, and rolls them large to some ecchoing shore.

On the rushy bank of a stream, slept the daughter of Inis-huna. The helmet had sallen from her head. Her dreams were in the lands of her fathers. There morning is on the field. Grey streams leap down from the rocks. The breezes, in shadowy waves, sly over the rushy fields. There is the found that prepares for the chace. There the moving of warriors from the hall. But tall above the rest is seen the hero of streamy Atha. He bends his eye of love on Sul-malla, from his stately steps. She turns, with pride, her face away, and careless bends the bow.

Such were the dreams of the maid, when Cathmor of Atha came. He faw her fair face before him, in the midft of her wandering locks. He knew the maid of Lumon. What should Cathmor do? His fighs arife. His tears come down. But straight he turns away. "This is no time, king of Atha, to awake thy fecret foul. The battle is rolled before thee, like a troubled stream."

HE struck that warning boss *, wherein dwelt the voice of war. Erin rose around him, like the sound of eagle-wing. Sul-malla started from sleep, in her disordered locks. She seized the helmet from earth. She trembled in her place. "Why should they know in Erin of the daughter of Inis-huna?" She remembered the race of kings. The pride of her soul arose! Her steps are behind a rock, by the blue-winding stream to a vale: where dwelt the dark-brown hind ere yet the war arose. Thither came the voice of Cathmor, at times, to Sul-malla's ear. Her

[•] In order to understand this passage, it is necessary to look to the description of Cathmor's shield in the seventh book. This shield had seven principal bosses, the sound of each of which, when struck with a spear, conveyed a particular order from the king to his tribes. The sound of one of them, as here, was the signal for the army to assemble.

[†] This was not the valley of Lona to which Sul-malla afterwards retired.

wind.

"The dreams of Inis-huna departed. They are dispersed from my soul. I hear not the chace in my land. I am concealed in the skirt of war. I look forth from my cloud. No beam appears to light my path. I behold my warrior low; for the broad-thielded king is near, he that overcomes in danger, Fingal from Selma of spears! Spirit of departed Conmor! are thy steps on the bosom of winds? Comest thou, at times, to other lands, father of sad Sul-malla? Thou dost come! I have heard thy voice at night; while yet I rose on the wave to Erin of the streams. The ghost of fathers, they say *, call away the souls

*Con-mor, the father of Sul-malla, was killed in that war, from which Cathmor delivered Inis-huna. Lormar his fon succeeded Conmor. It was the opinion of the times, when a person was reduced to a pitch of misery, which could admit of no alleviation, that the ghosts of his ancestors called bis soul aviay. This supernatural kind of death was called the voice of the dead; and is believed by the superstitious vulgar to this day.

There is no people in the world, perhaps, who give more univerfal credit to apparitions, and the vifits of the ghofts of the deceafed to their friends, than the ancient Scots. This is to be attributed as much, at leaft, to the fituation of the country they posses, as to that credulous disposition which distinguishes an unenlightened people. As their business was feeding of cattle, in dark and extensive defarts, so their journeys lay over wide and unfrequented heaths, where, often, they were obliged to sleep in the open air, amidst the whistling of fouls of their race, while they behold them lonely in the midst of woe. Call me, my father, away! When Cathmor is low on earth. Then shall Sul-malla be lonely in the midst of woe!"

of winds, and roar of water-falls. The gloominess of the scenes around them was apt to beget that melancholy disposition of mind, which most readily receives impressions of the extraordinary and supernatural kind. Falling asseep in this gloomy mood, and their dreams being disturbed by the noise of the elements around, it is no matter of wonder, that they thought they heard the woice of the dead. This voice of the dead, however, was, perhaps, no more than a shriller whistle of the winds in an old tree, or in the chinks of a neighbouring rock. It is to this cause I ascribe those many and improbable tales of ghosts, which we meet with in the Highlands of, in other respects, we do not find that the inhabitants are more credulous than their neighbours.

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK V.

ARGUMENT to Book V.

The poet, after a short address to the harp of Cona, describes the arrangement of both armies on either fide of the river Lubar. Fingal gives the command to Fillan; but, at the same time, orders Gaul, the fon of Morni, who had been wounded in the hand in the preceding battle, to affift him with his counsel. The army of the Fir-bolg is commanded by Foldath. The general onfet is described. The great actions of Fillan, He kills Rothmar and Culmin. But when Fillan conquers, in one wing, Foldath presses hard on the other. He wounds Dermid, the fon of Duthno, and puts the whole wing to flight. Dermid deliberates with himfelf, and, at last, resolves to put a slop to the progress of Foldath, by engaging him in fingle combat. When the two chiefs were approaching towards one another, Fillan came suddenly to the relief of Dermid; engaged Foldath, and killed him. The behaviour of Malthos towards the fallen Foldath. Fillan puts the whole army of the Fir-bolg to flight. The book closes with an address to Clatho, the mother of that hero.

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK V.

HOU dweller between the shields, that hang, on high, in Ossian's hall! Defeend from thy place, O harp, and let me hear thy voice! Son of Alpin, strike the string. Thou must awake the soul of the bard. The murmur of Lora's * stream has rolled the tale away. I stand in the cloud of years. Few are its openings toward the past; and when the vision comes, it is but dim and dark. I hear thee, harp of Selma! my soul returns, like a breeze, which the sun brings back to the vale, where dwelt the lazy mist!

LUBAR

^{*} Lora is often mentioned; it was a finall and rapid stream in the neighbourhood of Selma. There is no vessige of this name now remaining; though it appears from a very old song, which the translator has seen, that one of the small rivers on the north-west coast was called Lora some centuries ago.

LUBAR * is bright before me in the windings of its vale. On either fide, on their hills, rife the tall forms of the kings. Their people are poured around them, bending forward to their words: as if their fathers fpoke, defcending from the winds. But they themselves are like two rocks in the midst; each with its dark head of pines, when they are seen in the defart, above low-failing mist. High on their face are streams, which spread their soam on blasts of wind!

BENEATH the voice of Cathmor pours Erin, like the found of flame. Wide they come down to Lubar. Before them is the stride of Foldath. But Cathmor retires to his hill, beneath his bending oak. The tumbling of a fiream is near the king. He lifts, at times, his gleaming fpear. It is a flame to his people, in the midft of war. Near him ftands the daughter of Con-mor, leaning on a rock. She did not rejoice at the firife. Her foul delighted not in blood. A valley * fpreads green behind the hill, with its three blue fireams. The fun is there in filence. The dun mountain-roes come down. On these are turned the eyes of Sul-malla in her thoughtful mood.

^{*} From feveral passages in the poem we may form a distinct idea of the scene of the action of Temora. At a small distance from one another rose the hills of Mora and Lora; the first possessed by Fingal, the second by the army of Cathmor. Through the intermediate plain ran the small river Lubar, on the banks of which all the battles were fought, excepting that between Cairbar and Ofcar, related in the first book. This last mentioned engagement happened to the north of the hill of Mora, of which Fingal took possession, after the army of Cairbar fell back to that of Cathmor. At some distance, but within fight of Mora, towards the west, Lubar issued from the mountain of Crommal, and, after a short course through the plain of Moi lena, discharged itself into the sea near the field of battle. Behind the mountain of Crommal ran the small ftream of Lavath, on the banks of which Ferad-artho, the fon of Cairbre, the only person remaining of the race of Conar, lived concealed in a cave, during the usurpation of Cairbar, the fon of Borbar-duthul.

FINGAL beholds Cathmor, on high, the fon of Borbar-duthul! he beholds the deep-rolling of Erin, on the darkened plain. He strikes that warning boss, which bids the people to obey; when he sends his chiefs before them, to the field of renown. Wide rise their spears to the sun. Their ecchoing shields reply around. Fear, like a vapour, winds not among the host: for HE, THE KING, is near, the strength of streamy Selma. Gladness brightens the hero. We hear his words with joy.

"LIKE the coming forth of winds, is the found of Selma's fons! They are mountain waters, determined in their course. Hence is

[•] It was to this valley Sul-malla retired, during the last and decisive battle between Fingal and Cathmor. It is described in the seventh book, where it is called the vale of Lona, and the residence of a Druid.

Fingal renowned. Hence is his name in other lands. He was not a lonely beam in danger; for your steps were always near! But never was Fingal a dreadful form, in your presence, darkened into wrath. My voice was no thunder to your ears. Mine eyes fent forth no death. When the haughty appeared, I beheld them not. They were forgot at my feasts. Like mist they melted away. A young beam is before you! Few are his paths to war! They are few, but he is valiant. Defend my dark-haired fon. Bring Fillan back with joy. Hereafter he may stand alone. His form is like his fathers. His foul is a flame of their fire. Son of car-borne Morni, move behind the youth. Let thy voice reach his ear, from the skirts of war. Not unobserved rolls battle, before thee, breaker of the shields!"

THE king ftrode, at once, away to Cormul's lofty rock. Intermitting, darts the light, from his shield, as, slow the king of heroes moves. Sidelong rolls his eye o'er the heath, as forming advance the lines. Graceful, fly his halfgrey locks, round his kingly features, now lightened with dreadful joy. Wholly mighty is the chief! Behind him dark and slow I moved. Straight came forward the strength of Gaul. His shield hung loose on its thong. Hespoke, in haste, to Offian. "Bind *, fon of Fingal, this shield! Bind it high to the side of Gaul. The foe may behold it, and think I lift the spear. If I should fall, let my tomb be hid in the sield; for fall I must without same. Mine arm cannot lift the steel. Let not Evir-choma hear it, to blush between her locks. Fillan, the mighty behold us! Let us not forget the strife. Why should THEY come, from their hills, to aid our slying field?"

He strode onward, with the sound of his shield. My voice pursued him, as he went. "Can the son of Morni fall, without his same in Erin? But the deeds of the mighty are forgot by themselves. They rush careless over the fields of renown. Their words are never heard!" I rejoiced over the steps of the chief. I strode to the rock of the king, where he sat, in his wandering locks, amid the mountain-wind!

In two dark ridges bend the hofts, toward each other, at Lubar. Here Foldath rifes a pillar of darkness: there brightens the youth of Fillan. Each, with his spear in the stream, sent forth the voice of war. Gaul struck the shield of Selma. At once they plunge in battle! Steel pours its gleam on steel: like the fall of streams shone the field, when they mix their foam together, from two dark-browed rocks! Behold he comes the son of fame! He lays the people low! Deaths sit on blass around him! Warriors strew thy paths, O Fillan!

It is necessary to remember, that Gaul was wounded; which occasions his requiring here the assistance of Ossian to bind his shield on his side.

ROTHMAR*, the shield of warriors, stood between two chinky rocks. Two oaks, which winds had bent from high, spread their branches on either side. He rolls his darkening eyes on Fillan, and, silent, shades his friends. Fingal saw the approaching sight. The hero's soul arose. But as the stone of Loda † falls, shook, ^{*} Roth-mar, the found of the fea before a florm. Druman-ard, high-ridge. Cul-min, foft-haired. Cull-allin, beautiful locks. Strutha, freamy river.

⁺ By the stone of Loda is meant a place of worship among the Scandinavians. The Caledonians in their many expeditions to Orkney and Scandinavia, became acquainted with fome of the rites of the religion, which prevailed in those countries, and the ancient poetry frequently alludes to them. There are some ruins, and circular pales of stone, remaining still in Orkney, and the islands of Shetland, which retain, to this day, the name of Loda or Loden. They feem to have differed materially, in their construction, from those Druidical monuments which remain in Britain, and the western isles. The places of worship among the Scandinavians were originally rude and unadorned. In after ages, when they opened a communication with other nations, they adopted their manners, and built temples. That at Upfal, in Sweden, was amazingly rich and magnificent. Harquin, of Norway, built one, near Drontheim, little inferior to the former; and it went always under the name of Loden. Mallet, introduction a l'histoire de Dannemarc.

at once, from rocking Druman-ard, when fpirits heave the earth in their wrath; fo fell blue-thielded Rothmar.

NEAR are the steps of Culmin. The youth came, bursting into tears. Wrathful he cut the wind, ere yet he mixed his strokes with Fillan. He had first bent the bow with Rothmar, at the rock of his own blue streams. There they had marked the place of the roe, as the sun-beam slew over the fern. Why, son of Cul-allin! Why, Culmin, dost thou rush on that beam * of light? It is a fire that consumes. Son of Cul-allin retire. Your fathers were not equal, in the glittering strife of the field. The mother of Culmin remains in the hall, She looks forth on blue-rolling Strutha. A whirlwind rises, on the stream, dark-eddying round the ghost of her son. His dogs † are howling

^{*} The poet, metaphorically, calls Fillan a beam of light. Culmin, mentioned here, was the fon of Clonmar, chief of Strutha, by the heautiful Cul-allin. She was fo remarkable for the beauty of her person, that she is introduced, frequently, in the similies and allusions of ancient poetry. Mar Chul-aluin Strutha nan san; Lovely as Cul-alin of Strutha of the storms.

[†] Dogs were thought to be sensible of the death of their master, let it happen at ever so great a distance. It was also the opinion of the times, that the arms which warriors left at home became bloody, when they themselves sell in battle. It was from those signs that Cul-allin is supposed to understand that her son is killed; in which she is confirmed in their place. His shield is bloody in the hall.

"Art thou fallen, my fair-haired son, in Erin's dismal war?"

As a roe, pierced in fecret, lies panting, by her wonted streams; the hunter surveys her feet of wind: He remembers her stately bounding before. So lay the son of Cul-allin, beneath the eye of Fillan. His hair is rolled in a little stream. His blood wanders on his shield. Still his hand holds the sword, that failed him in the midst of danger. "Thou art fallen," faid Fillan, "ere yet thy same was heard. Thy sather sent thee to war. He expects to hear of thy deeds. He is grey, perhaps, at his streams. His eyes are toward Moi-lena. But thou shalt not return, with the spoil of the fallen soe!"

FILLAN pours the flight of Erin before him, over the refounding heath. But, man on man, fell Morven before the dark-red rage of Foldath: for, far on the field, he poured the roar of half his tribes. Dermid flands before him in wrath. The fons of Selma gathered around.

by the appearance of his ghost. Her sudden and short exclamation is more judicious in the poet, than if she had extended her complaints to a greater length. The attitude of the fallen youth, and Fillan's reflexions over him, come forcibly back on the mind, when we consider, that the supposed situation of the father of Culmin, was so similar to that of Fingal, after the death of Fillan himself.

BOOK V. AN EPIC POEM. 1

107

But his shield is cleft by Foldath. His people fly over the heath.

THEN faid the foe, in his pride, "They have fled. My fame begins! Go, Malthos, go bid Cathmor guard the dark-rolling of ocean; that Fingal may not escape from my sword. HE must lie on earth. Beside some fen shall his tomb be seen. It shall rise without a song. His ghost shall hover, in mist, over the reedy pool."

MALTHOS heard, with darkening doubt. He rolled his filent eyes. He knew the pride of Foldath. He looked up to Fingal on his hills: then darkly turning, in doubtful mood, he plunged his fword in war.

In Clono's * narrow vale, where bend two trees above the stream, dark, in his grief, stood Duthno's

[•] This valley had its name from Clono, fon of Lethmal of Lora, one of the ancestors of Dermid, the son of Duthno. His history is thus related in an old poem. In the days of Conar, the son of Trenmor, the first king of Ireland, Clono passed over into that kingdom, from Caledonia, to aid Conar against the Fir-bolg. Being remarkable for the beauty of his person, he soon drew the attention of Sulmin, the young wife of an Irish chief. She disclosed her passion, which was not properly returned by the Caledonian. The lady sickened, thro' disappointment, and her love for Clono came to the ears of her husband. Fired with jealousy, he vowed revenge. Clono, to avoid his rage, departed from Temora, in order to pass over Duthno's filent fon. The blood pours from the fide of Dermid. His shield is broken near. His spear leans against a stone. Why, Dermid, why so fad? "I hear the roar of battle. My into Scotland; and, being benighted in the valley mentioned here, he laid him down to sleep. There Lethmal descended in the dreams of Clono, and told him that danger was near.

Ghost of LETHMAL.

"Arise from thy bed of moss; son of low-laid Lethmal, arise. The sound of the coming of soes, descends along the wind.

CLONO.

Whose voice is that, like many streams, in the season of my rest?

Ghoft of LETHMAL.

Arife, thou dweller of the fouls of the lovely; fon of Lethmal, arife,

CLONO.

How dreary is the night! The moon is darkened in the sky; red are the paths of ghosts, along its sullen face! Greenskirted meteors set around. Dull is the roaring of streams, from the valley of dim forms. I hear thee, spirit of my father, on the eddying course of the wind. I hear thee; but thou bendest not, forward, thy tall form, from the skirts of night."

As Clono prepared to depart, the husband of Sulmin came up, with his numerous attendants. Clono defended himself, but, after a gallant resistance, he was overpowered and sain. He was buried in the place where he was killed, and the valley was called after his name. Dermid, in his request to Gaul the son of Morni, which immediately follows this paragraph, alludes to the tomb of Clono, and his own connection with that unfortunate chief.

people

people are alone. My fleps are flow on the heath; and no shield is mine. Shall he then prevail? It is then after Dermid is flow! I will call thee forth, O Foldath, and meet thee yet in fight."

He took his fpear, with dreadful joy. The fon of Morni came. "Stay, fon of Duthno, flay thy fpeed. Thy fleps are marked with blood. No boffy fhield is thine. Why fhouldst thou fall unarmed?" "Son of Morni! give thou thy fhield. It has often rolled back the war. I thall flop the chief, in his course. Son of Morni! behold that flone! It lifts its grey head thro' grass. There dwells a chief of the race of Dermid. Place me there in night."

He flowly rose against the hill. He saw the troubled field: The gleaming ridges of battle, disjoined and broken round. As distant fires, on heath by night, now feem as lost in smoak; now rearing their red streams on the hill, as blow or cease the winds: so met the intermitting war the eye of broad-shielded Dermid. Thro' the host are the strides of Foldath, like some dark ship on wintry waves, when she issues from between two isses, to sport on resounding ocean!

Dermid, with rage, beholds his course. He strives to rush along. But he fails amid his steps; and the big tear comes down. He founds his father's horn. He thrice strikes his bossy shield. He calls thrice the name of Foldath. from his roaring tribes. Foldath, with joy, beholds the chief. He lifts aloft his bloody fpear. As a rock is marked with ffreams, that fell troubled down its fide in a storm; fo. streaked with wandering blood, is the dark chief of Moma! The hoft, on either fide, withdraw from the contending of kings. They raife, at once, their gleaming points. Rushing comes Fillan of Selma. Three paces back Foldath withdraws, dazzled with that beam of light, which came, as iffuing from a cloud, to fave the wounded chief. Growing in his pride he flands. He calls forth all his fleel.

As meet two broad-winged eagles, in their founding firife, in winds: fo rush the two chiefs, on Moi-lena, into gloomy fight. By turns are the steps of the kings * forward on their rocks above; for now the dusky war feems to descend on their swords. Cathmor feels the joy of warriors, on his mostly hill: their joy in secret, when dangers rise to match their souls. His eye is not turned on Lubar, but on Selma's dreadful king. He beholds him, on Mora, rising in his arms.

^{*} Fingal and Cathmor.

FOLDATH * falls on his shield. The spear of Fillan pierced the king. Nor looks the youth on the fallen, but onward rolls the war. The hundred voices of death arise. "Stay, son of Fingal, stay thy speed. Beholdest thou not that gleaming form, a dreadful sign of death?

* The fall of Foldath, if we may believe tradition, was predicted to him, before he had left his own country to join Cairbar, in his defigus on the Irith throne. He went to the cave of Moma, to enquire of the fpirits of his fathers, concerning the fuccess of the enterprise of Cairbar. The responses of oracles are always attended with obscurity, and liable to a double meaning: Foldath, therefore, put a favourable interpretation on the prediction, and pursued his adopted plan of aggrandizing himself with the family of Atha.

FOLDATH, addressing the spirits of his fathers.

Dark, I fland in your presence; fathers of Foldath, hear. Shall my sleps pass over Atha, to Ullin of the roes?

The Answer.

Thy steps shall pass over Atha, to the green dwelling of kings. There shall thy stature arise, over the sallen, like a pillar of thunder-clouds. There, terrible in darkness, shalt thou stand, till the research beam, or Clon-cath of Moruth, come; Moruth of many streams, that roars in distant lands."

Cloncath, or reflected beam, fay my traditional authors, was the name of the fword of Fillan; fo that it was, in the latent fignification of the word Cloncath, that the deception lay. My principal reason for introducing this note, is, that this tradition serves to shew, that the religion of the Fir-bolg differed from that of the Caledonians, as we never find the latter enquiring of the spirits of their deceased ancestors.

Awaken not the king of Erin. Return, fon of blue-eyed Clatho."

Malthos* beholds Foldath low. He darkly stands above the chief. Hatred is rolled from his foul. He seems a rock in a defart, on whose dark side are the trickling of waters; when the slow-failing mist has left it, and all its trees are blasted with winds. He spoke to the dying hero, about the narrow house. "Whether shall thy grey stone rise in Ullin, or in Moma's † woody land? where the sun looks, in secret, on the blue streams of Dalrutho ‡?

There

^{*} The characters of Foldath and Malthos are fustained. They were both dark and furly, but each in a different way. Foldath was impetuous and cruel. Malthos stubborn and incredulous. Their attachment to the family of Atha was equal; their bravery in battle the same. Foldath was vain and oftentatious: Malthos unindulgent but generous. His behaviour here, towards his enemy Foldath, shews, that a good heart often lies concealed under a gloomy and fullen character.

[†] Moma was the name of a country in the fouth of Connaught, once famous for being the residence of an Arch-Druid. The cave of Moma was thought to be inhabited by the spirits of the chiefs of the Fir-bolg, and their posterity sent to enquire there, as to an oracle, concerning the issue of their wars.

[†] Dal ruäth, parched or fandy field. The etymology of Dardulena is uncertain. The daughter of Foldath was, probably, fo called, from a place in Ulfler, where her father had defeated part of the adherents of Artho, king of Ireland. Dor-dulena;

There are the fleps of thy daughter, blue-eyed Dardu-lena!"

"REMEMBEREST thou her," faid Foldath, "because no son is mine: no youth to roll the battle before him, in revenge of me? Malthos, I am revenged. I was not peaceful in the field. Raise the tombs of those I have slain, around my narrow house. Often shall I forsake the blast, to rejoice above their graves; when I behold them spread around, with their long-whistling grass."

His foul rushed to the vale of Moma, to Dardu-lena's dreams, where she slept, by Dalrutho's stream, returning from the chace of the hinds. Her bow is near the maid, unstrung. The breezes fold her long hair on her breasts. Cloathed in the beauty of youth, the love of heroes lay. Dark-bending, from the skirts of the wood, her wounded father seemed to come. He appeared, at times, then hid himself in mist. Bursting into tears she rose. She knew that the chief was low. To her came a beam from his soul, when solded in its storms.

lena; the dark awood of Moi-lena. As Foldath was proud and offentatious, it would appear, that he transferred the name of a place, where he himself had been victorious, to his slaughter.

Vol. II.

Thou wert the last of his race, O blue-eyed Dardu-lena !

WIDE-SPREADING over ecchoing Lubar, the flight of Bolga is rolled along. Fillan hangs forward on their steps. He strews, with dead, the heath. Fingal rejoices over his fon. Blue-shielded Cathmor rose *.

Son of Alpin, bring the harp. Give Fillan's praise to the wind. Raise high his praise, in mine ear, while yet he shines in war.

" LEAVE, blue-eyed Clatho, leave thy hall! Behold that early beam of thine! The hoft is withered in its courfe. No further look, it is dark. Light-trembling from the harp, strike, virgins, strike the found. No hunter he defcends, from the dewy haunt of the bounding roe. He bends not his bow on the wind; nor fends his grey arrow abroad.

* " The fuspence, in which the mind of the reader is left here, conveys the idea of Fillan's danger more forcibly home, than any description that could be introduced. There is a fort of eloquence, in filence with propriety. A minute detail of the circumstances of an important scene is generally cold and infipid. The human mind, free and fond of think. ing for itself, is disgusted to find every thing done by the poet. It is, therefore, his business only to mark the most striking out-lines, and to allow the imaginations of his readers to finish the figure for themselves."

The book ends in the afternoon of the third day, from the mening of the poem.

DEEP-FOLDED in red war! See battle roll against his side. Striding amid the ridgy strife, he pours the deaths of thousands forth. Fillan is like a spirit of heaven, that descends from the skirt of winds. The troubled ocean feels his steps, as he strides from wave to wave. His path kindles behind him. Islands shake their heads on the heaving seas! Leave, blue-eyed Clatho, leave thy hall!

TEMORA:

A N

EPIC POEM.

BOOK VI.

ARGUMENT to Book VI.

This book opens with a speech of Fingal, who sees Cathmor descending to the assistance of his slying army. The king dispatches Oslian to the relief of Fillan. He himself retires behind the rock of Cormul, to avoid the fight of the engagement between his fon and Cathmor. Offian advances. The descent of Cathmor described. He rallies the army, renews the battle, and, before Offian could arrive, engages Fillan himself. Upon the approach of Ossian, the combat hetween the two heroes ceases. Offian and Cathmor prepare to fight, but night coming on prevents them. Offian returns to the place where Cathmor and Fillan fought. He finds Fillan mortally wounded, and leaning against a rock. Their discourse. Fillan dies: his body is laid, by Offian. in a neighbouring cave. The Caledonian army return to Fingal. He questions them about his fon, and, underflanding that he was killed, retires, in filence, to the rock of Cormul. Upon the retreat of the army of Fingal, the Fir-bolg advance. Cathmor finds Bran, one of the dogs of Fingal, lying on the shield of Fillan, before the entrance of the cave, where the body of that hero lay. His reflections thereupon. He returns, in a melancholy mood, to his army. Malthos endeavours to comfort him, by the example of his father Borbar-duthal. Cathmor retires to rest. The fong of Sul-malla concludes the book, which ends about the middle of the third night, from the opening of the poem.

TEMORA:

A N

EPICPOEM.

BOOK VI.

Fingal take the fword of Luno? But what should become of thy fame, son of white-bosomed Clatho? Turn not thine eyes from Fingal, fair daughter of Inistore. I shall not quench thy early beam. It shines along my soul. Rise, wood-skirted Mora, rise between the war and me! Why should Fingal behold the strife, lest his dark-haired warrior should fall! Amidst the song, O Carril, pour the sound of the trembling harp! Here are the voices of rocks! and there the bright tumbling of waters. Father of Oscar list the spear! Desend the young in arms. Conceal thy steps from Fillan. He must not know that I doubt his steel. No cloud of mine shall rife, my son, upon thy soul of fire!"

[·] Fingal speaks.

HE funk behind his rock, amid the found of Carril's fong. Brightening, in my growing foul, I took the fpear of Temora*. I faw, along Moi-lena, the wild tumbling of battle; the ftrife of death, in gleaming rows, disjoined and broken round. Fillan is a beam of fire. From wing to wing is his wasteful course. The ridges of war melt before him. They are rolled, in smoak, from the fields!

Now is the coming forth of Cathmor, in the armour of kings! Dark-waves the eagle's wing, above his helmet of fire. Unconcerned are his fleps, as if they were to the chace of Erin. He raifes, at times, his terrible voice. Erin, abathed, gathers round. Their fouls return back, like a flream. They wonder at the fleps of their fear. He rofe, like the beam of the morning, on a haunted heath: the traveller looks back, with bending eye, on the field of dreadful forms! Sudden, from the rock of Moilena, are Sul malla's trembling fleps. An oak takes the fpear from her hand. Half-bent she looses the lance. But then are her eyes on the king, from amid her wandering locks! No friendly strife is before thee! No light contending of bows, as when the youth of Inis-huna *come forth beneath the eye of Conmor!

^{*} The Spear of Temora was that which Oscar had received, in a present, from Cormac, the son of Artho, king of Ireland. It was of it that Cairbar made the pretext for quarrelling with Oscar, at the seast, in the first book.

As the rock of Runo, which takes the passing clouds as they sly, seems growing, in gathered darkness, over the streamy heath; so seems the chief of Atha taller, as gather his people around. As different blass sly over the sea, each behind its dark-blue wave, so Cathmor's words, on every side, pour his warriors forth. Nor silent on his hill is Fillan. He mixes his words with his ecchoing shield. An eagle he seemed, with sounding wings, calling the wind to his rock, when he sees the coming forth of the roes, on Lutha's † rushy field!

^{*} Clu-ba, winding bay; an arm of the fea in Inis-huna, or the western coast of South-Britain. It was in this bay that Cathmor was wind-bound when Sul-malla came, in the disguise of a young warrior, to accompany him in his voyage to Ireland. Commor, the father of Sul-malla, as is infinuated at the close of the fourth book, was dead before the departure of his daughter.

[†] Lutha was the name of a valley in Morven. There dwelt Toscar the son of Conloch, the father of Malvina, who, upon that account, is often called the maid of Lutha. Lutha signifies fwift stream.

Now they bend forward in battle. Death's hundred voices arife. The kings, on either fide, were like fires on the fouls of the hofts. Offian bounded along. High rocks and trees rush tall between the war and me. But I hear the noise of steel, between my clanging arms. Rising, gleaming, on the hill, I behold the backward steps of hosts: their backward steps, on either side, and wildly-looking eyes. The chiefs were met in dreadful sight! The two blue-shielded kings! Tall and dark, through gleams of steel, are seen the striving heroes! I rush. My fears for Fillan sly, burning across my foul.

I COME. Nor Cathmor flies; nor yet comes on; he fidelong stalks along. An icy rock, cold, tall he feems. I call forth all my steel. Silent awhile we stride, on either side of a rushing stream: then, sudden turning, all at once, we raise our pointed spears! We raise our spears, but night comes down. It is dark and silent round; but where the distant steps of hosts are founding over the heath!

I COME to the place where Fillan fought. Nor voice, nor found is there. A broken helmet lies on earth, a buckler cleft in twain. Where, Fillan, where art thou, young chief of ecchoing Morven? He hears me leaning on a rock, which bends its grey head over the stream. He hears; but sullen, dark he stands. At length I saw the hero!

which

"Why standest thou, robed in darkness, son of woody Selma? Bright is thy path, my brother, in this dark-brown field! Long has been thy strife in battle! Now the horn of Fingal is heard. Ascend to the cloud of thy father, to his hill of feasts. In the evening mist he sits, and hears the sound of Carril's harp. Carry joy to the aged, young breakers of the shields!"

"CAN the vanquished carry joy? Offian, no shield is mine! It lies broken on the field. The eagle-wing of my helmet is torn. It is when foes fly before them, that fathers delight in their fons. But their fighs burst forth, in secret, when their young warriors yield. No: Fillan shall not behold the king! Why should the hero mourn?"

"Son of blue-eyed Clatho! O Fillan, awake not my foul! Wert thou not a burning fire before him? Shall he not rejoice? Such fame belongs not to Offian; yet is the king still a fun to me. He looks on my steps, with joy. Shadows never rise on his face. Ascend, O Fillan, to Mora! His feast is spread in the folds of mist."

"OSSIAN! give me that broken thield: thefe feathers that are rolled in the wind. Place them near to Fillan, that lefs of his fame may fall. Offian, I begin to fail. Lay me in that hollow rock. Raife no stone above, lest one should ask about my fame. I am fallen in the first of my fields; fallen without renown. Let thy voice ALONE send joy to my slying soul. Why should the bard know where dwells the lost beam of Clatho *!"

er Is

* A dialogue between Clatho the mother and Bosmina, the fister of Fillan.

CLATHO.

"Daughter of Fingal, arife: thou light between thy locks. Lift thy fair head from reft, foft-gliding fun-beam of Selma! I beheld thy arms, on thy breaft, white-toffed amidft thy wandering locks: when the ruffling breeze of the morning came from the defart of fireams. Haft thou feen thy fathers, Bos-mina, descending in thy dreams? Arife, daughter of Clatho; dwells there aught of grief in thy soul?

Bos-MINA.

A thin form passed before me, sading as it slew: like the darkening wave of a breeze, along a sield of grass. Descend, from thy wall, O harp, and call back the soul of Bos-mina, it has rolled away, like a stream. I hear thy pleasant sound. I hear thee, O harp, and my voice shall rife.

How often shall ye rush to war, ye dwellers of my soul? Your paths are distant, kings of men, in Erin of blue streams. Lift thy wing, thou southern breeze, from Clono's darkening heath: spread the sails of Fingal towards the bays of his land.

But who is that, in his strength, darkening in the presence of war? His arm stretches to the foe, like the beam of the sickly sun; when his side is crusted with darkness; and he rolls his dismal course through the sky. Who is it, but the father of Eos mina? Shall he return till danger is past!

Fillan,

"Is thy fpirit on the eddying winds, O Fillan, young breaker of thield! Joy purfue my hero, through his folded clouds. The forms of thy fathers, O Fillan, bend to receive their fon. I behold the fpreading of their fire on Mora: the blue-rolling of their mifty wreaths. Joy meet thee my brother! But we are dark and fad! I behold the foe round the aged. I behold the wasting away of his fame. Thou art left alone in the field, O grey-haired king of Selma!"

I LAID him in the hollow rock, at the roar of the nightly fiream. One red flar looked in on the hero. Winds lift, at times, his locks. I liften. No found is heard. The warrior flept! As lightening on a cloud, a thought came rushing along my foul. My eyes roll in fire: my Fillan, thou art a beam by his fide; beautiful, but terrible, is thy light. Thy fword is before thee, a blue fire of night. When shalt thou return to thy roes; to the streams of thy rushy fields? When shall I behold thee from Mora, while winds strew my long locks on their blasts! But shall a young eagle return from the field where the heroes fall!

CLATHO.

Soft, as the fong of Loda, is the voice of Selma's maid. Pleafant to the ear of Clatho is the name of the breaker of shields. Behold, the king comes from ocean: the shield of Morven is borne by bards. The soe has sled before him, like the departure of mist. I hear not the sounding wings of my eagle; the rushing forth of the son of Clatho. Thou art dark, O Fingal; shall the warrior never return? * * * *

firide was in the clang of ficel. "I will find thee, king of Erin! in the gathering of thy thousands find thee. Why should that cloud escape, that quenched our early beam? Kindle your meteors on your hills, my fathers. Light my daring steps. I will consume in wrath *. But should not I return! The king is without a son, grey-haired among his foes! His arm is not as in the days of old. His same grows dim in Erin. Let me not behold him, laid low in his latter field. But can I return to the king? Will he not ask about his son? "Thou oughtest to defend young Fillan." Offian will meet the foe! Green Erin, thy sounding tread is pleasant.

^{*} Here the sentence is designedly left unfinished. The sense is, that he was refolved, like a destroying fire, to consume Cathmor, who had killed his brother. In the midst of this resolution, the situation of Fingal suggests itself to him, in a very strong light. He resolves to return to assist the king in profecuting the war. But then his shame for not defending his brother, recurs to him. He is determined again to go and find out Cathmor. We may confider him, as in the act of advancing towards the enemy, when the horn of Fingal founded on Mora, and called back his people to his presence. This foliloguy is natural: the refolutions which fo fuddenly follow one another, are expressive of a mind extremely agitated with forrow and conscious shame; yet the behaviour of Offian, in his execution of the commands of Fingal, is fo irreprehensible, that it is not easy to determine where he failed in his duty. The truth is, that when men fail in defigns which they ardently wish to accomplish, they naturally blame themselves, as the chief cause of their disappointment.

to my ear. I rush on thy ridgy host, to shun the eyes of Fingal. I hear the voice of the king, on Mora's misty top! He calls his two sons! I come, my father, in my grief. I come like an eagle, which the slame of night met in the defart, and spoiled of half his wings!"

DISTANT*, round the king, on Mora, the broken ridges of Morven are rolled. They turned their eyes: each darkly bends, on his own athen fpear. Silent flood the king in the midft. Thought on thought rolled over his foul. As waves on a fecret mountain-lake, each with its back of foam. He looked; no fon appeared, with his long-beaming fpear. The fighs rofe, crowding, from his foul; but he concealed his grief. At length I flood beneath an oak. No voice of mine was heard. What could I fay to Fingal in his hour of woe? His words rose, at length, in the midst: the people shrunk backward as he spoke *.

^{* &}quot;This fcene, fays an ingenious writer, and a good judge, is folemn. The poet always places his chief character amidit objects which favour the sublime. The face of the country, the night, the broken remains of a descated army, and, above all, the attitude and silence of Fingal himself, are circumstances calculated to impress an awful idea on the mind. Offian is most successful in his night-descriptions. Dark images suited the melancholy temper of his mind. His poems were all composed after the active part of his life was over, when he was blind, and had survived all the companions of his youth: we therefore find a veil of melancholy thrown over the whole."

WHERE

* I owe the first paragraph of the following note to the same

The abashed behaviour of the army of Fingal proceeds rather from shame than sear. The king was not of a tyrannical disposition: He, as he professes himself in the fifth book, never was a dreadful form, in their presence, darkened into wrath. His woice was no thunder to their ears: bis eye sent forth no death. The first ages of society are not the times of arbitrary power. As the wants of mankind are sew, they retain their independence. It is an advanced state of civilization that moulds the mind to that submission to government, of which ambitious magistrates take advantage, and raise themselves into absolute power.

It is a vulgar error, that the common Highlander's lived, in abject flavery, under their chiefs. Their high ideas of, and attachment to, the heads of their families, probably, led the unintelligent into this miftake. When the honour of the tribe was concerned, the commands of the chief were obeyed, without reflriction: but, if individuals were oppreffed, they threw themselves into the arms of a neighbouring clan, assumed a new name, and were encouraged and protected. The fear of this defertion, no doubt, made the chiefs cautious in their government. As their consequence, in the eyes of others, was in proportion to the number of their people, they took care to avoid every thing that tended to diminish it.

It was but very lately that the authority of the laws extended to the Highlands. Before that time the clans were governed, in civil affairs, not by the verbal commands of the chief, but by what they called Clechda, or the traditional precedents of their ancestors. When differences happened between individuals, some of the oldest men in the tribe were chosen umpires between the parties, to decide according to the Clechda. The chief interposed his authority, and, invariably, enforced the decision. In their wars, which were frequent,

"WHERE is the fon of Selma, he who led in war? I behold not his steps, among my people, returning from the field. Fell the young bounding roe, who was so stately on my hills? He fell; for ye are silent. The shield of war is cleft in twain. Let his armour be near to Fingal; and the sword of dark-brown Luno. I am waked on my hills; with morning I descend to war."

HIGH * on Cormul's rock, an oak is flaming to the wind. The grey skirts of mist are rolled around; thither strode the king in his wrath.

Distant

on account of family-feuds, the chief was less reserved in the execution of his authority; and even then he seldom extended it to the taking the life of any of his tribe. No crime was capital, except murder; and that was very unfrequent in the Highlands. No corporal punishment, of any kind, was inflicted. The memory of an affront of this fort would remain, for ages, in a family, and they would scize every opportunity to be revenged, unless it came immediately from the hands of the chief himself; in that case it was taken, rather as a fatherly correction, than a legal punishment for offences.

* This rock of Cormul is often mentioned in the preceding part of the poem. It was on it Fingal and Offian flood to view the battle. The cuftom of retiring from the army, on the night prior to their engaging in battle, was univerfal among the kings of the Caledonians. Trenmor, the most renowned of the ancestors of Fingal, is mentioned as the first who instituted this custom. Succeeding bards attributed it to a hero of a latter period. In an old poem, which begins with Mac-Arcath na ceud frôl, this custom of retiring from the army, before an engagement, is numbered, among the wise institutions of Fergus, the son of Arc or Arcath, the first king of Scots. I

Distant from the host he always lay, when battle burnt within his foul. On two spears hung his shield on high; the gleaming sign of death; that shield, which he was wont to strike, by night, before he rushed to war. It was then his warriors knew, when the king was to lead in strife; for never was this buckler heard, till the wrath of Fingal arose. Unequal were his steps on high, as he shone in the beam of the oak; he was dreadful as the form of the spirit of night, when he cloaths, on hills, his wild gestures with mist, and, issuing forth, on the troubled ocean, mounts the car of winds.

Nor fettled, from the storm, is Erin's sea of war! they glitter, beneath the moon, and, low-humming, still roll on the field. Alone are the steps of Cathmor, before them on the heath; he hangs forward, with all his arms, on Morven's slying host. Now had he come to the mostly cave, where Fillan lay in night. One tree was bent above the stream, which glittered over the rock. There shone to the moon the broken shall here translate the passage; in some other note 1 may probably, give all that remains of the poem. Fergus of the hundred fireams, son of Areath who fought of old: theu didf first vetire at night: when the foe rolled before the, in ecchoing fields. Nor bending in rest is the king: he gathers battles in his soul. Fly, son of the stranger; with morn be shall rush abroad. When, or by whom, this poem was written, is uncertain.

shield of Clatho's fon; and near it, on grass, lay hairy-footed Bran *. He had missed the chief on Mora, and searched him along the wind. He thought that the blue-eyed hunter slept; he lay upon his shield. No blass came over the heath, unknown to bounding Bran.

CATHMOR faw the white-breafted dog; he faw the broken thield. Darkness is blown back on his foul; he remembers the falling away of the people. They come, a stream; are rolled away; another race succeeds. "But some mark the fields, as they pass, with their own mighty

* I remember to have met with an old poem, wherein a flory of this fort is very happily introduced. In one of the invasions of the Danes, Ullin-clundu, a confiderable chief, on the western coast of Scotland, was killed in a rencounter with a slying party of the enemy, who had landed, at no great distance, from the place of his residence. The few followers who attended him were also slain. The young wife of Ullin-clundu, who had not heard of his fall, fearing the worst, on account of his long delay, alarmed the rest of his tribe, who went in search of him along the shore. They did not find him; and the beautiful widow became disconsolate. At length he was discovered, by means of his dog, who fat on a rock beside the body, for some days. The shaze concerning the dog, whose name was Du-chos, or Blackfoot, is descriptive.

"Dark-fided Du-chos! feet of wind! cold is thy feat on rocks. He (the dog) fees the roe: his ears are high; and half he bounds away. He looks around; but Ullin fleeps; he droops again his head. The winds come paft; dark Du-chos thinks, that Ullin's voice is there. But fill he beholds him filent, laid amidft the waving heath. Dark-filed Du-chos, his voice no more shall fend thee over the heath!"

names. The heath, through dark-brown years, is theirs; fome blue ftream winds to their fame. Of these be the chief of Atha, when he lays him down on earth. Often may the voice of future times meet Cathmor in the air: when he strides from wind to wind, or folds himself in the wing of a frorm."

GREEN Erin gathered round the king, to hear the voice of his power. Their joyful faces bend, unequal, forward, in the light of the oak. They who were terrible were removed: Lubar * winds again in their hoft. Cathmor was that beam from heaven which shone when his people were dark. He was honoured in the midst. Their souls rose with ardour around. The king alone no gladness shewed; no stranger he to war!

"Why is the king so sad," faid Malthos eagleeyed? "Remains there a soe at Lubar? Lives

* In order to illustrate this passage, it is proper to lay before the reader the scene of the two preceding battles. Between the hills of Mora and Lona lay the plain of Moi-lena, through which ran the river Lubar. The first battle, wherein Gaul, the son of Morni, commanded on the Caledonian side, was fought on the banks of Lubar. As there was little advantage obtained, on either side, the armies, after the battle, retained their former positions.

In the second battle, wherein Fillan commanded, the Irishrafter the fall of Foldath, were driven up the hill of Lona; but, upon the coming of Cathmor to their aid, they regained their former situation, and drove back the Caledonians, in their turn: so that Lubar winded again in their bost.

there among them, who can lift the fpear? Not fo peaceful was thy father, Borbar-duthul , king of fpears. His rage was a fire that always burned: his joy over fallen foes was great. Three days feafted the grey-haired hero, when he heard that Calmar fell: Calmar, who aided the race of Ullin, from Lara of the ftreams. Often did he feel, with his hands, the fteel which, they faid, had pierced his foe. He felt it, with his hands, for Borbar-duthul's eyes had failed. Yet was the king a fun to his friends; a gale to lift their branches round. Joy was around him in his halls: he loved the fons of ^{} Borbar-duthul, the father of Cathmor, was the brother of that Colc-ulla, who is faid, in the beginning of the fourth book, to have rebelled against Cormac king of Ireland. Borbar-duthul feems to have retained all the prejudice of his family against the succession of the posterity of Conar, on the Irish throne. From this short episode we learn some facts which tend to throw light on the history of the times. It appears, that, when Swaran invaded Ireland, he was only opposed by the Cael, who possessed Ulster, and the north of that island. Calmar, the son of Matha, whose gallant behaviour and death are related in the third book of Fingal, was the only chief of the race of the Fir-bolg, that joined the Cael, or Irish Caledonians, during the invasion of Swaran. The indecent joy, which Borbar-duthul expressed, upon the death of Calmar, is well fuited with that spirit of revenge, which subfifted, univerfally, in every country where the feudal fystem was established. It would appear that some person had carried to Borbar-duthul that weapon, with which, it was pretended, Calmar had been killed.

Bolga. His name remains in Atha, like the awful memory of ghosts, whose presence was terrible, but they blew the storm away. Now let the voices * of Erin raise the foul of the king; he that shone when war was dark, and laid the mighty low. Fonar, from that grey browed rock, pour the tale of other times: pour it on wide-skirted Erin. as it settles round."

"To me," faid Cathmor, "no fong shall rise; nor Fonar sit on the rock of Lubar. The mighty there are laid low. Disturb not their rushing ghosts. Far, Malthos, far remove the found of Erin's song. I rejoice not over the foe, when he ceases to lift the spear. With morning we pour our strength abroad. Fingal is wakened on his ecchoing hill."

Like waves, blown back by fudden winds, Erin retired, at the voice of the king. Deeprolled into the field of night, they fpread their humming tribes. Beneath his own tree, at intervals, each † bard fat down with his harp.

They

^{*} The voices of Erin, a poetical expression for the bards of Ireland.

[†] Not only the kings, but every petty chief, had anciently their bards attending them. in the field; and those bards, in proportion to the power of the chiefs, who retained them, had a number of inferior bards in their train. Upon solemn occafions, all the bards, in the army, would join in one chorus; either when they celebrated their victories, or lamented the

They raifed the fong, and touched the ftring: each to the chief he loved. Before a burning oak Sul-malla touched, at times, the harp. She touched the harp, and heard, between, the breezes in her hair. In darknefs near, lay the king of Atha, beneath an aged tree. The beam of the oak was turned from him; he faw the maid, but was not feen. His foul poured forth, death of a person, worthy and renowned, slain in the war. The words were of the composition of the arch-bard, retained by the king himfelf, who generally attained to that high office on account of his superior genius for poetry. As the persons of the bards were facred, and the emoluments of their office confiderable, the order, in fucceeding times, became very numerous and infolent. It would appear, that, after the introduction of Christianity, some served in the double capacity of bards and clergymen. It was, from this circumstance, that they had the name of Chlere, which is, probably, derived from the Latin Clericus. The Chlère, be their name derived from what it will, became, at last, a public nuisance; for, taking advantage of their facred character, they went about, in great bodies, and lived, at discretion, in the houses of the chiefs; till another party, of the fame order, drove them away by mere dint of fatire. Some of the indelicate disputes of these worthy poetical combatants are handed down, by tradition, and shew how much the bards, at last, abused the privileges, which the admiration of their countrymen had conferred on the order. It was this infolent behaviour that induced the chiefs to retrench their number, and to take away those privileges which they were no longer worthy to enjoy. Their indolence, and difposition to lampoon, extinguished all the poetical fervour, which diftinguished their predecessors, and makes us the less regret the extinction of the order.

in fecret, when he beheld her fearful eye. "But battle is before thee, fon of Borbar-duthul."

AMIDST the harp, at intervals, the liftened whether the warrior flept. Her foul was up; fhe longed, in fecret, to pour her own fad fong. The field is filent. On their wings, the blafts of night retire. The bards had ceafed; and meteors came, red-winding with their ghofts. The fky grew dark: the forms of the dead were blended with the clouds. But heedless bends the daughter of Conmor, over the decaying flame. Thou wert alone in her foul, car-borne chief of Atha. She raised the voice of the song, and touched the harp between.

"Clun-GALO * came; fhe miffed the maid. Where art thou, beam of light? Hunters, from the mossy rock, faw ye the blue-eyed fair? Are her steps on grassy Lumon; near the bed of rocs? Ah me! I behold her bow in the hall. Where art thou, beam of light?"

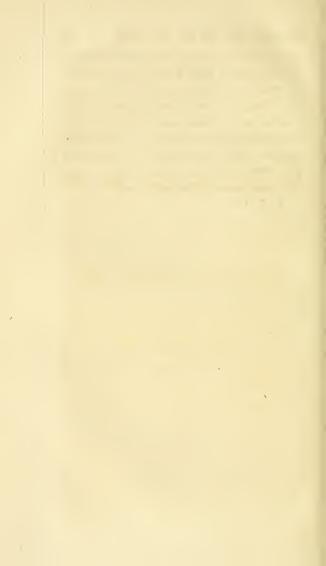

"CEASE +, love of Conmor, cease; I hear thee

* Clun galo, the wife of Conmor, king of Inis-huna, and the mother of Sul-maila She is here represented, as missing her daughter, after she had sied with Cathmor.

+ Sul-malla replies to the supposed questions of her mother. Towards the middle of this paragraph she calls Cathmor the sum of her foul, and continues the metaphor throughout. This book ends, we may suppose, about the middle of the third night, from the opening of the poem.

not on the ridgy heath. My eye is turned to the king, whose path is terrible in war. He for whom my foul is up, in the season of my rest. Deep-bosomed in war he stands, he beholds me not from his cloud. Why, sun of Sulmalla, dost thou not look forth? I dwell in darkness here; wide over me slies the shadowy mist. Filled with dew are my locks: look thou from thy cloud, O sun of Sulmalla's soul." * *

* * * *

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK VII.

ARGUMENT to Book VII.

THIS book begins, about the middle of the third night from the opening of the poem. The poet describes a kind of mist, which rose, by night, from the lake of Lego, and was the usual refidence of the fouls of the dead, during the interval between their decease and the funeral song. The appearance of the ghost of Fillan above the cave where his body lay. His voice comes to Fingal, on the rock of Cormul. The king strikes the shield of Trenmor, which was an infallible fign of his appearing in arms himself. The extraordinary effect of the found of the shield. Sul-malla, flarting from fleep, awakes Cathmor. Their affecting difcourfe. She infifts with him, to fue for peace; he refolves to continue the war. He directs her to retire to the neighbouring valley of Lona, which was the refidence of an old Druid, until the battle of the next day should be over. He awakes his army with the found of his shield. The shield described. Fonar, the bard, at the desire of Cathmor, relates the first settlement of the Fir-bolg in Ireland, under their leader Larthon. Morning comes, Sul-malla retires to the valley of Lona. A Lyric fong concludes the book.

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK VII.

ROM the wood-skirted waters of Lego, ascend at times, grey-bosomed mists; when the gates of the west are closed, on the sun's cagle-eye. Wide, over Lara's stream, is poured the vapour dark and deep: the moon, like a dim shield, is swimming thro' its folds. With this, clothe the spirits of old their sudden gestures on the wind, when they stride, from blast to blast, along the dusky night. Often, blended with the gale, to some warrior's grave *, they roll

that

As the mist, which rose from the lake of Lego, occasioned diseases and death, the bards seigned that it was the residence of the ghosts of the deceased, during the interval between their death, and the pronouncing of the suneral elegy over their tombs; for it was not allowable, without 142 T E M O R A: Book VII. roll the mist, a grey dwelling to his ghost, until the songs arise.

A SOUND came from the defart; it was Conar, king of Inis-fail. He poured his mist on the grave of Fillan, at blue-winding Lubar. Dark and mournful fat the ghost, in his grey ridge of smoak. The blast, at times, rolled him together: but the form returned again. It returned with bending eyes, and dark winding of locks of mist.

It was * dark. The fleeping hoft were still, in the skirts of night. The flame decayed, on the hill of Fingal; the king lay lonely on his shield. His eyes were half-closed in sleep; the voice of Fillan came. "Sleeps the husband of that ceremony was performed, for the spirits of the dead to mix with their ancestors, in their airy balls. It was the business of the spirit of the nearest relation to the deceased, to take the mist of Lego, and pour it over the grave. We find here Conar, the son of Trenmor, the first king of Ireland, performing this office for Fillan, as it was in the cause of the family of Conar, that that hero was killed.

* The following is the fingular fentiment of a frigid bard:

"More pleasing to me is the night of Cona, dark-streaming from Oslian's harp; more pleasant it is to me, than a white bosomed dweller between my arms; than a fair-handed daughter of heroes, in the hour of rest."

Tho' tradition is not very fatisfactory concerning the history of this poet, it has taken care to inform us, that he was very old when he wrote the diffich, a circumstance, which we might have supposed, without the aid of tradition.

Clatho? Dwells the father of the fallen in reft? Am I forgot in the folds of darkness; lonely in the season of night?"

"Why dost thou mix, said the king, with the dreams of thy father? Can I forget thee, my fon, or thy path of fire in the field? Not such come the deeds of the valiant on the foul of Fingal. They are not there a beam of lightning, which is feen, and is then no more. I remember thee, O Fillan, and my wrath begins to rife."

THE king took his deathful spear, and struck the deeply-sounding shield: his shield that hung high in night, the dismal sign of war! Ghosts sled on every side, and rolled their gathered forms on the wind. Thrice from the winding vale arose the voice of deaths. The harps * of the bards, untouched, sound mournful over the hill.

[•] It was the opinion of ancient times, that, on the night preceding the death of a person worthy and renowned, the harps of those bards, who were retained by his samily, emitted melancholy sounds. This was attributed to the light touch of ghosts; who were supposed to have a fore-knowlege of events. The same opinion prevailed long in the north, and the particular sound was called, the warning voice of the dead. The voice of death, mentioned in the preceding sentence, was of a different kind. Each person was supposed to have an attendant spirit, who assumed his sorm and voice, on the night preceding his death, and appeared, to some, in the attitude, in which the person was to die. The voices of Death were the foreboding shricks of those spirits.

144 T E M O R A: BOOK VII.

He firuck again the shield; battles rose in the dreams of his host. The wide-tumbling strife is gleaming over their souls. Blue-shielded kings descend to war. Backward-looking armies sty; and mighty deeds are half-hid, in the bright gleams of steel.

But when the third found arofe, deer started from the clefts of their rocks. The screams of fowl are heard, in the defart, as each slew, frighted on his blast. The sons of Selma half-rose, and half-assumed their spears. But silence rolled back on the host: they knew the shield of the king. Sleep returned to their eyes; the field was dark and still.

No fleep was thine in darknefs, blue-eyed daughter of Conmor! Sul-malla heard the dreadful shield, and rose, amid the night. Her steps are towards the king of Atha. "Can danger shake his daring soul!" In doubt, she stands, with bending eyes. Heaven burns with all its stars.

AGAIN the shield refounds! She rushed. She shopt. Her voice half-rose. It sailed. She saw him, amidst his arms, that gleamed to heaven's fire. She saw him dim in his locks, that rose to nightly wind. Away, for fear, she turned her steps. "Why should the king of Erin awake?

BOOK VII. AN EPIC POEM. 14

145

lift

awake? Thou art not a dream to his reft, daughter of Inis-huna."

More dreadful rings the shield. Sul-malla starts. Her helmet falls. Loud-ecchoes Lubar's rock, as over it rolls the steel. Bursting from the dreams of night, Cathmor half-rose, beneath his tree. He saw the form of the maid, above him, on the rock. A red star, with twinkling beam, looked thro' her sloating hair.

"Who comes thro' night to Cathmor, in the feafon of his dreams? Bring'st thou ought of war? Who art thou, fon of night? Stand'st thou before me, a form of the times of old? A voice from the fold of a cloud, to warn me of the danger of Erin?"

"Nor lonely fcout am I, nor voice from folded cloud," the faid; "but I warn thee of the danger of Erin. Dost thou hear that sound? It is not the feeble, king of Atha, that rolls his figns on night."

"LET the warrior roll his figns," he replied;
"to Cathmor they are the founds of harps. My joy is great, voice of night, and burns over all my thoughts. This is the mufic of kings, on lonely hills, by night; when they light their daring fouls, the fons of mighty deeds! The feeble dwell alone, in the valley of the breeze; where mifts

L

VOL. II.

146 T E M O R A: BOOK VII. lift their morning skirts, from the blue-winding streams."

"Nor feeble, king of men, were they, the fathers of my race. They dwelt in the folds of battle, in their diffant lands. Yet delights not my foul, in the figns of death! He*, who never yields, comes forth: O fend the bard of peace!"

Like a dropping rock, in the defart, flood Cathmor in his tears. Her voice came, a breeze, on his foul, and waked the memory of her land; where the dwelt by her peaceful flreams, before he came to the war of Conmor.

"DAUGHTER of strangers," he said; (she trembling turned away) "long have I marked thee in thy steel, young pine of Inis-huna. But my soul, I said, is solded in a storm. Why should that beam arise, till my steps return in peace? Have I been pale in thy presence, as thou bidst me to fear the king? The time of danger,

^{*} Fingal is faid to have never been overcome in battle. From this proceeded that title of honour which is always bestowed on him in tradition, Firngal na buai, Firgal of victories. In a peem, just now in my hands, which celebrates fome of the great actions of Arthur the famous British hero, that appellation is often bestowed on him. The poem, from the phraseology, appears to be ancient; and is, perhaps, tho' that is not mentioned, a translation from the Welsh language.

BOOK VII. AN EPIC POEM. 147 danger, O maid, is the feafon of my foul; for then it fwells, a mighty ftream, and rolls me on the foe"

"BENEATH the moss-covered rock of Lona, near his own loud stream; grey in his locks of age, dwells Clonmal * king of harps. Above him is his ecchoing tree, and the dun bounding of roes. The noise of our strife reaches his ear, as he bends in the thoughts of years. There let thy rest be, Sul-malla, until our battle cease. Until I return, in my arms, from the skirts of the evening mist, that rises, on Lona, round the dwelling of my love."

A LIGHT fell on the foul of the maid; it rose kindled before the king. She turned her face to Cathmor, from amidst her waving locks. "Sooner shall the eagle of heaven be torn, from the stream of his roaring wind, when he sees the dun prey, before him, the young sons of the bounding roe, than thou, O Cathmor, be turned from the strife of renown. Soon may I see thee, warrior, from the skirts of the evening ^{*} Claon-mal, crooked eye brow. From the retired life of this person, is infinuated, that he was of the order of the Druids; which supposition is not, at all, invalidated by the appellation of king of barps, here bestowed on him; for all agree that the bards were of the number of the Druids originally.

mist, when it is rolled around me, on Long of the streams. While yet thou art distant far, strike, Cathmor, strike the shield, that joy may return to my darkened foul, as I lean on the mosfy rock. But if thou shouldst fall, I am in the land of strangers; O fend thy voice, from thy cloud, to the maid of Inis-huna,"

- "Young branch of green-headed Lumon, why dost thou shake in the storm? Often has Cathmor returned, from darkly-rolling wars. The darts of death are but hail to me; they have often rattled along my shield. I have risen brightened from battle, like a meteor from a fformy cloud. Return not, fair beam, from thy vale, when the roar of battle grows. Then might the foe escape, as from my fathers of old."
- "THEY told to Son-mor , of Clunar +, who was flain by Cormac in fight. Three days darkened Son-mor, over his brother's fall. His spouse beheld the filent king, and foresaw his steps to war. She prepared the bow, in fecret, ^{} Son-mor, tall handsome man. He was the father of Borbar-duthal, chief of Atha, and grandfather to Cathmor himfelf.

⁺ Cluan-er, man of the field. This chief was killed in battle by Cormac Mac-Conar, king of Ireland, the father of Ros-crana, the first wife of Fingal. The story is alluded to in some ancient poems.

to attend her blue-shielded hero. To her dwelt darkness, at Atha, when he was not there. From their hundred streams, by night, poured down the fons of Alnecma. They had heard the thield of the king, and their rage arofe. In clanging arms, they moved along, towards Ullin of the groves. Son-mor struck his shield, at times, the leader of the war."

" FAR behind followed Sul-allin *, over the ftreamy hills. She was a light on the mountain, when they croffed the vale below. Her fleps were flately on the vale, when they rose on the mosfy hill. She feared to approach the king, who left her in ecchoing Atha. But when the roar of battle rose; when host was rolled on hoft; when Son-mor burnt, like the fire of heaven in clouds, with her fpreading hair came Sul-allin; for the trembled for her king. He stopt the rushing strife to fave the love of heroes. The foe fled by night; Clunar flept without his blood; the blood which ought to be poured upon the warrior's tomb."

" Nor rose the rage of Son-mor, but his days were filent and dark. Sul-allin wandered, by her grey streams, with her tearful eyes. Often did she look, on the hero, when he was folded in his thoughts. But the shrunk from his eyes, and turned her lone steps away. Battles rose, like a tempest, and drove the mist from his soul. He beheld, with joy, her steps in the hall, and the white rising of her hands on the harp."

^{*} Suil-alluin, beautiful the wife of Son-mor.

* In his arms firode the chief of Atha, to where his shield hung, high, in night; high on a mostly bough, over Lubar's streamy roar. Seven bosses rose on the shield; the seven voices of the king, which his warriors received, from the wind, and marked over all their tribes.

On each boss is placed a ftar of night; Canmathon with beams unthorn; Col-derna rising from a cloud: Uloicho robed in mist; and the soft beam of Cathlin glittering on a rock. Smiling, on its own blue wave, Reldurath half-finks its western light. The red eye of Berthin looks, thro' a grove, on the hunter, as he returns, by night, with the spoils of the bounding roe. Wide, in the midft, arofe the cloudless beams of Ton-thena, that star which looked, by night, on the course of the sea-tossed Larthon: Larthon, the first of Bolga's race, who travelled on the winds *. White-bosomed spread the sails of the king, towards streamy Inis-sail; dun night was rolled before him, with its skirts of mist. Unconstant blew the winds, and rolled him from wave to wave. Then rose the sieryhaired Ton-théna, and smiled from her parted cloud. Larthon † blessed the well-known beam, as it saint-gleamed on the deep.

^{*} To avoid multiplying notes, I shall give here the fignification of the names of the stars, engraved on the shield. Ceanmathon, bead of the bear. Col-derna, slant and sharp beam. Ul oicho, ruler of night. Cathlin, beam of the wave. Reuldurath, star of the twillight. Berthin, fire of the bill. Tonthéna, meteor of the waves. These etymologies, excepting that of Ceanmathon, are pretty exact. Of it I am not so certain; for it is not very probable, that the Firbolg had distinguished a constellation, so very early as the days of Larthon, by the name of the bear.

BENEATH

^{*} To travel on the winds, a poetical expression for sailing.

[†] Larthon is compounded of Lear, sea, and thon, wave. This name was given to the chief of the first colony of the Firbolg, who settled in Ireland, on account of his knowlege in navigation. A part of an old poem is still extant, concerning this hero. It abounds with those romantic fables of giants and magicians, which distinguished the compositions of the less ancient bards. The descriptions, contained in it, are ingenious, and proportionable to the magnitude of the persons introduced; but, being unnatural, they are inspired and tedious. Had the bard kept within the bounds of probability, his genius was far from being contemptible. The exordium of his poem is not destitute of merit; but it is the only part of it, that I think worthy of being presented to the reader.

[&]quot;Who first sent the black ship, thro' ocean, like a whale thro' the bursting of soam? Look, from thy darkness, on Cronath, Ossian of the harps of old! Send thy light on the blue-rolling waters, that I may behold the king. I see him

BENEATH the spear of Cathmor, rose that voice which awakes the bards. They came, dark-winding, from every side; each with the sound of his harp. Before them rejoiced the king, as the traveller, in the day of the sun; when he hears, far-rosting around, the murmur of mossy streams; streams that burst, in the defart, from the rock of roes.

"WHY," faid Fonar, "hear we the voice of the Ling, in the feafon of his reft? Were the dim forms of thy fathers bending in thy dreams? Perhaps they fland on that cloud, and wait for Fonar's fong; often they come to the fields where their fons are to lift the spear. Or shall our voice arise for him who lifts the spear no more; he that consumed the field, from Moma of the groves?"

"Nor forgot is that cloud in war, bard of other times. High shall his tomb rife, on Moi-lena, the dwelling of renown. But, now, dark in his own shell of oak! sea-tossed Larthon, thy soul is strong. It is careless as the wind of thy fails; as the wave that rolls by thy side. But the silent green is is before thee, with its sons, who are tall as woody Lumon; Lumon which sends, from its top, a thousand streams, white wandering down its sides."

It may, perhaps, be for the credit of this bard, to translate no more of this poem, for the continuation of his description of the Irish giants betrays his want of judgment. roll back my foul to the times of my fathers: to the years when first they rose, on Inis-huna's waves. Nor alone pleasant to Cathmor is the remembrance of wood-covered Lumon. Lumon of the streams, the dwelling of white-bosomed maids."

* " Lumon of the streams, thou rifest on Fonar's foul! Thy fun is on thy fide, on the rocks of thy bending trees. The dun roe is feen from thy furze; the deer lifts his branchy head; for he fees, at times, the hound, on the halfcovered heath. Slow, on the vale, are the steps of maids; the white-armed daughters of the bow: they lift their blue eyes to the hill, from amidst their wandering locks. Not there is the stride of Larthon, chief of Inis-huna. He mounts the wave on his own dark oak, in Cluba's ridgy bay. That oak which he cut from Lumon, to bound along the fea. The maids turn their eyes away, left the king should be lowly-laid; for never had they feen a ship, dark rider of the wave!"

"Now he dares to call the winds, and to mix with the mist of ocean. Blue Inis-fail rose, in Lumon was a hill, in Inis-huna, near the refidence of Sul-malla. This epifode has an immediate connection with what is faid of Larthon, in the description of Cathmor's shield.

fmoak; but dark-skirted night came down. The fons of Bolga feared. The fiery haired Ton-thena rose. Culbin's bay received the ship, in the bosom of its ecchoing woods. There, issued a stream, from Duthuma's horrid cave; where spirits gleamed, at times, with their half-sinished forms."

"Dreams descended on Larthon: he saw seven spirits of his fathers. He heard their half-formed words, and dimly beheld the times to come. He beheld the kings of Atha, the sons of future days. They led their hosts, along the field, like ridges of mist, which winds pour, in autumn, over Atha of the groves."

"LARTHON raifed the hall of Samla*, to the music of the harp. He went forth to the roes of Erin, to their wonted streams. Nor did he forget green-headed Lumon; he often bounded over his feas, to where white-handed Flathal † looked from the hill of roes. Lumon of the foamy streams, thou rifest on Fonar's foul!"

MORNING pours from the east. The misty heads of the mountains rife. Valleys shew, on + Flathal, beavenly, exquisitely beautiful. She was the wife of Larthon.

Samla, apparitions, fo called from the vision of Larthon, concerning his posterity.

every fide, the grey-winding of their streams. His hoft heard the shield of Cathmor: at once they rose around; like a crowded sea, when first it feels the wings of the wind. The waves know not whither to roll; they lift their troubled heads.

Sap and flow retired Sul-malla to Long of the streams. She went, and often turned; her blue eyes rolled in tears. But when the came to the rock, that darkly-covered Lona's vale: she looked, from her burfling foul, on the king; and funk, at once, behind.

Son of Alpin, flrike the flring. Is there aught of joy in the harp? Pour it then on the foul of Offian: it is folded in mist. I hear thee, O bard, in my night. But cease the lightly-trembling found. The joy of grief belongs to Offian, amidst his dark-brown years.

GREEN thorn of the hill of ghofts, that shakest thy head to nightly winds! I hear no found in thee; is there no spirit's windy fkirt now ruftling in thy leaves? Often are the steps of the dead, in the dark-eddying blasts; when the moon, a dun shield, from the east, is rolled along the fky.

ULLIN, Carril, and Ryno, voices of the days of old! Let me hear you, while yet it is dark, 156 T E M O R A: BOOK VII.

dark, to please and awake my foul. I hear you not, ye sons of song; in what hall of the clouds is your rest? Do you touch the shadowy harp, robed with morning mist, where the rustling sun comes forth from his greenheaded waves?

TEMORA:

AN

EPIC POEM.

BOOK VIII.

ARGUMENT to BOOK VIII.

The fourth morning, from the opening of the poem, comes on. Fingal, still continuing in the place, to which he had retired on the preceding night, is feen, at intervals, thro' the mist, which covered the rock of Cormul. The descent of the king is described. He orders Gaul, Dermid, and Carril the bard, to go to the valley of Cluna, and conduct. from thence, to the Caledonian army, Ferad-artho, the fon of Cairbre, the only person remaining of the family of Conar, the first king of Ireland. The king takes the command of the army, and prepares for battle. Marching towards the enemy, he comes to the cave of Lubar, where the body of Fillan lay. Upon feeing his dog Bran, who lay at the entrance of the cave, his grief returns. Cathmor arranges the Irish army in order of battle. The appearance of that hero. The general conflict is described. The actions of Fingal and Cathmor. A florm. The total rout of the Firbolg. The two kings engage, in a column of mist, on the banks of Lubar. Their attitude and conference after the combat. The death of Cathmor. Fingal refigns the spear of Trenmor to Offian. The ceremonies observed on that occasion. The spirit of Cathmor, in the mean time, appears to Sul-malla, in the valley of Lona. Her forrow. Evening comes on. A feast is prepared. The coming of Feradartho is announced by the fongs of a hundred bards. The poem closes, with a speech of Fingal.

TEMORA:

A N

EPICPOEM.

BOOK VIII.

A S when the wintry winds have feized the waves of the mountain-lake, have feized them, in flormy night, and cloathed them over with ice; white, to the hunter's early eye, the billows still seem to roll. He turns his ear to the found of each unequal ridge. But each is silent, gleaming, strewn with boughs and tusts of grass, which shake and whistle to the wind, over their grey feats of frost. So silent shone to the morning the ridges of Morven's host, as each warrior looked up from his helmet towards the hill of the king; the cloud-covered hill of Fingal, where he strode, in the folds of mist. At times is the hero feen, greatly dim in all his arms.

From

From thought to thought rolled the war, along his mighty foul.

Now is the coming forth of the king. First appeared the sword of Luno; the spear half issuing from a cloud, the shield still dim in mist. But when the stride of the king came abroad, with all his grey, dewy locks in the wind; then rose the shouts of his host over every moving tribe. They gathered, gleaming, round, with all their ecchoing shields. So rise the green seas round a spirit, that comes down from the squally wind. The traveller hears the sound afar, and lists his head over the rock. He looks on the troubled bay, and thinks he dimly sees the form. The waves sport, unwieldy, round, with all their backs of foam.

FAR-DISTANT flood the fon of Morni, Duthno's race, and Cona's bard. We flood fardiflant; each beneath his tree. We shunned the eyes of the king; we had not conquered in the field. A little stream rolled at my feet: I touched its light wave, with my spear. I touched it with my spear; nor there was the foul of Ossian. It darkly rose, from thought to thought, and fent abroad the sigh.

"Son of Morni," faid the king, "Dermid, hunter of roes! why are ye dark, like two rocks, each with its trickling waters? No wrath gathers on Fingal's foul, against the chiefs of men. Ye are my strength in battle; the kindling of my joy in peace. My early voice has been a pleafant gale to your ears, when Fillan prepared the bow. The son of Fingal is not here, nor yet the chace of the bounding roes. But why should the breakers of shields stand, darkened, far away?"

TALL they firode towards the king; they faw him turned to Mora's wind. His tears came down, for his blue-eyed fon, who flept in the cave of fireams. But he brightened before them, and fpoke to the broad-shielded kings.

"CROMMAL, with woody rocks, and misty top, the field of winds, pours forth, to the fight, blue Lubar's streamy roar. Behind it rolls clear-winding Lavath, in the still vale of deer. A cave is dark in a rock; above it strong-winged eagles dwell; broad-headed oaks, before it, found in Cluna's wind. Within, in his locks of youth, is Ferad-artho*, blue-eyed king, the son ^{*} Ferad-artho was the fon of Cairbar Mac-Cormac king of Ireland. He was the only one remaining of the race of Conar, the fon of Trenmor, the first Irish monarch, according to Ossian. In order to make this passage thoroughly understood, it may not be improper to recapitulate some part of what has been said in preceding notes. Upon the death of Conar the son of Trenmor, his son Cormac succeeded on the Irish throne. Cormac reigned long. His children were, Cairbar, who succeeded the condition of th of broad-shielded Cairbar, from Ullin of the roes. He listens to the voice of Condan, as, grey, he bends in feeble light. He listens, for his foes dwell in the ecchoing halls of Temora.

He

ceeded him, and Ros-crana, the first wife of Fingal. Cairbar, long before the death of his father Cormac, had taken to wife Bos-gala, the daughter of Colgar, one of the most powerful chiefs in Connaught, and had, by her, Artho, afterwards king of Ireland. Soon after Artho arrived at man's estate, his mother Bos-gala died, and Cairbar married Beltanno, the daughter of Conachar of Ullin, who brought him a fon, whom he called Ferad artho, i. e. a man in the place of Artho. The occasion of the name was this. Artho, when his brother was born, was absent, on an expedition, in the south of Ireland. A false report was brought to his father, that he was killed. Cairbar, to use the words of a poem on the subject, darkened for his fair-haired son. He turned to the young beam of light, the son of Baltanno of Conachar. Thou shalt be Farad-artho, he faid, a fire before thy race. Cairbar, foon after, died, nor did Artho long furvive him. Artho was fucceeded, in the Irish throne, by his fon Cormac, who, in his minority, was murdered by Cairbar, the fon of Borbar-duthul. Ferad-artho, fays tradition, was very young, when the expedition of Fingal, to fettle him on the throne of Ireland, happened. During the short reign of young Cormac, Feradartho lived at the royal residence of Temora. Upon the murder of the king, Condan, the bard, conveyed Ferad-artho, privately, to the cave of Cluna, behind the mountain Crommal, in Ulfter, where they both lived concealed, during the ufurpation of the family of Atha. A late bard has delivered the whele history, in a poem just now in my possession. It has little merit, if we except the fcene between Ferad-artho, and the meffengers of Fingal, upon their arrival, in the valley of Cluna. After hearing of the great actions of Fingal, the young prince proposes the following questions concerning him, to Gaul and Dermid, " Is the king tall as the rock of my cave? Is his He comes, at times, abroad, in the skirts of mist, to pierce the bounding roes. When the sun looks on the field, nor by the rock, nor stream, is he! He shuns the race of Bolga, who dwell in his father's hall. Tell him, that Fingal lifts the spear, and that his foes, perhaps, may fail."

"Lift up, O Gaul, the shield before him. Stretch, Dermid, Temora's spear. Be thy voice in his ear, O Carril, with the deeds of his fathers. Lead him to green Moi-lena, to the dusky field of ghosts; for there, I fall forward, in battle, in the folds of war. Before dun night defeends, come to high Dunmora's top. Look, from the grey skirts of mist, on Lena of the streams. If there my standard shall sloat on wind, over Lubar's gleaming stream, then has not Fingal failed in the last of his fields."

Such were his words; nor aught replied the filent, striding kings. They looked side-long, on Erin's host, and darkened, as they went. Never before had they left the king, in the midst of the stormy field. Behind them, touching at spear a fir of Cluna? Is he a rough-winged blast, on the mountain, which takes the green oak by the head, and tears it from its hill? Glitters Lubar within his stride, when he fends his stately steps along. Nor is he tall, said Gaul, as that rock; nor glitter streams within his strides, but his soul is a mighty stood, like the strength of Ullin's seas."

times his harp, the grey-haired Carril moved. He forefaw the fall of the people, and mournful was the found! It was like a breeze that comes, by fits, over Lego's reedy lake; when fleep half-defeends on the hunter, within his mosfly cave.

"WHY bends the bard of Cona," faid Fingal, "over his fecret stream? Is this a time for forrow, father of low-laid Ofcar? Be the warriors * remembered in peace; when ecchoing shields are heard no more. Bend, then, in grief, over the

* Malvina is supposed to speak the following soliloquy.

"Malvina is like the bow of the shower, in the secret valley of streams; it is bright, but the drops of heaven are rolling on its blended light. They say, that I am fair within my locks, but, on my brightness, is the wandering of tears. Darkness slies over my soul, as the dusky wave of the breeze, along the grass of Lutha. Yet have not the roes sailed me, when I moved between the hills. Pleasant, beneath my white hand, arose the sound of harps. What then, daughter of Lutha, travels over thy soul, like the dreary path a ghost, along the nightly beam? Should the young warrior fall, in the roar of his troubled fields! Young virgins of Lutha arise, call back the wandering thoughts of Malvina. Awake the voice of the harp, along my ecchoing vale. Then shall my soul come forth, like a light from the gates of the morn, when clouds are rolled around them, with their broken sides.

"Dweller of my thoughts, by night, whose form ascends in troubled fields, why dost thou stir up my soul, thou fardistant son of the king? Is that the ship of my love, its dark course through the ridges of ocean? How art thou so sudden, Oscar, from the heath of shields?"

The rest of this poem consists of a dialogue between Ullin and Malvina, wherein the distress of the latter is carried to the highest pitch.

flood, where blows the mountain breeze. Let them pass on thy foul, the blue-eyed dwellers of the tomb. But Erin rolls to war; widetumbling, rough, and dark. Lift, Ossian, lift the shield. I am alone, my fon!"

As comes the fudden voice of winds to the becalmed thip of Inis-huna, and drives it large, along the deep, dark rider of the wave; fo the voice of Fingal fent Offian, tall, along the heath. He lifted high his thining thield, in the dufky wing of war: like the broad, blank moon, in the fkirt of a cloud, before the ftorms arife.

Loud, from moss-covered Mora, poured down, at once, the broad-winged war. Fingal led his people forth, king of Morven of streams. On high spreads the eagle's wing. His grey hair is poured on his shoulders broad. In thunder are his mighty strides. He often stood, and saw behind, the wide-gleaming rolling of armour. A rock he seemed, grey over with ice, whose woods are high in wind. Bright streams leap from its head, and spread their soam on blass.

Now he came to Lubar's cave, where Fillan darkly flept. Bran still lay on the broken shield: the eagle-wing is strewed by the winds. Bright, from withered furze, looked forth the hero's spear. Then grief stirred the soul of the king, like whirlwinds blackening on a lake. He turned his fudden step, and leaned on his bending spear.

WHITE-BREASTED Bran came bounding with joy to the known path of Fingal. He came, and looked towards the cave, where the blue-eyed hunter lay, for he was wont to firide, with morning, to the dewy bed of the roe. It was then the tears of the king came down, and all his foul was dark. But as the rifing wind rolls away the from of rain, and leaves the white ftreams to the fun, and high hills with their heads of grafs: fo the returning war brightened the mind of Fingal. He bounded *, on his fpear,

* The Irish compositions concerning Fingal invariably speaks of him as a giant. Of these Hibernian poems there are now many in my hands. From the language, and allusions to the times in which they were writ, I should fix the date of their composition in the fifteenth and fixteenth centuries. In some passages, the poetry is far from wanting merit, but the fable is unnatural, and the whole conduct of the pieces injudicious. I shall give one instance of the extravagant sictions of the Irish bards, in a poem which they, most unjustly, ascribe to Offian. The story of it is this: Ireland being threatened with an invafion from fome part of Scandinavia, Fingal fent Oslian, Oscar, and Ca-olt, to watch the bay, in which, it was expected, the enemy was to land. Ofcar, unluckily, fell afleep, before the Scandinavians appeared; and, great as he was, fays the Irish bard, he had one bad property, that no less could waken him, before his time, than cutting off one of his fingers, or throwing a great stone against his head; and it was dangerous to come near him on those occafions, till he had recovered himfelf, and was fully awake, Ca-olt, fpear, over Lubar, and struck his ecchoing shield. His ridgy host bend forward, at once, with all their pointed steel.

Non Erin heard, with fear, the found: wide they came rolling along. Dark Malthos, in the wing of war, looks forward from shaggy brows. Next rose that beam of light Hidalla; then the side-long-looking gloom of Maronnan. Blueshielded Clonar lists the spear; Cormar shakes his buthy locks on the wind. Slowly, from behind a rock, rose the bright form of Atha. First appeared his two pointed spears, then the half of his burnished shield: like the rising of a nightly meteor, over the vale of ghosts. But when he shone all abroad: the hosts plunged, at once, into strife. The gleaming waves of steel are poured on either side.

As meet two troubled feas, with the rolling of all their waves, when they feel the wings of con-

Ca-olt, who was employed by Offian to waken his fon, made choice of throwing the stone against his head, as the least dangerous expedient. The stone, rebounding from the hero's head, shook, as it rolled along, the hill for three miles round. Ofcar rose in rage, fought bravely, and, singly, vanquished a wing of the enemy's army. Thus the bard goes on, till Fingal put an end to the war, by the total rout of the Scandinavians. Puerile, and even despicable, as these sictions are, yet Keating and O'Flaherty have no better authority than the poems which contain them, for all that they write concerning Fion Mac-comnal, and the pretended militia of Ireland.

tending winds, in the rock-fided firth of Lumon; along the ecchoing hills is the dim course of ghosts: from the blast fall the torn groves on the deep, amidst the foamy path of whales. So mixed the hosts! Now Fingal; now Cathmor came abroad. The dark tumbling of death is before them: the gleam of broken steel is rolled on their steps, as, loud, the high-bounding kings hewed down the ridge of shields.

MARONNAN fell, by Fingal, laid large across a stream. The waters gathered by his side, and leapt grey over his bossy shield. Clonar is pierced by Cathmor: nor yet lay the chief on earth. An oak seized his hair in his fall. His helmet rolled on the ground. By its thong, hung his broad shield; over it wandered his streaming blood. Tla-min * shall weep, in the hall, and strike her heaving breast.

NOR

TLAMIN.

[•] Tla-min, mildly foft. The loves of Clonar and Tlamin were rendered famous in the north, by a fragment of alyric poem. It is a dialogue between Clonar and Tlamin. She begins with a foliloguy, which he overhears.

[&]quot;Clonar, fon of Conglas of I-mor, young hunter of dunfided roes! where art thou laid, amidft rufhes, beneath the paffing wing of the breeze? I behold thee, my love, in the plain of thy own dark ftreams! The clung thorn is rolled by the wind, and ruftles along his shield. Bright in his locks he lies: the thoughts of his dreams fly, darkening, over his face.

BOOK VIII. AN EPIC POEM. 169

Nor did Ossian forget the spear, in the wing of his war. He strewed the field with dead. Young Hidalla came. "Soft voice of streamy Clonra! Why dost thou lift the steel? O that we met, in the strife of song, in thy own rushy vale!" Malthos beheld him low, and darkened as he rushed along. On either side of a stream, we bend in the ecchoing strife. Heaven comes rolling down: around burst the voices of squally winds. Hills are clothed, at times, in sire.

Thou thinkest of the battles of Ossian, young son of the ecchoing isle!

"Half hid, in the grove, I fit down. Fly back, ye mists of the hill. Why should ye hide her love from the blue eyes of Tlamin of harps?

CLONAR.

"As the spirit, seen in a dream, slies off from our opening eyes, we think, we behold his bright path between the closing hills; so fled the daughter of Clun-gal, from the fight of Clonar of shields. Arise, from the gathering of trees; blue-eyed Tlamin arise.

TLAMIN.

"I turn me away from his steps. Why should he know of my love! My white breast is heaving over sighs, as soam on the dark course of streams. But he passes away, in his arms! Son of Conglas, my soul is sad.

CLONAR.

"It was the shield of Fingal! the voice of kings from Selma of harps! My path is towards green Erin. Arise, fair light, from thy shades. Come to the field of my foul, there is the spreading of hosts. Arise, on Clonar's troubled soul, young daughter of blue shielded Clungal."

Clungal was the chief of I-mor, one of the Hebrides.

Thunder rolls in wreaths of mist. In darkness shrunk the foe: Morven's warriors stood aghast. Still I bent over the stream, amidst my whistling locks.

THEN rose the voice of Fingal, and the sound of the flying soe. I saw the king, at times, in lightning, darkly-striding in his might. I struck my ecchoing shield, and hung forward on the steps of Alnecma: the soe is rolled before me, like a wreath of smoak.

THE fun looked forth from his cloud. The hundred streams of Moi-lena shone. Slow rose the blue columns of mist, against the glittering hill. "Where are the mighty kings? * Nor by that stream, nor wood, are they! I hear the clang of arms! Their strife is in the bosom of ^{*}Fingal and Cathmor. The conduct here is perhaps proper. The numerous descriptions of single combats have already exhausted the subject. Nothing new, nor adequate to our high idea of the kings, can be said. A column of mist is thrown over the whole, and the combat is left to the imagination of the reader. Poets have almost universally sailed in their descriptions of this fort. Not all the strength of Homer could sustain, with dignity, the minutia of a single combat. The throwing of a spear, and the braying of a shield, as some of our own poets most elegantly express it, convey no magnificent, though they are striking ideas. Our imagination stretches beyond, and consequently, despises, the description. It were, therefore, well, for some poets in my opinion, (tho' it is, perhaps, somewhat singular) to have, sometimes, thrown miss over their single combats.

BOOK VIII. AN EPIC POEM.

171

that mist. Such is the contending of spirits in a nightly cloud, when they strive for the wintry wings of winds, and the rolling of the foamcovered waves.

I RUSHED along. The grey mist rose. Tall, gleaming, they flood at Lubar. Cathmor leaned against a rock. His half-fallen shield received the stream, that leapt from the moss above. Towards him is the stride of Fingal: he faw the hero's blood. His fword fell flowly to his fide. He spoke, midst his darkening joy.

"YIELDS the race of Borbar-duthul? Or still does he lift the spear? Not unheard is thy name, at Atha, in the green dwelling of frangers. It has come, like the breeze of his defart, to the ear of Fingal. Come to my hill of feafts: the mighty fail, at times. No fire am I to lowlaid foes: I rejoice not over the fall of the brave. To close * the wound is mine: I have known ^{*} Fingal is very much celebrated, in tradition, for his knowlege in the virtues of herbs. The Irish poems, concerning him, often reprefent him, curing the wounds which his chiefs received in battle. They fable concerning him, that he was in possession of a cup, containing the essence of herbs, which inflantaneously healed wounds. The knowlege of curing the wounded, was, till of late, universal among the Highlanders. We hear of no other disorder, which required the skill of physic. The wholsomeness of the climate, and an active life, spent in hunting, excluded diseases.

172 T E M O R A: BOOK VIII.

the herbs of the hills. I feized their fair heads, on high, as they waved by their fecret streams. Thou art dark and filent, king of Atha of strangers."

"By Atha of the ftream," he faid, "there rifes a mostly rock. On its head is the wandering of boughs, within the course of winds. Dark, in its face, is a cave, with its own loud rill. There have I heard the tread of strangers †, when they passed to my hall of shells. Joy rose, like a stame, on my soul: I blest the ecchoing rock. Here be my dwelling, in darkness; in my grassy vale. From this I shall mount the breeze, that pursues my thistle's beard; or look down, on blue-winding Atha, from its wandering mist."

† Cathmor reflects, with pleasure, even in his last moments, on the relief he had afforded to strangers. The very tread of their feet was pleasant in his ear. His hospitality was not passed unnoticed by the bards; for, with them, it became a proverb, when they described the hospitable disposition of a hero, that he was like Cathmar of Atha, the friend of strangers. It will seem strange, that, in all the Irish poems, there is no mention made of Cathmor. This must be attributed to the revolutions and domessic confusions which happened in that island, and utterly cut off all the real traditions concerning so ancient a period. All that we have related of the state of Ireland before the fifth century is of late invention, and the work of ill informed senachies and injudicious bards.

"Why speaks the king of the tomb? Offian! the warrior has failed! Joy meet thy soul, like a stream, Cathmor, friend of strangers! My son, I hear the call of years; they take my spear as they pass along. Why does not Fingal, they seem to say, rest within his hall? Dost thou always delight in blood? In the tears of the sad? No: ye dark-rolling years, Fingal delights not in blood. Tears are wintry streams that waste away my soul. But, when I lie down to rest, then comes the mighty voice of war. It awakes me, in my hall, and calls forth all my steel. It shall call it forth no more; Offian, take thou thy father's spear. Lift it, in battle, when the proud arise.

My fathers, Offian, trace my fleps; my deeds are pleafant to their eyes. Wherever I come forth to battle, on my field, are their columns of mist. But mine arm rescued the feeble; the haughty found my rage was fire. Never over the fallen did mine eye rejoice. For this *, my fathers shall meet me, at the gates

[•] The Celtic nations had some idea of rewards, and perhaps of punishments, after death. Those who behaved, in life, with bravery and virtue, were received, with joy, to the airy halls of their fathers; but the dark in foul, to use the expression of the poet, were spurned away from the babitation of therees, to avander on all the coinds. Another opinion, which of their airy halls, tall, with robes of light, with mildly-kindled eyes. But, to the proud in arms, they are darkened moons in heaven, which fend the fire of night, red-wandering over their face."

"Father of heroes, Trenmor, dweller of eddying winds! I give thy fpear to Offian, let thine eye rejoice. Thee have I feen, at times, bright from between thy clouds; fo appear to my fon, when he is to lift the fpear: then shall he remember thy mighty deeds, though thou art now but a blast."

He gave the fpear to my hand, and raifed, at once, a ftone on high, to fpeak to future times, with its grey head of moss. Beneath he placed a fword * in earth, and one bright boss from his shield. Dark in thought, a-while, he bends: his words, at length, came forth.

prevailed in those times, tended not a little to make individuals emulous to excel one another in martial atchievements. It was thought, that, in the ball of clouds, every one had a feat, raised above others, in proportion as he excelled them, in valour, when he lived.

* There are some stones still to be seen in the north, which were erected as memorials of some remarkable transactions between the ancient chiefs. There are generally found, beneath them, some piece of arms, and a bit of half-burnt wood. The cause of placing the last there is not mentioned in tradition.

"When thou, O stone, shall moulder down, and lose thee, in the moss of years, then shall the traveller come, and whistling pass away. Thou know'st not, feeble man, that same once thone on Moi-lena. Here Fingal resigned his spear, after the last of his fields. Pass away, thou empty shade; in thy voice there is no renown. Thou dwellest by some peaceful stream; yet a few years, and thou art gone. No one remembers thee, thou dweller of thick mist! But Fingal shall be clothed with same, a beam of light to other times; for he went forth, in ecchoing steel, to save the weak in arms."

BRIGHTENING in his fame, the king strode to Lubar's founding oak, where it bent, from its rock, over the bright-tumbling stream. Beneath it is a narrow plain, and the found of the fount of the rock. Here the standard * of Morven poured its wreaths on the wind, to mark the way of Ferad-artho, from his fecret vale. Bright, from his parted west, the sun of heaven looked abroad. The hero saw his people, and heard-

[•] The erecting of his standard on the bank of Lubar, was the signal which Fingal, in the beginning of the book, promised to give to the chiefs, who went to conduct Ferad-artho to the army, should he himself prevail in battle. This standard here is called, the fun-beam. The reason of this appellation, I gave in my notes on the poem intitled Fingal.

176 T E M O R A: BOOK VIII.

their shouts of joy. In broken ridges round, they glittered to the beam. The king rejoiced, as a hunter in his own green vale, when, after the storm is rolled away, he sees the gleaming sides of the rocks. The green thorn shakes its head in their face; from their top look forward the roes.

† GREY, at his moffy cave, is bent the aged form of Clonmal. The eyes of the bard had failed. He leaned forward, on his staff. Bright, in her locks, before him, Sul-malla listened to the tale; the tale of the kings of Atha, in the days of old. The noise of battle had ceased in his ear: he stopt, and raised the secret sigh. The spirits of the dead, they said, often lightened along his soul. He saw the king of Atha low, beneath his bending tree.

"WHY art thou dark," faid the maid? "The strife of arms is past. Soon * shall he come to thy cave, over thy winding streams. The sun looks from the rocks of the west. The

[†] The fcene is changed to the valley of Lona, whither Sulmalla had been fent, by Cathmor, before the battle. Clonmal, an aged bard, or rather druid, as he feems here to be endued with a prefcience of events, had long dwelt there, in a cave. This fcene is calculated to throw a melancholy gloom over the mind.

^{*} Cathmor had promifed, in the feventh book, to come to the cave of Clonmal, after the battle was over.

BOOK VIII. AN EPIC POEM. 177

mists of the lake arise. Grey, they spread on that hill, the rushy dwelling of roes. From the mist shall my king appear! Behold, he comes in his arms. Come to the cave of Clonmal, O my best beloved!"

It was the fpirit of Cathmor, stalking, large, a gleaming form. He sunk by the hollow stream, that roared between the hills. "It was but the hunter," she faid, "who fearches for the bed of the roe. His steps are not forth to war; his spouse expects him with night. He shall, whistling, return, with the spoils of the dark-brown hinds." Her eyes were turned to the hill; again the stately form came down. She rose, in the midst of joy. He retired again in mist. Gradual vanish his limbs of smoak, and mix with the mountain-wind. Then she knew that he fell! "King of Erin art thou low!" Let Ossian forget her grief; it wastes the soul of age *.

EVENING

[•] Tradition relates, that Offian, the next day after the decifive battle between Fingal and Cathmor, went to find out Sul-malla, in the valley of Lona. His address to her follows:

[&]quot;Awake thou daughter of Conmor, from the fern-firited cavern of Lona. Awake, thou fun-beam in defarts; warriors one day must fail. They move forth, like terrible lights; but, often, their cloud is near. Go to the valley of stream, to the wandering of herds, on Lumon; there dwells, in his Vol. II.

178 T E M O R A: BOOK VIII.

EVENING came down on Moi-lena. Grey rolled the streams of the land. Loud came forth the voice of Fingal: the beam of oaks arose. The people gathered round with gladness; with gladness blended with shades. They sidelong looked to the king, and beheld his unfinished joy. Pleasant, from the way of the desart, the voice of music came. It seemed, at first, the noise of a stream, far-distant on its rocks. Slow it rolled along the hill, like the russed wing of a breeze, when it takes the tusted beard of the rocks, in the still season of night. It was the voice of Condan, mixed with Carril's trembling harp. They came, with blue-eyed Ferad-artho, to Mora of the streams.

lazy mist, the man of many days. But he is unknown, Sulmalla, like the thistle of the rocks of roes; it shakes its grey beard, in the wind, and falls, unseen of our eyes. Not such are the kings of men, their departure is a meteor of sire, which pours its red course, from the desart, over the bosom of night.

"He is mixed with the warriors of old, those fires that have hid their heads. At times shall they come forth in song. Not forgot has the warrior failed. He has not seen, Sul-malla, the fall of a beam of his own: no fair-haired son, in his blood, young troubler of the field. I am lonely, young branch of Lumon, I may hear the voice of the feeble, when my strength shall have failed in years, for young Oscar has ceased, on his field."—" " " "

Sul-malla returned to her own country. She makes a confiderable figure in another poem; her behaviour in that piece accounts for that partial regard with which the poet ought to fpeak of her throughout Temora.

SUDDEN burfts the fong from our bards, on Lena: the host struck their shields midst the found. Gladness rose brightening on the king, like the beam of a cloudy day, when it rifes, on the green hill, before the roar of winds. He flruck the boffy fhield of kings; at once they cease around. The people lean forward, from their spears, towards the voice of their land *.

"Sons of Morven, foread the feast; fend the night away in fong. Ye have shone around me, and the dark florm is past. My people are the windy rocks, from which I fpread my eagle-

^{*} Before I finish my notes, it may not be altogether improper to obviate an objection, which may be made to the credibility of the story of Temora. It may be asked, whether it is probable, that Fingal could perform fuch actions as are ascribed to him in this book, at an age when his grandson, Ofcar, had acquired fo much reputation in arms. To this it may be answered, that Fingal was but very young [book 4th] when he took to wife Ros-crana, who foon after became the mother of Ossian. Ossian was also extremely young when he married Ever-allin, the mother of Oscar. Tradition relates, that Fingal was but eighteen years old at the birth of his fon Offian; and that Offian was much about the fame age, when Ofcar, his fon, was born. Ofcar, perhaps, might be about twenty, when he was killed, in the battle of Gabhra, [book 1st] fo the age of Fingal, when the decifive battle was fought between him and Cathmor, was just fifty-fix years. In those times of activity and health, the natural strength and vigour of a man was little abated, at fuch an age; fo that there is nothing improbable in the actions of Fingal, as related in this book.

130 T E M O R A. BOOK VIII.

wings, when I rush forth to renown, and seize it on its field. Offian, thou hast the spear of Fingal: it is not the staff of a boy with which he strews the thistle round, young wanderer of the field. No: it is the lance of the mighty, with which they firetched forth their hands to death. Look to thy fathers, my fon; they are awful beams. With morning lead Ferad-artho forth to the ecchoing halls of Temora. Remind him of the kings of Erin: the stately forms of old. Let not the fallen be forgot, they were mighty in the field. Let Carril pour his fong, that the kings may rejoice in their mist. To-morrow I fpread my fails to Selma's shaded walls; where streamy Duthula winds through the feats of roes."

CONLATH and CUTHONA:

A

P O E M.

ARGUMENT.

Conlath was the youngest of Morni's fons, and brother to the celebrated Gaul. He was in love with Cuthona the daughter of Rumar, when Toscar the son of Kinsena, accompanied by Fercuth his friend, arrived, from Ireland, at Mora, where Conlath dwelt. He was hospitably received, and according to the custom of the times, feasted, three days, with Conlath. On the fourth he fet fail, and coasting the island of waves, one of the Hebrides, he faw Cuthona hunting, fell in love with her, and carried her away, by force, in his ship. He was forced, by stress of weather, into I-thona a defart ifle. In the mean-time Conlath, hearing of the rape, failed after him, and found him on the point of failing for the coast of Ireland. They fought: and they and their followers fell by mutual wounds. Cuthona did not long furvive: for she died of grief the third day after. Fingal, hearing of their unfortunate death, fent Stormal the fon of Moran to bury them. but forgot to fend a bard to fing the funeral fong over their tombs. The ghost of Conlath comes, long after, to Ossian, to intreat him to transmit, to posterity, his and Cuthona's fame. For it was the opinion of the times, that the fouls of the deceased were not happy, till their elegies were composed by a bard.

CONLATH and CUTHÓNA;

A

P O E M.

ID not Offian hear a voice? or is it the found of days that are no more? Often does the memory of former times come, like the evening fun, on my foul. The noise of the chace is renewed. In thought, I lift the spear. But Offian did hear a voice! Who art thou, fon of night? The children of the feeble are afleep. The midnight wind is in my hall. Perhaps it is the shield of Fingal that ecchoes to the blast. It hangs in Offian's hall. He feels it fometimes with his hands. Yes! I hear thee, my friend! Long has thy voice been absent from mine ear! What brings thee, on thy cloud, to Offian, fon of generous Morni? Are the friends of the aged near thee? Where is Ofcar, fon of fame? He was often near thee, O Conlath, when the found of battle arose.

N 4

GHOST

184 CONLATH and CUTHONA:

GHOST OF CONLATH.

SLEEPS the fweet voice of Cona, in the midst of his ruftling hall? Sleeps Offian in his hall, and his friends without their fame? The fea rolls round dark I-thona*. Our tombs are not feen in our ifle. How long shall our fame be unheard, fon of resounding Selma?

OSSIAN.

O THAT mine eyes could behold thee! Thou fittest, dim, on thy cloud! Art thou like the mist of Lano? An half-extinguished meteor of fire? Of what are the skirts of thy robe? Of what is thine airy bow? He is gone on his blast like the shade of a wandering cloud. Come from thy wall, O harp! Let me hear thy sound. Let the light of memory rise on I-thona. Let me behold again my friends! And Ossian does behold his friends, on the dark-blue isse. The cave of Thona appears, with its mossy rocks and bending trees. A stream roars at its mouth. Toscar bends over its course. Fercuth is fad by his side. Cuthona is sits at a distance, and weeps. Does the wind of the waves deceive me? Or do I hear them fpeak?

^{*} I thonn, island of waves, one of the uninhabited western isles.

⁺ Cuthona the daughter of Rumar, whom Toscar had carried away by force.

TOSCAR.

THE night was flormy. From their hills the groaning oaks came down. The fea darklytumbled beneath the blaft. The roaring waves climbed against our rocks. The lightning came often and shewed the blasted fern. Fercuth! I faw the ghost who embroiled the night *. Silent he stood, on that bank. His robe of mist slew on the wind. I could behold his tears. An aged man he feemed, and full of thought !

FERCUTH.

IT was thy father, O Tofcar. He forefees fome death among his race. Such was his appearance on Cromla, before the great Maronnan + fell. Erin of hills of grass! how pleafant are thy vales? Silence is near thy blue ffreams. The fun is on thy fields. Soft is the

[.] It was long thought, in the north of Scotland, that forms were raised by the ghosts of the deceased. I his notion is still entertained by the vulgar; for they think that whirlwinds, and fudden fqualls of wind are occasioned by spirits. who transport themselves, in that manner, from one place to another.

[†] Ma-ronnan was the brother of Toscar.

186 CONLATH and CUTHONA:

found of the harp in Seláma*. Lovely the cry of the hunter on Crómla. But we are in dark I-thona, furrounded by the florm. The billows lift their white heads above our rocks. We tremble amidst the night.

TOSCAR.

WHITHER is the foul of battle fled, Fercuth with locks of age? I have feen thee undaunted in danger: thine eyes burning with joy in the fight. Whither is the foul of battle fled? Our fathers never feared. Go: view the fettling fea: the stormy wind is laid. The billows still tremble on the deep. They feem to fear the blast. Go view the settling sea. Morning is grey on our rocks. The fun will look foon from his east; in all his pride of light! I lifted up my fails, with joy, before the halls of generous Conlath. My courfe was by a defart isle: where Cuthona purfued the deer. I faw her, like that beam of the fun that iffues from the cloud. Her hair was on her heaving breaft. She, bending forward, drew the bow. Her white arm feemed, behind her, like the fnow of Cromla. Come to my foul, I faid, huntress ^{*} Selámath, beautiful to bebold, the name of Toscar's residence, on the coast of Ulster, near the mountain Cromla-of the defart isle! But she wastes her time in tears. She thinks of the generous Conlath. Where can I find thy peace, Cuthona, lovely maid!

CU-THONA *.

A DISTANT steep bends over the sea, with aged trees and mossy rocks. The billow rolls at its feet. On its side is the dwelling of roes. The people call it Mora. There the towers of my love arise. There Conlath looks over the sea for his only love. The daughters of the chace returned. He beheld their downcast eyes. "Where is the daughter of Rumar?" But they answered not. My peace dwells on Mora, son of the distant land!

TOSCAR.

CUTHONA shall return to her peace: to the towers of generous Conlath. He is the friend of Toscar! I have feasted in his halls! Rise, ye gentle breezes of Erin. Stretch my fails toward Mora's shores. Cuthona shall rest on Mora: but the days of Toscar must be sad. I shall sit in my cave in the field of the sun. The blast will rustle in my trees. I shall think it is Cuthona's voice. But she is distant far, in the halls of the mighty Conlath!

^{*} Cu-thona, the mournful found of the waves; a poetical name given her on account of her mourning to the found of the waves; her name in tradition is Gorm-huil, the blue-eyed graid.

188 CONLATH and CUTHONA:

CUTHONA.

Ha! what cloud is that? It carries the ghofts of my fathers. I fee the skirts of their robes, like grey and watry mist. When shall I fall, O Rumar? Sad Cuthona foresees her death. Will not Conlath behold me, before I enter the narrow house.*?

OSSIAN.

HE shall behold thee, O maid. He comes along the heaving sea. The death of Toscar is dark on his spear. A wound is in his side! He is pale at the cave of Thona. He shews his ghastly wound. Where art thou with thy tears, Cuthona? The chief of Mora dies. The vision grows dim on my mind. I behold the chiefs no more! But, O ye bards of suture times, remember the fall of Conlath with tears. He fell before his day. Sadness darkened in his hall. His mother looked to his shield on the wall, and it was bloody †. She knew that her hero fell.

^{*} The grave.

[†] It was the opinion of the times, that the arms left by the heroes at home, became bloody the very inflant their owners were killed, though at ever so great a distance.

Her

Her forrow was heard on Mora. Art thou pale on thy rock, Cuthona, befide the fallen chiefs? Night comes, and day returns, but none appears to raife their tomb. Thou frighteneft the fcreaming fowls away. Thy tears for ever flow. Thou art pale as a watry cloud, that rifes from a lake!

THE fons of green Selma came. They found Cuthona cold. They raised a tomb over the heroes. She rests at the side of Conlath. Come not to my dreams, O Conlath! Thou hast received thy same. Be thy voice far distant from my hall; that sleep may descend at night. O that I could forget my friends: till my footsteps should cease to be seen! till I come among them with joy! and lay my aged limbs in the narrow house!

BERRATHON:

A

P O E M.

ARGUMENT.

Fingal in his voyage to Lochlin, whither he had been invited by Starno the father of Agandecca, touched at Berrathon, an island of Scandinavia, where he was kindly entertained by Larthmor the petty king of the place, who was a vassal of the supreme kings of Lochlin. The hospitality of Larthmor gained him Fingal's friendship, which that hero manifested, after the imprisonment of Larthmor by his own fon, by fending Offian and Tofcar, the father of Malvina so often mentioned, to rescue Larthmor, and to punish the unnatural behaviour of Uthal. Uthal was handsome, and, by the ladies, much admired. Ninathoma, the beautiful daughter of Torthóma, a neighbouring prince, fell in love and fled with him. He proved unconftant; for another lady, whose name is not mentioned, gaining his affections, he confined Nina-thoma to a defart island near the coast of Berrathon. She was relieved by Offian, who, in company with Tofcar, landing on Berrathon, defeated the forces of Uthal, and killed him in a fingle combat. Nina-thoma, whose love not all the bad behaviour of Uthal could erafe, hearing of his death, died of grief. In the mean time Larthmor is restored, and Ossian and Toscar return in triumph to Fingal.

The poem opens with an elegy on the death of Malvina the daughter of Toscar, and closes with presages of Ossian's death.

BERRATHON:

A

P O E M.

END thy blue course, O stream, round the narrow plain of * Lutha. Let the green woods hang over it, from their hills: the fun look on it at noon. The thiftle is there on its rock, and shakes its beard to the wind. The flower hangs its heavy head, waving, at times, to the gale. "Why dost thou awake me, O gale," it feems to fay, "I am covered with the drops of heaven? The time of my fading is near, the blast that shall scatter my leaves. Tomorrow shall the traveller come; he that faw me in my beauty shall come. His eyes will fearch the field, but they will not find me?" So thall they fearch in vain, for the voice of Cona, after it has failed in the field. The hunter thall come forth in the morning, and the voice of my harp shall not be heard. "Where is the fon of carborne Fingal?" The tear will be on his cheek! Then come thou, O Malvina, with all thy music, come. Lay Ossian in the plain of Lutha: let his tomb rife in the lovely field.

* Lu:ha, fwift ftream.

MALVINA! where art thou, with thy fongs, with the foft found of thy steps? Son + of Alpin art thou near? where is the daughter of Toscar? " I passed, O fon of Fingal, by Tor-lutha's mosfy walls. The smoke of the hall was ceased. Silence was among the trees of the hill. The voice of the chace was over. I faw the daughters of the bow. I asked about Malvina, but they answered not. They turned their faces away: thin darkness covered their beauty. They were like flars, on a rainy hill, by night, each looking faintly thro' her mift."

PLEASANT || be thy rest, O lovely beam! foon haft thou fet on our hills! The fteps of thy departure were flately, like the moon on the blue, trembling wave. But thou haft left us in darkness, first of the maids of Lutha! We sit, at the rock, and there is no voice; no light but the meteor of fire! Soon hast thou set, O Malvina, daughter of generous Toscar! But thou risest like the beam of the east, among the spirits of thy friends, where they sit, in their stormy halls, the chambers of the thunder! A cloud hovers over Cona. Its blue curling sides are high. The winds are beneath it, with their wings. Within it is the dwelling * of Fingal. There the hero sits in darkness. His airy spear is in his hand. His shield half covered with clouds, is like the darkened moon; when one half still remains in the wave, and the other looks sickly on the field!

[†] His father was one of Fingal's principal bards, and he had a poetical genius.

^{||} Offian fpeaks. He calls Malvina a beam of light, and continues the metaphor throughout the paragraph.

His friends fit around the king, on mift! They hear the fongs of Ullin: he firikes the half-viewless harp. He raises the feeble voice. The lesser heroes, with a thousand meteors, light the airy hall. Malvina rises, in the midst; a blush is on her cheek. She beholds the unknown faces of her fathers. She turns aside her humid eyes. "Art thou come so soon?" faid Fingal, "daughter of generous Toscar. Sadnefs dwells in the halls of Lutha. My aged fon * is fad! I hear the breeze of Cona, that was wont to lift thy heavy locks. It comes to the hall, but thou art not there. Its voice is mournful among the arms of thy fathers! Go, with thy ruflling wing, O breeze! figh on Malvina's tomb. It rifes yonder beneath the rock, at the blue ftream of Lutha. The maids † are departed to their place. Thou alone, O breeze, mournest there!"

^{*} The description of this ideal palace of Fingal is agreeable to the notions of those times, concerning the state of the deceased, who were supposed to pursue, after death, the pleafures and employments of their former life. The situation of the Celtic heroes, in their separate state, if not entirely happy, is more agreeable, than the notions of the antient Greeks concerning their departed heroes.

But who comes from the dusky west, supported on a cloud? A smile is on his grey, watry face. His locks of mist fly on wind. He bends forward on his airy spear. It is thy father, Malvina! "Why shinest thou, so soon, on our clouds," he says, "O lovely light of Lutha! But thou wert sad, my daughter. Thy friends had passed away. The sons of little men the were in the hall. None remained of the heroes, but Ossian king of spears!"

^{*} Offian; who had a great f.iendship for Malvina, both on account of her love for his son Oscar, and her attention to himself.

[†] That is, the young virgins who fung the funeral elegy over her tomb.

[‡] Tradition is entirely filent concerning what paffed in the north, immediately after the death of Fingal and all his heroes; by which it would feem that the actions of their fucceffors were not to be compared to those of the renowned Fingalians.

AND doft thou remember Offian, car-borne Tofcar*, fon of Conloch? The battles of our youth were many. Our fwords went together to the field. They faw us coming like two falling rocks. The fons of the ftranger fled. "There come the warriors of Cona!" they faid. "Their fteps are in the paths of the flying!" Draw near, fon of Alpin, to the fong of the aged. The deeds of other times are in my foul. My memory beams on the days that are paft. On the days of mighty Tofcar, when our path was in the deep. Draw near, fon of Alpin, to the laft found of the voice of Cona!

The king of Morven commanded. I raifed my fails to the wind. Tofcar chief of Lutha flood at my fide, I rose on the dark-blue wave, Our course was to sea-surrounded Berrathon †, the isle of many storms. There dwelt, with his locks of age, the stately strength of Larthmor. Larthmor, who spread the feast of shells to Fingal, when he went to Starno's halls, in the days of Agandecca. But when the chief was old, the pride of his son arose; the pride of fair-haired Uthal, the love of a thousand maids. He bound ^{*} Tofcar was the fon of that Conloch, who was also father to the lady, whose unfortunate death is related in the last episode of the second book of Fingal.

[†] Barrathon, a promontory in the midst of avaves.

the aged Larthmor, and dwelt in his founding halls!

Long pined the king in his cave, befide his rolling fea. Day did not come to his dwelling; nor the burning oak by night. But the wind of ocean was there, and the parting beam of the moon. The red ftar looked on the king, when it trembled on the western wave. Snitho came to Selma's hall: Snitho the friend of Larthmor's youth. He told of the king of Berrathon: the wrath of Fingal arose. Thrice he assumed the spear, resolved to stretch his hand to Uthal. But the memory * of his deeds rose before the king. He sent his son and Toscar. Our joy was great on the rolling sea. We often half-unsheathed our swords. For never before had we fought alone, in battles of the spear.

NIGHT came down on the ocean. The winds departed on their wings. Cold and pale is the moon. The red fiars lift their heads on high. Our courfe is flow along the coaft of Berrathon. The white waves tumble on the rocks. "What voice is that," faid Tofcar, "which comes between the founds of the waves? It is foft but mournful, like the voice of departed bards. But I behold a maid *. She fits on the rock alone. Her head bends on her arm of fnow. Her dark hair is in the wind. Hear, fon of Fingal, her fong, it is smooth as the gliding stream." We came to the filent bay, and heard the maid of night.

^{*} The meaning is, that Fingal remembered his own great actions, and confequently would not fully them by engaging in a petty war against Uthal, who was so far his inferior in valour and power.

"How long will ye roll around me, blue-tumbling waters of ocean? My dwelling was not always in caves, nor beneath the whifiling tree. The feaft was fpread in Torthóma's hall. My father delighted in my voice. The youths beheld me in the fteps of my lovelinefs. They bleffed the dark-haired Nina-thoma. It was then thou didft come, O Uthal! like the fun of heaven! The fouls of the virgins are thine, fon of generous Larthmor! But why doft thou leave me alone, in the midft of roaring waters? Was my foul dark with thy death? Did my white hand lift the fword? Why then haft thou left me alone, king of high Finthormo †!"

THE tear started from my eye, when I heard the voice of the maid. I stood before her in my arms. I spoke the words of peace! "Lovely [&]quot; Nina-thoma, the daughter of Torth ma, who had been confined to a defart island by her lover Uthal.

⁺ Finthormo, the palace of Uthal. The names in this epifode are not of a Celtic original.

dweller of the cave! what figh is in thy breaft? Shall Offian lift his fword in thy presence, the destruction of thy foes? Daughter of Torthóma, rise. I have heard the words of thy grief. The race of Morven are around thee, who never injured the weak. Come to our dark-bosomed ship! thou brighter than that setting moon! Our course is to the rocky Berrathon, to the ecchoing walls of Finthormo." She came in her beauty; she came with all her lovely steps. Silent joy brightened in her face; as when the shadows sly from the field of spring; the blue-stream is rolling in brightness, and the green bush bends over its course!

THE morning rose with its beams. We came to Rothma's bay. A boar rushed from the wood: my spear pierced his side, and he fe'll. I rejoiced over the blood *. I foresaw my growing same. But now the sound of Uthal's train came, from the high Finthormo. They spread over the heath to the chace of the boar. Himself comes slowly on, in the pride of his strength. He lists two pointed spears. On his side is the hero's Offian might have thought that his killing a boar on his first landing in Berrathon, was a good omen of his suture success in that island. The present Highlanders look, with a degree of supersition, upon the success of their first action, after they have engaged in any desperate undertaking.

fword. Three youths carry his polithed bows. The bounding of five dogs is before him. His heroes move on, at a diffance, admiring the fteps of the king. Stately was the fon of Larthmor! but his foul was dark! Dark as the troubled face of the moon, when it foretels the ftorms!

We rose on the heath before the king. He stopt in the midst of his course. His heroes gathered around. A gray-haired bard advanced. "Whence are the sons of the strangers!" began the bard of song. "The children of the unhappy come to Berrathon; to the sword of carborne Uthal. He spreads no feast in his hall. The blood of strangers is on his streams. If from Selma's walls ye some, from the mosty walls of Fingal, chuse three youths to go to your king to tell of the fall of his people. Perhaps the hero may come and pour his blood on Uthal's sword. So shall the same of Finthormo arise, like the growing tree of the vale!"

"NEVER will it rife, O bard," I faid in the pride of my wrath. "He would thrink from the prefence of Fingal, whose eyes are the slames of death. The son of Comhal comes, and kings vanish before him. They are rolled together, like mist, by the breath of his rage. Shall three tell to Fingal, that his people fell?

Yes! they may tell it, bard! but his people shall fall with fame!"

I stood in the darkness of my strength. Tofcar drew his fword at my fide. The foe came on like a stream. The mingled found of death arose. Man took man, shield met shield; fleel mixed its beams with fleel. Darts hifs thro' air. Spears ring on mails. Swords on broken bucklers bound. As the noise of an aged grove beneath the roaring wind, when a thousand ghosts break the trees by night, fuch was the din of arms! But Uthal fell beneath my fword. The fons of Berrathon fled. It was then I faw him in his beauty, and the tear hung in my eye! "Thou art fallen *, young tree," I faid, " with all thy beauty round thee. Thou art fallen on thy plains, and the field is bare. The winds come from the defart! there is no found in thy leaves! Lovely art thou in death, fon of car-borne Larthmor."

NINA-THOMA fat on the thore. She heard the found of battle. She turned her red eyes on ^{*} To mourn over the fall of their enemies, was a practice univerfal among the Celtic heroes This is more agreeable to humanity, than the shameful insulting of the dead, so common in Homer, and after him, fervilely copied by all his imitators, the humane Virgil not excepted, who have been more successful in borrowing the imperfections of that great poet, than in their imitations of his beauties.

Lethmal, the gray-haired bard of Selma. He alone had remained on the coast, with the daughter of Torthóma. "Son of the times of old!" she faid, "I hear the noise of death. Thy friends have met with Uthal and the chief is low! O that I had remained on the rock, inclosed with the tumbling waves! Then would my foul be fad, but his death would not reach my ear. Art thou fallen on thy heath, O son of high Finthormo! Thou didst leave me on a rock, but my soul was full of thee. Son of high Finthormo! art thou fallen on thy heath?"

She rose pale in her tears. She saw the bloody shield of Uthal. She saw it in Ossian's hand. Her steps were distracted on the heath. She slew. She sound him. She fell. Her soul came forth in a sigh. Her hair is spread on his sace. My bursting tears descend. A tomb arose on the unhappy. My song of woe was heard. "Rest, hapless children of youth! Rest at the noise of that mostly stream! The virgins will see your tomb, at the chace, and turn away their weeping eyes. Your same will be in song. The voice of the harp will be heard in your praise. The daughters of Selma shall hear it: your renown shall be in other lands. Rest, children of youth, at the noise of the mostly stream."

Two days we remained on the coast. The heroes of Berrathon convened. We brought Larthmor to his halls. The feast of shells is spread. The joy of the aged was great. He looked to the arms of his fathers. The arms which he left in his hall, when the pride of Uthal rose. We were renowned before Larthmor. He blessed the chiess of Morven. He knew not that his son was low, the stately strength of Uthal! They had told, that he had retired to the woods, with the tears of grief. They had told it, but he was silent in the tomb of Rothma's heath.

On the fourth day we raifed our fails, to the roar of the northern wind. Larthmor came to the coast. His bards exalted the fong. The joy of the king was great, he looked to Rothma's gloomy heath. He saw the tomb of his son. The memory of Uthal rose. "Who of my heroes," he said, "lies there? he seems to have been of the kings of men. Was he renowned in my halls, before the pride of Uthal rose?" Ye are silent, sons of Berrathon! is the king of heroes low? My heart melts for thee, O Uthal! though thy hand was against thy father. O that I had remained in the cave! that my son had dwelt in Finthormo! I might have heard the tread of his feet, when he went to the chace of the boar. I might have heard his voice on the blast of my cave. Then would my foul be glad: but now darkness dwells in my halls."

Such were my deeds, fon of Alpin, when the arm of my youth was firong. Such * the actions of Toscar, the car-borne fon of Conloch. But Tofcar is on his flying cloud. I am alone at Lutha. My voice is like the last found of the wind, when it forfakes the woods. But Offian shall not be long alone. He fees the mist that shall receive his ghost. He beholds the mist that shall form his robe, when he appears on his hills. The fons of feeble men shall behold me, and admire the stature of the chiefs of old. They shall creep to their caves. They shall look to the sky with fear: for my steps shall be in the clouds. Darkness shall roll on my side.

LEAD, fon of Alpin, lead the aged to his woods. The winds begin to rife. The dark wave of the lake refounds. Bends there not a tree from Mora with its branches bare? It bends, fon of Alpin, in the ruftling blaft. My harp hangs on a blafted branch. The found of its strings is mournful. Does the wind touch thee, O harp, or is it some passing ghost! It is the hand of Malvina! Bring me the harp, fon of Alpin. Another fong shall rife. My foul shall depart in the found. My fathers shall hear it in their airy hall. Their dim faces thall hang, with joy, from their clouds; and their hands receive their fon. The aged oak bends over the stream. It fighs with all its moss. The withered fern whistles near, and mixes, as it waves, with Offian's hair.

^{*} Offian speaks,

"STRIKE the harp and raise the song: be near, with all your wings, ye winds. Bear the mournful found away to Fingal's airy hall. Bear it to Fingal's hall, that he may hear the voice of his fon. The voice of him that praifed the mighty!"

"THE blaft of north opens thy gates, O king. I behold thee fitting on mift, dimly gleaming in all thine arms. Thy form now is not the terror of the valiant. It is like a watery cloud; when we fee the flars behind it, with their weeping eyes. Thy fhield is the aged moon: thy fword a vapour half-kindled with fire. Dim and feeble is the chief, who travelled in brightness before! But thy fleps * are on the winds of the defart. The ftorms are darkening in thy hand. Thou takest the sun in thy wrath, and hidest him in thy clouds. The sons of little men are asraid. A thousand showers descend. But when thou comest forth in thy mildness; the gale of the morning is near thy course. The sun laughs in his blue fields. The grey stream winds in its vale. The bushes shake their green heads in the wind. The roes bound towards the defart."

^{*} This description of the power of Fingal over the winds and storms, and the image of his taking the fun, and hiding him in the clouds, do not correspond with the preceding paragraph, where he is represented as a feeble ghost, and no more the TERROR OF THE VALIANT; but it agrees with the notion of the times concerning the fouls of the deceased, who, it was supposed, had the command of the winds and storms, but took no concern in the affairs of men.

"THERE is a murmur in the heath! the flormy winds abate! I hear the voice of Fingal. Long has it been absent from mine ear! " Come, Offian, come away," he fays. "Fingal has received his fame. We passed away, like flames that had shone for a season. Our departure was in renown. Though the plains of our battles are dark and filent; our fame is in the four grey stones. The voice of Ossian has been heard. The harp has been strung in Selma. " Come Offian, come away," he fays, "come, fly with thy fathers on clouds." I come, I come, thou king of men! The life of Offian fails. I begin to vanish on Cona. My steps are not seen in Selma. Befide the stone of Mora I shall fall afleep. The winds whiftling in my grey hair, shall not awaken me. Depart on thy wings, O wind: thou caust not disturb the rest of the bard.

The night is long, but his eyes are heavy. Depart, thou rustling blast."

"But why art thou fad, fon of Fingal? Why grows the cloud of thy foul? The chiefs of other times are departed. They have gone without their fame. The fons of future years shall pass away. Another race shall arise. The people are like the waves of ocean: like the leaves of woody Morven, they pass away in the rustling blast, and other leaves lift their green heads on high."

DID thy beauty last, O Ryno*? Stood the strength of car-borne Oscar? Fingal himself departed.

* Ryno, the son of Fingal, who was killed in Ireland, in the war against Swaran, was remarkable for the beauty of his person, his swiftness and great exploits. Minvane, the daughter of Morni, and sister to Gaul, was in love with Ryno. Her lamentation over her lover sollows.

S HE blufhing fad, from Morven's rocks, bends over the darkly-rolling fea. She fees the youth in all their arms, Where, Ryno, where art thou?

Our dark looks told that he was low! That pale the hero flew on clouds! That in the grass of Morven's hills, his feeble voice was heard in wind!

And is the fon of Fingal fallen on Ullin's mostly plains? Strong was the arm that vanquished him! Ah me! I am alone!

Alone I shall not be, ye winds! that lift my dark-brown hair. My sighs shall not long mix with your stream; for I must sleep with kyno.

departed. The halls of his fathers forgot his fleps. Shalt thou then remain, thou aged bard! when the mighty have failed? But my fame shall remain, and grow like the oak of Morven; which lists its broad head to the storm, and rejoices in the course of the wind!

I see thee not, with beauty's steps, returning from the chace. The night is round Minvane's love. Dark silence dwells with Ryno.

Where are thy dogs, and where thy bow? Thy fhield that was fo strong? Thy sword like heaven's descending fire? The bloody spear of Ryno?

I see them mixed in thy deep ship; I see them stained with blood. No arms are in thy narrow hall, O darkly-dwelling Ryno!

When will the morning come, and fay, " arife, thou king of spears! arife, the hunters are abroad. The hinds are near thee, Ryno!"

Away, thou fair-haired morning, away! the flumbering king hears thee not! The hinds bound over his narrow tomb; for death dwells round young Ryno.

But I will tread foftly, my king! and steal to the bed of thy repose. Minvane will lie in silence, nor disturb the slumbering Ryno.

The maids shall seek me; but they shall not find me: they shall follow my departure with songs. But I shall not hear you, O maids: I sleep with fair-haired Ryno.

A

DISSERTATION

CONCERNING THE

ÆRA OF OSSIAN.

A

DISSERTATION

CONCERNING THE

ÆRA OF OSSIAN.

NQUIRIES into the antiquities of nations afford more pleafure than any real advantage to mankind. The ingenious may form fyslems of history on probabilities and a few facts; but at a great distance of time, their accounts must be vague and uncertain. The infancy of states and kingdoms is as destitute of great events, as of the means of transmitting them to posterity. The arts of polished life, by which alone facts can be preferved with certainty, are the production of a well-formed community. It is then historians begin to write, and public transactions to be worthy remembrance. The actions of former times are left in obscurity, or magnified by uncertain traditions. Hence it is that we find fo P 2 much much of the marvellous in the origin of every nation; posterity being always ready to believe any thing, however fabulous, that reflects honour on their ancestors.

THE Greeks and Romans were remarkable for this weakness. They swallowed the most abfurd fables concerning the high antiquities of their respective nations. Good historians, however, rose very early amongst them, and transmitted, with luftre, their great actions to posterity. It is to them that they owe that unrivalled fame they now enjoy, while the great actions of other nations are involved in fables, or lost in obscurity. The Celtic nations afford a striking instance of this kind. They, though once the masters of Europe from the mouth of the river Oby *, in Russia, to Cape Finisterre, the western point of Gallicia in Spain, are very little mentioned in history. They trusted their fame to tradition and the fongs of their bards, which, by the viciffitude of human affairs, are long fince loft. Their ancient language is the only monument that remains of them; and the traces of it being found in places fo widely distant from each other, ferves only to shew the extent of their ancient power, but throws very little light on their history.

Of all the Celtic nations, that which poffeffed old Gaul is the most renowned; not perhaps on account of worth superior to the rest, but for their wars with a people who had historians to transmit the same of their enemies, as well as their own, to posterity. Britain was first peopled by them, according to the testimony of the best authors *; its situation in respect to Gaul makes the opinion probable; but what puts it beyond all dispute, is that the same customs and language prevailed among the inhabitants of both in the days of Julius Cæsar †.

The colony from Gaul possessed themselves, at first, of that part of Britain which was next to their own country; and spreading northward, by degrees, as they increased in numbers, peopled the whole island. Some adventurers passing over from those parts of Britain that are within sight of Ireland, were the sounders of the Irish nation: which is a more probable story than the idle sables of Milesian and Gallician colonies. Diodorus Siculus ‡ mentions it as a thing well known in his time, that the inhabitants of Ireland were originally Britons, and his testimony is unquestionable, when we consider that, for many ages, the language and customs of both nations were the fame.

^{*} Cæf. 1. 5. Tac. Agric. c. z. † Cæfar. Pomp. Mel. Tacitus. ‡ Diod. Sic. 1. 5.

TACITUS was of opinion that the ancient Caledonians were of German extract; but even the ancient Germans themselves were Gauls. The present Germans, properly so called, were not the fame with the ancient Celtx. The manners and customs of the two nations were fimilar; but their language different. The Germans * are the genuine descendants of the ancient Scandinavians, who croffed, in an early period, the Baltic. The Celtæ +, anciently, fent many colonies into Germany, all of whom retained their own laws, language, and customs, till they were dissipated, in the Roman empire; and it is of them, if any colonies came from Germany into Scotland, that the ancient Caledonians were defcended.

Bur whether the Caledonians were a colony of the Celtic Germans, or the fame with the Gauls that first possessed themselves of Britain, is a matter of no moment at this distance of time. Whatever their origin was, we find them very numerous in the time of Julius Agricola, which is a presumption that they were long before settled in the country. The form of their government was a mixture of aristocracy and monarchy, as it was in all the countries where the Druids bore the chief fway. This order of men feems to have been formed on the fame principles with the Dactyli Idai and Curetes of the ancients. Their pretended intercourse with heaven, their magic and divination were the fame. The knowlege of the Druids in natural causes, and the properties of certain things, the fruit of the experiments of ages, gained them a mighty reputation among the people. The efteem of the populace foon increased into a veneration for the order; which these cunning and ambitious priests took care to improve, to fuch a degree, that they, in a manner, ingroffed the management of civil, as well as religious, matters. It is generally allowed that they did not abuse this extraordinary power; the preferving their character of fanctity was fo effential to their influence, that they never broke out into violence or oppression. The chiefs were allowed to execute the laws, but the legislative power was entirely in the hands of the Druids *. It was by their authority that the tribes were united, in times of the greatest danger, under one head. This temporary king, or Vergobretus +, was chosen by them, and generally laid down his office at the end of the war. These priests enjoyed long this extraordinary privilege among the Celtic nations who lay beyond the pale of the Roman empire. It was in the beginning of the fecond century that their power among the Caledonians begun to decline. The traditions concerning Trathal and Cormac, ancestors to Fingal, are full of the particulars of the fall of the Druids: a fingular fate, it must be owned, of priests, who had once established their superstition!

^{*} Strabo, 1.7. + Caf. 1.6. Liv. 1.5. Tac de mor. Germmonarchy

^{*} Cxf. 1. 6. † Fer-gubreth, the man to judge.

THE continual wars of the Caledonians against the Romans hindered the better fort from initiating themselves, as the custom formerly was, into the order of the Druids. The precepts of their religion were confined to a few, and were not much attended to by a people inured to war. The Vergobretus, or chief magistrate, was chosen without the concurrence of the hierarchy, or continued in his office against their will. Continual power strengthened his interest among the tribes, and enabled him to send down, as hereditary to his posterity, the office he had only received himself by election.

On occasion of a new war against the King of the World, as tradition emphatically calls the Roman emperor, the Druids, to vindicate the honour of the order, began to resume their ancient privilege of chusing the Vergobretus. Garmal, the son of Tarno, being deputed by them, came to the grandfather of the celebrated Fingal, who was then Vergobretus, and commanded him, in the name of the whole order, to lay down his office. Upon his refusal, a civil war commenced, which foon ended in almost the total extinction of the religious order of the Druids. A few that remained, retired to the dark recesses of their groves, and the caves they had formerly used for their meditations. It is then we find them in the circle of stones, and unheeded by the world. A total difregard for the order, and utter abhorrence of the Druidical rites enfued. Under this cloud of public hate, all that had any knowlege of the religion of the Druids became extinct, and the nation fellinto the last degree of ignorance of their rites and ceremonies.

them,

It is no matter of wonder then, that Fingal and his fon Offian difliked the Druids, who were the declared enemies to their fuccession in the fupreme magistracy. It is a fingular case, it must be allowed, that there are no traces of religion in the poems afcribed to Offian; as the poetical compositions of other nations are fo closely connected with their mythology. But gods are not necessary, when the poet has genius. It is hard to account for it to those who are not made acquainted with the manner of the old Scottish bards. That race of men carried their notions of martial honour to an extravagant pitch. Any aid given their heroes in battle, was thought to derogate from their fame; and the bards immediately transferred the glory of the action to him who had given that aid.

HAD the poet brought down gods, as often as Homer hath done, to affift his heroes, his work had not confifted of eulogiums on men, but of hymns to fuperior beings. Those who write in the Galic language feldom mention religion in their profane poetry; and when they professedly write of religion, they never mix with their compositions, the actions of their heroes. This custom alone, even though the religion of the Druids had not been previously extinguished, may, in some measure, excuse the author's silence concerning the religion of ancient times.

To allege, that a nation is void of all religion, would betray ignorance of the hiftory of mankind. The traditions of their fathers, and their own observations on the works of nature, together with that superstition which is inherent in the human frame, have, in all ages, raised in the minds of men some idea of a superior being. Hence it is, that in the darkest times, and amongst the most barbarous nations, the very populace themselves had some faint notion, at least, of a divinity. The Indians, who worship no God, believe that he exists. It would be doing injuffice to the author of thefe poems, to think, that he had not opened his conceptions to that primitive and greatest of all truths. But let his religion be what it will, it is certain he has not alluded to Christianity, or any of its rites, in his poems; which ought to fix his opinions, at least, to an æra prior to that religion. Conjectures, on this fubject, must supply the place of proof. The perfecution begun by Dioclesian, in the year 203, is the most probable time in which the first dawning of Christianity in the north of Britain can be fixed. The humane and mild character of Conflantius Chlorus, who commanded then in Britain, induced the perfecuted Christians to take refuge under him. Some of them, through a zeal to propagate their tenets, or through fear, went beyond the pale of the Roman empire, and fettled among the Caledonians; who were ready to hearken to their doctrines, if the religion of the Druids was exploded long before.

THESE missionaries, either through choice, or to give more weight to the doctrine they advanced, took possession of the cells and groves of the Druids: and it was from this retired life they had the name of Culdees*, which in the language of the country fignified fequestered persons. It was with one of the Culdees that Offian, in his extreme old age, is faid to have disputed concerning the Christian religion. This dispute, they fay, is extant, and is couched in verse, according to the custom of the times. The extreme ignorance on the part of Offian, of the Christian tenets, thews, that that religion had only been lately introduced, as it is not eafy to conceive, how one of the first rank could be totally unacquainted with a religion that had been known for any time in the country. The dispute bears the genuine marks of antiquity. The obfolete phrases and expressions peculiar to the times, prove it to be no forgery. If Ossian then lived at the introduction of Christianity, as by all appearance he did, his epoch will be the latter end of the third, and beginning of the fourth century. Tradition here steps in with a kind of proof.

^{*} Culdich.

THE exploits of Fingal against Caracul*, the fon of the king of the world, are among the first brave actions of his youth. A complete poem, which relates to this subject, is printed in this collection.

^{*} Carac'huil, terrible eye. Carac-'healla, terrible look. Caracchallamh, a fort of upper garment.

In the year 210 the emperor Severus, after returning from his expedition against the Caledonians, at York fell into the tedious illness of which he afterwards died. The Caledonians and Maiatæ, refuming courage from his indisposition, took arms in order to recover the possesfions they had loft. The enraged emperor commanded his army to march into their country, and to destroy it with fire and sword. His orders were but ill executed, for his fon, Caracalla, was at the head of the army, and his thoughts were entirely taken up with the hopes of his father's death, and with schemes to supplant his brother Geta.-He fcarcely had entered the enemy's country, when news was brought him that Severus was dead .--- A fudden peace is patched up with the Caledonians, and, as it appears from Dion Cassius, the country they had loft to Severus was reftored to them.

THE Caracul of Fingal is no other than Caracalla, who, as the fon of Severus, the Emperor of Rome, whose dominions were extended almost over the known world, was not without reason called the Son of the King of the world. The space of time between 211, the year Severus died, and the beginning of the fourth century, is not so great, but Ossian the son of Fingal, might have seen the Christians whom the persecution pale of the Roman empire.

224 A DISSERTATION concerning the cution under Dioclefian had driven beyond the

In one of the many lamentations on the death of Ofcar, a battle which he fought against Caros, king of thips, on the banks of the winding Carun *, is mentioned among his great actions. It is more than probable, that the Caros mentioned here, is the fame with the noted usurper Carausius, who assumed the purple in the year 287, and feizing on Britain, defeated the emperor Maximian Herculius, in feveral naval engagements, which gives propriety to his being called the King of Ships. The winding Carun is that finall river retaining still the name of Carron, and runs in the neighbourhood of Agricola's wall, which Caraufius repaired to obstruct the incursions of the Caledonians. Several other passages in traditions allude to the wars of the Romans; but the two just mentioned clearly fix the epocha of Fingal to the third century; and this account agrees exactly with the Irish histories, which place the death of Fingal, the fon of Comhal, in the year 283, and that of Ofcar and their own celebrated Cairbre, in the year 296.

Some people may imagine, that the allusions to the Roman history might have been derived by tradition, from learned men, more than from ancient poems. This must then have happened at least three ages ago, as these allusions are mentioned often in the compositions of those times.

^{*} Car-avon, Winding river.

EVERY one knows what a cloud of ignorance and barbarism overspread the north of Europe three hundred years ago. The minds of men, addicted to superstition, contracted a narrowness that destroyed genius. Accordingly we find the compositions of those times trivial and puerile to the last degree. But let it be allowed, that, amidst all the untoward circumstances of the age, a genius might arise, it is not easy to determine what could induce him to allude to the Roman times. We find no fact to savour any designs which could be entertained by any man who lived in the fifteenth century.

THE strongest objection to the antiquity of the poems now given to the public under the name of Ossian, is the improbability of their being handed down by tradition through so many centuries. Ages of barbarism some will say, could not produce poems abounding with the disinterested and generous sentiments so conspicuous in the compositions of Ossian; and could these ages produce them, it is impossible but they must be lost, or altogether corrupted in a long succession of barbarous generations.

Vol. II.

ZHEST

THESE objections naturally fuggest themselves to men unacquainted with the ancient state of the northern parts of Britain. The bards, who were an inferior order of the Druids, did not share their bad fortune. They were spared by the victorious king, as it was through their means only he could hope for immortality to his fame. They attended him in the camp, and contributed to establish his power by their fongs. His great actions were magnified, and the populace, who had no ability to examine into his character narrowly, were dazzled with his fame in the rhimes of the bards. In the mean time, men assumed sentiments that are rarely to be met with in an age of barbarism. The bards who were originally the disciples of the Druids, had their minds opened, and their ideas enlarged, by being initiated in the learning of that celebrated order. They could form a perfect hero in their own minds, and afcribe that character to their prince. The inferior chiefs made this ideal character the model of their conduct, and by degrees brought their minds to that generous fpirit which breathes in all the poetry of the times. The prince, flattered by his bards, and rivalled by his own heroes, who imitated his character as described in the eulogies of his poets, endeavoured to excel his people in merit, as he was above them in flation. This emulation continuing, formed at last the general character of the nation, happily compounded of what is noble in barbarity, and virtuous and generous in a polithed people.

WHEN virtue in peace, and bravery in war, are the characteristics of a nation, their actions become interesting, and their fame worthy of immortality. A generous spirit is warmed with noble actions, and becomes ambitious of perpetuating them. This is the true fource of that divine inspiration, to which the poets of all ages pretended. When they found their themes inadequate to the warmth of their imaginations, they varnished them over with fables, supplied by their own fancy, or furnished by absurd traditions. These fables, however ridiculous, had their abettors; posterity either implicitly believed them, or through a vanity natural to mankind, pretended that they did. They loved to place the founders of their families in the days of fable, when poetry, without the fear of contradiction, could give what characters she pleased of her heroes. It is to this vanity that we owe the prefervation of what remain of the more ancient poems. Their poetical merit made their heroes famous in a country where heroism was much effectmed and admired. The posterity of those heroes.

Q 2

heroes, or those who pretended to be descended from them, heard with pleasure the eulogiums of their ancestors; bards were employed to repeat the poems, and to record the connection of their patrons with chiefs fo renowned. Every chief in process of time had a bard in his family, and the office became at last hereditary. By the fuccession of these bards, the poems concerning the ancestors of the family were handed down from generation to generation; they were repeated to the whole clan on folemn occasions, and always alluded to in the new compositions of the bards. This cuffom came down to near our own times; and after the bards were discontinued, a great number in a clan retained by memory, or committed to writing, their compositions, and founded the antiquity of their families on the authority of their poems.

The use of letters was not known in the north of Europe till long after the institution of the bards: the records of the families of their patrons, their own, and more ancient poems were handed down by tradition. Their poetical compositions were admirably contrived for that purpose. They were adapted to music; and the most persect harmony was observed. Each verse was so connected with those which preceded or followed it, that if one line had been remembered in a stanza, it was almost impossible to forget the rest. The cadences followed in so natural a gradation, and the words were fo adapted to the common turn of the voice, after it is raifed to a certain key, that it was almost impossible, from a fimilarity of found, to substitute one word for another. This excellence is peculiar to the Celtic tongue, and is perhaps to be met with in no other language. Nor does this choice of words clog the fenfe or weaken the expression. The numerous flections of consonants, and variation in declenfion, make the language very copious.

THE descendants of the Celtæ, who inhabited Britain and its isles, were not fingular in this method of preferving the most precious monuments of their nation. The ancient laws of the Greeks were couched in verse, and handed down by tradition. The Spartans, through a long habit, became fo fond of this cuftom, that they would never allow their laws to be committed to writing. The actions of great men, and the culogiums of kings and heroes, were preferved in the fame manner. All the historical monuments of the old Germans were comprehended in their ancient fongs *! which were either hymns to their gods, or elegies in praise of their heroes, and were intended to perpetuate the great events in their nation which were carefully interwoven with them. This species of composition was not committed to writing, but delivered by oral tradition *. The care they took to have the poems taught to their children, the uninterrupted custom of repeating them upon certain occasions, and the happy measure of the verse, ferved to preferve them for a long time uncorrupted. This oral chronicle of the Germans was not forgot in the eighth century, and it probably would have remained to this day, had not learning, which thinks every thing, that is not committed to writing, fabulous, been introduced. It was from poetical traditions that Garcillasso composed his account of the Yncas of Peru. The Peruvians had loft all other monuments of their history, and it was from ancient poems which his mother, a princess of the blood of the Yncas, taught him in his youth, that he collected the materials of his hiftory. If other nations then, that had been often overrun by enemies, and had fent abroad and received colonies, could, for many ages, preferve, by oral tradition, their laws and histories uncorrupted, it is much more probable that the ancient Scots, a people fo free of intermixture with foreigners, and fo firongly attached to the memory of their ancestors, had the works of their bards handed down with great purity.

^{*} Tacitus de mor. Germ.

^{*} Abbé de la Bleterie Remarques sur la Germaine.

WHAT is advanced, in this short Dissertation, it must be confessed, is mere conjecture. Beyond the reach of records, is settled a gloom, which no ingenuity can penetrate. The manners described, in these poems, suit the ancient Celtic times, and no other period, that is known in history. We must, therefore, place the heroes far back in antiquity; and it matters little, who were their cotemporaries in other parts of the world. If we have placed Fingal in his proper period, we do honour to the manners of barbarous times. He exercised every manly virtue in Caledonia, while Heliogabalus difgraced human nature at Rome.

A

DISSERTATION

CONCERNING THE

POEMS OF OSSIAN.

A

DISSERTATION

CONCERNING THE

POEMS OF OSSIAN.

THE history of those nations, who originally possessed the north of Europe, is less known than their manners. Destitute of the use of letters, they themselves had not the means of transmitting their great actions to remote posserity. Foreign writers saw them only at a distance, and described them as they found them. The vanity of the Romans induced them to consider the nations beyond the pale of their empire as barbarians; and consequently their history unworthy of being investigated. Their manners and singular character were matters of curiosity, as they committed them to record. Some men, otherwise of great merit among ourselves, give into consined ideas on this fubject. Having early imbibed their idea of exalted manners from the Greek and Roman writers, they scarcely ever afterwards have the fortitude to allow any dignity of character to any nation destitute of the use of letters.

WITHOUT derogating from the fame of Greece and Rome, we may confider antiquity beyond the pale of their empire worthy of some attention. The nobler passions of the mind never thoot forth more free and unrestrained than in the times we call barbarous. That irregular manner of life, and those manly pursuits from which barbarity takes its name, are highly favorable to a strength of mind unknown in polithed times. In advanced fociety the characters of men are more uniform and difguised. The human passions lie in some degree concealed behind forms, and artificial manners; and the powers of the foul, without an opportunity of exerting them, lose their vigor. The times of regular government, and polithed manners, are therefore to be withed for by the feeble and weak in mind. An unfettled flate, and those convulfions which attend it, is the proper field for an exalted character, and the exertion of great parts. Merit there rifes always fuperior; no fortuitous event can raise the timid and mean into power. To those who look upon antiquity in this light, it is an agreeable prospect; and they alone can have real pleasure in tracing nations to their source.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 237

THE establishment of the Celtic states, in the north of Europe, is beyond the reach of written annals. The traditions and fongs to which they trusted their history, were lost, or altogether corrupted in their revolutions and migrations, which were fo frequent and universal, that no kingdom in Europe is now possessed by its original inhabitants. Societies were formed, and kingdoms erected, from a mixture of nations. who, in process of time, lost all knowlege of their own origin. If tradition could be depended upon, it is only among a people, from all time, free from intermixture with foreigners. We are to look for these among the mountains and inaccessible parts of a country: places, on account of their barrenness, uninviting to an enemy, or whose natural strength enabled the natives to repel invafions. Such are the inhabitants of the mountains of Scotland. We, accordingly, find, that they differ materially from those who possess the low and more fertile part of the kingdom. Their language is pure and original, and their manners are those of an ancient and unmixed race of men. Conscious of their own antiquity. they long despised others, as a new and mixed people. As they lived in a country only fit for pasture, they were free from that toil and business, which engross the attention of a commercial people. Their amusement confisted in hearing or repeating their songs and traditions, and these intirely turned on the antiquity of their nation, and the exploits of their forefathers. It is no wonder, therefore, that there are more remains of antiquity among them, than among any other people in Europe. Traditions, however, concerning remote periods, are only to be regarded, in so far as they co-incide with cotemporary writers of undoubted credit and veracity.

No writers began their accounts from a more early period, than the historians of the Scots nation. Without records, or even tradition itfelf, they give a long list of ancient kings, and a detail of their transactions, with a scrupulous exactness. One might naturally suppose, that, when they had no authentic annals, they should, at least, have recourse to the traditions of their country, and have reduced them into a regular system of history. Of both they seem to have been equally destitute. Born in the low country, and strangers to the ancient language of their nation, they contented themselves with copying from one another, and retailing the same sictions, in a new colour and dress.

JOHN

JOHN FORDUN was the first who collected those fragments of the Scots history, which had escaped the brutal policy of Edward I. and reduced them into order. His accounts, in fo far as they concerned recent transactions, deferved credit: beyond a certain period, they were fabulous and unfatisfactory. Some time before Fordun wrote, the king of England, in a letter to the pope, had run up the antiquity of his nation to a very remote æra. Fordun, possessed of all the national prejudice of the age, was unwilling that his country should yield, in point of antiquity, to a people, then its rivals and enemies. Destitute of annals in Scotland, he had recourse to Ireland, which, according to the vulgar errors of the times, was reckoned the first habitation of the Scots. He found, there, that the Irith bards had carried their pretentions to antiquity as high, if not beyond any nation in Europe. It was from them he took those improbable fictions, which form the first part of his history.

THE writers that fucceeded Fordun implicitly followed his fystem, though they fometimes varied from him in their relations of particular transactions, and the order of succession of their kings. As they had no new lights, and were, equally with him, unacquainted with the traditions of their country, their histories contain little information concerning the origin of the Scots. Even Buchanan himself, except the elegance and vigour of his stile, has very little to recommend him. Blinded with political prejudices, he seemed more anxious to turn the stations of his predecessors to his own purposes, than to detect their misrepresentations, or investigate truth amidst the darkness which they had thrown round it. It therefore appears, that little can be collected from their own historians, concerning the first migration of the Scots into Britain.

THAT this island was peopled from Gaul admits of no doubt. Whether colonies came afterwards from the north of Europe is a matter of meer speculation. When South-Britain yielded to the power of the Romans, the unconquered nations to the north of the province were diftinguithed by the name of Caledonians. From their very name, it appears, that they were of those Gauls, who possessed themselves originally of Britain. It is compounded of two Celtic words, Caël fignifying Celts, or Gauls, and Dun or Don, a hill; fo that Caël-don, or Caledonians, is as much as to fay, the Celts of the hill country. The Highlanders, to this day, call themselves Caël, their language Caëlic, or Galic, and their country Caëldoch.

Caëldoch, which the Romans foftened into Caledonia. This, of itself, is sufficient to demonstrate, they are the genuine descendents of the ancient Caledonians, and not a pretended colony of Scots, who fettled first in the north, in the third or fourth century.

FROM the double meaning of the word Caël, which fignifies strangers, as well as Gauls, or Celts, fome have imagined, that the ancestors of the Caledonians were of a different race from the rest of the Britons, and that they received their name upon that account. This opinion, fay they, is supported by Tacitus, who, from several circumstances, concludes, that the Caledonians were of German extraction. A discussion of a point fo intricate, at this diffance of time, could neither be fatisfactory nor important.

Towards the latter end of the third, and beginning of the fourth century, we meet with the Scots in the north. Porphyrius * makes the first mention of them about that time. As the Scots were not heard of before that period, most writers supposed them to have been a colony, newly come to Britain, and that the Piets were the only genuine descendents of the ancient Caledonians. This mistake is easily removed. The Caledonians, in process of time, became naturally divided into two distinct nations, as posfessing parts of the country, intirely different in their nature and foil. The western coast of Scotland is hilly and barren; towards the east the country is plain, and fit for tillage. The inhabitants of the mountains, a roving and uncontrouled race of men, lived by feeding of cattle, and what they killed in hunting. Their employment did not fix them to one place. They removed from one heath to another, as fuited best with their convenience or inclination. They were not, therefore, improperly called, by their neighbours, Sculte, or the wandering nation; which is evidently the origin of the Roman name of Scoti.

^{*} St. Hierom, ad Ctefiphon,

On the other hand, the Caledonians, who poffessed the east coast of Scotland, as the division of the country was plain and sertile, applied themselves to agriculture, and raising of corn. It was from this, that the Galic name of the PiEs proceeded; for they are called, in that language, Gruitlnich, i. e. the wheat or corn-eaters. As the PiEts lived in a country so different in its nature from that possessed by the Scots, so their national character suffered a material change. Unobstructed by mountains, or lakes, their communication with one another was free and frequent.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 243

Society, therefore, became fooner established among them, than among the Scots, and, confequently, they were much fooner governed by civil magistrates and laws. This, at last, produced fo great a difference in the manners of the two nations, that they began to forget their common origin, and almost continual quarrels and animofities fubfifted between them. These animosities, after some ages, ended in the subverfion of the Pictish kingdom, but not in the total extirpation of the nation, according to most of the Scots writers, who feemed to think it more for the honour of their countrymen to annihilate, than reduce a rival people under their obedience. It is certain, however, that the very name of the Picts was loft, and those that remained were fo completely incorporated with their conquerors, that they foon loft all memory of their own origin.

THE end of the Pictifh government is placed fo near that period, to which authentic annals reach, that it is matter of wonder, that we have no monuments of their language or history remaining. This favours the fystem I have laid down. Had they originally been of a different race from the Scots, their language of course would be different. The contrary is the case. The names of places in the Pictish dominions, and the very names of their kings, which are handed down to us, are of Galic original, which is a convincing proof, that the two nations were, of old, one and the fame, and only divided into two governments, by the effect which their fituation had upon the genius of the people.

THE name of Piets is faid to have been given by the Romans to the Caledonians, who poffessed the east coast of Scotland, from their painting their bodies. The flory is filly and the argument abfurd. But let us revere antiquity in her very follies. This circumstance made some imagine, that the Picts were of British extract, and a different race of men from the Scots. That more of the Britons, who fled northward from the tyranny of the Romans, fettled in the low country of Scotland, than among the Scots of the mountains, may be eafily imagined, from the very nature of the country. It was they who introduced painting among the Picts. From this circumstance, affirm some antiquaries, proceeded the name of the latter, to diffinguish them from the Scots, who never had that art among them, and from the Britons, who discontinued it after the Roman conquest.

THE Caledonians, most certainly, acquired a confiderable knowlege in navigation, by their living on a coast interfected with many arms of the fea, and, in islands, divided, one from another, by wide and dangerous firths. It is, therefore, highly probable, that they, very early, found their way to the north of Ireland, which is within fight of their own country. That Ireland was first peopled from Britain is, at length. a matter that admits of no doubt. The vicinity of the two islands; the exact correspondence of the ancient inhabitants of both, in point of manners and language, are fufficient proofs, even if we had not the testimony of * authors of undoubted veracity to confirm it. The abettors of the most romantic systems of Irish antiquities allow it; but they place the colony from Britain in an improbable and remote æra. I thall eafily admit, that the colony of the Firbolg, confeffedly the Belgæ of Britain, fettled in the fouth of Ireland, before the Caël, or Caledonians, difcovered the north: but it is not at all likely, that the migration of the Firbolg to Ireland happened many centuries before the christian æra.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 245

The poem of Temora throws confiderable light on this fubject. The accounts given in it agree fo well with what the ancients have delivered, concerning the first population and inhabitants of Ireland, that every unbiaffed prfon will confess them more probable, than the legends handed down, by tradition, in that country. It appears, that, in the days of Trathal, grandfather to Fingal, Ireland was poffeffed by two nations; the Firbolg or Belga of Britain, who inhabited the fouth, and the Cael, who passed over from Caledonia and the Hebrides to Ulster. The two nations, as is usual among an unpolithed and lately fettled people, were divided into finall dynasties, subject to petty kings, or chiefs, independent of one another. In this fituation, it is probable, they continued long, without any material revolution in the state of the island, until Crothar, Lord of Atha, a country in Connaught, the most potent chief of the Firbolg, carried away Conlama, the daughter of Cathmin, a chief of the Caël, who possessed Ulfter.

^{*} Dio. Sic. 1. 5.

Conlama had been betrothed some time before to Turloch, a chief of their own nation. Turloch resented the assront offered him by Crothar, made an irruption into Connaught, and killed Cormul, the brother of Crothar, who came to oppose his progress. Crothar himself then took arms, and either killed or expelled Turloch. The war, upon this, became general, between the two nations: and the Caël were reduced reduced to the last extremity. In this situation, they applied, for aid, to Trathal king of Morven, who fent his brother Conar, already famous for his great exploits, to their relief. Conar, upon his arrival in Ulster, was chosen king, by the unanimous confent of the Caledonian tribes, who poffesfed that country. The war was renewed with vigour and fuccess; but the Firbolg appear to have been rather repelled than fubdued. In fucceeding reigns, we learn from epifodes in the fame poem, that the chiefs of Atha made feveral efforts to become monarchs of Ireland, and to expel the race of Conar.

To Conar fucceeded his fon Cormac, who appears to have reigned long. In his latter days he feems to have been driven to the last extremity, by an infurrection of the Firbolg, who supported the pretentions of the chiefs of Atha to the Irish throne. Fingal, who then was very young, came to the aid of Cormac, totally defeated Colc-ulla, chief of Atha, and re-established Cormac in the fole poffession of all Ireland. It was then he fell in love with, and took to wife, Roscrana, the daughter of Cormac, who was the mother of Offian.

CORMAC was fucceeded in the Irish throne by his fon, Cairbre; Cairbre by Artho, his fon, who was the father of that Cormac, in whose R 4 minority the invasion of Swaran happened, which is the subject of the poem of Fingal. The family of Atha, who had not relinquished their pretentions to the Irish throne, rebelled in the minority of Cormac, defeated his adherents, and murdered him in the palace of Temora. Cairbar, lord of Atha, upon this, mounted the throne. His usurpation soon en ed with his life; for Fingal made an expedition into Ireland, and reflored, after various vicissitudes of fortune, the family of Conar to the possession of the kingdom. This war is the subject of Temora; the events, though certainly heightened and embellished by poetry, seem, notwithstanding, to have their foundation in true history.

TEMORA contains not only the history of the first migration of the Caledonians into Ireland, it also preserves some important facts, concerning the first settlement of the Firbelg, or Belge of Britain, in that kingdom, under their leader Larthon, who was ancestor to Cairbar and Cathmor, who fuccessively mounted the Irish throne, after the death of Cormac, the son of Artho. I forbear to transcribe the passage, on account of its length. It is the song of Fonar, the bard; towards the latter end of the seventh book of Temora. As the generations from Larthon to Cathmor, to whom the episode is addressed, are not marked, as are those of the family of Conar, the first king of Ireland, we can form no judgment of the time of the fettlement of the Firbolg. It is, however, probable, it was fome time before the Cail, or Caledonians, fettled in Ulster. One important fact may be gathered from this hiftory, that the Irith had no king before the latter end of the first century. Fingal lived, it is supposed, in the third century; fo Conar, the first monarch of the Irish, who was his grand-uncle, cannot be placed farther back than the close of the first. To establish this fact, is to lay, at once, aside the pretended antiquities of the Scots and Irith, and to get quit of the long lift of kings which the latter give us for a millennium before.

Or the affairs of Scotland, it is certain, nothing can be depended upon, prior to the reign of Fergus, the fon of Erc, who lived in the fifth century. The true history of Ireland begins fomewhat later than that period. Sir James Ware*, who was indefatigable in his refearches after the antiquities of his country, rejects, as mere fiction and idle romance, all that is related of the ancient Irith, before the time of St. Patrick, and the reign of Leogaire. It is from this confideration, that he begins his history at the introduction of Christianity, remarking, that all that is delivered down, concerning the times of paganifm, were tales of late invention, ffrangely mixed with anachronisms and inconsistencies. Such being the opinion of Ware, who had collected with uncommon industry and zeal. all the real and pretendedly antient manuscripts, concerning the history of his country, we may, on his authority, reject the improbable and felfcondemned tales of Keating and O'Flaherty. Credulous and puerile to the last degree, they have difgraced the antiquities they meant to establish. It is to be withed, that some able Irifhman, who understands the language and records of his country, may redeem, ere it is too late, the genuine antiquities of Ireland, from the hands of these idle fabulists.

^{*} War. de antiq. Hybern. præ. p. 1.

By comparing the liftory in these poems with the legends of the Scots and Irish writers, and, by afterwards examining both by the test of the Roman authors, it is easy to discover which is the most probable. Probability is all that can be established on the authority of tradition, ever dubique and uncertain. But when it favours the hypothesis laid down by cotemporary writers of undoubted veracity, and, as it were, finishes the figure of which they only drew the out-lines, it ought, ought, in the judgment of fober reason, to be preferred to accounts framed in dark and distant periods, with little judgment, and upon no authority.

CONCERNING the period of more than a century, which intervenes between Fingal and the reign of Fergus, the fon of Erc or Arcath, tradition is dark and contradictory. Some trace up the family of Fergus to a fon of Fingal of that name, who makes a confiderable figure in Offian's poems. The three elder fons of Fingal, Offian, Fillan, and Ryno, dying without iffue, the fuccession, of course, devolved upon Fergus, the fourth fon and his posterity. This Fergus, fay fome traditions, was the father of Congal, whose fon was Arcath, the father of Fergus, properly called the first king of Scots, as it was in his time the Carl, who possessed the western coast of Scotland, began to be distinguished, by foreigners, by the name of Scots. From thenceforward, the Scots and Picts, as diffined nations, became objects of attention to the historians of other countries. The internal state of the two Caledonian kingdoms has always continued, and ever must remain, in obscurity and fable.

It is in this epoch we must fix the beginning of the decay of that species of heroism, which subsisted in the days of Fingal. There are three stages in human fociety. The first is the refule of confanguinity, and the natural affection of the members of a family to one another. The fecond begins when property is established, and men enter into affociations for mutual defence, against the invasions and injustice of neighbours. Mankind fubmit, in the third, to certain laws and fubordinations of government, to which they trust the fafety of their persons and property. As the first is formed on nature, so, of course, it is the most disinterested and noble. Men, in the last, have leifure to cultivate the mind, and to restore it, with reslection, to a primaval dignity of fentiment. The middle flate is the region of complete barbarism and ignorance. About the beginning of the fifth century, the Scots and Picts were advanced into the fecond flage, and, confequently, into those circumscribed sentiments, which always diffinguish barbarity. The events which foon after happened did not at all contribute to enlarge their ideas, or mend their national character.

ABOUT the year 426, the Romans, on account of domestic commotions, entirely forfook Britain, finding it impossible to defend so distant a frontier. The Picts and Scots, seizing this favourable opportunity, made incursions into the deserted province. The Britons, enervated by the flavery of feveral centuries, and those vices, which are inseparable from an advanced state of civility, were not able to withfland the impetuous, though irregular attacks of a barbarous enemy. In the utmost distress, they applied to their old masters, the Romans, and (after the unfortunate state of the Empire could not spare aid) to the Saxons, a nation equally barbarous and brave, with the enemies of whom they were fo much afraid. Though the bravery of the Saxons repelled the Caledonian nations for a time, yet the latter found means to extend themselves. confiderably, towards the fouth. It is, in this period, we must place the origin of the arts of civil life among the Scots. The feat of government was removed from the mountains to the plain and more fertile provinces of the South, to be near the common enemy, in case of sudden incursions. Instead of roving through unfrequented wilds, in fearch of fubfiftance, by means of hunting, men applied to agriculture, and raifing of corn. This manner of life was the first means of changing the national character. The next thing which contributed to it was their mixture with ftrangers.

In the countries which the Scots had conquered from the Eritons, it is probable the most of the old inhabitants remained. These incorporating with the conquerors, taught them agriculture, and other arts, which they themselves had received from the Romans. The Scots, however, in number as well as power, being the most predominant, retained still their language, and as many of the customs of their ancestors, as suited with the nature of the country they possessed. Even the union of the two Caledonian kingdoms did not much affect the national character. Being originally descended from the same stock, the manners of the Picts and Scots were as similar as the different natures of the countries they possessed.

What brought about a total change in the genius of the Scots nation, was their wars, and other transactions with the Saxons. Several counties in the fouth of Scotland were alternately possessed by the two nations. They were ceded, in the ninth age, to the Scots, and, it is probable, that most of the Saxon inhabitants remained in possession of their lands. During the feveral conquests and revolutions in England, many sled, for refuge, into Scotland, to avoid the oppression of foreigners, or the tyranny of domestic usurpers; in so much, that the Saxon race formed perhaps near one half of the Scottish kingdom. The Saxon manners and language daily gained ground, on the tongue and customs of the antient Caledonians, till, at last, the latter were entirely relegated to inhabitants of the mountains, who were still unmixed with strangers.

IT was after the accession of territory which the Scots received, upon the retreat of the Romans from Britain, that the inhabitants of the Highlands were divided into clans. The king, when he kept his court in the mountains, was confidered, by the whole nation, as the chief of their blood. Their finall number, as well as the presence of their prince, prevented those divisions. which, afterwards, fprung forth into fo many feparate tribes. When the feat of government was removed to the fouth, those who remained in the Highlands were, of courfe, neglected. They naturally formed themselves into small societies, independent of one another. Each fociety had its own regulus, who either was, or in the fuccetion of a few generations, was regarded as chief of their blood. The nature of the country favoured an inflitution of this fort. A few valleys, divided from one another by extenfive heaths and impassible mountains, form the face of the Highlands. In these valleys the chiefs fixed their refidence. Round them, and almost wi hin fight of their dwellings, were the habitat.o., s of their relations and dependents.

THE feats of the Highland chiefs were neither disagreeable nor inconvenient. Surrounded with mountains and hanging woods, they were covered from the inclemency of the weather. Near them generally ran a pretty large river, which, discharging itself not far off, into an arm of the fea, or extensive lake, swarmed with variety of fish. The woods were stocked with wild-fowl; and the heaths and mountains behind them were the natural feat of the red-deer and roe. If we make allowance for the backward flate of agriculture, the valleys were not unfertile; affording, if not all the conveniencies, at least the neceffaries of life. Here the chief lived, the fupreme judge and law-giver of his own people; but his fway was neither fevere nor unjust. As the populace regarded him as the chief of their blood, fo he, in return, confidered them as members of his family. His commands therefore, though absolute and decifive, partook more of the authority of a father, than of the rigor of a judge. Though the whole territory of the tribe was confidered as the property of the chief, yet his vasfals made him no other confideration for their lands than fervices, neither burdensome nor frequent. As he seldom went from home, he was at no expense. His table was fupplied by his own herds, and what his numerous attendants killed in hunting.

In this rural kind of magnificence, the Highland chiefs lived, for many ages. At a diffance from the feat of government, and fecured, by the inacceffibleness of their country, they were free and independent. As they had little communication with ftrangers, the cuftoms of their ancestors remained among them, and their language retained its original purity. Naturally fond of military fame, and remarkably attached to the memory of their ancefiors, they delighted in traditions and fongs, concerning the exploits of their nation, and especially of their own particular families. A fuccession of bards was retained in every clan, to hand down the memorable actions of their forefathers. As Fingal and his chiefs were the most renowned names in tradition, the bards took care to place them in the genealogy of every great family. They became famous among the people, and an object of fiction and poetry to the bards.

The bards erected their immediate patrons into heroes, and celebrated them in their fongs. As the circle of their knowledge was narrow, their ideas were confined in proportion. A few happy expressions, and the manners they represent, may please those who understand the language; their obfcurity and inaccuracy would difgust in a translation. It was chiefly for this reason, that I have rejected wholly the works of the bards in my publications. Offian acted in a more extensive sphere, and his ideas ought to be more noble and universal; neither gives he, I prefume, fo many of those peculiarities, which are only understood in a certain period or country. The other bards have their beauties, but not in this fpecies of composition. Their rhimes, only calculated to kindle a martial fpirit among the vulgar, afford very little pleafure to genuine tafte. This observation only regards their poems of the heroic kind; in every inferior species of poetry they are more successful. They express the tender melancholy of desponding love, with fimplicity and nature. So well adapted are the founds of the words to the fentiments, that, even without any knowledge of the language they pierce and diffolve the heart. Successful love is expressed with peculiar tenderness and elegance. In all their compositions, except the heroic, which was folely calculated to animate the vulgar, they give us the genuine language of the heart, without any of those affected ornaments of phraseology, which, the' intended to beautify fentiments, divest them of their natural force. The ideas, it is confessed,

POEMS of OSSIAN. 259

are too local, to be admired, in another language; to those who are acquainted with the manners they represent, and the scenes they describe, they must afford pleasure and satisfaction

IT was the locality of their description and fentiment, that, probably, has kept them hitherto in the obscurity of an almost lost language. The ideas of an unpolished period are fo contrary to the prefent advanced state of society, that more than a common mediocrity of taste is required, to relish them as they deferve. Those who alone are capable of transferring ancient poetry into a modern language, might be better employed in giving originals of their own, were it not for that wretched envy and meannefs which affects to despise cotemporary genius. My first publication was merely accidental. Had I then met with less approbation, my after-purfuits would have been more profitable; at least I might have continued to be flupid, without being branded with dulnefs.

THESE poems may furnish light to antiquaries, as well as some pleasure to the lovers of poetry. The first population of Ireland, its first kings, and feveral circumstances, which regards its connection of old with the fouth and north of Britain, are presented in several episodes. The subject and catastrophe of the poem are founded upon facts, which regarded the first peopling of that country, and the contests between the two British nations, who originally inhabited that island. In a preceding part of this Dissertation, I have thewn how fuperior the probability of this fystem is to the undigested sictions of the Irish bards, and the more recent and regular legends of both Irish and Scottish historians. I mean not to give offence to the abettors of the high antiquities of the two nations, though I have all along expressed my doubts, concerning the veracity and abilities of those who deliver down their antient history. For my own part, I prefer the national fame, arifing from a few certain facts, to the legendary and uncertain annals of ages of remote and obscure antiquity. No kingdom now established in Europe can pretend to equal antiquity with that of the Scots, inconfiderable as it may appear in other respects, even according to my fystem, so that it is altogether needless to fix its origin a fictitious millennium before.

SINCE the first publication of these poems, many infinuations have been made, and doubts arisen, concerning their authenticity. Whether these supplies are suggested by prejudice, or are only the effects of malice, I neither know nor care. Those who have doubted my veracity have paid a compliment to my genius; and were even the allegation true, my self-denial might have atoned for my fault. Without vanity I say it, I think I could write tolerable poetry; and I assure my antagonists, that I should not translate what I could not imitate.

As prejudice is the effect of ignorance, I am not furprized at its being general. An age that produces few marks of genius ought to be sparing of admiration. The truth is, the bulk of mankind have ever been led, by reputation more than taste, in articles of literature. If all the Romans, who admired Virgil, understood his beauties, he would have fearce deferved to have come down to us, through fo many centuries. Unlefs genius were in fathion, Homer himfelf might have written in vain. He that withes to come with weight, on the fuperficial, must skim the furface, in their own shallow way. Were my aim to gain the many, I would write a madrigal fooner than an heroic poem. Laberius himfelf would be always fure of more followers than Sophocles.

Some who doubt the authenticity of this work, with peculiar acuteness appropriate them to the Irith nation. Tho' it is not easy to conceive how these poems can belong to Ireland and to me, at 262 A DISSERTATION concerning the once, I shall examine the subject, without further animadversion on the blunder.

OF all the nations descended from the antient Celtæ, the Scots and Irith are the most similar in language, customs, and manners. This argues a more intimate connection between them, than a remote descent from the great Celtic stock. It is evident, in thort, that at fome one period or other, they formed one fociety, were subject to . the fame government, and were, in all respects, one and the fame people. How they became divided, which the colony, or which the mother nation, I have in another work amply discussed. The first circumstance that induced me to difregard the vulgarly-received opinion of the Hibernian extraction of the Scottish nation, was my observations on their antient language. That dialect of the Celtic tongue, spoken in the north of Scotland, is much more pure, more agreeable to its mother language, and more abounding with primitives, than that now spoken, or even that which has been written for some centuries back, amongst the most unmixed part of the Irish nation. A Scotchman, tolerably conversant in his own language, understands an Irish composition, from that derivative analogy which it has to the Galic of North Britain. An Irithman, on the other hand, without the aid of fludy, can never understand a composition in the Galic tongue. This affords a proof, that the Scotch Galic is the most origipal, and, confequently, the language of a more ancient and unmixed people. The Irith, however backward they may be to allow any thing to the prejudice of their antiquity, feem inadvertently to acknowledge it, by the very appellation they give to the dialect they speak. They call their own language Cailic, Eirinach, i. e. Caledonian Irish, when, on the contrary, they call the dialect of North-Britain a Chailic, or the Caledonian tongue, emphatically. A circumstance of this nature tends more to decide which is the most antient nation, than the united testimonies of a whole legion of ignorant bards and fenachies, who, perhaps, never dreamed of bringing the Scots from Spain to Ireland, till fome one of them, more learned than the rest, discovered, that the Romans called the first Iberia, and the latter Hibernia. On fuch a flight foundation were probably built the romantic fictions, concerning the Milefians of Ireland.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 263

FROM internal proofs it fufficiently appears, that the poems published under the name of Offian, are not of Irish composition. The favourite chimæra, that Ireland is the mother-country of the Scots, is totally subverted and ruined. The sictions concerning the antiquities of that country, which were forming for ages, and growing as they came down, on the hands of fucceffive fenachies and fileas, are found, at last, to be the spurious brood of modern and ignorant ages. To those who know how tenacious the Irish are, of their pretended Iberian descent, this alone is proof sufficient, that poems, so subversive of their system, could never be produced by an Hibernian bard. But when we look to the language, it is so different from the Irish dialest, that it would be as ridiculous to think, that Milton's Paradise Lost could be wrote by a Scottish peasant, as to suppose, that the poems ascribed to Ossian were writ in Ireland.

S 4 of

The pretensions of Ireland to Ossan proceed from another quarter. There are handed down, in that country, traditional poems, concerning the Fiona, or the heroes of Fion Mac Comnal. This Fion, say the Irish annalists, was general of the militia of Ireland, in the reign of Cormac, in the third century. Where Keating and O'Flaherty learned, that Ireland had an embodied militia so early, is not easy for me to determine. Their information certainly did not come from the Irish poems, concerning Fion. I have just now, in my hands, all that remain, of those compofitions; but, unluckily for the antiquities of Ireland, they appear to be the work of a very modern period. Every stanza, nay almost every line, affords firiking proofs, that they cannot be three centuries old. Their allufions to the manners and customs of the fifteenth century, are fo many, that it is matter of wonder to me, how any one could dream of their antiquity. They are entirely writ in that romantic tafte, which prevailed two ages ago. Giants, enchanted castles, dwarfs, palfreys, witches and magicians form the whole circle of the poet's invention. The celebrated Fion could scarcely move from one hillock to another, without encountering a giant, or being entangled in the circles of a magician. Witches, on broomsticks, were continually hovering round him, like crows; and he had freed enchanted virgins in every valley in Ireland. In short, Fion, great as he was, passed a disagreeable life. Not only had he to engage all the mischiefs in his own country, foreign armies invaded him, affifted by magicians and witches, and headed by kings, as tall as the main-mast of a first rate. It must be owned, however, that Fion was not inferior to them in height.

8

POEMS of OSSIAN. 265

A chos air Cromleach, druim-ard, Chos eile air Crom-meal dubh, Thoga Fion le lamh mhoir An d'uifge o Lubhair na fruth.

With one foot on Cromleach his brow, The other on Crommal the dark, Fion took up with his large hand The water from Lubar of the ftreams.

Cromleach and Crommal were two mountains in the neighbourhood of one another, in Ulfler, and the river Lubar ran through the intermediate valley. The property of such a monster as this Fion, I should never have disputed with any nation. But the bard himself, in the poem, from which the above quotation is taken, cedes him to Scotland.

FION O ALBIN, fiol nan laoich!
FION from ALBION, race of heroes!

Were it allowable to contradict the authority of a bard, at this diffance of time, I should have given as my opinion, that this encorpous Fion was of the race of the Hibernian giants, of Ruanus, or some other celebrated name, rather than a native of Caledonia, whose inhabitants, now at least, are not remarkable for their stature. As for the poetry, I leave it to the reader.

IF Fion was fo remarkable for his stature, his heroes had also other extraordinary properties. In weight all the sons of strangers yielded to the celebrated Ton-iofal: and for hardness of skull. and, perhaps, for thickness too, the valiant Ofcar flood unrivalled and alone. Offian himfelf had many fingular and lefs delicate qualifications, than playing on the harp; and the brave Cuthullin was of fo diminutive a fize, as to be taken for a child of two years of age, by the gigantic Swaran. To illustrate this subject, I shall here lay before the reader, the history of some of the Irith poems, concerning Fion Mac Comnal. A translation of these pieces, if well executed, might afford fatisfaction, in an uncommon way, to the Public. But this ought to be the work of a native of Ireland. To draw forth, from obscurity, the poems of my own country, has waited all the time I had allotted for the muses; besides, I am too distident of my own abilities, to undertake fuch a work. A gentleman in Dublin accused me to the public, of . committing blunders and abfurdities, in tranflating the language of my own country, and that before any translation of mine appeared*How the gentleman came to fee my blunders before I committed them, is not easy to determine; if he did not conclude, that, as a Scotfman, and, of course descended of the Milesian race, I might have committed some of those oversights, which, perhaps very unjustly, are said to be peculiar to them.

FROM the whole tenor of the Irith poems, concerning the Fiona, it appears, that Fion Mac Comnal flourished in the reign of Cormac, which is placed, by the universal consent of the senachies, in the third century. They even fix the death

In Faulkner's Dublin Journal, of the 1st December, 1761, appeared the following Advertisement: two weeks before my first publication appeared in London.

Speedily will be published, by a gentleman of this kingdom, who hath been, for some time path, employed in translating and writing historical Notes to

FINGAL, A POEM,

Originally wrote in the Irish or Erse language. In the presace to which, the translator, who is a persect master of the Irish tongue, will give an account of the manners and customs of the antient Irish or Scotch; and, therefore, most humbly intreats the public, to wait for his edition, which will appear in a short time, as he will set forth all the blunders and abfurdities in the edition now printing in London, and shew the ignorance of the English translator, in his knowlege of Irish grammar, not understanding any part of that accidence.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 269

of Fingal in the year 286, yet his fon Offian is made cotemporary with St. Patrick, who preached the gospel in Ireland about the middle of the fifth age. Offian, though, at that time, he must have been two hundred and fifty years of age, had a daughter young enough to become wife to the faint. On account of this family connection, Patrick of the Pfalms, for fo the apostle of Ireland is emphatically called in the poems, took great delight in the company of Offian, and in hearing the great actions of his family. The faint fometimes threw off the austerity of his profession, drunk freely, and had his foul properly warmed with wine, to receive with becoming enthusiasin, the poems of his father-in-law. One of the poems begins with this piece of ufeful information,

> Lo don rabh Padric na mhúr, Gun Sailm air uidh, ach a gól, Ghluais é thigh Offian mhic Fhion, O fan leis bu bhinn a ghloir.

The title of this poem is Teantach mor na Fiona. It appears to have been founded on the fame flory with the battle of Lora. The circumstances and catastrophe in both are much the same; but the Irish Ossan discovers the age in which he lived, by an unlucky anachronism. After describing the total route of Erragon, he very gravely concludes with this remarkable anecdote, that none of the foe escaped, but a few, who were permitted to go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. This circumstance fixes the date of the composition of the piece some centuries after the samous croisade; for, it is evident, that the poet thought the time of the croisade so ancient, that he confounds it with the age of Fingal. Erragon, in the course of this poem, is often called,

Riogh Lochlin and of though, King of Denmark of two nations, which alludes to the union of the kingdoms of Norway and Denmark, a circumflance which happened under Margaret de Waldemar, in the close of the fourteenth age. Modern, however, as this pretended Offian was, it is certain, he lived before the Irith had dreamed of appropriating Fion, or Fingal, to themselves. He concludes the poem, with this reslection.

Na fagha fe comhthróm nan n' arm, Erragon Mac Annir nan lánn glas 'San n' ALBIN ni n' abairtair Triath Agus ghlaoite an n' Fhiona as.

" Had Erragon, fon of Annir of gleaming fwords, avoided the equal contest of arms, (fingle combat) no chief should have afterwards been numbered in Albion, and the heroes of Fion should no more be named."

The next poem that falls under our observation is Cath-cabhra, or, The death of Oscar. This piece is founded on the same story which we have in the first book of Temora. So little thought the author of Cath-cabhra of making Oscar his countryman, that, in the course of two hundred lines, of which the poems consists, he puts the following expression thrice in the mouth of the hero:

ALBIN an fa d' roina m' arach.

ALBION where I was born and bred.

The poem contains almost all the incidents in the first book of Temora. In one circumstance the bard differs materially from Ossian. Oscar, after he was mortally wounded by Cairbar, was carried by his people to a neighbouring hill, which commanded a prospect of the sea. A sleet appeared at a distance, and the hero exclaims with joy, Loingeas mo shean-athair at' án 'S iad a tiächd le cabhair chugain, O ALBIN na n' ioma stuagh.

"It is the fleet of my grandfather, coming with aid to our field, from ALBION of many waves!"

The testimony of this bard is sufficient to consute the idle fictions of Keating and O'Flaherty; for, though he is far from being ancient, it is probable, he flourished a full century before these historians. He appears, however, to have been a much better christian than chronologer; for Fion, though he is placed two centuries before St. Patrick, very devoutly recommends the soul of his grandson to his Redeemer.

Duan a Gharibh Mac-Starn is another Irish poem in high repute. The grandeur of its images, and its propriety of sentiment, might have induced me to give a translation of it, had not I some expectations, which are now over, of seeing it in the collection of the Irish Ossian's poems, promised twelve years since, to the public. The author descends sometimes from the region of the sublime to low and indecent description; the last of which, the Irish translator, no doubt, will choose to leave in the obscurity of the original. In this piece Cuthullin is used with very little ceremony, for he is est called, the deg of Tara, in the county of Meath. This fevere title of the redoubtable Cuthullin, the most renowned of Irish champions, proceeded from the poet's ignorance of etymology. Cu, voice, or commander, signifies also a dog. The poet chose the last, as the most noble appellation for his hero.

THE subject of the poem is the same with that of the epic poem of Fingal. Caribh Mac-Starn is the fame with Offian's Swaran, the fon of Starno. His fingle combats with, and his victory over all the heroes of Ireland, excepting the celebrated dog of Tara, i. e. Cuthullin, afford matter for two hundred lines of tolerable poetry. Caribh's progress in fearch of Cuthullin, and his intrigue with the gigantic Emir-bragal, that hero's wife, enables the poet to extend his piece to four hundred lines. This author, it is true, makes Cuthullin a native of Ireland; the gigantic Emir-bragal he calls the guiding star of the women of Ireland. The property of this enormous lady I shall not dispute with him, or any other. But, as he fpeaks with great tenderness of the daughters of the convent, and throws out fome hints against the English nation, it is probable he lived in too modern a period to be intimately acquainted with the genealogy of Cuthullin.

ANOTHER Irish Ossian, for there were many, as appears from their difference in language and fentiment, speaks very dogmatically of Fion Mac Comnal, as an Irishman. Little can be faid for the judgment of this poet, and less for his delicacy of fentiment. The history of one of his episodes may, at once, stand as a specimen of his want of both. Ireland, in the days of Fion, happened to be threatened with an invasion, by three great potentates, the kings of Lochlin, Sweden, and France. It is needless to insist upon the impropriety of a French invasion of Ireland; it is fufficient for me to be faithful to the language of my author. Fion, upon receiving intelligence of the intended invasion, fent Ca-olt, Offian, and Ofcar, to watch the bay, in which, it was apprehended, the enemy was to land. Ofcar was the worst choice of a scout that could be made, for, brave as he was, he had the bad property of falling very often afleep on his post, nor was it possible to awake him, without cutting off one of his fingers, or dashing a large stone against his head. When the enemy appeared, Ofcar, very unfortunately, was afleep. Offian and Ca-olt confulted about the method of wakening him, and they, at last, fixed on the flone, as the less dangerous expedient.

Gun thog Caoilte a chlach, nach gán, Agus a n' aighai' chican gun bhuail; Tri mil an tulloch gun chri', &c.

" Ca-olt took up a heavy stone, and struck it against the hero's head. The hill shook for three miles, as the stone rebounded and rolled away." Ofcar rose in wrath, and his father gravely defired him to fpend his rage on his enemies, which he did to fo good purpose, that he fingly routed a whole wing of their army. The confederate kings advanced, notwithstanding, till they came to a narrow pass, possessed by the celebrated Ton-iofal. This name is very fignificant of the fingular property of the hero who bore it. Ton-iofal, though brave, was fo heavy and unwieldy, that when he fat down, it took the whole force of an hundred men to fet him upright on his feet again. Luckily for the prefervation of Ireland, the hero happened to be standing when the enemy appeared, and he gave fo good an account of them, that Ficn, upon his arrival, found little to do, but to divide the fpoil among his foldiers.

ALL these extraordinary heroes, Fion, Ossian, Oscar and Ca-olt, says the poet, were Siol ERIN na gorm lann. The fons of ERIN of blue steel.

Neither shall I much dispute the matter with him: He has my consent also to appropriate to Ireland the celebrated Ton-iosal. I shall only say, that they are different persons from those of the same name, in the Scotch poems; and that, though the stupendous valour of the first is so remarkable, they have not been equally lucky with the latter, in their poet. It is somewhat extraordinary, that Fion, who lived some ages before St. Patrick, swears like a very good christian:

Air an Dia do chum gach casc. By God, who shaped every case.

It is worthy of being remarked, that, in the line quoted, Offian, who lived in St. Patrick's days, feems to have understood fomething of the English, a language not then fubfishing. A person, more fanguine for the honour of his country than I am, might argue, from this circumstance, that this pretendedly Irish Offian was a native of Scotland; for my countrymen are universally allowed to have an exclusive right to the second-sight.

POEMS of OSSIAN. 277

FROM the inflances given, the reader may form a complete idea of the Irith compositions concerning the Fiona. The greatest part of them make the heroes of Fion, Siol Albin a n'nioma caoile.

The race of Albion of many firths.

The rest make them natives of Ireland. But, the truth is, that their authority is of little confequence on either side. From the instances I have given, they appear to have been the work of a very modern period. The pious ejaculations they contain, their allusions to the manners of the times, fix them to the sisteenth century. Had even the authors of these pieces avoided all allusions to their own times, it is impossible that the poems could pass for ancient, in the eyes of any person tolerably conversant with the Irish tongue. The idiom is so corrupted and so many words borrowed from the English, that the language must have made considerable progress in Ireland before the poems were written.

It remains now to shew, how the Irish bards begun to appropriate the Scottish Ossian and his heres to their own country. After the English conquest, many of the natives of Ireland, averse to a foreign yoke, either actually were in a state of hossility with the conquerors, or at least, paid little regard to their government. The Scots, in those ages, were often in open war, and never in cordial friendship with the English. The similarity of manners and language, the traditions concerning their common origin, and above all, their having to do with the same enemy, created a free and friendly intercourse between the Scottish and Irish nations. As the custom of retaining bards and senachies was common to both; so each, no doubt, had formed a system of history, it matters not how much soever fabulous, concerning their respective origin. It was the natural policy of the times, to reconcile the traditions of both nations together, and, if possible, to reduce them from the same original stock.

T 3 little

278 A DISSERTATION concerning the

THE Saxon manners and language had, at that time, made great progress in the fouth of Scotland. The ancient language, and the traditional history of the nation, became confined entirely to the inhabitants of the Highlands, then fallen, from several concurring circumstances, into the last degree of ignorance and barbarism. The Irish, who, for some ages before the conquest, had possessed a competent share of that kind of learning, which then prevailed in Europe, found it no difficult matter to impose their own sictions on the ignorant Highland senachies. By slattering the vanity of the Highlanders, with their long lift of Heremonian kings and heroes, they, without contradiction, assumed to themfelves the character of being the mother-nation of the Scots of Britain. At this time, certainly, was established that Hibernian system of the original of the Scots, which afterwards, for want of any other, was univerfally received. The Scots of the low-country, who, by lofing the language of their ancestors, lost, together with it, their national traditions, received, implicitly, the history of their country, from Irish refugees, or from Highland fenachies, perfuaded over into the Hibernian fystem.

6

THESE circumstances are far from being ideal. We have remaining many particular traditions, which bear testimony to a fact, of itself abundantly probable. What makes the matter incontestible is, that the antient traditional accounts of the genuine origin of the Scots, have been handed down without interruption. Tho' a few ignorant fenachies might be perfuaded out of their own opinion, by the fmoothness of an Irish tale, it was impossible to eradicate, from among the bulk of the people, their own national traditions. These traditions afterwards so much prevailed, that the Highlanders continue totally unacquainted with the pretended Hibernian extract of the Scots nation. Ignorant chronicle writers, frangers to the antient language of their country, preserved only from falling to the ground, fo improbable a ftory.

THIS fubject, perhaps, is purfued further than it deserves; but a discussion of the pretensions of Ireland, was become in fome measure necesfary. If the Irith poems, concerning the Fiona, should appear ridiculous, it is but justice to obferve, that they are fcarcely more fo than the poems of other nations, at that period. On other fubjects, the bards of Ireland have difplayed a genius for poetry. It was, alone, in matters of antiquity, that they were monftrous in their fables. Their love-sonnets, and their elegies on the death of persons worthy or renowned, abound with fimplicity, and a wild harmony of numbers. They become more than an atonement for their errors, in every other fpecies of poetry. But the beauty of these pieces, depends so much on a certain curiosa felicitas of expression in the original, that they must appear much to difadvantage in another language.

A CRITICAL

DISSERTATION

ONTHE

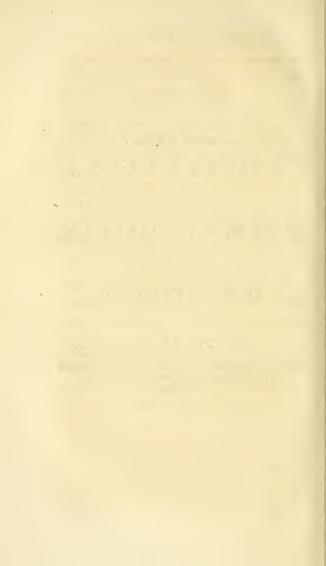

POEMS OF OSSIAN,

THE

SON OF FINGAL.

By HUGH BLAIR, D.D.

One of the Ministers of the High Church, and Professor of Rheterick and Belles-Letters, in the University of Edinburgh.

A CRITICAL

DISSERTATION

ONTHE

POEMS OF OSSIAN,

THE

SON OF FINGAL.

MONG the monuments remaining of the ancient state of nations, few are more valuable than their poems or fongs. History, when it treats of remote and dark ages, is seldom very instructive. The beginnings of society, in every country, are involved in fabulous consustion; and though they were not, they would furnish few events worth recording. But, in every period of society, human manners are a curious spectacle; and the most natural pictures of ancient manners are exhibited in the ancient poems of nations. These present to us, what is much more valuable than the history of such transactions as a rude age can afford, The history of human imagination and passion. They make us acquainted with the notions and feelings of our fellow-creatures in the most artless ages; discovering what objects they admired, and what pleasures they pursued, before those refinements of society had taken place, which enlarge indeed, and diversify the transactions, but disguise the manners of mankind.

Besides this merit, which ancient poems have with philosophical observers of human nature, they have another with persons of taste. They promise some of the highest beauties of poetical writing. Irregular and unpolithed we may expect the productions of uncultivated ages to be; but abounding, at the same time, with that enthusiasin, that vehemence and sire, which are the soul of poetry. For many circumstances of those times which we call barbarous, are favourable to the poetical spirit. That state, in which human nature shoots wild and free, though unsit for other improvements, certainly encourages the high exertions of fancy and passion.

In the infancy of focieties, men live feattered and dispersed, in the midst of solitary rural scenes, where the beauties of nature are their chief entertainment. They meet with many objects, to them new and strange; their wonder and furprize are frequently excited; and by the fudden changes of fortune occurring in their unsettled state of life, their passions are raised to the utmost, their passions have nothing to restrain them: their imagination has nothing to check it. They display themselves to one another without difguife: and converfe and act in the uncovered fimplicity of nature. As their feelings are strong, so their language, of itself, assumes a poetical turn. Prone to exaggerate. they describe every thing in the strongest colours, which of course renders their speech picturefque and figurative. Figurative language owes its rife chiefly to two causes; to the want of proper names for objects, and to the influence of imagination and passion over the form of expression. Both these causes concur in the infancy of fociety. Figures are commonly confidered as artificial modes of speech, devised by orators and poets, after the world had advanced to a refined flate. The contrary of this is the truth. Men never have used so many figures of style, as in those rude ages, when, besides the power of a warm imagination to fuggest lively images, the want of proper and precise terms for the ideas they would express, obliged them to have recourse to circumlocution, metaphor, comparison, and all those substituted forms of expression, which give a poetical air to language. An American chief, at this day, harangues at the head of his tribe, in a more bold metaphorical style, than a modern European would adventure to use in an Epic poem.

In the progress of society, the genius and manners of men undergo a change more favourable to accuracy than to fprightliness and sublimity. As the world advances, the understanding gains ground upon the imagination; the understanding is more exercised; the imagination, less. Fewer objects occur that are new or furprizing. Men apply themselves to trace the causes of things; they correct and refine one another; they fubdue or difguife their paffions; they form their exterior manners upon one uniform standard of politeness and civility. Human nature is pruned according to method and rule. Language advances from sterility to copioufness, and at the same time, from fervour and enthusiasm, to correctness and precision. Style becomes more chafte: but less animated. The progress of the world in this respect resembles the progress of age in man. The powers of imagination are most vigorous and predominant in youth; those of the understanding ripen more flowly, and often attain not to their maturity, till the imagination begin to flag. Hence, poetry, which is the child of imagination, is frequently quently most glowing and animated in the first ages of fociety. As the ideas of our youth are remembered with a peculiar pleasure on account of their liveliness and vivacity; so the most ancient poems have often proved the greatest favourites of nations.

POETRY has been faid to be more ancient than profe: and however paradoxical fuch an affertion may feem, yet, in a qualified fense, it is true. Men certainly never converfed with one another in regular numbers; but even their ordinary language would, in ancient times, for the reasons before assigned, approach to a poetical flyle; and the first compositions transmitted to posterity, beyond doubt, were, in a literal sense, poems; that is, compositions in which imagination had the chief hand, formed into fome kind of numbers, and pronounced with a musical modulation or tone. Music or fong has been found coxval with fociety among the most barbarous nations. The only fubjects which could prompt men, in their first rude state, to utter their thoughts in compositions of any length, were fuch as naturally affumed the tone of poetry; praises of their gods, or of their ancestors; commemorations of their own warlike exploits; or lamentations over their misfortunes.

288

And before writing was invented, no other compositions, except fongs or poems, could take fuch hold of the imagination and memory, as tobe preserved by oral tradition, and handed down from one race to another.

HENCE we may expect to find poems among the antiquities of all nations. It is probable too, that an extensive fearch would discover a certain degree of refemblance among all the most ancient poetical productions, from whatever country they have proceeded. In a fimilar flate of manners, fimilar objects and passions operating upon the imaginations of men, will stamp their productions with the same general character. Some diverfity will, no doubt, be occasioned by climate and genius. But mankind never bear fuch refembling features, as they do in the beginnings of fociety. Its fubfequent revolutions give rife to the principal diffinctions among nations; and divert, into channels widely feparated, that current of human genius and manners, which descends originally from one spring. What we have been long accustomed to call the oriental vein of poetry, because some of the earliest poetical productions have come to us from the East, is probably no more oriental than occidental; it is characteristical of an age rather than a country; and belongs, in fome measure, to all nations at a certain period. Of this the works of Offian feem to furnish a remarkable proof.

Our present subject leads us to investigate the ancient poetical remains, not so much of the east, or of the Greeks and Romans, as of the northern nations; in order to discover whether the Gothic poetry has any resemblance to the Celtic or Galic, which we are about to consider. Though the Goths, under which name we usually comprehend all the Scandinavian tribes, were a people altogether sierce and martial, and noted, to a proverb, for their ignorance of the liberal arts, yet they too from the earliest times, had their poets and their songs. Their poets were distinguished by the title of Scalders, and their songs were termed Vyses. Saxo Grammaticus,

^{*} Olaus Wormius, in the appendix to his Treatife de Literatura Runica, has given a particular account of the Gothic poetry, commonly called Runic, from Runes, which fignifies the Gothic letters. He informs us that there were no fewer than 136 different kinds of measure or verse used in their Vysis; and though we are accustomed to call rhyme a Gothic invention, he says expressly, that among all these measures, rhyme, or correspondence of final syllables, was never employed. He analyses the structure of one of these kinds of verse, that in which the poem of Lodbrog, afterwards quoted, is written; which exhibits a very singular species of harmony, if it can be allowed that name, depending neither upon rhyme Vol. Is.

ticus, a Danish Historian of considerable note who flourished in the thirteenth century, informs us that very many of these songs, contain-nor upon metrical feet, or quantity of fyllables, but chiefly upon the number of the fyllables, and the disposition of the letters. In every stanza was an equal number of lines: in every line six fyllables. In each distich, it was requisite that three words should begin with the same letter; two of the corresponding words placed in the first line of the distich, the third, in the second line. In each line were also required two syllables, but never the sinal ones, formed either of the same consonants, or same vowels. As an example of this measure, Olaus gives us these two Latin lines constructed exactly according to the above rules of Runic verse;

Christus caput nostrum Coronet te bonis.

The initial letters of Christus, Caput, and Coronet, make the three corresponding letters of the distinct. In the first line, the first syllables of Christus and of nostrum; in the second line, the on in coronet and in bonis make the requisite correspondence of syllables. Frequent inversions and transpositions were permitted in this poetry; which would naturally sollow from such laborious attention to the collocation of words.

The curious on this subject may consult likewise Dr. Hicks's Thesaurus Linguarum Septentrionalium; particularly the 2 de chapter of his Grammatica Anglo Saxonica & Mæso Gothica; where they will find a full account of the structure of the Anglo Saxon verse, which nearly resembled the Gothic. They will find also some specimens both of Gothic and Saxon poetry. An extract, which Dr. Hicks has given from the work of one of the Danish Scalders, entitled, Hervarer Saga, containing an evocation from the dead, may be sound in the sth volume of Miscellany Poems, published by Mr. Dryden.

ing the ancient traditionary stories of the country, were found engraven upon rocks in the old Runic character: feveral of which he has translated into Latin, and inferted into his Hiftory. But his verfions are plainly fo paraphrastical, and forced into fuch an imitation of the flyle and the measures of the Roman poets, that one can form no judgment from them of the native spirit of the original. A more curious monument of the true Gothic poetry is preferved by Olaus Wormius in his book de Literatura Runica. It is an Epicedium, or funeral fong, composed by Regner Lodbrog; and translated by Olaus, word for word, from the original. This Lodbrog was a king of Denmark, who lived in the eighth century, famous for his wars and victories; and at the fame time an eminent Scalder or poet. It was his misfortune to fall at last into the hands of one of his enemies, by whom he was thrown into prison, and condemned to be destroyed by ferpents. In this fituation he folaced himfelf with rehearfing all the exploits of his life. The poem is divided into twenty-nine stanzas, of ten lines each; and every stanza begins with these words, Pugnavimus Enfibus, We have fought with our fwords. Olaus's version is in many places so obfcure as to be hardly intelligible. I have fubjoined the whole below, exactly as he has published it; and shall translate as much as may give the English reader an idea of the spirit and ftrain of this kind of poetry *.

« WE

* I.

Pugnavimus Ensibus Haud post longum tempus Cum in Gotlandia accessimus Ad ferpentis immensi necem Tunc impetravimus Thoram Ex hoc vocarunt me virum Quod serpentem transfodi Hirsutam braccam ob illam cedem Cuspide ictum intuli in colubrum Ferro lucidorum stupendiorum.

2.

Multum juvenis fui quando acquisivimus Orientem versus in Oreonico freto Vulnerum amnes avidæ feræ Et flavipedi avi Accepimus ibidem fonuerunt Ad fublimes galeas Dura ferra magnam escam Omnis erat oceanus vulnus Vadavit corvus in fanguine Cæforum.

3.

Alte tulimus tunc lanceas Quando viginti annos numeravimus Et celebrem laudem comparavimus passim Vicimus octo barones In oriente ante Dimini portum Aquilæ impetravimus tunc fufficientem Hospitii sumptum in illa strage

ON THE POEMS OF OSSIAN. 293

"WE have fought with our fwords. I was young, when, towards the east, in the bay of

" Oreon, we made torrents of blood flow, to

" gorge the ravenous beaft of prey, and the Sudor decidit in vulnerum Oceano perdidit exercitus ætatem.

Pugnæ facta copia
Cum Helfingianos postulavimus
Ad aulam Odini
Naves direximus in ostium Vistulæ
Mucro potuit tum mordere
Omnis erat vulnus unda
Terra rubefacta Calido
Frendebat gladius in loricas Gladius findebat Clypeos.

Memini neminem tunc fugiffe Priusquam in navibus Heraudus in bello caderet Non findit navibus Alius baro præstantior Mare ad portum In navibus longis post illum Sic attulit princeps passim Alacre in bellum cor.

Exercitus abjecit clypeos Cum hasta volavit Ardua ad virorum pectora Momordit Scarforum cautes Gladius in pugna

U 3

" yellow-footed bird. There resounded the hard " fleel upon the lofty helmets of men. The " whole ocean was one wound. The crow

" waded in the blood of the flain. When we " had > Sanguineus erat Clypeus Antequam Rafno rex caderet Fluxit ex virorum capitibus Calidus in loricas fudor.

Habere potuerunt tum corvi Ante Indirorum infulas Sufficientem prædam dilaniandam Acquisivimus feris carnivoris Plenum prandium unico actu Difficile erat unius facere mentionem Oriente sole Spicula vidi pungere Propulerunt arcus ex se ferra, Altum mugierunt enfes Antequam in Laneo campo Eislinus rex cecidit Processimus auro ditati Ad terram proffratorum dimicandum Gladius secuit Clypeorum Picturas in galearum conventu Cervicum mustum ex vulneribus Diffusum per cerebrum fissum.

Tenuimus Clypeos in fanguine Cum hastam unximus Ante Boring holmum

ON THE POEMS OF OSSIAN. 295

" had numbered twenty years, we lifted our

" fpears on high, and every where fpread our

" renown. Eight barons we overcame in the

" east, before the port of Diminum; and plen" tifully

Telorum nubes difrumpunt clypeum Extrusit arcus ex se metallum Volnir cecidit in conslictu Non erat illo rex major Cæsi dispersi late per littora Feræ amplectebantur escam.

10.

Pugna manifeste crescebat
Antequam Freyr rex caderet
In Flandrorum terra
Cæpit cæruleus ad incidendum
Sanguine illitus in auream
Loricam in pugna
Durus armorum mucro olim
Virgo deploravit matutinam lanienam
Multa præda dabatur feris,

II.

Centies centenos vidi jacere
In navibus
Ubi Ænglanes vocatur
Navigavimus ad pugnam
Per fex dies antequam exercitus caderet
Transegimus mucronum mislam
In exortu solis
Coactus est pro nostris gladiis
Valdiofur in bello occumbere.

"tifully we feasted the eagle in that slaughter.
"The warm stream of wounds ran into the "ocean. The army fell before us. When we "fleered

Ι2.

Ruit pluvia sanguinis de gladiis
Præceps in Bardasyrde
Pallidum corpus pro accipitribus
Murmuravit arcus ubi mucro
Acriter mordebat Loricas
In conflictu
Odini Pileus Galea
Cucurrit arcus ad vulnus
Venenate acutus conspersus sudore sanguineo,

13.

Tenuimus magica scuta
Alte in pugnæ ludo
Ante Hiadningum sinum
Videre licuit tum viros
Qui gladiis lacerarunt Clypeos
In gladiatorio murmure
Galeæ attritæ virorum
Erat sicut splendidam virginem
In secto juxta se collocare,

14

Dura venit tempestas Clypeis Cadaver cecidit in terram In Nortumbria Erat circa matutinum tempus Hominibus necessium erat sugere Ex prælio ubi acute Cassidis campos mordebant gladii Erat hoc veluti Juvenem viduam In primaria sede osculari,

ON THE POEMS OF OSSIAN. 297

"fteered our ships into the mouth of the Viftula, we sent the Helsingians to the Hall of

" Odin. Then did the fword bite. The wa" ters

15.

Herthiofe evalit fortunatus
In Australibus Orcadibus ipse
Victoriæ in nostris hominibus
Cogebatur in armorum nimbo
Rogvaldus occumbere
Iste venit summus super accipitres
Luctus in gladiorum ludo
Strenue jactabat concussor
Galeæ sanguinis teli.

16

Quilibet jacebat transversim supra alium Gaudebat pugna lætus
Accipiter ob gladiorum ludum
Non secit aquilam aut aprum
Qui Irlandiam gubernavit
Conventus siebat ferri & Clypei
Marstanus rex jejunis
Fiebat in vedræ sinu.
Præda data corvis.

17.

Bellatorem multum vidi cadere Mane ante machæram Virum in mucronum dissidio Filio meo incidit mature Gladius juxta cor Egillus secit Agnerum spoliatum Impertertitum virum vita Sonuit lancea prope Hamdi Griseam loricam splendebant vexilla.

" ters were all one wound. The earth was dyed
" red with the warm fiream. The fword rung
" upon the coats of mail, and clove the buck" lers

18.

Verborum tenaces vidi diffecare
Haut minutim pro lupis
Endili maris enfibus
Erat per Hebdomadæ spacium
Quasi mulieres vinum apportarent
Rubesactæ erant naves
Valde in strepitu armorum
Scissa erat lorica
In Scioldungorum prælio.

19.

Pulchricomum vidi crepusculascere Virginis amatorem circa matutinum Et confabulationis amicum viduarum Erat ficut calidum balneum Vinei vasis nympha portaret Nos in llæ freto Antiquam Orn rex caderet Sanguineum Clypeum vidi ruptum Hoc invertit virorum vitam.

20

Egimus gladiorum ad cædem Ludum in Lindis infula Cum regibus tribus Pauci potucrunt inde lætari Cecidit multus in rictum ferarum Accipiter dilaniavit carnem cum lupo Ut fatur inde discederet Hybernorum sanguis in oceanum Copiose decidit per mactationis tempus. " lers in twain. None fled on that day, till

" among his ships Heraudus fell. Than him no braver baron cleaves the sea with ships;

" a chearful heart did he ever bring to the com" bat.

21.

Alte gladius mordebat Clypeos Tunc cum aurei coloris Hasta fricabat loricas Videre licuit in Onlugs infula Per secula multum post Ibi fuit ad gladiorum ludos Reges processerunt Rubicundum erat circa infulam Ar volans Draco vulnerum.

22.

Quid est viro forti morte certius
Etsi ipse in armorum nimbo
Adversus collocatus sit Sæpe deplorat ætatem
Qui nunquam premitur
Malum serunt timidum incitare
Aquilam ad gladiorum ludum
Meticulosus venit nuspiam
Cordi suo usui.

23.

Hoc numero æquum ut procedat
In contactu gladiorum
Juvenis unus contra alterum
Non retrocedat vir a viro.
Hoc fuit viri fortis nobilitas diu
Semper debet amoris amicus virginum
Audax esse in fremitu armorum.

" bat. Then the host threw away their shields,
" when the uplisted spear slew at the breasts of " heroes. The sword bit the Scarsian rocks;
" bloody

24.

Hoc videtur mihi re vera
Quod fata fequimur
Rarus transgreditur fata Parcarum
Non destinavi Ellæ
De vitæ exitu meæ
Cum ego fanguinem semimortuus tegerem
Et naves in aquas protrusi
Passim impetravimus tum feris
Escam in Scotiæ sinubus,

25.

Hoc ridere me facit semper
Quod Balderi patris scamna
Parata scio in aula
Bibemus cerevisiam brevi
Ex concavis crateribus craniorum
Non gemit vir fortis contra mortem
Magnifici in Odini domibus
Non venio desperabundis
Verbis ad Odini aulam.

26.

Hic vellent nunc omnes
Filii Aflaugæ gladiis
Amarum bellum excitare
Si exacte fcirent
Calamitates nostras
Quem non pauci angues
Venenati me discerpunt
Matrem accepi meis
Filiis ita ut corda valeant:

ON THE POEMS OF OSSIAN. 301

" bloody was the shield in battle, until Rafno

" the king was flain. From the heads of war" riors the warm fweat streamed down their

27.

Valde inclinatur ad hæreditatem Crudele stat nocumentum a vipera Anguis inhabitat aulam cordis Speramus alterius ad Othini Virgam in Ellæ fanguine Filiis meis livescet Sua ira rubescet Non acres juvenes Sessionem tranquillam facient.

28.

Habeo quinquagies
Prælia fub fignis facta
Ex belli invitatione & femel
Minime putavi hominum
Quod me futurus effet
Juvenis didici mucronem rubefacere
Alius rex præftantior
Nos Afæ invitabunt
Non eft lugenda mors.

29.

Fert animus finire
Invitant me Dysæ
Quas ex Othini aula
Othinus mihi miste
Lætus cerevisiam cum Asis
In summa sede bibam
Vitæ elapsæ sunt horæ Ridens moriar.

" armour. The crows around the Indirian " iflands had an ample prey. It were difficult " to fingle out one among fo many deaths. At " the rifing of the fun I beheld the fpears pier-" cing the bodies of foes, and the bows throwing " forth their fleel-pointed arrows. Loud roared "the fwords in the plains of Lano.-The vir-" gin long bewailed the flaughter of that morn-" ing."-In this firain the poet continues to describe several other military exploits. The images are not much varied: the noise of arms, the streaming of blood, and the feasting the birds of prey, often recurring. He mentions the death of two of his fons in battle; and the lamentation he describes as made for one of them is very fingular. A Grecian or Roman poet would have introduced the virgins or nymphs of the wood, bewailing the untimely fall of a young hero. But, fays our Gothic poet, "When Rogvaldus was flain, for him " mourned all the hawks of heaven," as lamenting a benefactor who had fo liberally supplied them with prey; " for boldly," as he adds, " in the strife of swords, did the breaker of hel-" mets throw the spear of blood."

THE poem concludes with fentiments of the highest bravery and contempt of death. "What " is more certain to the brave man than death, though amidst the storm of swords, he stands " always ready to oppose it? He only regrets " this life who hath never known diffrefs. The " timorous man allures the devouring eagle to " the field of battle. The coward, wherever he " comes, is useless to himself. This I esteem to honourable, that the youth should advance to " the combat fairly matched one against ano-" ther; nor man retreat from man. Long was " this the warrior's highest glory. He who " afpires to the love of virgins, ought always to " be foremost in the roar of arms. It appears " to me of truth, that we are led by the Fates. " Seldom can any overcome the appointment of destiny. Little did I foresee that Ella * was " to have my life in his hands, in that day when " fainting I concealed my blood, and pushed " forth my thips into the waves; after we had " fpread a repast for the beasts of prey through-" out the Scottish bays. But this makes me " always rejoice that in the halls of our father " Balder [or Odin] I know there are feats pre-" pared, where, in a short time, we shall be " drinking ale out of the hollow skulls of our " enemies. In the house of the mighty Odin, " no brave man laments death. I come not

3

^{*} This was the name of his enemy who had condemned him to death.

" with the voice of despair to Odin's hall. How " eagerly would all the fons of Aslauga now " rush to war, did they know the distress of " their father, whom a multitude of venomous " ferpents tear! I have given to my children a " mother who hath filled their hearts with va-" lour. I am fast approaching to my end. A " cruel death awaits me from the viper's bite. " A fnake dwells in the midst of my heart. I " hope that the fword of fome of my fons shall " yet be flained with the blood of Ella. The " valiant youths will wax red with anger, and " will not fit in peace. Fifty and one times have " I reared the standard in battle. In my youth " I learned to dye the fword in blood: my hope " was then, that no king among men would be " more renowned than me. The goddesses of "death will now foon call me; I must not " mourn my death. Now I end my fong. The " goddesses invite me away; they whom Odin has " fent to me from his hall. I will fit upon a " lofty feat, and drink ale joyfully with the " goddesses of death. The hours of my life are " run out. I will fmile when I die."

This is fuch poetry as we might expect from a barbarous nation. It breathes a most ferocious spirit. It is wild, harsh, and irregular; but at the same time animated and strong; the style, in the original, full of invertions, and, as we learn from fome of Olaus's notes, highly metaphorical and figured.

But when we open the works of Offian, a very different fcene prefents itself. There we find the fire and the enthufiafin of the most early times, combined with an amazing degree of regularity and art. We find tenderness, and even delicacy of fentiment, greatly predominant over fierceness and barbarity. Our hearts are melted with the foftest feelings, and at the fame time elevated with the highest ideas of magnanimity, generofity, and true heroifm. When we turn from the poetry of Lodbrog to that of Oslian, it is like passing from a favage defart, into a fertile and cultivated country. How is this to be accounted for? Or by what means to be reconciled with the remote antiquity attributed to thefe poems? This is a curious point; and requires to be illustrated.

THAT the ancient Scots were of Celtic original, is past all doubt. Their conformity with the Celtic nations in language, manners, and religion, proves it to a full demonstration. The Celtæ, a great and mighty people, altogether distinct from the Goths and Teutones, once extended their dominion over all the west of Europe; but seem to have had their most full and Vol. II.

compleat establishment in Gaul. Wherever the Celtæ or Gauls are mentioned by ancient writers, we feldom fail to hear of their Druids and their Bards; the inflitution of which two orders, was the capital diffinction of their manners and policy. The Druids were their philosophers and priefts; the Bards, their poets and recorders of heroic actions: And both thefe orders of men', feen to have fubfifted among them, as chief members of the state, from time immemorial *. We must not therefore imagine the Celtæ to have been altogether a groß and rude nation. They possessed from very remote ages a formed fystem of discipline and manners, which appears to have had a deep and lafting influence. Ammianus Marcellinus gives them this express testimony, that there flourished among them the fludy of the most laudable arts; introduced by the Bards, whose office it was to fing in heroic verse, the gallant actions of illustrious men; and by the Druids, who lived together in colleges or focieties, after the Pytha-

^{*} Τεία φύλα τῶν τιμωμενων διαφερίντως ἐκί. Βαρδοι τε καὶ ἐατικς, κὰ Δρύιδαι. Βαρδοι μεν ὑμυνταὶ κὰ στοινταὶ. Strabo. lib. 4.

Ε΄ οι παρ ἄυτοῖς καὶ πεικταὶ μελών, Ες Βαρδυς δνομαζεσιν. Ετοι δί μετ' δργάνων, ταῖς λυραις όμινιων, Ες μει υμιώσι, Ες δι βλασφημυσικ-Diodor. Sicul. 1. 5.

Τα δε άκεσματα άυτῶν εισιν δι καλέμενοι βαεδοι. ποιηταί δ'έτοι τυξχαιέστι μετ' ώδης έπαινές λεγοντες. Pofidonius ap. Athenæum, 1. 6.

gorean manner, and philosophizing upon the highest subjects, afferted the immortality of the human foul *. Though Julius Cæfar in his account of Gaul, does not expresly mention the Bards, yet it is plain that under the title of Druids, he comprehends that whole college or order; of which the Bards, who, it is probable, were the disciples of the Druids, undoubtedly made a part. It deferves remark, that, according to his account, the Druidical institution first took rife in Britain, and paffed from thence into Gaul; fo that they who aspired to be thorough masters of that learning were wont to refort to Britain. He adds too, that fuch as were to be initiated among the Druids, were obliged to commit to their memory a great number of verfes, infomuch that fome employed twenty years in this course of education; and that they did not think it lawful to record these poems in writing, but facredly handed them down by tradition from race to race +.

^{*} Per hæc loca (speaking of Gaul) hominibus paulatim excultis, viguere studia laudabilium doctrinarum; inchoata per Bardos & Euhages & Druidas. Et Bardi quidem fortia virorum illustrium facta heroicis composita versibus cum dulcibus lyræ modulis cantitarunt. Euhages vero scrutantes seriem & sublimia naturæ pandere conabantur. Inter hos, Druidæ ingeniis celsiores, ut auctoritas Pythagoræ decrevit, sodalitis adstricti consortiis, quæstionibus altarum occultarumque rerum erecti sunt; & despectantes humana promuniarunt animas immortales. Amm. Marcellinus, 1. 15. cap. 9.

So firong was the attachment of the Celtic nations to their poetry and their bards, that amidst all the changes of their government and manners, even long after the order of the Druids was extinct, and the national religion altered, the bards continued to flourish: not as a fet of ffrolling fongsters, like the Greek 'Aoidoi or Rhapfodiffs, in Homer's time, but as an order of men highly respected in the state, and supported by a public establishment. We find them, according to the testimonies of Strabo and Diodorus, before the age of Augustus Cæsar; and we find them remaining under the fame name, and exercifing the fame functions as of old, in Ireland, and in the north of Scotland, almost down to our own times. It is well known that in both these countries, every Regulus or chief had his own bard, who was confidered as an officer of rank in his court; and had lands affigned him, which defcended to his family. Of the honour in which the bards were held, many inftances occur in Offian's poems. On all important occasions, they were the ambassadors between contending chiefs; and their perfons were held facred. "Cairbar feared to stretch his fword to the bards, though his foul was dark. Loofe

ON THE POEMS OF OSSIAN. 309

- " the bards, faid his brother Cathmor, they are
- " the fons of other times. Their voice thall be
- " heard in other ages, when the kings of Te-
- " mora have failed."

From all this, the Celtic tribes clearly appear to have been addicted in fo high a degree to poetry, and to have made it fo much their fludy from the earlieft times, as may remove our wonder at meeting with a vein of higher poetical refinement among them, than was at first fight to have been expected among nations, whom we are accustomed to call barbarous. Barbarity, I must observe, is a very equivocal term; it admits of many different forms and degrees; and though, in all of them, it excludes polished manners, it is, however, not inconsistent with generous fentiments and tender affections †.

W hat

Sol, clarissimum emitte lumen in paludem Orra. Si enisus in summa picearum cacumina scirem me visurum Orra palu-

⁺ Surely among the wild Laplanders, if any where, barbarity is in its most perfect state. Yet their love song, which Scheffer has given us in his supponia, are a proof that natural tenderness of sentiment may be sound in a country, into which the least glimmering of science has never penetrated. To most English readers these songs are well known by the elegant translations of them in the Spectator, N. 3t and 40s. I shall subjoin Scheffer's Latin version of one of them, which has the appearance of being strictly literal,

What degrees of friendship, love, and heroism, may possibly be found to prevail in a rude state of fociety, no one can say. Assonishing instances of them we know, from history, have sometimes appeared: and a sew characters distinguished by those high qualities, might lay a soundation for a set of manners being introduced into the songs of the bards, more refined, it is probable, and exalted, according to the usual poetical licence, than the real manners of the country. In particular, with respect to heroism; the great employment of the Celtic bards, was to delineate the characters, and sing the praises of heroes. So Lucan;

dem, in ea eniterer, ut viderem inter quos amica, mea effet flores; omnes suscinderem frutices ibi enatos, omnes ramos præsecarem, hos virentes ramos. Cursum nubium essem secutus, quæ iter soum instituunt versus paludem Orra, si ad te volare possem alis, cornicum alis. Sed mihi desunt alæ, alæ querquedulæ, pedesque, anserum pedes planiæve bonæ, quæ deferre me valeant ad te. Satis expectafti diu; per tot dies, tot dies tuos optimos, oculis tuis jucundissimis, corde tuo amicissimo. Quod si longissime velles effugere, cito tamen te consequerer. Quid firmius validiusve esse potest quam contorti nervi, catenave ferreæ, quæ durissime ligant? Sic amor contorquet caput nostrum, mutat cogitationes & sententias. Puerorum voluntas, voluntas venti; juvenum cogitationes, longæ cogitationes. Quos si audirem omnes, a via, a via justa declinarem. Unum est confilium quod capiam; ita scio viam rectiorem me reperturum. Schefferi Lapponia, Cap. 25.

Vos quoque qui fortes animos, belloque peremptos,

Laudibus in longum vates diffunditis ævum Plurima fecuri fudiftis carmina bardi.

Pharf. 1. 1.

Now when we confider a college or order of men, who, cultivating poetry throughout a long feries of ages, had their imaginations continually employed on the ideas of heroifm; who had all the poems and panegyricks, which were composed by their predecessors, handed down to them with care; who rivalled and endeavoured to outfirip those who had gone before them, each in the celebration of his particular hero; is it not natural to think, that at length the character of a hero would appear in their fongs with the highest lustre, and be adorned with qualities truly noble? Some of the qualities indeed which diffinguith a Fingal, moderation, humanity, and clemency, would not probably be the first ideas of heroism occurring to a barbarous people: But no fooner had fuch ideas begun to dawn on the minds of poets, than, as the human mind eafily opens to the native reprefentations of human perfection, they would be feized and embraced; they would enter into their panegyricks; they would afford materials for fucceeding bards to work upon, and improve: they would contribute not a little to exalt the public manners. For fuch fongs as these, familiar to the Celtic warriors from their. childhood, and throughout their whole life, both in war and in peace, their principal entertainment, must have had a very considerable influence in propagating among them real manners nearly approaching to the poetical; and in forming even fuch a hero as Fingal. Especially when we confider that among their limited objects of ambition, among the few advantages which in a favage flate, man could obtain over man, the chief was Fame, and that Immortality which they expected to receive from their virtues and exploits, in the fongs of bards *.

HAVING made these remarks on the Celtic poetry and bards in general, I thall next confider the particular advantages which Offian poffeffed. He appears clearly to have lived in a period which enjoyed all the benefit I just now mentioned of traditionary poetry. The exploits of Trathal, Trenmor, and the other ancestors of Fingal, are fpoken of as familiarly known. An-

^{*} When Edward I. conquered Wales, he put to death all the Welch bards. This cruel policy plainly shews, how great an influence he imagined the fongs of these bards to have over the minds of the people; and of what nature he judged that influence to be. The Welch bards were of the same Celtic race with the Scottish and Irish.

cient bards are frequently alluded to. In one remarkable passage, Ossian describes himself as living in a fort of claffical age, enlightened by the memorials of former times, which were conveyed in the fongs of bards; and points at a period of darkness and ignorance which lay beyond the reach of tradition. "His words," fays he, "came only by halves to our ears; they " were dark as the tales of other times, before " the light of the fong arofe." Offian, himfelf, appears to have been endowed by nature with an exquisite sensibility of heart; prone to that tender melancholy which is fo often an attendant on great genius; and fusceptible equally of strong and of fost emotions. He was not only a professed bard, educated with care, as we may eafily believe, to all the poetical art then known, and connected, as he shews us himfelf, in intimate friendship with the other contemporary bards, but a warrior also; and the fon of the most renowned hero and prince of his age. This formed a conjunction of circumstances, uncommonly favourable towards exalting the imagination of a poet. He relates expeditions in which he had been engaged; he fings of battles in which he had fought and overcome; he had beheld the most illustrious scenes which that age could exhibit, both of heroisin in war, and magnificence in peace. For however rude the magnificence of those times may seem to us, we must remember that all ideas of magnificence are comparative; and that the age of Fingal was an æra of distinguished splendor in that part of the world. Fingal reigned over a considerable territory; he was enriched with the spoils of the Roman province; he was ennobled by his victories and great actions; and was in all respects a personage of much higher dignity than any of the chiestains, or heads of Clans, who lived in the same country, after a more extensive monarchy was established.

The manners of Ossian's age, so far as we can gather them from his writings, were abundantly favourable to a poetical genius. The two dispiriting vices, to which Longinus imputes the decline of poetry, covetousness and esseminacy, were as yet unknown. The cares of men were few. They lived a roving indolent life; hunting and war their principal employments; and their chief amusements, the musick of bards and "the" feast of shells." The great object pursued by heroic spirits, was "to receive their same," that is, to become worthy of being celebrated in the songs of bards; and "to have their name on the four grey stones." To die, unlamented by a bard, was deemed so great a missortune, as even to disturb their ghosts in another state. "They wander in thick mifts befide the reedy " lake; but never thall they rife, without the " fong, to the dwelling of winds." After death, they expected to follow employments of the fame nature with those which had amused them on earth; to fly with their friends on clouds, to purfue airy deer, and to liften to their praise in the mouths of bards. In fuch times as thefe, in a country where poetry had been fo long cultivated, and fo highly honoured, is it any wonder that among the race and fuccession of bards, one Homer should arise; a man who, endowed with a natural happy genius, favoured by peculiar advantages of birth and condition, and meeting in the course of his life, with a variety of incidents proper to fire his imagination, and to touch his heart, should attain a degree of eminence in poetry, worthy to draw the admiration of more refined ages?

THE compositions of Ossian are so strongly marked with characters of antiquity, that although there were no external proof to support that antiquity, hardly any reader of judgment and taste, could hesitate in referring them to a very remote æra. There are sour great stages through which men successively pass in the progress of society. The first and earliest is the life of hunters; pasturage succeeds to this, as the ideas of property begin to take root; next agriculture; and lastly, commerce. Throughout Ossian's poems, we plainly find ourselves in the first of these periods of society; during which, hunting was the chief employment of men, and the principal method of their procuring subsistence. Pasturage was not indeed wholly unknown; for we hear of dividing the herd in the case of a divorce; but the allusions to herds and to cattle are not many; and of agriculture, we find no traces. No cities appear to have been built in the territories of Fingal. No arts are mentioned except that of navigation and of working in iron †. Every thing presents to us the most simple and unimproved manners. At their feasts, the heroes prepared their own repast; they sat round the light of the burning oak; the wind listed their locks, and whistled through their open halls. Whatever was beyond the necessaries of life was known to them only as the spoil of the Roman province; "the gold "of the stranger; the lights of the stranger; the steeds of the stranger; the children of the "reign."

370

[†] Their skill in navigation need not at all surprize us. Living in the western islands, along the coast, or in a country which is every where intersected with arms of the sea, one of the first objects of their attention, from the earliest time, must have been how to traverse the waters. Hence that knowlege of the stars, so necessary for guiding them by night, of which we find several traces in Ostian's works; particularly in the beautiful description of Cathmor's shield, in the 7th book of Temora. Among all the northern maritime nations, navigation was very early studied. Piratical incursions were the chief means they employed for acquiring booty; and were among the sift exploits which distinguished them in the world. Even the savage Americans were at their first discovery found to possess the most surprizing skill and dexterity in navigating their immense lakes and rivers.

This representation of Offian's times, must strike us the more, as genuine and authentick, when it is compared with a poem of later date, which Mr. Macpherson has preserved in one of his notes. It is that wherein five bards are represented as passing the evening in the house of a chief, and each of them separately giving his description of the night. The night scenery is beautiful; and the author has plainly imitated the style and manner of Offian: But he has allowed some images to appear which betray a later period of society. For we meet with win-

The defeription of Cuthullin's chariot, in the 1st book of Fingal, has been objected to by some, as representing greater magnificence than is confishent with the supposed poverty of that age. But this chariot is plainly only a horse-litter; and the gems mentioned in the description, are no other than the shining stones or pebbles, known to be frequently sound along the western coast of Scotland.

dows clapping, the herds of goats and cows feeking shelter, the shepherd wandering, corn on the plain, and the wakeful hind rebuilding the shocks of corn which had been overturned by the tempest. Whereas in Ossian's works, from beginning to end, all is consistent; no modern allusion drops from him; but every where, the same sace of rude nature appears; a country wholly uncultivated, thinly inhabited, and recently peopled. The grass of the rock, the slower of the heath, the thisse with its beard, are the chief ornaments of his landscapes. "The defart," says Fingal, "is enough to me, with all its woods and deer."

The circle of ideas and transactions, is no wider than suits such an age: Nor any greater diversity introduced into characters, than the events of that period would naturally display. Valour and bodily strength are the admired qualities. Contentions arise, as is usual among savage nations, from the slightest causes. To be affronted at a tournament, or to be omitted in the invitation to a feast, kindles a war. Women are often carried away by force; and the whole tribe, as in the Homeric times, rise to avenge the wrong. The heroes show refinement of sentiment indeed on several occasions, but none of manners. They speak of their past actions actions with freedom, boast of their exploits, and fing their own praife. In their battles, it is evident that drums, trumpets, or bagpipes, were not known or used. They had no expedient for giving the military alarms but striking a shield, or raising a loud cry: And hence the loud and terrible voice of Fingal is often mentioned, as a necessary qualification of a great general; like the βοην αγαθος Μενελαος of Homer. Of military discipline or skill, they appear to have been entirely destitute. Their armies seem not to have been numerous; their battles were diforderly; and terminated, for the most part, by a personal combat, or wreflling of the two chiefs; after which, " the bard fung the fong " of peace, and the battle ceased along the " field."

THE manner of composition bears all the marks of the greatest antiquity. No artful tranfitions: nor full and extended connection of parts; fuch as we find among the poets of later times, when order and regularity of composition were more studied and known; but a style always rapid and vehement; in narration concife even to abruptness, and leaving feveral circumflances to be supplied by the reader's imagination. The language has all that figurative cast, which, as I before shewed, partly a glowing and undisciplined undifciplined imagination, partly the sterility of language and the want of proper terms, have always introduced into the early fpeech of nations; and in feveral respects, it carries a remarkable refemblance to the ftyle of the Old Testament. It deserves particular notice, as one of the most genuine and decisive characters of antiquity, that very few general terms or abflract ideas, are to be met with in the whole collection of Offian's works. The ideas of men, at first, were all particular. They had not words to express general conceptions. These were the confequence of more profound reflection, and longer acquaintance with the arts of thought and of fpeech. Offian, accordingly, almost never expresses himself in the abstract. His ideas extended little farther than to the objects he faw around him. A public, a community, the universe, were conceptions beyond his sphere. Even a mountain, a sea, or a lake, which he has occasion to mention, though only in a fimile, are for the most part particularized; it is the hill of Cromla, the florm of the fea of Malmor, or the reeds of the lake of Lego. A mode of expression, which whilst it is characteriffical of ancient ages, is at the fame time highly favourable to descriptive poetry. For the fame reasons, personification is a poetical figure not very very common with Offian. Inanimate objects, fuch as winds, trees, flowers, he fometimes perfonifies with great beauty. But the perfonifications which are fo familiar to later poets of Fame, Time, Terror, Virtue, and the rest of that class, were unknown to our Celtic bard. These were modes of conception too abstract for his age.

ALL these are marks so undoubted, and some of them too, fo nice and delicate, of the most early times, as put the high antiquity of these poems out of question. Especially when we confider, that if there had been any imposture in this case, it must have been contrived and executed in the Highlands of Scotland, two or three centuries ago; as up to this period, both by manuscripts, and by the testimony of a multitude of living witnesses, concerning the uncontrovertible tradition of these poems, they can clearly be traced. Now this is a period when that country enjoyed no advantages for a composition of this kind, which it may not be fupposed to have enjoyed in as great, if not in a greater degree, a thousand years before. To suppose that two or three hundred years ago, when we well know the Highlands to have been in a state of gross ignorance and barbarity, there should have arisen in that country a poet, of VOL. II. Y fuch

THERE are, befides, two other circumstances to be attended to, still of greater weight, if possible, against this hypothesis. One is, the total absence of religious ideas from this work; for which the translator has, in his preface, given a very probable account, on the footing of its being the work of Ossian. The druidical superstition was, in the days of Ossian, on the point of its final extinction; and for particular reasons, odious to the family of Fingal; whilst the Christian faith was not yet established. But had it been the work of one, to whom the ideas of christianity were familiar from his infancy; and who had superadded to them also the bigotbility.

ted superstition of a dark age and country; it is impossible but in some passage or other, the traces of them would have appeared. The other circumstance is, the entire silence which reigns with respect to all the great clans or families, which are now established in the Highlands. The origin of these several clans is known to be very ancient: And it is as well known, that there is no passion by which a native Highlander is more distinguished, than by attachment to his clan, and jealoufy for its honour. That a Highland bard in forging a work relating to the antiquities of his country, thould have inferted no circumstance which pointed out the rise of his own clan, which afcertained its antiquity, or increafed its glory, is of all suppositions that can be formed, the most improbable; and the silence on this head, amounts to a demonstration that the author lived before any of the prefent great clans were formed or known.

Assuming it then, as we well may, for certain, that the poems now under confideration, are genuine venerable monuments of very remote antiquity; I proceed to make fome remarks upon their general fpirit and firain. The two great characteristics of Osian's poetry are, tenderness and sublimity. It breathes nothing of the gay and chearful kind; an air of solemnity and feriousness is diffused over the whole. Offian is perhaps the only poet who never relaxes, or lets himself down into the light and antufing Arain; which I readily admit to be no finall difadvantage to him, with the bulk of readers. He moves perpetually in the high region of the grand and the pathetick. One key note is firuck at the beginning, and supported to the end; nor is any ornament introduced, but what is perfectly concordant with the general tone or melody. The events recorded, are all ferious and grave; the fcenery throughout, wild and romantic. The extended heath by the fea shore; the mountain shaded with mist; the torrent rushing through a folitary valley; the scattered oaks, and the tombs of warriors overgrown with moss; all produce a folemn attention in the mind, and prepare it for great and extraordinary events. We find not in Offian, an imagination that fports itself, and dresses out gay trisles to please the fancy. His poetry, more perhaps than that of any other writer, deferves to be stiled, The Poetry of the Heart. It is a heart penetrated with noble fentiments, and with fublime and tender passions; a heart that glows, and kindles the fancy; a heart that is full, and pours itself forth. Offian did not write, like modern poets, to please readers and critics. He sung from the love of poetry and fong. His delight was to think of the heroes among whom he had flourished; to recall the affecting incidents of his life; to dwell upon his past wars and loves and friendships; till, as he expresses it himself, "there comes a voice to Ossian and awakes his foul. It is the voice of years that are gone; "they roll before me with all their deeds;" and under this true poetic inspiration, giving vent to his genius, no wender we should so often hear, and acknowledge in his strains, the powerful and ever-pleasing voice of nature.

A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

—Arte, natura potentior omni.— Est Deus in nobis, agitante calescimus illo.

It is necessary here to observe, that the beauties of Ossian's writings cannot be selt by those who have given them only a single or a hasty perusal. His manner is so different from that of the poets, to whom we are most accustomed; his style is so concise, and so much crowded with imagery; the mind is kept at such a stretch in accompanying the author; that an ordinary reader is at first apt to be dazzled and satigued, rather than pleased. His poems require to be taken up at intervals, and to be frequently reviewed; and then it is impossible but his beauties must open to every reader who is capable of fenfibility. Those who have the highest degree of it, will relish them the most.

As Homer is, of all the great poets, the one whose manner, and whose times come the nearest to Offian's, we are naturally led to run a parallel in some instances between the Greek and the Celtic bard. For though Homer lived more than a thousand years before Ossian, it is not from the age of the world, but from the state of fociety, that we are to judge of refembling times. The Greek has, in feveral points, a manifest superiority. He introduces a greater variety of incidents; he possesses a larger compass of ideas; has more diversity in his characters; and a much deeper knowlege of human nature. It was not to be expected, that in any of these particulars, Offian could equal Homer. For Homer lived in a country where fociety was much farther advanced; he had beheld many more objects; cities built and flourishing; laws instituted; order, discipline, and arts begun. His field of observation was much larger and more fplendid; his knowlege, of course, more extensive; his mind also, it shall be granted, more penetrating, But if Ossian's ideas and objects be less diversified than those of Homer, they are all, however, of the kind fittest for poetry: The bravery and generofity of heroes, the tenderness of lovers, the attachments of friends, parents, and children. In a rude age and country, though the events that happen be few, the undiffipated mind broods over them more; they strike the imagination, and fire the passions in a higher degree; and of confequence become happier materials to a poetical genius, than the fame events when feattered through the wide circle of more varied action, and cultivated life.

HOMER is a more chearful and fprightly poet than Offian. You differn in him all the Greek vivacity; whereas Offian uniformly maintains the gravity and folemnity of a Celtic hero. This too is in a great measure to be accounted for from the different fituations in which they lived, partly personal, and partly national. Offian had furvived all his friends, and was disposed to melancholy by the incidents of his life. befides this, chearfulness is one of the many bleffings which we owe to formed fociety. The folitary wild flate is always a ferious one. Bating the fudden and violent burfts of mirth, which fometimes break forth at their dances and feafts; the favage American tribes have been noted by all travellers for their gravity and taciturnity. Somewhat of this taciturnity may be also remarked in Offian. On all occasions he is frugal of his words; and never gives you more of an image or a description, than is just fusficient to place it before you in one clear point of view. It is a blaze of lightning, which flashes and vanithes. Homer is more extended in his descriptions; and fills them up with a greater variety of circumstances. Both the poets are dramatick; that is, they introduce their personages frequently speaking before us. But Ossian is concife and rapid in his speeches, as he is in every other thing. Homer, with the Greek vivacity, had also some portion of the Greek loquacity. His speeches indeed are highly characteristical; and to them we are much indebted for that admirable display he has given of human nature. Yet if he be tedious any where, it is in these; fome of them trifling; and fome of them plainly unseasonable. Both poets are eminently sublime; but a difference may be remarked in the species of their fublimity. Homer's fublimity is accompanied with more impetuofity and fire; Offian's with more of a folemn and awful grandeur. Homer hurries you along; Offian elevates, and fixes you in aftonishment. Homer is most fublime in actions and battles; Ossian, in description and sentiment. In the pathetick, Homer, when he chuses to exert it, has great power; but Offian exerts that power much oftner, and has the character of tenderness far more deeply imprinted on his works. No poet knew better how to feize and melt the heart. With regard to dignity of fentiment, the pre-eminence must clearly be given to Ossian. This is indeed a surprising circumstance, that in point of humanity, magnanimity, virtuous feelings of every kind, our rude Celtic bard should be distinguished to such a degree, that not only the heroes of Homer, but even those of the polite and refined Virgil, are left far behind by those of Ossian.

AFTER these general observations on the genius and spirit of our author, I now proceed to a nearer view, and more accurate examination of his works: and as Fingal is the first great poem in this collection, it is proper to begin with it. To refuse the title of an epic poem to Fingal, because it is not in every little particular, exactly conformable to the practice of Homer and Virgil, were the mere fqueamithness and pedantry of criticism. Examined even according to Aristotle's rules, it will be found to have all the effential requifites of a true and regular epic; and to have feveral of them in fo high a degree, as at first view to raise our assonithment on finding Oslian's composition so agreeable to rules of which he was entirely ignorant. But our aftonishment will cease, when we consider from what fource Aristotle drew those rules. Homer knew no more of the laws of criticism than Offian. But guided by nature, he composed in verse a regular story, sounded on heroic actions, which all posterity admired. Aristotle, with great fagacity and penetration, traced the causes of this general admiration. He observed what it was in Homer's composition, and in the conduct of his flory, which gave it fuch power to please; from this observation he deduced the rules which poets ought to follow, who would write and please like Homer; and to a composition formed according to fuch rules, he gave the name of an epic poem. Hence his whole fyftem arose. Aristotle studied nature in Homer. Homer and Offian both wrote from nature. No wonder that among all the three, there should be fuch agreement and conformity.

THE fundamental rules delivered by Aristotle concerning an epic poem, are these: That the action which is the ground-work of the poem, should be one, complete, and great; that it should be seigned, not merely historical; that it should be enlivened with characters and manners; and heightened by the marvellous.

But before entering on any of thefe, it may perhaps be asked, what is the moral of Fingal? For, according to M. Bossu, an epic poem is no other than an allegory contrived to illustrate fome moral truth. The poet, fays this critic, must begin with fixing on some maxim, or inflruction, which he intends to inculcate on mankind. He next forms a fable, like one of Æsop's, wholly with a view to the moral; and having thus fettled and arranged his plan, he then looks into traditionary history for names and incidents, to give his fable fome air of probability. Never did a more frigid, pedantic notion, enter into the mind of a critic. We may fafely pronounce, that he who should compose an epic poem after this manner, who should first lay down a moral and contrive a plan, before he had thought of his personages and actors, might deliver indeed very found inftruction, but would find few readers. There cannot be the least doubt that the first object which strikes an epic poet, which fires his genius, and gives him any idea of his work, is the action or fubject he is to celebrate. Hardly is there any tale, any subject a poet can chuse for such a work, but will afford fome general moral instruction. An epic poem is by its nature one of the most moral of all poetical compositions: But its moral tendency is by no means to be limited to fome common-place maxim, which may be gathered from the flory. It arises from the admiration of heroic actions, which fuch a composition is peculiarly calculated to produce; from the virtuous emotions which the characters and incidents raise, whilst we read it; from the happy impression which all the parts separately, as well as the whole taken together, leave upon the mind. However, if a general moral be still insisted on, Fingal obviously furnishes one, not inserior to that of any other poet, viz. That Wisdom and Bravery always triumph over brutal force: or another nobler still; That the most compleat victory over an enemy is obtained by that moderation and generosity which convert him into a friend.

THE unity of the Epic action, which, of all Aristotle's rules, is the chief and most material, is fo strictly preferved in Fingal, that it must be perceived by every reader. It is a more compleat unity than what arises from relating the actions of one man, which the Greek critick justly censures as imperfect; it is the unity of one enterprife, the deliverance of Ireland from the invafion of Swaran: An enterprise, which has furely the full Heroic dignity. All the incidents recorded bear a conflant reference to one end; no double plot is carried on; but the parts unite into a regular whole: And as the action is one and great, fo it is an entire or compleat action. For we find, as the Critic farther requires, quires, a beginning, a middle, and an end; a Nodus, or intrigue in the poem; difficulties occurring through Cuthullin's rathness and bad fuccess; those difficulties gradually furmounted; and at last the work conducted to that happy conclusion which is held effential to Epic Poetry. Unity is indeed observed with greater exactness in Fingal, than in almost any other Epic composition. For not only is unity of fubject maintained, but that of time and place alfo. The Autumn is clearly pointed out as the feafon of the action; and from beginning to end the scene is never thisted from the heath of Lena, along the fea-thore. The duration of the action in Fingal, is much shorter than in the Iliad or Æneid. But fure there may be shorter as well as longer Heroic Poems; and if the authority of Aristotle be also required for this, he says expresly that the Epic composition is indefinite as to the time of its duration. Accordingly the Action of the Iliad lasts only forty-feven days, whilst that of the Æneid is continued for more than a year.

Throughout the whole of Fingal, there reigns that grandeur of fentiment, style, and imagery, which ought ever to distinguish this high species of poetry. The story is conducted with no small art. The poet goes not back to a tedious recital of the beginning of the war with Swaran; but haftening to the main action, he falls in exactly, by a most happy coincidence of thought, with the rule of Horace.

Semper ad eventum festinat, & in medias res,
Non secus ac notas, auditorem rapit——
Nec gemino bellum Trojanum orditur ab ovo.
De Arte Poet.

HE invokes no muse, for he acknowledged none; but his occasional addresses to Malvina, have a finer effect than the invocation of any muse. He sets out with no formal proposition of his fubject; but the fubject naturally and eafily unfolds itself; the poem opening in an animated manner, with the fituation of Cuthullin, and the arrival of a fcout who informs him of Swaran's landing. Mention is prefently made of Fingal, and of the expected affiftance from the ships of the lonely isle, in order to give further light to the fubject. For the poet often shows his address in gradually preparing us for the events he is to introduce; and in particular the preparation for the appearance of Fingal, the previous expectations that are raifed, and the extreme magnificence fully answering these expectations, with which the hero is at length presented to us, are all worked up with such skilful.

Akilful conduct as would do honour to any poet of the most refined times. Homer's art in magnifying the character of Achilles has been univerfally admired. Offian certainly thews no lefs art in aggrandizing Fingal. Nothing could be more happily imagined for this purpose than the whole management of the last battle, wherein Gaul the fon of Morni, had befought Fingal to retire, and to leave to him and his other chiefs the honour of the day. The generofity of the king in agreeing to this propofal; the majesty with which he retreats to the hill, from whence he was to behold the engagement, attended by his bards, and waving the lightning of his fword; his perceiving the chiefs overpowered by numbers, but from unwillingness to deprive them of the glory of victory by coming in perfon to their assistance, first fending Ullin, the bard, to animate their courage; and at last, when the danger becomes more preffing, his rifing in his might, and interpofing, like a divinity, to decide the doubtful fate of the day; are all circumstances contrived with fo much art as plainly discover the Celtic Bards to have been not unpractifed in Heroic poetry.

THE story which is the foundation of the Iliad is in itself as simple as that of Fingal. A quarrel arises between Achilles and Agamemnon concerning a female flave; on which, Achilles, apprehending himself to be injured, withdraws his affiffance from the rest of the Greeks. The Greeks fall into great distress, and beseech him to be reconciled to them. He refuses to fight for them in person, but sends his friend Patroclus; and upon his being flain, goes forth to revenge his death, and kills Hector. The fubject of Fingal is this: Swaran comes to invade Ireland: Cuthullin, the guardian of the young king, had applied for affiftance to Fingal, who reigned in the opposite coast of Scotland. But before Fingal's arrival, he is hurried by rash counsel to encounter Swaran. He is defeated; he retreats; and desponds. Fingal arrives in this conjuncture. The battle is for fome time dubious; but in the end he conquers Swaran; and the remembrance of Swaran's being the brother of Agandecca, who had once faved his life, makes him difmifs him honourably. Homer it is true has filled up his flory with a much greater variety of particulars than Offian; and in this has thewn a compass of invention superior to that of the other poet. But it must not be forgotten, that though Homer be more circumstantial, his incidents however are less diversified in kind than those of Offian. War and bloodthed reign throughout the Iliad; and notwithstanding all the fertility of Homer's invention, there is fo much uniformity in his subjects, that there are few readers, who, before the close, are not tired of perpetual fighting. Whereas in Offian, the mind is relieved by a more agreeable diversity. There is a finer mixture of war and heroifm, with love and friendship, of martial, with tender fcenes, than is to be met with, perhaps, in any other poet. The Epifodes too, have great propriety; as natural, and proper to that age and country: confifting of the fongs of bards, which are known to have been the great entertainment of the Celtic heroes in war, as well as in peace. These songs are not introduced at random; if you except the Epifode of Duchommar and Morna, in the first book, which though beautiful, is more unartful, than any of the rest; they have always some particular relation to the actor who is interested, or to the events which are going on; and, whilft they vary the scene, they preserve a sufficient connection with the main subject, by the fitness and propriety of their introduction.

As Fingal's love to Agandecca, influences fome circumstances of the poem, particularly the honourable difmission of Swaran at the end: it was necessary that we should be let into this VOL. II. \mathbf{Z} part part of the hero's flory. But as it lay without the compass of the present action, it could be regularly introduced no where, except in an Episode. Accordingly the poet, with as much propriety, as if Aristotle himself had directed the plan, has contrived an Episode for this purpose in the song of Carril, at the beginning of the third book.

THE conclusion of the poem is strictly according to rule; and is every way noble and pleafing. The reconciliation of the contending heroes, the confolation of Cuthullin, and the general felicity that crowns the action, footh the mind in a very agreeable manner, and form that passage from agitation and trouble, to perfeet quiet and repose, which critics require as the proper termination of the Epic work. "Thus they paffed the night in fong, and " brought back the morning with joy. Fingal " arofe on the heath; and fhook his glittering " fpear in his hand. He moved first towards " the plains of Lena; and we followed like a " ridge of fire. Spread the fail, faid the king of Morven, and catch the winds that pour " from Lena.-We rose on the wave with songs; " and rushed with joy through the foam of the " ocean."-So much for the unity and general conduct of the Epic action in Fingal.

WITH regard to that property of the fubject which Ariftotle requires, that it should be feigned not historical, he must not be understood so firictly, as if he meant to exclude all subjects which have any foundation in truth. For fuch exclusion would both be unreasonable in itself; and what is more, would be contrary to the practice of Homer, who is known to have founded his Iliad on historical facts concerning the war of Troy, which was famous throughout all Greece. Aristotle means no more than that it is the business of a poet not to be a mere annalist of Facts, but to embellish truth with beautiful, probable, and useful fictions; to copy nature, as he himfelf explains it, like painters, who preferve a likeness, but exhibit their objects more grand and beautiful than they are in reality. That Offian has followed this courfe, and building upon true history, has sufficiently adorned it with poetical fiction for aggrandizing his characters and facts, will not, I believe, be queftioned by most readers. At the same time, the foundation which those facts and characters had in truth, and the thare which the poet himfelf had in the transactions which he records, must be confidered as no fmall advantage to his work. For truth makes an impression on the mind far beyond any fiction; and no man, let his imagination be ever fo strong, relates any events fo feelingly as those in which he has been interested; paints any scene so naturally as one which he has feen; or draws any characters in fuch strong colours as those which he has perfonally known. It is confidered as an advantage of the Epic fubject to be taken from a period fo distant, as by being involved in the darkness of tradition, may give licence to fable. Though Offian's fubject may at first view appear unfavourable in this respect, as being taken from his own times, yet when we reflect that he lived to an extreme old age; that he relates what had been transacted in another country, at the distance of many years, and after all that race of men who had been the actors were gone off the ftage; we shall find the objection in a great measure obviated. In fo rude an age, when no written records were known, when tradition was loofe, and accuracy of any kind little attended to, what was great and heroic in one generation, eafily ripened into the marvellous in the next.

The natural representation of human characters in an Epic Poem is highly effential to its merit: And in respect of this there can be no doubt of Homer's excelling all the heroic poets who have ever wrote. But though Ossian be much inferior to Homer in this article, he will be found to be equal at least, if not superior, to Virgil; and has indeed given all the difplay of human nature which the fimple occurrences of his times could be expected to furnish. No dead uniformity of character prevails in Fingal; but on the contrary the principal characters are not only clearly diffinguished, but fometimes artfully contrasted, fo as to illustrate each other. Offian's heroes are, like Homer's, all brave; but their bravery, like those of Homer's too, is of different kinds. For instance; the prudent, the fedate, the modest and circumspect Connal, is finely opposed to the prefumptuous, rash, overbearing, but gallant and generous Calmar. Calmar hurries Cuthullin into action by his temerity; and when he fees the bad effect of his counfels, he will not furvive the difgrace. Connal, like another Ulysses, attends Cuthullin to his retreat, counfels, and coniforts him under his misfortune. The fierce, the proud, and high fpirited Swaran is admirably contrasted with the calm, the moderate, and generous Fingal. The character of Ofcar is a favourite one throughout the whole poems. The amiable warmth of the young warrior; his eager impetuofity in the day of action; his passion for fame; his ubmission to his father; his tenderness for Malvina; are the strokes of a masterly pencil; the firokes are few; but it is the hand of nature, and attracts the heart. Offian's own character, the old man, the hero, and the bard, all in one, prefents to us through the whole work a most respectable and venerable figure, which we always contemplate with pleafure. Cuthullin is a hero of the highest class; daring, magnanimous, and exquifitely fenfible to honour. We become attached to his interest, and are deeply touched with his diffress; and after the admiration raifed for him in the first part of the poem, it is a strong proof of Ossian's masterly genius that he durst adventure to produce to us another hero, compared with whom, even the great Cuthullin, thould be only an inferior perfonage; and who should rife as far above him, as Cuthullin rifes above the reft.

HERE indeed, in the character and description of Fingal, Offian triumphs almost unrivalled: For we may boldly defy all antiquity to shew us any hero equal to Fingal. Homer's Hector possesses feveral great and amiable qualities; but Hector is a secondary personage in the Iliad, not the hero of the work. We see him only occasionally; we know much less of him than we do of Fingal; who not only in this Epic Poem, but in Temora, and throughout the rest of Offian's works, is presented in all that variety of lights, lights, which give the full display of a character. And though Hector faithfully discharges his duty to his country, his friends, and his family, he is tinctured, however, with a degree of the fame favage ferocity, which prevails among all the Homeric heroes. For we find him infulting over the fallen Patroclus, with the most cruel taunts, and telling him when he lies in the agony of death, that Achilles' cannot help him now; and that in a short time his body, stripped naked, and deprived of funeral honours, shall be devoured by the Vultures . Whereas in the character of Fingal, concur almost all the qualities that can ennoble human nature; that can either make us admire the hero, or love the man. He is not only unconquerable in war. but he makes his people happy by his wisdom in the days of peace. He is truly the father of his people. He is known by the epithet of "Fingal " of the mildest look;" and distinguished, on every occasion, by humanity and generofity. He is merciful to his foes +; full of affection to his ^{} Iliad xvi. 83c. Il. xvii. 127.

[†] When he commands his fons, after Swaran is taken prifoner, to "pursue the rest of Lochlin, over the heath of Lena; "that no vessel may hereaster bound on the dark-rolling waves "of Inistore;" he means not assuredly, as some have mistrepresented him, to order a general slaughter of the soes, and to Z 4

344 A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

his children; full of concern about his friends: and never mentions Agandecca, his first love, without the utmost tenderness. He is the univerfal protector of the distressed; " None ever " went fad from Fingal." O Ofcar! bend " the strong in arms; but spare the feeble hand. " Be thou a stream of many tides against the " foes of thy people; but like the gale that " moves the grafs, to those who ask thine aid. " So Trenmor lived; fuch Trathal was; and " fuch has Fingal been. My arm was the fup-" port of the injured; the weak rested behind " the lightning of my ficel."-These were the maxims of true heroifm, to which he formed his grandfon. His fame is reprefented as every where fpread; the greatest heroes acknowledge his fuperiority; his enemies tremble at his name; and the highest encomium that can be bestowed on one whom the poet would most exalt, is to fay, that his foul was like the foul of Fingal.

To do justice to the poet's merit, in supporting such a character as this, I must observe, what is not commonly attended to, that there is prevent their faving themselves by flight; but, like a wise general, he commands his chiefs to render the victory complete, by a total rout of the enemy; that they might adventure no more for the future, to set out any seet against him or his allies.

no part of poetical execution more difficult, than to draw a perfect character in fuch a manner, as to render it diffinet and affecting to the mind. Some strokes of human imperfection and frailty, are what usually give us the most clear view, and the most fensible impression of a character; because they present to us a man, such as we have feen; they recall known features of human nature. When poets attempt to go beyond this range, and defcribe a faultless hero, they, for the most part, set before us, a sort of vague undiffinguishable character, fuch as the imagination cannot lay hold of, or realize to itself, as the object of affection. We know how much Virgil has failed in this particular. His perfect hero, Æneas, is an unanimated, infipid perfonage, whom we may pretend to admire, but whom no one can heartily love. But what Virgil has failed in, Ossian, to our assonishment, has fuccessfully executed. His Fingal, though exhibited without any of the common human failings, is nevertheless a real man; a character which touches and interests every reader. To this it has much contributed, that the poet has reprefented him as an old man; and by this has gained the advantage of throwing around him a great many circumstances, peculiar to that age. which paint him to the fancy in a more distinct light. He is furrounded with his family; he instructs his children in the principles of virtue; he is narrative of his past exploits; he is venerable with the grey locks of age; he is frequently disposed to moralize, like an old man, on human vanity and the prospect of death. There is more art, at least more felicity, in this, than may at first be imagined. For youth and old age, are the two states of human life, capable of being placed in the most picturesque lights. Middle age is more general and vague; and has fewer circumstances peculiar to the idea of it. And when any object is in a fituation, that admits it to be rendered particular, and to be cloathed with a variety of circumstances, it always stands out more clear and full in poetical description.

Besides human perfonages, divine or fupernatural agents are often introduced into epic poetry; forming what is called the machinery of it; which most critics hold to be an essential part. The marvellous, it must be admitted, has always a great charm for the bulk of readers. It gratisties the imagination, and affords room for striking and sublime description. No wonder therefore, that all poets should have a strong propensity towards it. But I must observe, that nothing is more difficult, than to adjust properly the marvellous with the probable. If a poet facristice facrifice probability, and fill his work with extravagant fupernatural fcenes, he fpreads over it an appearance of romance and childish fiction; he transports his readers from this world, into a fantastick, visionary region; and loses that weight and dignity which should reign in epic poetry. No work, from which probability is altogether banished, can make a lasting or deep impression. Human actions and manners, are always the most interesting objects which can be presented to a hum in mind. All machinery, therefore, is faulty which withdraws thefe too much from view; or obscures them under a cloud of incredible fictions. Befides being temperately employed, machinery ought always to have fome foundation in popular belief. A poet is by no means at liberty to invent what fystem of the marvellous he pleases: He must avail himself either of the religious faith, or the superflitious credulity of the country wherein he lives; fo as to give an air of probability to events which are most contrary to the common course of nature.

In these respects, Ossian appears to me to have been remarkably happy. He has indeed followed the fame course with Homer. For it is perfectly abfurd to imagine, as fome critics have done, that Homer's mythology was invented by him, in consequence of profound reflections on the benefit it would yield to poetry. Homer was no fuch refining genius. He found the traditionary stories on which he built his Iliad, mingled with popular legends, concerning the intervention of the gods; and he adopted these, because they amused the fancy. Offian, in like manner, found the tales of his country full of ghosts and spirits: It is likely he believed them himself; and he introduced them, because they gave his poems that folemn and marvellous cast, which fuited his genius. This was the only machinery he could employ with propriety; because it was the only intervention of supernatural beings, which agreed with the common belief of the country. It was happy; because it did not interfere in the least with the proper display of human characters and actions: because it had less of the incredible, than most other kinds of poetical machinery; and because it served to diverfify the scene, and to heighten the subject by an awful grandeur, which is the great defign of machinery.

As Offian's mythology is peculiar to himfelf, and makes a confiderable figure in his other poems, as well as in Fingal, it may be proper to make fome observations on it, independent of its subserviency to epic composition. It turns for the most part on the appearances of departed spirits. These, consonantly to the notions of every rude age, are reprefented not as purely immaterial, but as thin airy forms, which can be visible or invisible at pleasure; their voice is feeble; their arm is weak; but they are endowed with knowlege more than human. In a feparate state, they retain the same dispositions which animated them in this life. They ride on the wind; they bend their airy bows; and purfue deer formed of clouds. The ghosts of departed bards continue to fing. The ghofts of departed heroes frequent the fields of their former fame. "They rest together in their caves, and talk of " mortal men. Their fongs are of other worlds. " They come fometimes to the ear of rest, and " raise their feeble voice." All this presents to us much the fame fet of ideas, concerning spirits, as we find in the eleventh book of the Odyffey, where Ulysses visits the regions of the dead: And in the twenty-third book of the Iliad, the ghost of Patroclus, after appearing to Achilles, vanishes precifely like one of Offian's, emitting a shrill, feeble cry, and melting away like fmoke.

But though Homer's and Offian's ideas concerning ghosts were of the same nature, we cannot but observe, that Offian's ghosts are drawn with much stronger and livelier colours than those of Homer. Offian describes ghoss with all the particularity of one who had seen and conversed with them, and whose imagination was full of the impression they had lest upon it. He calls up those awful and tremendous ideas which the

- Simulacra modis pallentia miris, are fitted to raife in the human mind; and which, in Shakespear's style, " harrow up the " foul." Crugal's ghost, in particular, in the beginning of the fecond book of Fingal, may vie with any appearance of this kind, described by any epic or tragic poet whatever. Most poets would have contented themselves with telling us, that he refembled, in every particular, the living Crugal; that his form and drefs were the fame, only his face more pale and fad; and that he bore the mark of the wound by which he fell. But Offian fets before our eyes a spirit from the invisible world, distinguished by all those features, which a strong assonithed imagination would give to a ghost. " A dark-red . " stream of fire comes down from the hill. " Crugal fat upon the beam; he that lately fell " by the hand of Swaran, Ariving in the battle " of heroes. His face is like the beam of the " fetting moon. His robes are of the clouds of "the hill. His eyes are like two decaying " flames. Dark is the wound of his breaft .-"The stars dim-twinkled through his form; " and his voice was like the found of a distant " ffream." The circumstance of the stars being beheld, "dim-twinkling through his form," is wonderfully picturefque; and conveys the most lively impression of his thin and shadowy subflance. The attitude in which he is afterwards placed, and the speech put into his mouth, are full of that folemn and awful fublimity, which fuits the fubject. "Dim, and in tears, he ftood " and firetched his pale hand over the hero. " Faintly he raifed his feeble voice, like the gale " of the reedy Lego .- My ghost, O Connal! " is on my native hills; but my corfe is on the " fands of Ullin. Thou shalt never talk with " Crugal, or find his lone steps in the heath. I " am light as the blaft of Cromla; and I move " like the shadow of mist. Connal, fon of " Colgar! I fee the dark cloud of death. It " hovers over the plains of Lena. The fons of " green Erin thall fall. Remove from the field " of ghofts .- Like the darkened moon he re-" tired in the midft of the whiftling blaft."

SEVERAL other appearances of spirits might be pointed out, as among the most fublime pasfages of Offian's poetry. The circumstances of them are confiderably diversified; and the fcenery always fuited to the occasion. " Ofcar " flowly afcends the hill. The meteors of night " fet on the heath before him. A distant tor-" rent faintly roars. Unfrequent blafts ruth "through aged oaks. The half-enlightened " moon finks dim and red behind her hill. " Feeble voices are heard on the heath. Ofcar "drew his fword." - Nothing can prepare the fancy more happily for the awful fcene that is to follow. "Trenmor came from his hill, at "the voice of his mighty fon. A cloud like " the fleed of the flranger, fupported his airy " limbs. His robe is of the mist of Lano, "that brings death to the people. His fword " is a green meteor, half-extinguished. His " face is without form, and dark. He fighed " thrice over the hero: And thrice, the winds " of the night roared around. Many were his " words to Ofcar-He flowly vanished, like " a mist that melts on the funny hill." To appearances of this kind, we can find no parallel among the Greek or Roman poets. They bring to mind that noble description in the book of Job: " In thoughts from the visions of " the night, when deep fleep falleth on men, " fear came upon me, and trembling, which " made all my bones to thake. Then a spirit " paffed

them

" passed before my face. The hair of my flesh food up. It stood still; but I could not dissect the form thereof. An image was before mine eyes. There was silence; and I heard a voice—Shall mortal man be more just than God *?"

As Offian's fupernatural beings are described with a furprizing force of imagination, fo they are introduced with propriety. We have only three ghosts in Fingal: That of Crugal, which comes to warn the hoft of impending destruction, and to advise them to fave themselves by retreat; that of Evirallin, the spouse of Ossian, which calls him to rife and refene their fon from danger; and that of Agandecca, which, just before the last engagement with Swaran, moves Fingal to pity, by mourning for the approaching destruction of her kinsmen and people. In the other poems, ghosts sometimes appear when invoked to foretell futurity; frequently, according to the notions of these times, they come as fore-runners of misfortune or death, to those whom they vifit; fometimes they inform their friends at a distance, of thier own death; and fometimes they are introduced to heighten the fcenery on fome great and folemn occasion.

† Job iv. 13-17.

"A hundred oaks burn to the wind; and faint light gleams over the heath. The ghofts of Ardven pass through the beam; and shew their dim and distant forms. Comala is half-" unseen on her meteor; and Hidallan is sullen and dim."——" The awful faces of other times, looked from the clouds of Crona."—
"Fercuth! I saw the ghost of night. Silent he flood on that bank; his robe of mist slew on the wind. I could behold his tears. An aged man he seemed, and full of thought."

THE ghosts of strangers mingle not with those of the natives. " She is feen; but not like the " daughters of the hill. Her robes are from the " ftrangers land; and she is still alone." When the ghost of one whom we had formerly known is introduced, the propriety of the living character is still preferved. This is remarkable in the appearance of Calmar's ghost, in the poem entitled The Death of Cuthullin. He feems to forebode Cuthullin's death, and to beckon him to his cave. Cuthullin reproaches him for fupposing that he could be intimidated by such prognoffics. "Why doft thou bend thy dark " eyes on me, ghost of the car-borne Calmar? "Would'st thou frighten me, O Matha's fon! " from the battles of Cormac? Thy hand was " not feeble in war; neither was thy voice for

" peace.

" peace. How art thou changed, chief of Lara! if now thou dost advise to sty! Retire thou to thy cave: Thou art not Calmar's shost: He delighted in battle; and his arm was like the thunder of heaven." Calmar makes no return to this seeming reproach: But, "He retired in his blast with joy; for he had heard the voice of his praise." This is precisely the ghost of Achilles in Homer; who, notwithstanding all the distatisfaction he expresses with his state in the region of the dead, as soon as he had heard his son Neoptolemus praised for his gallant behaviour, strode away with filent joy to rejoin the rest of the shades."

It is a great advantage of Offian's mythology, that it is not local and temporary, like that of most other ancient poets; which of course is apt to seem ridiculous, after the superstitions have passed away on which it was founded. Offian's mythology is, to speak so, the mythology of human nature; for it is sounded on what has been the popular belief, in all ages and countries, and under all forms of religion, concerning the appearances of departed spirits. Homer's machinery is always lively and amusing; but far from being always supported with proper dignity. The indecent fquabbles among his gods, furely do no honour to epic poetry. Whereas Offian's machinery has dignity upon all occafions. It is indeed a dignity of the dark and awful kind; but this is proper; because coincident with the strain and spirit of the poetry. A light and gay mythology, like Homer's, would have been perfectly unfuitable to the fubjects on which Offian's genius was employed. But though his machinery be always folenm, it is not, however, always dreary or difinal; it is enlivened, as much as the fubject would permit, by those pleasant and beautiful appearances, which he fometimes introduces, of the spirits of the hill. These are gentle spirits; descending on fun-beams; fair-moving on the plain; their forms white and bright; their voices fweet; and their visits to men propitious. The greatest praife that can be given, to the beauty of a living woman, is to fay, "She is fair as the "ghost of the hill; when it moves in a fun-" beam at noon, over the filence of Morven." "The hunter shall hear my voice from his " booth. He shall fear, but love my voice.

^{*} Odyff. Lib. 11.

" For fweet thall my voice be for my friends;

" for pleafant were they to me."

Besides ghosts, or the spirits of departed men, we find in Oslian some instances of other kinds of machinery. Spirits of a fuperior nature to ghosts are fometimes alluded to, which have power to embroil the deep; to call forth winds and florms, and pour them on the land of the stranger; to overturn forests, and to fend death among the people. We have prodigies too: a thower of blood: and when fome difafter is befalling at a distance, the found of death heard on the strings of Ossian's harp: all perfeelly confonant, not only to the peculiar ideas of northern nations, but to the general current of a superstitious imagination in all countries. The description of Fingal's airy hall, in the poem called Berrathon, and of the afcent of Malvina into it, deferves particular notice, as remarkably noble and magnificent. But above all, the engagement of Fingal with the spirit of Loda, in Carric-thura, cannot be mentioned without admiration. I forbear transcribing the paffage, as it must have drawn the attention of every one who has read the works of Offian. The undaunted courage of Fingal, opposed to all the terrors of the Scandinavian God; the appearance and the speech of that awful spirit; the wound which he receives, and the shriek which he fends forth, " as rolled into himfelf, he rofe " upon the wind;" are full of the most amazing and terrible majesty. I know no passage more A a 3 fublime fublime in the writings of any uninfpired author. The fiction is calculated to aggrandize the hero; which it does to a high degree; nor is it so unnatural or wild a fiction, as might at first be thought. According to the notions of those times, supernatural beings were material, and confequently, vulnerable, The spirit of Loda was not acknowledged as a deity by Fingal; he did not worship at the stone of his power; he plainly confidered him as the God of his enemies only; as a local deity, whose dominion extended no farther than to the regions where he was worshipped; who had, therefore, no title to threaten him, and no claim to his fubmission. We know there are poetical precedents of great authority, for fictions fully as extravagant; and if Homer be forgiven for making Diomed attack and wound in battle, the gods whom that chief himfelf worshipped, Oslian furely is pardonable for making his hero fuperior to the god of a foreign territory *.

Norwith-

^{*} The scene of this encounter of Fingal with the spirit of Loda is laid in Inistore, or the islands of Orkney; and in the description of Fingal's landing there, it is said, "A rock bends along the coast with all its echoing wood. On the top is the circle of Loda, with the mostly stone of power." In confirmation of Ossian's topography, it is proper to acquaint the reader that in these islands, as I have been well informed, there are many pillars, and circles of stones, still remaining,

NOTWITHSTANDING the poetical advantages which I have afcribed to Offian's machinery, I acknowledge it would have been much more beautiful and perfect, had the author discovered fome knowlege of a fupream Being. Although his filence on this head has been accounted for by the learned and ingenious translator in a very probable manner, yet still it must be held a confiderable difadvantage to the poetry. For the most august and lofty ideas that can embellish poetry are derived from the belief of a divine administration of the universe: And hence the invocation of a fupream Being, or at least of fome fuperior powers who are conceived as prefiding over human affairs, the folemnities of religious worship, prayers preferred, and affistance implored on critical occasions, appear known by the name of the stones and circles of Loda, or Loden; to which some degree of superstitious regard is annexed to this day. These islands, until the year 1468, made a part of the Danish dominions. Their ancient language, of which there are yet some remains among the natives, is called the Norse; and is a dialect, not of the Celtic, but of the Scandinavian tongue. The manners and the superstitions of the inhabitants, are quite distinct from those of the Highlands and western isles of Scotland. Their ancient songs too, are of a different strain and character, turning upon magical incantations and evocations from the dead, which were the favourite subjects of the old Runic poetry. They have many traditions among them of wars in former times with the inhabitants of the western islands.

A a 4

with

with great dignity in the works of almost all poets as chief ornaments of their compositions. The absence of all such religious ideas from Ossian's poetry, is a sensible blank in it; the more to be regretted, as we can easily imagine what an illustrious sigure they would have made under the management of such a genius as his; and how finely they would have been adapted to many situations which occur in his works.

AFTER fo particular an examination of Fingal, it were needless to enter into as full a discussion of the conduct of Temora, the other Epic Poem. Many of the same observations, especially with regard to the great characteristics of heroic poetry, apply to both. The high merit, however, of Temora, requires that we thould not pass it by without some remarks.

THE fcene of Temora, as of Fingal, is laid in Ireland; and the action is of a posterior date. The subject is, an expedition of the hero, to dethrone and punish a bloody usurper, and to restore the possession of the kingdom to the posterity of the lawful prince; an undertaking worthy of the justice and heroism of the great Fingal. The action is one, and compleat. The poem opens with the descent of Fingal on the coast, and the consultation held among the chiefs of the enemy. The murder of the young prince prince Cormac, which was the cause of the war, being antecedent to the epic action, is introduced with great propriety as an episode in the first book. In the progress of the poem, three battles are described, which rise in their importance above one another; the success is various, and the issue for some time doubtful; till at last, Fingal brought into distress, by the wound of his great general Gaul, and the death of his son Fillan, assumes the command himself, and having slain the Irith king in single combat, restores the rightful heir to his throne.

TEMORA has perhaps less fire than the other epic poem; but in return it has more variety, more tenderness, and more magnificence. The reigning idea, fo often prefented to us of " Fingal in the last of his fields," is venerable and affecting; nor could any more noble conclusion be thought of, than the aged hero, after fo many fuccefsful atchievements, taking his leave of battles, and with all the folemnities of those times resigning his spear to his son. The events are less crouded in Temora than in Fingal; actions and characters are more particularly displayed; we are let into the transactions of both hofts; and informed of the adventures of the night as well as of the day. The still pathetic, and the romantic scenery of several of the night night adventures, fo remarkably fuited to Offian's genius, occasion a fine diversity in the poem; and are happily contrasted with the military operations of the day.

In most of our author's poems, the horrors of war are foftened by intermixed scenes of love and friendthip. In Fingal, thefe are introduced as epifodes; in Temora, we have an incident of this nature wrought into the body of the piece; in the adventure of Cathmor and Sulmalla. This forms one of the most conspicuous beauties of that poem. The diffress of Sulmalla, disguised and unknown among strangers, her tender and anxious concern for the fafety of Cathmor, her dream, and her melting remembrance of the land of her fathers; Cathmor's emotion when he first discovers her, his struggles to conceal and fuppress his passion, lest it should unman him in the midst of war, though " his foul " poured forth in fecret, when he beheld her " fearful eye;" and the last interview between them, when overcome by her tenderness, he lets her know he had discovered her, and confesses his passion; are all wrought up with the most exquisite sensibility and delicacy.

BESIDES the characters which appeared in Fingal, feveral new ones are here introduced; and though, as they are all the characters of warriors, warriors, bravery is the predominant feature, they are nevertheless diversified in a sensible and striking manner. Foldath, for instance, the general of Cathmor, exhibits the perfect picture of a favage chieftain: Bold, and daring, but prefumptuous, cruel, and overbearing. He is diffinguithed, on his first appearance, as the friend of the tyrant Cairbar; "His stride is " haughty; his red eye rolls in wrath." In his person and whole deportment, he is contrasted with the mild and wife Hidalla, another leader of the fame army, on whose humanity and gentleness he looks with great contempt. He profeffedly delights in strife and blood. He infults over the fallen. He is imperious in his counfels, and factious when they are not followed. He is unrelenting in all his fchemes of revenge, even to the length of denying the funeral fong to the dead; which, from the injury thereby done to their ghofts, was in those days considered as the greatest barbarity. Fierce to the last, he comforts himself in his dying moments with thinking that his ghost shall often leave its blaft to rejoice over the graves of those he had flain. Yet Offian, ever prone to the pathetic, has contrived to throw into his account of the death, even of this man, fome tender circumflances; by the moving description of his daughter Dardulena, the last of his race.

THE character of Foldath tends much to exalt that of Cathmor, the chief commander, which is distinguished by the most humane virtues. He abhors all fraud and cruelty, is famous for his hospitality to strangers; open to every generous fentiment, and to every foft and compassionate feeling. He is so amiable as to divide the reader's attachment between him and the hero of the poem; though our author has artfully mapaged it fo, as to make Cathmor himself indirectly acknowledge Fingal's fuperiority, and to appear fomewhat apprehensive of the event, after the death of Fillan, which he knew would call forth Fingal in all his might. It is very remarkable, that although Offian has introduced into his poems three complete heroes, Cuthullin, Cathmor, and Fingal, he has, however, fenfibly diffinguithed each of their characters. Cuthullin is particularly honourable; Cathmor particularly amiable; Fingal wife and great, retaining an afcendant peculiar to himself in whatever light he is viewed.

But the favourite figure in Temora, and the one most highly finished, is Fillan. His character is of that fort, for which Ossian shews a particular particular fondness; an eager, servent young warrior, fired with all the impatient enthusiasin for military glory, peculiar to that time of life. He had sketched this in the description of his own son Oscar; but as he has extended it more fully in Fillan, and as the character is so consonant to the epic strain, though so far as I remember, not placed in such a conspicuous light by any other epic poet, it may be worth while to attend a little to Ossian's management of it in this instance.

FILLAN was the youngest of all the fons of Fingal; younger, it is plain, than his nephew Ofcar, by whose fame and great deeds in war, we may naturally suppose his ambition to have been highly stimulated. Withal, as he is younger, he is described as more rath and fiery. His first appearance is foon after Oscar's death, when he was employed to watch the motions of the foe by night. In a conversation with his brother Offian, on that occasion, we learn that it was not long fince he began to lift the fpear. " Few are the marks of my fword in battle; " but my foul is fire." He is with fome difficulty reftrained by Offian from going to attack the enemy; and complains to him, that his father had never allowed him any opportunity of fignalizing his valour. " The king hath not " remarked " remarked my fword; I go forth with the " croud; I return without my fame." Soon after, when Fingal according to custom was to appoint one of his chiefs to command the army, and each was standing forth, and putting in his claim to this honour, Fillan is prefented in the following most picturesque and natural attitude. "On his spear stood the son of Clatho, in the " wandering of his locks. Thrice he raifed his " eyes to Fingal: his voice thrice failed him as " he spoke. Fillan could not boast of battles, " at once he strode away. Bent over a distant " ftream he flood; the tear hung in his eye. " He struck, at times, the thistle's head, with " his inverted fpear." No lefs natural and beautiful is the description of Fingal's paternal emotion on this occasion. " Nor is he unseen " of Fingal. Side-long he beheld his fon. He " beheld him with burfling joy. He hid the " big tear with his locks, and turned amidst his " crouded foul." The command, for that day, being given to Gaul, Fillan rushes amidst the thickest of the foe, faves Gaul's life, who is wounded by a random arrow, and diffinguishes himself so in battle, that "the days of old " return on Fingal's mind, as he beholds the " renown of his fon. As the fun rejoices from " the cloud, over the tree his beams have raifed,

" whilft

"whilst it shakes its lonely head on the heath, fo joyful is the king over Fillan." Sedate however and wise, he mixes the praise which he bestows on him with some reprehension of his rashness, "My son, I saw thy deeds, and my foul was glad. Thou art brave, son of Clatho, but headlong in the strife. So did not Fingal advance, though he never seared a fee. Let thy people be a ridge behind thee; they are thy strength in the field. Then shalt thou be long renowned, and behold the tombs of thy fathers."

On the next day, the greatest and the last of Fillan's life, the charge is committed to him of leading on the hoft to battle. Fingal's speech to his troops on this occasion is full of noble fentiment; and where he recommends his fon to their care, extremely touching. "A young " beam is before you; few are his steps to war. "They are few, but he is valiant; defend my " dark-haired fon. Bring him back with joy; " hereafter he may stand alone. His form " is like his fathers; his foul is a flame of their " fire." When the battle begins, the poet puts forth his strength to describe the exploits of the young hero; who, at last encountering and killing with his own hand Foldath the oppofite general, attains the pinnacle of glory. In what follows.

follows, when the fate of Fillan is drawing near. Offian, if any where, excells himfelf. Foldath being flain, and a general rout begun, there was no refource left to the enemy but in the great Cathmor himfelf, who in this extremity defcends from the hill, where, according to the custom of those princes, he surveyed the battle. Observe how this critical event is wrought up by the poet. "Wide spreading over echoing " Lubar, the flight of Bolga is rolled along. " Fillan hung forward on their steps; and " firewed the heath with dead. Fingal rejoiced " over his fon. - Blue-shielded Cathmor rose. "-Son of Alpin, bring the harp! Give " Fillan's praise to the wind; raise high his " praife in my hall, while yet he thincs in war. " Leave, blue-eyed Clatho! leave thy hall! " behold that early beam of thine! The hoft is " withered in its courfe. No farther look-" it is dark-light-trembling from the harp, " ftrike, virgins! ftrike the found." The fudden interruption, and fuspense of the narration on Cathmor's rifing from his hill, the abrupt bursting into the praise of Fillan, and the pasfionate apostrophe to his mother Clatho, are admirable efforts of poetical art, in order to interest us in Fillan's danger; and the whole is heightened by the immediately following fimile, one of the most magnificent and sublime that is to be met with in any poet, and which if it had been found in Homer, would have been the frequent subject of admiration to critics; "Fil"lan is like a spirit of heaven, that descends "from the skirt of his blast. The troubled "ocean feels his steps, as he strides from wave to wave. His path kindles behind him; "islands shake their heads on the heaving "feas."

Bur the poet's art is not yet exhausted. The fall of this noble young warrior, or in Offian's stile, the extinction of this beam of heaven, could not be rendered too interesting and affeeting. Our attention is naturally drawn towards Fingal. He beholds from his hill the rifing of Cathmor, and the danger of his fon. But what thall he do? " Shall Fingal rife to his " aid, and take the fword of Luno? What "then should become of thy fame, fon of " white-bosomed Clatho? Turn not thine eyes " from Fingal, daughter of Inistore! I shall " not quench thy early beam.-No cloud of " mine shall rife, my fon, upon thy foul of " fire." Struggling between concern for the fame, and fear for the fafety of his fon, he withdraws from the fight of the engagement; " and dispatches Offian in haste to the field, ВЬ with VOL. II.

with this affectionate and delicate injunction. " Father of Ofcar!" addressing him by a title which on this occasion has the highest propriety, "Father of Ofcar! lift the spear; defend " the young in arms. But conceal thy steps " from Fillan's eyes: He must not know that I " doubt his steel." Offian arrived too late. But unwilling to describe Fillan vanquished, the poet suppresses all the circumstances of the combat with Cathmor; and only shews us the dying hero. We fee him animated to the end with the fame martial and ardent spirit; breathing his last in bitter regret for being fo early cut off from the field of glory. "Offian, lay me in that " hollow rock. Raise no stone above me; lest " one should ask about my fame. I am fallen in " the first of my fields; fallen without renown. Let thy voice alone, fend joy to my flying " foul. Why should the bard know where " dwells the early-fallen Fillan." He who after tracing the circumftances of this flory, shall deny that our bard is possessed of high sentiment and high art, must be strangely prejudiced indeed. Let him read the story of Pallas in Virgil, which is of a fimilar kind; and after all the praise he may justly bestow on the elegant and finished description of that amiable author, les him fay, which of the two poets unfold most of the human foul. I wave infifting on any more of the particulars in Temora; as my aim is rather to lead the reader into the genius and fpirit of Offian's poetry, than to dwell on all his beauties.

THE judgment and art discovered in conducting works of fuch length as Fingal and Temora, distinguish them from the other poems in this collection. The fmaller pieces, however, contain particular beauties no less eminent. They are historical poems, generally of the elegiac kind; and plainly discover themselves to be the work of the fame author. One confistent face of manners is every where prefented to us; one spirit of poetry reigns; the masterly hand of Offian appears throughout; the fame rapid and animated style; the same strong colouring of imagination, and the fame glowing fenfibility of heart. Besides the unity which belongs to the compositions of one man, there is moreover a certain unity of fubject, which very happily connects all these poems. They form the poetical history of the age of Fingal. The fame race of heroes whom we had met with in the greater poems, Cuchullin, Ofcar, Connal and Gaul return again upon the stage; and Fingal himself is always the principal figure, presented on every occasion, with equal mag-B b 2 nificence. nificence, nay rifing upon us to the last. The circumstances of Ossian's old age and blindness, his surviving all his friends, and his relating their great exploits to Malvina, the spouse or mistress of his beloved son Oscar, surnish the sinest poetical situations that fancy could devise for that tender pathetic which reigns in Ossian's poetry.

On each of these poems, there might be room for separate observations, with regard to the conduct and disposition of the incidents, as well as to the beauty of the descriptions and fentiments. Carthon is a regular and highly finished piece. The main story is very properly introduced by Clessammor's relation of the adventure of his youth; and this introduction is finely heightened by Fingal's fong of mourning over Moina; in which Ossian, ever fond of doing honour to his father, has contrived to distinguish him, for being an eminent poet, as well as warrior. Fingal's fong upon this occafion, when " his thousand Bards leaned forwards " from their feats, to hear the voice of the "King," is inferior to no passage in the whole book; and with great judgment put in his mouth, as the feriousness, no less than the fublimity of the firain, is peculiarly fuited to the Hero's character. In Darthula, are affembled bled almost all the tender images that can touch the heart of man; Friendthip, love, the affections of parents, fons, and brothers, the diffress of the aged, and the unavailing bravery of the young. The beautiful address to the moon, with which the poem opens, and the transition from thence to the fubject, most happily prepare the mind for that train of affecting events that is to follow. The flory is regular, dramatic, interesting to the last. He who can read it without emotion may congratulate himfelf, if he pleases, upon being completely armed against fympathetic forrow. As Fingal had no occasion of appearing in the action of this poem, Oslian makes a very artful transition from his narration, to what was passing in the halls of Selma. The found heard there on the strings of his harp, the concern which Fingal shows on hearing it, and the invocation of the ghosts of their fathers, to receive the Heroes falling in a distant land, are introduced with great beauty of imagination to increase the folemnity, and to diversify the fcenery of the poem.

CARRIC-THURA is full of the most sublime dignity; and has this advantage of being more chearful in the fubject, and more happy in the catastrophe than most of the other poems: Though tempered at the same time with episodes in that strain of tender melancholy, which seems to have been the great delight of Offian and the Bards of his age. Lathmon is peculiarly distinguished, by high generosity of sentiment. This is carried fo far, particularly in the refusal of Gaul, on one fide, to take the advantage of a fleeping foe; and of Lathmon, on the other, to overpower by numbers the two young warriors, as to recall into one's mind the manners of Chivalry; fome refemblance to which may perhaps be fuggested by other incidents in this collection of Poems. Chivalry, however, took rife in an age and country too remote from those of Offian to admit the fuspicion that the one could have borrowed any thing from the other. So far as Chivalry had any real existence, the same military enthufiafm, which gave birth to it in the feudal times, might, in the days of Offian, that is, in the infancy of a rifing state, through the operation of the fame cause, very naturally produce effects of the fame kind on the minds and manners of men. So far as Chivalry was an ideal system existing only in romance, it will not be thought furprifing, when we reflect on the account before given of the Celtic Bards, that this imaginary refinement of heroic manners should be found among them, as much, at least, as among the Trobadores, or strolling Provençal yencal Bards, in the 10th or 11th century; whose fongs, it is faid, first gave rise to those romantic ideas of heroifin, which for fo long a time enchanted Europe *. Offian's heroes have all the gallantry and generofity of those fabulous knights, without their extravagance; and his love fcenes have native tenderness, without any mixture of those forced and unnatural conceits which abound in the old romances. The adyentures related by our poet which refemble the most those of romance, concern women who follow their lovers to war difguifed in the armour of men; and these are so managed as to produce, in the discovery, several of the most interesting situations; one beautiful instance of which may be feen in Carric-thura, and another in Calthon and Colmal.

OITHONA prefents a fituation of a different nature. In the absence of her lover Gaul, she had been carried off and ravished by Dunrommath. Gaul discovers the place where she is kept concealed, and comes to revenge her. The meeting of the two lovers, the fentiments and the behaviour of Cithona on that occasion, are described with such tender and exquisite propriety, as does the greatest honour both to the art and to the delicacy of our author; and would have been admired in any poet of the most refined age. The conduct of Croma must strike every reader as remarkably judicious and beautiful. We are to be prepared for the death of Malvina, which is related in the fucceeding poem. She is therefore introduced in person; " the has heard a voice in a dream; the feels " the fluttering of her foul;" and in a most moving lamentation addressed to her beloved Ofcar, the fings her own Death Song. Nothing could be calculated with more art to footh and comfort her, than the flory which Offian relates. In the young and brave Fovargormo, another Ofcar is introduced; his praifes are fung; and the happiness is set before her of those who die in their youth, " when their renown is around " them; before the feeble behold them in the " hall, and fmile at their trembling hands."

^{*} Vid. Huetius de origine fabularum Romanensium.

BUT no where does Offian's genius appear to greater advantage, than in Berrathon, which is reckoned the conclusion of his fongs, "The "last found of the Voice of Cona."

Qualis olor noto positurus littore vitam, Ingemit, et mæstis mulcens concentibus auraș Præsago queritur venientia funera cantu.

THE whole train of ideas is admirably fuited to the subject. Every thing is full of that invifible world, into which the aged Bard believes himself now ready to enter. The airy hall of Fingal prefents itself to his view; " he sees the "cloud that shall receive his ghost; he beholds " the mist that shall form his robe when he ap-" pears on his hill;" and all the natural objects around him feem to carry the prefages of death. " The thiftle shakes its beard to the wind. The " flower hangs its heavy head; it feems to fay, " I am covered with the drops of heaven; the " time of my departure is near, and the blaft " that shall featter my leaves." Malvina's death is hinted to him in the most delicate manner by the fon of Alpin. His lamentation over her, her apotheofis, or afcent to the habitation of heroes, and the introduction to the flory which follows from the mention which Offian supposes the father of Malvina to make of him in the hall of Fingal, are all in the highest spirit of poetry. " And dost thou remember Ossian, O Toscar " fon of Comloch? The battles of our youth " were many; our fwords went together to the " field." Nothing could be more proper than to end his fongs with recording an exploit of the father of that Malvina, of whom his heart was now fo full; and who, from first to last, had been fuch a favourite object throughout all his poems.

THE scene of most of Ossian's poems is laid in Scotland, or in the coast of Ireland opposite to the territories of Fingal. When the scene is in Ireland, we perceive no change of manners from those of Ossian's native country. For as Ireland was undoubtedly peopled with Celtic tribes, the language, customs, and religion of both nations were the fame. They had been feparated from one another by migration, only a few generations, as it should seem, before our poet's age; and they still maintained a close and frequent intercourfe. But when the poet relates the expeditions of any of his heroes to the Scandinavian coast, or to the islands of Orkney, which were then part of the Scandinavian territory, as he does in Carric-thura, Sulmalla of Lumon, and Cathloda, the cafe is quite altered. Those countries were inhabited by nations of the Teutonic descent, who in their manners and religious rites differed widely from the Celta; and it is curious and remarkable, to find this difference clearly pointed out in the poems of Ossian. His defcriptions bear the native marks of one who was present in the expeditions which he relates, and who defcribes what he had feen with his own eyes. No fooner are we carried to Lochlin, or the islands of Inistore, than we perceive that we are in a foreign region. New objects begin to appear. We meet every where with the stones and circles of Loda, that is, Odin, the great Scandinavian deity. We meet with the divinations and inchantments, for which it is well known those northern nations were early famous. "There, mixed with the murmur of waters, " rose the voice of aged men, who called the " forms of night to aid them in their war:" whilst the Caledonian chiefs who affisted them. are described as standing at a distance, heedless of their rites. That ferocity of manners which distinguished those nations, also becomes conspicuous. In the combats of their chiefs there is a peculiar savageness; even their women are bloody and fierce. The fpirit, and the very ideas of Regner Lodbrog, that northern fcalder whom I formerly quoted, occur to us again. "The " hawks," Offian makes one of the Scandinavian chiefs fay, " rush from all their winds; they " are wont to trace my courfe. We rejoiced " three days above the dead, and called the " hawks of heaven. They came from all their " winds, to feaft on the foes of Annir."

DISMISSING now the separate consideration of any of our author's works, I proceed to make some observations on his manner of writing, under the general heads of Description, Imagery,

A POET of original genius is always distinguished by his talent for description *. A secondrate writer discerns nothing new or peculiar in the object he means to describe. His conceptions of it are vague and loofe; his expressions feeble; and of course the object is presented to us indistinctly and as through a cloud. But a true poet makes us imagine that we fee it before our eyes: he catches the diffinguishing features; he gives it the colours of life and reality; he places it in fuch a light that a painter could copy after him. This happy talent is chiefly owing to a lively imagination, which first receives a strong impression of the object; and then, by a proper felection of capital picturefque circumstances employed in describing it, transmits that impression in its full force to the imaginations of others. That Offian poffeffes this descriptive power in a high degree, we have a clear proof from the effect which his descriptions produce upon the imaginations of those who read him with any degree of attention and tafte. Few poets are more interesting. We contract an intimate acquaintance with his principal heroes. The characters, the manners, the face of the country become familiar; we even think we could draw the figure of his ghofts: In a word, whilft reading him we are transported as into a new region, and dwell among his objects as if they were all real.

^{*} See the rules of poetical description excellently illustrated by lord Kaims, in his Elements of Criticism, vol. iii. chap. 21. Of narration and description.

IT were eafy to point out feveral instances of exquifite painting in the works of our author. Such, for inflance, as the fcenery with which Temora opens, and the attitude in which Cairbar is there prefented to us; the description of the young prince Cormac, in the fame book; and the ruins of Balclutha in Cartho. " I have " feen the walls of Balclutha, but they were de-" folate. The fire had refounded in the halls; " and the voice of the people is heard no more. "The stream of Clutha was removed from its " place by the fall of the walls. The thiftle " fhook there its lonely head: The moss whistled " to the wind. The fox looked out from the " windows; the rank grass of the wall waved " round his head. Defolate is the dwelling of " Moina; filence is in the house of her fathers." Nothing also can be more natural and lively than the manner in which Carthon afterwards defcribes how the conflagration of his city affected him when a child: " Have I not feen the " falleri

" fallen Balclutha? And shall I feast with Com-" hal's fon? Comhal! who threw his fire in the " midst of my father's hall! I was young, and "knew not the cause why the virgins wept. "The columns of fmoke pleafed mine eye, when " they rose above my walls: I often looked back " with gladness, when my friends fled above the " hill. But when the years of my youth came " on, I beheld the moss of my fallen walls. My " figh arose with the morning; and my tears " descended with night. Shall I not fight, I " faid to my foul, against the children of my " foes? And I will fight, O Bard! I feel the " firength of my foul." In the fame poem, the affembling of the chiefs round Fingal, who had been warned of fome impending danger by the appearance of a prodigy, is described with so many picturesque circumstances, that one imagines himself present in the assembly. "The "king alone beheld the terrible fight, and he " forefaw the death of his people. He came in " filence to his hall, and took his father's fpear; " the mail rattled on his breaft. The heroes " rose around. They looked in filence on each " other, marking the eyes of Fingal. They " faw the battle in his face. A thousand shields " are placed at once on their arms; and they " drew a thousand swords. The hall of Selma " brightened 6

" brightened around. The clang of arms

" afcends. The grey dogs howl in their place.

" No word is among the mighty chiefs. Each

" marked the eyes of the king; and half af-

" fumed his fpear."

IT has been objected to Ossian, that his descriptions of military actions are imperfect, and much lefs diverfified by circumftances than those of Homer. This is in some measure true. The amazing fertility of Homer's invention is no where fo much displayed as in the incidents of his battles, and in the little history pieces he gives of the persons slain. Nor indeed, with regard to the talent of description, can too much be faid in praise of Homer. Every thing is alive in his writings. The colours with which he paints are those of nature. But Offian's genius was of a different kind from Homer's It led him to hurry towards grand objects, rather than to amuse himself with particulars of less importance. He could dwell on the death of a favourite hero; but that of a private man feldom stopped his rapid course. Homer's genius was more comprehensive than Ossian's. It included a wider circle of objects; and could work up any incident into description. Offian's was more limited; but the region within which it chiefly exerted itself was the highest of all, the region of the pathetic and sublime.

384 A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

WE must not imagine, however, that Offian's battles confift only of general indiffinct description. Such beautiful incidents are fometimes introduced, and the circumstances of the persons flain fo much diversified, as show that he could have embellished his military scenes with an abundant variety of particulars, if his genius had led him to dwell upon them. One man " is firetched in the dust of his native land; he " fell, where often he had spread the feast, and " often raifed the voice of the harp." The maid of Inistore is introduced, in a moving apostrophe, as weeping for another; and a third, " as rolled in the dust he lifted his faint " eyes to the king," is remembered and mourned by Fingal as the friend of Agandecca. The blood pouring from the wound of one who is flain by night, is heard " hiffing on the half " extinguished oak," which had been kindled for giving light: Another, climbing a tree to escape from his foe, is pierced by his spear from behind; " shrieking, panting he fell; whilst " mofs and withered branches purfue his fall, " and firew the blue arms of Gaul." Never was a finer picture drawn of the ardour of two vouthful youthful warriors than the following: " I faw "Gaul in his armour, and my foul was mixed " with his: For the fire of the battle was in his " eyes; he looked to the foe with joy. We fpoke the words of friendthip in fecret; and " the lightning of our fwords poured together. We drew them behind the wood, and tried the " firength of our arms on the empty air."

Ossian is always concife in his descriptions, which adds much to their beauty and force. For it is a great mistake to imagine, that a crowd of particulars, or a very full and extended flyle, is of advantage to description. On the contrary, fuch a diffuse manner for the most part weakens it. Any one redundant circumstance is a nuisance. It encumbers and loads the fancy, and renders the main image indistinct. " Obstat," as Quintilian fays with regard to flyle, " quicquid non adjuvat." To be concife in description, is one thing; and to be general, is another. No description that rests in generals can possibly be good; it can convey no lively idea; for it is of particulars only that we have a distinct conception. But at the same time, no strong imagination dwells long upon any one particular; or heaps together a mass of trivial ones. By the happy choice of some one, or of a few that are the most striking, it presents the image more complete, shows us more at one glance, than a feeble imagination is able to do. by turning its object round and round into a variety of lights. Tacitus is of all profe writers the most concise. He has even a degree of abruptness resembling our author: Yet no writer is more eminent for lively description. When Fingal, after having conquered the haughty Swaran, propofes to difmifs him with honour: " Raife to-morrow thy white fails to " the wind, thou brother of Agandecca!" He conveys, by thus addressing his enemy, a stronger impression of the emotions then passing within his mind, than if whole paragraphs had been fpent in describing the conflict between refentment against Swaran and the tender remembrance of his ancient love. No amplification is needed to give us the most full idea of a hardy veteran, after the few following words: " His if shield is marked with the strokes of battle; " his red eye despises danger." When Oscar, left alone, was furrounded by foes, "he flood," it is faid, " growing in his place, like the flood " of the narrow vale;" a happy reprefentation of one, who, by daring intrepidity in the midst of danger, feems to increase in his appearance, and becomes more formidable every moment, like the fudden rifing of the torrent hemmed in by the valley. And a whole crowd of ideas, concerning the circumstances of domestic forrow occasioned by a young warrior's first going forth to battle, is poured upon the mind by these words: " Calmar leaned on his father's fpear; " that fpear which he brought from Lara's hall, " when the foul of his mother was fad."

THE conciseness of Ossian's descriptions is the more proper on account of his fubjects. Descriptions of gay and fmiling fcenes may, without any difadvantage, be amplified and prolonged. Force is not the predominant quality expected in these. The description may be weakened by being diffuse, yet notwithstanding, may be beautiful still. Whereas, with respect to grand, solemn and pathetic subjects, which are Offian's chief field, the cafe is very different. In these, energy is above all things required. The imagination must be seized at once, or not at all; and is far more deeply impressed by one strong and ardent image, than by the anxious minuteness of laboured illustration.

Bur Offian's genius, though chiefly turned towards the fublime and pathetic, was not confined to it: In fubjects also of grace and delicacy, he discovers the hand of a master. Take for an example the following elegant description of Agandecca, wherein the tenderness of Tibulius feems united with the majefty of Virgil. "The daughter of the frow overheard, and left the hall of her fecret figh. She came in all her beauty; like the moon from the cloud of the East. Loveliness was around her as light. Her steps were like the music of songs. She faw the youth and loved him. He was the folen figh of her soul. Her blue eyes rolled on him in secret: And she bleft the chief of Morven." Several other instances might be produced of the feelings of love and friendship painted by our author with a most natural and happy delicacy.

The simplicity of Ossian's manner adds great beauty to his descriptions, and indeed to his whole poetry. We meet with no affected ornaments; no forced resinement; no marks either in style or thought of a studied endeavour to thine and sparkle. Ossian appears every where to be prompted by his feelings; and to speak from the abundance of his heart. I remember no more than one instance of what can be called quaint thought in this whole collection of his works. It is in the first book of Fingal, where from the tombs of two lovers two lenely yews are mentioned to have sprung, "whose branches "wished to meet on high." This sympathy of the trees with the lovers, may be reckoned to border on an Italian conceit; and it is fomewhat curious to find this fingle inflance of that fort of wit in our Celtic poetry.

THE "joy of grief," is one of Offian's remarkable expressions, several times repeated. If any one shall think that it needs to be justified by a precedent, he may find it twice used by Homer; in the Iliad, when Achilles is visited by the ghost of Patroclus; and in the Odyssey, when Ulysses meets his mother in the shades. On both these occasions, the heroes, melted with tenderness, lament their not having it in their power to throw their arms round the ghost, "that we "might," say they, "in a mutual embrace, "enjoy the delight of grief."

----Κρυεροίο τεταρπωμεσθα γόοιο *.

But in truth the expression stands in need of no desence from authority; for it is a natural and just expression; and conveys a clear idea of that gratification, which a virtuous heart often seels in the indulgence of a tender melancholy. Ossian makes a very proper distinction between this gratification, and the destructive essect of overpowering grief. "There is a joy in grief, "when peace dwells in the breasts of the sad. "But forrow wastes the mournful, O daughter of Toscar, and their days are few." To give the joy of grief," generally signifies to raise the strain of fost and grave music; and finely characterifes the taste of Ossian's age and country. In those days, when the fongs of bards were the great delight of heroes, the tragic muse was held in chief honour; gallant actions, and virtuous fufferings, were the chofen theme; preferably to that light and trifling strain of poetry and music, which promotes light and trifling manners, and ferves to emafculate the mind. "Strike the harp in my hall," faid the great Fingal, in the midst of youth and victory, "Strike the harp in my hall, " and let Fingal hear the fong. Pleafant is the " joy of grief! It is like the shower of spring, " when it foftens the branch of the oak; and " the young leaf lifts its green head. Sing on, " O bards! To-morrow we lift the fail."

^{*} Od; ff. 11. 211. Iliad. 23. 98.

Personal epithets have been much used by all the poets of the most ancient ages: and when well chosen, not general and unmeaning, they contribute not a little to render the style descriptive and animated. Besides epithets sounded on bodily distinctions, a-kin to many of Homer's, we find in Ossian several which are remarkably beautiful and poetical. Such as, Oscar of the suture sights, Fingal of the mildest look, Carril of other times, the mildly blushing Evirallin; Bragela, the lonely sun-beam of Dunscaich; a Culdee, the son of the secret cell.

But of all the ornaments employed in descriptive poetry, comparisons or similes are the most splendid. These chiefly form what is called the imagery of a poem: And as they abound so much in the works of Ossian, and are commonly among the savourite passages of all poets, it may be expected that I should be somewhat particular in my remarks upon them.

A POETICAL fimile always supposes two objects brought together, between which there is fome near relation or connection in the fancy. What that relation ought to be, cannot be precifely defined. For various, almost numberless, are the analogies formed among objects, by a fprightly imagination. The relation of actual fimilitude, or likeness of appearance, is far from being the only foundation of poetical comparifon. Sometimes a refemblance in the effect produced by two objects, is made the connecting principle: Sometimes a refemblance in one distinguithing property or circumflance. Very often two objects are brought together in a fimile, though they refemble one another, firictly fpeaking, in nothing, only because they raise in the mind a train of fimilar, and what may be called, concordant ideas; fo that the remembrance of the one, when recalled, ferves to quicken and heighten the impression made by the other. Thus, to give an instance from our poet, the pleasure with which an old man looks back on the exploits of his youth, has certainly no direct refemblance to the beauty of a fine evening; farther than that both agree in producing a certain calm, placid joy. Yet Offian has founded upon this, one of the most beautiful comparisons that is to be met with in any poet. "Wilt thou not listen, fon of the rock, is to the fong of Offian? My foul is full of other times; the joy of my youth returns. "Thus the fun appears in the west, after the " fleps of his brightness have moved behind a " florm. The green hills lift their dewy heads. "The blue streams rejoice in the vale. The " aged hero comes forth on his staff; and his " grey hair glitters in the beam." Never was there a finer group of objects. It raises a strong conception of the old man's joy and elation of heart, by difplaying a scene, which produces in every fpectator, a corresponding train of pleafing emotions; the declining fun looking forth in his brightness after a florm; the chearful face of all nature; and the still life finely animated by the circumstance of the aged hero, with his staff and his grey locks; a circumstance both extremely picturefque in itself, and peculiarly fuited to the main object of the comparison. Such analogies and affociations of ideas as thefe, are highly pleafing to the fancy. They give opportunity opportunity for introducing many a fine poetical picture. They diversify the scene; they aggrandize the subject; they keep the imagination awake and sprightly. For as the judgment is principally exercised in distinguishing objects, and remarking the differences among those which feem like; so the highest amusement of the imagination is to trace likenesses and agreements among those which feem different.

The principal rules which respect poetical comparisons are, that they be introduced on proper occasions, when the mind is disposed to relish them; and not in the midst of some severe and agitating passion, which cannot admit this play of fancy; that they be sounded on a resemblance neither too near and obvious, so as to give little amusement to the imagination in tracing it, nor too saint and remote, so as to be apprehended with difficulty; that they serve either to illustrate the principal object, and to render the conception of it, more clear and distinct; or at least, to heighten and embellish it, by a suitable association of images *.

EVERY country has a fcenery peculiar to itfelf; and the imagery of a good poet will exhibit it. For as he copies after nature, his allufions will of course be taken from those objects which he fees around him, and which have often flruck his fancy. For this reason, in order to judge of the propriety of poetical imagery, we ought to be, in some measure, acquainted with the natural history of the country where the scene of the poem is laid. The introduction of foreign images betrays a poet, copying not from nature, but from other writers. Hence so many Lions, and Tygers, and Eagles, and Serpents, which we meet with in the fimiles of modern poets; as if these animals had acquired some right to a place in poetical comparisons for ever, because employed by ancient authors. They employed them with propriety, as objects generally known in their country; but they are abfurdly used for illustration by us, who know them only at fecond-hand, or by description. To most readers of modern poetry, it were more to the purpose to describe Lions or Tygers by fimiles taken from men, than to compare men to Lions. Offian is very correct in this particular. His imagery is, without exception, copied from that face of nature, which he faw before his eyes; and by confequence may be expected to be lively. We meet with no Grecian or Italian fcenery; but with the mifts, and clouds, and forms of a northern mountainous region.

^{*} See Elements of Criticism, ch. 19. vol. 3.

No poet abounds more in fimiles than Offian. There are in this collection as many, at least, as in the whole Iliad and Odyssey of Homer. I am indeed inclined to think, that the works of both poets are too much crowded with them. Similes are fparkling ornaments; and like all things that fparkle, are apt to dazzle and tire us by their lustre. But if Offian's similes be too frequent, they have this advantage of being commonly shorter than Homer's; they interrupt his narration less; he just glances aside to some resembling object, and instantly returns to his former track. Homer's fimiles include a wider range of objects. But in return, Offian's are, without exception, taken from objects of dignity, which cannot be faid for all those which Homer employs. The Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, Clouds and Meteors, Lightning and Thunder, Seas and Whales, Rivers, Torrents, Winds, Ice, Rain, Snow, Dews, Mist, Fire and Smoke, Trees and Forests, Heath and Grass and Flowers, Rocks and Mountains, Music and Songs, Light and Darkness, Spirits and Ghosts; these form the circle, within which Offian's comparisons generally run. Some, not many, are taken from Birds and Beafts; as Eagles, Sea Fowl, the Horfe, the Deer, and the Mountain Bee; and a very few from fuch operations of art as were then known. Homer has diversified his imagery by many more allusions to the animal world; to Lions, Bulls, Goats, Herds of Cattle, Serpents, Infects: and to the various occupations of rural and pastoral life. Ossian's defect in this article, is plainly owing to the defert, uncultivated flate of his country, which fuggested to him few images beyond natural inanimate objects, in their rudest form. The birds and animals of the country were probably not numerous; and his acquaintance with them was slender, as they were little fubjected to the uses of man.

The great objection made to Ossian's imagery, is its uniformity, and the too frequent repetition of the same comparisons. In a work so thick fown with fimiles, one could not but expect to find images of the fame kind fometimes fuggested to the poet by resembling objects; especially to a poet like Offian, who wrote from the immediate impulse of poetical enthusiasm, and without much preparation of study or labour. Fertile as Homer's imagination is acknowledged to be, who does not know how often his Lions and Bulls and Flocks of Sheep, recur with little or no variation; nay, fometimes in the very fame words? The objection made to Offian is, however, founded, in a great measure, upon a mistake. It has been supposed by inattentive readers, that wherever the Moon, the Cloud, or the Thunder, returns in a fimile, it is the fame fimile, and the fame Moon, or Cloud, or Thunder, which they had met with a few pages before. Whereas very often the fimiles are widely different. The object, whence they are taken, is indeed in substance the same; but the image is new; for the appearance of the object is changed; it is presented to the fancy in another attitude; and clothed with new circumstances, to make it suit the different illustration for which it is employed. In this, lies Offian's great art; in fo happily varying the form of the few natural appearances with which he was acquainted, as to make them correspond to a great many different objects.

LET us take for one inflance the Moon, which is very frequently introduced into his comparisons; as in northern climates, where the nights are long, the Moon is a greater object of attention, than in the climate of Homer; and let us view how much our poet has divesified its appearance. The shield of a warrior is like "the darkened moon when it moves a dun circle through the heavens." The face of a ghost, wan and pale, is like "the beam of the fetting moon." And a different appearance of a ghost, thin and indistinct, is like "the " new moon feen through the gathered mift, " when the sky pours down its flaky snow, and " the world is filent and dark;" or in a different form still, is like "the watery beam of the "moon, when it rushes from between two " clouds, and the midnight-shower is on the " field." A very opposite use is made of the moon in the description of Agandecca: " She " came in all her beauty, like the moon from " the cloud of the East." Hope, succeeded by disappointment, is " joy rifing on her face, and " forrow returning again, like a thin cloud on " the moon." But when Swaran, after his defeat, is cheared by Fingal's generofity, "His " face brightened like the full moon of heaven, " when the clouds vanish away, and leave her " calm and broad in the midst of the sky." Venvela is "bright as the moon when it trembles " o'er the western wave;" but the foul of the guilty Uthal is "dark as the troubled face of "the moon, when it foretels the fform." And by a very fanciful and uncommon allusion, it is faid of Cormac, who was to die in his early years, " Nor long shalt thou lift the spear, " mildly shining beam of youth! Death stands " dim behind thee, like the darkened half of " the moon behind its growing light."

ANOTHER instance of the same nature may be taken from mist, which, as being a very familiar appearance in the country of Offian, he applies to a variety of purposes, and pursues through a great many forms. Sometimes, which one would hardly expect, he employs it to heighten the appearance of a beautiful object. The hair of Morna is "like the mist of Cromla, " when it curls on the rock, and shines to the " beam of the west."-" The fong comes with " its musick to melt and please the ear. It is " like foft mift, that rifing from a lake pours " on the filent vale. The green flowers are " filled with dew. The fun returns in its " flrength, and the mist is gone *."-But, for the most part, mist is employed as a similitude of fome difagreeable or terrible object. "The " foul of Nathos was fad, like the fun in the

^{*} There is a remarkable propriety in this comparison. It is intended to explain the effect of foft and mournful music. Armin appears disturbed at a performance of this kind. Carmor says to him, "Why bursts the sigh of Armin? Is there a "cause to mourn? The song comes with its music to melt and please the ear. It is like soft mist, &c." that is, such mournful songs have a happy effect to soften the heart, and to improve it by tender emotions, as the mosture of the mist refreshes and nourishes the flowers; whilst the sadness they occasion is only transient, and soon dispelled by the succeeding occupations and amusements of life: "The sur returns in "its strength, and the mist is gone."

A CRITICAL DISSERTATION " day of mist, when his face is watery and " dim." "The darkness of old age comes like "the mist of the desert." The face of a ghost is " pale as the mist of Cromla." "The " gloom of battle is rolled along as mist that is " poured on the valley, when florms invade " the filent fun-shine of heaven." Fame suddenly departing, is likened to "mist that slies " away before the ruftling wind of the vale." A ghoft, flowly vanishing, to " mift that melts " by degrees on the funny hill." Cairbar, after his treacherous affaffination of Oscar, is compared to a pestilential fog. "I love a foe like " Cathmor," fays Fingal, " his foul is great; " his arm is ftrong; his battles are full of fame. "But the little foul is like a vapour that hovers " round the marshy lake. It never rises on the " green hill, left the winds meet it there. Its " dwelling is in the cave; and it fends forth "the dart of death." This is a fimile highly finished. But there is another which is still more striking, founded also on mist, in the 4th book of Temora. Two factious chiefs are contending; Cathmor the king interpofes, rebukes, and filences them. The poet intends to give us the highest idea of Cathmor's superiority;

and most effectually accomplishes his intention by the following happy image. "They funk

" from the king on either fide; like two columns " of morning mist, when the sun rises between " them, on his glittering rocks. Dark is their " rolling on either fide; each towards its reedy " pool." These instances may sufficiently shew with what richness of imagination Offian's comparifons abound, and at the fame time, with what propriety of judgment they are employed. If his field was narrow, it must be admitted to have been as well cultivated as its extent would allow.

As it is usual to judge of poets from a comparison of their similes more than of other pasfages, it will perhaps be agreeable to the reader, to fee how Homer and Offian have conducted fome images of the fame kind. This might be thewn in many inflances. For as the great objects of nature are common to the poets of all nations, and make the general store-house of all imagery, the ground-work of their comparifons must of course be frequently the same. I thall felect only a few of the most considerable from both poets. Mr. Pope's translation of Homer can be of no use to us here. The parallel is altogether unfair between profe, and the imposing harmony of flowing numbers. It is only by viewing Homer in the simplicity of a Vor. II. Dd profe

A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

profe translation, that we can form any compa-

THE shock of two encountering armies, the noise and the tumult of battle, afford one of the most grand and awful subjects of description; on which all epic poets have exerted their strength. Let us first hear Homer. The following description is a favourite one, for we find it twice repeated in the fame words*. "When now " the conflicting hofts joined in the field of " battle, then were mutually opposed shields, " and fwords, and the strength of armed men. "The boffy bucklers were dashed against each " other. The univerfal tumult rose. There " were mingled the triumphant shouts and the " dying groans of the victors and the vanquished. "The earth streamed with blood. As when " winter torrents, rushing from the mountains, " pour into a narrow valley, their violent wa-" ters. They iffue from a thousand springs, " and mix in the hollowed channel. The dif-" tant shepherd hears on the mountain, their " roar from afar. Such was the terror and the " fhout of the engaging armies." In another passage, the poet, much in the manner of Ossian, heaps fimile on fimile, to express the vastness of the idea, with which his imagination feems to labour. "With a mighty shout the hosts engage." Not so loud roars the wave of ocean, when driven against the shore by the whole force of the boisterous north; not so loud in the woods of the mountain, the noise of the slame, when rising in its sury to consume the forest; not so loud the wind among the losty oaks, when the wrath of the storm rages; as was the clamour of the Greeks and Trojans, when, roaring terrible, they rushed against each " other "."

* Iliad, iv. 446. and Iliad, viii. 60.

To these descriptions and similes, we may oppose the following from Ossian, and leave the reader to judge between them. He will find images of the same kind employed; commonly less extended; but thrown forth with a glowing rapidity which characterises our poet. "As autumn's dark storms pour from two echoing hills, towards each other, approached the heroes. As two dark streams from high rocks meet and mix, and roar on the plain; loud, rough and dark in battle, meet Lochlin and Inisfail. Chief mixed his strokes with chief, and man with man. Steel clanging, sounded on steel. Helmets are cleft on high; blood

^{*} Iliad, xiv. 393.

" bursts and smoaks around .- As the troubled " noise of the ocean, when roll the waves on " high; as the last peal of the thunder of hea-" ven, fuch is the noise of battle."-" As roll a " thousand waves to the rock, so Swaran's host " came on; as meets a rock a thousand waves, " fo Inisfail met Swaran. Death raifes all his " voices around, and mixes with the found of " shields.—The field echoes from wing to wing, " as a hundred hammers that rife by turns on " the red fon of the furnace."-" As a hundred " winds on Morven; as the streams of a hun-" dred hills; as clouds fly fuccessive over hea-" ven: or as the dark ocean affaults the thore " of the defart; fo roaring, fo vast, fo terrible, " the armies mixed on Lena's echoing heath." In feveral of these images, there is a remarkable fimilarity to Homer's; but what follows is fuperior to any comparison that Homer uses on this fubject. " The groan of the people spread " over the hills; it was like the thunder of " night, when the cloud burfts on Cona; and " a thousand ghosts shriek at once on the hol-" low wind." Never was an image of more awful fublimity employed to heighten the terror of battle.

BOTH poets compare the appearance of an army approaching, to the gathering of dark clouds.

clouds. " As when a shepherd," fays Homer, " beholds from the rock a cloud borne along " the fea by the western wind; black as pitch " it appears from afar, failing over the ocean, " and carrying the dreadful ftorm. He thrinks " at the fight, and drives his flock into the cave: " Such, under the Ajaces, moved on, the dark, "the thickened phalanx to the war +."-"They came," fays Offian, "over the defert " like stormy clouds, when the winds roll them " over the heath; their edges are tinged with " lightning; and the echoing groves foresee " the fform." The edges of the cloud tinged with lightning, is a fublime idea; but the shepherd and his flock, render Homer's fimile more picturesque. This is frequently the difference between the two poets. Offian gives no more than the main image, strong and full. Homer adds circumstances and appendages, which amuse the fancy by enlivening the fcenery.

HOMER compares the regular appearance of an army, to " clouds that are fettled on the " mountain top, in the day of calmness, when "the strength of the north wind sleeps "." Offian, with full as much propriety, compares the appearance of a difordered army, to " the † Iliad, iv. 275.

* Iliad, v. 522.

" mountain cloud, when the blaft hath entered " its womb; and scatters the curling gloom on " every fide." Offian's clouds affume a great many forms; and, as we might expect from his climate, are a fertile fource of imagery to him. "The warriors followed their chiefs, like the " gathering of the rainy clouds, behind the " red meteors of heaven." An army retreating without coming to action, is likened to " clouds, that having long threatened rain, " retire flowly behind the hills." The picture of Oithona, after she had determined to die, is lively and delicate. " Her foul was refolved, " and the tear was dried from her wildly-look-" ing eye. A troubled joy rose on her mind, like the red path of the lightning on a stormy " cloud." The image also of the gloomy Cairbar, meditating, in filence, the affaffination of Ofcar, until the moment came when his defigns were ripe for execution, is extremely noble, and complete in all its parts. " Cairbar heard their " words in filence, like the cloud of a shower; " it flands dark on Cromla, till the lightning " burfts its fide. The valley gleams with red " light; the spirits of the florm rejoice. So " flood the filent king of Temora; at length his " words are heard."

HOMER's comparison of Achilles to the Dog-Star, is very fublime. " Priam beheld him " rushing along the plain, thining in his ar-" mour, like the star of autumn; bright are " its beams, diffinguished amidst the multitude " of ftars in the dark hour of night. It rifes " in its fplendor; but its fplendor is fatal; be-" tokening to miferable men, the destroying " heat †." The first appearance of Fingal, is, in like manner, compared by Offian, to a flar or meteor. "Fingal, tall in his ship, stretched " his bright lance before him. Terrible was the " gleam of his fleel; it was like the green " meteor of death, fetting in the heath of Mal-" mor, when the traveller is alone, and the " broad moon is darkened in heaven." The hero's appearance in Homer, is more magnificent; in Offian, more terrible.

A TREE cut down, or overthrown by a fform, is a fimilitude frequent among poets for describing the fall of a warrior in battle. Homer employs it often. But the most beautiful, by far, of his comparisons, founded on this object, indeed one of the most beautiful in the whole Iliad, is that on the death of Euphorbus. " As the young and verdant olive, which a man " hath reared with care in a lonely field, where † Iliad, xxii. 26,

" the fprings of water bubble around it; it is " fair and flourishing; it is fanned by the breath " of all the winds, and loaded with white blof-" foms: when the fudden blaft of a whirlwind " descending, roots it out from its bed, and " firetches it on the dust 1." To this, elegant as it is, we may oppose the following simile of Offian's, relating to the death of the three fons of Ufnoth. "They fell, like three young oaks " which flood alone on the hill. The traveller " faw the lovely trees, and wondered how they " grew fo lonely. The blaft of the defert came " by night, and laid their green heads low. " Next day he returned; but they were wi-"thered, and the heath was bare," Malvina's allusion to the same object, in her lamentation over Ofcar, is fo exquifitely tender, that I cannot forbear giving it a place also. " I was a " lovely tree in thy presence, Oscar! with all " my branches round me. But thy death came, " like a blaft from the defert, and laid my " green head low. The fpring returned with " its showers: but no leaf of mine arose." Several of Offian's fimiles taken from trees, are remarkably beautiful, and diversified with well chosen circumstances; fuch as that upon the death of Ryno and Orla: " They have fallen " like the oak of the defert; when it lies acrofs
" a stream, and withers in the wind of the " mountains:" Or that which Ossian applies to himself; " I, like an ancient oak in Morven, " moulder alone in my place; the blast hath " lopped my branches away; and I tremble at
" the wings of the north."

As Homer exalts his heroes by comparing them to gods, Ossian makes the same use of comparisons taken from spirits and ghosts. Swaran " roared in battle, like the shrill spirit of a " form that fits dim on the clouds of Gormal. " and enjoys the death of the mariner." His people gathered around Erragon, " like florms " around the ghost of night, when he calls " them from the top of Morven, and prepares " to pour them on the land of the stranger."-"They fell before my fon, like groves in the " defert, when an angry ghost rushes through " night, and takes their green heads in his " hand." In fuch images, Offian appears in his strength; for very seldom have supernatural beings been painted with fo much fublimity, and fuch force of imagination, as by this poet. Even Homer, great as he is, must yield to him in fimiles formed upon these. Take, for instance, the following, which is the most remarkable of this kind in the Iliad. " Meri-

410 A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

" ones followed Idomeneus to battle, like Mars " the destroyer of men, when he rushes to war, "Terror, his beloved fon, strong and fierce, " attends him; who fills with difmay, the most " valiant hero. They come from Thrace, " armed against the Ephyrians and Phlegyans; " nor do they regard the prayers of either; but dispose of success at their will ‡." The idea here, is undoubtedly noble: but observe what a figure Offian fets before the aftonished imagination, and with what fublimely terrible circumstances he has heightened it. " He rushed " in the found of his arms, like the dreadful " fpirit of Loda, when he comes in the roar of a thousand storms, and scatters battles from " his eyes. He fits on a cloud over Lochlin's " feas. His mighty hand is on his fword. "The winds lift his flaming locks. So terrible " was Cuthullin in the day of his fame."

Homer's comparisons relate chiefly to martial subjects, to the appearances and motions of armies, the engagement and death of heroes, and the various incidents of war. In Ossian, we find a greater variety of other subjects illustrated by similes; particularly, the songs of bards, the beauty of women, the different circumstances of old age, forrow, and private diffress; which give occasion to much beautiful imagery. What, for inflance, can be more delicate and moving. than the following fimile of Oithona's, in her lamentation over the difference? " Chief of Strumon," replied the fighing maid, " why didst thou come over the dark blue wave " to Nuath's mournful daughter? Why did not "I pass away in secret, like the flower of the " rock, that lifts its fair head unfeen, and ffrews " its withered leaves on the blaft?" The mufic of bards, a favourite object with Offian, is illustrated by a variety of the most beautiful appearances that are to be found in nature. It is compared to the calm shower of spring; to the dews of the morning on the hill of roes; to the face of the blue and still lake. Two similes on this fubject, I shall quote, because they would do honour to any of the most celebrated classics. The one is; "Sit thou on the heath, O bard! " and let us hear thy voice; it is pleafant as " the gale of the fpring that fighs on the hun-" ter's ear, when he wakens from dreams of " joy, and has heard the music of the spirits of "the hill." The other contains a short, but exquifitely tender image, accompanied with the finest poetical painting. "The music of Carril " was like the memory of joys that are past, " pleafant

" pleasant and mournful to the foul. The ghosts of departed bards heard it from Sli" mora's fide. Soft founds spread along the " wood; and the silent valleys of night rejoice." What a figure would such imagery and such scenery have made, had they been presented to us, adorned with the sweetness and harmony of the Virgilian numbers!

I HAVE chosen all along to compare Offian with Homer, rather than Virgil, for an obvious reason. There is a much nearer correspondence between the times and manners of the two former poets. Both wrote in an early period of fociety; both are originals; both are diffinguished by fimplicity, fublimity, and fire. The correct clegance of Virgil, his artful imitation of Homer, the Roman stateliness which he every where maintains, admit no parallel with the abrupt boldness, and enthusiastick warmth of the Celtic bard. In one article, indeed, there is a refemblance. Virgil is more tender than Homer; and thereby agrees more with Offian; with this difference, that the feelings of the one are more gentle and polished, those of the other more strong; the tenderness of Virgil softens, that of Offian diffolves and overcomes the heart.

A RESEMBLANCE may be fometimes observed between Osiian's comparisons, and those employed by the facred writers. They abound much in this figure, and they use it with the utmost propriety ‡. The imagery of Scripture exhibits a foil and climate altogether different from those of Ossian; a warmer country, a more fmiling face of nature, the arts of agriculture and of rural life much farther advanced. The wine prefs, and the threshing floor, are often presented to us, the Cedar and the Palmtree, the fragrance of perfumes, the voice of the Turtle, and the beds of Lilies. The fimiles are, like Offian's, generally thort, touching on one point of refemblance, rather than spread out into little episodes. In the following example may be perceived what inexpressible grandeur poetry receives from the intervention of the Deity. "The nations shall rush like the " rushings of many waters; but God shall re-" buke them, and they shall fly far off, and " shall be chased as the chass of the mountains " before the wind, and like the down of the " thiftle before the whirlwind +."

Besides formal comparisons, the poetry of Offian is embellished with many beautiful metaphors: Such as that remarkably fine one applied to Deugala; "She was covered with the " light of beauty; but her heart was the house " of pride." This mode of expression, which fuppresses the mark of comparison, and substitutes a figured description in room of the object described, is a great enlivener of style. It denotes that glow and rapidity of fancy, which without paufing to form a regular fimile, paints the object at one flroke. "Thou art to me the " beam of the east, rising in a land unknown." " In peace, thou art the gale of fpring; in war, " the mountain ftorm." Pleafant be thy rest, "O lovely beam, foon haft thou fet on our " hills! The steps of thy departure were stately; " like the moon on the blue trembling wave. " But thou hast left us in darkness, first of the " maids of Lutha!-Soon haft thou fet Mal-" vina! but thou rifest, like the beam of the " east, among the spirits of thy friends, where " they fit in their flormy halls, the chambers " of the thunder." This is correct and finely fupported. But in the following inflance, the metaphor, though very beautiful at the beginning, becomes imperfect before it closes, by being improperly mixed with the literal fense. "Trathal went forth with the ffream of his " people; but they met a rock; Fingal stood " unmoved; broken they rolled back from his " fide.

I See Dr. Lowth de Sacra Poesi Hebræorum.

⁺ Isaiah xvii. 13.

414 A CRITICAL DISSERTATION

"fide. Nor did they roll in fafety; the fpear of the king purfued their flight."

THE hyperbole is a figure which we might expect to find often employed by Ossian; as the undisciplined imagination of early ages generally prompts exaggeration, and carries its objects to excess; whereas longer experience, and farther progress in the arts of life, chasten men's ideas and expressions. Yet Oslian's hyperboles appear not to me, either fo frequent or fo harsh as might at first have been looked for; an advantage owing no doubt to the more cultivated state, in which, as was before shewn, poetry fubfifted among the ancient Celtæ, than among most other barbarous nations. One of the most exaggerated descriptions in the whole work, is what meets us at the beginning of Fingal, where the fcout makes his report to Cuthullin of the landing of the foe. But this is fo far from deferving cenfure that it merits praife, as being, on that occasion, natural and proper. The fcout arrives, trembling and full of fears; and it is well known, that no passion disposes men to hyperbolize more than terror. It both annihilates themselves in their own apprehension, and magnifies every object which they view through the medium of a troubled imagination. Hence all those indistinct images of formidable greatness, the natural marks of a disturbed and confused mind, which occur in Moran's description of Swaran's appearance, and in his relation of the conference which they held together; not unlike the report, which the affrighted Jewish fpies made to their leader of the land of Canaan. "The land through which we have gone to " fearch it, is a land that eateth up the inhabi-" tants thereof; and all the people that we faw " in it, are men of a great flature: and there " faw we giants, the fons of Anak, which come " of the giants; and we were in our own fight " as grasshoppers, and so were we in their " fight *."

WITH regard to personifications, I formerly observed that Ossian was sparing, and I accounted for his being fo. Allegorical perfonages he has none; and their absence is not to be regretted. For the intermixture of those shadowy Beings, which have not the support even of mythological or legendary belief, with human actors, feldom produces a good effect. The fiction becomes too visible and phantastick; and overthrows that impression of reality, which the probable recital of human actions is calculated to make upon the mind. In the ferious and pathetic fcenes of Offian especially, allegorical characters would have been as much out of place, as in Tragedy; ferving only unseasonably to amuse the fancy, whilst they stopped the current, and weakened the force of passion.

^{*} Numbers xiii. gz, 23.

WITH apostrophes, or addresses to persons abfent or dead, which have been, in all ages, the language of passion, our poet abounds; and they are among his highest beauties. Witness the apostrophe, in the first book of Fingal, to the maid of Inistore, whose lover had fallen in battle; and that inimitably fine one of Cuthullin to Bragela at the conclusion of the same book. He commands the harp to be flruck in her praise; and the mention of Bragela's name, immediately fuggesting to him a crowd of tender ideas; " Dost thou raise thy fair face from " the rocks," he exclaims, " to find the fails " of Cuthullin? The fea is rolling far diffant, " and its white foam shall deceive thee for " my fails." And now his imagination being wrought up to conceive her as, at that moment, really in this fituation, he becomes afraid of the harm the may receive from the inclemency of the night; and with an enthusiasm, happy and affecting, though beyond the cautious firain of modern poetry, "Retire," he proceeds, " retire, for it is night, my love, and the dark VOL. II. " winds Ee winds figh in thy hair. Retire to the hall of " my feafts, and think of the times that are or past; for I will not return till the form of war has ceased. O Connal, speak of wars . " and arms, and fend her from my mind; for " lovely with her raven hair is the white-" bosomed daughter of Sorglan." This breathes all the native fpirit of passion and tenderness.

THE addresses to the fun, to the moon, and to the evening flar, must draw the attention of every reader of tafte, as among the most splendid ornaments of this collection. The beauties of each are too great, and too obvious to need any particular comment. In one passage only of the address to the moon, there appears some obscurity. "Whither dost thou retire from of thy course, when the darkness of thy counof tenance grows? Haft thou thy hall like " Offian? Dwelleft thou in the shadow of " grief? Have thy fifters fallen from Heaven? of Are they who rejoiced with thee at night, no " more? Yes, they have fallen, fair light! and " thou dost often retire to mourn." We may be at a lofs to comprehend, at first view, the ground of these speculations of Ossian, concerning the moon: but when all the circumflances are attended to, they will appear to flow naturally from the present fituation of his mind.

A mind under the dominion of any strong passion, tinctures with its own disposition, every object which it beholds. The old bard, with his heart bleeding for the lofs of all his friends. is meditating on the different phases of the moon. Her waning and darkness, presents to his melancholy imagination, the image of forrow; and prefently the idea arises, and is indulged, that, like himself, she retires to mourn over the loss of other moons, or of stars, whom he calls her fifters, and fancies to have once rejoiced with her at night, now fallen from heaven. Darkness suggested the idea of mourning, and mourning fuggefted nothing fo naturally to Offian, as the death of beloved friends. An inftance precifely fimilar of this influence of passion, may be seen in a passage which has always been admired of Shakespear's King Lear, The old man on the point of distraction, through the inhumanity of his daughters, fees Edgar appear difguifed like a beggar and a madman.

Lear. Didft thou give all to thy daughters?

And art thou come to this?

Couldest thou leave nothing? Didst thou give them all?

Kent. He hath no daughters, Sir.

E e 2

Lear.

Lear. Death, traitor! nothing could have fubdued nature,

To fuch a lowness, but his unkind daughters. King Lear, A& 3. Scene 5.

THE apostrophe to the winds, in the opening of Darthula, is in the highest spirit of poetry. " But the winds deceive thee, O Darthula: and " deny the woody Etha to thy fails. Thefe are " not thy mountains, Nathos, nor is that the " roar of thy climbing waves. The halls of "Cairbar are near, and the towers of the foe " lift their head.-Where have ye been, ye " fouthern winds; when the fons of my love " were deceived? But ye have been sporting on " plains, and purfuing the thiftle's beard. O " that ye had been ruftling in the fails of Na-" thos, till the hills of Etha rose! till they rose " in their clouds, and faw their coming chief." This passage is remarkable for the refemblance it bears to an exposulation with the wood nymphs, on their absence at a critical time; which, as a favourite poetical idea, Virgil has copied from Theocritus, and Milton has very happily imitated from both.

Where were ye, nymphs! when the remorfeless deep

Clos'd o'er the head of your lov'd Lycidas?

For neither were ye playing on the steep Where your old bards, the samous Druids, lie; Nor on the shaggy top of Mona, high, Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream *...

HAVING now treated fully of Offian's talents, with respect to description and imagery, it only remains to make some observations on his sentiments. No fentiments can be beautiful without being proper; that is, fuited to the character and fituation of those who utter them. In this respect. Offian is as correct as most writers. His characters, as above observed, are in general well supported; which could not have been the case, had the sentiments been unnatural or out of place. A variety of personages of different ages, fexes, and conditions, are introduced into his poems; and they fpeak and act with a propriety of fentiment and behaviour, which it is furprifing to find in fo rude an age. Let the poem of Darthula, throughout, be taken as an example.

But it is not enough that fentiments be natural and proper. In order to acquire any high Milton's Lycidas. See Theocrit. Idyll. I.

 Πῶ ποκ' ἀς ἀσθ ὁκα Λαφης ἐτακετο; πῶ πωκα, Νυμφαι, &c.
 And Virg. Eclog. 10.
 Quæ nemora, aut qui vos faltus habuere, puellæ, &c.

degree of poetical merit, they must also be sublime and pathetick.

THE fublime is not confined to fentiment alone. It belongs to description also; and whether in description or in sentiment, imports such ideas prefented to the mind, as raise it to an uncommon degree of elevation, and fill it with admiration and aftonishment. This is the highest effect either of eloquence or poetry: And to produce this effect, requires a genius glowing with the strongest and warmest conception of some object awful, great or magnificent. That this character of genius belongs to Offian, may, I think, fufficiently appear from many of the passages I have already had occasion to quote. To produce more inflances, were fuperfluous. If the engagement of Fingal with the spirit of Loda, in Carric-thura; if the encounters of the armies, in Fingal; if the address to the fun, in Carthon; if the fimiles founded upon ghosts and spirits of the night, all formerly mentioned, be not admitted as examples, and illustrious ones too, of the true poetical fublime, I confess myself entirely ignorant of this quality in writing.

ALL the circumftances, indeed, of Offian's composition, are favourable to the sublime,

more perhaps than to any other species of beauty. Accuracy and correctness; artfully connected narration; exact method and proportion of parts, we may look for in polished times. The gay and the beautiful, will appear to more advantage in the midst of smiling scenery and pleafurable themes. But amidft the rude fcenes of nature, amidst rocks and torrents and whirlwinds and battles, dwells the fublime. It is the thunder and the lightning of genius. It is the offspring of nature, not of art. It is negligent of all the lesser graces, and perfectly consistent with a certain noble diforder. It affociates naturally with that grave and folemn spirit, which distinguishes our author. For the sublime, is an awful and ferious emotion; and is heightened by all the images of Trouble, and Terror, and Darknefs.

Ipfe pater, media nimborum in noce, corusca Fulmina molitur dextra; quo maxima motu Terra tremit; sugere seræ; & mortalia corda Per gentes, humilis stravit pavor; ille, slagranti Aut Atho, aut Rhodopen, aut alta Ceraunia telo Dejicit.——

VIRG. Georg. I.

SIMPLICITY and conciseness, are never-failing characteristics of the stille of a sublime writer. He rests on the majesty of his sentiments, not on the pomp of his expressions. The main fecret of being fublime, is to fay great things in few, and in plain words: For every fuperfluous decoration degrades a fublime idea. The mind rifes and fwells, when a lofty description or fentiment is prefented to it, in its native form. But no fooner does the poet attempt to spread out this fentiment or description, and to deck it round and round with glittering ornaments, than the mind begins to fall from its high elevation; the transport is over; the beautiful may remain, but the fublime is gone. Hence the concife and fimple flyle of Offian, gives great advantage to his fublime conceptions; and affifts them in feizing the imagination with full power *.

SUBLIMITY

"The noted faying of Julius Cæsar, to the pilot in a storm; "Quid times? Cæsarem vehis;" is magnanimous and sublime. Lucan, not satisfied with this simple conciseness, resolved to amplify and improve the thought. Observe, how every time he twists it round, it departs farther from the sublime, till, at last, it ends in tumid declamation.

Sperne minas, inquit, Pelagi, ventoque furenti
Trade finum. Italiam, si cœlo auctore, recusas,
Me, pete. Sola tibi causa hæc est justa timoris
Vectorem non nosse tuum; quem numina nunquam
Destituunt; de quo male tunc fortuna meretur,
Cum post vota venit; medias perrumpe procellas
Tutela secure mea. Cœli iste fretique,
Non puppis nostræ, labor est. Hanc Cæsare pressam
A stuctu

SUBLIMITY as belonging to fentiment, coincides in a great measure with magnanimity, heroifm, and generofity of fentiment. Whatever discovers human nature in its greatest elevation; whatever befpeaks a high effort of foul; or thews a mind fuperior to pleafures, to dangers, and to death, forms what may be called the moral or fentimental fublime. For this. Offian is eminently diffinguished. poet maintains a higher tone of virtuous and noble fentiment, throughout all his works. Particularly in all the fentiments of Fingal, there is a grandeur and loftiness proper to swell the mind with the highest ideas of human persection. Wherever he appears, we behold the hero. The objects which he purfues, are always truly great; to bend the proud; to protect the injured; to defend his friends; to overcome his enemies by generofity more than by force. A portion of the fame spirit actuates all the other heroes. Valour reigns; but it is a generous valous, void of cruelty, animated by honour, not by hatred. We behold no debasing passions

A fluctu defendit onus.

— Quid tantâ strage parater,
Ignoras i Quærit pelagi cælique tumultu
Quid præstet fortuna mihi, among Fingal's warriors; no fpirit of avarice or of infult; but 2 perpetual contention for fame; a defire of being diffinguished and remembered for gallant actions; a love of justice; and a zealous attachment to their friends and their country. Such is the strain of sentiment in the works of Ossian.

Bur the fublimity of moral fentiments, if they wanted the foftening of the tender, would be in hazard of giving a hard and siff air to poetry. It is not enough to admire. Admiration is a cold feeling, in comparison of that deep interest, which the heart takes in tender and pathetick fcenes; where, by a mysterious attachment to the objects of compassion, we are pleased and delighted, even whilst we mourn. With scenes of this kind, Ossian abounds; and his high merit in these, is incontestable. He may be blamed for drawing tears too often from our eyes; but that he has the power of commanding them, I believe no man, who has the least fensibility, will question. The general character of his poetry, is the heroic mixed with the elegiac strain; admiration tempered with pity. Ever fond of giving, as he expresses it, "the joy of grief," it is visible, that on all moving subjects, he delights to exert his genius; and accordingly, never were there finer pathetick fituations, than what his works prefent. His great art in managing them lies in giving vent to the simple and natural emotions of the heart. We meet with no exaggerated declamation; no fubtile refinements on forrow; no fubilitation of description in place of passion. Oslian felt ftrongly himfelf; and the heart when uttering its native language never fails, by powerful fympathy, to affect the heart. A great variety of examples might be produced. We need only open the book to find them every where. What, for instance, can be more moving, than the lamentations of Oithona, after her misfortune? Gaul, the fon of Morni, her lover, ignorant of what she had fuffered, comes to her rescue. Their meeting is tender in the highest degree. He proposes to engage her foe, in single combat, and gives her in charge what she is to do, if he himself thall fall. " And shall the daughter of " Nuath live?" she replied with a bursting sigh. " Shall I live in Tromathon and the fon of " Morni low? My heart is not of that rock;

" nor my foul careless as that sea, which lifts

" its blue waves to every wind, and rolls beneath

" the frorm. The blaft, which shall lay thee low,

" fhall pread the branches of Oithona on earth.

"We shall wither together, son of car-borne

" Morni! The narrow house is pleasant to me;

"and the grey flone of the dead; for never more will I leave thy rocks, fea-furrounded Tromathon!——Chief of Strumon, why camest thou over the waves to Nuäth's mournful daughter? Why did not I pass away in fecret, like the flower of the rock, that lifts its fair head unseen, and strews its withered leaves on the blast? Why didst thou come, O Gaul! to hear my departing sigh?—
O had I dwelt at Duvranna, in the bright beams of my same! Then had my years come on with joy; and the virgins would bless my steps. But I fall in youth, son of Morni, and my father shall bluth in his hall."

OITHONA mourns like a woman; in Cuthullin's expressions of grief after his defeat, we behold the sentiments of a hero, generous but desponding. The situation is remarkably sine. Cuthullin, rouzed from his cave, by the noise of battle, sees Fingal victorious in the field. He is described as kindling at the sight. "His hand is on the sword of his fathers; his red-"rolling eyes on the soe. He thrice attempted to rush to battle; and thrice did Connal stop him;" suggesting, that Fingal was routing the soe; and that he ought not, by the show of superssuous aid, to deprive the king of any part of the honour of a victory, which was owing to him alone. Cuthullin yields to this generous fentiment; but we fee it stinging him to the heart with the fense of his own difgrace. "Then, " Carril, go," replied the chief, " and greet " the king of Morven. When Lochlin falls " away like a stream after rain, and the noise " of the battle is over, then be thy voice fweet " in his ear, to praise the king of swords. Give " him the fword of Caithbat: for Cuthullin is " worthy no more to lift the arms of his " fathers. But, O ye ghofts of the lonely " Cromla! Ye fouls of chiefs that are no more! " Be ye the companions of Cuthullin, and talk " to him in the cave of his forrow. For never " more shall I be renowned among the mighty " in the land. I am like a beam that has thone: " Like a mist that has fled away; when the " blaft of the morning came, and brightened " the shaggy side of the hill. Connal! talk of " arms no more: Departed is my fame. My " fighs shall be on Cromla's wind; till my foot-" fleps cease to be feen. And thou, white-" bosomed Bragela! mourn over the fall of my " fame; for vanquithed, I will never return to " thee, thou fun-beam of Dunfcaich!"

-Æstuat ingens

Uno in corde pudor, luctusque, & conscia virtus.

BESIDES fuch extended pathetick fcenes, Offian frequently pierces the heart by a fingle unexpected stroke. When Ofcar fell in battle. " No father mourned his fon flain in youth; " no brother, his brother of love; they fell " without tears, for the chief of the people was " low." In the admirable interview of Hector with Andromache, in the fixth Iliad, the circumstance of the child in his nurse's arms, has often been remarked, as adding much to the tenderness of the scene. In the following pasfage relating to the death of Cuthullin, we find a circumstance that must strike the imagination with still greater force. " And is the fon of " Semo fallen?" faid Carril with a figh. " Mournful are Tura's walls, and forrow dwells at Dunscaich. Thy spouse is left " alone in her youth; the fon of thy love is " alone. He shall come to Bragela, and ask " her why she weeps. He shall lift his eyes to " the wall, and fee his father's fword. Whose " fword is that? he will fay; and the foul of " his mother is fad," Soon after Fingal had shewn all the grief of a father's heart for Ryno, one of his fons, fallen in battle, he is calling, after his accustomed manner, his fons to the chafe. "Call," fays he, "Fillan and Ryno-"But he is not here-My fon rests on the bed

" of death."—This unexpected flart of anguish, is worthy of the highest tragic poet,

If the come in, the'll fure fpeak to my wife—
My wife!—my wife—What wife?—I have no wife—

Oh infupportable! Oh heavy hour!

Othello, A& 5. Scene 7.

The contrivance of the incident in both poets is fimilar; but the circumftances are varied with judgment. Othello dwells upon the name of wife, when it had fallen from him, with the confusion and horror of one tortured with guilt. Fingal, with the dignity of a hero, corrects himself, and suppresses his rising grief.

THE contrast which Ossian frequently makes between his present and his former state, disfuses over his whole poetry, a solemn pathetick air, which cannot fail to make impression on every heart. The conclusion of the songs of Selma, is particularly calculated for this purpose. Nothing can be more poetical and tender, or can leave upon the mind, a stronger, and more affecting idea of the venerable aged bard. "Such were the words of the bards in "the days of the song; when the king heard the music of harps, and the tales of other times. The chiefs gathered from all their

" hills, and heard the lovely found. They " praifed the voice of Cona *; the first among a thousand bards. But age is now on my " tongue, and my foul has failed. I hear, " fometimes, the ghosts of bards, and learn " their pleafant fong. But memory fails on my " mind; I hear the call of years. They fay, " as they pass along; Why does Offian fing? " Soon shall he lie in the narrow house, and " no bard shall raise his fame. Roll on, ye " dark-brown years! for ye bring no joy in " your courfe. Let the tomb open to Offian, " for his strength has failed. The sons of the " fong are gone to rest. My voice remains, " like a blaft, that roars lonely on a fea-fur-" rounded rock, after the winds are laid. The " dark moss whiftles there, and the diffant ma-" riner fees the waving trees."

Upon the whole; if to feel strongly, and to describe naturally, be the two chief ingredients in poetical genius, Ossian must, after fair examination, be held to possess that genius in a high degree. The question is not, whether a few improprieties may be pointed out in his works; whether this, or that passage, might not have been worked up with more art and skill, by some writer of happier times? A thousand such cold and frivolous criticisms, are altogether indecifive as to his genuine merit. But, has he the spirit, the fire, the inspiration of a poet? Does he utter the voice of nature? Does he elevate by his fentiments? Does he interest by his descriptions? Does he paint to the heart as well as to the fancy? Does he make his readers glow, and tremble, and weep? These are the great characteristicks of true poetry. Where these are found, he must be a minute critic indeed, who can dwell upon flight defects. A few beauties of this high kind, tranfcend whole volumes of faultless mediocrity. Uncouth and abrupt, Offian may fometimes appear by reason of his conciseness. But he is fublime, he is pathetick, in an eminent degree. If he has not the extensive knowlege, the regular dignity of narration, the fulness and accuracy of description, which we find in Homer and Virgil, yet in strength of imagination, in grandeur of fentiment, in native majesty of passion, he is fully their equal. If he flows not always like a clear stream, yet he breaks forth often like a torrent of fire. Of art too, he is far from being destitute; and his imagination is remarkable for delicacy as well as strength. Seldom or never is he either trifling or tedious; and if he be thought too melancholy, yet he is always Vol. II. Ff moral.

^{*} Offian himself is poetically called the voice of Cona,

moral. Though his merit were in other refpects much lefs than it is, this alone ought to entitle him to high regard, that his writings are remarkably favourable to virtue. They awake the tenderest fympathies, and inspire the most generous emotions. No reader can rise from him, without being warmed with the sentiments of humanity, virtue and honour.

THOUGH unacquainted with the original language, there is no one but must judge the translation to deserve the highest praise, on account of its beauty and elegance. Of its faithfulness and accuracy, I have been assured by persons skilled in the Galic tongue, who, from their youth, were acquainted with many of these poems of Ossian. To transsuse such spirited and fervid ideas from one language into another; to translate literally, and yet with such a glow of poetry; to keep alive so much passion, and support so much dignity throughout, is one of the most difficult works of genius, and proves the translator to have been animated with no small portion of Ossian's spirit.

THE meafured profe which he has employed, possesses considerable advantages above any fort of verification he could have chosen. Whilst it pleases and fills the ear with a variety of harmonious cadences, being, at the same time, freer from conftraint in the choice and arrangement of words, it allows the fpirit of the original to be exhibited with more justness, force, and fimplicity. Elegant however, and mafterly as Mr. Macpherson's translation is, we must never forget, whilst we read it, that we are putting the merit of the original to a fevere test. For, we are examining a poet stripped of his native drefs: divefted of the harmony of his own numbers. We know how much grace and energy the works of the Greek and Latin poets receive from the charm of verification in their original languages. If then, destitute of this advantage, exhibited in a literal version, Ossian still has power to please as a poet; and not to please only, but often to command, to transport, to melt the heart; we may very fafely infer, that his productions are the offspring of true and uncommon genius; and we may boldly affign him a place among those, whose works are to last for ages.

