The Editor's Preface.

THE Selections from the Registers of the Burgh of Aberdeen, printed in the present volume, extend from the early part of the reign of King James the Sixth to its conclusion.

The plan of editing it requires no explanation, being in all points the same as that adopted in preparing the first volume of these Extracts, and it only remains to advert to some of the more picturesque features of the selection, and to the illustrations of history and social progress which it may be supposed to afford.

The time embraced in the volume was one of change and stirring incident, and the impressions which these produced, as well as the tone of feeling which they served to realize in the minds of the Burgesses of Aberdeen, may enable us to judge of their effects on the country in general.

A very apt illustration of the insecurity which prevailed, and which at times rendered it doubtful to whom allegiance was really due, meets us nearly at the commencement of the volume. The burgh had a natural connection with the great house of Huntly, which for two centuries had exercised a most powerful influence over a large district of the north of Scotland, but which in the reign of Queen Mary had been totally overthrown. For two years the late Earl had been Provost of the burgh, and about a century before that time mutual letters or bonds of manrent passed between the head of this noble house and the burgh, binding themselves to mutual assistance. It was asserted by the vanquished party that the citizens took part with the Gordons at the Battle of the Crabstane in 1571, but the statement seems unfounded. A few years afterwards, the town gave for the support of the Earl (in whose person the family was restored) a sum of 600 merks; but the special reason assigned for the grant is the removal of his "suldeouris and men of weir out of this burght and boundis thairrof." However, their attachment to this family, real or supposed, formed a useful pretext to the greedy Regent Morton for exacting a large fine from the citizens.

The Regent and Lords of Privy Council were present in the burgh at the time of the Justice air in 1574, and at a meeting of the townsmen called for the purpose, and held in St. Peter's Aisle of their Parish Church, it was explained by the Provost, "quhow that my Lord Regent's Grace, be sinister and wrang informationne of sum invyous personis, baris indignationne at this burght and inhabitantis thairrof, allegeand that thai haf nocht done thair dewetie and thankfull service to our Souerane Lord the Kingis Grace, induring the tyme of the lait truble and frequent tumult that was in this realme amongis the nobilite and lieges thairrof," and therefore meant to pursue them for a large fine in the present air. (p. 11.) The town at once agreed to give their bond of fidelity to the King and his Regent, and to pay a reasonable tax on getting a discharge of all past crimes. One of the bonds which the town granted narrates "their proceedings in the resetting, assisting, contributionn, and stent making witht George, Erll of Huntly, Adam Gordoun of Auchindoun, his brother, and thair complices," during the time of their late rebellion ; and the discharge which the Regent granted to the burgh releases them of the consequences of these proceedings, and of all other crimes (with the exceptions therein enumerated, among which is the crime of witchcraft), but it cost them 4000 merks. (p. 19.)

There are various allusions to the injuries which the inhabitants sustained from the conflicts of "clannit men." Thus they refer to the great number of people from the country, who congregate in the town about the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday, "sum to ressaue in thair dettis, vtheris to vplift or giue out siluer on proffit, and mak thair securities," and after arranging these "lesum effaris," that they having deadly feuds unreconciled, and private quarrells, drew themselves into parties, and pursued each other with arms, within the burgh, and, on being charged by the Magistrates to desist, "they prouddie and contemnandlie hawe disobeyit the command of the Magistrattis, being clannit men of gryt freynschip ;" and the Magistrates, in attempting to quell these tumults, had often been in great danger and peril, and some of them hurt and wounded. (p. 249.) With the view of putting a stop to these disorders, the Magistrates proposed to procure letters from the Privy Council, charging the authors of them to desist—a remedy which we may undoubtedly presume to have been quite insufficient for such a purpose.

A few years afterwards, the Magistrates complain of another set of difficulties, which proceeded from the "clannit men ;" inasmuch as they often received charges to apprehend and put them in ward, "quhilkis thay are not hable to put to executioun, be reasoun of the grytnes and power of the pairties ;" they therefore agreed to request the Privy Council that they might only be required to give their concurrence in such acts to the Sheriff of the Shire. (p. 294.)

Occasionally we find a burgess accused of purchasing lordship against the Burgh by obtaining the assistance of some of the country

lairds in his affairs. This was regarded as a very heinous crime, as indeed it was, seeing that every burghess, by his oath at admission, became bound "na lordschip to purchis in contrair the libertie of this Brughe." And thus, when the Duke of Lennox was admitted a burghess, while they resolved to secure his purity and orthodoxy in religious matters, by requiring him to forsake the "Romane religioun, called Papystrie," the Magistrates at the same time made him swear that he "suld vsurp nor purcheis na lordschip contrar the fredom of the Burght." (p. 106.)

In former times of trouble and danger, the Charters of the Burgh were occasionally sent to the church as a sanctuary. But now the fortress, which, amid the commotions of the succeeding century, afforded a temporary shelter to the regalia of Scotland, was selected for the safety of the muniments of the town. It was "thocht expedient to put the townis eidentis in ferme securetye and keiping in Dunnottar for a seassoune, quhill thai think expedient, for eschewing of apperand danger in this troublouss tyme." (p. 6.)

The period was one of much religious excitement and change, and there will be found scattered illustrations of the popular feeling on this subject, as well as of the breaking up of ancient associations.

In former times, the burgesses had been exceedingly liberal in the founding and endowing of Chaplainries in the parish church, a practice which indeed had existed till a time comparatively recent. In 1575, there were only six Chaplains alive "of the queyr and College of the said burgh," who resigned into the hands of the Provost all their lands and other property, reserving their own liferent; and they thereafter ratified their resignation, and agreed that the funds should be applied "to the support and vphald of Sanct Thomas Hospitale, fuudit within this burght, besyd thair parroche kirk." (p. 8.) The Magistrates had, on a previous occasion, assumed that they had right to the property belonging to these Chaplainries, as patrons of the same, and had resolved to apply the revenue thereof for the upholding of their parish church. They thought it better afterwards to get their rights ratified by the existing Chaplains, perhaps on a principle which was not unfrequently acted on at the time, and which very forcibly exhibits the feeling of insecurity and doubt which prevailed as to the stability of the existing order of things; for in the sale of church lands after the Reformation, it is believed that it was by no means unusual to receive charters as well from the former owners as from those who had supplanted them and were now in possession. The purchasers were thus prepared either for a continuance of the new system or for a relapse into the old one.* Where the patronage of the Chaplainry remained with the heirs of the founder, they appear, in many cases, to have applied the revenues for their own private purposes. Thus, in 1592, we find reference made to the founders of altars within the parish church, who, as patrons, had given divers annual rents to the same, "for idolatrous service to be maid be preistis for thame, thair parentis, and successouris," and who now not only applied these revenues to their own use, but also usurped the privilege of burial-place within the Church, where the altar at which these services had been performed had stood, without payment of any dues therefor, or of any contribution for maintenance of the Church, which gave occasion to these * Robert Crichton was Bishop of Dunkeld at the time of the Reformation. In 1571 the See is declared to be void through Bishop Robert's forfeiture. (Keith's Cat. of Scott. Bishops, p. 96.) Among the writs of the Barony of Cluny, in Perthshire, which belonged to the Bishop of Dunkeld, and which is now the property of the Earl of Airlie, are to be found charters, granted in 1584, by Robert, Bishop of Dunkeld, with consent of his Chapter, just as if no change or forfeiture had happened. James Paton, his successor in the See, had been granting charters of various parts of the barony since 1576. Among the deeds of this barony, is a procuratory of resignation, by Mr. James Creichtoun, Fiar of Cluny, with consent of Mr. Robert Creichtoun of Eliok, his father, for resigning the same into the hands of the Bishop of Dunkeld, dated 20th June, 1570. The deed is signed and sealed by the parties, and the signature of the "admirable" Crichton gives a very favourable impression of his acquirements in the art of writing.

who had no foundations, to put up their arms upon various pillars of the said kirk, and other places of the same. An ordinance was therefore made, requiring such patrons either to mortify the revenues of the altars for upholding of the parish church, or sustentation of the Ministers, or some other godly uses, or else to pay for their burial places as others do; and that no arms should hereafter be put up anywhere in the church, except in windows, without licence from the Magistrates. (p. 78.) In 1596, a resignation was made by Thomas Murray, burgess, in favour of the Magistrates, of all right which he had to the altarge and chaplainry of St. Salvator, founded by his predecessors in St. Nicholas Church, and of the patronage and property thereof to be applied by them, ad pios usus, as they should think fit. (p. 146.) This privilege of sepulture within the church seems to have been highly valued; so much so, that complaints occur "of the desyr and supplicatioun of dyuers personis, quha desyris the bodeis of thair departit friendis to be bureit in the said kirk, swa that threw the multitude of deid bodies buriet thairin, few places is to be fund thairintill but grein grauis, albeit the kirk yard be ane honorabill place of burial, gif thai wald content thairwitht." (p. 55)

In the beginning of the succeeding century, the existence of the feeling may still be seen. (p. 226.)

A good deal of the attention of the Magistrates was still devoted to the maintenance of orthodoxy, and the uprooting of superstitious practices. They accordingly used much exertion to procure the regular attendance of the citizens at church to hear sermons, although the practice seems to have been by no means popular, and to have required the exaction of penalties to enforce compliance. Thus, in 1584, all masters of households are required, under a penalty, to repair to the parish church, "and keip and obserue the sermones and prechingis on the oulk dayis, towit, Tuysday and Thurisday, for hearing of the word of God and Christis euangell trewlie prechit." (p. 54.) This ordinance did not meet with much success, for in the course of four years afterwards there are renewed complaints of "a great nuner of the inhabitantis professing Chryst, as he is now offerit be the preching of the evangell, throch wilful re-maining from thair paroche kirk in tyme of preching and prayeris, als well on the Sabbotht day as on the oulk day, and be gaming and playing, passing to tavernis and ailhousis, using the tred of merchandice and handie labour in time of sermon on the oulk day, contrar to the custume of reformat kirkis and weill governit common weillis of this realme," whereupon the former ordinance is renewed under like penalties. (p. 62.)

About ten years afterwards new statutes are set down for the attendance at church. By these, the wives of burgesses are not to be allowed henceforth to sit "in the side aisles nor behind pillers, but in the middle of the church that thay may the mair easilie sie and hear the delyverer and preicher of the word." Moreover, the wives of burgesses are to have decent cloaks when they come to church, instead of plaids as heretofore, and every one shall bring a stool, according to the usages of all reformed boroughs and congregations of the realm. (p. 167.) In 1617, regrets are expressed that these various statutes had not taken full execution "throu iniquitie of time." They are therefore re-enacted, and the householders ordained to attend sermons as formerly under the usual penalties; and to meet the case of those who repaired to church on week days for avoiding the penalties, but did not remain till the service was concluded, they were ordained not only to keep the sermons, but also "not to depairt out of the kirk thairfra vnto the end thairof." (p. 354.)

We find also various ordinances against markets on Sunday during the time of sermon, (p. 38.) and "aganis the playeris in the Linkis and at the kyittis during the time of the sermones, as well as against sweraris and blasphemaris of Goddis holie name." (p. 167.)

With the view of securing the better observance of Sunday, it was resolved, in conformity with a recent act of parliament, to set aside the Monday of every week for a day of pastime, “quhairn it suld be lesum to all the laboraris of the ground within this realme to do thair awin lesum busines, and navayes to be answerabill to thair maisteris that day.” (p. 179.)

The Magistrates also intimated to the citizens, at a general meeting, the proposal of the Kirk Session, “that the maisteris of houshaldis, thair wyffis, bairnis, and servandis, and utheris inhabitants cum to discretioun of yeris, should be catechised every Thursday,” which “was thoct werray reasonabill, and nane op-ponit nor objectit in the contrar.” (p. 208.)

In 1599, they appointed a fast to be held on a Sunday, and enjoyned the inhabitants “to keip the kirkis fra murning to the efternoon sermonis be endit, and for entreating God of his mercies for seasonable wedder, and dropping schouris of rayne, to the comfort of the fructis and cornis presentlie growand on the ground, widderit at the gud plesour of God, be ane gryt droucht and blastering wyndis, for the sinnis and offencis of the people.” On this occasion intimation was made to the inhabitants by tuck of drum, that those who should be found absent from church on that day would incur a fine of five pounds. (p. 186.)

In 1592, they apprehended William Murdo on suspicioun of his being “an mantener of errouris,” and he being tried by the Provost, Bailies, and Ministers of the burgh, “was fund ane oppin blasphemer aganis the ancient Prophetis and Chrystis Apostlis, ane quha damnis the haill Auld Testament, except the Ten Commandments, and the New Testament, except the Lordis Prayer; a oppin railzear aganis the ministrie and treuth preichit, and is sic a blasphemous heretyk that he can not be sufferit in ane republict.” He was accordingly banished from the burgh. with certification that if he should again be found therein, he “sal be brint on the cheik and his luggis cuttit.” (p. 75.)

In the same year they ordained the whole inhabitants to compear in church after sermon, and give their oaths "for mantenance of the caus of trew religioun presentlie professit within this realm," in terms of his Majesty's proclamation.

The Magistrates thus performed the duties of ecclesiastical censors, and exhibit some jealousy of any undue exercise of spiritual powers elsewhere. Thus, among the points to be inquired into by the privy inquest, are the following:—"Item, gif ony man drawis his nichtbouris fra secular courtis, be ony spirituall court quhatsumeuer." (p. 88.) "Item, gif thair be any quhilk hes gevin landis or annuell rentis to religious places, or in the handis of religious men, or uther kirkmen, without licence of the king." (p. 89.)

While thus vigilant in regard to such matters, it is not to be supposed that a man who was suspected of intercourse with spirits would escape their notice. Accordingly, Thomas Lorne, in the Overtoun of Dyce, being accused of "hering of spreittis and wauer-ing oftentymes fra his wyff, bairnis, and famelie, be the space of seven ulkis," without its being known to them or any other person where he has been during that time, and confessing his fault, became bound to reform his practices, or in the event of his failing to do so, he "is contented to suffer death as ane giltie persoun dealer with spreittis." * (p. 204.)

It appears from other records printed for the Club, that at this time a great outburst of witchcraft occurred in the district. Doubtless the business which accumulated on the hands of the Magistrates must have been very engrossing, as twenty-six individuals suffered in the flames as witches at this period. The Dean of Gild was so much occupied with these matters, and his time so much abstracted from his ordinary duties, "in his extraordinarie panis on the birning of the gryt numer of witches brint this year, and on the four pirrattis, and bigging of the port on the brig of Dee, and reparing of the Gray Freris Kirk and stepill theirow," as to induce the Magistrates to vote a sum of money to him by way of recompence. (p. 155.)

* The Parish of Dyce seems to have had a monopoly of spirits at this time. See the case of Walter Ronaldsone in Kirkton of Dyce, in 1601, who had "familiaritie of a spirite." On one occasion this spirit appeared in the form of "ane litill bodie, haiffing a scheavin berd, cled in quhyt lening lyk a sark." (Selections from Ecc. Records, p. 154.)

About this time John Gordon was detained in the kirk vault, as a "manifest and oppin witch." It would appear that multitudes flocked to him, "and speris at the said John dyvers and sindrie thingis werray prejudiciall to the commoun pepill." It does not here appear how John had been involved in this heavy charge, except that until "he was laitlie apprehendit and tane, he gawe himself out as a dum man." (p. 145.) There is evidence of the continued determination of the Magistrates to proceed against witches and sorcerers, "and that this burcht and fredome thairof suld be purgitt of sic contagious enemies to the commoun weill of the same." (p. 206.)

We have an instance in the present volume of the proceedings which took place at the election of a minister under the system which prevailed during part of the period in question. Mr. Robert Howie had been removed from Aberdeen to Dundee, and "at the desire of the counsall, and be consent of his Majestie, and adwyse of the Commissionaris of the General Kirk," Mr. George Greir came to the burgh and preached "for a tryall of his qualificatioun" to be Mr. Howie's successor. After hearing him preach, the town authorized the Council "to deall with him for his transportation to this burcht." (p. 188.) The Council accordingly "travellit earnestlie" with Mr. Greir, in whom however "thair was, nor is nocht, sic willingnes fand, nather yit is he sa loving towards his accepting of the charge, as the Counsall wald wische him." (p. 196.)

Mr. Grier remained in Aberdeen about ten days. His whole charges were defrayed by the town, as appears by the following entries in the accounts of the burgh* :—

Item, be vertew of ane act of counsall of the dait the xii. of [     ] 1599, gevin to Maister George Greir, minister, for his expensis in cuming to this burght from Edinburgh, as he that was put in licence to have bene one of the ministers of this burght . . . . .	£40 0 0
Item, gevin to the said Mr. George, horshyre, [     ] Dundie . . . . .	3 7 0
Item, gevin at command of the prouest and bailleis for the wyne and spyeerie to the said Mr. George Greir, the nicht before his passing out of this burght . . . . .	3 6 8
Item, gevin at command of the prouest, bailleis, and counsall for the said Mr. George ordinar chargis and expensiss during his remaining within this burght, quhilk wes be the space of ten dayes, in the hous of Mr. Peter Blakburne, minister . . . . .	13 6 8

The citizens, on hearing of the coldness of Mr. Greir, resolved to look out for a clergyman elsewhere, and accordingly named a large commission, which included David, Bishop of Aberdeen; Mr. Blackburn, Minister; Mr. David Raitt, Principal of King's College; Mr. Gilbert Gray, Principal of Marischal College, and several of the principal burgesses, "to nominat and cheis ane qualifiet persoun indewit with qualities meit for the said office, to accept the function of ane of the ministeris of this burght," either in the diocese of Aberdeen or elsewhere, "as to sic persones quha hes best knowledge, and can decerne better in the said matter nor a commonaltie," should seem right, with power to fix his stipend and how it is to be paid, but "provyding that befor the admission of the said persoun to the said function, he be hard teiche and weill lyckit of be thame." (p. 195.)

* The gifts made to their clergymen by the Magistrates were many and various. To Mr. Adam Herriot, the first clergyman in Aberdeen of the new opinions, they presented a suit of cloathes in 1560, of which the following entry occurs in the accounts :—

Item, for ane garment and hail stand of claythis to Maister Adame Herreat at the townis command.....	28 lib.
Item, Adame Herreat himself, his servand, and his horss, the space of ix. owkkis ellis bigane.....	25 lib.

At a subsequent meeting, the Commissioners reported that they, after hearing the doctrine of Mr. James Ross, Minister at Strachan, on Sunday last, made to both the congregations, "on the tua pairtis of the halie scriptures, gevin to him for a theme and text to teich on, for his tryell in doctrine and literature, had, efter censuring of him in knowledge, doctrine, and lyff, fund the said Maister James to have sound knowledge in the holie scriptures, and habill to undertak the said charge." The meeting, on being enquired at, gave their opinion that "his doctrine was sound and hailsum doctrine," and therefore gave their consent to his nomination. election, and admission; accordingly, David, Bishop of Aberdeen, for himself, and "as ane havand powar of his Majestie, to the chesing and electing of ane ordinar minister and pastor for preching of the evangell and ministratioun of the sacramentis within this burght, for his Hienes, and in name of his Majestie, votit and declarit, in audience of the towne, that he gawe his consent to the electing of the said Mr. James;" which nomination and election by the Commissioners, and also by the Bishop, having power of his Majesty, as aforesaid, and by the whole inhabitants without contradiction, having been made, the Commissioners proceeded to settle the stipend to be paid to the said Mr. James; and he being personally present, accepted of the office, and, in token of his acceptance thereof, and that he was content with the offered stipend, "the said Mr. James jointit hand in the hand of the said David, Bishop of Aberdene, and of the said Alex. Rutherford, prowest, in presence of the towne; they on the vther part promising faythfullie to assist the said Maister James in every thing pertening to his charge, with obedience as becumeth the flock to their pastour, sa long as he remanit faythfull in that office." (p. 197.)

A "disjoyne" was given to the Bishop and Ministers on the occasion (p. 204); and, as an addition was soon made to the stipend of Mr. Ross, it would appear that his popularity had been sustained.

Various notices would seem to show the closeness of the bond which then united the various classes of society together; and the heartiness with which rejoicings were universally celebrated on the occasion of any public benefit, would imply the existence of a pervading feeling that all were members of one large family, each member being interested in the welfare of the other. On the birth of a Prince, in 1593, rejoicings were ordered to be held on the Sunday, immediately after the afternoon sermon, a table to be covered at the Market Cross for the Magistrates and Council, "with tua bunnis of Inglis beir to be placed and run at the said Marcat Crose, the wyne to be liberallie drunkin in sic a ressonabill quantitie as the Deane of Gild sall denyse, four dussoun buistis of skorchettis, confectionis, and confectionis, to be placed on the said tabill and cassin amongis the pepill, with glassis to be brockin." (p. 90.)

On the King's escape from the Gowrie conspiracy, while many of his subjects disbelieved the existence of any plot or danger except in his own royal imagination, the people of Aberdeen were warned by their Magistrates to "keip the sermones" both morning and afternoon, and instead of resuming their work, they were ordered, "after the preitching and thankisgeving, to spend the rest of the day in all lauchfull and honest gladnes, and accompanie thair Magistrattis throu the tonne, in singing of psalmes and prasing of God, and ordanis the crose to be dectit and hung, and ane tabill to be sett thairat, and the wyne and spycerie to be drunkin and spent, and a number of glassis to be cassin and brockin, in significatioun of thair rejocing and glaid hartis for his Majesties happie preservatioun, wrocht sa miraculouslie be Goddis guid providence." (p. 221.) The Master of the Grammar School composed a congratulatory treatise in Latin on the occasion, and as it was dedicated to the Magistrates, and contained "sum commemoratioun of this burghis antiquitie and privilegis, granted thairunto be his Majesties pre-dicessouris," he received a honorarium of twenty pounds. (p. 222.)

On the news of his Majesty's accession to the English throne, the townsmen were forthwith warned, be sound of trumpet and drum, "to assemble instantlie in thair parochie kirk, and thair gif thankis and prasis to God for the foresaid glad tydings:" thereafter bonfires were to be kindled on all the streets, the bells to be rung, wine and spicery to be drunk at the cross, glasses broken, and "the haill youthis of the toune, to tak thair hagbuttis, and accompanie thair Magistrattis throcht the haill rewis of the toun, pas the tyme in seluting thair muskattis and hagbuttis til lait at nicht; the tonniss haill munitioun and artailzerie to be chargit and schott, and all godlie mirrienes and pastime usit, that may expres the joy and glaidnes of the hartis of the people." (p. 237.)

On his Majesty's escape from gunpowder plot, besides other demonstrations of joy, the townsmen were ordered to "accompanie the Magistratis and Ministrie, passing throu the haill streittis, and singing of psalmes and magnefeing the Lord, for the said benefitt;" and thereafter adjourn to the cross for wine and spicery, as usual. (p. 279.)

Even the safe return of Prince Charles from Spain, in 1623, was celebrated with every demonstration of joy, including the sermons, bonfires, drinking of wine, and shooting. (p. 390.)

The hospitality of the burgh also resembles rather the warm demonstrations of private friendship than the formal courtesy of a public body. No man engaged in the public service or of distinguished rank seems ever to have passed through the burgh without an entertainment from the Magistrates, nor was any transaction arranged without a banquet to those who conducted the arrangements.

The Bishop, who had been on an embassy to Denmark, gets wine and spicery "for his welcome hame." (p. 175.) At the same time, on hearing that the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Huntly were to be in the town, it was resolved, "according to the custume ob-servit within this burght heirtfoir in all ages." to present these noblemen with six quarts of wine, and various confections. (p. 177.) A few months after this time, the Earl of Huntly being again in the town, received another present of wine and confections, "according to the lovabill consuetude of this burght." Next month, the Countess Marischal gets a similar gift, "it being the first tyme of hir entrie thairin"

In 1619, the Duke of Lennox was expected to remain in the burgh for some days, "for his pastime and recreatioun," and it was resolved to provide him with a lodging, as well as wine, spices, and all other necessary provisions. (p. 361.) The expense was considerable:—

Item, be wertew of ane ordinance of counsall of the dait 4 August, 1619, debursit upoun halding hous to my Lord Duke of Lenox, and the nobillmen that attendit him during the tyme of his lait being in this burgh, in the said moneth of August, conforme to the particular compt thair of, sene, and allowit be the auditors of comptis, extending in all to the soume of £425 12 0

The liberality of the citizens was also extended, in 1601, to the "Kingis servandis presentlie in this burght, quha playes comedies and staige playes, be reasoun thay ar recommendit be his Majesties speciall letter, and hes played sum of thair comedies in this burght." (p. 222.) The following entry in the accounts of the burgh show the sums thus given:—

Item, to the stageplayeris, Inglischemen . . . . .	£22 0 0
Item, for the stageplayeris support that nicht thaye plaidd to the towne . . . . .	3 0 0

Their whole expenses were also defrayed during their sojourn in the burgh, as well as the expenses of a French knight who accompanied them. These are thus entered in the accounts:—

Item, gevin for the expensiss maid on the enterntenement of Monsieur de Halzie, Frenschemane, and the gentilmen, his Majestes servands, quho cum to this burght with him, in October, 1601, and for defraying of thair hail chargis during thair remaining in this burght, conforme to ane ordinance of counsall maid thairanent. . . . £126 3 6

This Frenchman and many other knights and gentlemen were admitted burgesses.

* In "William Shakspeare, a Biography by Charles Knight, London, 1843," there is
(p. 441.) a very interesting dissertation on the above entry, relating to the King's servants or company of Comedians. Mr. Knight seems satisfactorily to identify "Laurence Fletcher, comediane to his Majestie," with that Laurence Fletcher who is associated with Shakspeare in the Patent granted to them and others by James I. in 1603. The presumptions are very weighty therefore for believing that our great poet was one of the company who with Fletcher "played comedies and staige playes" to the burgesses of Aberdeen in 1601, and that Fletcher, as the head of the company, received the only honour which the Magistrates could confer, by being admitted a burgess.

Mr. Knight also finds traces of Shakspeare's witches in the singularly curious trials for witchcraft printed for the Club (Miscellany, vol. I.), which had recently occurred in Aberdeen, and of which a stranger, capable of appreciating and willing to listen to such marvellous instances of supernatural power, would doubtless hear enough. Mr. Knight also suggests that Shakspeare might have picked up in his sojourn in Scotland at this time, the floating traditions about Macbeth which he afterwards worked up in his wonderful tragedy.

Thus we find them aiding three Hungarians who had been taken prisoners by the Turks in defence of the christian religion. (p. 89.) A burgess of Irvine, who had been "pilleit and herreit be the Ireland men," gets assistance. (p. 110.) Two shipwrecked Danes received aid, and "six coastsyd men that wer pilleit be the Hie-land men in thair cumming fra the Lewis" (p. 234) are relieved.

Various illustrations of the state of education in the burgh, occur in the present volume.

The Master of the Grammar School had the exclusive right of teaching grammar within the burgh, and on various occasions he is found asserting this privilege. Thus in 1593, a certain Mr. David Kanzie was accused "of instructing of bairnis in oratric, poetrie, and sic as belangis to that liberall science, without licence, libertie, and previledge grantit to the said Maister David, be the provest, bailleis, and consall, and the said Mr. Thomas, maister of the grammer school, usurping theirby the said Mr. Thomas place, to quhom onlie it is lesum, and to sic as he sall deput vnder him to teich grammer within this burgh." (p. 90.) Whereupon he was ordered to desist and cease from farther teacheing till he should obtain such licence.

An ordinance vindicating the privileges of the Grammar School occurs shortly after. (p. 154.)

About ten years after this time, Edward Diggens, Englishman, supplicates the council for liberty to "teache the youthe within this burgh in wretting and arithmetik for the space of thrie monethis allanerlie." He promised to teach them in that time "a sufficient habite of a legible hand." His terms were unexceptionable: he was "to teache the poor for Godis sake, and the ritche for reasone, and nothing to be payit except they be profited." (p. 293.)

He accordingly received licence from the council, "provyding that he teache his scolleris onlie to wreit and in arithmetik, and no utherways." John Thomson and his wife were allowit to teach, but the license extended only to "maidayne bairnis," and provided that they should have no "man doctour" under them. (p. 171.)

The burgh then, as now, was so fortunate as to possess in the Masters of their Grammar School men of letters and classical taste. At the time when these notices occur, the chairs of learning in this academy were occupied by men whose names are not unknown in the world of letters. These were Mr. Thomas Reid and Mr. David Wedderburn, who were for some time joint masters of the Grammar School. The former soon became one of the Regents in Marischal College, and thereafter Latin Secretary to King James VI. (p. 246.) The latter was a poet of no little fame in his day. He lived in the closest intimacy with Dr. Arthur Johnston, and numbered among his friends, the pious Bishop Patrick Forbes, William Forbes, Bishop of Edinburgh, and many illustrious contemporaries.

Perhaps we may not err in ascribing to the fire enkindled by these men of genius in the breasts of their youthful pupils, that maturity of scholarship and classical taste which rendered the names of many of the scholars of Aberdeen illustrious, as well in foreign countries as at home, during the early part of this century.

About two years after his admission, Wedderburn intimated to the Council, "that he being vrgit and burdenit be the lait provinciall assembleie of the ministrie hauldin in this burght, to accept upon him the functioun of ane minister of Goddis word, was resolut to enter in the said functioun, and obey God calling him thairto be the said assembleie, and to leave and desert the said school." (p. 238.)

The Council permitted him to give up his situation in the Grammar School, but he very soon changed his intentions, and, at his own request, was reponed in his former office. (p. 244.)

In the ensuing year, there is mention made of "the greiffs" expressed by many of the inhabitants against Wedderburn, for "certane abuses and extortionis laitlie enterit and raisit in the said school, by all gude ordour or forme." These consisted of exactions of higher fees for teaching than had been appointed. "Item, for tacking fra ewerie bairne, ilk Sunday, tua penneis, to be gevin to the puir; it being no point of charitie to caus bairnis giwe siluer to the puir, thai hawing no siluer to giwe of thair awin but that for quhilk thay mak sum wrang schift." Among other exactions, he took eightpence monthly for "bent money," and at the beginning of ilk buik twelf penneis. "Item, for causing bairnis pay siluer at Candilmes, for thair Candilmes candill, aganis all forme and ordour, quhairas the auld forme wes to tak onlie candill and navayes siluer." The last matter was so arranged that the children should only be obliged to bring two candles during their pleasure at Candlemas, "not restraining alwayes the liberalitie of thair parantis." No silver was allowed to be taken, "except fra him quha sall be king, to quhome it sall be lesum to gif quhat he pleissis, and tua of the Counsall to be present in the school on Candilmes evin, to sie this ordour concerning the candill preceislie keipit for eschewing emulation and contentioun amangis the bairnis." (p. 264.)

Several of these alleged "novations" appear to have arisen "rather upoun ane auld vse and custume introducit in the said school befor the said Maister Davidis entrie thairwith, than anywayis inuentit or devysit be him." The regulations now made were ordered to be written "in gryt letteris on a brod, and to be affixit in the Grammar School, that nather the Maister, nor the Doctour, (the second master,) nor ony of the scholeris pretend ignerance thairrof."

On the death of Mr. Gilbert Gray, Principal of Marischal College, in 1614, Wedderburn was appointed by the Council to teach "the hie class of the College" for a time, in doing which, he met with the approbation of the Students, Council, and whole inhabitants, and received from the Council a suitable reward.

In 1620, we find Mr. Wedderburn complaining to the Council, "that he hes not ane stipend quhilk may encourage ane honest man to walk in sic a toilsom callin with cheerfulness ; the multitude of schooles everiequhair, the burdine of a familie unknowin to him of befor, the darth of the tyme, so cutteth away any little thing that is gottin, that or the twa pairt of the quarter be expired, he sees evidently no correspondense betwixt his extraordinar paynis and the ordinar reward : thairfour that it wald pleas thair wisdemes, with quhat affectioun they wald wishe the wark to stand and go fordward, to sie also with the same affectioun how be honest meanes the wark may be under proppet ;” and that they “ will see that in sum measure he may liwe as vther scholaris in vther professionis.” (p. 366.) This reasonable request was readily complied with by augmenting the school fees, and also by giving him an yearly sum of eighty merks, for which cause Wedderburne agreed to give a weekly lesson in Humanity, in the Marischal College, “ out of sic authoris, at sic hours, and after sic method as sal be enjoyned to him be the counsall, and thairwith to compose in Latine, both in prose and verse, quhatsumeuir purpose or theme concerning the commoun effairis of the toune, ather at hame or afield, as he sal be requyred be any of the Magistrattis or Clerk in tyme comeing.” It was found, however, that the teaching of Humanity interfered with the discharge of his other duties, and this part of his labour was soon discontinued.

Mr. William Wedderburne, a brother of the Master of the Grammar School, held the office of “Doctour” or Second Master. He had given some offence to Alexander Forbes, sometime of Towie, who had in consequence “ passed to the said Grammer School, and thair gevin ane cuff to the said Maister Williame Wedderburne.” He acknowledged his offence, and in terms of an ordinance of the Council he accompanied the Magistrates and Council to the Grammar Schoole, “ and thair most submissiwelie on his kneeis, confest his wrang foirsaid, done to the toune and to the said Maister Williame Wedderburne, Doctour of thair Grammer Schoole, and first crawit the Magistrattis and Counsall, and nixt the said Maister Williame, pardoun thairfoir, promeising neur to do the lyke in tyme cumeing, but to remayne a freynd and weill willar baith to the toune and to the said Maister Williame in all tyme heireftir, and instantlie choppit handis with the Magistrattis and the said Maister Williame." (p. 353.)

It is notoriously a difficult matter to change the established customs of a people, and the Magistrates amply experienced this truth in the continued opposition which they encountered in their efforts to abolish certain observances, to which the boys of the Grammar School, as well as the inhabitants in general, had been accustomed at the feast of "Yule."

In 1576, certain deacons of crafts were accused of "manteining of the twenty-fyft day of December last bypast, as Ywill day, halding the same haly day, and absteyning fra labour for the maist pairt witht festing and playing," who answered that they who were suspected "of the said inormitie" had been already dealt with by the Minister and Kirk Session, and had purged themselves thereof; but they again "purgit thame selffis on their consciens that they mantenit nocht the said superstitionis festuall dayis," and found caution to observe the ordinance against the same in time coming. (p. 25.)

In former times, the boys of the Grammar School had enjoyed certain "auld priuileges" about the time of Christmas, which were modified or withdrawn soon after the Reformation. In 1568, they presented a supplication to the Council on the subject, "be epistill in Latin," and at this time it was arranged, that in lieu of the old privileges they should have liberty to remain absent from school "fra Sanct Thomas evin before Yuill quhill vpon the morne efter the Epiphanie day." (Burgh Records, vol. i. p. 366.) But the Council finding "inconuenientis followand thairon," abolished this holiday. (p. 25.)

Some years thereafter, it would appear that the students had persisted in their old enormities, by "taking of the schuill, and vsurping aganis the Master and Magistrates this tyme of yeir afoir Yuill, callit Natiuite of our Lord"; so that it became necessary to ordain, that all gentlemen's sons to landward, as well as burgesses sons within the burgh, should be presented to the Magistrates before they should be admitted to the school, and should find caution for obedience to the Master and Magistrates. (p. 39.)

Notwithstanding of this, the boys appear to have vindicated their old privileges on the very next occurrence of the time of Yuill, and to have "takyn the schuill, mening to have the ald privilege." The Council freely forgave all past misdeeds of this sort, and in presence of the master, and of the greater part of the scholars, ordained that no privilege should be granted to the scholars at the time of "Yuill" in time coming; they however compounded with the boys by assigning to them three days of vacation at the beginning of every quarter. (p. 45.)

About twenty years after this time, the old privilege seems to have been resumed in all its strength. Thus in 1604, "the disordour and dissolute behaviour" of the boys of the Grammar School, had again come to a great height, about the superstitious time of Yuill. They would appear to have been guilty of "tacking of the school, keping and haulding of the same aganis thair Maister, with swordis, gunnis, pistollis, and vtheris wappynnis, spulzeing and tacking of puir folkis geir, sic as geisse, foullis, peittis, and utheris vivaris;" all which, not only tended to the superstitious observation of holy days, but also bred in the scholars a contempt of their Master and of all discipline; "besyddis, that the puir people that cummis into the towne for selling of vivaris, are spulzeit and reft thair of, and na satisfactioun maid to thame of the samen, to thair grypt hurt and skayth, and sklander of this burcht and Magistrattis thair of." The statute requiring caution from all the scholars, that they would submit to discipline, and relinquish such disorders in future, was again renewed. (p. 251.)

The boys seem to have been under no very effectual discipline, for we find them accused of "trubling and striking of the serwandis of diwerse nichtbouris within the burght, and using gryt disordour and enormities," and at a time when they could not plead the excuse of their old privileges at Yule.

The inadequacy of the means used to prevent these disorders may be gathered from what happened a few years after the last notice on the subject. In 1612, we find seven students, sons of country gentlemen, accused by the provest of the great enormities which, in company with their associates in the Grammar School, Song School, and Writing School, they had perpetrated on the first of December, aggravated, too, by its commission "lang befor the superstitious tyme of Yuill." They appear on the above day to have taken possession of the Song School, "keippit and hauldin the same with hagbuttis, pistollis, swordis, and long wapynnys," for three days, till the magistrates were compelled to apprehend and imprison a certain number of them. They were also accused "for wearing of gunes and schoitting theirwith, alsuell on the nicht as on the day, and for great deidis of oppressioun and ryottis comittit be thame sen the first day of December, aganis diuers nichtbouris of this burghe, in cumeing to thair houssis and bracking up thair durris and windouis, and maisterfullie away tacking of thair foulis, pultrie, breid, and vivaris," besides taking at thair own hand "fewall and vivaris" from the lieges coming to the burgh, and committing many other deeds of oppression. (p. 310.)

This was too serious a matter to be passed over, and accordingly upwards of twenty students, all of them sons of gentlemen, were expelled from the schools of the burgh, and were appointed to find caution that they should not molest the inhabitants in time coming. The Magistrates, at the same time, resolved to provide against the usual disorders at Christmas, which they partly attributed to the slackness of discipline maintained by the Masters. And in the meantime, Gilbert Leslie, Master of the Writing School, who happened to be present, undertook for the good behaviour of his scholars in time to come. No doubt he must have found this to be a hazardous task, for the very next day we find that he was attacked by Patrick Gordon of Birsmoir, a near relative of two of the boys who had been expelled, who drew his sword, and pursued Mr. Leslie on the street, "giwing furthe dyveris and sindrie straikis at the said Gilbert." The Laird of Birsmoir acknowledged his offence, and found surety that he would not molest the Master of the Writing School in time to come. (p. 313.) But the affront which had been put upon the expelled scholars was very grievous, and probably had been brought about by the evidence of Leslie; in a few months, we find that a brother of the Laird of Birsmoir, and Francis Murray, brother to the Laird of Cowbairdie, "with sum vtheris, thair complices, hes this day cum to this burgh of sett purpos and prouisioun, and maist prouddie, in contempt of law and justice, hes mest crewallie and unmercifullie persewit Gilbert Leslie, reidar, and Maister of the Writing School of this burgh, of his lyiff, on the Kingis hie streitt of this burgh, at the kirk styill, and hes gewin him many bluidie and best straikis with durkis and battounes in dyuers pairtis of his bodie, to the great effuseoune of his bloode and danger of his lyiff. (p. 315.)

The Magistrates immediately resolved to charge the above individuals as well as the Laird of Birsmoir, who probably was at the bottom of the attack, to appear before the Privy Council to answer for the oppression thus committed. Through the mediation of Alexander Gordon of Cluny the matter was amicably settled. The Laird of Birsmoir had to pay two hundred merks of a fine, and he along with his accomplices were ordered "to cum to the auld kirk of this burgh on ane preiching day, and thair, immediatlie efter the ending of the sermone befor the blessing, to ryis out of thair seat in the ruid loft and compear befor the pulpitt, and thair in all humilitie, ilk ane seuerallie efter vther, craue first God pardoun and forgiwenes for thair said wrang done to the toun and to the said Gilbert Lesle; and nixt to turne themselffis towardis the magistrattis dask, and, in all humilitie, confes thair offence done to the toun and to the said Gilbert, and craue the Prowest, Baillies, Counsall, and haill toun, pardoun thairfoir; and last, to craue the said Gilbert Leslie, quhome thay hurt, pardoun and forgiwenes for the same, schak handis with him, and promeis newer to do the lyk in tym cumming." (p. 319.)

There seems no reason to doubt that these disorders proceeded from the saturnalia originally indulged in by the boys at the time of "Yuill," and from the attempts of the Magistrates to bring their license within reasonable limits.

It is probable that then, as in later times, the irritated feelings of contending parties found vent in law pleas, when the system of attacking each other with swords and guns began to be discouraged. In 1580, we find the Magistrates taking order for enforcing a recent Act of Parliament "against sic personis within burght as wrangouslie perseuis or defendis ony actionis or caussis in judgement, and upon thame that tynes the pley within burght." The fines which were recoverable from such parties, were leased for one year at a sum of forty pounds.

We observe a warlike spirit, too, in quarters where it is not ordinarily looked for. Thus the wife of Mr. Aidie, Principal of the Marischal College, was convicted of "dinging and stricking Janet Mackye, servand to James Birny in Tarves, on the face, to the effusion of her bluid." (p. 361.)

The erection of the College by the Earl Marischal, was an event of no little consequence to the prosperity of the burgh. The charter of its foundation is dated 2nd April, 1593; and we have the election of James Forbes of Tullochbuie, as the first economus of the establishment, in little more than two months thereafter.

Various notices in the accounts of the year 1593-4, show that the Magistrates took every means to expedite the undertaking:

Be vertew of ane ordinance of counsall, of the dait the xxi. of December, 1593, gevin to the Bischop, Minister, and Mr. Thomas Mollisoun, Clerk, appoyntit be the Counsall to pas to Edinburgh anent the mater of the exhibitoun of the execution of the new College, to mak thair expensiss . . . . .	£80	0	0

It formed part of the duties of the Master of the Grammar School, that he should indite Latin verses on all occasions when the "necessar adoiss" of the town required it; and it is not wonderful that his poetical talent should have been employed to celebrate an event so interesting and important as the foundation of Marischal College.

The following payment was made—

To Mr. Thomas Cargill, to caus print certane verse in Latin in commendatione of my Lord Marscheall for erecking the new College in Aberdeen, at the Counsallis command . . . . .	£3	0	0

In these times, every grown up person carried his sword, and was trained to use his weapons, and we are therefore prepared to expect frequent notices of broils and mutual attacks by "drawing of swords and quhingeris," (p. 109), both among the burgesses and barons. On one occasion, the Magistrates found it necessary to call out the townsmen "in thair armis, and specialle in lang vappynnis," to keep the peace between the Earl Marischal and his friends, on the one part, and Gordon, younger of Cairnborrow, and others of that clan, on the other.

A curious symptom of the lawless state of the times may be observed in the ordinances of the Magistrates requiring a certain number of the inhabitants to assist in besieging the Houses of the Abbey of Deer (p. 68), and Drumbreck. (p. 250.) The circumstances attending the siege of the former have been already noticed in one of the works printed for the Club.*

George Meldrum, younger of Drumbreck, the hero of the latter, affords a choice specimen of the cruel brigand. It would appear that he had conceived a deadly feud against his brother Andrew, and, in futherance of his malice, had attacked him at the Mylnetoun of Dumbreck, in the year 1599, grievously wounding him, and at the same time "tuck the said Andro captiue and prissoner, had and conveyit him to the place of Dumbrek, quhair the said George detenit him as captiue be the space of aucht oulkis or thairby, in strait firmance and captiuitie," removing him thereafter to the place of Ernesyde, from which, after a farther captivity of nearly three weeks, he made his escape. He entertained malice also against Andrew Meldrum of Achquhartis, and, with the aid of some of his servants, took him prisoner at his own dwelling-place, carrying him to a house on the Borough Muir of Edinburgh. He was also at feud with Mr. Alexander Gibsone, one of the Clerks of Session, and took him prisoner as well as a friend and servant, who were riding in company with him, and robbed them. He carried Mr. Gibsone into England, detaining him in captivity for the space of eight days.

* Antiquities of Aberdeen and Banff, vol. ii., p. 423.

His last offence, being also the one which called for the aid of the citizens of Aberdeen in its redress, was the invasion of his brother's house of Drumbreck, and keeping of the same against the King's Guard, who had commission to charge him to render it up. This charge he disobeyed, and the burgh had now to furnish sixteen soldiers to assist the royal guard in besieging this ferocious freebooter in his retreat. He was soon afterwards tried, found guilty, and beheaded for his oppression and other crimes.*

In 1593, provision was made for the defence of the town against "lawles Helandmen in Birss, Glentanner, and thair about," who had lately been guilty of the "onmerciful murthering of men and bairnis, and also of the maisterfull and violent robbing and spulzeing of all the bestiall, guidis, and gear of a gryt pairt of the inhabitantis of theas boundis." These Highlanders, who are said to have "na respect to God nor man," plundered the country within 20 miles of the burgh, so that the inhabitants were warned to be ready to convene at the sound of the bell, for the defence of "thair lyvis, gudis, and geir," in case of a sudden assault by these men of Birss. (p. 82.)

On several occasions during the period embraced in the present volume, the necessities of state, or his own amusement, drew the King to visit the burgh. We may guess at the nature of the relaxations in which he indulged while in the burgh, from the "bigging of ane pair of buttis besyd the Castell hill, for serving of his hienes and noble men that is to cum heir with his grace, according to the praiss and renoune of this burgh." (p. 65.)

In 1617, his Majesty being desirous of enjoying his favourite sport of hunting, made a progress into Angus, lodging at Kinnaird, in that shire, in the vicinity of Montreumouth Moor, which had been from an early period set apart for royal sport. On this occasion the Lords of the Privy Council thought "it lyke aneugh that if the necessitie of his princelie afferis and adois will not suffer him to come forder northe," yit many of his train would probably pay a visit to the burgh. They therefore exhorted the magistrates to make suitable preparations, so that no "markis of incivilitie nor tackynnis of penurie and scant" might be discovered among them. They were recommended to have lodgings prepared in the "most handsome, civile, and comelie" order that can be, "with goode bedding, weel washine weel smellit naprie, and with goode clein and cleir weshell, and of sufficient lairgenes; to have viveris for men and horse, to have the streets kept clean, so that no filthe nor middingis be seine vpon the same, and in especial that the commoun way betuixt the burgh and the Auldtoun, be kept cleene, and the middingis thereon forthwith removed, becaus the same is not onlie his Majesties hie way to the Auldtoun, whair the consistorie sittis, and whairunto all the memberis of that judicatorie, and pairtyis haueing to do thair, doth daylie repair, bot the strangeris whilks will repair to your towne at that tyme will be curious to see the Colledge, Church, and otheris monumentis in the Auldtown." In conclusion, they were advised that thair "be no beggaris seene vpoun your streittis nor about your portis."

His Majesty did not on this occasion visit his faithful subjects in Aberdeen, but "twenty worschipful knychtis and worthie gentillmen" in his train did so, and were admitted burgesses. Among these were his Majesty's apothecary, and his fool. The latter received a more substantial testimony of the town's kindness, of which the record is preserved in the accounts:

Item, at command of the magistrattis and counsall, gewin to Archibald Armstrong, his Majesties plesant, quha come to this burght with the Inglish knightis quhen his Majestie was at the huntis in Munremonth, ane Portugall ducat	£53 6 8

Item, to his Majesties violeris that accompaniet the saidis knychtis to this burgh . . . . .	26	13	4
Item, to Alexander Gariauche, commoun cuik, for his service done to the towne the time of the Inglish e knychtis heir being . . . . .	6	13	4

In this burgh, as in all other parts of the country, the necessities of the poor in the period which followed the Reformation, required much of the attention of those in power.* The following arrangement for their support was adopted in 1595: the poor were "deuidit in four rankis, to wit, in babes, decayit persones, houshalderis, leamit and impotent persones, and in sic as war decrepit and auld, borne and bred within this burght, at the leist that hes maid their commoun resort and residence within the same, be the space of thir sevin yeris bypast."

The inhabitants resolved, at a general meeting called to consider of the matter, that each person should receive "ane baib" into his house, and that they should also raise a voluntary contribution for the other classes.

It was a matter of great difficulty to clear the town of stranger beggars, although a person was specially appointed for the purpose. On various occasions there are complaints of the great number of idle persons who resort to the town, who are called "very contagious enemies to the commoun weill of this burgh." On one occasion a remedial ordinance was passed, "that na maner of persone salbe sufferit or permittit to duell within this toun, bot sic as salbe notourlie knawn to have sufficient rent of thair awin, or sum honest moyen, industrie, craft, or occupation, to leine on in tyme cumming." (p. 149.)

It would appear that the Parish Church had been permitted to

* In 1587 we hear of complaints of the "misordour and tumult of the pair folkis sittand at the kirk dur beggand almous, plukand and pulland honest menis gownis, cloikis, and abulzement, throw the quhilk thair is gryt confusioun amangis thame." (p. 60.) It was ordered that in time coming they should not be permitted to "sitt or remane ony wyss asking almous within the kirk nor kirk yard, bot to sit without the stylis," and stranger beggars were again ordered to be removed from the burgh.

remain without much alteration since the Reformation, beyond the removal of the many altars which had been erected in it. In 1596, however, the "carvit timmer wark betuixt the pilleris in the queir" was removed, to make way for a stone wall, to be built between the choir and the nave, so as to convert the former into "ane preiching kirk, for preiching of the word of God, and ministratioun of the sacramentis." (p. 135.)

It is probable that for a long time the necessities of the burgh only required the services of a single physician. In 1596, Maister Quintine Prestoun, professor of physie, "in respect of his debilitie, being sumquhat strickin in aige," craves the council's leave "to interteine ane apothecar with his apothecarie shop, for the better furnesing of this burght and of the cuntrie, of all sort of physical and chirurgicall medicamentis" (p. 144.), which they at once accorded to him. In 1601, the council appointed Maister James Cargill, doctor of physie, to try the qualifications of two "chirurgians," and to report whether "they be meitt and qualifeit to exerce and use the said airt." (p. 218.)

In 1594, when his Majesty came northwards to demolish or dismantle the Keeps of the Popish Lords, he borrowed from the magistrates "twentie stand weycht of poulder, togidder with certain mattockis, gavellokis, and vtheris warklomes and materialls for demolishing and casting down of houssis and fortalices," for the redelivery of which the King and Privy Council gave bond, (p. 102). These warlike instruments were faithfully restored by his Majesty, and thereafter sold, as appears by the accounts of the above year.

Item, the comptar chargis him with the money gotten be him for the irnewark, mattlockis, gavillockis, pickis, and uthir instrumentir furneist be the toun to the demolishing of Strathbogie, Newtoun, and Slanis, quhilkis war ordanit be act of consall to be sauld, quhilkis being sauld, the money gottin thairfor, according to the partiicular compt of the selling thairof, extendis to l. lib. xix. sh. viii. d.

His Majesty appears to have resided in the House of the Earl Marischal during his sojourn in Aberdeen, and the town as usual provided all sort of provisions for his comfort. The following entry in the accounts refers to the spices purchased for the royal use:—

Item, for the spycerie ordanit to be laid in and gevin to the Kingis hous, quhilk was gevin in the quantitie folowing, viz. :—
Four pund of pepper, price of the pund 34s. is	.	.	£6 16 0

Item, ane dussone buistis of confeittis, scorchettis, and confectionis, at viii. s. the buist, is
	.	.	4 16 0

The Earl Marischal having been turned out of his house for his Majesty's accommodation, the Council had to provide a lodging for his Lordship.

Item, at the counsallis command, to Alexander Callens wyff, for the maill of the house to the Erl Merschall during his Majesties being in this toun, £20 0 0

The magistrates were on various occasions brought into considerable perplexity from their anxious attempts to put down Papistry. In 1594, their proceedings in this respect brought them into contact with the three Popish Earls, the representatives of the ancient religion in the north. On the 16th of July of that year, a ship called the Esperance arrived in the harbour from Calais “quhairin is thrie strangearis quha ar suspect to be papistis and traffiqueris.” The magistrates’ supicion arose “be ressone that Mr. James Gordone cam out of Caleis in the said schip, with thame and landit this day furth theirof on the sandis of this burght;” they therefore resolved to seize the ship along with the strangers, and to send them to his Majesty, in charge of twelve of the citizens, (p 91.)

On the following day the three strangers were committed to jail, because the wind was boisterous, so that the ship could not be sent southwards.

On the 18th of July, the magistrates resolved to send a commissioner to his Majesty to notify the arrival of Mr. James Gordon with the three strangers, "to the effect his Majestie may tak sic ordour theiranent as his hienes sall think expedient," * (p. 92.)

Before any farther step could be taken in the matter, however, the magistrates received a letter from the Popish Earls and the Laird of Auchindoun, in which they intimated, that unless the three strangers were forthwith set at liberty, they would not only esteem the citizens of Aberdeen as their enemies in all time coming, but would instantly attack the town with fire and sword, "and it sal be ane perpetuall querrell to stand sa lange as our houses and posteriteis shall last."

After deliberating on this threatening epistle "at gryt lentht," the magistrates "for eschewing of the eminent perrell of the hail toun, being suirlye informit of the gryt forcis of the saidis erlis, mair nor partie to the toun, quha war alreddie lyand about the toun reddie to invaid and persew the samen with fyre and sword, deuisit and ordanit, with uniforme consent, but oppositioune or contradictioun, that rather or the toun suld be put in hazert or perrell, that the saidis thrie strangeris suld be delyuerit to the said erlis, according to the quhilk ordinance the saidis strangeris war delyuerit to thame furth at the portis." (p. 93.)

The magistrates, although the circumstances seemed to leave them no choice in their conduct, did not think themselves safe

* Mr. James Gordon was fourth son of that George, Earl of Huntly, who fell at Corrichie, and uncle of the Earl who took part with the three strangers. He was bred to the church, and was presented to the parsonage of Rhynie when a young man. He was parson of this parish in 1563. (Rec. Parl. 773.) Adhering to the Roman Catholic religion he went abroad, and was admitted a member of the society of Jesus: he also got the degree of Doctor of Theology. He was an active agent of the Roman Catholic Church, to serve which he came repeatedly to Scotland in the reign of James VI., and was thence an object of jealousy and dislike to the new ministers. In February 1587-8, he had a disputation of several hours with the King on the grounds of religion, but without any result. He died on Good Friday in 1620 at Paris in the Jesuits' College in Rue St. Antoine, where he was buried. (Gordon's Hist. of Gordons, vol. ii. p. 119.)

without receiving a discharge for their proceedings in liberating these three men, whose only apparent fault consisted in their being found in the company of Mr. James Gordon, and in being "strangers" to the magistrates of Aberdeen.

The expense of the discharge is entered in the accounts :—

Item, thairefter to the said Jon Andro, be vertew of ane ordinance of counsall, of the dait the fourt of November, 1594, for his panis in forming and registering of the townis discharge, for lating to libertie of the thre strangeris arryving with Mr. James Gordon, ane roiss nobill, at . . . . . £7 6 8

The following mode of punishing the fishermen of Fatty who should cut or interfere with ropes or other goods belonging to ships or boats coming to the harbour, would be considered as too severe by their representatives of the present day. The transgressor was to be "bund to ane staik within the floode merk during the space of thre houris, quhill the water flow round about him," thereafter scourged through the whole town and banished from the same for ever. (p. 209.)

The custom of giving entertainments at funerals has long been considered a great evil, and yet its hold on society seems to be as powerful in our own times as it was several centuries ago. In 1612, the magistrates enacted "that no desert suld be from thyne furth at any lykwalkis in this burght, of quhatsumewir ranck or degrie the defunct be of, bot onlie bread, drink, and cheiss," under a penalty of twenty pounds; and eight years afterwards the fine was levied from three widows who had transgressed the ordinance at the funerals of their husbands. (p. 369.) Another abuse "laitlie croppin in" at burials, arose from the employment of two hand bells, "to go throw the streittis of this burgh, to giwe warning to the nichtbouris of the towne to keip the buriall, the lyke quhairof is not observeit in any wther burgh of this kingdome"; it was ordered, that in future, only one hand bell should be used at burials, under a penalty of ten pounds. (p. 378.)

But the feasting at baptisms also required to be redressed. It is stated in 1622, that of late a great abuse had appeared by "superfluous and costlie banquetting of bairnes, and be convocating of great numberis of people, both men and wemen, thairwnto, and haveing and vseing all sort of succouris, confectionunes, spyceries, and desert brocht from forane pairtis, besyid great superfluitie of venisone and wyld meat of all sortis, and withal using of excessive and extraordinarie drinking and scolling." With the view of improving matters, it was provided that none should hereafter invite "any mae persones to be gossipis or cummeris to any of thair bairnes, bot four gossipis or cummeris at the maist, and that thair salbe bot sex wemen at the maist invited or employed to convoy the bairne to and fra the kirk, nather yit sall thair be any mae persones invited to any denner, supper, or eftirnoones drink at a baptisme bot sex men and sex wemen at the most; and withall, ordanis that nane presume to have at thair banquettis any kynd of succouris, spyceries, droggis, or confectionunes brocht from pairtis beyond sea, nather yit any kynd of wyld meat or bakin meat at thair baptismes, nor yit use at any tyme any excessive drinking or scolling, or urge thair nichtbouris to waught or scole farder nor thair plesour," under a penalty of forty pounds. (p. 391.)

At this time it was ordered that "everie magistrat and counsallar sall repair to the tounes counsal hous at all occasiounes whan the counsall sittis, with honest gownes about thame, as being the most comelie utter garment; and that on the Sabbath day lyikways, and on the preiching dayis in the weik, they sall sitt in thair gownes in the kirk". (p. 383.)

Other regulations on the subject of dress occur. Thus, in 1576, it was ordained that no burgess should wear a plaid from the ensuing feast of St. Martin, in all time thereafter, under a penalty of forty shillings. Again, if he presumed to wear a “bleu bonatt,” he subjected himself to a fine of five pounds. The use of the plaid by the fair sex, required revision about fifty years after this time, when the Magistrates, considering the “incivill forme of behaweour of a great manye women in this burght of gude qualitie, quha resortis both to kirk and mercat with thair playddis about thair headis, and be thair exampell the meaner sort of women uses the samen forme of incivilitie, quhilk gewis offence to strangeris, and occasion to thame to speik reprochefullie of all women generallie within this burght”; (p. 373.) for remedying of which abuse, it was ordered that intimation should be given out of the pulpit, that no women, of whatever degree, should resort to kirk or market in future, having plaids about their heads, nuder certain penalties. But while the use of the plaid was thus proscribed to the burgesses of Aberdeen, we find the Magistrates, about twenty years after the date of the above enactments, bestowing a “propine” on the King’s Justice Depute, which consisted of two of these “incivil” garments.

Item, likwayes for a pair of playdis to Mr. William Hart, his Hienes Justice
Deput,	£10 0 0

It has only to be stated, in conclusion, that it was at one time intended to print selections from the accounts of the burgh, as an appendix to the present volume. Farther consideration has induced the belief that it will be more desirable to print them in a separate volume. A few extracts, however, have been introduced into the preface, with the view of illustrating some of the notices in the text, and of indicating the nature of the accounts themselves.

JOHN STUART.
